When Perry Mason was consulted by an agitated man about the howling of a dog he imagined the case to be a trivial one, but it developed abruptly into one of the most sensational murder mysteries of his career

The CASE OF THE HOWLING DOG

Starring
Warren William and Mary Astor

An Extraordinary Client

THE quiet of Milpas Drive, Los Angeles, was shattered by the dismal howling of a dog, and Arthur Cartwright went to the window of his bed-room and looked out into the darkness, holding a pair of binoculars to his eyes.

He had used those binoculars many times to spy upon his neighbour, Clinton Foley, but to-night all the windows of the house beyond two trim lawns and a common driveway were screened by curtains. With a gesture of helplessness he dropped the glasses upon the seat of an easy-chair and held his hands to his ears as though to shut out the hateful sound.

Other people in Milpas Drive, presumably, had been disturbed by the howling of the dog, but Arthur Cartwright was more than merely disturbed; he was terrified.

He had begun to undress quite a while before the noise had started, but instead of completing his preparations for bed had put on a dressing-gown over shirt and trousers to wander restlessly about the room.

The sound of footsteps in the carpeted passage outside the bed-room reached his shielded ears, and he went to the door. His elderly housekeeper, Elizabeth Walker, was out there with folded sheets and blankets in her arms, evidently on the way to the linen cupboard.

February 9th, 1935.

"Did you hear it?" he demanded huskily.

Mrs. Walker was a prim-looking female dressed primly in black with a starched collar at her neck and an old-fashioned brooch beneath the collar. She was plain of face, and professed to be hard of hearing.

"What did you say?" she asked blankly.

"Did you hear that dog howling next door?" shouted Cartwright.

"I didn't hear any dog," she retorted tartly.

"Oh, it's driving me crazy!" he shivered. "You know, it means a death in the neighbourhood!"

The housekeeper screwed up her face.

"What's that?"

"Oh, nothing!" he exploded.

The howling of the dog persisted, but apparently she was quite unconscious of it.

"I might as well talk to these walls!" he snorted, and dived back into the bed-room and slammed the door.

At eleven o'clock next morning, Perry Mason, attorney-at-law, was seated at his own massive desk in his own elaborately furnished office on the fourth floor of the Hamilton Building, in Hill Street, when his pretty but very efficient private secretary, Della Street, stepped into the room and closed the door carefully behind her.

In the big outer office, and in other rooms on the fourth floor, all sorts of assistants were dealing with all sorts of callers, for Perry Mason was a very successful lawyer and had reached a stage in his career when he could afford to pick and choose, among the cases that were brought to him, those which seemed to merit his own personal attention.

He was a tall man and a handsome one, quiet of manner in the ordinary way, but fierce enough when occasion demanded. His own staff adored him; the district attorney had a very wholesome respect for his cleverness, and wrongdoers as well as perfectly innocent people sought his aid.

A wisp of a moustache adorned his upper lip, his brown hair was brushed well back from a particularly high brow, and a pair of very quick blue eyes could express everything, or nothing, as their owner willed.

"Mr. Mason," said Della Street in her own quiet way, "there's a young man out there with the jitters. I don't know what it's all about, but he seems to have jumpy nerves over a dog that bays the moon."

Perry Mason looked up from a law book which had been engaging his very close attention. His eyes frowned, but his lips smiled, for he had a very considerable regard for the girl who was his secretary.

"You know I can't be bothered with such things," he growled. "Tell him to go in and talk with Morgan—Morgan knows all about dogs."

"He refuses to see anyone but you. Says it's terribly important. He acts so strangely. I wish you'd see him for a minute."

"Well, all right," surrendered Perry Mason, "send him in."

Arthur Cartwright was ushered into the room, and his agitation was manifest. He was not a bad-looking man, but his hands were shaky and his brown eyes were wild.

"Sit down," said Perry Mason. "My secretary told me you wanted to see me about a dog."

"Yes," said Cartwright, dropping into a chair facing the lawyer, "about a dog and a will."

"A will? Oh, well, let's talk about the will first."

"Just as you like."

A cigarette was offered and lit; Perry Mason picked up a pencil.

"First a little personal history," he said. "Your full name?"

"Arthur Cartwright."

"Age?"

"Thirty-two."

"Residence?"

"Four-eight-nine-three Milpas Drive."

"Married or single?"

Cartwright hesitated.

"Do we need to go into that?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Well, I don't think it makes any difference in the kind of will I'm drawing up—I mean on account of the way I'm leaving my property?"

"Just for my own information," insisted Perry Mason. "Your wife's name, please?"

"Evelyn Cartwright, aged twenty-seven."

"Residing with you?"

"No," said Cartwright, and compressed quite a lot of bitterness into the little word.

"Any children?"

"No."

"Very well," Mason leaned back in his chair. "Now then, how do you want to leave your property?"

"Before we go into that," Cartwright burst out, "I want to know if a will is valid no matter how a man dies. Suppose he dies on the gallows, or in the electric chair? You know, suppose he's executed for a murder—then what happens to his will?"

Not by the flicker of an eyelid did Perry Mason betray any surprise at such an extraordinary question.

"It makes no difference how a man dies," he replied quietly. "His will is not affected."

Cartwright seemed relieved.

"All right," he said. "Suppose I write the will entirely in my own handwriting—will I need witnesses?"

"No. A will is valid and binding, in this State, providing the date, contents, and signature are all in your own handwriting, and that there's no other writing on the document."

He opened a drawer of the desk and took out a printed sheet of blue paper.

"Here's a form, if you want it," he said.

Cartwright took the form and put it in his pocket.

"Well, that seems to clear up that point," he sighed. "I intend to leave my property to Mrs. Clinton Foley, living at four-eight-nine-one Milpas Drive."

"A neighbour?"

"Yes."

"Don't have any secrets from your lawyer, Cartwright. I won't betray your confidence."

"That's all there is to it."

Perry Mason was convinced to the contrary, but dismissed the subject.

"All right," he said. "Now let's hear about the dog."

His visitor immediately got to his feet, walked the length of the desk, and clenched his hands,

"A dog has been howling for forty-eight hours," he cried, "mostly at night, but sometimes during the day, and that continual howling is driving me crazy. You know, when a dog howls it's an omen of death in the neighbourhood."

"Where is the dog?" inquired Mason.

"In Clinton Foley's house."

"Suppose you tell me all about it, Cartwright."

Cartwright went back to his chair, but did not sit down.

"Look here," he blurted, "there's one more question about the will. Suppose—suppose Mrs. Clinton Foley shouldn't really be Mrs. Foley. I mean, suppose he divorced the original Mrs. Foley, and this is another one?"

"That wouldn't make any difference," replied Perry Mason, "if you described her in the will as the Mrs. Clinton Foley living at four-eight-nine-one Milpas Drive."

"All right. But suppose the original Mrs. Clinton Foley is still alive?"

"If you leave your property to the woman who is now the wife of Clinton Foley, that's all that will be necessary."

"Ah, good, good!" exclaimed Cartwright. "Now then, about that dog! We've got to do something to stop that howling! I—I want Clinton Foley arrested!"

Perry Mason pushed aside the pad on which he had made notes and pulled a law book towards him.

"I'm afraid I won't be able to handle this matter for you, Mr. Cartwright," he said. "I'm exceptionally busy just now."

Arthur Cartwright gulped.

"Oh, but look here," he shrilled, "you've got to handle it! I'll make it worth your while. I'll pay you—"

He whisked a wad of notes from his breast-pocket and held them out.

"There's ten thousand dollars! There'll be more—more—if you need it!"

Perry Mason looked up at him with a curious expression on his face:

"Ten thousand dollars to handle a case over a howling dog?" he scoffed.

The notes were placed on the blotting-pad before him, but he flipped them aside with his pencil.

"You're forgetting the will!" Cartwright protested. "You're to handle that, too, you know."

For a few seconds Perry Mason studied the distraught young man thoughtfully; then he rose and walked round the desk.

"Ten thousand dollars to handle a case over a howling dog?" scoffed Perry Mason.

"Cartwright," he said impressively, "if I act as your lawyer in this thing. I'm going to do what I think is for your own best interests, no matter what it may be."

"Oh, yes, yes!" agreed Cartwright eagerly. "Of course—I understand. Oh, yes!"

"All right, then just a moment. I want to call in one of my assistants—I want him to hear the facts in the case."

"Sure," nodded Cartwright, and sank down into the chair and passed his hand across his brow as the lawyer went briskly out from the room.

The District Attorney Intervenes

PERRY MASON crossed the general office, but he did not speak to any of his assistants at their various desks. Instead, he proceeded into the corridor and made his way along it to a door that bore upon its frosted panel the inscription, "Dr. Carl Cooper, Psychiatrist."

He opened the door and put his head round it to speak to a little man, dwarfed by the desk at which he was seated—a dapper little man with a blob of a nose and a monocle.

"Oh, doctor," he said cheerfully, "I want you to take a look at a client in my office. I want to know if he's in his right senses."

Dr. Cooper rose instantly.

"What makes you think he may be out of his mind?" he inquired.

"He's just paid me ten thousand dollars, in cash, as a retainer."

"Oh, that settles it!" chuckled the mental specialist. "That's a sure sign of insanity. A distinct departure from the normal."

"I'll say it's a departure from the normal," laughed the lawyer. "Come and have a look at him!"

Arthur Cartwright had been prowling about the room during Perry Mason's absence, but he sat down in the chair again as the handle of the door was turned.

"Mr. Cartwright," purred Mason, "this is my assistant, Mr. Smith."

He perched on the corner of the desk while the little doctor shook hands with the agitated young man and exchanged greetings.

"It's about a dog, Smith," he explained. "Clinton Foley, a neighbour of Mr. Cartwright, has a dog that howls."

"Yes!" cried Cartwright excitedly. "It's a German police dog, and it goes on, and on. That howling's got to be stopped. D'you hear? It's got to be stopped!"

"What makes him howl?" inquired Dr. Cooper, readjusting his monocle.

"Why, Foley makes him howl!" declared Cartwright.

"Why?"

"Oh, because he knows it drives me crazy! You see, it means a death!"

The little psychiatrist pursed his lips and tilted his head.

"How long has it been going on?" he asked.

"It started night before last," was the quavering reply. "I want Foley arrested."

"Now, now, we've got to be careful," said Perry Mason, folding his arms.

"Suppose Foley were to turn round and sue you for malicious prosecution?"

"Oh, he'd do that if he could!" Cartwright declared vehemently. "That's why I came to you. I want to be protected!"

"Very well, then," said the lawyer; "here's what I suggest: We'll acquaint the district attorney's office with the facts in a fair manner, and ask that a letter of warning be sent to Mr. Foley immediately, requesting that he abate the nuisance."

February 9th, 1935.

"No!" shouted Cartwright. "I want him arrested!"

"You've agreed to act on my advice," Mason reminded him. "If the letter warning Mr. Foley has no effect we will then ask that a warrant be issued."

Cartwright's fingers moved spasmodically against one another on his knees.

"All right," he said reluctantly, "but see that Foley's notified right away. Have it sent by special messenger—I can't stand another night of that infernal howling."

"I'll attend to it," promised Mason; and his client rose and looked about the desk for the hat and gloves he had left in the outer office.

"Thank you, gentlemen!" he said. "I'm sorry if I'm upset, but—but I haven't been sleeping much lately."

Perry Mason opened the door for him and crooked a finger at Della Street, who advanced with the hat and gloves. The door was closed, and Mason looked inquiringly at the doctor.

"Well?"

"Of course, I can't make a complete diagnosis on such limited observation," replied Cooper with professional caution, "but I should say it's a case of agitated melancholia."

"Nerves all shot from some great mental stress, eh?" Perry Mason translated into common English. "But he's not insane, is he?"

"Well, he isn't normal."

"I know—but he's not insane?"

Dr. Carl Cooper grinned.

"It isn't, of course, the degree of irresponsibility that would save a man from the penalty for having committed a crime," he said shrewdly, "if that's what you mean."

That was exactly what Perry Mason had meant. He picked up the notes and pocketed them.

"Okay, doctor," he said smilingly. "I guess it's up to me to get rid of that howling dog."

Other matters engaged most of his attention throughout the rest of that day; but the howling dog had become an obsession with Arthur Cartwright, and that night—after he had written for a while at a little desk in the library on the ground floor of his home—he stood at the window with the binoculars in his hands.

He saw Clinton Foley cross the wide hall of the house next door, and for a moment he glimpsed a big German police dog, howling on the mat at the front door. Then a dark-haired girl approached the window of the hall and pulled the curtains across the panes.

Cartwright's mouth was all twisted as he lowered the useless glasses, and the voice of Elizabeth Walker behind him made him jump. She had entered without knocking.

"Excuse me," she said. "I—I thought you'd retired."

"Must you always go prowling around the house?" he flamed at her.

"What?" said the housekeeper. He strode past her to the desk and picked up a large envelope which lay there, addressed to Perry Mason.

"I'm going out to post a letter," he shouted.

"Letter?" she echoed. "Who's it from?"

"Mind your own business!" he bawled. "I'm going out!"

"Oh!" She put down a decanter and a glass she had brought in on a tray and followed him to the door.

"I've always worked for respectable people!" she called after him.

The letter he posted that night was opened by Della Street in Perry Mason's office next morning—in company with many other letters and not a few bills.

"Oh, here's something more from Mr. Cartwright," she said, and held out a sheet of notepaper and the will form, now completed.

"Humm!" mused Perry Mason, as he read what Cartwright had written.

"He says: 'I know, now, why the dog howled. I want you to represent the beneficiary named in the enclosed will, and fight for her interests all the way through.'"

He dropped the letter to study the will.

"Does he leave you something?" inquired Della after a while.

"My, but you're getting mercenary this morning!" quoth her employer with a grin. "He leaves his property nine-tenths to Mrs. Foley and one-tenth to me. He provides— Well!"

"What is it?"

"Why, when he was in here yesterday, he told me he wanted to leave his property to the second Mrs. Foley, living with Clinton Foley in Milpas Drive, but now he leaves his property to the original Mrs. Foley, the divorced wife."

Della Street blinked.

"Oh, that makes a difference, doesn't it?" she exclaimed.

"Of course it does! It means that the original Mrs. Foley, whoever she may be, will now be my client. I've received my fee, and now I'm legally and morally obliged to protect her interests. The question is, what made Cartwright change his mind?"

The telephone bell rang and Della picked up the instrument.

"Yes?" she said. "Oh! It's Mr. Drumm, the district attorney!"

Perry Mason took the telephone from her, and Claude Drumm's none too pleasant voice sounded in his left ear.

"Something's come up that you ought to know about," it informed the listener. "Clinton Foley intends to ask that your client, Arthur Cartwright, be sent to the psychopathic ward for observation as to his sanity."

"Just a moment, Claude," returned Mason. "Did you send that letter of warning, yesterday, to Mr. Foley about his howling dog?"

"Yes, I did," the district attorney replied, "and apparently this howling dog business is all a part of Cartwright's imagination. Foley believes the man's dangerous—that he has a homicidal complex which may cause him to take the law into his own hands. Foley's in my office right now."

"All right," said Mason, "hold him there. I'll be right down."

A Visit to the House

THE district attorney's office was situated on the first floor of the Municipal Building, only a little way along Hill Street, and Perry Mason reached it within ten minutes.

"Come in, Perry, come in," said Drumm, a man of no great stature, but a very keen lawyer whose clean-shaven face bore some slight resemblance to that of the famous film star, James Cagney. "This is Mr. Foley—Mason."

Perry Mason gazed with interest at Clinton Foley. He was a tall man of almost military bearing, with a long nose, a smudge of a moustache, tight lips, and unpleasant eyes. The two men greeted one another formally, and Foley said:

"I've explained the facts to Mr. Drumm here. Your client, Mr. Cartwright, is a very peculiar man. He lives like a hermit, yet he spies on me out of the windows of his house, covering every move I make with binoculars."

Perry Mason dropped into a chair at the end of the district attorney's littered desk and nursed his hat.

"Go on," he said quietly. "I'm listening."

"I'm convinced that Cartwright is a mental case," declared Foley emphatically. "Doesn't know what he's doing—and I have witnesses to substantiate everything I've been saying."

"I'm still listening," said Perry Mason.

"Well, it makes it very difficult for me to keep my servants. I have only one left now—my housekeeper. The cook and the chauffeur left last week. They couldn't stand it any longer."

"Your servants must be highly sensitive individuals," observed Perry Mason, with the barest suggestion of sarcasm in his voice.

"It's annoying to my guests also," bridled Foley. "The man never has the lights in his house turned on—just parades through the dark rooms at night with his binoculars, snooping and spying on everything that goes on in my house."

"Is it a crime to look through binoculars?" asked Perry Mason blandly.

"No," intervened the district attorney with some acerbity, "but that isn't the point, and you know it—the man's insane."

"What makes you think so?"

"Because he has reported a howling dog, and the dog doesn't howl. I propose to see that his sanity is inquired into."

"All right," said Mason, "I'm just warning you! If you sign a complaint alleging that my client is insane, you'd better make a thorough investigation; otherwise there's going to be trouble. All your ideas about the man's insanity are founded on Mr. Foley's statement that the dog doesn't howl—isn't that right?"

Clinton Foley scowled, but Claude Drumm nodded.

"Naturally," he agreed, "but Mr. Foley says he has witnesses to prove his statement."

Perry Mason stood up.

"Until you investigate these witnesses," he said sharply, "how do you know which one is crazy? Maybe Foley is crazy!"

Clinton Foley's unpleasant eyes blazed with fury.

"I beg your pardon!" he exploded, bounding to his feet.

"Gentlemen, please!" protested the district attorney; and then to Mason: "All you ask is that we investigate the facts before we do anything?"

"Right."

The District Attorney picked up the telephone, was put through to the sheriff's office, and asked for Bill Pemberton.

"This is Claude Drumm," he said.

"Listen, Bill, we've got a dispute down here involving a couple of millionaires out on Milpas Drive. There's a question of a howling dog. One of them says the dog howls—the other says it doesn't. One of them says the other man's crazy."

Bill Pemberton, deputy-sheriff of Los Angeles county, a thick-set fellow with a full face and very bushy brows, emitted a fat chuckle.

"That's a hot one!" he exclaimed. "I didn't know the District Attorney had to settle quarrels about dogs. I didn't think you had the time. Why don't you throw those birds out on their ears?"

"I would," laughed Drumm, "only

Perry Mason stood between the two bodies with a finger to his lips, trying to visualise what had happened.

it happens that Perry Mason is here representing one of them. He demands an investigation."

"I'll be right over," decided Pemberton; and in a very few minutes he arrived and was introduced to Clinton Foley.

"Hallo, Perry," he said to Mason.

"Who are the witnesses?"

It was Clinton Foley who replied.

"Well, there's Arthur Cartwright, who claims the dog howls," he said, "and there's Cartwright's housekeeper. She may claim that she heard the dog howl, but you'll find that she's as deaf as a post and couldn't hear thunder! Then there's my wife—of course, she's ill in bed, but she can talk to you. She knows that the dog's as quiet as a mouse. And then there's Miss Benton, my housekeeper."

"How about the dog himself?" suggested Pemberton. "He ought to have something to say about this."

"Well, I think you'll find him a willing witness," said Foley.

"Okay," said the deputy-sheriff. "Then let's get along."

The District Attorney was left in full possession of his room, and the three set off for Milpas Drive in a limousine, which Clinton Foley drove. The city was left behind, the fashionable hill district beyond the Wilshire Boulevard was reached, and they descended from the vehicle in a branch of the concreted way which divided the lawns of the two residences.

Perry Mason gazed quickly about him. He noted various details about the house on the left, which he assumed to be Cartwright's, and the number of windows in Foley's house on that side; but it was Foley's garage that interested him most. Its double doors were open and a touring car was visible inside. Part of the end wall had been knocked down and three workmen were busy erecting the wooden framework of an extension.

"Oh, room for three cars, I see!" he remarked. "Going to drive them all yourself?"

"Why do you ask that?" demanded Foley.

"You said your chauffeur left last week."

"I don't see that it concerns you," Foley snapped, "but I'm putting on an addition to my garage because I happen to want it that way. Any objections?"

"None at all," replied Perry Mason blandly.

Pemberton intervened. "Who do we talk to first?" he inquired, a trifle impatiently.

"Well, suit yourself," said Clinton Foley. "I think after you've talked with my wife you won't need to bother with any more witnesses."

They were crossing the lawn, past two flower borders, when a girl came running out from the house—a brown-haired girl, plainly-dressed, her hair parted down in the middle and plastered down at the sides as though to make herself as unattractive as possible. Her right hand was roughly bandaged and she looked scared.

"Oh, Mr. Foley," she cried, "I—I must see you at once! We've had some trouble."

"My housekeeper," explained Foley.

"What happened?"

"Prince bit me," she replied.

Clinton Foley looked annoyed rather than sympathetic.

"How did it happen?" he asked sharply.

"Oh, I don't know," she faltered, "but I—I think he'd been poisoned. He acted sick, and I forced him to swallow some salt for an emetic. Then he bit me. I shut him up in your bathroom. He's better now."

"These gentlemen," said Foley, "are investigating charges made by neighbours about the dog."

"Just a moment," boomed Pemberton, "let me do the talking. You have a German police dog on the premises named Prince?"

"Yes, sir," replied the girl meekly. "Has he been howling?"

"Howling?" She looked surprised. "Oh, no, sir. He barked once yesterday when a peddler came to the door, but there's been no howling."

"You're sure about that?"

"Oh, positive!"

"You see?" said Foley triumphantly. "Now if you'll talk with my wife I'm sure you'll be satisfied the charges are false."

"Your wife isn't here, Mr. Foley," said the girl.

Perry Mason and the deputy-sheriff exchanged glances. Foley seemed to be astonished.

"Isn't here?" he gasped. "Well, she couldn't have gone out—she's been very ill."

"I know," the girl responded, "but she went just the same. She packed a suitcase and took a taxi. She left a note for you."

"Where is it?" asked Foley gruffly.

"It's upstairs in her room on the dressing-table."

"Will you excuse me?" Foley said hurriedly to his companions, and ran to the steps of the porch and disappeared into the house.

Perry Mason, who had been studying the girl, inquired pointedly:

"Was there any trouble between you and Mrs. Foley just before she left?"

"Certainly not," was the indignant reply, "and, furthermore, it's not any of your business!"

She flounced away to the porch, and Bill Pemberton grinned at Mason.

"That for you!" he remarked.

"Funny thing about that girl," said the lawyer. "She's tried to make herself up to look as ugly as possible. Rather young for a housekeeper, don't you think?"

"Not gossiping, are you, Mason?" jeered the deputy-sheriff.

"No," was the quick reply, "just speculating—that's all."

The Letter

CLINTON FOLEY beckoned from the porch and Perry Mason and the deputy-sheriff joined him in a spacious lounge-hall, excellently furnished.

"Well, it's all over," he said bitterly. "You can call off your little investigation."

"Something wrong?" asked Pemberton.

"My wife's run away with another man," Foley growled. "And it may interest you to know that the man is Arthur Cartwright, the fellow next door who's been raising a fuss about the howling dog! His complaint against me was just a trick to get me out of the way long enough to carry out his scheme."

Perry Mason was not by any means convinced, and he resorted to sarcasm. "That shows you were wrong when you accused him of being crazy, doesn't it?" he said brightly.

"Keep your remarks to yourself!" shouted Foley.

"I'm here representing Cartwright," Mason reminded him. "You can't bluff me, Foley."

"Why, you—"

"Just a minute, folks!" Bill Pemberton commanded, and thrust his bulky form between the two. "Let's not fly off the handle!"

February 9th, 1935.

"You're going to have plenty of work to do for your client, Mr. Mason," Foley bellowed. "I'm going to get out a warrant for his arrest!"

"That's up to the District Attorney," Mason retorted. "How do you know your wife left with Cartwright?"

"Well, she says so in this note. Here, read it!"

The deputy-sheriff appropriated the sheet of paper, and he read aloud from it:

"Dear Clinton, a few days ago I found out who was living next door. I know, now, that I have always loved him and not you. I am going away with him. I know we will be happy. Evelyn."

Perry Mason took the note and examined it, then handed it back to Foley.

"Short and sweet, isn't it?" said Pemberton.

"Yes," said Mason, "but there's something about that letter I don't quite understand yet."

"Look here," stormed Foley, "that man has broken up my home—he's tricked me and betrayed me, and he's going to pay for it. I'll catch him and prosecute him on every charge within the law. If it takes every cent I've got I'm going to make him pay for what he's done to me!"

"That's up to you, Mr. Foley," said Pemberton mildly. "You can talk with the District Attorney's office, and you can put private detectives on their trail."

Perry Mason smiled cryptically. "Do you mind if I use your telephone?" he asked.

"You can use my telephone, and then you can get out!" roared Foley.

"Thanks for the invitation," said Mason. "Where is it?"

The girl who looked too young to be a housekeeper stepped out from the doorway of the drawing-room.

"I'll show you," she said, and Perry Mason followed her across the hall into a panelled study, while the deputy-sheriff took his leave of Clinton Foley and went off to find a taxi.

"How would you like to make twenty dollars in a hurry?" Mason asked the girl as he dialled a number.

"Mr. Foley said you might use the phone, and then you were to leave," she said in a voice that was cold and hard; and he smiled at her in an irritating fashion till Edward Wheeler, one of his assistants, responded to the call.

"Wheeler talkin'. Yes, chief?" "Stand by—you and Dobbs. Important. Throw everything else overboard. I'll be there in half an hour."

The instrument was restored to its prongs, but the smile reappeared on Perry Mason's face.

"If you could find a photograph of the woman who left with Mr. Cartwright," he said to the girl, "it might even be worth twenty-five dollars." "Why should you want a picture of Mr. Foley's wife?" she challenged.

"Did I say his wife?" purred Mason. "Never mind—I'll probably be able to pick one up at Mr. Cartwright's home, next door. Thank you."

He walked serenely past her out into the lounge-hall—now deserted—crossed it to the porch descended the steps, and strolled across the lawns to the house next door, where he rang the bell.

There was no response to the bell, so he banged the knocker with vigour till at last Elizabeth Walker opened the door, viewed him with disfavour, and asked what he wanted.

"I want Mr. Cartwright," he replied.

"Can't hear you," said the woman, and held a hand to her ear. "You'll have to speak a little louder."

Perry Mason, in a voice that would have made any ordinary person jump, bellowed:

"Where is Mr. Cartwright? I'm his lawyer, Mr. Mason."

"Oh, his lawyer," said Mrs. Walker. "Went out last night about half-past ten, and he didn't come back."

"Did he take a suitcase?"

"No."

"Did he take his car?"

"No, he hasn't a car."

"Where did he go?"

"I don't know."

"Look here," shouted Mason, "I've got to find Mr. Cartwright, and you've got to help me."

"I don't know anything about it," she retorted. "He went out, and he didn't come back. Where he went is none of my business. I clean up the house for him, that's all. I'm deaf, and I can't keep track of what's going on."

Perry Mason decided not to ask about any photograph.

"What's your name?" he demanded loudly. "And how long have you known Mr. Cartwright?"

"My name is Elizabeth Walker," she replied. "I've worked for him for two months."

"How long would you stay if Mr. Cartwright didn't return?"

"I'll stay till my time's up."

"When will that be?"

"That's my business, Mr. Lawyer," she bit back at him, and went in and slammed the door in his face.

He glanced over his shoulder at Clinton Foley's house as he made his way across the grass to the drive, and at a window of the lounge-hall he saw the face of the girl peering round a curtain. He waved his hand ironically and went on out to the road.

Three quarters of an hour later he was in his own swivel chair, behind his own massive desk, with Della Street on one side of him and Edward Wheeler and George Dobbs on the other.

To Della he dictated some notes, which she took down in shorthand, and then he turned to his two assistants.

"I want you to find out everything you can about Mr and Mrs. Clinton Foley, living at four-eight-nine-one Milpas Drive," he said. "Check on their housekeeper while you're about it. Also get me all the dope you can on Arthur Cartwright, living next door to them at four-eight-nine-three. Find out where they came from—their past history. Don't spare expenses."

Ed Wheeler, a heavy-featured man with a pair of very bright eyes and a straw hat perched on the back of his head, ventured a question.

"What's the low-down, chief?" he asked.

"That's what I can't figure out," Perry Mason replied quite frankly. "I'm representing Cartwright in a matter that began with a howling dog, but I think there's something fishy about the whole business. Cartwright's disappeared. Foley claims that he ran off with Mrs. Foley. I want the facts of the case as soon as you can get them."

The End of Clinton Foley!

IT was nearly six o'clock in the evening when Ed Wheeler and George Dobbs returned to the office in Hill Street and burst in upon Perry Mason and his secretary.

"Well, we got it," Wheeler announced triumphantly.

"Good!" said Mason, and pushed aside some papers he had been studying.

"We had to burn up the wires," said

Dobbs. "We got a couple of outside agencies working on the case."

"Never mind that—let's have the dope."

Dobbs looked at Wheeler, and Wheeler did the talking.

"The woman living with Foley on Milpas Drive isn't his original wife," he said.

"I had an idea she wasn't," commented the lawyer.

"As a matter of fact, she was the wife of Arthur Cartwright."

"The wife of Arthur Cartwright?" Perry Mason's blue eyes widened.

"Well, that's interesting."

"Yeah," said Ed Wheeler. "Mr. and Mrs. Foley lived at Santa Barbara. They were friendly with Mr. and Mrs. Cartwright."

About a year ago Clinton Foley skipped out with Mrs. Cartwright, got one of those cheap divorces for each of them, and they married one another in Reno. Foley's original wife, Bessie, was broken-hearted, and Cartwright swore he'd get even with Foley and get his wife back if it took him the rest of his life.

About two months ago he traced Foley and Evelyn to Milpas Drive, and moved in next door."

"And now Foley is accusing Cartwright of running away with the woman who was his own wife," said Perry Mason with scorn. "Get Foley on the 'phone, Della."

Della Street looked up the number and dialled it.

"Foley has the reputation of being a pretty rough customer," said Ed Wheeler.

"Suits me," declared his employer. "I'm a fool for a fight myself."

"Here's your call," said Della, and he spoke into the instrument.

"Mr. Foley? This is Perry Mason, the attorney. I want to talk to you. No? Well, perhaps you'd better change your mind. This is about the affairs of a client who lived at Santa Barbara—a married woman whose husband ran off and left her about a year ago. Yes, I thought you'd see me! To-night, at eight, sharp!"

He put down the telephone. "Now, then, what about Foley's housekeeper?" he demanded.

"I checked on her," said Dobbs. "Her name is Lucy Benton. She was Foley's private secretary in Santa Barbara. When he took a ramble with Mrs. Evelyn Cartwright, he took Miss Benton along as his housekeeper. From the dope I get, she didn't know Miss Benton had worked for him before."

"I see," nodded Mason. "What about the divorced wife, Bessie Foley?"

"We haven't got a line on her yet," admitted Wheeler.

"You get busy about her, Ed. Find her for me!"

"Right, chief!" said Wheeler, and went out.

"Della, you'd better stay around here to-night—I may want you later."

"All right, sir," said Della, and Perry Mason looked up at Dobbs.

"George, get out to the Foley home," he directed. "Stay out of sight, but keep your eye on the place. Check everything that goes on. I'll be there at eight."

George Dobbs travelled to Milpas Drive in a taxi, which he dismissed halfway along that palm-fringed thoroughfare. It was dark when he reached the lawns, and no one saw him steal from tree to tree till he had reached the side of the house, where he made himself one with the shadows.

He had been on guard for over half an hour when the front door was opened, and Lucy Benton stepped down from the porch. At almost the same moment a dark coupé appeared in the driveway between the two houses, and the girl sped over to it.

A man whom Dobbs could not see with any distinctness got down and opened the door for her, then climbed back at the wheel. The car was turned, and the light of the rear lamp shone upon its number-plate. George Dobbs took out a notebook and a pencil, looked at his luminous wristwatch, and made a note of the time and the car number.

Ten minutes afterwards a yellow taxi turned into the driveway from the road and came to a standstill between the two lawns. The driver got down from his seat and opened the door for a woman in a dark fur coat.

"That's the one," she said, "the house next door."

"Yes, ma'am," nodded the driver, and he went briskly off to the front door of Cartwright's house while the woman crossed the lawn to the porch of the house Lucy Benton had left.

She found the door slightly ajar and stepped into the brilliantly-lighted lounge-hall, which was deserted. She was quite young and very beautiful, but there was a strained look about her face. She gazed swiftly about her, then went to an elaborate radio cabinet, set against the wall, and turned the switch.

Abruptly there came a burst of music from the loud speaker—and a dog barked. Clinton Foley, who was in the bath-room, shaving himself, put down his razor, wiped the lather from his face with a towel, and unfastened the leash of a German police dog attached to one of the supports of the hand-basin.

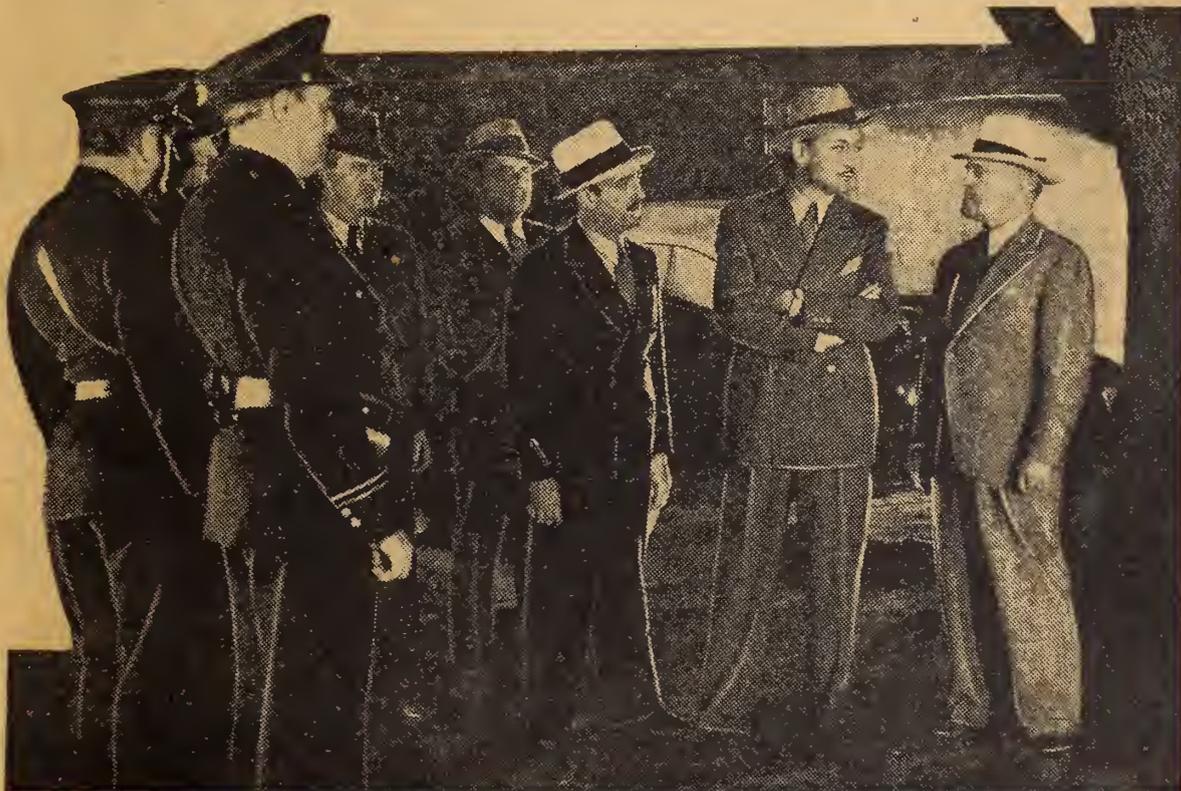

Holding the leash, he went out through the library to the lounge-hall, but stopped short in the double doorway as he saw who was standing there.

"Oh, so it's you!" he rasped. "You've found me!"

"Yes," replied the woman sternly. "I've found you!"

"What do you want?"

"Justice!"

"Well, well," remarked Perry Mason, folding his arms. "The District Attorney himself on the job."

"Rubbish!" he snarled. "You've broken into my home like a common intruder, and I'm going to treat you like one!"

He let go of the dog and snatched up from a side table a paper-knife shaped like a dagger. But before either he or the dog could reach the woman she fired twice with an automatic she had taken from her handbag.

The dog rolled over on its side, and Clinton Foley pitched headlong to the floor and lay still. For several minutes the woman stared down at the two bodies with horrified eyes, then slowly she stepped nearer, dropped the automatic upon the carpet between them, and walked unsteadily to the front door.

The taxi-driver was standing beside his vehicle when she reached it, and in a voice not altogether under control she said:

"Well, where is he?"

"There's nobody home," replied the man. "I knocked and knocked, and

"Well, never mind," she broke in. "Take me to Ninth and Olive."

"Yes, ma'am," said the driver.

George Dobbs, concealed behind some shrubs at the side of the house, made several notes in his pocket-book after the taxi had gone. Among them were these items:

"Taxi 545. Woman in Black. Ninth and Olive."

Almost on the stroke of eight o'clock Perry Mason arrived in his own coupé, descended from it only a few yards away from his watchful assistant, and strode along the path to the open front door.

He rang the bell twice, but there was no answer, and finally he stepped in over the threshold. An acrid smell of burnt powder hung about the lounge-hall, and he looked round, sniffing at the air.

He saw the dog, lying on its side, before he caught sight of Foley. He caught at his breath, stared down at the gun, then stood between the two bodies with a finger to his lips, trying to visualise what had happened.

He stooped over the dog and found a metal disc attached to its collar on which had been punched the inscription "Prince. Property of Clinton Foley, 491, Milpas Drive." He sped to the telephone which he had used that morning, dialled the operator, and asked for Police Headquarters.

He was put through to Captain Kelly. "Hallo, captain," he said. "This is Perry Mason. I'm talking from the home of Clinton Foley, at four-eight-nine-one Milpas Drive; Foley's been murdered."

"Repeat that number," said the voice of the captain. "Four-eight-nine-one, Milpas. Stay right there! Don't touch anything! I'll send Sergeant Holcomb out with the Homicide Squad straight away."

Having replaced the telephone, Perry Mason went out into the porch and called to Dobbs, who ran round the house to him.

"Get out of the neighbourhood as fast as you can," Mason directed. "Keep out of sight, and keep your mouth shut till you see me."

Dobbs made himself scarce, and a very little while afterwards a police car came roaring into the driveway and stopped with a grinding of brakes. Perry Mason walked across the lawn as nine men scrambled down on to the grass, four of them in uniform, five in plain clothes.

The policemen lined up as he approached, and a man in a white soft February 9th, 1935.

felt hat strode forward with an air of importance.

"I'm Detective-sergeant Holcomb," he said. "Where's the body?"

To Perry Mason's surprise Claude Drumm, last to descend from the car, brushed past the other plain-clothes men and waved an imperious hand at the speaker.

"Just a moment, sergeant," he said brusquely. "I'll take charge!"

"Well, well," remarked Perry Mason, folding his arms. "The district attorney himself on the job! Hallo, Claude!"

"How are you, Perry?" returned Drumm. "Thought I'd look into this case personally. Sergeant, assign your men!"

Holcomb turned to the squad. "Cavass the neighbourhood," he barked. "Question anybody you find, and hold anyone who can't give a satisfactory account of himself. You three guys stick to me."

The four policemen went off towards the road; the three plain-clothes men waited.

"Come along," said Mason, and walked towards the house.

The Scented Handkerchief

WHILE flashlight photographs were being taken of the two bodies by an official photographer, Perry Mason leaned against a table in the library and looked from the keen face of the district attorney to the less intelligent face of the detective-sergeant.

Holcomb was broad-shouldered and powerful of build, but his moustache failed to conceal a weak mouth, and his brown eyes were inclined to stare rather than to notice things.

"I had an appointment with Foley at eight o'clock this evening," Mason said quietly. "I found the door open. I rang the bell and no one answered, so I walked in—and found Foley dead."

"You're not holding anything back, are you, Perry?" inquired the district attorney with obvious suspicion; and Mason chuckled.

"Are you insinuating that I might have shot Foley?" he challenged.

"How do we know you didn't?" growled Holcomb.

"I know you represented a client who had trouble with Foley," said the district attorney; and this was news to the detective-sergeant, who exclaimed;

"That's an idea! Maybe he's trying to cover up for him!"

"Maybe I'm trying to cover up for myself," retorted Mason.

"I'm beginning to think so!" Holcomb blustered.

"Then why don't you arrest me?"

"Maybe I will, if you don't come clean on this thing."

Perry Mason laughed, and walked over to a kidney-shaped desk near the bookshelves, where he deposited his hat under a reading-lamp. He was about to pick up a telegram he saw lying on the blotting-pad, when the district attorney pounced on it.

"Dispatched from Ventura to-day," he said, and read aloud: "Clinton, for my sake don't do anything that will cause any more scandal. It won't do any good, and will do us all harm.—EVELYN."

Perry Mason dropped into the chair behind the desk, appearing not to notice a plain-clothes man who had just sauntered into the room and was leaning against a row of books.

"Mind if I see that?" he asked.

Claude Drumm showed him the telegram, but did not part with it. Mason jotted some notes on a pad and pocketed the pad.

"It's quite possible that your client, Arthur Cartwright, really did do the job," said the district attorney. "Worked himself up to a murderous pitch, just as Foley feared he would. The dog tried to protect his master and was shot. Then Cartwright killed Foley. What do you think of that theory?"

Perry Mason raised his hand, and his face was inscrutable.

"Why don't you find Cartwright and ask him?" he said.

"You've probably got him pretty well hidden by now," growled Drumm.

"Why don't you co-operate with us?"

"If you stop this third-degree hokum I may," was the reply, and Mason got to his feet. "Come along!"

Holcomb and the district attorney followed him to the bath-room, and he pointed down to one of the supports of the wash-basin.

"Here's where the dog was chained," he said. "There's the catch-lock that fastened on the dog's collar."

"Well?" queried Drumm; and Mason picked up a crumpled towel from the floor.

"There's shaving lather on this towel," he said.

"What about it?" snorted Holcomb.

"In my opinion, this towel was dropped when Foley released the dog from the catch-lock. Now when a man shaves he doesn't put the lather on a towel—he only does that when he wipes the lather from his face. If Arthur Cartwright wanted to kill Foley, he'd have come here and blazed away without any conversation. But that isn't how it happened."

"You're talking in circles!" Holcomb complained. "Right now we don't care about the lather on the towel. What we care about is Arthur Cartwright. Where is he?"

"I don't know."

"Of course not," said the district attorney with a mirthless laugh. "Look here, the coroner's physician says that Foley died not more than an hour ago. All you've got to do is to show where Cartwright was between seven and eight, and he'll be out of it as a suspect."

"Claude," said Perry Mason, "I've already told you that I don't know where Cartwright is. Look here, you're talking as though I were an accessory after the fact in this murder."

"Yeah," drawled the detective-sergeant, "he thinks you're holding out on us—and so do I!"

"Mason," said Claude Drumm, "you've got the reputation of being one of the shrewdest criminal lawyers in the country, but even the cleverest lawyer sometimes puts his foot in it."

"Meaning," suggested Mason genially as he dropped the towel, "that you're through with asking me questions for the time being?"

"That's it."

"Good-night, gentlemen. Any time I can be of service—"

He went off with a mocking bow, and Holcomb picked up the towel.

"Lather on a towel!" he exploded.

"He knows plenty!"

"Sergeant," said the district attorney, "I want you to shadow Mason. He's up to something, and I want to know what it is. I'll instruct my office to use every effort to locate Cartwright."

"You're right, chief," nodded Holcomb, and flung the offending towel into the bath. "Cartwright's the guy!"

Perry Mason went back to his office, and found George Dobbs there as well as Dellz Street. Dobbs had been making a few inquiries in the city on his own account, and he and his employer went off to a taxi-stand in Main Street.

"This is where that driver hangs out," Dobbs said.

There were six taxicabs on the rank, and they walked over to them.

"Take it is!" cried Dobbs, pointing. "Five forty-five!"

Perry Mason went up to the driver at the wheel of the leading vehicle, a thin-faced and elderly man with a hawk-like nose.

"You busy?" he inquired.

"No, sir," was the ready response. "Where to?"

"Anywhere—just drive around."

"Okay," said the man; and George Dobbs opened the door for his employer and sat down with him in the back.

The taxi slid out into the traffic stream and turned the corner at Ninth Street in the direction of the Wilshire Boulevard.

Its driver slid back the window behind him.

"My meter's running," he announced.

"That's all right," said Perry Mason, leaning forward. "You'll get paid for your meter and a nice tip on top of that."

"What's the gag?" asked the driver dubiously.

"I'm an attorney, and I'm trying to run down a little information for one of my clients."

Flower Street was passed, and Dobbs leaned forward.

"You drove a woman to four-eight-nine-one Milpas Drive this evening," he stated.

"What about it?" asked the driver over his shoulder.

"What did she look like?"

"Oh, she was about medium size—wore a black fur coat. Kinda good-looking—dark eyes. She had on some kind of a perfume that smelled great. She left a handkerchief in the car. Here it is!"

A tiny slip of lace and lawn was removed from a pocket and held over his shoulder with his left hand while the right held the wheel.

"Take a whiff at that!" he said.

Perry Mason acquired the handkerchief and held it to his nose.

"Very nice," he said. "I think I know the brand. 'Bellogia.'"

"Yeah?" said the driver, stopping because the traffic lights were against him at Figueroa Street. "Well, it still smells good to me."

"What else did you notice about this woman?"

"She had a strained sort of voice, and that's all I noticed about her, except that she was wearing black gloves."

"What happened when you got to the house?" asked Mason.

"Oh, why she asked me to go next door and deliver a message. I was to ask for 'Arthur' and tell him he'd better go over to Clinton Foley's house right away, because Bessie was havin' a show-down."

"Did you deliver the message?"

"No." The taxi moved on again along Ninth Street, released with other vehicles by the lights. "No, I kept pounding at the door, but nobody answered. So finally I took my passenger back where I'd picked her up."

Perry Mason reached farther forward.

"Here," he said. "Here's the handkerchief; but I wish you wouldn't turn it into the 'Lost and Found' for a while. I have an idea this woman will show up and ask for it. When she does, get her name and address."

The driver thrust the handkerchief back into his pocket.

"We've got to do that anyhow," he declared. "We got to turn in a report to the company on everything we find in the cab."

George Dobbs, who had been looking out through the little rear window of the vehicle, caught suddenly at his employer's sleeve.

"Police car trailing us," he whispered urgently.

Perry Mason took out a wallet, extracted a note from it, and held it over the driver's shoulder.

"Here!" he said. "Here's a twenty-dollar bill. Drive us around the next corner as fast as you can and let us out. Then you're to drive as far as that money'll take the cab. Another ear is going to follow you, but don't stop for it, and don't let them catch you until you're good and ready."

"Sounds screwy to me," laughed the driver, "but you're payin' for it!"

! At the Breedmont Hotel

HALF an hour later Perry Mason was seated at his own desk in his own private office, with Della Street on one side of him and George Dobbs on the other. The police car had been evaded, and Dobbs was making a report with the aid of his notebook.

"Probably the reason you didn't hear those shots," commented Mason, "was because the driver was banging on Cartwright's door."

"Probably so," agreed his assistant. "And then the radio was playing so loud, too."

"Well, that clears up your report on the yellow cab. Now what about Lucy Benton?"

"She left at seven-fifteen," said Dobbs.

"A man called for her in a Chevie coupé. The licence number was 6M-9245."

"All right." Perry Mason jotted down the number. "Then what?"

"Then the taxicab you know all about. After that nothing happened till you showed up at one minute to eight."

"Fine!" said Mason. "Now here's what I want you to do. A telegram was sent from Ventura to Clinton Foley. It's supposed to have been written by the second Mrs. Foley, who was formerly Mrs. Cartwright. I want a photostatic copy of the original."

"That's a pretty hard job, chief," said Dobbs, rubbing his chin.

"Never mind how much of a job it is. I want you to get it!"

"Okay," said Dobbs.

The door had only just closed behind him when the telephone-bell rang.

Della Street answered the call and handed the instrument to Perry Mason.

"Wheeler on the line," she said.

Ed Wheeler was in a drug-store call-box in Olive Street.

"Breedmont Hotel," he said tersely.

"Ninth and Olive. Room 864, and the name is Mrs. C. M. Dangerfield."

Mason repeated the message and hung up.

"Dangerfield?" said Della. "Who's that?"

"That," replied Mason, "is the name under which Bessie Foley is registered at the Breedmont Hotel."

He rose and put on his hat.

"What are you going to do?" she asked, as he caught hold of her arm.

"You and I are going to pay a social call on a lady who may be arrested at any moment on a charge of murdering her husband."

"Oh!" said Della; and her grey eyes widened.

"Let's go," said he. His car was standing at the kerb

"Are you mistaken, or are you not mistaken?" thundered Perry Mason.

down in the street, but he ignored it, and—a few doors away from the Hamilton Building—stopped a passing taxi, bundled his secretary into it, and sat down beside her.

The Breedmont Hotel was reached—a rather palatial establishment on the corner of Ninth Street and Olive Street—and the two ascended in a lift to the eighth floor. In one of the carpeted corridors Perry Mason knocked on the door of Room 864.

"Who is it?" demanded a feminine voice from within.

"An attorney," he replied loudly. "It's very important."

"I don't want to see anyone!" Mason turned the handle of the door, and it proved to be unlocked. He flung the door wide.

"Come on, Della," he said, and strode into a well-appointed bed-room, past a beautiful auburn-haired woman in a white silk-and-satin wrap, whose dark brown eyes flamed at the intruders.

"Please leave this room at once!" she cried.

"Close the door, Della," said Perry Mason, and Della closed the door.

"If you don't leave," stormed the woman, "I'll phone the police!"

She snatched up a telephone, but Mason immediately clapped his finger on the plunger, holding it down so that the line remained dead.

"Don't bother," he said calmly. "The police will be here soon enough, Mrs. Foley."

Her face paled, and the hand that held the telephone became unsteady. Mason took it from her and replaced it.

"Sit down and listen," he said. "Cut out all this monkey business."

"You'd better do as he tells you," urged Della. "It's for your own good."

Mrs. Foley sank into an armchair, and Perry Mason perched on the edge of a table beside her and folded his arms.

"I know all about you," he said pleasantly. "Don't deny anything—and don't go into hysterics. Your husband deserted you for another woman—Mrs. Evelyn Cartwright. He bought a divorce for himself and for her, and they married. You and Cartwright found them. Clinton Foley has been murdered."

"Murdered?" she shuddered.

"Yes. I specialise in murder cases. My name is Perry Mason."

"Perry Mason? Oh, I'm so glad to see you!"

"I thought you would be," he said grimly. "Now listen. I don't want you to try to explain anything to me yet. Cartwright made a will leaving you his property. He retained me to see that your legal rights were safeguarded."

"He named me in his will?" she said wonderingly. "I—I don't understand."

"Don't waste time! I've got my fee, and I propose to earn it, but if you don't want my services all you've got to do is to say so, and I'll walk out of here right now."

A measure of colour had returned to her cheeks, but she was still badly agitated.

"Oh, don't do that!" she exclaimed tremulously. "I want your services! I need help!"

"All right. Now if anyone questions you about where you were at any time to-night, or what you were doing, tell them you cannot answer any questions unless your attorney is present. That sounds simple, but it may be harder to do than you realise."

"Supposing they ask me—" she began; but he cut her short.

"If they ask you what the weather is—if they ask you how old you are—if they ask you what kind of face-cream

February 9th, 1935.

you use—or anything else—make the same answer: you cannot answer any questions unless your attorney is present."

"I understand," she nodded—and stared in blank astonishment as he slid off the table, walked over to the chest of drawers and picked up a bottle of perfume, removed its stopper and sniffed at its contents.

"Yes, that's it—that's the perfume," he said. "Come here, Della!"

Della went obediently over to him and he showered the perfume all about her neck and shoulders till the bottle was empty.

"What are you doing?" cried Bessie Foley. "That costs a lot of money!"

"It's liable to cost you everything you've got if you're not careful," Perry Mason retorted. "Buy yourself some other distinctly different perfume. Sprinkle it over everything you've got."

"What else?" she asked submissively, as he looked quickly about the room.

"Check out of this hotel right away," he answered. "Go to the Broadway Hotel, on Fifth Street. Register under your right name, and be careful not to leave a back-trail to this place."

He whisked up a black fur coat from the coverlet of the bed.

"Are these the things you've been wearing to-night?"

"Yes," she admitted faintly.

"I want to borrow them for a while." He held up the coat. "Here, Della, slip this on!"

"But you can't take my things!" Bessie Foley objected as Della was helped into the fur coat.

"I said I only wanted to borrow them for a while," Perry Mason brusquely reminded her, and held out a black hat and a pair of black kid gloves. "Della, these, too."

The hat was donned, the gloves were pulled on—and almost fitted the secretary's hands.

"But my—" began Bessie Foley.

"Please do as I say, and don't argue," Mason interrupted. "I'm in a hurry. Don't answer any questions unless I'm present. Good-bye. Come on, Della."

He went out with his transformed secretary, closing the door behind him, and they walked together along the corridor to the lifts.

"I'm afraid you're skating on pretty thin ice, Mr. Mason," said Della, while they were waiting for a cage.

"Well, I haven't fallen through yet," returned her employer with a grin. "Will you skate with me?"

"You know I will," she replied simply.

"All right. Let's see if you can impersonate Mrs. Foley!"

The Police Arrive!

IN Main Street, near the cab-rank, Perry Mason stood in the closed doorway of an office building while Della went over to the yellow taxi in which Bessie Foley had travelled to Milpas Drive. The two had waited a full twenty minutes for it.

"Pardon me," Della said to the lean-faced driver at the wheel. "Didn't I leave my handkerchief in your taxi-cab?"

The odour of a familiar perfume reached the man's nostrils, and he noticed the black fur coat and the black gloves more particularly than her face.

"Yes, I—I guess you did," he hesitated.

"May I have it, please?"

"Sure—er—where was it I took you?"

"Milpas Drive."

"That's right."

He was completely convinced and produced the handkerchief; also a notebook and stub of a pencil.

"That's nifty-smelling scent you use, lady. Er—what's your name and address? I got to make out a report to the Lost and Found Department."

Della took the handkerchief.

"Mrs. Clinton Foley," she said. "Broadway Hotel."

"Foley? F-o-l-e-y?"

"Yes."

"Okay, lady."

She returned to the pavement, dropped the handkerchief as though by accident near the doorway in which Perry Mason lurked, and walked on without a backward glance in the direction of her own home.

Mason smiled to himself as a police car pulled up at the kerb and Detective-sergeant Holcomb got out from it, then strolled over to the handkerchief and picked it up.

Holcomb fell into step with him as he sauntered away.

"Not following me, are you, sergeant?" Perry Mason inquired with an air of amusement.

"Nope, just out for a walk," replied the detective.

"Oh, I see! Well, it's lucky I ran into you. I've got a little something for you. Might be important evidence."

Holcomb accepted the scented handkerchief, but viewed it with scornful eyes.

"First it was a towel," he growled, "now it's a handkerchief. What's this got to do with the case?"

"It was left in Yellow Cab 545 by the woman who went to Clinton Foley's house shortly after seven o'clock this evening," replied Mason. "I thought you might be interested."

"You bet your neck I am!" exclaimed Holcomb, staring at him.

"How did you get hold of this?"

"I'm not at liberty to explain that. You can get all the information you want from the taxi-driver."

"Now see here, Mason—"

"You see here yourself, Holcomb! An attorney is supposed to guard the confidences of his client. You can't drag anything more out of me. You've got the handkerchief, so good-night, sergeant."

He stopped a passing taxi.

"Broadway Hotel," he said to the driver, "and make it snappy."

Detective-sergeant Holcomb heard, and he stood holding the handkerchief while the lawyer entered the vehicle and was driven away.

The Broadway Hotel, in Fifth Street, was reached in less than ten minutes, and in less than fifteen Perry Mason was in a room on the third floor which Bessie Foley had engaged only a very little while before.

She had just taken off a tweed coat and a little grey hat and was dressed plainly in a dark blue frock with a white collar and cuffs. She seemed far more composed than she had done about an hour earlier, and she accepted a cigarette, which he lit for her; but she became badly upset again when he asked her to tell him exactly what happened when she went to see her former husband.

"How did you know I went there?" she gasped.

"It's my business to know things," he replied. "Give me the details."

She sat down in a chair, eyeing him with consternation.

"Well, when I got to the house," she said after a while, "the door was unfastened. I wanted to see Clinton without giving him a chance to prepare for my visit, so I went in. Wo—we had a few words. He let his dog loose. Suddenly there was a shot—the dog was killed. Clinton rushed in, and there—there was another shot, and he fell dead.

"Your Honour," cried the District Attorney, "in the name of common decency I demand an adjournment!"

"Who fired the shots?" he asked, watching her eyes.

"I don't know," she replied slowly.

"Was there anybody in the room besides yourself and Mr. Foley?"

"I didn't see anyone."

"Could someone have been concealed in the room?"

"Either that, or someone might have fired the shots through the open door. It closed right after the shots were fired."

"What did you do?"

"All I could think of was running away. I knew that I might be suspected of having done the shooting."

"Hmm. I suppose you have no way of showing that you didn't do it?"

"No," she admitted, and bit her lip because it was quivering.

"A gun was found lying on the floor," said Perry Mason abruptly. "Was it your gun?"

"No."

"Did you ever have a gun like it?"

"No. I never saw the gun." She clasped her hands together. "I tell you I didn't have a thing to do with it! Why won't you believe me? I'm telling the truth!"

"All right," said Mason quietly. "We'll let it go at that. What happened next?"

"I had sent the taxi-driver next door to call Arthur Cartwright, but he wasn't home. I was panie-stricken! I went out and had the driver take me back to the vicinity of my hotel. I figured that nobody would ever be able to trace me. I don't know how you found out about it!"

"Did you know that you left a handkerchief behind in the taxi?"

"Good heavens, no!" she gasped. "Where is it?"

"The police have it," he said, and added in the most casual fashion: "I gave it to them."

She sprang to her feet in horror.

"I thought you were acting as my lawyer!" she shrieked. "They'll be able to trace me through that handkerchief!"

"That's all right," he returned cheerfully. "They're going to trace you, anyway—and they're going to question you. You can't afford to lie to them, and you can't afford to tell the truth. You're in a jam, and you've got to keep quiet. Do you understand that?"

"But everybody will be prejudiced against me," she faltered. "It'll make them think I'm guilty! The newspapers will say that I refuse to talk."

He got up and pushed her gently back into her chair.

"Don't worry about that," he said. "You can tell the police and the reporters that you want to talk, but that I won't let you. Tell them you could easily explain everything, if I'd only give you permission to tell your story. You can even call me up on the telephone in their presence and plead with me for permission to talk. Put it on big! I'll sit tight and say that the minute you talk you'll have to get another lawyer."

She drew a long breath.

"Do you think I'll be arrested?" she quavered.

"Certainly you'll be arrested," he replied with calm. "You were in the house when Foley was murdered. You didn't notify the police. You registered at an hotel under an assumed name. If you think you can pull a stunt like that and get away with it, you're crazy!"

"Oh, I don't think I can stand it!" she said brokenly. "How soon do you think they—they'll come for me?"

There was an imperious knock at the door, and Perry Mason replied:

"Right now!"

He was not mistaken. Detective-sergeant Holcomb was on the other side of the door, and with him were two plain-clothes men.

"Open up, there!" bellowed Holcomb. "We're officers! Open up, there!"

Bessie Foley flew to an open window with the obvious intention of flinging herself out from it. But Perry Mason grabbed hold of her before she could mount the sill, and he pulled her back and held her tightly in his arms.

"That won't do any good," he chided. "Get a grip on yourself. If you can keep your head, I'll manage everything. Ready now—chin up!"

She raised her head with an effort and tried to smile. Somehow the grip of his arms seemed to have given her courage.

"Rely on me entirely," he said, and let go of her to open the door.

Holcomb burst into the room with his companions, and his eyes were as fierce as his tongue as he shouted at Perry Mason:

"What are you doin' here?"

"I'm talking with my client, Mrs. Bessie Foley, divorced wife of Clinton Foley," returned Mason with a mocking bow. "Does that answer your question?"

"You bet your neck it does!" rasped the detective. "And I know, now, where you got that handkerchief! Mrs. Foley, you're under arrest, charged with the murder of your husband—and I must warn you that whatever you say may be used against you."

"That's all right, sergeant," purred Mason, "she won't say anything."

The two plain-clothes men caught hold of Bessie Foley's arms, but she kept her chin up. Holcomb dived over to the dressing-table and snatched up a bottle.

"Don't bother, sergeant," said Perry Mason genially. "It's not the same perfume."

"You'd see to that all right!" snorted the detective; but he sniffed at the bottle and at the handkerchief before he went out with his assistants and their beautiful prisoner.

Mason Makes an Offer

NEWSSBOYS were shouting in Hill Street next morning when Perry Mason got out from his coupe and crossed the pavement to the doorway of the Hamilton Building. He declined a paper that was thrust almost under his nose and grinned at Detective-sergeant Holcomb, who was leaning against the wall.

"Hallo there, sergeant!" he greeted, and stopped to re-light his pipe. "I missed you when I got home last night. I expected to find you peeping in at my windows."

"Well, Mr. Wise-Guy," drawled the detective, "if you knew what I know you wouldn't be so sure of yourself! We've positively identified the gun found in Foley's house—the gun that killed him and his police dog."

Perry Mason's grin broadened. "That's very interesting," he remarked. "How do you do that?"

"We traced it by the numbers," boasted Holcomb, "and we got a report on its sale. It was bought by Bessie Foley, of Santa Barbara, two days before her husband ran away with Evelyn Cartwright. What d'you think about that?"

"It's the best news I've heard to-day," declared Mason. "Keep up the good work, sergeant."

He ascended to his office, leaving a puzzled detective behind; but in less than an hour he was seated at a little desk in a room almost adjoining the cells in the city gaol, and Bessie Foley was seated on the other side of the desk.

Other lawyers were talking to other feminine prisoners across similar desks dotted about the room, and a woman warder paced up and down the floor. Bessie Foley's face was very white and there were shadows under her eyes; but she seemed almost calm.

"How do you do, Mrs. Foley!" said Mason, depositing a leather satchel and his hat on the desk. "Police-sergeant Holcomb has traced that gun to you. Why did you lie to me about it?"

"I didn't lie," she replied. "I—I just forgot. Two days before my husband left Santa Barbara I found out about his affair with Evelyn Cartwright. I went to a sporting-goods store and bought the automatic."

Perry Mason smiled. "What did you intend to do with it?" he inquired. "Use it on your husband—or on Mrs. Cartwright?"

"I don't know," she said vaguely. "My husband took it away from me because I threatened to kill myself with it in his presence—and I haven't seen it since."

"Then your idea is that someone got possession of the gun and committed the crime? How about Lucy Benton, the housekeeper?"

"Oh, why should she want to kill him?"

"I don't know," confessed Mason. "Why should anybody want to kill him? The fact remains that he's dead, and you're charged with committing the murder."

She looked at him reproachfully. "You don't believe what I've told you about the gun," she said.

"I never believe anything I can't make a jury believe," he retorted evenly, "and I'm not at all sure that I can make a jury believe about that gun."

She put her arms on her portion of the desk and leaned nearer to him, her mouth working.

"I want to tell you something," she began impulsively. "My husband was cruel—unprincipled. He humiliated me—"

"Do you want me to help convict you, or defend you?" Perry Mason interrupted sharply, and he got to his feet and picked up his hat and his satchel. "Good-bye, Mrs. Foley—and remember, no one ever got into trouble by not talking too much!"

Without another word, without even a backward glance, he walked straight out of the visitors' room, and the matron tapped Bessie Foley's bowed shoulders.

It was not till late in the afternoon of the following day that Ed Wheeler put in an appearance at his employer's office with the photostatic copy of the telegram dispatched to Foley from the little city of Ventura, on the coast above Santa Barbara.

George Dobbs and Della Street were present, and Perry Mason said:

"All right, now let's check up and see where we stand. How about this phoney housekeeper, Lucy Benton?"

"She's got an alibi that covers every minute of her time from the moment she left the house," reported Dobbs. "The man who called for her in the coupé is Carl Trask—he was Foley's chauffeur. He's got something of a police record."

"Good!" said Perry Mason. "Crack down on him. Find out if he saw Miss Benton the day after the killing."

MAURICE MURPHY

in

"TAILSPIN TOMMY."

War in the Air. High-speed thrills in a grim life or death vendetta between rivals in aviation. Don't miss the opening chapters of this smashing serial of a youngster's ambition to become an ace pilot and the adventures that befell him in his career.

"NAME THE WOMAN."

As a cub reporter, Clem Rogers made many mistakes, but when District Attorney Forbes was murdered luck favoured him and he beat all the experienced press-men to the story behind the crime in a whirlwind of dangerous adventure. Starring Richard Cromwell.

"THE MAN WHO KNEW TOO MUCH."

A gang of assassins planned a ghastly crime, but a Secret Service agent knew of their plans and they killed him. But the dying man managed to gasp out a few of the facts that he had learned and the gang adopted strange and drastic methods to preserve their secret. Starring Leslie Banks, Edna Best and Nova Filbeam.

Ed Wheeler produced a number of photostatic prints on which printed matter and handwriting appeared in white on a black background.

"These are the samples of handwriting you asked for," he said. "Now this is Mrs. Bessie Foley's handwriting, and this is the dame's who was Mrs. Cartwright. Here's some of the stuff that Benton girl wrote."

Perry Mason spread the prints upon his blotting-pad and asked for the copy of the note the second Mrs. Foley had left behind on the day of her supposed departure with Arthur Cartwright. Della Street brought it to him, and he studied it; the prints in turn.

"None of them match," he said disgustedly. "Even a handwriting expert couldn't find any resemblance!"

He worried the ends of his little moustache and frowned at the prints.

"I've got a hunch!" he announced suddenly, and looked up at Dobbs. "Remember the Benton woman was bitten by Foley's police dog? Is her hand still bandaged?"

"Yeah," nodded George Dobbs. "I checked on her at the Riverview Apartments early this morning—she's still bandaged, hand, wrist and elbow."

"Della," said Mason crisply, "ring up the Riverview Apartments and get Miss Benton on the line. Tell her it's the—er—the 'Chronicle' calling."

Della gaped, but obeyed. A few minutes later she handed over the instrument, and Perry Mason said in a feigned voice:

"City editor speaking. Miss Lucy Benton? Oh, Miss Benton, it looks like there's going to be a lot of—er—dramatic interest in the Foley murder case. You've been with the people concerned for a long time. Did you—er—keep a diary?"

Lucy Benton, in the snug little sitting-room of a service flat on the fourth floor of the Riverview Apartment House, overlooking the Los Angeles River in Alameda Street, frowned at a picture on the wall and inquired cautiously:

"Why do you ask?"

"For a very good reason," replied Mason. "In case you did keep a diary, we're prepared to pay you ten thousand dollars for the exclusive right to publish it."

"Ten thousand dollars?" echoed Lucy Benton. "Why—why, yes—yes, of course I'm interested. I—I—"

"Well, keep that diary up to date, will you?" said Mason. "Don't say anything about this offer. I'll have one of my reporters get in touch with you in a few days. Naturally, we'll have to see it before we close the deal."

Lucy Benton's voice sounded quite excited as she replied:

"Why, certainly. I—I understand."

"All right," said Perry Mason. "That's all."

He put down the telephone and grinned at his assistants.

"Do you think she did keep a diary?" asked Della Street.

"I don't know, and I don't care," was the reply. "The way I made the offer she'll have time to fake one. A girl can do a lot of writing for ten thousand dollars!"

Ho leaned back in his chair and lit a cigarette.

Outlaws of the clouds, at war with the men of the U.S. Flying Service. A non-stop drama of a young pilot's fight to track down a dangerous gang of smugglers and clear his name of an undeserved stigma, featuring Ray Walker and Jacqueline Wells

Border Buddies

THE time was eight-fifteen in the morning, and the place was a bed-sitting-room in a comfortable lodging-house on the outskirts of San Antonio, Texas. The room was occupied by the recumbent figures of two young men belonging to the U.S. Border Patrol and billeted within ten minutes' walk of their depot.

An alarm clock buzzed startlingly, and its bell finally succeeded in awakening one of the sleepers. He was Lieutenant Pete Taylor, and with sundry grunts of disgust he reached over and clutched the offending clock sleepily. Then he removed it from the proximity of his bed by the simple process of tossing it across the room.

It fell on the pillow of his comrade's resting-place at the other side of the apartment, and that worthy in turn was aroused by that insistent clamour of the time-piece. With a drowsily impatient gesture he pitched it to the floor, and then all at once, as some penetrating thought took form in his befogged brain, he sat up with a spasmodic jerk, flung off the bed-clothes and planted his feet on the carpet.

The young man thus transformed from slothfulness to vigorous activity was Lieutenant Nicholas Terris, more commonly known as Nick. He was also one of the ace pilots of the Border Patrol; a handsome fellow of genial temperament and dare-devil character, with a sunburned, humorous face, a pair of keen, grey-blue eyes and a thatch of smooth, light-brown hair that was generally brushed to perfection, though at the moment it was straggling over his forehead.

Nick began to wash and shave with hot haste but scrupulous care, and presently his movements awakened Pete Taylor again. The latter raised himself and blinked at his comrade, surprised by the unwonted alacrity with which Nick was preparing to greet a new day.

"Hey, what's the rush?" Pete demanded. "This is the first time I've known you to be up before me in months."

Nick was busily scraping his chin with a safety-razor.

"If you must know," he remarked, "my girl's coming home to-day. She's arriving on the boat from Mexico."

The effect of these words on Pete Taylor was remarkable. He fairly leaped out of bed, six feet of wiry and agile humanity, with a shock of crisp, dark hair and a determined jaw.

"Your girl, huh?" he scoffed. "Well, listen, mug—believe it or not—I'm going to make a date with her for to-night. That's what I call irony."

Now Nick Terris and Pete Taylor were fast friends, and though they were for ever chaffing each other, any man who might have tried to do one of them an injury would have had to deal with both of them. Not even the fact that they were in love with the same girl had spoiled their comradeship—the girl in question being Janet Curtis, the daughter of their colonel.

Within sixty seconds of rising from his bed, Pete Taylor reached under his pillow in search of a certain prized possession, and, on failing to find it there, he ripped out an exclamation and darted a suspicious glance at his fellow-pilot.

"Hey, wise guy, where's that photograph Janet gave me?" he stormed. "Come on, what have you done with it?"

No answer being volunteered, he blundered towards Nick's bed, and under the pillow he found two photographs of winsome Janet Curtis; one, the picture with which he himself had been presented, the other an identical copy of the same photo. Both were signed in Janet's own handwriting, and bore affectionate messages.

"Say, how did you come by one of these?" Pete wanted to know.

"Janet sent me one," his comrade rejoined airily. "Take a look at what she calls me. 'To dearest Nick.'"

"Ah, just a figure of speech," Pete said in derisive accents. "She really means what she's written on the picture that she sent to me. And, boy, you should have read the letter that came with it."

"I did," Nick observed carelessly. "You did?" Pete roared, beginning to advance on him threateningly. "Why, you double-crossing—"

He was interrupted by the appearance of the landlady, who announced that breakfast was ready, and mastering his wrath, Pete started to wash, shave and dress.

Three quarters of an hour later, Lieutenants Terris and Taylor reported at the aerodrome of the squadron to which they belonged, the pair of them looking spick and span in their khaki uniforms and peaked hats; and shortly after their arrival, Pete Taylor was accosted by Janet's father, Colonel Curtis, just outside the wireless office.

Colonel Curtis was a veteran of the Force, a powerfully-built, well-preserved man of fifty, rugged of feature and of somewhat hasty temper, yet immensely popular with his men.

Returning Pete's respectful salute, he fired a question at the young pilot.

"Where is Lieutenant Terris?" he asked.

"Why—I—er think Lieutenant Terris is in the wireless-room, sir," Pete answered a little uncomfortably.

Nick was in the wireless-room all right, despatching a radiogram to the s.s. Meridian, the boat in which Janet Curtis was travelling home. Presently he heard his colonel's voice summoning him, and hurrying forth, he joined Pete and the commanding officer, standing to attention before the latter.

"Lieutenant Terris," the colonel announced, "I want you to patrol Section Four to-day. Is that clear?"

Nick's face fell. Section Four embraced that corner of Texas which lies between the Laguna de la Madre and the great curve of the Rio Grande. He had rather hoped that he would be assigned to the job of reconnoitring the open sea, through which the s.s. Meridian was ploughing towards Galveston.

"Section Four," Nick reiterated. "Well, sir, I—I was just thinking that someone should take a look over the Gulf of Mexico this morning."

The features of Colonel Curtis seemed to harden.

"Someone will, Lieutenant," he said grimly. "You know, I appreciate your enthusiasm, which makes you think when you're off duty. But—you will still patrol Section Four."

Peter Taylor smirked discreetly behind his hand. Then he himself came under the steady gaze of Janet's father.

"You, Lieutenant Taylor, will patrol the border between Sections Two and Four," the colonel stated.

It was Pete's turn to register disappointment, for he had imagined that he might be detailed for duty over the gulf.

"The border?" he faltered. "Oh, no doubt the order is unusual, but you'll have to humour me," Colonel Curtis remarked with heavy sarcasm. "You see, every now and then I get the idea that this is the Border Patrol."

Within a few minutes the two discomfited pilots were ascending in their respective 'planes, but, once out of sight of the airport, neither of them paid any heed to the instructions he had received, and if old man Curtis had been able to spy them about half an hour later he might have torn his hair with rage. For Lieutenants Terris and Taylor were calmly flying on a parallel course over the blue waters of the Mexican Gulf.

Through the radio-phones that were attached to his helmet Pete Taylor suddenly heard the voice of his buddy.

"Calling Patrol 'Plane Seven. Calling Patrol 'Plane Seven. Where are you, mug?"

Pete Taylor answered the query through his microphone with a twisted grin.

"Patrolling the border, sweetheart. Where are you?"

"Flyin' over Section Four," Nick came back at him, glancing through space at the other machine as he framed his reply.

"You'd better be," observed the voice of Pete Taylor. "An' don't go near the steamship Meridian."

Fifteen minutes after this exchange of pleasantries the two Government flyers discerned their common objective, a sleek passenger steamer which was raking its way northward through calm waters, and with one accord the airmen proceeded to swoop closer to it and perform a series of hair-raising feats.

They were watched by groups of men and women lining the steamship's rail, and among those onlookers was a girl whom both aviators managed to pick out in the course of their aerial acrobatics.

She was Janet Curtis, the dark-haired little lady who had charmed their hearts and turned their heads, and she was quick to recognise the identification marks on the two 'planes.

"Why, it's Nick Terris and Pete Taylor!" she exclaimed to a tall, sallow individual with whom she had been in conversation. "Oh, how marvellous of them to come out and welcome me home to the Old Country! It's just typical of them, too!"

The man at her side said nothing. As he followed the evolutions of the two aeroplanes a slight sneer was playing around his thin-lipped mouth. Then he saw the machines straighten out and turn away from the steamship in a graceful manoeuvre.

Up in the forward cockpit of the 'plane that he was occupying, Nick Terris was talking to Pete via his radio attachment. His face had lost its habitual geniality, and he looked pretty fierce.

"Did you see Harland?" he demanded.

"Harland?" came the voice of Pete. "You mean Captain Harland, the guy that had to quit the service? Is he on the boat?"

"He sure is, and he's right where either of us would be if we were aboard. Alongside of Janet."

There was a brief pause, and then Pete's voice reached Nick's ears again—a voice that seemed to rasp harshly through the earphones.

"That rat—beside Janet, I'd like to choke the life out of him!"

"I'd like to be ahead of you and do the same," Nick rejoined.

Meanwhile, on the deck of the s.s. Meridian, Janet Curtis and Frank Harland had been joined by an elderly man in the uniform of the merchant service. He was the captain of the ship, at whose table Janet had had the honour of dining all through the voyage from Vera Cruz, seven hundred miles to the south.

Like everyone else, the skipper had been watching the reckless stunt-flying of the two young government pilots, and the expression on his face was one that seemed to strike a balance between amusement and sourness as he came up to Janet.

"Oh, good morning, captain," the girl greeted him. "Did you see the patrol pilots flying around your ship just now? Weren't they thrilling?"

"A couple of fools, if you want my candid opinion," the skipper grunted. "By the way, I've just had a radiogram in which you might be interested."

He handed a message to her, and Janet read as follows:

"There's a pretty little bundle of 'It' aboard your ship that answers to the name of Janet Curtis. She's your future daughter-in-law, dad. Introduce yourself.—Nick."

Janet gave vent to an ejaculation of surprise, and then looked up quickly. "Oh, you dear," she said. "I didn't know you were Nick's father."

"And I didn't connect you with the young lady he's always telling me about whenever I go ashore," Captain Terris answered with a smile.

During the foregoing conversation, Frank Harland had been standing by in silence, and now Janet turned towards him.

"Oh, Captain Terris," she mentioned, "Captain Harland was in the Border Patrol, and he knew Nick—didn't you, Frank?"

"Yes, I knew him," Harland rejoined airily.

"Why did you leave the Service, Frank?" the girl asked.

For the moment Harland seemed a trifle confused. Then he shrugged his shoulders.

"I found it rather dull," he said. "He found it rather dull, Captain Terris," Janet reiterated in an ineredulous tone. "Can you imagine such a thing, after watching your son and Pete Taylor just now?"

"Maybe Captain Harland wasn't so crazy as those boys," Nick's father remarked. "I reckon those two rascals could get a kick out of a lame mule."

"Perhaps you're right," Janet laughed. "But listen, I'll be seeing Nick to-night, at a big Aviation Dance which is to be held. Can I give him any message from you?"

The skipper of the Meridian smiled grimly.

"Yes," he declared, "if he's still alive by that time you might say to him that there are other ways of winning a young lady besides trying to break his fool neck."

Frank Harland Again

THAT night the Border Patrol was represented in force at the aviation dance, but there were also a good many civilian flyers present, and among these was the man who had been talking to Janet Curtis at the Meridian's rail earlier in the day.

Harland was far from popular with his one-time comrades of the patrol, for, although esprit de corps forbade the government pilots to refer to the subject even among themselves, every man knew that Harland had left the Service under a cloud.

The fellow who did that was not generally the victim of a public scandal, if such could be avoided, but he was deliberately "cut" by the other members of the Force. Consequently Harland was not made very welcome by his former colleagues at to-night's affair, and none resented his presence more than Nick Terris and Pete Taylor.

When Nick and Pete showed up at the dance, Frank Harland had just started a waltz with Janet, and the two friends looked grim as they saw the man weaving his way across the floor with the colonel's daughter in his arms.

The particular dance in question was an "Excuse me" number. In other words, a fellow without a partner was entitled to accost any man on the floor and request him to give up the lady with whom he happened to be paired.

"This is where I separate Harland from Janet," Nick growled.

"Go ahead," Pete stated. "I'll rescue Janet from you after you've had one turn around the floor."

Nick made a pass at him, and then edged his way through the crowd of dancers until he was alongside the colonel's daughter and Frank Harland. "Excuse me," he said grimly, tapping the man on the shoulder.

Harland stopped dancing, took his arm from Janet's waist and looked at Nick impatiently.

"Say, what about letting Miss Curtis and I get round the hall?" he snapped. "We've only just started."

"That's too bad," Nick remarked in icy tones.

An angry glitter appeared in Harland's eyes. He was quick to sense the aloofness and hostility of Nick's manner. "You don't seem to like me, Terris," he said. "What's the idea of the cold shoulder?"

"I think you know," was the curt reply.

"I don't know," Harland retorted, "and I don't care for your attitude."
 "Then why don't you leave?" Nick suggested.

A sudden expression of contempt and derision seemed to cross the other's face. "I think I get you," he sneered. "You're worrying about the honour of the Force, is that it?"

"It might have something to do with that," Nick said crisply. "But maybe I just don't like your face—or anything about you."

Harland lost his temper at that and stepped towards Nick threateningly. As for the younger man, he needed no further provocation than the ominous look on the ex-captain's features, and his right came across in a smashing punch that took his opponent on the point of the jaw.

The crack of the blow was heard all over the room, and Harland went down like a skittled ninepin. At the same time an involuntary cry of alarm escaped Janet, a cry that was followed by an uproar of voices as men and women crowded around the scene of the altercation.

"Nick!" Janet exclaimed. "Nick, have you forgotten where you are?"

The stalwart figure of her father thrust his way into view. He had been drinking a cup of claret with a friend when he had become aware of the quarrel on the dance-floor, and, although he had no liking for Harland, he was enraged at one of his subordinates creating a disturbance.

"Lieutenant Terris," he ground out, "I think you'd better leave."

Nick had drawn back, already a little ashamed of his hastiness.

"Yes, sir," he mumbled, and, with an apologetic glance at Janet, he made his way from the room.

He had been gone several minutes before Frank Harland was revived, and even then the former patrol pilot was in no condition to dance. He left the hall with a truculent expression on his sallow countenance, plainly nursing a grudge against the youngster who had bruised his jaw—a grudge that was to be repaid in full before very long.

Harland was not the man to forget a hurt, and, two or three days later, several circumstances combined to show him how he could take his revenge on Nick Terris. In short, through his connection with a gang of rogues whom he had joined after leaving the patrol, he was able to strike a dire blow at the young lieutenant.

Harland and his confederates were men who dealt in smuggling, robbery and any other criminal activities that presented a chance of earning easy money. The latest coup they had planned was a raid on the First National Bank at a small town known as Cajon, a hundred miles north of the border; and, while two of the gang who answered to the names of Mike Jordan and Paul Henty, were motoring towards the neighbourhood of Cajon, Frank Harland and an associate named Powell might have been located at a lonely hut of adobe fifteen miles within Mexican territory.

Inside that hut was a wireless transmitting set, and Harland was posted at the instrument. Powell was seated close to him, a big, thick-set individual with coarse features.

"Jordan an' Henty ought to be close to Cajon by now," said Powell, looking at his watch. "You'd better get Terris soon, or the whole job will fall through. Remember, everything's been timed to the minute."

"You're right," jerked Harland, who was wearing a pair of earphones, "and this is where we get busy. Patrol headquarters are off the air now."

"Yeah, but are you sure Terris is in the air?"

"Certainly I am," Harland retorted. "I'm not working in the dark, Powell, believe me. Terris was to go on duty this morning and patrol Section Five, between Del Rio and Eagle Pass. We'll make contact with him all right."

He pulled a scarf around his mouth and began to speak into the set.

"Patrol Base calling 'Plane Number Six. Patrol Base calling 'Plane Number Six. Lieutenant Terris. Patrol Base calling 'Plane Number Six."

He was carefully manipulating a dial on the radio set while he talked, and all at once, some eighty miles to the north and five thousand feet above the hills and valleys of Texas, a lone flyer picked up the signal on his receiving equipment.

"'Plane Number Six answering. Lieutenant Terris here."

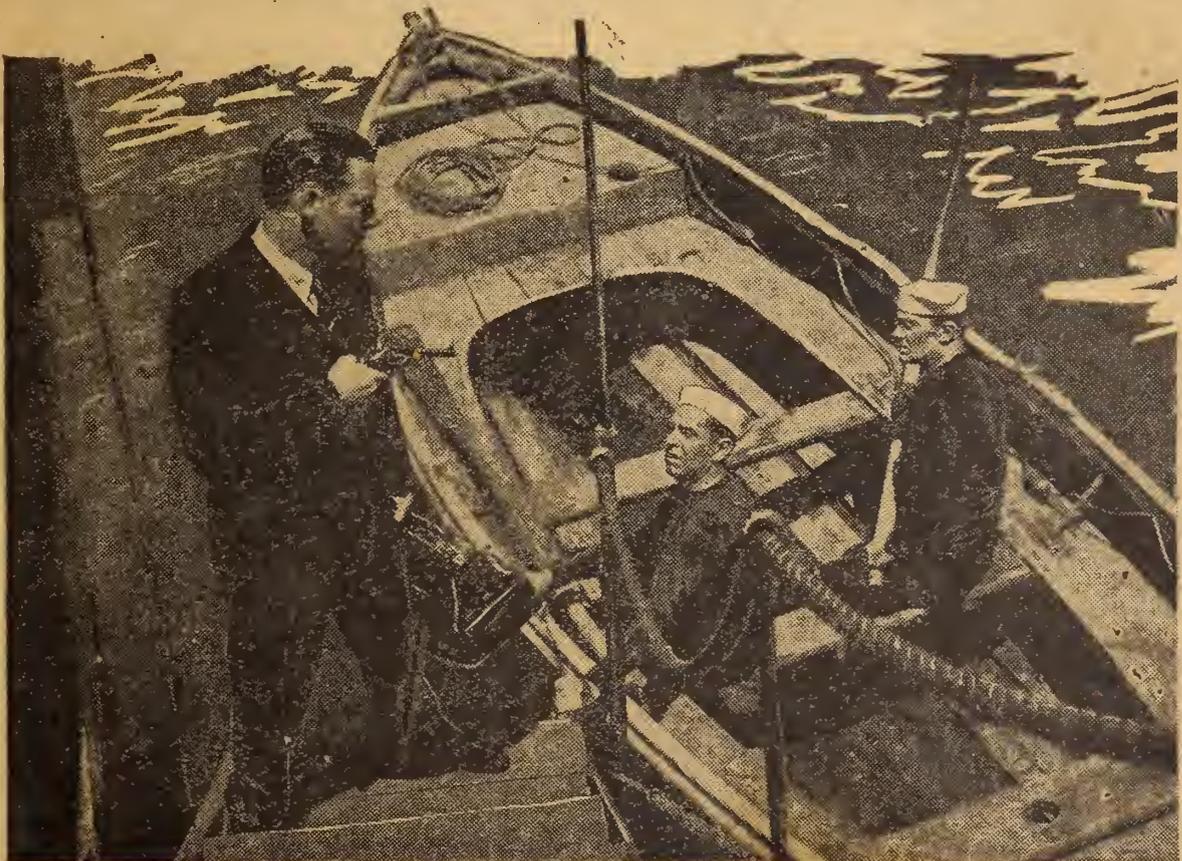

As Harland heard that voice he became tense. He must now do his best to imitate Pete Taylor's style of speech. Would he succeed in fooling Nick, or would the young pilot detect him as a fake?

"Oh, is that you, sweetheart?" queried Harland.

The familiar tone of address completely tricked young Nick Terris.

"Yes, dearie. What's on your feeble mind?" he wanted to know.

"You're to go to Emergency Field Number Three. Colonel's orders. You're to pick up a man named Jordan,

Nick descended into the waiting row-boat with the leather bag in one hand and Henty's revolver in the other.

February 9th, 1935.

and take further instructions from him. Do you get it?"

"Okay," Nick answered.

"And make it snappy," said Harland. "Okay twice."

Frank Harland switched off and looked at Powell exultantly.

"He fell for it like a ton of bricks," he declared. "Boy, what a honey of an idea of mine that was! Jordan and Henty will actually have free transport into Mexico aboard a U.S. Government 'plane, and there's no telling what amount of trouble that pup Terris will get into. He'll certainly be called over the coals, anyway, when Colonel Curtis finds out that one of his men gave a lift to a couple of bank-bandits."

The Dupe

EMERGENCY FIELD NUMBER THREE was a level strip of plain about five miles south of Cajon, and in this somewhat lonely spot Nick Terris came to earth about mid-day, bringing his machine to a standstill on the rich, green mesquite grass.

Two or three minutes after he had landed, an automobile swung into view round a bend in the road that skirted the emergency field, and, turning aside from the trail, it bumped across the turf and came to a halt alongside Nick's aeroplane.

Two men emerged from the car, one of them carrying a leather satchel. Which was Mr. Jordan, Nick wondered? And who was Mr. Jordan? Some government official, he supposed.

He did not know that Messrs. Jordan and Henty had just burgled the Cajon Bank, having shot up a cashier pretty thoroughly in the process. Nor did he know that the sheriff of Cajon County and a couple of armed deputies had been pursuing them in a fast tourer.

"Are you Lieutenant Terris?" the man with the satchel was asking him briskly.

"Yes, sir," Nick answered.

"I'm Jordan. You're to take me and my friend below the border."

Nick was startled. It was an unusual order, for there was an international edict against United States Government 'planes landing in foreign territory, unless special permission were obtained.

"Below the border?" the young flyer echoed, wondering if Jordan had a permit.

It was at this juncture that the car occupied by Cajon's sheriff and his deputies swept into sight, and Jordan promptly whipped out a revolver, covering the surprised Nick.

"You heard me," he rasped. "Below the border, an' make it snappy. Come on, Henty, climb in."

The crooks entered the rear cockpit, and, handing the satchel of loot to Henty, Jordan pushed the muzzle of the gun into the back of the Patrol pilot's neck.

"Get goin'," he commanded harshly. "Come on, if you don't, we'll put a slug through you and handle the crate ourselves. Don't forget there's dual control here, and we'll use it if the worst comes to the worst."

Nick had no choice but to obey, and a moment later the craft was moving across the field, the spasmodic blurring of its motor rising into a powerful song of speed.

The ship left the ground, and soared skyward in a wide circle. She was a hundred and fifty feet in the air when the car containing the sheriff and his deputies careered on to the emergency field and jolted to a halt.

"Why, that's a Government 'plane

February 9th, 1935.

those crooks have got away in," the sheriff ejaculated, staring upward. "Listen, you fellows search that auto they've abandoned. I'll drive back to the nearest telephone."

Within a quarter of an hour, the officer of the Law was in touch with Colonel Curtis at the Patrol Base hard by San Antonio, and, on receiving the sheriff's message, Janet's father sent for Pete Taylor, who happened to be available at the airport as a relief pilot.

"Bandits held up the bank at Cajon," the colonel stated. "They got away in a 'plane that was apparently disguised as a government machine. Lieutenant Terris is out in that section. Go give him a hand."

Pete departed with alacrity, and was soon in the air. In the meantime, Colonel Curtis was instructing his wireless operator to signal Lieutenant Terris, but no reply came from 'Plane Number Six, for, within five minutes of leaving the ground, Mike Jordan had leaned into the forward cockpit of the Patrol ship and smashed Nick's radio set with the butt of his gun.

'Plane Number Six was now winging its way southward in the direction of Mexico at a hundred and twenty miles per hour, and about one-fifteen p.m. Jordan ordered Nick to make a landing in a forest clearing some ten miles below the border.

With a revolver caressing the back of his head, Nick was compelled to obey, and shortly afterwards the 'plane was raking to a standstill on the ground. As it came to a halt, the young government pilot noticed a car standing near the edge of the trees some distance away, a man being in charge of it. Then he heard Jordan's voice right behind him again.

"Thanks for the ride, lieutenant."

The words were followed by a cowardly, unexpected blow with the butt of the revolver, and Nick slumped down in the forward cockpit, his wits scattered by the impact of the gun.

"That ought to hold him until we get away," Jordan said to Henty.

"Come on, and bring the swag with you."

The two crooks alighted from the 'plane and hurried to the waiting car, driving off with the man who had been sitting in the vehicle. By the time Nick Terris recovered consciousness, there was no sign of the rogues, and the only sound that disturbed the quiet of the clearing was the twittering of birds in the not-far-distant trees.

For several minutes Nick remained motionless, collecting his thoughts and wincing at the pain which throbbled through his head. Then he fell to speculating over the message that Pete Taylor had sent him—for he still imagined that it had been Pete's voice which had ordered him to pick up the man known as Jordan.

What was behind the whole affair? Why had Jordan and his companion forced him to convey them to Mexican territory? Who were the men who had driven on to Emergency Field Number Three just after he had taken off with his mysterious passengers?

Nick gave up the riddle, and set out for home to make a report. Ere long he was flying northward again at an altitude of several thousand feet, and it was soon after he re-crossed the border that he sighted another 'plane.

On closer approach he recognised it as Pete's, and soon Pete was waving to him from the machine. Nick answered the gesture sourly enough, and, unable to converse with him on account of his shattered radio, laid his course for the airport, Pete accompanying him.

They landed on the flying-field of the depot almost simultaneously, and, descending from their 'planes, they walked towards each other.

"What's the matter with you?" Pete demanded, as he joined his comrade. "Where the heck have you been? I've been trying to get in touch with you—"

"What's the matter with me?" Nick broke in angrily. "Say, I'd like—"

He was interrupted by an orderly who came hurrying across at that moment.

"The colonel wants you, Lieutenant Terris," the man said. "He wishes you to report at once."

Nick strode in the direction of his commanding officer's quarters, and Pete hastened after him. As they entered the colonel's office they found him in conversation with a tall, lean man of sober mien.

"You sent for me, colonel," Nick said, saluting Janet's father.

"This is the sheriff of Cajon County," the commanding officer of the airport rejoined, indicating the tall individual to whom he had been talking when Nick and Pete had entered. "The bank at Cajon City was held up to-day by two men who made their escape in a 'plane which has since been identified as yours. Can you explain it?"

"No, sir, I can't," Nick answered hazily, "except that I received a message from you to go there and pick up a man named Jordan, who would give me further instructions."

The colonel looked at him blankly for an instant, and then:

"Yes, yes, that's quite true," he said. "Mr. Jordan is a secret agent of ours. The bank robbers must have known about our arrangements—though I can't imagine where they got their information from. We—we shall start an investigation as to what has become of the real Mr. Jordan. Lieutenant Terris here will give you a description of the thieves, sheriff—"

"We already have that," the representative of the law interrupted truculently.

"In that case," remarked the colonel, "I'm afraid we can do nothing more for you at present."

The sheriff turned to Nick.

"Where did you let those guys out?" he demanded.

"Ten miles south of the border," the young lieutenant informed him. "There was another man waiting for them with a car. They had a gun on me all the way down, and they'd smashed the radio soon after we started."

"Well, I guess that's that," the sheriff grunted, and, nodding to the colonel, he took his leave.

Janet's father waited until the door had closed behind the man, and then he glanced up at Nick, who had remained in the room with Pete.

"All right, lieutenant, I want the truth," he snapped. "I don't know Jordan—never heard of him in my life before—and I issued no orders about picking him up."

Nick looked staggered.

"But—you just told the sheriff—"

"What I told the sheriff has nothing to do with us," Colonel Curtis broke in grimly. "Do you think I'm going to let him know that one of my men has been mixed up with a gang of bank robbers, until I've had a chance to make some further investigations?"

"Oh, come, sir," Pete Taylor exclaimed. "This is ridiculous—"

"Lieutenant," Curtis ground out, "who asked you for your opinion?"

"I'm sorry, sir," Pete apologised, "but surely you know Nick too well to suspect him of being mixed up with a set of crooks."

Nick listened to his friend like a man in a dream. His brain was in a whirl, and he could make nothing of this ugly business in which he had become involved so innocently. What was Pete hiding? This was the question that reverberated in his bewildered mind. It had been Pete who had wirelessed those instructions purporting to be from the colonel, hadn't it?

The voice of Janet's father cut in upon the trend of Nick's confused thoughts.

"If Lieutenant Terris is innocent, then let him explain himself more fully. Lieutenant Terris, you say you received a message which was supposed to come from me. Have you any idea who sent it?"

Nick kept his glance averted from Pete. He could only think that his friend was in some way associated with those bank robbers — an unwitting accomplice, perhaps. At any rate, he could not bring himself to denounce him, whatever Pete may have done.

"I received the message by radio, sir," Nick muttered, "but—I didn't recognise the voice."

"You didn't recognise the voice?" the colonel ejaculated. "Yet you failed to check back to headquarters and see if the call was authentic? Terris, I want to believe you. But, if nothing else, you've been guilty of gross negligence."

"Will you permit me to resign, sir?" Nick said thickly.

"I'm afraid I'll have to," was the stern reply, and, saluting, the young pilot swung round and made his way from the office.

Pete Taylor followed him, and, once outside, he attempted to talk to Nick, but the latter flung away from him, and, without a word of farewell, he left the air base. As for Pete, he had to remain on duty, and it was not until evening that he was able to repair to the diggings which he had shared with his fellow-pilot.

Here he learned from the landlady that Nick had paid his bill and departed, and Pete was brooding over the whole affair in his room when Janet called on him.

"Where's Nick?" she wanted to know. She looked pale and agitated, and the expression in her eyes made him wonder if Nick, after all, were the one who must ultimately win her for a wife.

"I don't know where he is, Janet?" Pete said. "He packed and left before I got here."

"You don't believe this absurd suspicion against him, do you?" she demanded.

"No, I don't," Pete answered. "But I can't understand him. He seemed to be withholding something—"

"Listen," Janet interposed, "I think I know how to find him, and I'm going to try. I'm going to tell him that there are two people who have faith in him—you and I."

"Wait," Pete laid a hand on her arm. "Janet, Nick and I have always thought a lot of you. I guess you know that. I—P'd like to know which of us comes first with you. Is it—Nick?"

"Yes," she said in a low voice.

He was silent for a moment. Then he took her by the shoulders.

"I hope everything turns out all right for both of you," he told her. "You know that, too, don't you—Janet?"

At Sea

THE following day there was activity in a certain remote hide-away fifteen miles south of the border. It was the hide-away occupied by Harland and his associates, and, in the hut from which the former Government pilot had made that bogus radio call the previous morning, the three men known as Jordan, Henty and Powell might have been discovered in close conversation over a map of the Mexican coast.

"At seven o'clock this evening the s.s. Meridian will be at this point," said Paul Henty, "about thirty miles off shore, and right opposite the border."

"Are you sure of that?" asked Powell. "I've checked her last six trips south from Galveston, knowing that she was going to take this consignment of cash," Paul Henty replied. "If there's any delay, I'll wireless Mike here. Meanwhile, let's go out and see how Harland is getting on."

Powell and Henty made their way from the hut, leaving Jordan inside. Not far from the dwelling was a creek in which a seaplane was moored, and close to the machine stood Frank Harland, listening to the note of its motor.

"She's in perfect order," the crook-

"The game's up," Nick told the crooks in grim accents. "You're taking a nice long trip that will end in the gaol-house!"

airman said as his associates came up. "The engine is running as sweet as honey. I've loaded up the crate with bombs, and there's a tommy-gun aboard. By the way, is anybody going along with me?"

"I am," rejoined Powell. "I wouldn't want you to think we don't trust you, but a quarter of a million dollars is a quarter of a million dollars."

Harland grunted.

"And Henty?" he inquired.

"He'll be aboard the Meridian," was the reply. "We're leaving Jordan here. He's all right for bank jobs, but he's just a plain thug, and this sort of coup is out of his line. In fact, I'll let you in on a little secret, Harland. We intend to ditch him. We've already tipped off the Mexican authorities about the crazy fool shooting that bartender down in Salinas Victoria, and they'll pick him up in due course."

"That's tough on him, isn't it?" Harland commented.

"It means a three-way split instead of a four-way split," Powell retorted. "I mean, when it comes to sharin' out our loot. Besides, Jordan is a blockhead."

"Maybe you're right," Harland agreed. "Well, what's the next move?"

"The next move is Henty's," was the reply. "He'll take the car, drive to railhead and catch the first train across the border. There's a chance he may be recognised, but he'll have to risk it—"

Henty left the hide-out shortly afterwards, and six hours later he was on the deck of the s.s. Meridian at Galveston, Texas. He might have been seen loitering near the gangway, and was leaning against the rail close by when a bank messenger came aboard with an armed escort.

The messenger was carrying a leather bag, and Henty knew that the receptacle contained a quarter of a million dollars in United States currency. With a glint in his narrow eyes the crook watched Captain Terris leading the bank messenger and escort in the direction of the purser's cabin.

The money having been deposited, the men from the bank took themselves off the ship, and in a little while Captain Terris reappeared on the deck.

"Do we sail on time, captain?" Paul Henty asked, accosting him.

"Right on the dot," was the reply.

Captain Terris passed on to his own cabin, and as he was about to enter it a girl came hurrying up, addressing him by name. He at once recognised Janet Curtis.

"Has Nick been here?" she asked earnestly.

The skipper fingered his rugged jaw.

"Supposing you tell me first why you want to know?" he murmured.

"Why?" Janet echoed. "Because I love him."

"Oh, just like that, eh?" Captain Terris said whimsically. "And I suppose you're going to tell him that you don't believe this ridiculous suspicion against him?"

"Of course I don't believe it. Nick couldn't do anything wrong. And besides, I've been figuring things out, and I have a theory."

The skipper smiled.

"You'll find Nick aft," he told her. "Don't be surprised if he's in overalls. You see, he's making this trip south with me, and he's insisted on making himself useful."

Before very long two young people were standing with clasped hands at the stern of the s.s. Meridian, and presently Janet was broaching the subject of Nick's resignation from the Border Patrol.

February 9th, 1935.

"Was it Pete who wirelessly you yesterday?" she wanted to know.

Nick looked uncomfortable.

"He didn't say so, but it was Pete's crazy lingo," he muttered. "That's why I didn't bother to check the instructions."

"Outside the Force, who is there that knows the two of you well enough to fool you?" Janet said suddenly. "Listen, Nick. Who left that dance the other night hating you?"

"Frank Harland?" Nick ejaculated with a start. "You mean—he might have been responsible? Aw, no, Janet—he may have been sore at me, but he wouldn't buy an expensive radio set and engineer a bank robbery to get even."

"But wasn't he mixed up in something shady when he left the Service?" the girl persisted.

"Smuggling," Nick mused, "but they couldn't prove it."

"If he were guilty, he may have had connections with some gang," Janet pointed out. "The same gang who staged the Cajon bank robbery, perhaps—using you for a dupe."

Nick began to realise that Janet's theory was not so wild as it had first seemed.

"You're a smart girl," he said to her, "but how are you going to prove that you're right?"

"I can't imagine," she admitted. "But we know that you're innocent, so who cares?"

"Sweet kid," he breathed, pressing her hands tightly. "Say, listen, Janet. I'd like you to meet my dad."

"I've already met him," she rejoined.

"Yes, I know, but I'll bet you didn't think of what I've just thought of. A sea captain can marry people. How about it, dear? Will you stay aboard?"

Her answer was given in a whisper, but when the s.s. Meridian steamed out of port, Janet Curtis was still by the rail, holding a romantic conversation with the youngster who had proposed to her.

The Raider

AT seven o'clock that evening it was still broad daylight, and on the stroke of the hour Paul Henty made his way to the wireless cabin.

He found the operator standing on the threshold of his quarters, gazing up at the clear sky and listening to the powerful drone of a seaplane that had appeared out of the blue.

"Got a match?" Henty inquired, opening a cigarette-case.

The wireless operator obliged him, and then indicated the big seaplane flying towards the ship.

"She sure is a big baby, isn't she?" he commented.

Henty did not answer him. With the operator's attention focused on the plane, the crook slipped past him into the wireless cabin and started to damage the radio set with the butt of a .45 revolver.

At the first blow the wireless operator turned with an astonished cry and blundered through the doorway.

"Hey, what are you doing?" he exclaimed. "What's the—"

He never completed the sentence, for the handle of Henty's gun came down on his head with sickening force. The operator collapsed, and, satisfied with his work so far, Henty slid out of the cabin, closed the door behind him and made for the captain's quarters.

There were crowds of passengers on the deck, staring upwards at the approaching seaplane with interest. The gangster paid no heed to them, and, with revolver hidden in his pocket, he reached the skipper's cabin.

Henty let himself in without ceremony. As he entered he saw Captain Terris standing by a table in conversation with three other people—the ship's second officer, Janet Curtis and a young man whom Henty immediately recognised as Nick.

The recognition was mutual, and Nick gave vent to a startled ejaculation. Then he found himself covered by a forty-five.

"Don't move," Henty warned. "Keep quite still, all of you."

"What's the meaning of this?" Captain Terris demanded.

Before the gangster could volunteer a reply there was a sudden explosion two or three hundred feet ahead of the steamship's bow. It was the blast of a bomb that had been dropped from the seaplane which had attracted the interest of the crowds on the Meridian's deck.

"That's a visiting card from some friends of mine," Henty rasped. "Let's call it a sample. The next will fall astern, and the third will hit your deck. You'd better run up a white flag and put me adrift with the quarter of a million dollars that were deposited in the purser's cabin."

The features of Captain Terris became livid and he took a step towards Henty, only to be driven back by a significant jerk of the weapon in the rogue's hand. There ensued a spell of silence—a silence confined to the skipper's state-room, for out on deck the passengers were in a panic-stricken uproar.

A second bomb dropped in the ship's wake, and Henty grinned wolfishly at Nick's father.

"In another few minutes the third will strike your craft—unless you show that white flag. It will hit the fore-deck, probably cripple your ship, and undoubtedly blow some of your passengers to 'Kingdom Come.' Remember, there are women and children aboard, skipper."

Captain Terris ground his teeth. For several seconds he maintained a defiant attitude, but the safety of his passengers was the argument that finally prevailed upon him to surrender, and with an air of helplessness he turned to his second officer.

"Do as this man says, Mr. Watson," he ordered huskily. "Run up a white flag. See if you can calm those people on the deck. Then ask the purser to come here with that money."

Watson edged out of the cabin, and in a little while the clamour of the passengers began to die down. Meantime the white flag of surrender had been raised, and the big plane which had threatened the Meridian was descending to the surface of the sea.

Within two or three minutes the purser put in an appearance at the captain's cabin. He was carrying a leather bag, and Henty relieved him of it. Then the crook glanced quickly inside it to make certain that it contained the loot, and it was at this moment that Nick Terris saw his chance.

With an unexpected leap he pounced on Henty. The gangster instantly attempted to cover him again, but ere he could do so the young airman's fist had crashed home, and the rogue went down in a heap.

He was "out" before he hit the floor, and Nick spoke to the other occupants of the cabin briskly.

"This is where we fool this guy's accomplices. Dad, I'm going to change clothes with him and get aboard that seaplane. Take the money out of that bag and stuff it full of waste paper.

The Swindle

OLD Dad Saunders sat by the side of the desk in Jeremy Wales' office and did his best to explain what he had come for.

He was a simple-looking man, with honest, rugged features—quite different from Wales. Wales had hard eyes and a clever face; he also had a smile which could hide what he was thinking.

"It's this way, Jeremy," said Dad Saunders, "I've struck a rich vein in that mine down in the valley. I'm extracting seven and a half ounces of fine gold from the ton, and I reckon I'll extract more as I get deeper."

Wales gave him enigmatic smile.

"Sounds pretty good, Dad," he said smoothly.

"It is good," said Dad Saunders. "But it ain't payin' me. At least, not yet. I sent to San Francisco for one of them ore-crushing plants, and they want a thousand dollars down. With the machine, I can increase my yield twenty times at least; without it—well, I guess I should just have to go on breakin' by hand, and that would barely show me a livin'. And I'm gettin' old, Jeremy, like you are. I want to take things easy."

Wales smiled again.

"So you want me to lend you a thousand dollars, huh?" he said.

Dad Saunders leaned forward eagerly.

"That's right," he said. "For, say, six months, and I'll pay fifteen hundred back."

Wales leaned back in his chair and scratched his chin. He appeared to be thinking.

"What's your security, Dad?" he asked suddenly.

Dad Saunders looked hurt.

"Security?" he repeated.

"Now look here, Jeremy, you and me's known each other for thirty years, and—"

Wales soothed him by patting him on the arm.

"Take it easy, take it easy," he said.

"I ain't castin' any reflections on your honour, Dad. Only, as you said just now, you're gettin' old. Your eyesight's bad, for one thing, and gettin' worse, by all accounts."

Dad Saunders cooled down somewhat.

"That's true enough," he admitted.

"Well, can't you see what I'm gettin' at?" Wales spoke gently but with infinite cunning. "Supposin' anything happened to you. I'd lose my thousand bucks, wouldn't I?"

Dad Saunders nodded.

"That's true, too," he said. "An' I'd hate anythin' like that, Jeremy. What can you do to protect yourself?"

"Well," said Wales, "I reckon the mine's worth somethin'. How about you signin' a paper saying you owe me a thousand dollars—"

"Fifteen hundred," corrected Dad Saunders.

Wales waved his hand carelessly.

"I won't worry about the interest, Dad," he said. "Call it a thousand, with the mine as security. Then, if things go bad for you, I can get my money back from whoever buys the mine."

Dad Saunders nodded vigorously.

"I guess that's fair enough," he said. "And it's thumpin' decent of you, Jeremy. I reckon that when I make the grade, I'll not forget you."

Wales smiled.

"Glad to be of help, Dad," he said. He went across to his safe and counted out a thousand dollars. "There you are. Now just sit around a minute while I draw up the paper."

He drew himself up with writing. Briefly he drew up a mortgage saying that the undersigned had borrowed money, and that it would be repaid in six months, the Saunders gold mine being the security for the loan. Then he turned the paper round for Dad Saunders' signature.

Dad Saunders tried to read it, and found that he couldn't. But he could make out the figures written at the bottom—one thousand dollars. That, to him, was good enough.

He signed, picked up his money, and went away.

Hardly had he left the office than a door opened leading from Wales' living quarters, and a young man came in. He was inclined to fatness, and his eyes gleamed greedily.

"I heard what you and old Saunders was sayin'," he said rapidly. "I guess we might be able to break his title to that mine if we hired a slick lawyer from the East."

Jeremy Wales chuckled, and looked at the young man fondly. For the young man was his son, Sam.

"We don't have to," he said, picked up his pen, and made a quick alteration to the document that Dad Saunders had just signed. "Read that."

Sam did so, and uttered a long, drawn-out whistle.

"He says he owes you ten thousand bucks!" he muttered. "But I thought you only lent him a thousand."

"So I did," Jeremy Wales' eyes became like twin flames. "But I wrote ten thousand in words on this paper. I knew Dad Saunders couldn't read with those eyes of his. All he saw was one thousand in figures at the bottom, and it's easy to change one thousand into ten—just by addin' a nought at the end." He reached out and patted Sam on the back. "I did it for you, son. When old Saunders is called upon to pay and can't, I'll foreclose, sell the mine to you at a knock-out figure, and then leave you to it. I guess you'll be sittin' mighty pretty after that."

Sam laughed. Then he became suddenly thoughtful.

"I can do with big money," he said slowly. "I guess I've got a use for it now."

Jeremy Wales looked at him curiously.

"Findin' that movie girl expensive?" he asked.

Sam shook his head. "No, not expensive," he replied. "Just disinterested. But I reckon I could change that with some big dough behind me."

Jeremy nodded. "I reckon you could," he said. "And it won't be long in comin' now."

Meanwhile, Dad Saunders had returned to his mine. It lay some half a mile outside the township, and had formerly been a small ranch. Dad Saunders had given up raising cattle when he had struck gold, however, and two or three horses were the only livestock he had left.

He put his thousand dollars away against the time when the traveller from San Francisco should come again about the ore-crusher, and went about his work. Life, for him, was pretty quiet.

The following morning he was again at his job. Suddenly, round about midday, he heard the sound of approaching hoofs, and looked up to see the local land commissioner approaching. The commissioner stopped and looked down at him.

"Good morning, Dad," he said. "I hear you're goin' to run this mine of yours on a big scale."

Dad Saunders grinned and scratched his head.

"Well, I don't know about runnin' it big," he said, "but I reckon to make a tidy profit out of it."

"It sounds big to me," said the commissioner. "Wales was over at my office this mornin' to register a mortgage for ten thousand on your prospects, anyway."

Dad Saunders stared at him in amazement.

"Ten thousand!" he said. "Ain't you makin' some mistake? It was a thousand I borrowed."

"Ten thousand, Dad," said the commissioner gently. "You must be gettin' absent-minded. The sum was named in both words and figures, so I reckon there ain't no mistake."

He rode on, leaving Dad Saunders staring after him angrily.

He might have been half blind, but he was no fool. He knew what had happened; Wales had tricked him.

He knew something else, too—that he had no remedy in law. There was his signature, and he would have to stand by it.

But he was not entirely helpless. Wales might be a dirty crook, but there were other men in the district who would see justice done.

With sudden resolution he went to the compound, threw himself upon the back of a horse, and rode swiftly towards a ranch that stood at the head of the valley.

Strange Shooting

PHIL LEE was superintending the branding of some calves that morning and, one way and another, he was feeling pretty good. He had found a gang of rustlers on his territory, and had handed them over to the sheriff, only to find that the gang had been "wanted" for three months back.

The sound of thudding hoofs made him look up, and he saw a rider coming down the trail. He recognised Dad Saunders.

"Hallo, Dad!" he said to the old man when the latter had reined in. "What's troubling you?"

Dad Saunders told him. He didn't waste much time over it, and as he proceeded with his story, Phil Lee's eyes narrowed.

Phil was pretty well known in the district. Not only was he a ranch-owner himself, and a pretty successful one at that, but he was also a friend to anyone who was in trouble. "Quick-Trigger Lee" was what folks called him, and he had earned the nickname honourably. He was so quick on the draw that even old-timers kept clear of him when any trouble was about—and Phil never hesitated to make trouble when a wrong had to be righted.

He heard the old man out, then turned to his foreman.

"We're going into town, Hutch," he said briefly. "Get two horses!"

Dad Saunders started to thank him, but he waved the thanks aside.

"Forget it," he said. "Plenty of time for that afterwards, Dad. We've got work to do now."

They rode into town, stopping on the way for Dad to collect the thousand dollars Jeremy Wales had given him.

Their first call was at the land commissioner's office, where they inspected the register of mortgages. The figure was ten thousand all right. From there they went to Phil's bank, where Phil drew a wad of notes.

February 9th, 1935.

Then they made their way to Jeremy Wales' office.

Sam was lounging about outside, talking to a bunch of strangers. He saw Phil Lee and Dad Saunders approaching, and hurriedly excused himself.

But he did not have a chance to get far. Phil caught up with him and gripped him by the shoulder.

"I guess I'll be wanting you," he said. "Inside!"

And he ran him into his father's office.

Jeremy Wales was there, waiting for them. Jeremy had heard the commotion outside, and had risen from his chair, his hand on his six-gun.

Phil shoved Sam forward and surveyed the old man critically.

"You'd better forget the artillery, Mr. Wales," he said quietly. "If we ever get to shooting, you're already dead!"

Jeremy Wales glared at him and slowly took his hand from his gun. He did his best to smile as he resumed his seat.

"What do you want with me, Lee?" he said.

Phil did not answer immediately. He looked around, and saw that two of the strangers had followed him in. They were standing just inside the doorway, their evil eyes glittering, ready for trouble.

Phil looked at Jeremy Wales pointedly.

"Do we have to talk business in front of a crowd, Wales?" he asked.

Sam broke in shortly.

"They're pals of mine," he said. "Anything you want to say can be said in front of them."

Phil shrugged his shoulders, and turned to Dad Saunders.

"Dad," he said. "I understand that you borrowed a thousand dollars from Jeremy Wales yesterday?"

"That's right," said the old man. "Here are the notes."

Phil took them and tossed them on to Wales' desk. Then he took the wad of notes he had just drawn from the bank and gave them to Dad.

"I'm buying the loan," he said. "All right, Wales?"

Jeremy Wales did his best to look indifferent.

"Okay by me," he said. "I still foreclose on Dad's mine if I don't get my money back."

Phil's mouth went hard.

"That suits us," he said. "We're redeeming. You've got your dough back intact, and we're taking the paper Dad signed. Get it."

Jeremy Wales met Phil's eyes, and saw danger in them. But he decided to hold out.

"Dad signed for ten thousand, not one," he said. "Give me another nine, and everything's square."

That was all Phil wanted. He walked slowly and deliberately to Jeremy Wales' desk, taking care to keep Sam and the two men at the door in sight.

"The argument's over, Wales," he said. "Give me that paper quietly, or I take it. Please yourself."

Jeremy looked appealingly at Sam, and Sam nodded to his two pals. They came across the room, forming a semi-circle around Phil, ready for action.

Phil gave them a look of contempt, and decided that they were not even worth gun-play. He turned casually to Dad Saunders.

"Look after the old man, Dad," he said. "I'll fix the others."

He wheeled suddenly, and sent his fist smashing into the face of the man nearest to him. Dad Saunders, chuckling excitedly, grabbed old Jeremy's gun and threw it out of the window. Then he kicked Jeremy clean out of the office.

Sam's eyes flamed with murder. If he reached for his own gun and dragged it from its holster, but before he could bring it up to his hip, Phil was on him. He sent him back across a table, one hand across Sam's throat, and the other gripping Sam's gun-wrist.

"You aren't quick enough, Sam," he said softly, and dug his fingers into the tendons of Sam's wrist. Sam let out a cry of agony, and his gun dropped to the floor with a crash.

Phil, still holding Sam down, turned and saw that Dad Saunders was struggling with the third man. He did not move, but his voice carried across the room like a pistol shot.

"You'd better let the old man alone," he said slowly, "or I'll plug you right between the eyes."

The man laughed and began to bend Dad Saunders' arms behind his back. Phil saw and acted. Without seeming to move, he kept Sam helpless with one hand, picked a six-gun from the holster against his thigh, and pressed the trigger. The man's hat went across the room as though it had been knocked off by an unseen hand.

"Three inches lower," said Phil, "and you'd have been deader than mutton."

The man stared at him, petrified with fear, and his face went white. For a moment he seemed incapable of movement; then he released Dad Saunders abruptly, and ran for his life.

Phil laughed and indicated the other man, who was then trying to get to his feet, nursing his jaw.

"Send him after his pal, Dad," he said; "after which, we can talk to Sam about that paper."

Dad Saunders obeyed lustily. He might be old, but he still had enough strength to give a crook a good kick in the pants.

Phil grinned and stood back from Sam. "All I have to do now is to collect that document from you, Sam, and Dad and me will be on our way. How about it?"

Sam got to his feet, his face twisted with hate. He made to bend down for his gun, but Phil reached out and put his foot upon it.

"Haven't you had enough?" Phil asked softly.

Sam swore. He was beaten, and he knew it.

"The paper's in the second drawer of the desk," he said shortly.

Phil stood guard while Dad Saunders found it. Carefully Dad tore it into little pieces and burnt it in the stove.

Then, suddenly, pandemonium broke loose outside. A girl screamed, and the scream was followed by a rattle of shots.

Phil and Dad Saunders pounded out into the street. There, a few yards away and gaining speed every second, was a touring car. A girl was in the back, struggling with two men, while a third stood up, gun in hand, letting rip as hard as he could go.

Phil didn't stop to ask questions. He took one flying leap and landed on the back of his horse. The next moment he was galloping after the car at full stretch.

A Discovery

ALMOST before the driver had got the car into top gear, Phil was level with it, his feet clear of his stirrups. He leapt into the tonneau, six-gun in hand, and pressed the muzzle against the driver's head.

"Pull up, son," he said grimly. "And if any of those pals of yours think of trying conclusions with me, you die. So I guess you'd better tell them to take it easy."

The driver swore, and slammed on his brakes. Phil waited until the car was at a standstill, then jumped out in readiness for trouble.

But it never came. Instead, the two men and the girl in the tonneau were holding their sides with laughter.

Phil looked at them hard, wondering if he was mixed up with a bunch of lunatics.

"Listen," he said, and spun his gun on his finger by way of letting all concerned realize that he knew how to use it. "If you can see anything funny in—"

He broke off. Someone came running towards him, and he turned, his gun held low. But the newcomer was unarmed. He wore a cap, the peak of which was at the back of his head, and his plus fours and pullover made him look like something that had escaped from a dude ranch.

"Say, cowboy," he drawled, "didn't anyone ever teach you anything at school?"

Phil blinked at him in astonishment. Then he caught sight of a second car that was trundling slowly towards them. In the back of the car was a cinematograph camera mounted on a tripod.

Phil saw the joke then. He gazed around at the grinning faces, and realised that the joke was on him.

He, too, roared with laughter.

Then he remembered the girl, and turned to her.

"Sorry, miss," he said, holstering his gun. "I guess I'm seatty. You see, I live a little way out of the township, and haven't been this way for a fortnight. I didn't know a movie outfit was in the neighbourhood."

The girl smiled, and it was the kind of smile that made Phil's heart miss a couple of beats.

"If it hadn't been a movie scene, what would you have done?" she asked interestedly.

Phil chuckled, and looked at the still laughing men with her.

"I guess I'd have busted them both across the head," he said. "They wouldn't have woken up for a week."

There was just the smallest edge to his tone, and the laughing men heard it. Rather abruptly they stopped laughing and looked thoughtful.

The girl got out of the car and turned to the man with the back-to-front cap.

"I've done enough work for to-day," she said. "I'm tired. Let's make another start early to-morrow morning."

"Okay," was the reply. "It ain't my money you're spending."

The girl turned to Phil.

"I'm staying at the hotel up the street," she said. "Liko to walk back with me?"

Phil shuffled his feet awkwardly, and held out his arm.

"I'd like to," he said. "My name's Phil Lee."

"Mino's Rose Campbell," she replied as they walked away together. "The way you jumped into that car was marvellous. I've never seen anything like it before. You must be an awfully good rider."

Phil coloured with embarrassment.

"I guess I don't ride any better than other folks around here," he said.

"Rounding up cattle would make moderate riders of anybody."

Rose laughed.

"You're a funny sort of person," she said. "Most men boast about what they can do, but you do your best to run yourself down." She was silent for a few seconds, then continued: "Staying in town long?"

"As long as I'm wanted," said Phil.

"Then how about coming to my dance to-night?" She stopped and pointed to the hotel. "The boys have been working very hard lately, and I promised them a break. We've taken the chapel hall for the occasion." She lowered her voice a little. "As a matter of fact, I think there's something you could help me over. Will you come?"

Phil nodded gratefully. Danees were few and far between in these parts.

"Just say the time, and I'll be there," he replied.

"Seven sharp," she said. "And thanks tremendously for rescuing me." She smiled up into his face. "After all, it might have been real, mightn't it? So I'm grateful just the same."

She turned and ran into the hotel. Phil stood there, staring after her; and just went on staring until he felt a touch on the arm, and turned to find Dad Saunders by his side.

"Well, son," said Dad, "I'll be on my way. And when I make my big strike down at the mine, you ain't goin' to be sorry you stood by me."

"That's all right," said Phil. "Call on me any time you find yourself in a fix. So long."

"So long," said Dad, and left him there, still staring at the hotel.

At seven sharp, Phil approached the chapel hall. From within came the sound of music.

Phil was just about to go inside when he saw two shadows nearby. They appeared to be struggling, and one of them was a girl. Phil approached softly, and heard Rose Campbell speaking.

"Please let me go, Sam," she was saying. "I like you as a friend, but no more. Can't you take no for an answer?"

Phil leaned against the side of the hall, his eyes hard.

"He's going to," he said quietly.

"Aren't you, Sam?"

Sam Wales spun round and let Rose go. He saw who it was, and grinned sheepishly.

"I—er—me and Rose was just havin' a little talk," he said. "We didn't hear you comin'."

Phil did not reply. He merely jerked his head in the direction of the hall, and Sam took the hint and went inside. Phil laughed and approached the girl, hat in hand.

Phil sent him back across the table, one hand on his throat and the other gripping his gun wrist.

"Friend of yours, Miss Campbell?" he asked.

She shook her head definitely.

"No," she replied. "But I know him. You see, when I came here with our production unit, he helped fix us up at the hotel."

"That's because his old man owns it," said Phil, grinning. "That Wales family is pretty slick on business."

She moved nearer to him, and lowered her voice.

"I also asked him to find someone for me," she went on. "I chose this place for a location because I have a grandfather out this way somewhere, but I don't think he's done very much about it."

"What's your grandfather's name?" asked Phil.

"John Saunders," she replied. "He's my mother's father." She looked at him anxiously. "Poor old chap, he's had a very hard life, and now I'm doing well, I want to make things easy for him. Do you know him?"

"Know him!" Phil chuckled as he thought of the scheme of the Wales family to ruin the old chap. "As soon as you can spare the time, I'll take you out to his shack. He's discovered a gold-mine near here, and—"

She was not interested in all that. She stopped him speaking by taking hold of his arm.

"You'll really take me to him?" she said.

"Whenever you like," Phil replied.

She started dragging him towards the hall.

"Wait for me while I change my clothes, and I'll come right away," she said. "I'll meet you in the hall in half an hour."

Phil nodded, and watched her run towards the hotel. He looked after her until she was out of sight, then drifted into the hall. Hardly had he set foot inside the door than the daughter of a neighbouring ranch-owner came up.

"We don't often see you in town, Mr. Lee," she said. "How about giving me a dance?"

Phil nodded. It was as good a way of making half an hour go quickly as he knew.

They waltzed away together.

Trapped

AT the end of the time one of the hotel servants came over with a message.

"The lady's ready, mister," he announced. "She's waitin' out the back—said she didn't want anyone to see her."

Phil nodded, and followed the man unsuspectingly. They went out through one of the rear doors of the hall, and it was not until he reached the back veranda that he realised that he had fallen into a trap.

For facing him was Sam Wales, while beyond guns in their hands, were two of Wales' men. They were standing up in a car, ready to shoot without warning.

"I reckon this is one of those times when bein' quick on the draw ain't going to help you any, Lee," said Sam, grinning evilly. "I've got a quarrel to settle with you, and this is the time to do it. I guess the lady won't like the looks of you by the time I'm through."

Phil faced him tensely, every muscle taut. Sam had to relax his watchfulness for just one second, and the tables were going to be turned.

But Sam had planned his coup carefully. Before Phil could do anything, the hotel servant who had made him come out here stepped behind him and pinioned his arms behind his back.

Sam Wales laughed and swaggered over. He reckoned he was safe now.

February 9th, 1935.

"You ain't so smart as I thought," he jeered.

Phil struggled to get free. Instantly one of the men on the car raised his gun and took careful aim. Phil stopped struggling. There was no sense in committing suicide.

"Where does all this get you, Wales?" he asked quietly.

Sam grinned.

"I'll tell you," he replied. "I was talkin' to Rose Campbell a minute back, and she said you was goin' to take her out to see her grandfather. Well, you ain't, because I'm goin' in your place. And I reckon that when she and me's better acquainted, she won't be wantin' to think so much about you. Get the idea?"

"You dirty hound!" roared Phil.

Sam's eyes narrowed. He swung back his fist, and hit Phil in the jaw. Phil saw red, and with a supreme effort, threw the man who was holding him over his head.

But the odds were against him. Sam whipped out his gun, gripped it by the barrel, and hit Phil behind the ear with the butt. Phil grunted, staggered back, and fell prone.

Sam kicked him and laughed. He turned to one of his men.

"Keep him in the stable behind the hall," he said. "And don't let him go until I get back." He turned to Phil's unconscious form. "I guess your lady friend won't think so high of you when she hears about this."

He swaggered away, leaving Phil to be dragged off to the stables.

Sam had timed his coup well. He got into the car and drove it round to the front of the hall. He was just in time. Rose was standing outside, looking about anxiously.

Sam got out and went up to her, a smirk on his face. He took off his hat.

"Was you lookin' for someone?" he asked.

Rose turned and saw him. She nodded coldly.

"I'm waiting for Phil Lee," she said.

Sam did his best to look regretful.

"I reckon Lee's busy," he said. "He started dancin' with a girl from the Three R Ranch after you'd left, and then took her walkin'. They're down by the brook somewhere."

He saw the expression of disappointment pass over her face, and chuckled inwardly. She turned as though to go down to the brook, then stopped. Bright scarlet spots burned in her cheeks.

"Do you know where Mr. John Saunders lives?" she asked suddenly.

"Sure," said Sam. "Was you wantin' to see him? If so, me and the boys will take you there. We're goin' that way ourselves."

She looked at him doubtfully, then still more doubtfully at the car. In the end, she shrugged her shoulders.

"I'll be grateful if you would," she said.

Sam went to the car, and held open the door. She got in and sat down next to the driving-seat. Sam got in beside her.

"You warm enough?" he asked, trying to be solicitous for her comfort.

"Yes, thank you," she replied stiffly.

"And would you mind hurrying? I want to get there quickly."

Sam's eyes glinted as he let in the clutch. The car moved slowly away.

Meanwhile Phil was fast recovering from the blow that Sam had given him. He kept his eyes shut until his swimming senses had returned to him fully, then opened them the merest fraction.

He found that he was lying on a truss of hay. Nearly sat one of Sam's men, smoking, gun in hand.

Phil did not move. He looked at the man for some time, wondering how to surprise him.

Then he had an idea. Moving his fingers inch by inch, he caught hold of a button on his jacket and wrenched it off. Slowly he worked it into position between thumb and forefinger, and flicked it across the stable.

It hit the far wall with a slight click, and the man with the gun spun round to see what it was.

The next instant, Phil was upon him and bearing him to the ground. The man tried to break loose, but Phil's fist swung hard and caught the man on the side of the jaw. The man went limp, gasped for breath, then tried to recover.

Phil hit again, this time more accurately. The man went down with a crash and lay still.

"I guess I owed you that," Phil muttered, and picked up the man's gun. Then he raced out into the open.

The car was nowhere to be seen.

Phil ran across to the veranda of the hall, and found a deputy-sheriff lounging about smoking a cigarette. Phil went up to him.

"Where's Sam Wales?" he asked crisply.

The deputy pointed down the trail that led to Dad Saunders' mine.

"He drove down that way," he replied.

"Miss Campbell was with him." He saw the expression on Phil's face. "Anything wrong?"

Phil shook his head.

"Nothing that I can't handle alone," he replied, and rushed away.

Pursuit

SAM WALES drove slowly. He did not reckon he had anything to fear from Phil Lee. Phil was a prisoner, and would remain so until further orders.

He leaned towards Rose confidentially. "So you found out about Dad Saunders after all?" he said in a low voice.

She turned and looked at him coldly. "Why didn't you tell me you knew him when I asked you first?" she demanded.

Sam did his best to put a tender look on his face.

"I'm sorry," he said. "The fact was, I reckoned I wanted to know you better. I thought that if I told you about him right away, you'd clear off down to his place, and I wouldn't see so much of you. You can't blame a guy for bein' crazy about you, honey."

She looked at him with distaste.

"And your way of showing how crazy you are about me is to tell me lies," she said bitterly. "I think you'd better drive more quickly. The sooner I arrive at my grandfather's place, the better I'll be pleased."

He took one hand off the steering-wheel and tried to put it about her. She shrank back, and when he persisted she reached out and brought the flat of her hand across his face.

One of the men behind guffawed. Sam went red, and turned to say something about it. But the words never left his lips. His mouth just dropped open, and his eyes began to show fear.

For riding hard along some rising ground a little to the rear was a lone horseman.

"Lee!" Sam Wales breathed.

Rose heard, and stared at the rider.

"Oh, thank heaven!" she cried, and made to get out of the car.

Roughly Sam pushed her back into her seat and pressed his foot on the accelerator. The car leapt forward.

"Let him have it, boys!" he shouted.

"AIR PATROL"

Give orders for a hoat to be lowered. Look, there's the 'plane, lying to starboard. You can see it through the port-hole."

"Son, you're taking an awful chance," his father began, but Nick cut in on him. His mind was made up, and nothing could deter him from his purpose. Consequently, some little time afterwards, the passengers aboard the Meridian were treated to the spectacle of a young man going over the side into one of the ship's boats, in which two sailors were already seated.

The young man was Nick Terris, of course. He was about Henty's build, and, in the gangster's clothes, he felt that he might pass muster for the scoundrel, especially with the aid of a pair of sun-glasses which he intended to slip on.

Nick descended into the waiting row-boat with the leather bag in one hand and Henty's revolver in the other. He made a show of covering the two oarsmen with the gun as they pulled for the stationary seaplane, and soon he was alongside the sky-pirates' machine.

A door was opened for him, and he was helped aboard by Powell, whom he did not recognise. But once in the cabin of the 'plane, he glanced through to the pilot's compartment and saw Frank Harland at the controls.

"What's the idea of the sun-glasses?" Powell was inquiring.

Nick kept his head down. "I was afraid someone might spot me on board the Meridian," he answered in a muffled tone. "Tell Harland to get goin'. Everything is okay."

Shortly afterwards the seaplane was rising off the surface of the water, watched by several hundred onlookers from the rail of the s.s. Meridian. But not all of those aboard the steamship were idle, for Captain Terris and one of his officers were engaged in the task of reviving the wireless operator whom Henty had struck down.

They succeeded in bringing him round, and the operator then set to work on the job of repairing the radio. He managed to fix it up temporarily, and, though it was by no means in perfect order, he finally made contact with Colonel Curtis at the San Antonio airport, flashing a message that turned the flying-field into a hive of industry.

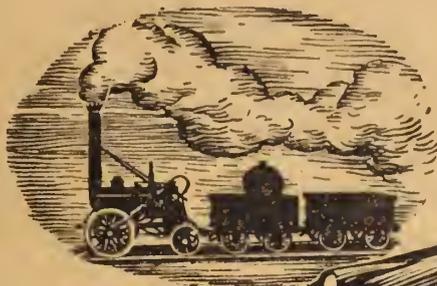

Pete Taylor was among the pilots who took off and headed for the Gulf in widely-scattered formation, intent upon tracing the seaplane that had figured in the raid on the s.s. Meridian, and presently he was flying alone over the deep, his nearest comrade being an aviator who was patrolling the coastline.

In the meantime, aboard the cabin 'plane occupied by the sky-robbers, neither Powell nor Harland had discovered Nick's identity. Powell had merely handed Nick a parachute, advising him to don it in case of accidents, and had then turned to enter into a conversation with the man at the controls.

Nick took the precaution of attaching the chute to his body, and as he was fixing the harness he heard a snatch of the discussion that was in progress between Powell and Harland.

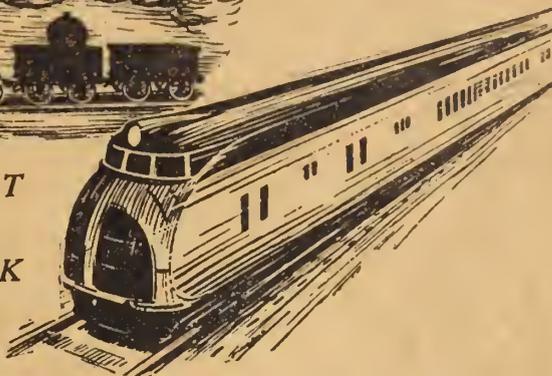

"Don't head for the old hide-out," Powell was saying. "The Mexican authorities will be picking up Jordan there, like I told you. Set your course for the south."

THE STEEL HIGHWAY IN STORY AND PICTURE

IMPORTANT NEW PART WORK

RAILWAY WONDERS OF THE WORLD

The Adventurous Story of the Railways from Stephenson's "Rocket" to the modern Streamline Express, written by experts and illustrated by the most fascinating gallery of railway photographs and pictures ever brought together.

7<sup>p</sup> Weekly

This new work is the most important contribution to railway lore in the present century. It presents, for the first time, a true and comprehensive picture of the inspiration, brave-hearted devotion, heroism and enterprise which were given unsparingly, and are still devoted, to the development of the railroads of the world. It depicts with all the enthralling interest of a modern adventure story, all that you want to know about every railway of importance in every quarter of the globe—and some which are not so important but which have unusual features to recommend them.

It deals not only with locomotives and railroads, but also with all the scientific marvels of invention that overcame almost insuperable difficulties and made possible such triumphs of engineering skill as the Forth Bridge, the Alpine Railways of Switzerland, London's Underground and the wonder railways of Australia and the East. Whatever is of interest in any phase of railway construction and railway travel will be dealt with in this unique publication.

SUPERBLY ILLUSTRATED

A feature of RAILWAY WONDERS OF THE WORLD will be the unique collection of photographs, many of which have been obtained after almost unprecedented research and expense. Each part will contain a large number of these interesting pictures, in addition to many diagrams, specially prepared by experts, showing the construction and working of railway machinery from signals to locomotives.

The work, which is to be completed in about 40 weekly parts, is beautifully printed on art paper and will contain a large number of PLATES IN FULL COLOUR in addition to special supplements produced by the latest methods of photogravure printing.

Every boy who is interested in railways will want this wonderful work. It is new, it is accurate, it is the finest railway publication yet issued in this country—and the best value.

At all Newsagents and Bookstalls.

cat, but was intercepted by Ed Wheeler, who sprang up and grabbed hold of her.

"What are you doing?" she cried savagely. "Give me that!"

"Take it easy, sister," drawled Dobbs, pocketing the sheet and dropping the diary on the chestfield as he rose to his feet.

"Carl, do something!" she shouted. "Don't let them get away with it!"

Carl Trask clenched his fists, but knew that he was no match for the two men.

"Come on, you guys!" he said fiercely. "Kick back with that paper!"

"They're not reporters at all!" stormed Lucy Benton, struggling to free herself. "They're detectives!"

"What's all the excitement?" jeered Ed Wheeler. "You're not afraid of anything, are you?"

"Come on, don't stall!" bellowed Trask. "Hand it over!"

"Just a minute, now," drawled George Dobbs. "What's your name?"

"My name's Carl Trask, but that hasn't got anything to do with it."

"Carl Trask, eh? And you want this piece of paper—is that right?"

"Yeah, and I want it in a hurry!"

Dobbs thrust his hand into his breast-pocket and he brought out a paper, but it was not the sheet he had torn from the diary.

"Well, here's a piece of paper that's just as good," he said. "Read it over carefully. Here's one for the dame, too!"

A second sheet of paper was deposited on the table while Carl Trask gaped at the one he had received.

"Hi, what is this, a subpoena?" he gasped.

"You guessed it, brother," chuckled Dobbs. "Be in court at ten o'clock in the morning."

"What's the big idea?" Trask exploded. "I'm not in on this!"

"That's what you think," said Wheeler, and let go of Lucy Benton to pick up his hat.

He followed Dobbs swiftly to the door, and they went out, regardless of the girl's shouted abuse.

Next morning, in court, Lucy Benton was one of the first witnesses called for the defence. She took her seat on the stand with a defiant toss of her head for Perry Mason, and the manner in which she answered his preliminary questions demonstrated her hostility and caused the District Attorney to wonder why she had been subpoenaed. But Perry Mason was very quiet and very patient.

"And now, in reference to Mr. Foley's German police dog, Prince," he said slowly. "Was the dog devoted to Evelyn Foley, formerly Evelyn Cartwright?"

"Yes," admitted the girl. "He had become very attached to her."

"And the dog was also devoted to Mrs. Bessie Foley?"

"Naturally," snapped Lucy Benton. "He had been with Mr. and Mrs. Foley for years at Santa Barbara."

"And the dog had also become attached to you?"

"Yes. He had a very affectionate disposition."

"I can understand that," commented Mason. "Yet the dog howled almost continuously during the nights of the fifteenth and sixteenth of April of the present year?"

"He did not!"

"Is it not a fact," suggested Perry Mason, moving nearer to the witness-stand, "that the dog left the house, stood near an addition to the garage which was under construction, and howled dismally?"

Lucy Benton's eyes were turned to the clock on the wall, but she declared emphatically:

"He did not!"

Perry Mason, with a glance for the jury, looked up at the judge.

"May it please the court," he said gravely, "the defence, at this time, would like to make a motion for the adjournment of the court, officers, and witnesses, to the scene of the crime, in Milpas Drive, for the further examination of this witness."

"A most unusual motion," exclaimed the judge.

"Unusual, Your Honour," agreed Mason, "but not necessarily irregular. It is only at the Foley residence that the defence can hope to introduce new and important evidence, physically impossible to bring into this court."

The judge looked across at Claude Drumm.

"Does the prosecution wish to enter any objections?" he inquired.

"On the contrary, Your Honour," was the prompt rejoinder, "the prosecution feel that a visit to the scene of the crime may be of great benefit to the jury in arriving at a verdict."

The judge pursed his lips.

"Motion granted," he decided. "Bailiff, take charge of the jury."

A buzz of excited conversation filled the court. Bessie Foley looked worried, and Lucy Benton gulped and descended from the witness-stand because the clerk had whispered to her.

Cars were ordered, and all the people concerned in the case were conveyed to the house in Milpas Drive. The drawing-room was converted into a sort of court, and the judge sat in a high-backed chair at a little round table in the bay-window.

Lucy Benton was conducted to an easy-chair on the left of the bay, and Perry Mason resumed his interrogation. From the direction of the garage, out in the ground, there arose a noise as of pneumatic drills at work.

"Now, as I understand your testimony," said Mason loudly, because of the noise, "Evelyn Foley—formerly Cartwright—left this residence in a taxi-cab on the morning of April seventeenth."

"Yes, that is correct," admitted the girl.

"You saw her leave?"

"Yes."

Perry Mason folded his arms, paced a costly rug, and suddenly whirled round on the witness.

"Do I understand," he demanded, "that you saw her alive on the morning of April the seventeenth?"

Lucy Benton drew a long breath, then turned appealingly to the judge.

"Your Honour," she faltered, "that pounding is driving me crazy! I can scarcely think!"

The judge himself was irritated by the din and nodded.

"Bailiff," he said, "will you please see that that noise is stopped?"

The bailiff went out through the lounge-hall to the garden.

"The witness will answer the last question," directed the judge, and Lucy Benton held up her head.

"I can't say that I saw her personally," she admitted. "I heard steps going down the stairs from her room. I was—here in this room. I glanced out and saw a taxi-cab drawn up by the front door. I took it for granted the woman was Mrs. Evelyn Foley."

Perry Mason advanced to an exquisitely-carved desk, from which he took two photostatic prints. He held them almost under the girl's nose.

"Now you've identified this letter as being in the handwriting of Mrs. Evelyn Foley," he said sharply. "Will you identify this photostatic copy of a telegram as also being in her handwriting?"

He thrust the print of the telegram into the girl's unsteady hand and stood over her.

"Don't you know?" he shouted. "You unhesitatingly identified this letter as being in her handwriting—what about this telegram?"

"Yes," murmured Lucy Benton in a voice little above a whisper. "Yes—it's the same."

Perry Mason took the photostatic copy of the telegram from Lucy Benton's hand.

"Will you kindly explain," he said in a voice that chilled her to the spine, "how Mrs. Evelyn Foley could have written a letter, and dispatched this telegram from Ventura, both on the seventeenth of April of this year, when you know that she was murdered on the evening of the fifteenth of April—just as you also know that her former husband, Arthur Cartwright, was murdered in this house on the following night?"

The Dog That Howled

LUCY BENTON sat speechless in her chair and closed her eyes; Claude Drumm sprang up in consternation.

"That is objected to," he shouted, "as argumentative, calling for a conclusion of the witness, not proper examination, and assuming a fact not in evidence."

"Objection sustained," said the judge.

The startled members of the jury settled down in their seats at the back of the room, and Lucy Benton buried her face in her hands. The noise of pneumatic drills persisted.

"Didn't you write this letter?" demanded Perry Mason.

"No!" cried the girl hysterically, and raised her head to look at the print he was holding out to her. "No, that handwriting doesn't resemble mine in the least!"

"As a matter of fact," said Mason, "on April the seventeenth your right hand was in a bandage, wasn't it? You'd been bitten by a dog?"

"Yes," she replied more firmly. "Prince had been poisoned, and when I tried to give him an emetic he accidentally bit my hand."

"You couldn't hold a pen in that hand?"

"Of course I couldn't!" she cried. "And that goes to show how false your accusation is that I wrote the letter or the telegram! Why, my hand was so crippled I couldn't possibly hold a pen in it!"

"Exactly," said Mason. "But didn't you go to Ventura on the seventeenth of April in an automobile driven by Carl Trask?"

Marvellous Offer to Readers of BOY'S CINEMA

Wonderful Folding STEREOSCOPE

Together with 6 Fascinating Stereoscope Cards, at the Bargain Price of 1/- Only POST FREE

If you would like one of these wonderful stereoscopes, you must send now, for in a few days this exceptional BOY'S CINEMA offer will be withdrawn and it may never be repeated. The stock is limited, and all applications will be dealt with in strict rotation. Do not delay. Take advantage of this great opportunity while there is still time.

This wonderful stereoscope is not a toy—it is a real scientific instrument—it makes pictures seem to live, to jump out of a background into solid reality. It is made in metal, is beautifully finished in black, folds into a convenient size and, most important, has two wonderful lenses.

A stereoscope is described in the dictionary as an instrument combining two views of an object taken at slightly different angles into a single image with effect of solidity. It is really amazing. Held up to the light and correctly focused, it is startling in its effect. What first appears to be an ordinary picture becomes something living and vital.

With every stereoscope we send you six special stereoscope cards, showing animals at the Zoo: Lions, Penguins, Pelicans, Crocodiles, Hippo and the quaint Sambar Deer. These stereoscopes will also bring out the detail in any ordinary snapshot—try it and see how successful it is!

"Yes," she said slowly. "I—I thought I might find Mrs. Cartwright—I mean Mrs. Evelyn Foley—in Ventura."

"And you didn't write this telegram while you were there, because you couldn't hold a pen in your right hand on that day, or for several days thereafter—isn't that true?"

"Yes."
"Very well. But isn't it a fact that you kept a diary over the period I've mentioned?"

"Yes," she said—and realised that she was caught in a trap. "No!"

The sheet which George Dobbs had ripped from the diary was flourished before her frightened eyes.

"Isn't this a page from your diary, written on April the seventeenth?" Perry Mason demanded harshly. "Is it not a fact, Lucy Benton, that you are ambidextrous—that you have always been able to write equally well with either hand? Is it not a fact that the handwriting on this page from your diary is identical with the handwriting on this letter and this telegram, both of which are purported to have been written by Mrs. Evelyn Foley, formerly Mrs. Evelyn Cartwright?"

Lucy Benton became a huddled and quivering figure of fear in the chair she occupied. Her lips moved, but she could not utter a word. And then, in the awed silence, everybody in the drawing-room realised that the din of drills had ceased and that voices outside the house were shouting something that sounded like "Murder!"

Bessie Foley, seated at the end of the carved desk caught at her breath and shivered.

Running feet sounded in the lounge-hall, and the bailiff burst excitedly into the presence of the judge, followed by Ed Wheeler and others.

"Your honour," blurted the bailiff, "they've just dug up two bodies in the garage! They were buried under the concrete!"

"You were right, chief," boomed Ed Wheeler. "It's Arthur Cartwright, and the dame was his wife! Both shot through the head!"

With a little strangled cry Lucy Benton got to her feet—and Ed Wheeler gripped her by wrist and arm. The district attorney rushed over to the judge.

"Your honour!" he cried. "Your honour, in the name of common decency I demand an adjournment!"

The judge rapped on the table with his gavel and glared at the whispering members of the jury.

"Granted," he said. "And the court recommends that the district attorney shall take the proper steps to determine this witness' connection with the murders of Mr. and Mrs. Cartwright."

In the cars that had brought them to the house, all those concerned in the proceedings were taken back to the court; and late in the afternoon of that day, Perry Mason made his speech to the jury.

After he had dealt with every other aspect of the case, he said warmly:

"It is the contention of the prosecution that the shots which killed Clinton Foley and the dog were fired by his wife, the defendant, but there is one unanswerable objection to such a theory. If the killer had been the defendant it would not have been necessary for her to have shot the dog. And why?"

"I will tell you why! The dog knew the defendant and loved her. It would have been overjoyed at seeing the defendant, and at knowing that the two persons to whom it was most devoted had been remitted. That, ladies and gentlemen, disposes of the case for the prosecution!"

In the circumstances the verdict of the jury was almost inevitable. Bessie Foley was found not guilty!

At six o'clock in the evening, while newsboys were shouting in the streets of the city "Foley murder case result! Extra!" Ed Wheeler and George Dobbs played draughts in a room adjoining Perry Mason's private office and glanced occasionally at a splendid specimen of a German police dog, lying contentedly under the table to which it was fastened.

Perry Mason was leaning against his desk, talking to Della Street, who had several questions to ask.

"How did you guess that the bodies of Arthur Cartwright and his former wife were buried under the garage?" was one of them; and Mason replied:

"Arthur Cartwright told the truth when he said the dog howled on the night of April the fifteenth. Between the time he came here to see me and the time he wrote his will he discovered, somehow, that his wife was dead. That's why he changed his will, leaving his property to Bessie Foley instead of to Evelyn, who had been his wife."

"Then you think it was Foley who killed Evelyn?" said Della.

"Unquestionably. She discovered that Foley and his so-called housekeeper were in love. They'd probably been quarrelling about it for days. It was a pre-meditated crime, otherwise why should Foley have built a totally unnecessary addition to his garage? And when Cartwright faced them with his suspicions they had to commit a second crime to cover up the first."

There came a tap at the door, and Bessie Foley opened it, a free woman but a very pallid one.

"I beg your pardon," she murmured. "Am I intruding?"

"Oh, no at all!" declared Perry Mason heartily. "I was waiting for you."

An excited barking rang out from the inner room and he pressed a bell-button on the desk, whereupon Ed Wheeler released the dog and opened the door.

"Prince!" cried Bessie Foley, as the animal flew joyously to her. "Prince, you rascal! Hallo, boy!"

"I beg your pardon," said Perry Mason with a cryptic smile, "but his name is not Prince! Prince is dead!"

Bessie Foley stared at him, patting the dog.

"Down, Prince, down!" she commanded, and the dog settled contentedly at her feet.

"I urge you not to call him Prince," said Perry Mason significantly.

"Where did you get him?" she asked.

"Well," said Mason, "I couldn't understand why the dog suddenly stopped howling, and why an apparently friendly animal should have savagely attacked Luey Benton. So I made a round of the kennels in the neighbourhood, and I found one kennel where a man answering to the description of Clinton Foley had exchanged a German police dog on the night of April the sixteenth for another police dog of similar appearance. I purchased the dog."

"What are you going to do with him?" she inquired.

"I would suggest that you take him with you. Keep me advised of your whereabouts—and, remember, don't answer any questions."

She went off soon afterwards, expressing her gratitude; and the dog went with her. But Della Street gazed accusingly at her employer.

"That was the dog that howled!" she said. "The only real argument you had to convince the jury of Mrs. Foley's innocence was that her own dog would never have attacked her—she'd never have had to shoot him. This means that—that woman actually did—"

Perry Mason clapped a hand over Della Street's mouth and slipped an arm round her waist.

"I have never heard Mrs. Foley's story," he said quietly, "nor has anyone else, but I'm convinced that anything she did was done in self-defence. She had to defend herself against a savage dog and a murderous man. I acted merely as her lawyer."

Della looked admiringly up into his face.

"You're a cross between a saint and a devil," she declared.

"How do you like it?" chuckled Perry Mason—and kissed her on the lips.

The harness of the parachute firmly buckled around him, Nick drew Henry's gun and covered the two men with it.

"Harland," he ground out, "you'll take your orders from me. You'll set your course for the north and the San Antonio Air Base."

The scoundrelly pilot and his accomplice whipped round, and, as Nick coolly removed the sun-glasses he was wearing, Frank Harland gave vent to an oath.

"Terris!" he blurted.

"The game's up," Nick told the crooks in grim accents: "You're taking a nice long trip that will end in the gaol-house. Come on, Harland—swing north!"

With the gun threatening him, the man at the controls was forced to obey, and for the next twenty minutes the 'plane sped in the direction Nick had indicated. Twenty minutes—because it took Harland just that length of time to pluck up sufficient courage to throw the craft into an ugly dive at the risk of being shot.

The sudden dip of the machine caught Nick unawares and pitched him in a heap on the floor. Powell also lost his balance, but he was flung against the side of the cabin and managed to keep his feet. Nor was he slow to take advantage of the situation, and with a shout he hurled himself on Nick Terris as the vessel straightened out.

A series of cowardly blows reduced the youngster to insensibility, and it was in an exultant voice that Powell called out to Harland.

"I got him! I got him! When you made that dive! What'll we do with him?"

"Dump him out," Harland answered tersely. "And make it snappy. There's another 'plane ahead of us, and it looks like a government outfit. See—it's just flown out of that cloud. I'm swingin' south again, but get Terris out of here."

With difficulty Powell dragged Nick from the floor and hauled him to the side of the cabin. Then he rolled down one of the windows and shoved his victim through the aperture, sending him to what seemed certain doom in a stretch of sea dotted with small islets.

Nick Terris was lucky. It was by sheer chance that the ring of the unconscious youngster's parachute fouled the catch of the window. It was by sheer chance that it held for an instant and then snapped—just as the rip-cord was pulled and the folds of the chute billowed out in the wind.

Nick floated downwards to the sea, and was dropped into the water, the cold shock reviving him even as the parachute sagged around him. Then he collected his wits, and, struggling out of the harness, he swam towards a strip of beach fifty yards away.

He gained firm sand, and as he hid so he realised that a 'plane was descending. It was the government 'plane which Harland had observed a minute or two previously, and as it came to rest on the beach Nick recognised Pete Taylor at the controls.

It did not take Nick long to climb into the passenger cockpit, before which a machine-gun was mounted, and in a few seconds the craft was rising into the air again, wheeling in pursuit of the ship occupied by Harland and Powell.

From the outset it was clear that the

"QUICK TRIGGER LEE"

The rider came to a sudden stop as a gun roared from the back of the car. He let go of his reins, and drew his own gun. Carefully he rested it on the crook of his left arm and pressed the trigger.

The bullet found one of Sam's rear tyres, and the car began to bump and sway dangerously. Rose let out a cry of alarm, and one of the men in the back touched Sam on the shoulder.

"You'd better stop, boss," he said. "We can deal with him better if the car is still."

Sam slammed on his brakes, and reached for his own gun. Phil, watching, suddenly spurred his horse and began to bear down upon the car as hard as he could.

The men in the back raised their guns and waited, knowing that the nearer Phil got the better mark he would make. Phil came on at headlong speed.

Suddenly one of the men took careful aim. Instantly Rose let out a cry and caught hold of his hand. The gun exploded and the bullet buried itself in the ground.

Phil's own gun roared a split second later, and the man fell backwards over the side of the car, a red stain appearing on his right shoulder. Phil's gun roared yet again, and the second man gave a howl of agony and started nursing his wrist.

Then Phil stopped. He was but twenty yards away now, and made a perfect mark.

"Well, Wales," he shouted. "Do we shoot it out?"

Sam's gun was half-up, and his first impulse was to take quick aim and let fly. Then he remembered the accuracy of Phil's shooting, and remained still.

"Take his gun and throw it into the road, Miss Campbell," Phil went on. "We can do without the artillery now, I reckon."

Rose obeyed, and Phil slid from the saddle. Slowly he walked to the side of the car.

"Sorry I had to make trouble in front of you," he said to Rose, and turned to Sam. "You'd better get going, Wales," he went on. "And if you want my advice, leave the district, otherwise the next time I meet you I'm going to give you the biggest beating you ever had. You'd get it now, only it wouldn't be a pleasant sight for a lady to see." Sam, sitting hunched in the car, made no reply. Phil picked up the three guns that were lying around, and then turned to Rose.

"There's only one horse," he said, "but if you wouldn't mind sharing it with me I reckon we can manage."

Rose smiled at him, and got out of the car.

"Won't that young lady you were dancing with be jealous?" she asked. Phil looked at Sam significantly.

"So he's been telling more lies, huh?" he said. "That'll be something else to square later on." He led her to the horse and helped her mount, then swung up lightly behind her. "There isn't any young lady," he finished gruffly as he jerked the horse forward.

"AIR PATROL"

government plane had a big advantage in speed over his quarry, and soon Pete and Nick were close up on the fugitives. Then came a streaming blast of hot lead from the foe, a fusillade which was promptly answered by the patrol sloop's machine-gun.

Within the scaplane Harland was drilled by a rain of death that shattered the windows of the craft, and next instant the vessel was hurtling to disaster in a terrific nose-dive, exploding into fragments as it hit the water with ghastly impact.

Half an hour later Plane Number Seven of the Border Patrol was soaring high above the deck of the s.s. Meridian, and Lieutenant Pete Taylor was yelling a command to his friend and comrade. "Go on, mug, bail out! You've had one wetting, and another won't hurt you. You'll find a clute right beside you."

Nick grinned and began to prepare himself for another descent through space.

"Okay, sweetheart!" he sang out, when he had adjusted the harness. "I'll be seein' you."

"At the airport—after the honeyficers h moon."

"Right," said Nick. "That's if they'll take me back on the Force."

"They'll take you back, don't you worry," Pete rejoined. "They'll jump at you. So-long—mug!"

Five minutes afterwards Nick Terris was picked out of the sea by one of the Meridian's lifeboats, and the first to greet him as he climbed to the steership's deck was Janet. Together they stood by the rail, locked in fond embrace, with the youngster's father looking on smilingly, and meanwhile, high above the sea-going vessel, Government Plane Number Seven traced a message in the sky.

It was a message written in smoke, a message from a man who had lost in the game of love but knew how to take defeat and disappointment.

"Good luck!" it spelled.

Nick and Janet broke apart and gazed up at the whirling plane. They waved, and Pete waved back, then, with a final dip of his machine, he turned and flew off to the Airport.

"FIGHTING YOUTH"

The All-American football star was a simple-hearted giant and easy prey for a daring and beautiful adventuress. She robbed him of his spirit and manhood, but one day he realised his folly. Could he stage a come-back? A thrilling drama of the football field, starring Charles Farrell and June Martel

Conspirators

A POWERFUL low-bodied car pulled up with a screech of brakes before a shabby, red-bricked villa. A dark, pale-faced girl of unusual beauty alighted and surveyed the house carefully, then she glanced up and down the very quiet road before lifting the latch of the gate.

The place seemed deserted, but it was the address on the envelope. The girl was about to ring the bell when a sound made her glance round—a man had appeared from a side entrance and was peering at her through thick-lensed glasses searchingly and suspiciously. Not very old, of obvious foreign origin, with a thin face and hooky nose—very like a hawk. He came into the porch and towered over her, but the girl did not seem awed or perturbed by his behaviour.

"Are you Mr. Markoff?"

"I am," he replied, and took the letter she gave him. "You are Miss Arlington? Excuse me!"

The contents of the letter were brief:

"This will introduce Miss Carol Arlington. She will serve as undergraduate leader of the radical activities at State and will carry out your commands at all times. She will not fail the cause. Fraternally, K. N., 405."

Across the headlines were large blue letters: "THE LEAGUE OF FREEDOM."

Markoff folded the note.

"There are no other credentials?"

"None—that note is sufficient."

"It is unfortunate that you are so beautiful." Markoff scowled at her.

The girl smiled.

"Why?"

December 7th, 1935.

"It raises questions concerning your sincerity."

"I've just been thrown out of one college for my sincerity."

His lips twisted in a sneer.

"That wasn't sincerity—that was stupidity. Now I must make one thing clear. I detest having to work with a woman. Here in America women are permitted to think that they are as smart as men, so I shall have to tolerate you. If you will keep that in mind—it will save much difficulty."

"Cut out the talk, and give me my orders." Her eyes narrowed as she strove to keep her temper.

"I said a moment ago that you were fired from college last year because of your stupidity." The eyes behind the glasses glowered at her. "That was true only in a measure. To a certain degree our whole party was guilty of the same kind of stupidity. We came out into the open. For this year the Central Committee has worked out an entirely different plan. In accordance with this plan you will be elected President of the Student League of Freedom here at State College."

"Do you mean to tell me that I can come here—a perfect stranger—and be elected to an important post?"

"That has been arranged," Markoff answered. "The branch committee have had their orders. Once you are elected I will have many things to tell you—but at no time must you be seen with me. When necessary we will meet here. I'm registered at the University as a law student. When you pass me on the campus—don't recognise me."

"That will be a pleasure," Carol Arlington laughed shortly.

"My plans are almost prepared for a great victory, and the Brotherhood will expect you to do your share, Miss Arlington," Markoff told her. "Do not fail us, for the Brotherhood do not forgive a second time."

"Don't think you're putting a scare into me because you're not," the girl answered defiantly. "I was fired last time through obeying orders, and that's not my idea of failure, but the failure of the Brotherhood. Let us trust that their plans do not fail again. It might be unhealthy for all of us. If you ring State 45724 you can always leave a message for me. Good-day, Mr. Markoff."

The bogus student watched the car drive away before entering the house, which was apparently empty and unfurnished. He went down into the basement to the kitchen—an old dresser swung back to reveal a door. He tapped twice and the door immediately opened. The door closed behind him.

The Football Game

THREE weeks later Carol Arlington was elected President of the League of Freedom. It was not quite so easy as Markoff had hinted because of another candidate, Tony Tonetti. An American with Italian blood in his veins so it was said, and a great speaker. Probably he lost his chance by being so antagonistic to a girl being elected president, and thus got little of the female vote.

Markoff gave orders that meetings of a mild nature were to be held as the plan of campaign was not definitely settled by the Brotherhood. She was to keep her eyes open for any ideas and suggestions.

At the big football stadium she saw Larry Davis for the first time. A stalwart, upright young fellow, who in spite of his height and big build could move like the wind. The announcer on the loud-speaker made his words ring round that crowded stadium.

"Believe me, this State team looks like another great football machine. At this stage of the game they're way out in front with a score of twenty to nothing. As usual, Larry Davis, dynamic quarter-back, is the leader of the State attack. His passing, punting and ball-carrying this afternoon has been little short of sensational. He's in mid-season form at the very start. Davis was an All-American last year, and, judging from his performance to-day, he's a cinch to repeat again this fall. Boy, he's the kind of quarter-back a coach stays up all night praying for. It's still fourth quarter. Captain Johnson is kicking off for Carter. It's a nice kick—going deep into State territory. Larry Davis is waiting for it on his three-yard line. He traps the ball neatly, spills a couple of tackles, and is away like the breeze. He's up to the fifteen-yard line and still going. My—oh, my—oh, my! He crosses the thirty—the thirty-five, and is finally downed on State's forty-seven-yard line."

The crowd bellowed their praise of this great run.

"Blake has the ball. He heaves it to Davis. Davis is off. With ease and without abating his tremendous pace he avoids the hands that try to bear him down. He's right down into Carter territory. Ah, he's down on Carter's twenty-three yard line—"

Carol Arlington turned to the girl seated next to her.

"That Larry Davis seems to be the whole team."

"I wouldn't say that," answered the student. "Although he did make All-America last year, and he'll make it this year just as sure as you powder your nose."

Carol said nothing for a while. She saw Davis make a brilliant run and score a touchdown, which the quarter-back converted.

"Does Larry Davis dance as well as he runs with a football?" she asked.

"You'd better ask Betty Wilson." The girl student pointed. "There she is over there. That dark girl with her friend, Dodo. It is a cinch for wedding-bells. And I expect Dodo will have to marry the big fellow on her left. Charlie Kipp is his name, and he follows her about like a lamb. He never has a cent, and manages to stay here by working down at Luigi's restaurant as a waiter. I think he is the biggest breaker ever known, but Luigi keeps him on to pay off for the damage—which will be never."

"I suppose Larry Davis and Charlie are pals?"

"Yes, they room together. Larry has been relieved of his military duties at the college so that he can play football."

"Has Larry a lot of money?"

"He hasn't any debts, which is something of a record, but he hasn't any money," the student laughed. "He has a job down at the gas station, and he works there most nights. I understand he is a smart mechanic, and hopes one day to start a garage of his own. He's an upper classman, and in his last year. Betty's also in her last year. The dean thinks they're a grand couple. Betty also works some nights—she's a cashier down at Luigi's. She can do anything with that old Italian. That's all I know."

"Rah! Rah! Rah! Larry!" raved the State fans, as the quarter-back made a brilliant run and then at the right moment got the ball to one of his own men who was unmarked. The result ended in another touchdown. State had beaten Carter by 34 points to nothing.

Two nights later Carol Arlington received a message that Markoff wished to see her, and she went over to the deserted house. The girl was blindfolded—Markoff did not completely trust her—and taken down to the cellar hide-out. In one of the cellars the bandage was removed from her eyes.

"The Central Committee has decided on a plan of action," stated Markoff. "Somebody has said that a college is only a little red building attached to a stadium filled with two football teams and seventy thousand people. We're going to start the campaign by cracking inter-collegiate football wide open."

"Another nutty idea!" scoffed the girl. "What are you planning to do—bomb it from the air?"

"Silence!" Markoff rasped out. "This is no matter for jesting. We can achieve our end by taking the money out of it. The committee has gone thoroughly into the matter. Until the League of Freedom is strongly organized we cannot risk an open encounter with the authorities."

"Why pick football?"

"Because football is very vulnerable. It will give us something to shout about. Once the youth of this country have tasted victory in a common cause, it will be a simple matter to direct their energies against the evils of the existing social order." Markoff stood up and fairly shouted his words at her. "We must find a way to turn these fools from their football to the League of Freedom. Bust up their games and we will gain hundreds of recruits. Our power grows, and our power will grow at other colleges. In the end we shall be able to dictate to the cursed Senate when our representatives are chosen for office."

Carol Arlington smiled.

"If the committee wants me to attack football, I know a very simple way to begin."

"Then get busy." Markoff's voice softened. "So far your work in the good cause has been satisfactory. The Brotherhood are pleased."

Two men appeared at Markoff's signal and her eyes were bound. When the bandage was removed she was in the garden of the deserted house. Carol Arlington drove her car slowly—her nimble wits were concocting a clever plan.

The Breakdown

CAROL drove out to the garage, and it was Larry Davis who appeared to fill up her car with petrol.

"May I thank you?" said the girl, when he came to her for the money.

"For what?" He was puzzled.

"For giving me one of the biggest thrills of my life. Your run to score that touchdown last Saturday."

The quarter-back gave a self-conscious laugh and shrugged his big shoulders.

"Oh, I couldn't help that. Two big fellows in the other team were chasing me."

"The cheering of your fans must have been stirring," Carol smiled round at him. "Are you going out for the All-American this year?"

"I shall do my best, but there are a lot of better players than myself."

"You're too modest, Mr. Davis. I admire your pluck working here so you can go to college."

"Matter of necessity." He produced a leather. "I'll just give your wind-screen a clean."

"Thanks." She watched him through half-closed eyes. "When are you here?"

"Between six-thirty and eight-thirty."

Carol thanked him again and smiled at him, then she drove away. At eight-thirty the manager of the garage had a message that Miss Carol Arlington had broken down on the Millpond road, about a mile from Briarcliff, and could someone come out to help her. She had a flat tyre. The manager told Larry about the puncture, and the quarter-back only hesitated for a moment before volunteering to go out with the service motor-bicycle combination. He could fix the puncture and still meet Betty Wilson at nine.

He took the letter she held out to him. "Excuse me," he said.

December 7th, 1935.

When Carol heard that Larry was coming out to her she drove her car to the side of the road and unfastened the valve.

Larry arrived and changed the wheel for her, whilst she leaned against the car and chatted brightly.

"I've a dreadful premonition."

"About what?" he asked.

"That I'm going to have another flat on the way home."

"Well, I—I could hook my machine to the back and drive with you." He suggested just what she had hoped.

"Would you mind? It is kind." She gave him one of her most alluring looks. "You are a dear. Will you drive?"

After a while Carol began to talk about the League of Freedom and of the cause that should give the young people a chance to make a name for themselves without the restrictions that hampered them at the moment. Glorious new ideas. Modern youth. The way to make America the greatest country in the world. Carol was a great talker, and Larry thought it was marvellous that so beautiful a girl could be so clever. He promised to attend the next meeting.

There are always people ready in this world to broadcast scandal and gossip. Larry did not keep his appointment at nine, and by nine-fifteen someone had seen them driving together in the car and torn off to tell Betty Wilson the news. That young lady laughed about it, and pretended that she had called the evening off as she was studying for an exam.

At ten-thirty Larry came round to the dormie house where a number of the girls resided, and he was informed that as it was after calling hours he could not see Betty. Feeling very guilty, Larry begged the housekeeper to ask Betty to come down for a few minutes.

"I want to explain about to-night," began Larry. "I got a call for a breakdown out in the country—"

"Don't bother to explain, Larry," Betty interrupted. "Explanations are very dull. Take my advice and keep out of spots that make them necessary."

"Don't you care what I do?" he demanded.

"Don't you think it's time for footballers to be in bed?"

"Right!" Larry snapped out the word. He was in the wrong, but his conscience was not awake to the cheapness of his behaviour. The quiet, scornful words of this girl made him feel foolish and angry. He turned on his heel and strode away without a backward glance.

The Radical Meeting

IT was a surprise to Larry Davis to see Betty Wilson in the crowd outside the lecture-hall, which had been reserved for a meeting of the League of Freedom.

"You're not going to this meeting—are you?" Larry asked a little nervously, for he had not seen Betty for a week.

"Yes—any objection?"

"No, but how did you get away from the café so early?"

"Her man let me off."

"Just to come up here," muttered Larry. "I didn't know you were interested in the movement."

"I'm not." She came nearer so that others should not hear. "I came here to ask you just one question, Larry, do you think it's smart for you to be mixed up in this crowd?"

"Why not?" Larry demanded. "Carol says it's about time I did something besides carry a football."

"Do you think she'd mind if I came along, too?" Betty asked, almost too sweetly.

"Certainly not—come on!" The simple
December 7th, 1935.

Larry was pleased. "I hope Carol gets you as a recruit."

There were desks in the lecture-room, and they sat side by side. Carol was on the rostrum with two or three members of her committee behind her. Markoff was at the back of the lecture-hall.

"My father is one of the richest men in the country," Carol commenced.

"But I wonder if you know exactly why I'm here—why I'm part of your movement?" She glanced round for this to sink in. "There is only one reason—because I believe in the complete freedom of the individual. We are Radicals; it's our job to overthrow existing conditions. And so far we've failed miserably." A pause for this to digest.

"We've failed because we—as youth, as students—have undertaken to correct the evils created by our elders. I propose that we, as youth, attack youth. Let's challenge big business where big business is least expected to exist." Solemnly Carol looked round her audience, which was composed of a mixed gathering of at least a hundred. "I mean inter-collegiate football."

Betty shot a quick glance at Larry, who was sitting there with a bland, foolish expression on his face.

Tony Tonnetti was on his feet.

"You're making our organisation ridiculous. Some of you were present when we founded this branch of the League of Freedom. I know you all. I know the homes you come from, and I know that you'd die for an ideal. Football is an ideal, and—"

But Carol Arlington had her agitators there, and they shouted him down. The girl once more had the floor.

"Let's learn from experience and fact." Her smile was triumphant. "Last year one of the biggest coaches in the country resigned because the game's a racket. What right has a college got to burn our young men out in four years just to make a Roman holiday for the public? Like gladiators in the ring, with all the while the fear that they may fail, and that the public will turn down their thumbs to smash that unfortunate. It isn't a sport—it's nothing but commercialised brutality."

Betty Wilson stood up.

"I crashed the gate to-night, but I'm glad to see that this is an open meeting, where anybody can talk!" Her clear young voice rang through the hall. Her dark eyes were defiant. "We've heard a lot about football—but nothing from a football player. I'd like to hear what an All-American has to say about it!" She pointed to Larry, who blinked round nervously.

Under the repeated shouts of "Speech!" he rose to his feet.

"Er—I'm afraid I can't be of very much help to you—you see Miss Arlington told me if I came to this meeting all I'd have to do was to sit. I'm afraid I'm a much better sitter than I am a speaker."

"You're perfectly right, Larry. I did promise not to call on you!" cried Carol as the footballer made to sit down. "But now that you're on your feet tell us one thing—football is no longer an undergraduates' sport—it's a business. It's run for the profit of the college. You take a beating—the college and the coaches take the money. It's wrong, and we propose to stop all that. Will you help us?"

Larry grinned.

"Why, er—of course."

The audience applauded loudly, whilst Betty Wilson gazed at him as if she saw him for the first time in his true colours.

When the meeting was over, Betty and Larry made their way to the entrance. The triumphant Carol was waiting for them, and she did not try to conceal her dislike of Betty.

"Burns you to find out that Larry can think for himself, doesn't it?" she sneered.

"No one can think better than Larry on the football field," was Betty's retort. "But at a meeting like yours he's just like a fish out of water!"

"You're proud of me to-night, aren't you?" Larry was angry at the scorn in her voice.

"Just about as proud as if you'd fumbled the ball on your own goal-line!" Larry's eyes could not face the fierce contempt and looked away. "If this is your idea of thinking for yourself I think it a very poor one. I think someone is doing the thinking for you." And with one look at the President of the League of Freedom, Betty left them.

The Favourite Fails His Side

ON the following Saturday State played a match away and State won by seven points to six. The Gridiron Review, which was the college paper, had not very much to say about the match except that Davis had not been up to his best form. He had played well, but not with his earlier brilliance.

The Saturday after State were at home to Manchester College, and the Stadium was packed in expectation for a great battle.

Betty was there with her friend Dodo, and the latter's escort—the fat Charlie Kipp.

"Larry don't seem to get going." Charlie scratched his mop of hair. "Ho seems to stick around as if he had glue on his feet."

"Larry's on the five-yard line," Betty pointed. "He's waiting his chance."

Manchester had the ball and as five of the State men rushed in to tackle the man it was neatly passed into centre. Larry rushed forward to intercept the pass, and Betty was sure her hero was going to make up for his past play. He caught the ball, but was slow getting away, and was instantly seized by three Manchester men and brought down, the ball rolling out of his hands.

"Through Davis' fumble Manchester is now in sporting position," the announcer told the Stadium. Betty could have killed the man, and when, a few seconds later, Manchester got the expected touchdown, then the commentator had a lot to say.

"Larry will soon even up the score," Betty whispered to her friends.

"The teams are now lining up for the kick-off. State have never lost to Manchester on their home ground, but today they must look to their laurels."

"What a lot of nonsense that man talks!" Betty spoke indignantly. "If Larry scores he'll be all full of praise for Larry, and what a wonderful team are State!"

"State has the ball!" Charlie leaned forward eagerly. "That's the second down—seven yards to go. The boys are going into a huddle, and Larry is sparking up signals. I bet every cent I got they make it! Ah, now for the fun!"

The ball came back between the centre's legs to Davis, and instead of catching it neatly he seemed to fumble the ball as if it were greasy. Then Davis swung away to try and work away from Manchester and gain the valuable seven yards which were necessary for State to maintain the attack. He hadn't run a few yards before he was brought down and again the ball slipped out of his hands.

"What's the matter with Larry?"

shouted someone behind Betty. "Is he sick?"

"He hasn't fumbled in two years," muttered veteran Coach Parker to his assistant. "I'll have a word with him when this quarter's through."

The score was still Manchester 6 and State nothing when the third quarter ended.

"Something the matter with you, Larry?" questioned the coach. "Sure your mind's on football?"

"I'll be all right. Sorry I'm playing so badly," Larry answered. "I'll snap out of it next quarter."

But the All-American was no better. The coach had taught them many clever moves, but to-day they seemed to fail. Manchester had lost several of their best men through injuries, and yet State did not make any progress. Davis seemed to have lost his sprint, and was tackled before he could gain any ground, but when the quarter-back got the ball and had almost a clear field the crowd did think he could make a brilliant rundown. What happened was hard to say, but Larry seemed to trip over his own feet, stumbled, and the ball shot out of his hands.

State's groan could have been heard miles away.

It was more than Coach Parker could endure. He stabbed a finger at one of the reserve players, who was seated on a long bench. "Lucats—get in there!"

The whistle shrilled. "Lucats for Davis," the commentator seemed to chuckle. "Coach Parker's taking Davis out of the game. One can't be surprised after this afternoon's childlike display!"

Betty bit her lip as she saw Larry hurrying off the field. Would they give him another chance? Then she gave a gasp of dismay, because the coach had given an imperious wave of his hand.

"Coach waves Davis to the showers!" The loudspeaker seemed to thunder the words. "Lucats replaces Davis as quarter-back for State."

Lucats did not fumble the ball, but he hadn't the speed. State fought stubbornly, but with little co-ordination. They were like a side without a leader. Manchester registered two more touchdowns with one converted.

Markoff's Treachery

BETTY told herself that she did not care when Carol Arlington brought Larry Davis to Luigi's restaurant the night of the match. Saturday night was always a gala, and usually the State boys made all the noise, but this night it was the Manchester lads who waved rattles and yelled battle-cries. Being good sportsmen the State boys shouted back defiance, and threatened to tear Manchester to pieces in the return match.

Manchester started one of those crocodile stunts, people holding on to coats-tails and threaded in and out of tables. The leader kept this up for ten minutes, but he had a definite objective, and that was the table where Larry sat with Carol Arlington.

Larry grinned good-humouredly as the head of the crocodile paused before his table, but it was not so easy to smile when a large bunch of onions was handed to him.

"For you—All-American!" jeered the Manchester fan. "That was a great score you piled up—for us."

"You were our guests to-day," Larry looked unconcerned. "I was just being polite."

They cheered, and the chain of humanity passed.

"That was pretty rotten of them."

Larry Davis snatched off his helmet. "You can have this!" he cried. "I'm through!"

Carol leaned across the table and laid a sympathetic hand on his.

"A winner's privilege," Larry answered dismally.

She pressed his hand.

"Snap out of it, Larry. It's not the end of the world."

"I know; but an All-American isn't supposed to lose." He moved restlessly. "And when I do lose the rest of the college feels that I've let them down. That's what hurts."

"Never mind," Carol sensed danger. "Larry, here's Coach Parker. Wonder what he wants?"

The lined face of the old coach was set and unpromising as he came to their table. Behind him stood his assistant.

"Can you excuse yourself for a minute? We want to see you outside."

Larry bridled at the tone.

"You and Blake know Miss Arlington." The quarter-back stood up. "I'm afraid I can't leave her. If you can't talk to me in here it will have to wait."

"It can't wait!" the coach rasped.

"All right," Larry squared his shoulders. "What's on your mind?"

"Is it something I shouldn't hear?"

Carol stared at the two trainers with impudent scorn.

"No, it concerns you definitely." Coach Parker glanced at her with equal contempt before giving Larry a searching look. "I understand that you joined Miss Arlington's Radical Club. The other night at a meeting you took a stand against football."

"Well, I— You see—" The question floored Larry, then he became angry. "What are you getting at?"

"Word was just brought to me that this afternoon your fumbles were not accidents."

"Are you accusing me of throwing the game?"

Larry was horrified.

"It's what they're saying all over the campus."

The coach's tone denoted uncertainty.

"Do you believe that?"

"I don't know what to believe." The coach faced his quarter-back. "Your play was so atrocious I could believe anything."

Larry clenched his fists as if he would strike his accuser, then he pushed back his chair and without a word walked from the restaurant. It was as if he were unable to stay there and listen to such an accusation a moment longer without saying or doing something he would regret.

Carol Arlington smiled as she watched him, but turned with a start as someone touched her shoulder. It was Markoff. At once she pushed her bag off the table to give him an excuse.

Markoff picked it up and handed it back.

"Keep that rumour that Davis threw the game alive." He spoke out of the corner of his mouth. "I started it."

The next morning the coach went to see the dean of the college, and he reported all that had happened. The dean was a wise man and a great scholar. He listened patiently.

"I have a hunch that Carol Arlington is somehow connected with Larry's fumbles," the coach concluded. "If something isn't done to stop that bunch of Radicals—in two weeks' time we won't have a football team!"

"I understand your anxiety; but what specific charge can you bring that would warrant me taking action?" The dean shook his head slowly. "You have none."

"They're trying to break up the morale of my football team," shouted Parker. "That crowd in the League of Freedom would do any dirty trick."

"No, no, no—you're wrong, Parker." December 7th, 1925.

The dean was emphatic. "I know almost every one of them personally. They're youngsters with ideas. We're a college, and we're supposed to foster ideas, even if sometimes the students make mistakes; and as regards the latter, if they meet the scholastic requirements and conform to the regulations I can't interfere with them."

"Then you don't care if the football team goes to smash?"

The coach did not mince his words.

"That would be very regrettable, but the morale of the team is not my province," the dean answered sharply. "If there's anything the matter with that—it's up to you to fix it."

"All right, then!" The coach's jaw set in hard lines. "I'll take steps to see that these Radicals don't bust up my team. Those Radicals will want to leave my province before I'm through."

And he went out, muttering dire threats.

The Secret Practice

THE coach was missing from college the rest of that day, but on the next morning he called together all members of the A and B teams for a secret practice. No one was to be admitted to the stadium.

Among the players there was plenty of discussion concerning Coach Parker's move, and they prophesied some startling changes in the line-up and severe criticism.

The two teams got changed, and everyone was silent and preoccupied. Lucats, who had taken Larry's place as quarter-back, went over to Wilson, who captained the B team.

"This place's like a morgue," he whispered.

"They say Parker's going to give Larry the works," Wilson answered.

"He'd better lay off," Lucats muttered. "Larry's a good fellow, and done some great things for State. One bad showing, and all that is forgotten. You heard about coach going to Luigi's the other night and accusing Larry of intentional fumbles? Would you like that said of you? Would you be smiling? No; and if coach treats Larry that way again we'll have trouble."

"You can't blame coach for getting mad."

"Coach Parker knows his job, and he's dead keen on college honour and all that sort of thing," Lucats stated. "But he's hasty-tempered and a little old-fashioned in his ideas. I've got a hunch this practice is going to prove a flop."

Larry was one of the last to arrive, and, except for one or two brief greetings, all gave the star player a somewhat cold reception. All the boys were changed when Coach Parker appeared, and with him was a large, heavily-built man, whose face was vaguely familiar.

"Boys!" The coach's voice rang out harsh and authoritative. "You've all heard of Bull Stevens. In his day State never lost a game. He's been kind enough, as a personal favour to me, to come down here to-day. Bull was in the team over thirty years ago, and some of their methods were a bit different from present times. Bull is going to try out methods of his day that never failed. Bull, they're all yours."

The big, scowling man, whose hair was very thin, had lost none of his vitality.

"Boys, old man Parker tells me you haven't much morale," he bellowed at them. "In my day we didn't have any such thing as morale—that's a new disease. We just had a lot of fight.

December 7th, 1935.

Now, I'm not going to bother about your morale—I'm going to find out what's the matter with your fight. Any of you fellows ever hear of fight day?"

The players shook their heads.

"Well, it's something they cut out of football some years ago." Bull Stevens glared round. "I don't know—maybe you fellows are too soft to take it, but I'm going to take a chance, and if the going gets too tough you can always quit." He pointed to the doors. "Come on—on your feet and out in that field."

On the field Parker chose two teams that he considered of equal strength, then Stevens lined them up for a talk.

"This is going to be a regular football game—and every man on this squad is going to get a chance to play this afternoon," Stevens paused. "And get this—there's no first string man who has a stranglehold on his job, and if any of you soreheads think you've been overlooked and deserve a place in the team, and want a chance to show your worth, then now is the time. It was just such a day as this that Percy Wendell of the 1912 Harvard team went from third string substitute to full-back and captain. A great football player has a great love for the game, and if he wants to play for the college then he's got to fight. Those that won't fight can get out—they're no good. This is fight day."

The players glanced across at each other apprehensively.

"Coach Parker has picked two teams and the rest arc reserves." Collins squared his shoulders. "The reserves go out to the bench, and be ready when wanted. The rest of you take your places."

"How do you think the boys will take it?" the coach asked anxiously as he watched the boys going to their places.

"It'll show what they're made of," Stevens answered. "They're not a bunch of cissies. They've got to look at the team facing them and regard them as an enemy through whom they have to smash their way or go under. Pick out the fighters and State's on the map again."

"Don't brains count for anything, Bull?"

"Brawn's far better than brain," retorted the old warrior. "This method never failed in my day, and it's the only chance I reckon you have of making anything out of this bunch."

The practice started and, within one minute, the whistle shrilled.

"This is a fight game!" Stevens raved at them. "Twelve and Fourteen—come here! Your ideas of intercepting a man arc fine at a girl's school, but not on a football field. You, Twelve, could have stopped that run by throwing yourself forward—I suppose you were scared of making yourself dirty, or hurting your hands. You Fourteen, were outpaced and manœuvred. You were like a great ox!

Put a bit more jerk into it, my lad, or you'll go out to the bench!"

A few moments later the whistle shrilled again. Why hadn't Six tried to break through the gap? Why had he run a foolish diagonal course that had just wasted time and been brought down with a bare seven-yard gain? Had he been scared the nasty rough boys might hurt him?

The two teams realised that if they wanted to retain their positions they had to fight, and Stevens made it plain enough that if they could not take bruises and kicks they could quit. He roused them with stinging, lashing words so that they crouched like warriors going into a battle of life and death. They saw red, or rather some of them saw red.

The result was a pile of humanity on the ground and when the players had been removed there was the man with the ball—knocked-out. One of the assistants dashed out and threw water over the boy, who spluttered and soon recovered. The play continued, and then another player had to retire with a strained tendon.

All this while Larry Davis, from the bench, had been watching the play with angry, dissatisfied gaze. Geton, the opposing quarter-back, was ordered to the bench for being a fumbling, futile blunderer. Lucats was shouted for and came out from the bench.

"When you come out on the field, run!" bellowed Stevens. "Do you think we've got all day? Hurry, hurry!"

"Better take it easy," cautioned Coach Parker, "or else you'll have this place like a battlefield."

"I'm going to rouse this bunch or bust!" Stevens was living again the old days. "I'll make 'em fight!"

Two minutes later Lucats tried to make a run from a pass and was brought down. The doctor had to go out to another victim.

Larry was shouted for to replace Lucats, and the star quarter-back did not go to his place, but strode up to Stevens.

"Stevens, why don't you cut out this rough stuff?" he demanded. "We don't go for it around here."

Stevens' hard mouth twisted in a sneer.

"No! You drop the ball and run this moment anybody looks at you. Your turn is coming, Davis, and when it does—if I can land you in the hospital I'll be doing the team a favour."

An angry retort rose to Larry's lips, but he checked it and strode off to his place. He was boiling with rage.

It was the other side's play, and resulted in another wild scrimmage and one man was so badly winded that the doctor had to make another rush on to the field.

"Now you're going to have a try-out!" Stevens shouted to Larry. "Now we should see something."

The ball came to Larry and he fumbled it. Stevens' remarks were scathing, and Larry wanted to rush at the man. It had been a clumsy pass and short; Larry had failed to gather it, but, according to Stevens, only one person was to blame. They would start that play again.

This time Larry gathered the ball and hurled himself like a battering-ram at the defence. He was brought down and told to use his brains. Next time he was accused of running wide with a hint that the first tackle had scared him. On the third run Larry broke through. He was so mad with rage against everyone that he did not fail to use his strength to fling the defence to one side. It was to be a touchdown. He had showed Stevens what he could do. He realised as he ran that he had a clear field, and he glanced back. The defence were not trying to stop him—why not? He turned his head a bit more and saw a small crowd gathered near the centre of the field—someone else had been hurt.

Larry Davis flung down the ball and raced back.

"Get the doc here!" Coach Parker shouted.

Larry peered over the other players' shoulders and saw someone moaning on the ground. He pushed everyone away so that he could get nearer. It was Paul Alton, one of his greatest pals.

He glanced round and noticed how everyone seemed to be staring at him. Paul had been one of the defence and had tried to check him—he had knocked Paul down.

"My chest—my chest!" groaned the sick footballer as the doctor knelt by his side.

The doctor made his examination. "A rib gone," was his verdict. "This man must go to hospital."

"I couldn't help it, Paul." Larry knelt beside his friend. "I was so mad at Stevens I didn't even see you." He did not care if Stevens or Parker heard.

Two stretcher-bearers raced on to the field, and Larry helped to get the groaning Paul on to the canvas.

"Tough break, kid!" Stevens smiled at the injured man, then turned away as if the matter was at an end. "All right—let's get going. We can't waste the whole day."

The stretcher-bearers moved away and with them went Larry Davis, unstrapping his helmet.

"Davis!" Stevens sang out.

Larry took no notice.

"Davis!" roared Bull. "Get back in that game!"

Larry motioned the stretcher-bearers to wait, then he turned round. "He's my room-mate. I got to see him to hospital."

"You can't do anything for him, and your football playing is rotten!" bellowed Stevens in a voice that rang round the empty Stadium. "Stop crying, and get into the game."

Larry Davis walked up to Bull Stevens, and the team thought he was going to strike the one-time star. A queer grin showed on Larry's face as he snatched off his helmet. "You can have this!" the All-American cried. "I'm through."

"Larry, you can't do this!" The coach was aghast.

"Oh, can't I?" sneered Larry, and tossed the helmet to the coach. "Just watch me!" He turned and ran back to the stretcher.

No one moved or did a thing but stare until Larry Davis and the stretcher-bearers had gone.

Markoff a Marked Man

MARKOFF was smiling as he came down the street after a busy day at the college. His plans were maturing better than he had dared hope. State football was in a glorious mess after the sensational withdrawal of Larry Davis. The Freedom of Youth had upheld Larry's action and the college was divided into two camps. Stevens had gone, and Coach Parker was in a worse quandary than ever. True the fighting spirit had been roused but it had done no good, and unless something happened would fade away into nothing, leaving Parker with a team of fourth-rate footballers. Markoff chuckled as he thought of the last three matches he had watched—the pitiful display of State had made him rub his hands. Soon! Soon it would be the time for the final blow.

Markoff stopped before a tenement house and glanced round. All seemed quiet, but a surprise awaited him when he entered his room. Everything was in confusion. Drawers opened and their contents on the floor, bags and suitcases flung open, and his desk burst open, with the papers scattered in an obviously hurried search. He went quickly to the fireplace and knelt down; part of the wainscoting came away and revealed a recess.

A look of relief showed as he drew out some papers. The searchers had not found the papers that meant everything to the cause. Swiftly he closed the secret drawer, placed the papers in his pocket, and hastened to the door. Suddenly he hesitated and turned uncertainly. Quietly he went across to the window and drew back the curtain; a man was leaning against a lamp-post.

With a curse Markoff dropped the curtain and hurried to a window that looked on a side alley. Another man was there!

Panic seized him and he drew out a gun, as if expecting the door to burst open and his enemies to enter. He bolted and barred the door and minutes passed, then he pouched the gun and paced the room. He unbarred the door and crept down the stairs: someone came into the hall and he bolted up the stairs. Next he tried the fire-escape, and had climbed out of a window when he saw a man in the grounds. Every exit was barred.

Back to his room went Markoff. He was trapped. He must not be found in possession of these papers. He would burn them. He hesitated, for those papers had meant weeks of hard work. A rush to the window showed those watchdogs were still on the prowl.

His brains should tell him some way out of this jam. Was the great Markoff to be caught by a bunch of cheap 'tces? He must act swiftly because they might come again to these rooms. They had been once and failed to find the secret recess. Ah, now he saw his plan of campaign!

Markoff went back to the fireplace, opened the panel and placed inside his gun and the papers. He straightened up his room and then went back to the windows. The men were still there. Finally he went out of his room, locked the door and went downstairs.

At the bottom of the stone steps a thick-set man was waiting for him, and barred Markoff's way as he would have passed.

"One moment!"

The man ran his hands in expert fashion over the Russian's clothes.

"Apparently you are looking for something?"

Markoff seemed amused.

"Wise guy, huh?" sneered the searcher.

"What's the idea?" demanded Markoff.

"That's a compliment, coming from you. Are you finished?"

The man gave a brief nod.

"On your way."

And he watched Markoff till the latter was out of sight.

Once certain that he was not being followed, Markoff took a car to the other side of the town, where Tony Tonnetti resided. Quickly the Russian told what had happened.

"We must get them out of there to-night." Markoff's eyes blinked behind his spectacles. "Those papers contain the names of all the secret committee. If they're found, the Government will smash the committee and us along with it."

"They've searched the house and got 'totes planted outside!" Tonnetti whistled his dismay. "How we going to get them?"

"Would you trust that football player, Larry Davis?"

A decided shake of the head.

"He's tied in with us. And watched just as closely. They're not wise to him, but mighty suspicious. But his name gives me an idea. I've got it!" He smiled at his own cleverness. "How about Betty Wilson?"

"Betty Wilson! She'd never do it!"

"Yes, she will—she'll do it." Tonnetti laughed and winked slyly. "I'll tell her it's to save Larry Davis. She'd do anything for that big sap."

"Go to it," Markoff decided. "Let there be no mistakes."

That evening Tonnetti went to Luigi's and waited outside till Betty appeared. She recognised him as one of the League of Youth leaders.

"I want you to do something for me."

"I see no reason why I should help you."

Her expression was as cold as her tone.

"Nor do I," he admitted frankly.

"But I'm telling you because you can keep Larry Davis from being thrown out of college, or even worse."

"I don't know what you mean." She faced him indignantly. "And I'm sure Larry is man enough to want to face the consequences of his own actions. I won't believe any of your lies."

"These are facts," Tonnetti shrugged his shoulders. "Larry is an ardent supporter of the league, but he doesn't understand our real aims. He got excited about this football business, and is being led around by the nose, and you know it. Well, he has been persuaded to sign some papers, and if made public would ruin his chances of ever making good as a footballer. They are papers of a definite revolutionary nature, and actually would cause him tremendous harm, whatever business Davis decides to adopt as a career."

"You tricked Larry into joining the league," the girl cried, with contemptuous scorn. "If I offer to help will you promise you will find some way to destroy these papers and get him out of your rotten league? Otherwise I won't do a thing."

"I swear it," Tonnetti cried solemnly. "What you have to do is very simple. You have to get a number of papers, and amongst them are those signed by Larry. You must go to a certain house at a certain time and get them. Our enemies will be on the watch, but they won't suspect you. It is very simple."

"All right. Where is the house?"

"Markoff's place. Here is a plan of his room." Tonnetti drew on the back of an envelope. "At the left of the fireplace you'll find part of the wainscoting loose. Behind is a recess, and—"

At nine that evening Betty was excused from Luigi's. All the way to the place where Markoff lived she imagined she was being followed. There was a man outside the house, and Betty walked past him with fast-beating heart. At the top of the stone stairs she gave a quick glance back and was relieved to find that the man was rolling a cigarette. If he were a detective he did not place any importance on the girl's visit.

Very quietly she went up the stairs and met not a soul. Markoff's room and everything seemed quiet. She opened the door and expected to find herself facing a lot of police-officers, but the place was dark. Quietly she closed the door and locked it. She took from her pocket a torch and began a tour of the apartment. She soon found the fireplace, and, after some searching, the hidden recess. Inside there were a number of papers and a gun. She took out the papers and left the gun, and was about to replace the panel when she hesitated. There was a grim smile on her pretty face as she took out the gun and placed it in one of the drawers.

"I hope the cops break in and find it, and you'll get put in prison for carrying a gun without a permit," Betty thought.

With the papers in her pocket she unlocked the door and peered forth, and was about to leave when she heard footsteps. She peered through a crack in the door and breathed when she heard steps going down the stairs. Probably only someone staying in the place. She left Markoff's and walked down the stairs. On the second floor she passed a student and gave him a slight smile. She hurried on lest the young man wanted to stop and talk; down into the hall and out of the front door.

Another few yards and she would be quite safe. Her heart missed a beat as she saw a broad-shouldered man approaching. The same man that she had seen before. She walked down the stone steps, and this time she knew the man was watching her. Why? Probably he was wondering why she should have come to this house for so short a while and what was her business there. She tried to look casual as she passed him, and she had a terrible desire to look round to see what the man was doing.

Betty walked quite slowly, and after going two or three hundred yards, dared to look back. The man was strolling after her. He was suspicious of her. How she longed to run. She must not get panicky or else Larry would be ruined.

At the corner of the street she looked back and saw that the man had quickened his pace and was not so far behind. Once round the corner Betty began to move quickly. She looked round desperately—this street was the rendezvous.

A car came along. Tonnetti sat in the back, with Markoff at the wheel. The car passed Betty and then swung into the kerb.

Tonnetti crouched down, with his hand on the door-handle. When Betty had passed he opened it quietly and ran after her in rubber shoes that made no sound. He seized her round the shoulders, with one hand over her mouth.

The girl struggled, but Tonnetti was strong. Markoff jumped out and held open the door of the car. Tonnetti had swung up Betty in his arms, and he flung her into the back of the car, then jumped in after her, as Markoff got back to the wheel.

"Help! Help! He—"

Betty's cries were stifled.

The detective saw the girl seized and the car speed away. He hastened to put through an emergency call to the police.

The Secret Agent

NEXT morning the dean was at his office extra early. An amazing tale had been brought to him of a girl being kidnaped, and that the man responsible was a college student.

In his big study he interviewed Betty and Markoff. Betty decided that there was no necessity to tell all the story and involve Larry. She had been asked as a great favour to go to a certain house and get some papers, and on leaving the house she had been kidnaped.

"Before I knew what was happening a car drew up to the kerb," concluded Betty. "A man must have got out and run up to me from behind. I heard the car, but paid no attention. I did not suspect anything. I was pushed into the back of the car, my screams stifled, a coat flung over me, and then the car sped away. About five miles out of town the papers were taken from me, and I was forced out into the road. I had to walk back."

"And you identify the driver as Mr. Markoff?" questioned the dean.

"I do."

"This is serious."

The dean looked worried. He turned to Markoff.

"What have you to say?"

"The whole story is fantastic and ridiculous." Markoff jumped to his feet. "As a matter of fact, I was with Anthony Tonnetti last night."

"Do you mind if I send for Mr. Tonnetti?"

"Certainly not." Markoff spoke with easy assurance. "We were having breakfast together when your call came and he walked over with me. I believe he's in your outer office."

The dean switched on a dictograph and ordered Anthony Tonnetti to be sent in.

That young man came into the dean's office, and after a respectful "Good-morning" did a most amazing thing. He walked up to Markoff and ran his hands over him.

"What's the idea?" demanded Markoff.

The study door opened and two men entered. They had guns in their hands.

"I wanted to be sure you weren't armed before placing you under arrest." Tonnetti signalled to the two men. "Handcuff him!"

"Dean Churehill," Markoff protested. "I don't understand what this means."

"Nor do I," exclaimed the dean.

"Anthony Tonnetti, what is the meaning of this outrage, these armed men, this—"

"I will explain, sir," Tonnetti smiled.

"Thanks to Miss Wilson I came into possession of some records which proved very interesting. When our code expert got through with them we learned that this man's name was not Louis Markoff, but Boris Marovitch. Three years ago Boris was deported as an enemy alien."

"Anthony Tonnetti, do you mean to say," spluttered the dean, and was silenced by an imperious gesture.

"Dean Churchill, this is going to be a morning of surprises for you. My name is not Anthony Tonnetti. Officially I have no name. The Department of Justice placed me here to help uncover enemy aliens who were taking definite steps to destroy the American form of Government. By his name you can guess the part of the world where Murovitch was born. The Brotherhood of which he is a member planned to stir up strife all over America in businesses, colleges, military academies, factories and even prisons. They would have got their men elected as officials and even senators. Too vast a scheme to explain in full, Dean Churchill, but you can take it from me that Marovitch was attacking State through the League of Freedom.

"I always thought the League quite sound."
 "Yes, but not when people like Marovitch are interested," the agent of justice shook his head. "With money and influence he made use of these Radical hot-heads. I had to be a hot-head myself to get wise to this scheme and get into his confidence."

Markoff seemed resigned to his fate. "I suppose I'm going to take another ocean voyage at the expense of your Government?"

The agent nodded. "You bet, and don't come back, because next time you may get shot. Take him away, boys."

The dean still looked bewildered after the door had closed. "You know I had no idea that the Government had agents in colleges."

"About a hundred of us, Dean, scattered throughout the country," was the ready explanation. "We are selected because all of us are college graduates and know the student mind. I may look about twenty, but I'm nearly thirty—I've been in the service five years."

"Why didn't you take me into your confidence?"

"Because our orders are to work in secret. Yours is the problem of education—ours the safety of the Government. America has no fear concerning the loyalty of American youth, but where you give them intellectual freedom, we must give them protection from paid agitators like Markoff. I must ask you to keep this arrest and my identity in strictest confidence. And that goes for you, young lady."

"Certainly," Betty's eyes were gleaming. "Does this mean the end of the League of Freedom?"

"No." The agent shook his head. "But it does mean the end of Carol Arlington. In fact, I have an appointment with her at the police station. I think, Dean, you want to know why the daughter of a rich man should act this way." He smiled. "Most of his money came from abroad—from the people who employ Markoff. We have wanted to get something on this so-called American financier for years, and now I think we have it. Carol Arlington is only American through her mother. Now, Dean, I wish to be excused. I may come back to this great college very soon, and I may get sent elsewhere, but you must always treat me as a student." He laughed. "Even if I should take another name."

"I should recognise you," the dean cried.

"My hair is fair." The agent smiled. "We're all good at make-up. Good-bye!"

When Betty left she saw Larry Davis in the outer office, and though the girl did not speak she smiled at Larry, and the big fellow looked delighted. Then the dean sent for Larry, and later on put through a call to Coach Parker.

"Good-morning, Parker! Larry Davis just left my office. He's decided that his thinking apparatus went a little haywire, and he's coming over to make his apologies to you."

"A lot of good that will do him."
 "Don't be too hard, coach," urged the dean. "He's only a youngster, and they are not so wise as they like to make out. They need the guiding hands of their elders."

"What do you expect me to do with him?" came the gruff voice of the coach.

"Take him back in the team," answered the dean. "I know it's none of my business, and I wouldn't dream of telling you how to handle the boys, but you won't have any more trouble."

"I don't have any time for types like Larry Davis," the coach shouted back. "He let down the school team and walked off the field, and he can't do that to me. He can come down and I'll let him play with some of the B reserves, but no more. Larry Davis, the All-American, is a back number."

"Don't be too hard, Parker," urged the dean. "I follow with keen interest the progress of State. And I'm not talking nonsense when I say that State won't do any good until it has a quarter-back like Davis. The most important man in the team in my humble opinion, and you'll be unwise not to forget and forgive. The College Board want to see State get back its reputation and name, and they have their eyes on you. Good-morning, Coach Parker."

A MONTH later, on a Saturday morning, the following appeared in the local paper:

"State goes into the final game of the term with little hope of victory. Since Larry Davis quit the team, State has not scored. Notre Dame have a great forward line, and only need a break to romp away with the game."

Yet in spite of this gloomy outlook the Stadium was packed for the match.

In the dressing-room Coach Parker was addressing his men:

"To-day you're the under-dog. But you don't have to stay there. True we lost the last three games—but you don't have to lose this one. I think that the team playing this day is the finest State has ever known, and with a little more confidence should score an easy victory. If every one of you gets in there and fights every second you can win. You're playing Notre Dame, the league champions; beat them, and you take your place among the great teams of State College. That's all."

The boys cheered, then filed out of the dressing-room, whilst sour old Coach Parker watched them with a look of sorrowful pride in his eyes. But his expression hardened at sight of almost the last player.

"Davis!" he rapped out. "No use in you going out there!"

"I'd like to—just in case—" humbly replied the All-American.

"For the twentieth time—no!" Coach Parker was a grand trainer, but he did not easily forgive. "The greatest football player in the world couldn't turn in his suit on me and then come back for the big game."

Davis hesitated, then shuffled past. Coach Parker went out to the gridiron and gave last-minute instructions to his men. He came back to the bench, and if he saw Larry Davis sitting there with a sweater round his shoulders he paid no attention.

"It's the big game of the season," boomed the announcer. "Thousands of people in the Stadium. Both teams are now out in the field waiting for the kick-off. Notre Dame will kick to State. There it goes! The ball is high in the air—State is waiting for it. Lucats takes it—starts going—and is spilled on his own thirty-three yard line." The roaring of the crowd shut out the sound of his voice for a few moments. "State's ball—first down—ten to go—"

A very even game, but it was easy to see that the superiority was not with State. All their attacks were frustrated by the brilliant tackling of the Notre Dame players. They were superior to State in all departments of the game.

It was Wilson, of Notre Dame, who did a brilliant run across midfield and crossed the far goal line. He had dodged and twisted round the State players, and when they had tried to catch him had been left standing. It was a touchdown, but Notre Dame failed with the kick, so they only got six points.

The assistant nudged Coach Parker.

"Why don't you put Davis in?"

"That double-crossing—" Parker checked himself. "I'm running this team."

"Both teams are out in the field ready for the second kick-off," the announcer boomed. "State is kicking to Notre Dame. A long kick that goes deep into Notre Dame territory. Rosetti, their quarter-back, gathers it, runs hard, and goes to the twenty-eight yard line. First down—ten to go—Notre Dame ball. Rosetti is given the ball—he is running wide—ho is spilled after a short gain of one yard. Notre Dame ball—second down, and nine yards to go. They're out of the huddle. Rosetti gives over the ball and it goes to Coogan—Coogan gives the pass to centre—he gives it to Rosetti. Pretty work—pretty work! Rosetti neatly fends off an attack, feints, and seems to have a clear run. There he goes like a streak of lightning. He can't make it—two State men waiting for him. Well done, Rosetti! He shoots the pass to Critchley, who is unmarked. State never expected the move, and Critchley is going over the line."

Notre Dame gained the extra point, and so the score was thirteen to nothing.

It was agony to Larry Davis, who twisted on the bench as if he were sitting on needles. Unable to stand it, he raced up to Coach Parker.

"Let me in there—will you?"

"If we lose by twenty touchdowns you'll never get in there!" was the sour answer.

Blake and Hubbard for State nearly broke through, but the chance was bungled and intercepted. Soon after Hogan, of Notre Dame, nearly scored another touchdown. State looked a beaten team. There was only ten minutes to go.

A Girl With a Brain

THERE was one girl who was thoroughly depressed as she watched State's futile efforts to score. Time and again she glanced across at the bench and the pathetic figure of Larry Davis. Charlie Kipp and Dodo looked just as mournful, for they realised Betty's state of mind.

Suddenly Betty jumped up and grabbed the megaphone of a student near her.

"Listen—listen, boys—please!" They heard her, because State were not doing much cheering. "Listen, everybody! There's just about ten minutes left to play—plenty of time to win! Sitting out on that bench is the man who can do it for us. Larry Davis! We've got to make Coach Parker let him into the game. Come on now—we want Larry! Let's go! We want Larry! We want Larry!"

Coach Parker scowled round, and tried to give his attention to the game.

"Wo, want Larry! Wo want Larry! We want Larry!"

It drowned every other cry.

"Coach!" the assistant shouted. "You're a great fool if you don't let Larry into this game. Larry treated you badly, but it was a woman that fooled him. Once you were fooled by a woman—you who are so cute. State look like a pack of kids, and you'll look even worse if State don't make a showing! I want to come back here next season, and so do you, but you won't unless you buck up your ideas."

"Mind your own business! How dare—"

"We want Larry! Wo want Larry! We want Larry!"

A sudden quiet—Lucats had been knocked out. The doctor and the stretcher-bearers were running.

"You can send in Larry now and your fool pride won't get hurt," whispered the assistant. "You had to send in Larry because you had no one better. Listen to that mob cry. If you don't put in Larry you'll go down in the December 7th, 1935.

annals as the dumbest, craziest, pig-headed, venomous old—"

"Shut up, or I'll—" Coach Parker began, but got no further because the cries of the crowd had swelled in volume.

"We want Larry! We want Larry! We want Larry!"

Coach Parker jumped up. Larry Davis had not taken his eyes off the coach for the last few minutes. The coach pointed:

"Get in there!"

How the crowd shouted when Larry Davis went into the game, and what a silence when play recommenced.

"State's All-American quarter-back is going into the game," the announcer cried. "And now they're in punt formation. Davis is standing behind his old goal line waiting for the pass from centre. Here it is—and it's high. Davis is not going to kick the ball—he's running instead. Notre Dame are taken by surprise. Boy, oh, boy, is he moving! He goes tearing down the field like a madman. An attempt to intercept cunningly avoided—a clear field—it's a touchdown!"

Davis took the kick, and it was a peach. Notre Dame thirteen—State seven. Four minutes to go.

"Davis is an inspiration to his teammates. He's driving them hard—making them fight. Hero's a pass from centre. Davis takes it, fades back, and throws a long pass—it's okay! Hubbard takes it. Hubbard is inspired, and goes across mid-field, with Notre Dame falling over themselves to stop him. It must be close on time. Can Hubbard make it? Clever work—clever work! Hubbard has avoided a tackle in a manner that he must have learnt from Larry Davis. It's a touchdown!"

The score-board showed thirteen points all. An awed hush as they watched the kick being taken. It was a conversion. State's number on the board became fourteen.

The crowd went crazy. They threw hats in the air, they sang and danced, they embraced perfect strangers, and, happiest, among them all was Betty Wilson.

On the field the happiest man was Larry Davis. Coach Parker coughed, and gave his assistant a sideways glance.

"All he needed was to be kept on that bench. It would have been fatal if I had used him before."

The assistant was speechless.

Then the crowd seized hold of Betty, and she was carried over people's heads down to the field. They hoisted Larry Davis up, and those two people who had saved State that day were chaired. They tore round and round the gridiron until at last some of their exuberance evaporated.

They called upon Larry for a speech. "Folk, I haven't got a thing to say," those round him heard him say. "It's not me you should call upon for a speech, but Betty." He smiled at her. "Betty Wilson won this game for State."

They tried to make Betty make a speech, but she shook her head. The chair-bearers swayed towards each other, and Betty, to save herself from falling, clutched at Larry.

Larry put his arms round her and kissed her. That was far better than any speech!

When Perry Mason was consulted by Rhoda Montaine about a girl friend whose husband had returned from the grave to blackmail her, he did not dream he was to become involved in a most extraordinary murder case. A powerful mystery drama, starring Warren William and Margaret Lindsay

"The CASE OF THE CURIOUS BRIDE"

An Important Occasion

EVEN among the open-air stalls of San Francisco's famous Fisherman's Wharf newsboys were shouting.

"Pa-per! Extra! Perry Mason! Pa-per! All about the Hatchet murder! Pa-per!"

Perry Mason, attorney-at-law, was leaning over one of the stalls to pick out from a goodly collection of crabs four of the most desirable specimens, and he paid no attention whatever to the raucous voices that mentioned his name.

Although he had scored a triumph in the criminal court at the Hall of Justice only a few hours before, he was, at the moment, concerned exclusively with the selection of edible crustacea worthy of a celebration at Luigi's Restaurant in Market Street.

He was a tall man and a handsome one, quiet of manner in the ordinary way, but fierce enough when occasion demanded. His own staff adored him; the District Attorney had a very wholesome respect for his cleverness, and wrongdoers, as well as perfectly innocent people, sought his aid.

A wisp of a moustache adorned his upper lip; his brown hair—mostly concealed, just now, by a soft felt hat—was brushed well back from a particularly high brow, and a pair of very quick blue eyes could express everything, or nothing, as their owner willed.

Beside him, an interested party because he was to help devour the crabs, stood Wilbur Strong, the city coroner—a long-nosed, clean-shaven and elderly man, who was so hardened to his gruesome duties that he was prone to indulge a grim sense of humour. He would have chosen some larger crabs, but Perry Mason was adamant.

"I contend," he said definitely, and in the manner of an advocate, "that the four I have selected will lend themselves more aptly to the Bordeaux treatment."

"But, Perry," protested the coroner, "taking into consideration the fact that in this particular species—"

"Objection overruled," Perry interrupted, and addressed the stall-keeper. "Joe, we've decided upon these four antagonistic arthropods. Could we conclude some purchase agreement?"

Joe looked round with a puzzled expression on his homely features, and at that moment a broad-shouldered man, full of face and weak of mouth but with a pair of particularly bright brown eyes, swept up to the stall with two evening papers in his hands, and a very ugly newspaper reporter beside him.

"Ho means he wants to buy 'em, chump!" boomed the brown-eyed one, who was known (affectionately and otherwise) as "Spudsy," though his real name was Herbert Drake, and who was Perry Mason's faithful adherent and bodyguard. "Look, Perry! Did we put that trial over? Boy, they're ravin' about you!"

Perry scorned even to glance at the headlines thrust upon his attention. He made sure that Joe picked up the right crabs and suitably wrapped them, and he paid the price demanded. Spudsy turned to the newspaper reporter, flourishing the front page of the "Enquirer."

"Hi, Toots!" he said disappointedly. "Where's my picture? I stood right next to Perry!"

"So did I," said Toots, whose surname was Howard, and whose real front name was James. "But I'm a reporter, not a photographer!"

The crabs having been paid for and received by Perry Mason, the four men retreated from the region of stalls to a streamlined and dark-blue saloon capable of exceeding all the speed limits of the State of California, and climbed into it.

A uniformed chauffeur pressed a self-starter, and the car slid almost noiselessly away from the kerb and round a corner. Market Street was reached in less than ten minutes, and the car drew up outside the glass-canopied doorway of Luigi's very popular establishment.

A typically Irish patrolman who had paused to have a word with the door-keeper greeted Perry Mason as he crossed the pavement. Spudsy, following his employer and the coroner in company with Toots Howard, proudly presented the policeman with the two newspapers he had purchased.

"The papers say we're a genius," he proclaimed. "Take a look at 'em, Clancy!"

In the vestibule an attendant informed Perry that a lady had been looking for him.

"Good!" murmured the attorney.

"Not carrying a gun or a hatchet, eh?"

"Send all dames to me," said Spudsy. "That's my department."

The vestibule was crossed and the counter of the gentlemen's cloak-room was reached. Several male patrons of the establishment were congregated there, handing outer garments to the girl in charge, and one of them clapped Perry on the shoulder.

"Great speech, Perry!" he said enthusiastically. "You certainly put it over!"

"Thanks!" drawled Spudsy on behalf of his employer. "Gangway!"

Coats and hats were deposited, and the four proceeded into the restaurant, which was fairly crowded. Luigi, proprietor of the place and an Italian of Italians, short of stature and very tubby, advanced swiftly towards them, beaming and bowing. He viewed the parcel Perry carried, and was prepared for an invasion of his kitchen.

"What is that?" he inquired.

"Epicure's dream, Luigi," replied Perry. "I bought them myself, and now I'm going to cook them myself."

"Thanks!" murmured Luigi, who, on many previous occasions, had endured his distinguished patron's culinary whims.

"I'm going to China," Perry explained, "and that's why this dinner has to be something out of the ordinary. Just lead me to a skillet, my learned friend."

"Si, si, signor!" Luigi, with rather a worried expression on his fat face led the way between tables in serried ranks assembled upon carpet warmly red, and the kitchen was reached.

A variety of odours assailed the nostrils of the four as they entered it. White-robed cooks were busy at the stoves, but Pierre, the head chef, deserted a dish he was preparing to greet the lawyer.

"Pierre," said Perry, "we're going to try a noble experiment."

"Oui?" said the chef, who was a Frenchman.

"Crab à la Bordeaux." Perry turned to Luigi. "I want a fine white wine—a Bordeaux of 'twenty-one."

Perry shed his coat and donned a white overall which one of the cooks brought him. Spudsy stayed the departing proprietor to order a drink for himself and Toots. The coroner looked on with a tight-lipped smile.

"We'll mince the crab like lobster hermidor," said Perry and unpacked his parcel on a bench while the chef hovered round him. "And cheese, Pierre—a grated Parmesan. No Gruyère to-night."

Pierre raised his dark brows.

"That is too radical," he said, "but it is your stomach, not mine. Good thing you bring the coroner along with you."

Laughter followed that remark, but Perry wagged a knife at the critic.

"Pierre," he said confidently, "you'll be wanting my recipe!"

Quite expertly he was removing the crabs from their shells when the door from the restaurant was opened, and a swarthy waiter appeared with drinks upon a tray.

"Signor Mason," he announced loudly, "there's a lady waiting at the bar."

"If she's at the bar," said Perry, without looking up, "it must be for you, Toots."

"No, signor," protested the waiter; "she say she want to see you."

"All right, Tony," nodded Perry, "we'll have the lady later—with the cognac."

"But she say it is very important!"

"So's the cognac!"

"He's got cookin' on his mind," said Spudsy. "Beat it, Tony!"

Tony vanished with an empty tray. Perry began to mince the dissected crabs.

"Gentlemen," he said, with a grin for the coroner, "to-night we make history! To-night we startle the entire cooking world! Our experiment will rank with the achievements of Albert at the Ritz."

The door the waiter had closed behind December 7th, 1935.

him was re-opened, and a very beautiful girl put her head into the kitchen. A little hat was tilted sideways on her dark brown head and furs accentuated the perfect contours of her neck. She was tall for a girl, but perfectly proportioned, and Spudsy stared at her with admiring eyes. But her eyes were only for Perry Mason.

"Hallo, Perry!" she called, across the intervening space. "What are you doing, whipping up a little fudge?"

Perry Mason looked up with a start. "Rhoda!" he exclaimed. "Why, if I'd known it was you I wouldn't have kept you waiting a minute."

"No," mocked the girl at the door, "I'm sure you wouldn't. It's only a few years since you were supposed to meet me at a certain bar—and didn't!"

"Five years, as I reckon time," said Perry, who had a passion for accuracy even when it was to his own disadvantage, and he began hurriedly to shed the white garment he had borrowed. "But bars were against the law, then. Wilbur, you watch the crabs! Toots, you watch Wilbur!"

The Handbag

HE went out with the girl into the restaurant and marched her off between the tables to one set in an alcove at the far end of the big room, beckoning a waiter on the way.

"Rhoda," he said, as they sat facing one another across the table, "it's great, seeing you again. You haven't changed a bit!"

The waiter arrived with cocktails and departed. The brown-haired girl sipped at her glass and looked over its rim.

"You like women a lot, don't you?" she said.

"They're nice," said Perry, and drank as though to womankind in general.

"Would you do something for one even if you were never going to see her?" she asked with an eagerness she tried vainly to conceal.

"I would—if she were pretty," Perry returned. "Anything but my recipe for onion soup, that is. I never told you that, did I? When I was younger there were times when I was impulsive."

"This girl's husband," said Rhoda, "disappeared four years ago, and, not long afterwards, he died suddenly—or, at least, she was told he was dead."

"Hmm, that's something you'd think she'd check up on pretty carefully," commented Perry. "And now she's married again?"

"No. But she wants to get married again, and somebody told her that she'd have to prove definitely that her first husband is dead."

"You don't want me," said Perry lightly. "You want the coroner."

"Oh, but you could help the poor kid, Perry. It's just that she's curious about her legal standing."

"Just curious, eh?" He looked at her quizzically. "Just a curious bride."

"All right, call her that—if it makes it more intriguing to you. Won't you help her a little for me, Perry?"

"When you put it that way," he replied, "I've got to. Tell your curious bride to call at my office."

"Oh, but—er—"

"Second-hand information is always unsatisfactory. What's her name?"

"Her name," hesitated Rhoda, "if you have to know, is Helen—Helen Crocker."

"All right; now, where does she live? If she won't come to see me I may have to drop in on her—on my way to China!"

"China?" echoed Rhoda, in evident dismay. "Well, it's—er—fourteen-ninety-six East Sycamore Street."

"Fourteen-ninety-six East Sycamore?" Perry laughed. "That would be a nice residential district if it weren't under water! The bay drowns out East Sycamore Street just beyond the eight hundreds!"

Rhoda gulped and bit her lip, but just then Luigi came to the table to announce regretfully that the only Bordeaux he had was of 1918.

"Use Chablis 'twenty-one," said Perry, his eyes on the girl's hands because she was twisting a brand-new wedding-ring round and round on her finger.

Luigi bowed and went off, and she said tremulously:

"What difference does it make what her name is, or where she lives? This girl is a friend of mine, and she's in trouble. You can give me the information."

"Swallow your drink, Rhoda," said Perry. "You're getting terribly upset over this friend of yours. Been married long?"

"You mean my friend?"

"No, sweetheart, I mean you."

"You still know everything, don't you?"

"Well," purred the attorney, "I know that when a woman fingers her wedding-ring like you're doing she hasn't had it on long."

Luigi reappeared, bowing over clasped hands.

"No Chablis 'twenty-one," he lamented.

"No Chablis 'twenty-one?" Perry rose to his feet. "Well, I'll have to take a look into your cellar, Luigi."

He smiled down at Rhoda.

"I'll be back in less than five years this time," he assured her. "Meanwhile, perhaps you can think of your friend's identity and her correct address. I'm getting interested in our curious bride. Come on, Luigi!"

Proprietor and patron descended to the wine cellar, which was a large and well-stocked one. The patron evidently knew his way about it, for after a very brief search among the bins, he held up a bottle in triumph.

"Chablis 'twenty-one!" he cried.

"Bravo!" exclaimed the surprised proprietor. "Signor Mason knows Luigi's wine cellar better than Luigi, eh? I'm gonna watch you from now on!"

Perry handed him the bottle and hurried back to the alcove; but Rhoda was no longer at the table, nor was she anywhere in the restaurant. He looked down at the chair she had occupied, and on it he saw a beaded handbag which she must have left behind.

He picked it up, and, without the slightest compunction, opened it. Inside, amongst other articles, was an ugly little automatic—and that gave him something to think about.

The girl had slipped out from the restaurant almost immediately after he had gone off with Luigi, and she walked briskly down Market Street to a roadster round a corner. The night was cold, but crisp and clear. She climbed into the open car and drove off as though making for some rendezvous, and she did not look back.

Had she done so she might have seen a tall and clean-shaven young man who stepped out from a doorway near the restaurant and made for his own car; but she had no idea that she was followed all the way across the city to an apartment-house in Norwalk Avenue.

Some hours afterwards she opened the front door of another apartment-house.

situated in quite a different part of the city, and climbed carpeted stairs to a flat on the third floor. She was in the hallway of the flat, and had fastened its front door, when a voice called out:

"Is that you, Rhoda?"
She went into a bed-room, elegantly furnished, and the young man who had followed her from the restaurant was sitting bolt upright in bed.
"Carl!" she exclaimed. "Are you still awake?"

"I couldn't sleep," he replied. "How's your headache, dear?"
She sank wearily into a chair and took off her hat.

"I—I thought the air would clear it up," she said with a sigh, "but it's worse now—and my legs ache from walking so far."

"That's too bad," he murmured sympathetically, and added, with just the barest hint of reproach in his voice: "You were gone a long time."

"I—er—I have a sharp pain here," she said, and put a hand over her heart. "Carl, would you mind if I slept in the other room to-night? I—I'm afraid I might keep you awake."

"If you'd rather," he returned. "I think it's better." She crossed the room to kiss him, avoiding his lips. "There—now you go to sleep. You need your rest. Good-night, Carl."

The Wooden Indian

THE dinner for four at Luigi's was a great success. The crab à la Bordeaux was pronounced delicious, despite the substitution of one wine for another, and the coffee stage had been reached when the waiter named Tony came to the table with a telephone to which a length of flex was attached.

"Excuse, please," he said. "Phone call for Signor Coroner. I will connect you."

The flex was plugged into a wallsocket, and Wilbur Strong spoke into the instrument.

"Yes, this is the coroner," he said in a voice that suggested he was just about as pleased to be disturbed as a general practitioner called up in the middle of the night. "What? I can't help it if you looked for me all afternoon. I'm at an important meeting of the International Committee for the Elimination of Starvation. Oh, all right!"

The telephone was removed by the waiter. Perry asked laughingly:

"Well, Wilbur, what's the latest error on the part of our Grand Jury friends?"

"Some gink by the name of Gregory Moxley," growled the coroner, "was laid gently to rest four years ago in Meadowbrook Cemetery."

"Say, that's mighty nice country up there," said Toots brightly. "You get a marvellous view of the mountains and the ocean."

"Oh, yeah?" snorted the coroner. "Well, some lunatic thinks he saw this Moxley on the street, and the Grand Jury want me to look in the coffin."

"Better look in the coffin, Wilbur," said Perry cheerfully. "We'll finish our coffee at the morgue!"

"No, no," protested the coroner. "Now, listen, I don't want to be inhospitable, boys, but—"

"Now, Wilbur," admonished Perry, getting to his feet, "surely you wouldn't deny us this midnight rendezvous with death?"

Wilbur yielded, warning his companions that they would find the county morgue rather a smelly place, and they all went off in Perry's car to the grim building.

A minor official, in charge for the night, provided them with coffee in an office full of filing cabinets, and the coroner enveloped himself in white overalls, with a sort of collar in front to protect his mouth, and pulled rubber gloves over his hands.

They passed through a glass-panelled room in which shrouded corpses reposed on marble slabs and entered the autopsy-room, where a large and rather ornate coffin, recently disinterred from Meadowbrook Cemetery, stood on trestles.

"What's the dope?" asked the coroner, and the official in charge read from a card:

"Gregory Moxley, died four years ago of pneumonia. Buried from funeral parlours of Malivinsky and O'Darrow. Height, five feet, eleven inches; weight, thirteen stone seven."

"Get a can-opener, son," said the coroner with callous levity. "We'll see whether this Moxley died of pneumonia or a wild hare."

The coffin was opened, a cloth was pulled back, and an expression of amazement swept over the coroner's face as he stared downwards.

"Well, I'll be—"
Words failed him for a few moments, and then he began to laugh.

"Gentlemen, in all my experience as a coroner, I—I've— Oh, step over here and look at this!"

The three stepped forward. Perry and Toots Howard still holding their coffee-cups, Spudsy with his hands on his hips. They looked into the coffin, and what they saw there was not a human body but a wooden effigy of a Redskin, highly coloured, and complete with feathered headdress.

"I always wondered what had become of those things," said the coroner.

"My grandmother had one of 'em, back in eighteen-sixty, in front of her cigar store," said Spudsy.

Perry laughed.
"Good old Moxley!" he exclaimed. "He gave his six feet of land back to the Indians!"

What they saw was not a human body, but a wooden effigy of a Redskin, highly coloured, and complete with feathered headdress.

"What a yarn!" cried the reporter. "What a yarn! White man saved from the grave by noble Redskin! Where's the phone? This is a headline story with a banner line!"

He went off to find a telephone, and Perry turned thoughtfully to his henchman.

"Spudsy," he said, "there are certain elements of time and events in this nutty night that might be fitted together—if I weren't going to China. For instance, husband supposed to be dead for four years, and Rhoda—"

"I once fought a guy in Fresno eight rounds who had a sister named Rhoda," interrupted Spudsy.

"This Rhoda hasn't got a brother," said Perry, "but she had a husband. It's too bad I'm on a vacation, because I'm as curious as a June bride!"

The celebration so rudely interrupted by a corpse that was not a corpse was resumed in one of the gay resorts of the city and continued far into the night. As a consequence, Perry Mason was still in bed next morning when he should have been preparing for his departure to China, and his secretary, Della Street, arrived at his luxurious flat in Jefferson Square.

Spudsy admitted her, instead of the Chinese servant who usually answered the door, and Spudsy was very scantily clad and was holding a tumbler into which he had squeezed the juice of an orange.

"Well, well, you make a very natty figure, Spudsy," said the girl, "stripped down to your fight togs to squeeze an orange! Where's Ping?"

"Chinese New Year," explained Spudsy. "He's celebratin', too!"

She followed him into the sitting-room, cool, calm and efficient. She had been Perry's secretary for quite a number of years, and though her good looks and perfect figure appealed to him considerably, her intelligence appealed still more. She looked from Spudsy's blood-shot eyes to his unsteady hands as he put the tumbler on a table and reached to a decanter.

"I think you need a little ice," she said.

A piece of ice tinkled in the glass, but the decanter was raised.

"I guess we'd better fill it up the rest of the way with gin," said Spudsy. "Not that there's any hurry, though—he won't be up for hours. My orders. I told him he needed a little shut-eye."

"Oh, you told him?" said she, and sailed across the room to a door and opened it, to enter a spacious bed-room in which the famous attorney was apparently fast asleep.

She went to the windows, pulled aside the curtains and raised the blinds, flooding the room with the light of a February day. On the dressing-table she saw a beaded handbag, the clasp of which was unfastened, and an ugly little automatic. She frowned at the gun and leant over the bed to waken the sleeper.

"All aboard for China!" she said loudly in his ear. "Don't you hear the call of the Orient?"

Perry opened his blue eyes and sat up to blink into her green ones. He put his hands to his aching head.

"There are a thousand Chinese gongs clanging in my cranium," he growled. She skipped away into the sitting-room and returned with a glass of milk and soda-water, despite Spudsy's protests.

"Here, drink this," she commanded. "I couldn't!" Perry shuddered. "My mouth tastes like the whole Chinese Army marched through it last night!"

December 7th, 1935.

"Possibly that explains the beaded bag on your dressing-table," she remarked.

He took the glass of soda-and-milk from her and put it on a little table beside the bed.

"Haven't you looked through that bag yet?" he inquired.

"No," she replied, "but I'm going to!"

He watched her as she went to the dressing-table and picked up the automatic. He was fully awake, now, and, though his head ached, his brain functioned.

"Number three-four-eight-nine-two-six-one," he said. "A twenty-five Colt automatic."

"Right," said Della Street, and put down the gun to examine the contents of the handbag, while he, behind her back, slipped out of the bed in his pyjamas and donned a dressing-gown and slippers.

"Looks like she knew she was going to meet you!"

"Oh, sure!" he scoffed, busy tying a silken cord round his waist. "That's why she got that very potent drug from a prescription by a Dr. Millsap!"

"Umm!" mused Della. "She's got —"

"Thirty-four dollars and twenty-four cents," he completed for her glibly. "One lipstick, one compact, one lace handkerchief, one telegram."

"That proves you were awfully drunk," she informed his reflection in the mirror and with irony. "Otherwise you wouldn't remember so well."

"If I could only remember who the girl was!" he said—and walked over to her.

"You remember me, don't you?" she challenged.

"Oh, yes," he laughed, "you're Della Street."

"So you needn't lie to me! Just tell me how long this case will postpone that trip to China."

"Not a moment," he declared. "I gave her a chance last night to come clean."

"So did whoever sent her this telegram," she retorted, holding a creased and flimsy sheet of paper in her hands.

"Await your final answer; five o'clock to-day extreme limit," he recited. "Addressed to 'R. Montaine,' at 'a hundred-and-twenty-eight, East Pelton Avenue.'"

"What a memory!" quoth Della.

"Who tore off the signature?"

"That's something I can't remember," he replied, "because I never knew. I wish I did."

She tilted her head at him.

"You've got an awfully far-away look in your eye, Perry," she said.

"and it isn't China."

"You're wrong, Della," he assured her. "My heart throbs only with a passionate desire to eat shark-fins and bird's-nest soup."

"I know," she nodded, "but first you're going to clear up our little mystery, so you might as well get started."

"I don't want to work—I need a vacation."

"You need a cold shower!" she retorted, and caught hold of his arm and marched him towards the bathroom.

"Anybody'd think that I was the secretary and you were the boss," he chuckled.

"Well, maybe I am," she said calmly.

A Real Corpse

WHILE Perry was having his bath and Spudsy was out in the kitchen, preparing breakfast, Della sat on a chesterfield in the sitting-room, looking at the morning papers. She was still looking at them when the door-bell rang and Spudsy admitted Toots Howard and a tall and quietly dressed young man who looked handsome beside the ugly reporter.

"After you, doctor," said Toots, and the tall young man passed into the sitting-room and glanced about him, his dark eyes finally resting on Della.

"Where's the patient, please?" he inquired.

"Just a minute," said Toots. "This is Dr. Millsap. Where's Perry, Della?"

"The doctor's too late to do him any harm," said Della. "He's recovering."

Toots went off to Perry's dressing-room and presently returned with him fully dressed and blandly smiling.

"Good-morning, doctor," said he. "Nice of you to come over."

Millsap frowned.

"I was led to believe that I was to attend a patient here," he said stiffly.

"Nice of you to believe that, doctor," purred Perry. "Sit down."

Millsap seated himself in a chair and Perry sank into a capacious easy chair facing him. Over his shoulder he said to Della:

"You'll get all the important remarks down in shorthand, won't you?"

"I will if they turn up," said Della, and she nursed a notebook on her knee and poised a pencil.

"Might I ask you what it is that's trying to make a sap out of me?" exploded the doctor.

"I'm Perry Mason," said Perry in the smoothest of voices. "If you weren't already a sap you wouldn't give poison to your lady friends."

Millsap started ever so slightly and his frown deepened.

"Your advice would be a lot more important," he said curtly, "if I knew what you were talking about—and if you did!"

"I'm talking about Rhoda Montaine," said Perry. "Let's both talk about her now. If you like Miss Montaine well enough to send her out armed to the teeth with instruments of death, you ought to like her well enough to explain yourself."

Della smiled at her notebook.

"The medicine was just a hypnotic to induce sleep," said the doctor stiffly.

"Permanent sleep?" asked Perry.

"No, certainly not! It isn't a poison, in proper doses."

"The gun is lethal enough!"

"Rhoda was in trouble and needed protection."

"She hasn't got the gun now," said Perry. "She's only got you for protection—and me. You tell me where Rhoda is, and I'll tell you how we can get her out of this."

"I haven't anything to say."

"Did it interfere with your friendship for Rhoda when she married Carl Montaine, the millionaire's son?"

The question was a totally unexpected one, and caused the young doctor to catch at his breath, but he summoned a show of dignity to his aid.

"I don't know why I should discuss this matter with strangers," he said.

"I'm her attorney," said Perry, and took the crumpled telegram from his pocket. "Do you know who sent her this?"

Millsap read the telegram and handed it back.

"I haven't anything to say," he reiterated, and then Perry rose up and patted him on the arm.

"How about some breakfast, doctor?" he suggested genially. "It's bound to be very tasty. Spudsy's cooked it!"

The astonished doctor was at a loss for words, but just then Spudsy entered with a tray, and an appetising odour filled the room.

A crowd gathered, two attendants of the airport ran over, and the attention of the detectives was diverted.

"I—er—I—I guess I'll have some," decided the doctor.

A trifle less than two hours later Perry and Spudsy entered the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company whence the message to "R. Montaine" had been dispatched, and Spudsy dived into a telephone-box there while his employer spoke to a clerk behind the counter.

"But this is very irregular, sir," objected the clerk.

Perry, for the purposes of deception, had adopted the accent of a Frenchman.

"But I have receive this message on a business matter very important," he said, "and so stupidly I've lose the address of ze sender. Please, you could discover it up for me?"

"You are Mr. Montaine?" asked the clerk doubtfully.

"Oh, oui!"

"Well, I'll see what I can do for you."

Spudsy put his head out of the telephone-box.

"Monsoor Montaine," he boomed, "I have for you ze office."

"Ah, merci!" Perry returned and took his place in the box and closed the door. "Is zis you, Della? What have you found out for me?" he said into the instrument, and Della replied:

"There was a marriage licence issued last week to Carl Montaine of Pasadena. The girl was Rhoda Moxley, a widow."

"Wedow of Moxley, the coffin man, eh?" said Perry. "Now, listen, my chickadee, get in touch with the gas company and the water company and see if any connection has been made for ze 'usband. I want ze address. No?"

"No," said Della. "And in case you're interested, your accent is rotten!"

Having hung up, Perry returned to the counter. The clerk had looked up the original message and informed him that the sender was a Gregory Moxley

"Moxley?" said Perry. "Ah, oui—zat I know; but ze address?"

"Three-sixteen, Norwalk Avenue," said the clerk, and wrote the address on a slip of paper.

Perry had left his car a little way down the street. He and Spudsy went out to it, and Spudsy took the wheel.

"I'll still make that boat to China," said Perry on the way to Norwalk Avenue.

"Yeah; but how?" wondered Spudsy.

"It looks like a Chinese puzzle to me!"

"Well, it's like this: Our girl friend, Rhoda, thought she was a widow for four years, and then she thought she'd become a bride again—which was exactly what her first husband had been playing dead and waiting for. Now he's turned up, and is putting on the pressure. Blackmail, Spudsy, blackmail!"

Norwalk Avenue was reached and the car drew up outside the entrance to a building of white stone labelled "Colemont Apartments." Perry descended to the pavement, and Spudsy would have followed, but his employer raised a restraining hand.

"So sorry," he said, "but I'll have to handle this alone. We only want to give Moxley such a scare that he'll hide himself in a coffin."

He walked into the building and ascended to a door on the second floor, at which he knocked.

"Come in!" called a gruff voice, and he turned the handle of the door and walked into a plainly furnished living-room and faced a pugilistic-looking person who was lolling in an armchair with a newspaper on his knees.

"Good-afternoon!" he said incisively. "I'm here to take charge of things for Rhoda. You remember Rhoda?"

"Do I?" grunted the man, whose mouth was large and whose eyes were small.

"You remembered her four years after you died!"

The little eyes rounded.

"Oh, so I'm a dead 'un, am I?" asked their owner, rising to his feet.

"I wouldn't say that exactly," Perry returned. "Not to a man smart enough to pull that trick with a wooden Indian."

"Oh, you know all about the wooden Indian, eh? Well, even a smart fellow makes a little mistake sometimes."

"You made a big mistake. Moxley!"

"You're goin' pretty good yourself, buddy," retorted the man. "I ain't Moxley! If you want to see the master mind, Moxley, he's in there!"

A thumb was jerked in the direction of a door behind some curtains, and the door was opened. On the floor of an inner room a white sheet covered some fairly bulky form and near it a man was stranding with a cigar clamped between his teeth.

"You wouldn't be Moxley, would you?" inquired Perry.

"Not if I could help it," was the harsh reply. "There's Moxley."

A corner of the white sheet was jerked back, disclosing a dead body on the carpet.

"That's what happens to 'em when they get too smart," said the man with the large mouth and the small eyes significantly. "You better take a good look at him!"

"Dead, eh?" murmured Perry.

"That's a great discovery of yours!" jeered the second man. "Just give us your name so that we can make sure you get full credit."

Perry regarded the none-too-attractive features of the dead blackmailer, then moved towards a desk on which there was a telephone. But the man who had lifted the sheet whipped out a gun.

"Keep away from that 'phone!" he roared.

"Put that gun away," said Perry quietly. "You might break something."

Through the open doorway of a bedroom came Wilbur Strong in his shirt sleeves, wiping his hands on a towel and grinning broadly.

"I thought that was your voice, Perry," he said. "Bless my soul! Well, you boys are as wrong as usual! He's not a crook, he's a cook—and one of the greatest in the world! Makes scrambled eggs taste like heavenly shortcake!"

Shamefacedly the plain-clothes man put away his gun, and with a belated greeting for the coroner Perry dialled the number of his own office on the telephone.

"Hallo!" he said. "Oh, that you, Norris. Let me speak to Miss Street, please. This is Perry Mason."

The man with the little eyes gaped at his colleague; the voice of Della sounded in Perry's left ear.

"Oh, hallo, sweetheart!" said her employer. "What's new at the gas station?"

"Both gas and water connections," Della replied. "were made in the name of Carl Wilton Montaine at two-three-nine Hawthorne Avenue. Got it?"

"Right!" Perry made a note of the address on a slip of paper after he had replaced the telephone, then walked over to the coroner, who said quite cheerfully:

"Well, it's a nice little murder, Perry. Who are you working for—the dead man, or the dame that bumped him off?"

"What happened?" asked the attorney.

"All I know is what I see on the floor. Mr. Moxley won't change places with any wooden Indian this time!"

"Any details of how he joined your tribe?"

"Oh, some!" was the reply. "The first the police knew was when the people in the next apartment house reported last night that someone over here was trying to disturb the peace."

"A nice conservative way of putting it," remarked Perry. "Somebody made quite a mess of this apartment."

"Certainly made a mess of Mr. Moxley," said Wilbur. "Hit on the head with the poker and stabbed in the back. That's enough to kill any man!"

"Any finger-prints?"

"Can't even find the knife."

"Yet you say a woman did it?"

"Well, the couple across the way declare that just before a crash of glass they heard a woman's voice."

"H'm!" grunted Perry, and contemplated a shattered mirror over the mantelpiece.

Pursuit!

THESE came a sound of heavy footsteps in the other room, and three men strode in at the curtained doorway. One of them was Joseph Lucas, Chief of Detectives, an unpleasant-looking person with a pronounced jaw and an almost permanent scowl; the other two were typical plain-clothes men.

"Hallo, Wilbur!" said Lucas after a brief survey of the body on the floor and the disordered room. "Got it all figured out?"

"As usual," returned the coroner, who had no great liking for the domineering detective.

"Hallo, Joe!" said Perry, folding his arms.

"I thought you'd gone to China!" snapped Lucas. "What're you doing here, anyway?"

"Oh, just a little social call—the coroner sent for me."

"Yes," said Wilbur Strong, without the slightest hesitation, "I wanted to consult him about a recipe for ice-box cookies."

December 7th, 1935.

"He didn't talk about no cookies, chief," interposed the pugilistic-looking plain-clothes man whom Perry had first encountered. "He talked about Moxley and a dame named Rhoda and some racket that Moxley was working on her."

"Who's Rhoda?" Lucas rapped at Perry, and Perry replied with an indulgent smile.

"You wouldn't want to know, Joe. It'd get you all mixed up."

The plain-clothes man, who had drawn a gun, stepped forward.

"We found some keys that don't belong to these doors on the floor by the body," he stated. "Maybe they'll tell us who this Rhoda is. Mason phoned, too, chief, and he wrote something on a piece of paper."

Lucas scowled again at Perry.

"What was it?" he demanded.

"Well, I'll tell you, Joe," drawled Perry. "Just a little music for my exit march. Good-bye, boys! As the coroner is wont to say, 'I'll be seeing you'!"

He walked out from the flat, blowing a kiss to the coroner from the door, and after he had gone Lucas grunted:

"Nice friends you've got, Wilbur!"

"Even you, Joe," returned the coroner brightly, "would like his cooking."

"Lemme see those keys!" Lucas snapped.

Perry Mason went out from the apartment house to his car and climbed into it beside Spudsy.

"Two-three-o-nine, Hawthorne Avenue," he directed, "and don't spare the horses!"

Spudsy drove away down the wide thoroughfare.

"I guess you didn't have much trouble handling Moxley," he said. "Did you put him in his place?"

"Somebody else had already done a very excellent job of putting Moxley in his place," replied Perry.

In Hawthorne Avenue a better-class apartment house was reached, and once more Spudsy was left at the wheel while his employer climbed carpeted stairs to the third floor and rang the bell of a door.

Carl Montaine rose up from a chair, brushed his rather disordered black hair back from his brow with his left hand, put a glass from which he had been drinking on a table, and crossed a well-furnished sitting-room to answer the summons.

He stared in annoyance at the tall stranger who brushed past him into the room he had just left, and followed to demand an explanation, but Perry forestalled him.

"Sorry," he said in the most self-possessioned manner imaginable, "but I'm looking for Rhoda Montaine."

"She isn't here," growled the young man.

"Who are you?" inquired Perry.

"I'm her husband, that's all!"

"You're one of her husbands, that's all!" Perry corrected. "And you're all upset, aren't you?"

A telephone-bell rang, and Carl moved towards a desk on which the instrument reposed, but Perry stopped him.

"I'll answer all 'phone calls for you," he said masterfully, and whisked the telephone from its plunger. "What?"

"No, no! Dis is de Dog-Walloper's Saloon! We eat guys wid names like dat!"

Down crashed the instrument, and Carl Montaine asked nervously:

"Who was that?"

"That was Joe Lucas, Chief of Police

Detectives," Perry informed him. "They're catching up with us. In case you don't know, we're Perry Mason. Sit down, Montaine; your legs are giving way!"

Carl Montaine permitted himself to be led over to a chair. He was quite good-looking, but his hands were trembling, and his mouth was working.

"But what do the police want?" he quavered. "What do you want?"

"I'm trying to help Rhoda," said Perry. "Where is she?"

"I wish I could tell you, Mr. Mason. She acted rather strangely all morning, and a little while ago an express-man came for her trunk. Then she took a suitcase and left."

"What did she say?"

Carl Montaine moistened his lips with his tongue.

"Just that—that going away was the only means of saving me from scandal."

"What scandal?" demanded Perry sharply.

"I—why, I—I don't know."

"You must know something," said Perry still more sharply, "or else it's too cold for you in here!"

"Anybody'd be a little shaky," blurted the agitated young man, "if his wife walked out like that."

"And the police were about to walk in!" added Perry. "Not long after midnight this morning your wife's former husband, Gregory Moxley, was murdered!"

Carl Montaine sank back in his chair, trembling all over. "Rhoda wouldn't do that," he faltered. "She didn't!"

The telephone bell rang again, stridently, insistently.

"The police found some keys beside the body," continued Perry. "That screaming 'phone means that they've traced them to your wife."

"My father could get me out of this," mumbled Carl.

"Not with all the Montaine millions," Perry assured him curtly.

"I can't tell him! There—there's never been anything like this in our family. I don't know what to do! Oh, it's terrible, Mr. Mason! The scandal will ruin me, and my father, too!"

Perry Mason, with a gesture of disgust, went over to the telephone and ripped its cord from the wall.

"They're going to question you," he said sternly. "Tell them nothing—and plenty of it. A husband can't testify against his wife in any criminal proceedings."

"Oh, but they'll make me talk," whimpered Carl. "I—I can't conceal facts."

"I'm sorry Rhoda developed such a poor taste in ties," said Perry cryptically, and he went out from the flat and down to the streamlined car at the kerb.

"But why the airport?" asked Spudsy as the car streaked across the city. "Are you gonna fly to China?"

"Step on it, boy," urged Perry. "My friend Joe Lucas has put a tail on us. There's a police car right behind."

Spudsy increased speed and the car shot down a hill in the direction of the municipal airport, but he declared disconsolately that the easiest way to get rid of the police would be by stopping.

"I haven't mopped up a cop since nineteen-thirty-one," he said. "How'd you know you'll find her at the airport?"

"She expressed her trunk and she's carrying a light suitcase," expounded his employer. "That means she's travelling fast and high. But if she gets off on a 'plane, it'll mean she's running away—and that'll hang her!"

The police car was held up at a corner by a traffic block and the airport loomed in sight.

"They can't arrest her if they don't find her," said Perry. "You stay near the ticket window."

With a grinding of brakes the dark blue saloon came to a full stop outside the combined booking-hall and waiting-room of the airport and was left untended while Perry and Spudsy rushed into the building.

Spudsy darted round a bookstall to the ticket window; Perry looked to left and right and caught sight of Rhoda, among other passengers, walking towards a covered way that led down a slope to the flying field.

He caught up with her, grabbed hold of her, and before she had time to realise what was happening was holding the suitcase and kissing her on the lips.

"Frances, darling, it was all a horrible mistake!" he cried, for the benefit of staring people. "That woman was my sister! Come on, darling, we're going to be married!"

Rhoda gasped, but a strong arm was round her waist and she was swept back into the booking-hall.

"Get in a 'phone-box as quickly as you can," he whispered in her ear, and tore across the floor to have word with Spudsy.

A row of telephone-boxes stood against one of the walls, not very far from the circular bookstall which occupied the middle of the vast room. Rhoda ran into one of them, and Perry joined her there and closed the door.

"Get down on the floor!" he commanded harshly.

"How can I?" she asked in a plaintive voice. "There isn't room."

"Get down and make room," he said. "Right now it's the most comfortable place in the world for you."

She squeezed down between his legs and the cork-lined wall of the box, and he pushed her still farther down, so that her head would not show through the glass panels of the box.

Into the booking-hall streamed three detectives from the car that had pursued his, and they saw Spudsy at the bookstall and caught sight of him in the box.

"There he is!" cried one of them. "We'll park here!"

Tit-for-Tat!

PERRY'S quick eyes had seen the enemy even before he himself was seen. He dialed the number of the "Enquirer" and asked to be put through to Toots Howard.

"Hallo, Toots!" he said after a while. "Perry Mason! I'm in a 'phone booth with Rhoda Montaine, the little lady the State is going to try to hang as the murderer of Gregory Moxley. By this time, Toots, you've probably read of the killing in a rival paper. I'm at the municipal airport, up to my neck in police detectives."

"Say, you're sinking pretty low!" exclaimed the voice of Toots in his ear. "D'you want me to stagger over and rescue you?"

"If you get here soon enough," responded Perry, "the 'Enquirer' can have the honour of capturing the beautiful murderess."

"Right," said Toots, and rang off. But Rhoda, crouched very uncomfortably on the floor of the box, cried indignantly:

"You're not going to turn me over to anybody for a crime I didn't commit."

"Keep your head and your voice low," said Perry, thumbing the pages of a telephone directory, "and tell me what did happen."

"I don't know," she replied in a whisper. "I didn't even know he was dead until now."

"You were doing a nice job of hanging yourself, running away like that," he retorted, running a finger down the names on a page of the directory.

"I knew there'd be some kind of scandal, and I didn't want to bring my husband into it. I thought Moxley had been dead four years—honestly."

"I know. And Moxley thought, when you married a rich kid, that he could come back and make himself a nice living. But what happened? You couldn't get the money he demanded, but you went to his apartment."

"Yes," she admitted. "He was furious. I couldn't do anything with him. He hit me, and—and then the lights went out. But I didn't kill him! I swear I didn't!"

Perry rang up the airport in which he was concealing a girl wanted by the police, and to the uniformed attendant at the inquiry office across the room he said:

"There's a funny-looking guy at the news-stand reading a magazine he hasn't paid for. Call him to the 'phone, will you?"

Spudsy was the only man at the bookstall who appeared to be reading a magazine, and he was called over to the attendants' instrument.

"Spudsy," said Perry's voice in his ear, "Toots Howard will be here any second. I want to talk to him before those three dicks crash down on me. The moment Toots arrives, take a good sock at your nearest neighbour."

"Okay!" said Spudsy delightedly.

During the period of waiting Perry kept the plunger of the telephone down with one hand while he talked to Rhoda as though speaking into the transmitter.

He told her that the District Attorney would ask her a lot of questions, but that she was not to answer one of them.

The three detectives watched him with gloom.

"Wonder how much rent he pays for livin' in there!" growled one of them.

Perry was consulting the directory again when Toots Howard burst into the waiting room with several of his colleagues and among them a Press photographer. Spudsy, by the bookstall, immediately tore a newspaper from the hands of an astonished man; but the man was a giant and towered over him, bellowing:

"What's the matter? Have you gone daffy?"

Spudsy retreated in haste, came to a man of less than his own size, and struck out at him. But this one, though small, happened to be a professional boxer, and the battle that followed was fierce and resulted in the downfall of the assailant.

While it was in progress a crowd gathered, two attendants of the airport ran over, and the attention of the detectives was diverted. Perry put his head out of the telephone-box to call Toots to him.

"This is Rhoda Montaine," he said, and Rhoda rose up from her cramped and undignified position. "Of her own free will she surrenders to you gentlemen as representatives of the 'Enquirer.'"

"That's fine, Perry!" declared Toots, and the Press photographer took a flashlight picture of the girl as she emerged from the box.

The detectives swooped, but the reporters barred their way.

"Say, what does this mean?" howled one of the officers.

"It means," responded Toots with a wave of his hand, "that Rhoda Mon-

Lucas took the sheet of paper and read what was typed on it. "Well, we aren't proving anything here," he grunted.

taine, of her own free will, has surrendered to the Press."

"On the pages of the 'Enquirer,'" said Perry, "she'll get a square deal! For once we'll let the great American public try a ease."

"So that's the kind of a shyster you are!" howled the baffled plain-clothes man.

"One more crack like that, my fine, flat-footed friend," said Perry, "and I'll tear you three to ribbons, assisted only by my friend Mr. Spudsy Drake! Where is Spudsy? Spudsy!"

Spudsy rose up from the floor near the bookstall and walked over, and even the detectives laughed, for his face was bruised and his nose was bloody.

"All right," said the detective, "we'll accept the girl from the 'Enquirer.'"

Rhoda travelled with the reporters in their car to the office of the newspaper, and within an hour she had been handed over to the police as a voluntary prisoner. Perry tried to see her at the Hall of Justice, but was rebuffed, while the "Enquirer" enjoyed the benefit of being the only paper to publish the story of her arrest.

Next day, in the region of noon, Perry rang up the District Attorney from his own office in Columbia Street.

"Ah, Mr. Stacey, at last, eh?" he said with some heat. "How long do you think you're going to get away with hiding my client from me? I could excuse a flat-foot like Lucas, but our esteemed District Attorney!"

The District Attorney suggested jeeringly that he should get the "Enquirer" to find the girl for him.

"You and the boys work so well together," he said. "The husband? Oh, you'll see him, too—in court, sir, when I go to trial!"

It was a case of tit-for-tat, but Perry wasn't standing for it.

"All this will get you nowhere!" he exploded. "They'll not change the law for you, Mr. D.A. A husband can't testify against his wife in a criminal proceeding. Even you know that."

He swung round with the telephone in his hand as Della Street entered the many-windowed room.

"Montaine senior is outside," she announced. "Looks like he knows his way around. Past sixty, wide face, straight mouth, tight-lipped. I'll send him in."

The rather grey-haired man who was ushered into Perry's presence just after he had put down the telephone had been pretty accurately described. Perry rose to greet him.

"I've been expecting you," he said. "And you hoped I'd bring my cheque-book?" suggested the millionaire.

"Naturally—since I happen to be defending your daughter-in-law."

"And, naturally, you've got the amount of the cheque pretty well set in your mind?"

"Naturally," bowed Perry.

"Mr. Mason, I'm prepared to double that amount if you'll consent to let me decide the perfect outcome of the affair."

"Oh, sit down, Mr. Montaine," purred the attorney, "and tell me your idea of the perfect outcome."

Montaine seated himself facing the desk.

"My son," he said, "married a woman whose greatest affection was for his pocket-book. I think, Mr. Mason, that it would be best if he were free from this unfortunate marriage entanglement."

"I see," nodded Perry. "Then it is your intention to find your son's marriage illegal?"

December 7th, 1935.

"In a nutshell, Mr. Counsellor, I shall attempt to do that very thing at any cost!"

"Even at the cost of Rhoda Montaine's life?"

The millionaire bounded to his feet.

"I've made a lot of money in my time, young man," he said icily, "but I didn't make it by being blunt."

"And I've done pretty well in my own small way," retorted Perry, also rising, "mainly by being blunt! Mr. Montaine, I'm defending a woman charged with murder, and it's my idea to defend her as well as I can."

"Then you refuse my offer?"

"As bluntly as possible!"

"In that case, I shall have to rely on the District Attorney."

"I guess you will," agreed Perry.

"Although I can't absolutely recommend him as a man to depend on. Good-day, Mr. Montaine!"

Della returned after the visitor had departed and Perry made a face at her.

"Mr. C. Phillip Montaine, of Pasadena," he said wryly. "Well, I dusted him off, Della—and now I'm going over to the District Attorney's office. Oh, by the way, you'd better call the steamship company and tell 'em I won't be able to make that boat for China."

"They'll be awfully glad to know that," said Della. "The boat sailed two hours ago!"

Rhoda Makes a Mistake

THE office of the District Attorney was situated on one of the upper floors of the Hall of Justice; the office of Joe Lucas, Chief of Detectives, was situated on a lower floor. In the ante-room of the District Attorney's office a secretary started up from his desk to stop Perry from opening the inner door, but was too late—and Perry had a perfectly good view of the official he sought, practising golf-shots on a rug.

"Hallo, Perry!" he exclaimed somewhat shamefacedly. "Something worrying you? Oh, it's the Montaine-Moxley case, of course. Well, don't let it upset you or my practice—I'll see if Lucas knows where the young lady is."

He propped a putter against his desk to speak into the dictograph.

"This is Stacey," he said. "Is Lucas there? Old friend named Mason inquiring about him."

A nasal and obviously disguised voice answered back:

"I don't know, sir. I think Mr. Lucas is out playing golf."

"The lucky stiff!" quoth the District Attorney as one filled with envy.

"Probably find him at the club, Perry—out there yesterday I shot a—er—"

"You boys aren't playing golf," Perry interrupted dryly. "You're playing hide-and-seek! It's a kid's game at best, Mr. D.A."

He took hold of the putter and, with it, sent a ball flying through a pane of glass.

"Bad shot, Mr. Mason," rebuked the District Attorney; but at least Perry had relieved his feelings.

He had also thought of an expedient, and he went off briskly to carry it into effect.

Rhoda, at that moment, was seated in a chair in a room on the same floor as the office of the Chief of Detectives. In accordance with Perry's instructions she had refused to answer any questions, but Joe Lucas was not by any means defeated. He had sent for Carl Montaine, and he escorted that young man into the room.

"Carl!" cried Rhoda, springing to her feet.

"Hallo, Rhoda," returned Carl in a strained sort of way.

"I guess you two would like to be left alone," said Lucas, and he went out and closed the door. But there was a microphone in the room, connected to a dictaphone in a radio department along the corridor, and he went into that department and grinned at a shirt-sleeved man at the desk where the dictaphone stood.

"Okay, Paul," he said. "Get it all—and don't let the newly-weds get you two upset!"

The conversation recorded by the dictaphone was certainly something of a revelation.

"Oh, darling!" Rhoda said tremulously, "I—I've missed you so much! You're all I've got to keep me going! It's been so awful not seeing you. I—I knew when I ran away that it was going to hurt me, but I had to do it for your sake."

"Let's not talk about how hard it was to do anything for my sake," Carl Montaine bit back at her.

"I tried every possible way to make Moxley leave us alone."

"I suppose that's why you sneaked down to Luigi's that night?" challenged Carl.

"Yes," she admitted. "I—I wanted to consult Perry Mason about the legal side."

"And what were you consulting Dr. Millsap about?" he demanded bitterly. "The medical possibility of a man returning to life?"

"He's just an old friend."

"Oh, just an old friend, eh? But you had to sneak out to meet him!"

"Carl!"

"I called his apartment the night of the murder and he wasn't there. You were out with him somewhere!"

"Carl! Oh, Carl, what are you saying? My nerves were to pieces—that's why I saw him. I thought you loved me! The only thing that's kept me going during these past awful hours was the thought that you—you'd stand by me."

"The law must take its course, Rhoda," Carl said, almost like a school-boy repeating a lesson. "Even if it means scandal for the Montaine name."

"Those are your father's words, Carl!" she cried. "They don't sound like you."

On a typewriter the officer at the desk had practically kept pace with the spoken words, recording them on paper. In the silence that followed he ripped the sheet from his machine.

"Well, I guess that young couple of yours won't be speaking to each other any more for quite a while," he said to Lucas. "Here's the record, if you want it."

Lucas took the sheet of paper and read what was typed on it.

"Well, we aren't proving anything here," he grunted.

"Only that no matter how low Moxley was," remarked the officer with considerable feeling, "that girl killed the wrong husband!"

"Aw, don't be so sentimental," drawled Joe Lucas, and he went back to the room in which Carl was leaning against a filing cabinet with his hands in his pockets and Rhoda was twisting a little handkerchief into a ball.

"Sorry," he said gruffly, "time's up! Can't let you two have any more secrets."

"Thanks for this favour, Mr. Lucas," said Carl frigidly.

"Aw, that's all right." The Chief of Detectives waved a hand in dismissal, closed the door after the young man had departed, and walked round to a desk.

"Sit down, Mrs. Montaine," he said, taking a document from his pocket and opening it out on the blotting-pad. "Don't look so worried. I just had a talk with the District Attorney, and the people in the next apartment claim that Moxley's door-bell was ringing at the time the murder was committed. Now, Mrs. Montaine, if you were ringing Moxley's door-bell and he didn't answer the door because he was busy gettin' killed, why, it couldn't have been you that killed him. Don't you see?"

Rhoda, who had sunk into a chair and burst into tears, looked up with a tear-stained face.

"Yes, th—that must be it," she faltered. "I—I rang the door-bell and—er—I didn't get any answer. I remember now."

"That's fine!" boomed Lucas. "Saying that'll get us a lot further than you waiting for Perry Mason to let you talk. Now, you just sign this statement to that effect."

He held out a pen to her, and she rose to take it and to sign her name to the statement he read aloud to her.

About an hour afterwards, Perry Mason once more invaded the ante-room of the District Attorney's office, and this time nearly a dozen newspaper men and photographers were with him.

The secretary eyed the crowd with dismay and rose up behind his desk.

"You can't go in there, Mr. Mason!" he cried out. "The District Attorney is very busy."

Perry flourished a sheet of blue paper which he took from his breast-pocket.

"Not too busy to look over this habeas corpus for my client," he said sternly, and advanced to the door and opened it—only to gaze into a deserted room. "He isn't in his office. Where is he?"

"I don't know," the secretary replied.

"You're fired, gentlemen of the jury!"

The newspaper reporters and the photographers clustered round the attorney. Toots Howard, who was among them, gurgled:

"All right, Perry, let's have it!"

Perry addressed the men collectively, as though he were in a court of justice.

"Gentlemen of the jury," he declaimed, "and in calling you such I could ask for no more jurisprudent an assemblage, is it not with the utmost falseness that this building is known as the Hall of Justice?"

"That's right, Perry," declared Toots.

"I have here a document, known technically as a habeas corpus. You know the meaning of that word. The ancient Romans, from whom it sprang, knew its significance well, but does our District Attorney? It means that my client—that innocent victim of modern scheming—must be delivered into my hands; a privilege that is being denied me, and her. But is justice served? It is not! Not only is my client hidden from me, but the District Attorney hides from me as well!"

Dropping his arms and his rhetorical manner, Perry beamed at the representatives of the Press.

"Is that all right for the climax, or could we do better?" he asked genially.

"It's very good," said Toots.

Flashlight photographs were taken of the wily advocate, and the reporters were busy making notes when the District Attorney walked in from the corridor with Joe Lucas.

"You're getting very hard to find,

Mr. District Attorney," said Perry. "I have a present for you!"

The District Attorney bestowed a casual glance upon the writ of habeas corpus and smiled at Lucas, who produced the statement Rhoda had signed.

"We have a little legal document, too," sneered the Chief of Detectives.

"Perhaps you recognise the signature," said the District Attorney. "It's your client's. When she signed this she practically signed her death warrant!"

A Blonde Pretender

EMPOWERED by the writ of habeas corpus, Perry visited Rhoda in gaol that afternoon, and he took Toots with him. As he needed food he had a meal brought in from a neighbouring restaurant for himself, the reporter, and the beautiful prisoner, and under the watchful eyes of a warder the three sat and ate in a bleak room.

"Start talking, my good woman," said Perry. "This man Toots has been deaf since birth."

Toots grinned and filled his mouth; Rhoda talked. She admitted once more that she had seen Moxley on the night of his death, though to no purpose.

"He was so furious with me for not bringing the money he demanded," she said, "that he hit me and tried to choke me. I broke loose and grabbed a poker from the fireplace, and when he came at me again I hit him good and hard."

"Good and hard?" murmured Perry, raising his brows. "Well, when I get you before a jury, don't hit quite so enthusiastically!"

"He staggered back," said Rhoda, "but he didn't fall. I started to run out from the flat, but suddenly all the lights went out and I realised that somebody else was in the apartment."

"Maybe," suggested Toots brightly, "it was the wooden Indian, come to scalp Moxley by way of revenge!"

"A little more quiet, please!" commanded the warder from the door against which he had taken his stand, and Perry frowned at the reporter.

"You couldn't see who it was, Rhoda?" he asked.

"No," she replied. "Everything was happening at once. There were matches being lit by somebody, and the door-bell was ringing frantically. Then I heard the sound of glass crashing in the inside room—and after that the door-bell stopped ringing, and—and all was quiet. I ran downstairs and went home."

"Hmm!" mused Perry. "Well, our plea would have been self-defence, but you smashed all that up by telling the police that you were ringing the bell."

"I—I don't know why I signed it," murmured Rhoda.

"All the State has to do," Perry informed her, "is to produce the person who was ringing the bell. The finding of your keys beside the body makes you out a lovely little liar."

Rhoda sighed.

"After all, what difference does it make," she said plaintively, "with Carl against me?"

"What did you marry him for?"

"I loved him," she replied slowly. "He—he was so helpless and he—he needed mothering. His father had been a brute to him—made a wreck of his life, and—"

Another warder put his head in at the door.

"Your time's up!" he announced.

Perry wiped his mouth on a serviette and patted Rhoda on the arm.

"We'll show 'em a thing or two," he said confidently. "Keep your chin up."

From the gaol he went back to his own office, where he summoned Spudsy and conversed with him at length.

"Moxley's game," he said, "was to marry women and then disappear.

"And that's the hand!" said Perry. "The hand that carved the life out of Gregory Moxley!"

He'd wait till his widows had married again, and then he'd come back and demand hush-money. So to-morrow, Spudsy, you must go out and find some other woman that Moxley was married to, get her down to the morgue, and have her identify Moxley as her dead husband. That will make Rhoda unmarried to him and her marriage to Carl Montaine legitimate. Under the law a husband cannot testify against his wife, and young Montaine will, therefore, be prevented from going on the stand. You've just got twelve hours to find the woman."

Spudsy scratched the back of his head and stared at his employer.

"Sounds easy!" he remarked lugubriously. "D'you think I'd better start from north to south, or go from east to west?"

"Oh, come, come, Spudsy," reproved Perry. "Surely you can think of some lady friend who might have wed Moxley? What about a certain blonde named Florabelle Morgan, living at the Churchill Hotel? You used to be very friendly with her—and she's not a bad actress."

"Boy!" exclaimed Spudsy with a long-drawn sigh of relief. "Am I glad we thought of her?"

Florabelle Morgan was a cabaret dancer whose brother Perry had done his best to save from the gallows, though without avail—an ample blonde, prepared to do almost anything for money and especially for the befriender of her brother. She proved quite willing to play the part of one of Moxley's widows, and on the following evening she was taken to the morgue by Spudsy, where, in the presence of numerous newspapermen, she tearfully identified the corpse of Gregory Moxley as that of a long-lost husband.

Flashlight photographs were taken of her, and Wilbur Strong, the coroner, was an interested witness. Having been well tutored in the part she was to play, Florabelle answered all the reporters' questions satisfactorily, but two men from the District Attorney's office arrived on the scene, and they were sceptical.

They asked her name, and she gave her real married name with a feeling of safety because her own husband had been dead for a number of years.

"Mrs. Gregory Lawson, sir," she said. "This man was my husband, and his name was Lawson, not Moxley."

"Where's your marriage certificate?" demanded one of the officers brusquely. "I have it right here," she whimpered, and produced a genuine document from her handbag. "Oh, my poor Gregory!"

"Sonora, Mexico, eh?" grunted the officer, pocketing the certificate. "I'm afraid you'll have to come with us, Mrs. Lawson. The District Attorney wants to talk to you."

"Do you mean to tell me that I'm not to have a minute alone with my dead?" she sobbed.

"Come on!" commanded the hard-hearted official.

After she had gone the reporters and photographers trooped away, with the single exception of Toots, who followed the coroner into the office along the corridor. The coroner said slyly:

"Well, how do you figure it, Toots?"

"Looks to me," replied the representative of the "Enquirer," "like Perry Mason was born with a lot of lucky horseshoes."

"Yes," chuckled the coroner, "and he always puts one in his glove when he swings a fast one at the D. A."

A policeman entered to deliver a message, and Toots asked if he could take another peep at Moxley.

December 7th, 1935.

"Sure; make yourself at home," replied the coroner.

So Toots went back into the glass-pannelled room of shrouded corpses, but he stopped short with a gasp as one of the white sheets was flung back and a fully-clothed figure sat bolt upright. It was Spudsy the sheet had concealed, however, not a dead body, and Spudsy cried out:

"Hi, Toots! Who won the Lasky-Spimoni fight to-night?"

Clues!

PERRY MASON, that evening, went to Norwalk Avenue alone, and he climbed a fire-escape at the back of the Coleman Apartments to the kitchen window of the flat in which Gregory Moxley had been killed. The police had left the window unfastened, and he slid in over the sill with an electric torch in his hand.

In the light of the torch he examined each room thoroughly, paying particular attention to the broken mirror and a damaged chair. From the carpet near the door he picked up a jagged piece of thick plate-glass, silvered on one side, which clearly had been part of the mirror. This he wrapped in a handkerchief and put in his pocket before he continued his search.

Only one other find rewarded his efforts, and that was a charred fragment of a sheet of letter-paper which he retrieved from a fireplace, and this seemed to please him, though there was nothing more on it than the printed words, "Fremont Hotel."

He went back to his office, where Della Street was still waiting, and Spudsy had just arrived, and Spudsy was sent off to South San Francisco to investigate every resident in the Fremont Hotel, which was situated in that suburb of the city.

Nearly twenty-four hours elapsed before the faithful assistant returned, but meanwhile he had cultivated the acquaintance of one of the girls on the switchboard at the hotel, and from her had learned quite a lot.

"There's a singer in the Midnight Follies at the Irving Theatre we'll have to see," he informed Perry.

"Connected with the case?" Perry inquired.

"Sure! She and her brother—a guy by the name of Oscar Pender. They phoned Moxley from the hotel just thirty minutes before he got bumped off. The telephone operator gave me the tip. She still calls herself Doris Pender, but I've checked on her, and I've found out that she married Moxley last year."

Perry whistled shrilly.

"What could I do without you?" he groaned. "That makes Florabelle no widow of the deceased!"

"It still makes Carl Montaine a real husband of Rhoda," said Spudsy.

"We'll go and see these Midnight Follies," decided Perry.

They went to the Irving Theatre, where Perry bribed the stage-door-keeper, and between turns they invaded the dressing-room of Doris Pender, a dark-haired girl and a good-looking one.

"Can we talk to you for a minute?" Perry said to her. "We're inspectors from the telephone company."

"Telephone company?" echoed the girl. "Well, I haven't much time now. What's the beef?"

"You were in South San Francisco on the night of the twelfth?"

"Is that a crime?" she demanded, eyeing the intruders with scorn, though not without a measure of nervousness.

"No," said Perry, "but it's a crime to try to collect money over the telephone by threats."

"It looks," she retorted, "as though the telephone company's got the wrong number, as usual!"

"Lady," said Perry sharply, "there's no use denying that you called Gregory Moxley that night from the Fremont Hotel—you or your brother—and Moxley was bumped off that night!"

"Wait a minute—wait a minute!" gulped Doris Pender. "That telephone call didn't have anything to do with that killing!"

Perry moved towards the door, beckoning to Spudsy.

"Wait a minute!" cried the girl. "Listen—"

"Good-night!" said Perry emphatically, and he went out with Spudsy past a call-boy who was about to knock.

Outside the stage-door he left Spudsy to lurk in the shadows while he himself went back to the office. He knew that he had left Doris Pender panic-stricken, and he felt pretty sure that she would fly off to her brother the moment she could escape from the theatre. Spudsy would attend to that matter.

Toots was at the office in quest of news. Della Street said plaintively as her employer seated himself in a businesslike manner at his desk:

"It's pretty late for a lady to be still working!"

"Yes," agreed Perry, "and it's late for a lady to be still in gaol; and it's late for Spudsy to be out on a wild-goose chase."

"You've still got that Moxley widow," remarked Toots.

"Yes," said Perry, and filled his pipe. "But I don't think I'll have her long. Things are messed up badly."

The door was opened and Wilbur Strong walked into the room.

"Hallo, fellows!" he said. "Perry, my friend, I've got some more bad news for you! Your young Dr. Millsap turned out to be a bell-ringer. He's admitted to Joe Lucas that it was him ringing the bell while Moxley was being done in."

"That's fine!" quoth Perry bitterly. "He's certainly fixed things up beautifully for Rhoda!"

"Hasn't he, though?" said the coroner. "With her saying it was her ringing the bell, and her keys by the body—say, I guess I'll have a little of your embalming fluid, Perry!"

Della had already provided Toots with a whisky-and-soda. She mixed one for the speaker and another for her employer, and then the telephone-bell rang.

The District Attorney was on the other end of the line, seated at a desk in a room where Joe Lucas had been badgering Florabelle Morgan for a very long while. The blonde pretender was facing a painfully bright light as well as the Chief of Detectives, and some reporters were present.

"Hallo!" said the District Attorney into his instrument.

"Hallo, Stacey!" returned Perry. "Sorry to keep you up so late worrying about me."

"Well," was the retort, "I think we've managed to work out something that'll keep you up all night every night until the trial! Listen, Perry, you'd better not plan to use that woman Florabelle's identification of Moxley as her husband. Somebody paid her to do that. We caught her putting the money in the bank!"

"That's a lie!" stormed Florabelle, jumping to her feet, but Perry could not hear her voice, nor could he hear the voice of Joe Lucas commanding her to sit down.

"Death Rides the Plains"

Read This First

Montana Larkin, an ex-deputy, is planning to join in a land rush with Jinglebob Morgan, his friend, whose brother has provided them with the map of a claim which contains rich mineral deposits.

Montana and Jinglebob make the acquaintance of a rancher named Parker, and are introduced to his daughter, Mary, and his niece, Ann Hardy. From Parker they learn the details of the projected land rush, and agree to ride in company with the cattleman and his party.

Parker's foreman, Gillespie, is a crook, however. Discovering the purpose of Montana and Jinglebob, he beats them to their claim with some of his hirelings, and records it in his name.

Later, Jinglebob's brother Clem arrives on the scene, and reveals the fact that the land secured by Gillespie is worthless, owing to a flaw in the map which Jinglebob had possessed.

Clem is kidnapped by the Gillespie gang, but is rescued before Gil can force him to divulge the whereabouts of the real claim.

That same night Gillespie and his men come to the Parker ranch. Anxious to account for Montana, they entice him to the bunkhouse by a trick. As the ex-deputy realises his danger he sweeps out the light, but five guns blaze in the darkness!

Gun Duel

It was lucky for Montana that he had the presence of mind to bound to one side as he shattered the bunkhouse lamp, or five leaden slugs must have ripped through his body.

In the instant that he leapt away from the table he heard the bullets whistle past him and smack into the timbers of the wall. Then he dived for the door, and in another split second he was clear of the building.

A second volley splintered the panels of the door as he slammed it after him. Next moment he heard Gillespie's voice raised in strident tones.

"He's got away! After him!"

Montana dodged round the corner of the cow-hands' quarters and sped to the ranch-house, and as he reached the porch Jim Parker came blundering across the threshold with Mary, Ann, Jinglebob and Clem.

"What is it?" Parker jerked. "What happened, Montana? We heard shots!"

"Gillespie and his gang!" the ex-deputy answered tersely. "Quick—inside! They may try to rush the house!"

Even as he spoke the words Gil and his men swung into view round the angle of the bunkhouse, and a bullet cut a neat hole through the sleeve of Jinglebob's shirt.

"Inside!" Montana repeated. "Turn out the lights and get under cover. We'll beat off these coyotes!"

The girls were hustled through the doorway, Montana following with Parker and the Morgans. In the living-room stood young Steve Randall, his arm bandaged, a look of blank inquiry on his face.

"Gillespie, Steve!" Montana told him. "Douse that light an' then lie low. Keep out of the way with Ann and Mary. You can't handle a gun with that game flipper o' yours."

"Gimme a six-shooter an' I'll use my left hand," Steve retorted, as he turned out the lamp that illuminated the living-room; but the other men paid no heed, for already they were making towards the windows.

They took up their positions in the gloom, and, looking out, they saw Gil and his hirelings advancing on the house.

"Let 'em have it!" Jim Parker said crisply.

Four guns roared a flaming challenge to the onset of the Gillespie gang. It was an opening fusillade that drew no blood; but Butch Riley clapped a hand to his pate as his sombrero was whipped off, and the other members of the party had close enough shaves.

By tacit understanding the crooks swerved towards a big wagon that offered them shelter, and as they ducked behind it Hank Rodgers uttered a hoarse comment.

"We're sunk, Gil!" he gasped. "If we could 've finished Montana and then busted down on Parker and the Morgan's afore they could organise—if we could 've done that, we'd have been settin' pretty. But right now we're in a spot!"

"There's four o' them and five of us," Gillespie retorted, "an' the prize we're after is a claim that's worth a fortune in gold. We're gonna fight, and we'll smoke Larkin and his friends outa there if I have to stay here all night!"

He set an example to his men by crouching down behind one of the wagon-wheels and firing through the spokes, and Rodgers and the others followed suit, the bellow of their "irons" echoing around the ranch-house and outer buildings of the Dry Creek outfit.

In grim response the guns of the defenders belched lead that struck splinters from the wagon-spokes, and the back of

Tex Sanders' hand was blistered by a ricocheting slug that kept him out of the duel for two or three minutes, during which time he nursed his slight hurt and mouthed black oaths.

Meanwhile the window-panes of the living-room were falling asunder in fragments before the enfilading bullets of the attackers, and Clem Morgan suffered a cut on the cheek by a flying piece of glass.

He continued to blaze away, however, pumping the trigger of a borrowed forty-five that Mary had brought him from her father's private collection.

Over at the wagon Sanders finally resumed active interest in the siege, but neither he nor the other three men under Gillespie's command had much hope of success crowning their efforts.

"Hank was right, Gil," Jake Conroy blurted all at once. "We ain't got a chance. There ain't enough of us to smoke out them hombres."

But Gillespie could not see it—would not see it. Greed had inspired in him a desperate determination to discover the whereabouts of that valuable strip of land which Clem Morgan hoped to stake, and he persisted in his determination until Hank Rodgers suddenly clutched him by the arm and indicated two horsemen who were riding towards the ranch from the east.

"Look!" Rodgers panted. "Maybe you'll believe we're up against it now. That must be Slim an' Porky, back from Auburn!"

The oncoming riders were Slim and Porky, indeed—the two loyal punchers who had remained steadfast to their employer with the somewhat chicken-hearted Happy when Gillespie had caused the split in the Parker outfit. And at the sound of firing Slim and Porky had drawn their revolvers; were now galloping up to investigate the situation.

The fact that there were only two of them was not insignificant, for their presence swung the balance completely in the favour of the ranch-house defenders. Even Gillespie realised that.

Confronted by the belching guns of the men in the house, outflanked by Slim and Porky, the gangsters could not afford to maintain the battle. Despite his announcement that he was prepared to fight all night, Gillespie saw that discretion was advisable.

"Beat it, fellers!" he snarled in chagrined accents. "Pick up your horses and pull outa here!"

He led the way in a rush to the copse where he and his accomplices had left their brones, and presently the rogues were spurring from the scene, exchanging a few shots with Slim and Porky as the two cowboys blazed at their departing figures.

Slim and Porky drew rein in front of the ranch-house, watched Gillespie and his men ride off into a tract of brushwood, then dismounted as Montana, Jim Parker and the Morgans came out on to the porch.

"Hallo, there, boys," old man Parker greeted his two employees. "Mighty glad to see you!"

"That was Gillespie an' his gang. wasn't it, boss?" said Slim.

"Yep, it sure was!" the rancher declared, glancing ironically in the direction that the crooks had taken. "They tried to raid us, but I reckon we were one too many for 'em when you and Porky showed up."

Slim was all for organising a pursuit, but Parker would not hear of it, seeing little chance of catching up with the gangsters—except, perhaps, by running into an ambush in the dark.

"You're right, Mr. Parker," Montana put in, giving the rancher credit for his caution. "We can't take any long chances. Meantime I suggest we should look around for Happy."

Happy was discovered among the bushes into which he had been thrown, after he had been knocked senseless, and he was carried to the bunk-house, where he came round after five minutes' attention. Then, having heard his story, Montana returned to the ranch-house with Parker and the two Morgan brothers.

When they re-entered the living-room the lamp was alight again, and Steve Randall was awaiting them with Ann and Mary.

"Slim and Porky brought those gew-gaws you asked them to buy in Auburn, Mary," Jim Parker told his daughter. "They say they're in their saddle-bags."

"Never mind them now," Mary rejoined. "I'd forgotten all about them. The point is—are you sure Gil and his crew have gone?"

"They've gone all right," Montana interposed, "and I figure they won't be back here in a hurry. It was Clem, of course, that they were after."

Mary nodded. She and her father had been taken into full confidence by Montana and Jinglebob after the land rush, and understood the situation completely.

"I reckon we oughta track them skunks down and round 'em up," Jinglebob stated emphatically. "We've got plenty on 'em now—what with the murder of Trask, the attempted rustlin' of Parker's herd and this attack to-night. Clem, ain't you got no idea where that hide-out of Gillespie's is?"

"Naw," his brother said, shaking his head. "Yuh see, I was blindfolded when I was taken there, an' blindfolded again when I was brought out."

"How about you, Steve?" Jinglebob asked young Randall. "If you can tell us where that hide-away is, we'll call in the sheriff and grab the whole gang."

"I only know that it's somewhere near Hell's Gate," Steve replied. "But I'll tell you what, Jinglebob. I'll try to contact Gillespie and team up with them again. He ain't to know that I'm not on his side any more."

Montana moved between Jinglebob and the wounded man.

"I guess you're fit enough to fork a saddle, Steve," he observed, "but if you don't know where Gillespie's hide-away is, how are you gonna contact him?"

"You're forgettin' Marco Brett, Montana," Steve Randall answered. "Gil is bound to show up at Brett's saloon in Sicomoro some time, and that's where I'll be lookin' for him. I'll join up with him again, and when I get the low-down I'll tip you off—let you know the best way to corner him and his crew."

The idea appealed to Montana, even if Parker and the others seemed a trifle dubious, and after a moment's thought the ex-deputy looked at Steve Randall quizzically.

"I'm hopin' you'll play straight with us," he said.

"You can trust me," Steve told him. "I give you my Bible oath on that, pardner."

"All right," Montana grunted. "You'd better start out at sun-up tomorrow."

News of Plunder

EARLY the following day Gil Gillespie and his men cantered into the main street of Sicomoro from the north, and, hitching their ponies to the veranda rail of the town's saloon, they filed through the swing-doors and crossed the bar-room to the private office of Marco Brett.

Big Marco Brett was seated at his desk, but rose quickly to his feet as Gil and his hirlings entered the room.

"Hallo, Gillespie," he greeted.

"Takin' a chance comin' to Sicomoro, ain't you? Or maybe you haven't heard?"

"Heard what?" Gil demanded.

"The sheriff was here after you left town yesterday," Brett explained. "I don't know how true it is, but there's a rumour goin' around that he'd like to see you about the shootin' of Bill Trask up in Red Gulch, the night of the flood. He's dropped the charge against Montana Larkin, anyway."

Gillespie scowled.

"The sheriff had better not try any funny stuff with me," he said. "Sicomoro ain't Red Gulch. There ain't much account taken of the law in Sicomoro. Yeah, and talkin' of Montana Larkin, that guy is gettin' in my hair. I told you how he busted up that cattle raid. Well, he's ridin' herd on Clem Morgan now."

"You mean—he took Clem Morgan away from you?"

Gillespie nodded viciously, and Brett gave vent to a low whistle.

"Queered the plan you had in mind about the land with the mineral deposits, eh?" he mused. "Say, that's tough, Gil. The way you talked about that deal, I thought it was a cinch."

"I'm gonna make it a cinch," Gillespie ground out. "But listen, Brett, I've got to have more men. You know plenty of tough hombres that you could get in touch with. There's a good many right here in this town—fellers that have done work for you. Put 'em on to me, Brett, will yuh?"

The saloon owner fingered his chin. "Okay, Gil," he said shrewdly, "but for that little favour I'd want a cut in this land deal."

"You're on, Brett," came the reply. "I'm convinced there's enough gold in that strip for you and me both, and any likely guys that care to throw in with me. The way Clem Morgan's talked about it, we'll make our fortunes."

"Yeah, if we can find the strip," Brett grunted, "and find it afore Morgan stakes a claim on it. The way I look at it—"

He paused, for at that instant there was a knock on the door, and with a frown the crooked saloon owner called out inquiringly.

"Who's there?"

"The name is Steve Randall," a voice answered from the other side of the door.

Gillespie uttered an exclamation, and, striding in front of Brett, he opened the office door to admit the unexpected caller. A moment later Steve was confronting the ex-foreman and his associates with a look of sham resentment on his countenance.

"I thought I might find you fellers here," he said. "A fine bunch you turned out to be, didn't you—leavin' me in Hidden Valley after that battle there?"

"We had to clear off in a hurry," Gillespie muttered. "What happened to you, anyway?"

"Larkin and his friends took me to the Parker ranch, an' I've been held prisoner there ever since," Steve rejoined. "While you and the boys were shootin' up the outfit last night I slipped out through the back door, stole a horse and made my getaway."

It was at this point that another visitor arrived, and Gil and his men recognised him as one Blackie Davis, an individual who had had a good many dealings with Marco Brett in the past.

Blackie Davis nodded to the Gillespie gang and then addressed Brett, knowing that he could speak freely in the presence of Gil and his party.

"I've got some news that might interest you, Brett," he announced. "I've been ramrodin' Bill Hardy's freight column across-country, an' believe me it's the biggest, richest outfit I ever saw."

Steve Randall glanced at the man known as Blackie with interest. He recalled that Bill Hardy was the father of Mary Parker's cousin Ann, and wondered why Blackie Davis should bring tidings of the wagon-train to Marco Brett. Then the saloon owner's voice interrupted his reflections.

"What's Bill Hardy's outfit carryin'?" Brett asked.

"What ain't it carryin'?" Blackie retorted. "Supplies of all kinds—thousands and thousands of dollars' worth—not to mention a prairie schooner full of gunpowder and ammunition. I tell yuh, Brett, if you could lay hands on it you could sell the stuff yourself, quiet-like, and make a pile out of it."

Brett's eyes narrowed craftily.

"How well is the column guarded?" he murmured.

"It's wide open," was the answer. "It was attacked a while back by renegade Indians. They was beaten off, but a good many men was lost in the fight. The column is short-handed now—and what's more, Bill Hardy himself was plugged. He's layin' up in one of the schooners."

"Renegade Indians," the saloon owner ejaculated. "Say, we ain't had trouble with Redskins in years."

"Yeah; but I reckon someone's been peddlin' liquor among these here renegades, an' they got crazy enough to think they could act like their forefathers and get away with it."

"Where are the wagons now?" Brett demanded.

"Up in the rock country," said Blackie. "They're headin' for the water-hole at Lizzard Creek, because their water supply give out. I made some excuse, left the outfit, an' came on to town."

The saloon-owner turned to Gil Gillespie, a sinister smile playing around his brutal mouth.

"Seem' we're more or less in partnership now, Gil, how would you like to pull off this job?" he suggested. "I can get hold of those extra men you were talkin' about. Say the word an' I'll have 'em rounded up within the hour—enough of 'em to make the thing easy for you. Then you can hit the trail for Lizzard Creek."

"I'm your man, Brett," Gillespie declared. "You can depend on me."

"What about Clem?" Steve Randall interposed quickly. "You'd better have him watched, or before you know what's happenin' he might stake out that land of his and file a claim on it. Supposin' you leave me to keep an eye on his movements, seem' I've got a bullet hole in me arm and can't fight. I'll know where to find you if I want to get in touch with you in a hurry."

"That's a good idea, Randall," Gillespie agreed. "You beat it for the Parker outfit and watch points."

Steve left the saloon without delay, and soon he was galloping off in a northerly direction at the top speed of his brone—seemingly bent on carrying out Gillespie's instructions, but actually contemplating a very different mission.

For, on sighting the Parker outfit an hour or two later, he did not conceal himself in some favourable coign of vantage to play the spy, but rode straight ahead for the ranchhouse and located its owner near a corral at the back of the building.

Jim Parker was interviewing a group of likely-looking cowboys who had shown up at the house that very morning, some of them having arrived singly, others in two or threes. They were men who had heard that jobs were to be had at the ranch, and, although these applicants were really too numerous for his requirements, Parker was, nevertheless, prepared to engage them en bloc in view of Gillespie's activities.

The arrival of Steve interrupted the interview, but before the newcomer could divulge the information which he had picked up in Sicomoro, Montana hurried into view with Ann, Mary and the two Morgans.

"Hallo, there, Randall!" Jim Parker was saying to Steve as they came up. "Didn't expect you back so soon. Have you found out something?"

"Gillespie and his gang are raisin' reinforcements," Steve jerked, "and they're plannin' to jump Bill Hardy's freight column at Lizzard Creek."

The news was received with consternation by the Parkers and Bill Hardy's daughter, Ann, and their agitation increased on learning that the wagon-boss had been wounded in a previous raid by renegade Indians. Then Jinglebob Morgan spoke up.

"If the new hands will throw in with us, we've got enough men to save that column and maybe bust up the Gillespie gang," he growled. "Ask 'em how they feel about it, Parker."

The situation was explained to the cowboys who had been applying for jobs at the ranch, and they seemed ready enough for action.

"All right," Jim Parker declared. "Every man of you is on my pay-roll now, and this is where we ride."

"Wait a minute," Montana said. "You've got cattle on this property, Parker, and I advise you not to leave them unattended. Let me handle this job. I'll take Slim, Porky, Jinglebob and the new hands with me, and make for the Lizzard Creek trail. You stay right here with Clem, Happy and Steve—just to keep an eye on things."

The rancher fell in with this proposal, and shortly afterwards Montana and his followers set out for the south-east, a formidable body of men with purposeful expressions on their weather-beaten faces.

They were accompanied by Ann Hardy and Mary Parker, for Ann had flatly refused to stay at home and, with equal stubbornness, Mary had insisted on accompanying her, even in defiance of parental commands.

It was a long ride to the Lizzard Creek trail, and the sun had crossed the meridian when Montana and his party espied it ahead of them. Then they beheld a straggling column of prairie schooners moving slowly from the east, and, knowing that this must be the Hardy freight-train, they pushed onward at a brisk pace to meet it.

The first wagon in the column was the one that contained Bill Hardy and, within a few seconds of the supply train halting, Montana was climbing into that first schooner with Mary and Ann.

Bill Hardy was lying there on a pile of hides, a fine-looking old fellow, though his countenance was drawn with suffering, and his mind in so disordered a condition that he scarcely seemed to recognise his own daughter.

Leaving the two girls with the wounded man, Montana moved to the front of the wagon and spoke to the driver of it.

"Hardy seems in a pretty bad way," he said.

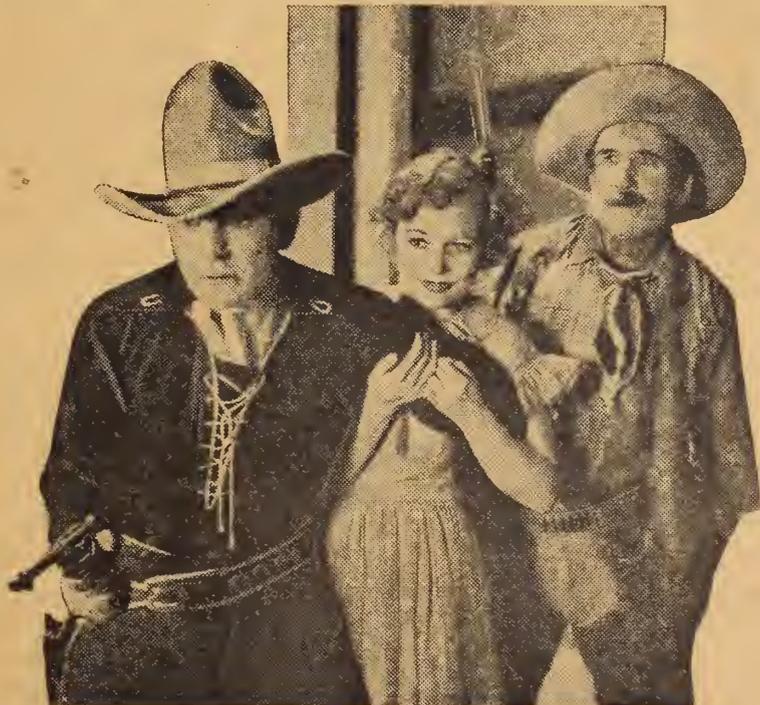

"He keeps cryin' out for water," the other rejoined, "but there ain't a drop in the outfit. That's why we're headin' for Lizzard Creek."

"Then there's no possible chance of making Sicomoro by the direct route?" Montana queried.

"Not a chance," was the reply. "If we was on horseback we could all reach Sicomoro to-night. But these here wagon-teams can't keep up a fast pace for long, and we're jest about desperate. Why, the very ponies will pass out on us if they don't get their thirst slaked."

Montana nodded grimly. "All right," he said. "Here, let me have those reins. You've probably had more'n enough drivin' to do."

"I sure have," the other answered. "Wouldn't mind a spell in the saddle for a change."

"Inside!" Montana repeated. "Turn out the lights and get under cover. We'll beat off these coyotes!"

He alighted from the wagon and mounted a spare horse that had been hitched to the back of the vehicle. Then Montana cracked a whip above the heads of the prairie schooner's team, and the animals plodded forward.

One by one the rest of the wagon-teams in the column were set in motion by their drivers. Meanwhile, Jinglebob, Slin and Porky had taken charge of the brones belonging to Montana, and the two girls, who had boarded the first schooner with him, and the remainder of the Parker ranch-hands were cantering back along the train to spread the news that trouble might be expected.

The wagons and outriders of the Hardy freight-train looked grim as they heard these tidings, and rifles, shotguns and revolvers were sternly examined, their owners making certain that these were loaded.

Forewarned and forwarned, the convoy rumbled slowly onward over the plains, Lizzard Creek its goal.

Onset

LIZZARD CREEK was situated in the heart of a singularly barren expanse of country, and was akin to an oasis in the desert. And, like an oasis, it had become the permanent residence of at least one human being.

This individual was one Dave Baxter, and he obtained a living from two sources. Primarily a horse-dealer, he also held the rights on the water-hole at the creek—the word creek being used in this instance according to the American definition, and signifying a narrow plain between the mountains, not a river tributary.

There was no river near Lizzard Creek, but there was water in the form of a deep, sprawling pool; and apart from his activities in regard to horseflesh Baxter was wont to allow any way-farers to slake their thirst there—at a price.

Baxter's outfit consisted of a large corral, that was usually packed with mules and ponies, and a fair-sized dwelling, where he lived with such men as he employed. It was this outfit that Gillespie beheld after a long ride from Sicomoro with his four cronies, Blackie Davis and a powerful band of ruffians hired by Brett.

"Whose dump is that?" Gillespie asked, viewing the bunkhouse and the corral.

"Dave Baxter's," Blackie replied. "Let's have a little talk with him. He's a friend of Marco Brett's, too."

The gang spurred on, and a little while later drew rein near the water-hole. Their arrival brought several men from the bunkhouse, these being headed by Baxter in person, who was a tough-looking customer of unpleasant manner.

Blackie held converse with Baxter and made the position clear.

"Now if you refuse to let that wagon-train water here, Dave," he added, "they're bound to head for Devil's Gorge in the hope of gettin' water there."

"So what?" Baxter asked. "On the trail to Devil's Gorge there's plenty o' spots where Gillespie and his bunch could ambush the train," Blackie observed. "You see, we aim to wipe out every man in that column and leave no evidence."

Baxter considered for a moment. "If I do as you ask," he said at length, "I'll want my pickings outa the deal. I'll even follow up with my own men an' join you when you cut loose on the trail."

"Brett would be agreeable to that," Blackie declared. "How about you, Gillespie?"

Gillespie nodded, and, the bargain having been sealed, he and his gang departed with Blackie, turning on to the Devil's Gorge trail and seeking cover behind a mass of huge boulders that were just in sight of the Baxter outfit.

Baxter and his hands were left to await the arrival of the freight-train, which presently came into view, and a few minutes later the leading wagons halted near the pool.

Montana acted as spokesman, addressing Baxter and his employees, who had taken up a position between the convoy and its objective.

"We're out of water, friends," the ex-deputy explained.

"You're outa luck as well," Dave Baxter grunted. "We ain't got no water for strangers."

"What's that?" Montana ejaculated. "You heard me," Baxter rasped, and now Montana realised that Baxter and his men were gripping the butts of their guns. "We ain't got water for strangers, so pull out of here."

"We're willing to pay for it," Montana protested, alighting from the Hardy wagon.

"We don't want your money," came the harsh reply. "Get out."

Some of the other wagoners descended to the ground and added their voices to Montana's appeals, but all to no purpose, and, with the argument still in progress, the ex-deputy quietly retreated and spoke in an undertone to Jinglebob Morgan.

"This hombre is within his rights—Baxter, or whatever his name is," he said. "But I reckon we've got the law of common humanity on our side, if nothing else."

"Let's rush 'em," Jinglebob muttered.

"We can shoot our way to that water, if need be."

"And put ourselves completely in the wrong? No, I've got a better lynch, Jingles. See the horses in that corral? Well, when Baxter and his men start after 'em, you tell the folks to fill up with water."

Jinglebob did not altogether comprehend, but he was to understand Montana's meaning soon enough. For, mounting his pony and riding quietly round to Baxter's corral, the ex-deputy opened the gate of the pen and proceeded to drive out the mob of brones and mules.

The argument over at the water-hole was suddenly interrupted by the drumming of hoofs and the piercing yawns of Montana's voice as he scattered the herd far and wide, and with loud shouts of dismay Baxter and his men rushed for their saddle-horses, bent on giving immediate chase and rounding up the animals that had stampeded from the corral.

Away they spurred in full pursuit, and, with the herd fairly on the run, Montana swung off into a thicket, waiting until Baxter's party dashed past before he issued forth again and returned to the water-hole.

Here Jinglebob had quickly taken control of the situation and led a rush to the pool, and now the men of the wagon-train were engaged in filling empty kegs that they had carried from the prairie schooners. It was a task that was completed while Baxter and his employees were still speeding after their fleeing herd, and with triumphant shouts the freighters got under way again.

In the meantime, up on the Devil's Gorge trail, Gillespie and his force had witnessed the whole affair without being able to realise exactly what had happened. They only knew, as they saw the wagons and outriders drawing away from Lizzard Creek, that events had not turned out according to plan.

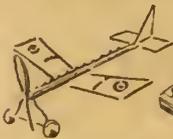

"Something's gone wrong," jerked Blackie Davis. "They've got water, and they ain't headin' this way at all."

"Baxter slipped up somehow," Gillespie snarled. "No chance of an ambush now. We'll have to bust leather and catch up with that column, and it's gotta be a runnin' fight!"

He clapped his heels to the flanks of his pony and charged through the rocks, and the men under his command stormed after him. Across the barren, dusty ground they swept, turning finally on to the tracks left by the receding wagon-train.

They had been seen by the freighters, and the word had spread like wildfire that the expected attack was at hand, so that every driver was now crowding on all speed and every outrider galloped with drawn six-gun; and soon the blatter of firearms was punctuating the thunder of the horses' feet.

They might have halted and given battle, the men of the column, but, despite the fact that Montana and his company had swelled their numbers, they were still in the minority, and, although realising that they might ultimately be forced to make a determined stand, it was their object if possible to obtain the advantage of some sloping ground ahead.

Vast clouds of dust rose from hoofs and wheels, forming a screen between pursuers and pursued and rendering marksmanship more difficult. Gillespie and his rogues were gaining, however, and ere long they were perilously close to the hindmost prairie schooners.

One of the hindmost wagons was the vehicle laden with gunpowder and ammunition, and two men were aboard it, a shaggy old pioneer who was in the driving position, and a younger man who was crouching in the interior.

It was the younger man who suddenly conceived the idea of checking the enemy's pursuit by use of the gunpowder, and, picking up one of the smaller kegs of explosive, he fitted a short fuse to it and struck a match.

The fuse began to splutter, and the man in the wagon tossed the keg over the tailboard. It rolled a few yards after it hit the earth, then came to rest near a prairie dog's burrow—the powder wagon drawing rapidly away from it while Gillespie and his band as rapidly approached it.

The spark touched the explosive and there was a shattering roar, accompanied by a vivid blast of flame. Three of the gang were blown to eternity, and the rest thrown into confusion.

Cursing, Gillespie led his men on again, and through the dust haze saw the young fellow in the powder wagon preparing another fuse. This time Gillespie and his followers knew what to expect, and they concentrated their fire on the interior of that vehicle.

The man with the fuse was drilled through the heart, and pitched from the swaying schooner. The same volley from the outlaws' guns accounted for the veteran driver, and, as his lifeless hands let fall the whip and reins, his team of ponies eased up.

The Gillespie gang came alongside, and all at once Blackie Davis scrambled on to the wagon from his horse, calling upon another of the band to do the same.

"What's the idea?" Gillespie shouted.

"The guy what threw out that keg has given me a hunch," Blackie answered. "You fellers hang hack a little. I'll take this freighter right to the head of the Hardy outfit and then bomb the foremost schooners. That oughta pull up the whole bunch quick enough—yeah, an' throw such a scare into 'em that your work will be easy. All I need is one man to help me."

"You'll never make it, Blackie," Gil belled. "You'll be shot to pieces before you ever get near the head of the train."

"No. They'll never notice me—an' if they do, they'll take it I'm on their side. They won't guess anything's wrong until the explosions start—an' when that happens they'll be too het-up to do much."

The powder wagon was still going forward, and, as a gangster named Dorgan clambered aboard, Blackie lashed the horses into full gallop again and pulled away from Gillespie and the rest of the gang as these slackened pace a trifle.

Suddenly the nature of the ground seemed to change, and the clouds of dust that rose from it became less dense. In that clearer atmosphere Blackie Davis again saw the press of prairie schooners and out-riders in front of him, and with swift strokes of the whip he drove his team after them at full stretch.

To give the man his due, he was a magnificent driver, and, making up on the column, he weaved his way through them towards the leading wagons. Meanwhile Dorgan was in the back of the vehicle which Blackie had commandeered, and was engaged in attaching a fuse to a canister of explosive.

The powder wagon swept onward, Blackie Davis flailing his horses mercilessly, but handling the reins with consummate skill and steering the outfit through that stampede like a navigator taking his ship through a treacherous sea.

Sometimes the schooner was on two wheels. Once it almost fouled another vehicle, and once it came near to being sandwiched between two heavier wagons.

Blackie forced his way ahead of the foremost schooners, and the last one which he overtook was the Hardy outfit, containing the wounded boss of the freight-train and the two girls from the Parker ranch. It also contained Montana, who had abandoned the saddle of his horse to relieve Mary of the wagon-team's reins.

"Hurry up with that powder!" Blackie yelled to Dorgan. "Toss it into that schooner behind us. That oughta make the rest of these freighters sit up!"

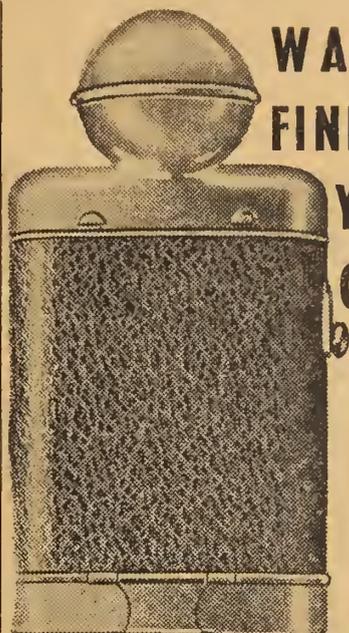

"The fuse is ready now, Blackie," Dorgan answered from the interior. "But there's women in that outfit!"

"What of it? Do as I tell yuh!"

Dorgan lit the fuse that he had attached to the canister. Then he dragged apart the curtains at the tail-board of the wagon in which he and Blackie were riding. An instant later he was raising his hand to make the fatal throw!

"THE CASE OF THE CURIOUS BRIDE"

"I got that money as a present!" she cried. "I've got an uncle in Australia who's rollin' in dough!"

"Yes," said the District Attorney, holding his hand over the telephone. "but Perry Mason doesn't deny that it was a false identification."

That was a blow to the blonde, and Lucas followed it up. "Remember," he rasped, "you're fooling around with a murder charge!"

"All right, all right," surrendered Florabelle. "It was a whim, boys, that's all! Just a whim!"

"That's more like it!" exulted Lucas. "Here, you can have a cigarette!"

The wily District Attorney spoke again to Perry. "We've got a confession," he said, "and I could use it to make you withdraw—and possibly get you disbarred. But I won't do that because it would deprive me of the pleasure of beating you for once. Good-night, Mr. Mason!"

Perry put down the telephone with a grimace.

"For once!" he growled, and turned to the others. "Well, the blonde Florabelle turned out to be just a blonde, after all! She gave in!"

"The police are really gettin' tough this time," quoth Toots.

"Yeah, you'll be able to go to China 'most any time now," said the coroner.

"Perry——" began Della, but at that moment Spudsy tottered into the room, and they all stared at him, for his face was bruised and swollen, and some sticking-plaster adorned the left side of his brow.

"What happened?" asked Perry.

"I met Oscar Pender, of South San Francisco," Spudsy replied. "Followed his sister in a taxi to a low-down lodging-house on the water-front, and after she come out and went off I barged in."

"Good!" said Perry. "You look as though you found out something."

"I did!" said the warrior. "I found out that Pender was at Moxley's apartment the night Moxley got bumped off!"

"There's the man I want!" cried Perry. "Why didn't you bring him in?"

"For two good reasons. First, I had to get my health back, and, second, he was practically surrounded with private detectives!"

"Sure they were private detectives?"

"I can smell 'em! Pender gave them the slip, but not me! I out-foxed the lot of 'em!"

Perry tapped his teeth with the stem of his pipe.

"Spudsy," he said, after a while, "go back and out-fox Pender, even if he kills you! Get him to my apartment to-morrow night, not later than eight."

Spudsy blinked and gulped, but nodded his aching head. "All right," he said, "but this time I ain't goin' alone!"

"Better luck this time, Spudsy," said Toots. "Have a drink before you go."

Perry lit his pipe and puffed at it reflectively.

"Someone with money is interested in Oscar Pender," he remarked. "Someone with money asked me to go easy on the Rhoda Montaine defence. Della, first thing in the morning we'll get someone with money on the 'phone!"

The Truth At Last!

A PLAN already half-formed in the attorney's mind was elaborated in the small hours of the morning when he should have been fast asleep, but he looked fit enough when he arrived at his office and began to put the plan into operation.

During the afternoon he went to see Rhoda in her cell, and a warder affected not to notice the forbidden cigarette she accepted and smoked.

He went over all the old ground with her again, and she seemed no longer concerned to protect Carl Montaine.

"Then you went home?" prompted Perry.

"Yes," she said wearily, "then I went home. I put the car in the garage at the back of the apartment house, and I—I tried to close the doors, but I couldn't because the bumper of Carl's car was sticking out. So I left it and went upstairs, and I tried to sleep and couldn't. Isn't that enough?"

"I think it is," decided Perry. "I'm sorry to have had to put you through all this again."

"I don't see what difference it makes, anyway," she lamented. "I haven't got a chance!"

"Oh, yes, you have," he reassured her. "True, they've got you, but they've got Dr. Millsap, and Flornbelle—and almost everything—almost!"

"She found a little hope in that word 'almost.'"

"What are you going to do?" she asked anxiously.

"I'm going to give a cocktail party to-night," he replied.

"Oh, Perry, don't joke!"

"I'm not joking," he declared. "It's our only hope, but it's a good one."

At eight o'clock that evening his luxurious flat in Jefferson Square was ablaze with lights, and most of his guests for the cocktail party were assembled in the spacious sitting-room.

Carl Montaine was there with his father, both wondering what it was all about. Dr. Claude Millsap, released on bail, sat in an easy chair under a curtained window. Toots was present, and so was Della Street, and Wilbur Strong, the coroner, arrived a little late.

Ping, the Chinese butler, drifted from one guest to another with a tray loaded with cocktails, and then Perry stood on the hearthrug holding a long-stemmed glass in his hand, and addressed the company at large.

"My friends," he said, bowing to left and right, "since, by some weird whim of Fate, there has arrived here such an unassociated group, I suppose the most appropriate toast would be to the hope—however remote—that some mutual benefit may come out of the meeting of this strange assembly. Good health!"

Everybody stood up to raise their glasses, and then the telephone-bell rang. Della answered it and called to her employer.

"Pardon me," said Perry, and went over to the instrument.

"Hallo!" he said. "Who? Oh, Mr. Drake! You've brought him in personally? Very well, bring him up!"

It was Spudsy, telephoning from the hallway on the ground floor, and with him were two particularly tough-looking men who were holding the arms of Oscar Pender, an even tougher specimen than themselves. Perry put down the instrument and turned to his guests.

"That was my assistant, Mr. Drake," he explained. "He has found a man he believes to be the murderer of Gregory Moxley. Better fortify yourselves with another cocktail, gentlemen, because he is about to appear amongst us!"

"That's a good idea," decided Toots; but Carl Montaine cried hoarsely:

"Then you can free Rhoda?"

"Who shall say?" murmured Perry, and his slant-eyed and soft-footed butler appeared with a fresh supply of cocktails, which he was handing round when a commotion was heard outside the room, and the voice of Spudsy, raised in anger, shouting:

"Shut up and get in there!"

Oscar Pender was bundled into the room by his custodians, and stood scowling at strange faces. The two tough assistants of the redoubtable Spudsy retired, but Spudsy stood close to the captive with a life-preserver in his hand.

"We've all been looking forward to seeing you, Mr. Pender," said Perry genially.

"Well, take a good look at me," snarled Pender, "and take a good look at your friend here as well, because some time soon there'll be only one of us."

"Another crack like that and there'll be three of us," retorted Spudsy, swinging the life-preserver, "because I'm gonna bust you in two!"

"Sit down, Mr. Pender," urged

Perry. "Sit down. Let's talk about your last murder. Do you always come up to the big city for your killings?"

Oscar Pender looked round at the guests who had re-seated themselves.

"Say, everyone else is gettin' a drink," he complained. "Why don't I get one?"

Perry apologised and beckoned to Ping, who somewhat diffidently proffered a cocktail, which was swallowed in the twinkling of an eye.

"I was there all right when Moxley got it," admitted Pender, restoring an empty glass to the butler's tray, "but I'd just called to collect some money he'd swindled out of my sister. Thanks."

"You had a perfect motive for killing Moxley, then," said Perry. "Your sister phoned him from South San Francisco half an hour before his death, and told him that if he didn't kick through you'd kill him. You didn't want to make your sister out a liar, so you did kill him."

"I didn't kill Moxley," returned Pender calmly, "and I can prove it with his own blood. I got some of it on my shirt!"

Somebody in the room gasped, and the coroner stared. Perry said, very quietly:

"Then I trust you haven't changed your shirt since, Mr. Pender."

Pender waved that matter aside.

"I'm gonna tell you what happened," he said. "I went up to Moxley's by the back stairs, but when I reached the door I heard the sound of glass crashing inside, and that didn't sound kosher to me, so I scrambled down them stairs again and hid in the dark. Then I heard somebody hot-footin' it down the same way, and they're runnin' so fast they bumps into me."

"And didn't say 'Pardon me'?" questioned Perry.

"He said somethin' worse than that," was the reply. "He says Moxley's been killed."

"Did you get a good look at this man?"

"Well, no. It was dark, and—and I

—"

"Would you say he was about my size?"

Pender looked up at Perry, but shook his head, and the attorney said:

"Gentlemen, will you stand up, please?"

There was a scraping of chairs and everybody stood, except Della. Perry beckoned Carl Montaine forward.

"Would you say about his size?"

"I'm not sure," muttered Pender.

"Perhaps the size of Mr. Montaine senior?" suggested Perry.

"No," said Pender definitely. "Not so heavy and not so stiff."

"Doctor, will you step forward, please?"

The handsome, black-haired young doctor approached quite readily, and Pender surveyed him.

"Well," he said doubtfully, "he was about the size of this guy."

"We're all about the same size," said Perry, "and it was dark. What did this man say?"

"Well, he said we'd better beat it, or we'd be suspected of murder."

"And what did you answer, in your own quaint language?"

"Well, I told him I'd already ankled up from South San Francisco just to glom a big load of dough from this loogan."

"Did the gentleman seem to understand that?"

"He knew what it was about all right," said Pender with a grin, "cos he handed me a wad o' money and told me to beat it."

Perry nodded, glancing from one strained face to another.

"And now, Mr. Pender," he said crisply, "what about the blood on your shirt?"

"The blood come off the money," was the answer he had expected to receive, though it surprised Toots and the coroner; and he swung round on C. Phillip Montaine.

"Out of all the millions the Montaines have," he cooed, "none of their money would have blood on it, would it?"

"Certainly not, Mr. Mason!" snapped the millionaire.

"Then Carl is eliminated too!"

"Yes, Mr. Lawyer," roared the grey-haired parent: "eliminated from your facetious and supposedly humorous insinuations!"

Perry took a white handkerchief from the pocket of his coat.

"At the risk of appearing to contradict myself," he said in the calmest of voices, "it does not eliminate Carl—it points the finger right at him!"

"I trust you're not as confused as you seem, sir?" rapped the millionaire.

"No, not at all," was the bland reply.

"In fact, the story starts with you the day you came into my office and tried to bribe me into hanging Rhoda Montaine, innocent or guilty. You couldn't buy me, so you bought a crew of private detectives to find Oscar Pender, here, and get him out of the country to save the neck of your son."

Abruptly he flung out an accusing finger, and his voice became stern.

"You knew he was guilty," he thundered, "because you were at the Moxley apartment when the murder took place!"

"You'd like to be able to prove that," Carl's father cried furiously, "and I'd like to hear you try!"

"All right," said Perry grimly. "All you've got to do is to listen. Sit down!"

Montaine sank back into the chair whence he had risen, muttering to himself. Carl rose up indignantly, and Perry promptly pushed him into another chair.

"When you saw your wife sneak out on the night of the murder," he said, "you thought she was going to a rendezvous with Dr. Millsap so you followed her."

"Excellent imagination, counsellor," sneered the enraged parent, but Perry flipped a hand at him.

"This isn't imagination," he said. "Rhoda unlocked the garage doors when she left, but she couldn't lock them again when she returned, because, in this young man's haste to beat her home, he neglected to get his car well into the garage and the bumpers were in the way."

He looked down at Carl. "You followed her to Moxley's apartment," he accused, "and you sneaked up the back stairs."

"You seem to be getting my son and Mr. Pender confused," said Montaine, the millionaire, tartly.

"No," returned Perry, "I'm not getting either of them confused—I'm just getting Carl straightened out. You heard Moxley threaten your wife—you heard her try to 'phone for help. You thought of the name she'd have to give—the name you gave her—the sacred and precious name of Montaine!"

Carl flinched, but his father cried out: "Insane tirade!"

"In your excitement," pursued Perry inexorably, "you turned out the lights. You ran into the inner room; you struggled with Moxley and you killed him!"

"Let me go!" shrieked Carl Montaine. "It's a frame-up!"

"That's the voice!" shouted Oscar Pender, and bounded forward excitedly. "I recognise it!"

Perry grabbed hold of Carl Montaine, who tried to escape from him. A lamp on a table by the chair was overturned, but Carl was forced back into his seat, a handkerchief fluttered to the floor, and a jagged piece of broken mirror was forced against the palm of his right hand, where it fitted a scar.

"And that's the hand!" said Perry, removing the piece of mirror. "The hand that carved the life out of Gregory Moxley."

For several minutes there was a horrified silence in the room, then Perry suggested mildly that everybody should have another cocktail.

"I'll have a dozen!" said the coroner huskily.

"I could use one," said Toots, and the Chinese butler flitted silently about the room with his tray, while Carl Montaine tried to collect scattered wits.

"I didn't kill Moxley," he cried suddenly. "I swear I didn't! You're wrong about the killing! When Rhoda came out of Luigi's I followed her to Moxley's apartment. Just as I got there I saw Millsap drive up. He ran up the steps to the front door and rang the bell, so I ran round the house and up the back stairway."

He drew a long breath and sat up right.

"I heard Moxley struggling with Rhoda as I went into the apartment by the tradesman's door," he went on, "and then I saw him hitting her. She backed away, found a poker, and struck him with it. I switched off the lights to help her, and when he got them on again she had gone. He rushed at me in a murderous rage, and we fought. All this time the front door bell was ringing."

"I managed to knock him down, but that made him wilder. I could see he was going to find some weapon, so—so I picked up a chair and threw it. It shattered against the mirror, and then I hit him again. He staggered back and fell against a blade of glass—I heard it cutting into his flesh. He just seemed to hang there, and then he fell. That's what killed him!"

"And then?" asked Perry.

"Then I—I knelt down beside him, and before I realised what I was doing I pulled the glass out of the wound. That's how I cut my hand. I was in a panic—didn't know what to do. I wrapped up my hand as best I could, picked up my hat, and ran down the back way again."

"The rest happened just as you said. I gave Pender money so he'd go away and keep quiet. I didn't mean to accuse Rhoda. I—I thought she'd plead self-defence and the jury would free her. I thought—"

"That's enough!" Perry cut in, stemming the torrent of words, and he turned to the distracted father, who was fumbling in a pocket. "I believe what your son has said, but a jury will have to be convinced. No, put that cheque-book away. Bring it to my office at ten in the morning. Your son's defence, and Rhoda's divorce, will make quite a dent in it!"

The Chinese butler was hovering in the doorway.

"Hats and coats, Ping," directed Perry. "Toots, your paper gets the privilege of turning the Moxley murder suspect over to the police. Dr. Millsap, you'd better run along to the gaol—Rhoda will be out by the time you get there, and her nerves may need some medical attention."

"Thank you, Mr. Mason," murmured the young doctor, and he was the first to depart. Toots went off with Carl Montaine and his father, and Oscar Pender was permitted to follow.

In less than half an hour Perry, Della, the coroner, and the redoubtable Spudsy were seated round a table in the dining-room, and Ping was waiting on them.

"Della," said Perry with a sigh, "I think I'm going to need a vacation." Della smiled impishly at him.

"Ever think of taking a trip to China?" she inquired.

Ensuring the Correct Background

Hollywood "joined the army" some time ago when a large company of stars, featured players and technicians were sent to Randolph Field, Texas, a very famous American air school, for scenes in "West Point of the Air."

The regiment of seventy cameramen, director's aides, sound-recording engineers and other workers was the largest number ever sent out to a single location by the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios.

For the aerial photography two cameras shot from the ground; two worked from a platform 168 feet in the air on top of Randolph Tower, the famous 4,000,000 candle-power aeroplane beacon; two were in the air, while a seventh camera "covered" the ground from the barrack roofs.

The first day's shooting included two difficult training manoeuvres flown by Army aces during one of their regular flights. Nearly one hundred ships in perfect flying formation formed a triple chevron mark.

While Wallace Beery flew from Hollywood in his own passenger monoplane, other members of the company travelled by train. With them they carried over eight tons of cameras and sound and electrical equipment which were unpacked at the field.

It was one of the most complete "miniature studios" ever set up on a location site, and included apparatus for developing and printing film, so that the director could see the "rushes" of scenes right on the flying field.

On the Same Film Three Times

Doran H. Cox, because he is at present serving as assistant to Rowland V. Lee, who is directing "The Three Musketeers" for Radio Pictures, becomes something of an historical figure—he is the sole connecting link between three film versions that have been made of the Dumas classic.

Cox was also assistant-director to Charles Swickard in 1914, when the latter guided Orin Johnston through the rôle of d'Artagnan. That first adaptation was a Thomas Ince three-reel super production—made without benefit of lights.

When Douglas Fairbanks swash-buckled and fought in the romantic story, some years later, Cox was again assistant-director—this time to Fred Niblo.

Cox's third participation in the colourful doings of the Musketeers in seventeenth-century France is consequently tinged with tradition and sentiment. He treads familiar ground and walks in familiar places. The Broadway actor, Walter Abel, now plays the redoubtable d'Artagnan; Paul Lukas

"THE CALL OF THE SAVAGE"

Starring Noah Beery, Jun., and Dorothy Short.

is Athos; Moroni Olsen, also of the New York stage, is Porthos, and Onslow Stevens is Aramis, Margot Graham is Milady de Winter, and Heather Angel is Constance. Others in the cast are Ralph Forbes, Nigel de Brulier, John Qualen, Murray Kimmell, Lunsden Hare, and Miles Mander.

Risking Their Lives

Making motion pictures, frequently has its hazards and thrills for the cameraman as well as the actors. Roy Davidson and Harry Perry, special-effects photographers, not only had to wear parachutes, but were strapped into the open cockpit of their camera-plane when filming "Death Flies East"—the story of which appeared last week.

Because of the clouds hanging over Southern California, the exterior views of the passenger plane had to be filmed at eight to ten thousand feet above the Sierra Mountains. Davidson and Perry were swathed in heavy wraps and gloves while facing the screeching north wind at that altitude in an open aeroplane. Now and then the clouds broke away, showing the rugged, snow-clad ranges of the Sierras through fleecy, cloud-framed holes below.

In Foggiest Hollywood

During the height of the summer, when Hollywood was sweltering in a heat-wave, Samuel Goldwyn was making "Barbary Coast," and the players had to endure an artificial fog as well as the intense heat.

The set, representing the San Francisco waterfront, was pitched under a huge canvas roof. It was hot and stuffy from the combined effects of the brass sun and the big lights, and the atmosphere was filled with fog made by atomising a specially prepared oil. The air was so thick that it was difficult to see what was going on, whilst the oily dampness necessitated frequent stops for make-up repairs.

The players, including Miriam Hopkins in the leading rôle, spent their spare time devising new methods of torture for the script writer, technicians, director, and producer!

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

Big Mike's son was too sure of himself, perhaps because Lady Luck had smiled on him all his life. But there came a day when his nerve and his confidence failed him, and it was then that his rugged father proved his finest friend. A top-flight drama of pilots in the making, starring Wallace Beery and Robert Young

Pioneer Pilot

DURING the year 1910 the military encampment at Randolph Field, outside the city of San Antonio, had become the headquarters of aviation in America.

Here men risked their lives in the frail, new-fangled machines that had earned the sardonic nicknames of "crates" and "flying coffins." Here they devoted themselves fearlessly to the development and exploitation of a contrivance that was still in its hazardous infancy.

Here, like the gods of some ancient saga, they took unto themselves the wings of a bird and soared towards the heavens—carrying the traditions of the Army into this youngest branch of the Service.

One of the greatest of those early pioneers was Lieutenant Kelly, and on a certain spring morning, when conditions were not altogether admirable for his purpose, Lieutenant Kelly might have been seen preparing to make an ascent.

The machine which he was to take up was a Curtiss "pusher" biplane, a spidery affair that looked as if it would scarcely hold itself together once it was off the ground. But at that time it was a thoroughly up-to-date craft, and ranked high in the estimation of flying men.

It was certainly an object of wonder and admiration to three youngsters who were gazing upon it just then. One of these children was a girl, the other two were boys, and their presence at Randolph Field was explained by the fact that they belonged to a couple of the men stationed there.

The girl was Skip Carter, and the smaller of the boys was her brother Phil.

They were the daughter and the son of Captain Carter, one of the officers at the military post.

The third youngster was known as Mike Stone—Little Mike Stone, to distinguish him from his father, Big Mike Stone, who was a corporal, and something of a character.

Big Mike Stone loomed up impressively as the children were about to take too lively an interest in the craft that they were contemplating, and he addressed them in gruff, deep-toned, but kindly, accents.

"Hey," he said, "hey, you kids, don't you start climbin' all over that ship, now. Don't you know that the lieutenant is just goin' up and everything has gotta be in order?"

The three youngsters retreated, and were standing well clear of the plane when Lieutenant Kelly showed up with Captain Carter and one or two other officers.

Kelly and Carter had been friends all their lives, and for that matter Big Mike Stone had also been a close companion of theirs when they had all been recruits in the Army. But Kelly and Carter had had the advantage of a superior education and had risen to the rank of officers, whereas rough-and-ready Mike was no higher than a non-com., and probably never would be.

Not that this made any difference to the captain and the lieutenant when they were out of uniform. They still regarded Mike as their friend—the best friend a man could possibly have, for they knew the sterling qualities that existed under his simple, downright exterior.

A heart as big as his hulking body, and a nature as lovable as his genial face was ugly. That was Big Mike Stone.

The corporal saluted as the officers came up, and Kelly and Carter returned the salute smilingly. Then the lieutenant laid eyes on the three children nearby and promptly went over to them, singling out Big Mike's son, who was a great favourite with him.

"Wish me luck, Little Mike," Kelly said.

Looking on with a grin, Big Mike felt someone touch him on the arm, and as he glanced round he saw the wiry figure of one Joe Bags, who was also a corporal.

Now, Joe Bags was possessed of a mania. That mania was the study of astrology, and he was forever consulting a handbook which dealt with the subject, a volume that was easily his most prized possession.

"I don't like it, Mike," he whispered luskily. "The book says that this is a bad day fer takin' any kind of chances. The evil planet Saturn is in conjunction with Venus, which is liable to make things plenty tough."

Big Mike looked at Joe with scorn.

"Ah, you an' your star gazin', you make me sick," he growled. "I don't believe in that punk."

Joe Bags shook his head in gloomy fashion, and was about to make some comment when Captain Carter's voice was heard giving out instructions. Immediately the two corporals jumped to action, and soon they and a whole crew of soldiers were fussing around the Curtiss "pusher."

With everything in readiness for the flight, Lieutenant Kelly climbed into the plane, seating himself on two stunts at the front of the machine, and planting his feet in a pair of stirrups that were clamped to a crosspiece beneath him.

To a modern pilot he would have looked incongruously exposed, but there were no enclosed, well-constructed compartments in the flying vessels of those early days.

The engine was started up. It was a water-cooled unit at the rear of the craft, and it coughed fumes and spat flame from its exhaust as Kelly opened the throttle. Presently, however, its note became steadier, and suddenly the ship was on the move.

Watched by Carter and the captain's fellow-officers and men, the pioneer pilot dove the machine across the flying field. Then he swung around to take off into the wind, and, after it had taxied rapidly over the turf for some little distance, the craft lifted clear of the grass and rose towards the Texas sky.

It circled higher and yet higher, then turned in a northerly direction, and it was passing above the field at an altitude of several hundred feet when the engine began to misfire.

Away below, Carter and the onlookers heard the stutter of that engine, and an expression of intense anxiety dawned in the captain's eyes.

"He's having trouble with the motor!" he jerked. "See, he's losing height. Pray God he's able to keep control, but this wind is going to hamper him?"

In the background, Joe Bags pursed his lips and let his hand stray to his hip pocket, where the book on astrology reposed. The evil planet Saturn in conjunction with Venus! And yet Big Mike Stone called the study of the stars "a lot of punk."

White-faced, the men on the field stared up at the sky and followed the uncertain motion of the Curtiss plane with agitated gaze. Would Kelly be able to handle it? Would he?

And then all at once the engine spluttered feebly and faded out; and next instant the craft was diving earthward in a swift, ugly spin, plunging to disaster in the field which it had bravely left a few minutes before.

It crashed at the north end of the encampment, and, when they gained the wreckage, the men who had come running from all directions knew that aviation and the struggle for progress had claimed one more gallant life.

That night Big Mike Stone soothed his little son to sleep, for the boy was old enough to understand what had happened—and to realise he would never again see the Lieutenant Kelly whom he had loved so dearly, loved better than anyone except his father.

It was shortly after slumber had at last silenced the youngster's weeping that Big Mike was asked to report to Captain Carter, and, when he appeared in the latter's quarters, his superior laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Mike," the captain said, dropping all formalities, "you and I have had our share of grief. We both lost our wives within a few months of each other—and now we've lost our greatest friend."

Mike nodded his big head. He was numb with emotion, choked by a lump in the throat.

"Mike," Carter went on, "I'm aware what Kelly intended to do for your boy. He was as fond of that youngster of yours as he could have been of his own flesh and blood. He was going to help you send him to West Point Military Academy, wasn't he?"

"Yes," the corporal answered huskily. "Well, your boy's still going there," Carter said. "You've got to let me help you as Kelly would have helped you. I know you've got ambitions for your son and, if it's only a question of the expense, those ambitions are going to be fulfilled."

August 17th, 1935.

Football Hero

THE years had slipped by and, thanks to the financial assistance that Captain Carter had rendered his father, those passing years had treated little Mike Stone with wondrous kindness.

High school, college, and then West Point—this was his career in a nutshell—and at each of the three institutions he had earned honours as a student and an athlete. But to-day was the day of days, this crisp, keen day in the month of January. For to-day he was representing the great military academy in the biggest football game of the season, the match against the Navy.

Up on the packed terraces of the college arena a hundred thousand wild enthusiasts were yelling themselves hoarse, and a hundred thousand pairs of eyes were focused with eager intensity on the teams which were battling for the mastery down there on the pitch.

The game was nearing its end, a game as memorable and thrilling as any that had ever been played at the vast bowl in Orange County, State of New York. There were only a few more minutes to go, and the issue was still in doubt.

In a couple of seats overlooking the midfield you might have seen two fans who had a personal interest in the sporting event which was in progress. One of them was Big Mike Stone, older-looking and even bulkier-looking than he had been in the early days of aviation, but then many changes had taken place since the year 1910.

The Randolph Field down in Texas, for instance, was no longer a rough cantonment with a collection of sheds that housed a few crazy planes. It was a magnificent aerodrome, proud of its equipment, its squadrons of heavy bombers and swift scouting machines that could darken the air like a cloud of locusts when flying in mass formation. It was, moreover, the foremost instructional depot of the U.S. Army for would-be pilots.

And Big Mike Stone, a sergeant now, was one of its chief instructors.

But to return to the scene of the West Point versus Navy game—Big Mike was seated next to Skip Carter, grown to lovely young womanhood, and the pair of them were almost frenzied with excitement. Indeed, Big Mike had reached the pitch of interfering with the comfort of the other spectators immediately around him, and at a particularly critical moment of the match he had to apologise to a girl behind him—having leaped to his feet, lost his balance, and blundered against her.

"I'm sorry, lady," he gasped. "Sorta—sorta carried away. That's my boy out there, you see. Mike Stone—Little Mike, we call him—Number Fourteen."

The girl smiled understandingly. Her name was Dare Marshall, and she was a typical daughter of fashionable New York, beautifully dressed and astonishingly attractive, though her features, nevertheless, lacked the winsome appeal of pretty Skip Carter's.

"Little Mike Stone?" she echoed cheerfully, raising her voice above the hubbub to make herself audible to the burly sergeant. "He doesn't look so little to me—especially after the way he's been throwing those Navy gorillas about."

"He ain't so little as that," Big Mike answered with a grin. "He's taller than me now, an' turns the scales at a hundred and eighty pounds; but we've always called him Little Mike, an' I guess we always will."

"Well, you've certainly got reason to be proud of him," Dare Marshall said, glancing towards the field and singling out a padded stalwart who wore the number 14 on his back. "He's been the mainstay of the West Point team up till now."

She was right, and even as she stated that opinion it was borne out by a sudden break-away dash which Stone Junior made.

The ball had come to young Mike from Phil Carter, also in the West Point team, and like a hound slipping its leash the sergeant's son made for the opposing line.

One hundred thousand people scrambled to their feet en masse—one hundred thousand people minus one, for, despite his bulk, Big Mike Stone was knocked on his back by a large, fat woman who sprang up with a shriek of excitement and cannoned into him as he himself was in the act of rising.

Big Mike spent the next thirty seconds in searching for his hat and in trying to shield himself from the stamping, trampling feet of his neighbours. He did not see the glorious run staged by his son—the swift, swerving cut-through that baffled man after man and carried the youngster to his objective.

It was a run that ended with Little Mike lying between the Navy's goal-posts and a trail of prone and defeated opponents marking the course that he had taken, but by the time that Big Mike managed to stand up every man on the field was on his feet again, and the ball was being carried back to be placed for the kick.

The crowd was still in a hilarious uproar, and Big Mike had to bellow at Skip Carter before she could hear him.

"What happened?" he shouted in frantic tones. "What happened?"

"Mike scored!" Skip shrilled in response. "He's won the game for West Point! Even if the touch-down isn't converted, West Point's won!"

The kick was now being taken and, propelled by a studded boot, the ball soared clean between the Navy's posts to increase the margin of the soldier-cadets' victory. A split second afterwards the whistle went for time, though it was almost drowned by the thunderous cheering of the spectators.

With the players trotting off the field a rush was made for the goal-posts by mobs of West Point's supporters and, these posts having been torn out of the ground, they were borne off in triumph. Then the laughing, jostling crowds on the terraces began to pour down the gangways to the exits.

Escorting Skip Carter down one of the lanes between the rows of seats, Big Mike Stone suddenly felt someone touch him on the shoulder, and as he looked round he saw the girl who had been sitting behind him during the match.

"I'm awfully glad to have met the father of a football hero," she said merrily.

"Come to the Lido Restaurant to-night, an' you'll meet the hero himself," Big Mike declared in a hearty tone. "The teams are congregatin' there!"

He saluted her with a smile, and some time later he and Skip were outside the dressing-rooms of the players. Here Big Mike left his companion to seek out his son and, just across the threshold, he ran into Phil Carter, who was stripping off his begrimed football kit.

Phil's father was with him—General Carter now—and one or two other senior officers of the Service were standing round.

"Hallo, there, sergeant!" the general exclaimed. "Say, that was a great game your boy played."

He turned and introduced the grinning Mike to a bluff Army man who was among the party of officers.

"Oh, General Devens," he said, "may I present Sergeant Stone? It was his son who won the game for West Point to-day."

Mike had taken off his cap. He stood stiffly to attention as General Devens smilingly acknowledged the introduction and congratulated him on his boy's fine display. Then Little Mike was seen emerging from one of the showers, a magnificent specimen of young manhood, his wet hair hanging into his clear, grey eyes, his bronzed face lighting up as he saw his dad amongst the group of officers.

Accompanied by General Devens and three or four of the party, Big Mike moved across to his son as the latter was briskly towelling himself, and the officers began to praise the youngster un stintingly, in a manner that might well have turned his youthful head.

"It was a great performance, Stone," Devens declared finally, "and I guess your father is mighty proud of you."

Little Mike smiled and turned to his parent.

"What did you think of the game, dad?" he asked.

"Aw, it was fair," the older man said with enforced coolness. "Pretty fair."

"Go on," his son challenged genially. "I'll bet you yelled yourself hoarse."

Big Mike's face expanded into a broad grin again.

"Yeah, I did, too!" he croaked.

There was a concerted laugh, and then, feeling that the sergeant and his boy might like to be alone, General Devens and the other men drifted off. When they had gone, Big Mike watched his boy gathering his football kit together, and presently indicated the crash-helmet that the youngster had worn on the field.

"You'll be swappin' that for a flying helmet in a month or two, when you graduate from West Point," he said, with a twinkle in his eye. "By that time I reckon you'll be so swollen-headed that you'll need a bigger size, huh!"

"What do you think?" Little Mike asked with a chuckle.

"I ain't paid to think," his father answered whimsically, "but I'll tell you what I'll do. If you come down to Randolph Field with any high an' mighty ideas after you're through with West Point—well, I'll hammer 'em out of you, see?"

"Okay, dad!" Little Mike agreed in a light-hearted tone. "But, changing the subject, don't forget our date at the Lido to-night, with Skip and Phil."

His father assured him that nothing could stop him from being there, and that evening he and Little Mike, together with General Carter's son and daughter, were among the diners at the fashionable Lido Restaurant.

It was as they were toasting West Point's victory that two people approached their table, one being Dare Marshall, the other a man of forty-five who was her escort.

"Hallo, there!" the girl said to Big Mike. "How about that promise of yours?"

Big Mike rose to his feet as he recognised her.

"Promise?" he said. "Promise?"

"Sure, you told me that I'd meet the hero of the big game here to-night," Dare reminded him.

"Oh, yeah," the sergeant answered with a grin. "Er—Mike, this is Miss—Miss—"

"Dare Marshall," put in the girl from New York. "Miss Dare Marshall."

She was introduced to the rest of the party, and then presented her escort, who was apparently a relative. These formalities over, Little Mike urged the new acquaintances to join the party, and summoned a waiter to fetch a couple of chairs.

Indeed, Little Mike seemed to have been impressed by Dare Marshall at first sight, and was soon paying her a good deal of attention, entering into an animated conversation with her and dancing with her two or three times, to the music of a live-wire band.

His interest in Dare caused him to be a little neglectful towards Skip, who was sitting on the other side of him, and the younger girl began to look as if she were not exactly enjoying herself. Youthfully and sweetly unsophisticated, she found that she could not keep Little Mike's attention against the rivalry of Dare Marshall's presence, Dare Marshall who was worldly wise, who knew how to use her charms, who was obviously making a "dead-set" at the West Point cadet—perhaps because it pleased her vanity to be in the company of a celebrity.

For to-night, at least, young Mike Stone was a celebrity—a handsome, twenty-six-year-old idol of the football public.

Sometimes the youngster would remember Skip and begin some conversation with her, but always he was diverted from her by some interruption made by Dare, and Skip would fall meekly silent again, toying helplessly with a crushed table-napkin.

In her heart she felt miserable. While they had been growing up, she and Little Mike had been sweethearts—not consciously, but as if through some tacit, instinctive understanding. And now Skip realised that she cared for him deeply.

She was suddenly aroused from her thoughts by the voice of Big Mike Stone. In response to some remark made by Dare Marshall's relative he was sheepishly confessing that he had not witnessed his son's brilliant achievement in the last minutes of the match.

It was a statement which was received with surprise and amusement. Then Dare volunteered a suggestion.

"Let's go to a picture house," she proposed. "It's only eight o'clock, and the game will be shown on the news-reels."

The idea was unanimously approved, and, having paid their bill, the party repaired to the nearest cinema, where they sat down just as a record of the big game was being flashed on the screen.

Various incidents of the match were re-lived, and then came the moment when Little Mike had made his glorious run.

Experiencing again the excitement he had felt at the actual arena, Big Mike saw the ball come to his son from Phil Carter—and that was as much as he saw, for at this juncture a number of people in the row before him decided to leave their seats, having apparently witnessed that part of the programme already.

"Go on," Little Mike challenged genially, "I'll bet you yelled yourself hoarse."

They stood up and completely blocked Big Mike's view. As they fussed and fidgeted before him, waiting while other patrons were rising to give them a clear exit, the burly sergeant made vain efforts to catch a glimpse of the screen between their shifting figures.

"Hey, move on!" he complained. "Move along, please! Aw, sit down, then, can't you?"

He rapidly waxed wrathful and impatient. He could hear the voice of a commentator coming over the sound-track, but could see not a thing for those cursed people who were in front of him, and when at length they passed from the line of his vision the film was blackening out.

"Well, what did you think of it?" Dare Marshall asked him, from the end of the row.

"I guess I'll have to read about it in the morning papers," Big Mike growled dismally.

They left a few minutes afterwards, and outside the picture house Mike Senior explained that he and Skip would have to be going.

"We've got to catch that Texas train," he said, "and General Carter will be waiting for us at the station. He's going straight there from General Devens' quarters."

"Phil and I will trail along to the station with you," Little Mike announced; but Dare Marshall laid a hand on his arm appealingly.

"Oh, must we all split up?" she protested. "The night's young, and Uncle George and I are going along to the contest club. We're meeting some friends there—an awfully jolly crowd. You'd like them, and we'd love to have you and Phil come along."

Young Mike looked at his father and at Skip, and it was the latter who answered his questioning glance.

"Sure, you and Phil go along with Miss Marshall and her uncle," she said in a small voice. "There—there really isn't any need for you to come to the station with us."

Big Mike nodded. "That's right," he stated. "You two boys enjoy yourselves some more. And Mike—thanks for whipping the Navy."

A street-car hove into sight just then, and Big Mike signalled the motor-man. Then, as the vehicle drew up, he helped Skip aboard and climbed after her.

Standing on the rear platform of the car, Big Mike and Skip waved farewell to Phil, Little Mike, Dare Marshall and her uncle. They were still waving when Dare slipped her hand through young Mike's arm possessively.

"I'll take good care of him," the girl called to the two figures on the platform of the receding street-car.

Big Mike happened to glance at Skip. He noticed vaguely that her eyes were downcast, and that there was an odd little droop to her shoulders.

Airmen in the Making

TWO months had elapsed, and from the window of his quarters at Randolph Field, Big Mike Stone was gazing out across the extensive landing-ground.

There was a gleam in his eyes, for to-day he was expecting his son, young Mike, and a number of other cadets having graduated from West Point and been drafted to San Antonio for practical instruction in flying.

Already Phil Carter and most of the fellows from the northern military academy were present at the Texas aerodrome, but Little Mike had yet to put in an appearance.

August 17th, 1935.

Big Mike squared his shoulders and threw up his head. Then he addressed Joe Bags, who was seated at a table nearby, looking through the pages of a well-thumbed volume.

It was that self-same volume which dealt with the study of the stars, still Joe's favourite subject of discourse.

"Joe," Mike said, "it seems like yesterday that my boy an' Phil Carter an' Skip used to play around the collection of shanties that was once Randolph Field."

"Yeah, there's been a lot o' changes around here since then," Joe Bags commented.

"You're right," Big Mike declared. "We've gone a long way since poor Kelly crashed in that ole pusher 'plane. While those kids have been growin' up, aviation has grown up as well. Only, in the case of aviation, every inch of progress has been made by sacrifice."

"You sound like the general talkin'," Joe remarked facetiously.

Mike was about to offer some gruff retort when the note of a 'plane's motor reached his ears through the open window. A moment later he was fixing his attention on a commercial 'plane that was approaching the aerodrome.

It was flying low, but on drawing closer to Randolph Field it proceeded to go through a series of movements that caused Mike's face to harden. In other words, the civilian pilot in charge of it began to give an exhibition of crazy stunt flying that was not likely to be appreciated by the personnel of an army depot—men who could put a craft through the whole gamut of aerobatics, but who had been disciplined to do so at a reasonable altitude, and to avoid endangering lives or property.

"Look at that passenger outfit!" Mike snarled. "Say, if I had my way some of these civil flyers would be lynched."

He continued to glare at the offending 'plane until it grounded on the field a short distance from his quarters. He was still glaring when its pilot and a solitary passenger emerged from it, but his expression changed as he recognised the passenger as his son.

Meanwhile, the advent of the cabin 'plane had been witnessed by a group of people which included Skip and Phil Carter, General Carter and a Captain Cannon, the latter being chief instructor at the aerodrome, and, as Little Mike and the commercial pilot emerged from the machine, the general advanced towards them with a darkening brow.

He was followed by Captain Cannon, and the pair of them confronted the civilian aviator.

"A man like you has no business to be carrying a licence!" General Carter ground out. "What do you mean by flying over this aerodrome in that fool-hardy fashion? Do you realise that the slightest misjudgment on your part may have damaged Government property or caused loss of life?"

The pilot of the cabin 'plane had begun to look abashed, and young Mike Stone made haste to volunteer a statement.

"I'm afraid it was my fault, sir," he explained. "I persuaded this man—"

"Then he should have known better than to let himself be persuaded," the general cut in tersely, "particularly by someone so lacking in consideration for others or respect for the Service."

Young Mike was silent, and General Carter turned to the commercial pilot.

"Get your ship out of here," he ordered curtly. "I'll report this matter to the proper authorities, and at least see that you are never allowed to land on this field again."

The civilian airman climbed back into his machine, and a few seconds later he was taking off, General Carter then switching his attention upon Mike again.

He had done much for the youngster; he had been a second father to him, and he was almost as fond of him as he was of his own son. But he did not intend to let sentiment or favouritism influence him.

"Lieutenant Stone," he rapped out, "I want you to understand that flying rules are made to be obeyed, for they save men's lives. By urging that commercial aviator to indulge in an exhibition of aerobatics, you violated those rules."

"Yes, sir," Mike said humbly. "I warn you, Lieutenant Stone," the general went on. "If you don't learn to obey regulations here, I'll wash you out just as I would any other member of the Force. Is that clear?"

"Yes, sir," the younger man breathed.

General Carter left him, walking off with Captain Cannon, and when they had gone Phil and Skip came forward to welcome Mike.

"Gee," the latter gasped, "I certainly made your dad blow up. I wouldn't upset him for the world. I just didn't think—"

"Aw, forget it," cut in Phil, a big, brown-haired fellow of hearty mien. "The Old Man will get over his tantrums. C'mon and I'll show you your quarters."

Accompanied by Skip, he conducted Mike, Junior, to the rooms he was to occupy, and, after an appreciative glance around, the new arrival set down a valise with which he had stepped out of the cabin 'plane.

"Shall I help you to unpack, Mike?" Skip suggested.

"Young lady," Mike said with pretended severity, "you're not even supposed to be in my quarters. It's against regulations."

"The general's daughter is above regulations," Skip answered laughingly. "Phil, you've got your own unpacking to do, haven't you? All right, you run along and I'll give 'Lieutenant' Michael Stone a hand."

Phil departed, and Mike proceeded to unlock the valise. As he opened it, Skip saw a photograph lying on the top of his clothing, and on picking it up she recognised the features of Dare Marshall.

"Oh!" she said involuntarily.

"Nice, isn't it?" Mike commented. "I was tickled to death when she gave it to me. We've been seeing a lot of each other—"

He paused, and then: "You're not jealous, are you?" he asked banteringly.

"I—jealous?" Skip retorted in a gay tone, though her heart felt leaden. "How did you ever get conceited enough to imagine that I was sweet on you?"

"I just can't pick a quarrel with you, can I?" Mike chuckled. "Say, where's the best place to put a pretty girl's picture?"

Skip suggested the mantelpiece, and presently the photograph was gracing the shelf. Then Mike produced one of Skip herself, and this was also set in a conspicuous position.

Skip left Mike's quarters a few minutes later, and she had not long been gone when the youngster's father opened the door and stepped across the threshold. He looked pretty grim, and did not return the beaming smile with which his son greeted him.

"Why did you have to come down by 'plane?" the older man grated.

"Why?" the lieutenant exclaimed. "There's no harm in a would-be pilot getting used to the air, is there?"

"Yeah, and somebody's liable to give you the air around here if you're not careful," Big Mike snarled. "I understand it was you who put that commercial aviator up to all that crazy flyin' over the aerodrome."

"So what?"

"So what?" the irate father stormed. "Listen to me, if you don't line up with the regulations of the Service I'll—"

"Wait a minute, wait a minute," young Mike interrupted. "You seem to forget that you're addressing a superior officer."

The big sergeant's face coloured wrathfully.

"Don't you come that superior officer stuff with me," he blazed. "I—"

But again his son interrupted him, this time laying an affectionate hand on his shoulder.

"Aw, dad, I'm only pulling your leg," he said. "But don't bawl me out, anyway. I'll be a good guy from now on—honest, I will."

"See that you do," Big Mike growled, somewhat appeased, and then, gradually softening, he began to tell the youngster how glad he was to see him.

"But say," he added, "I almost forgot. The new draft is paradin' before the general, and you're wanted out there along with the rest. Get into your uniform, and make it snappy."

Young Mike hurriedly changed from civilian clothes, and ten minutes later, when General Carter appeared on the parade ground to give a brief address to the new officers, the former football hero of West Point was standing in the front file.

The general formally welcomed the cadets to Randolph Field, and then proceeded to give them some sound advice.

"If we appear severe in regard to our regulations," he told them, "remember that since the Wright Brothers first flew from Kitty Hawk, many fine and courageous men have given their lives to advance flying to its present state—and for that reason the lessons that they have passed on cannot be ignored."

He paused, and drew back a pace.

"Good luck to each and every one of you," he finished, and carried his hand to the peak of his cap as the West Point graduates saluted him smartly.

The general's address preceded a series of rigorous tests through which the cadets were put in order to ascertain whether they were suitable for the Force. In the first place there was a medical test, followed by the examination of eyes and mouths by a military oculist and a military dentist.

"A fine set of teeth, lieutenant," young Mike was told by the aerodrome's dental surgeon.

"Do you have to chew your way through this outfit?" Mike inquired jocularly.

The jest was not appreciated. Indeed, Mike's free-and-easy, cocksure manner had not gone down well with the other specialists who had looked him over, much as they had admired his physical qualities.

The next step in the programme was rather more interesting, the cadets being confronted with an intricate and sensitive machine which measured their resistance to distraction. Then they were taken to a room where each in turn had to occupy a contraption which was made to rock to and fro, to spin completely over and to describe all manner of evolutions calculated to produce giddiness and sickness, if the victim were in the least susceptible to such complaints.

Young Mike Stone came through these tests with flying colours. Yet he was nevertheless the subject of a heart-to-heart talk between his father and General Carter, when the latter had scanned the reports tendered by the men who were responsible for carrying out the examinations.

"Sergeant," the general began, as Big Mike appeared in response to a message requesting his presence in the commanding officer's quarters, "Sergeant, I'm putting you in charge of a party of the West Point students. Lieutenants Stone and Carter will be among that party. Er—I know I can rely on you to make flyers out of every one of them, if they have the right stuff in them."

"I'll do my best, sir."

The general stood up, and, dropping all formalities, he spoke to Big Mike as man to man.

"Let's forget the discipline of the Service for a moment," he said earnestly.

"Listen, Mike, according to the reports your boy has the makings of a splendid pilot. But I understand he's inclined to be pretty cocky and self-assured. Things come a little too easy for him, I'm thinking."

Big Mike puffed his lips.

"If cocksureness is his trouble, I'll see that it's taken out of him," he stated grimly.

"I know you will," the general said. "And Mike, do the same for my boy if he shows any signs of going over the traces. So far as your rank of sergeant-instructor permits you, keep a tight rein on him. I want no favouritism, and if he doesn't measure up to our standards here—I expect you to recommend his transfer."

"I understand, sir," the big fellow answered. "If any one of those boys don't pass muster with me—they're as good as out, sir."

Riding the Clouds

DURING the days that followed, Big Mike Stone took his pupils in hand and lectured them diligently.

One of his first concerns was to familiarise them with the handling of a parachute, and in characteristic style he described the method of using this device.

"If you have to jump," he impressed on them, "don't pull the rip cord till you're clear of the machine. And listen, if any emergency should ever crop up while you're undergoing your training, always remember that your instructor jumps last."

His next job was to explain fully the controls of a 'plane, and he first of all singled out a youngster named Pettis, who had scraped through the preliminary tests rather doubtfully.

"Get into the forward cockpit of that crate over there," he ordered, indicating a machine that was standing in one of the hangars.

Pettis obeyed him, and Big Mike clambered into the rear compartment, the other students looking on.

"You see the stick?" the sergeant said to Pettis. "Okay, put it back. Right. Now you understand what happens. That raises the flippers and makes the nose climb. The ship goes right up, see."

"Now push the stick forward," he went on. "That makes her dive."

Pettis nodded, and so did the other pupils. Then Big Mike continued the lesson.

"Now shift the stick from side to side. You see those flaps moving on the wings? They're called ailerons, and in operating them by means of the stick you can make the crate bank. You turn to right or left—see?"

Day by day the routine of lectures and practical instruction was carried out. And one by one Big Mike took his pupils into the air and coached them, his hand always ready to operate the dual control lever if they made a mistake. But the majority of the youngsters were fairly rapid learners, and progressed satisfactorily.

The only exception was Pettis. He seemed unable to make a showing, and in the end Big Mike was compelled to advise his transfer to another arm of the Service.

Pettis was summoned before a council of senior officers, over whom General Carter presided.

"Sergeant Stone reports that the headwork of Lieutenant Pettis is very poor," the general said, reading from a document in front of him. "He is constantly skidding, slipping, ignoring other traffic completely—a source of danger to himself and others. Therefore Sergeant Stone has been forced to recommend elimination."

He looked up at Pettis and laid aside the paper.

"I'm sorry, lieutenant," he observed. Pettis made his way from the room, and outside he was met by a group of his fellow-students. They eyed him with mute inquiry.

"Eliminated," he said huskily. "I guess—I guess I'm for the infantry."

His comrades consoled with him, knowing what a bitter disappointment the youngster must have suffered. Yet Pettis was more or less resigned, for he had realized that he would never make a flyer.

The rest of the student-officers said farewell to him the following day, and an hour after his departure they were in the capable hands of Big Mike again. He made no reference to Pettis, but grudgingly informed his pupils that he was fairly satisfied with the progress they had made. Then he selected his son for a test flight.

"I'm taking you up with me to-day again," he said.

Now the previous afternoon he had made this same statement to Phil Carter, and, once in the air, had tossed out the dual control-stick and commanded his protégé to operate the craft.

Phil had been up with him a number of times previously and had managed pretty well, although he had known all along that his instructor could take over immediately if he made any blunder. The realization that he could depend only on himself had shaken him for the moment, but he had felt mighty proud when he had landed the machine safely.

Was it now Big Mike's intention to put his son through that same ordeal?

This question was occupying Little Mike's thoughts while a plane was being made ready, but, far from the prospect being an ordeal, the youngster saw in it a means of "putting one over" on his father, and he contrived to smuggle a spare joystick into the ship with him when he entered the rear cockpit.

Big Mike climbed into the forward compartment, and presently the plane was taking off from the landing ground.

August 17th 1935.

With the wind whistling in its struts it climbed higher and yet higher, and it had attained a height of several thousand feet when the sergeant quietly dismantled the stick on which his fingers had been resting.

He turned and held it up to his son, then pitched it overboard.

"Now ground the plane all by yourself," he said with a grim smile. "You ought to be able to by now."

Little Mike returned the smile. Beneath the cowl of the rear cockpit he was grasping the genuine lever on which the manipulation of the machine now solely depended. But in his free hand he was clutching the spare stick that he had smuggled into the craft, and, still smiling, he held this up to his father before tossing it after the instrument which the older man had "jettisoned."

The spare stick followed the first one, falling away through several thousand feet of empty air. And Big Mike watched it, agape with horror, believing that the ship was now without any means of control.

For a moment the sergeant could not speak. Then he found his voice and gave vent to a wild bellow.

"Jump!" he roared, and in a panic he scrambled over the side, hurling himself from the machine and pulling the rip-cord of the chute he was wearing.

The folds of the safety device billowed out, and at an arrested momentum Big Mike began to drift earthward. Flying above him, his son gazed after him with amusement for a few seconds and then proceeded to follow him down, quite confident of his ability to land the plane.

His confidence in himself was not misplaced. He was safely on the ground when Big Mike reached terra firma near the north end of the field, and he had stepped out of the craft by the time that his irate and discomfited parent disentangled himself from the parachute and blundered across to him.

Big Mike had not far to walk, for the youngster had landed fairly close to the locality whither the older man had been drifting.

Marching up to his son, the sergeant-instructor brushed past him and glared into the rear cockpit to see the genuine control-stick still in its place. Then he swung around on the grinning student-officer.

"I suppose you think that was funny!" he snarled.

"Aw, can't you take a joke, dad?" Little Mike chuckled. "I was only clowning."

"Clowning!" Big Mike breathed. "The United States Government don't run this place for clowns. I oughta see that you're washed out—that's what I oughta do."

"But you won't, dad, will you?" his son said gently.

Big Mike's face was working, but the stormy passion within him was a fire that would soon die down, quenched by his sheer good nature and his love for his boy.

"Well, maybe I won't this time," he grumbled. "But one more trick like that an' I'll—I'll— Aw, get out of here before I forget myself."

The First Casualty

THREE or four nights after he had been flying solo, young Mike Stone entered his quarters to find a girl waiting for him—a girl whom he recognised with an exclamation of astonishment and joy.

"Dare!" he ejaculated breathlessly. "How did you get in here?"

"Smuggled myself in," she answered with a smile. "I told you, Mike, that I'd be down here the first vacation I got, and I'll be staying in San Antonio for a month. Are you glad to see me?"

"Glad!" Mike announced hilariously. "Honey, I'll say I'm glad!"

He took her in his arms and kissed her, and he was still clasping her when a knock on the door interrupted them. Next moment his father appeared on the threshold, and, seeing the youngster's visitor, the big sergeant-instructor checked abruptly.

Then his face seemed to darken, and he glowered at his son ominously.

"You know it's against the regulations to have women here in your quarters," he ground out.

"Aw, take it easy, dad," young Mike retorted. "Skip's been here, hasn't she?"

"Skip's different," the older man rasped. "She's privileged, and nobody ever saw her in a huggin' match like this. Let go of that dame and tell her to get out."

"Look here, dad," his son snapped, "you can't use that tone—"

Dare Marshall interrupted him sweetly.

"Oh, I can see your father's point of view, Mike!" she said. "Listen, Sergeant Stone, you don't have to worry. We'll be out of here in two shakes. I just dropped over to ask Mike if he could see me to-night."

She turned to the younger man again and proceeded to explain.

"Some friends of mine live in San Antonio," she told him. "They're throwing a party for me, and I'd like you to be there. Will you come along, Mike?"

"Say, listen," the lieutenant's father interrupted curtly, "Mike's not going anywhere to-night. The chief instructor is gonna take a peek at the new officers to-morrow morning, and my boy's got to have his wits clear—"

Once more young Mike swung around on his parent.

"Look here, that's about enough, dad," he jerked. "I'm free, white, and I've cut my teeth; and I don't need a nurse or a keeper. Dare, I'm ready to leave now, so let's get going."

He departed with her, and Big Mike was left to fume and rage impotently, cursing the name of Dare Marshall—and he had occasion to curse that name afresh the following morning, when he discovered that his son had not returned to his quarters.

Fearful lest young Mike should fail to answer to his name when called upon, the sergeant presented himself to Captain Cannon on the flying field as the chief instructor was preparing to watch the student-officers take the air.

The first man to be called upon was Phil Carter, and, showing signs of nervousness under the critical eyes of the captain, he entered a two-seater plane and taxied across the turf.

The machine rose from the ground and circled towards the sky, and after a short flight Phil Carter set her down again, coming in from the west over one of the buildings that flanked the field.

Now, a hundred yards to the east of that particular building, a carriage-way marked the edge of the actual landing ground. This was the main approach to the officer's quarters, and a smart-looking car had appeared on it as Phil was making his descent.

The car contained Dare Marshall and young Mike Stone, returning from a gay party that had been prolonged all through the night at the home of the girl's friends in San Antonio; and when Phil swooped over the building at the west side of the field he suddenly perceived the automobile directly in front of him.

Taking the line of Phil's descent, it was obvious that he must clear the roadway only by a few feet ere setting the machine down upon the landing field. It was equally plain that he must foul the car if he kept to his course.

Quick thought and action were needed. In that instant of emergency, however, Phil Carter's brain seemed benumbed. He should have opened the throttle and pulled back the stick—"given his craft the gun," as Big Mike Stone had said again and again in lecturing his pupils on how they should act if ever they found themselves balked during an attempt to land.

But Phil Carter's wits deserted him.

He acted in panic-stricken fashion and tried to bank, cleared the moving automobile all right, but at the cost of throwing his ship out of control. Tilting madly as it rushed above the heads of Dare and Little Mike, the plane scraped one wing on the ground beyond the carriage-way, and the contact was enough to hurl the ship into an ugly somersault.

The craft finished on her back with a wing and part of her landing gear buckled, and as she came to rest men streamed across the field, running to the aid of her pilot. But none ran so hard as Big Mike Stone, and he was first on the scene of the accident.

He saw the car which had figured in the occurrence. It had stopped, and his son was climbing out of it. Struggling towards him, Big Mike clutched him by the arm.

"Get to your quarters," he said fiercely. "Get yourself shaved and straightened up. Go on!"

White-faced, the young man stumbled off, unnoticed and unheeded except by Dare Marshall, whose features were also deathly pale. The crowd which was now assembling round the wreck of Phil Carter's plane had eyes only for a limp and insensible form lying trapped within one of the inverted cockpits.

Big Mike blundered back to the wreck, and as he reached it he saw Skip coming up. He tried to stop her from approaching, but she thrust past him and saw the body of her brother dragged from the overturned ship.

An aerodrome ambulance had arrived in the meantime, and Phil was borne away in it. As she watched the vehicle drive off with the injured man inside it, Skip leaned weakly against the plane in which he had crashed so disastrously.

Behind her groups of pilots were examining the wreck, unanimously declaring how lucky it was that the craft had not caught fire. Then Skip's father showed up.

His countenance looked drawn and haggard, but by sheer will-power he was able to keep a grip of himself.

"This is bad for the other students, captain," he told Cannon huskily. "Get them all into the air as quickly as you can. This thing mustn't be allowed to prey on their nerves."

Cannon looked at him, and there was admiration in the captain's eyes. The man who could learn that his son had met with a serious accident, and who could still think of his duty and the moral effect of the situation on others—that man was indeed a magnificent example to his fellows.

"Yes, sir," Captain Cannon answered, and within fifteen minutes the pupils of Big Mike Stone were going into the air. Little Mike being amongst their number.

The official inquiry into the cause of Phil Carter's accident had merely established the fact that the pilot, in crashing, had failed to meet a sudden emergency which was liable to occur at any hour of any day.

In a lecture-room at the aerodrome, however, Big Mike Stone took it upon himself to enlarge upon that bald, official statement, and before an assembly of his pupils he went to the length of illustrating his remarks by drawing a diagram on a blackboard.

"Now here's the position of the car," he said, "and this is the direction from which Lieutenant Carter was coming in for a landing. All right. When he saw the car he should have given his ship the gun and zoomed. Instead of that he lost his head and tipped it into a vertical bank, looking one wing. This rolled him up in a ball over here—"

He was interrupted by a hoarse exclamation from one of his listeners. The interrupter was his son.

"Phil is in hospital!" he cried out. "Dying, maybe. Yet you talk as if he were a piece of machinery, or an illustration!"

The sergeant looked at the rest of the junior officers, and then fixed his eyes on young Mike.

"We've gotta learn lessons from crashes," he said, "so that we can avoid crashes."

"But the whole thing was my fault," his son groaned. "It didn't come out at the inquiry, but if I hadn't got Dare Marshall to run me home from that all-night party the accident would never have happened."

Big Mike hit his lip.

"It just happened to be the car you were in, that's all," he said, logically enough. "In most cases the pilot is to blame—and in this case he was certainly to blame. The man who flies a ship must learn to think fast."

Little Mike was in no mood to listen to cold reasoning, and fifteen minutes later he was at the hospital where Phil Carter was lying. Here he was informed that he might see his friend for a few minutes, and a nurse escorted him to the private ward which the injured youngster was occupying.

Outside the door of the room the nurse paused.

"Don't mention his leg," she whispered. "He's in too weak a condition to be told yet that they've taken it off below the knee."

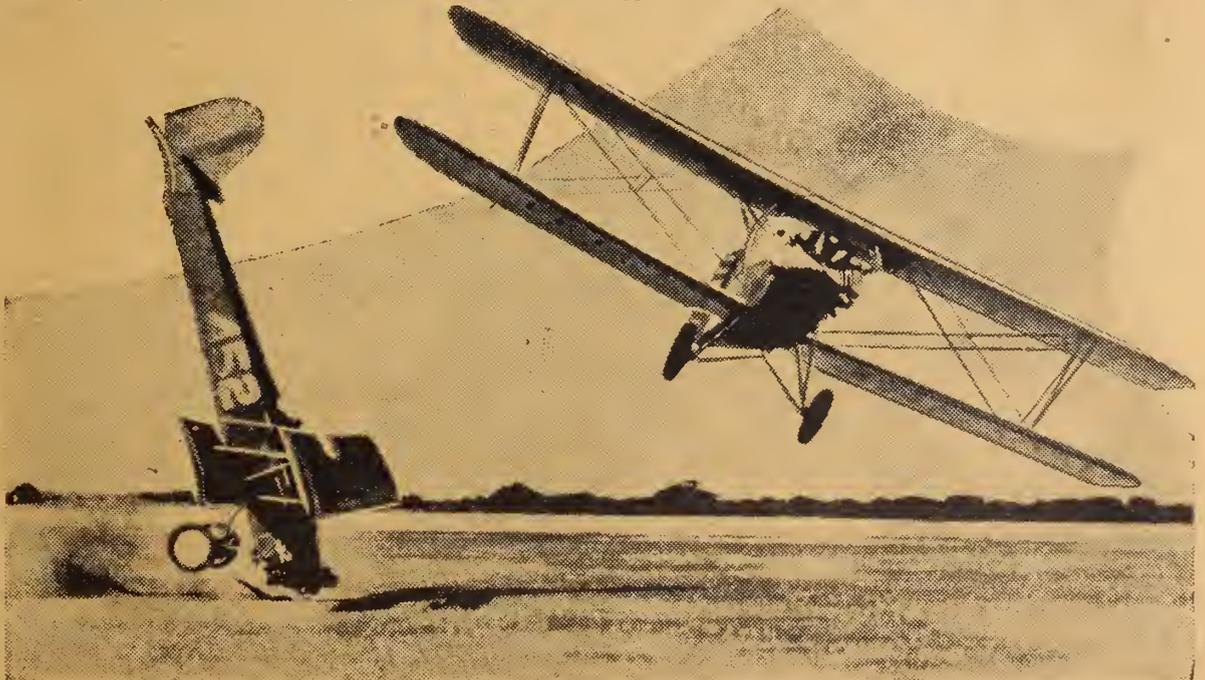

The blood in Mike's veins went cold, and his face turned ashen in hue.

"I—I didn't know," he said in a cracked voice.

"His sister is with him just now," the nurse went on. "But as you're a very close friend of the family—"

"Has—has Miss Carter been told," he interrupted, "that her brother won't—won't fly again?"

The nurse inclined her head, then opened the door of the private ward and stood aside for Mike to enter. As Jaskerelli's ship hurled itself into the ground nose-first, with terrific impact.

The sergeant raised a clenched fist. "Don't be a fool," he said fiercely, "and don't tell me that Big Mike Stone has gotta beat some manhood into his boy!"

he crossed the threshold he saw Phil lying in bed, with Skip bent over him.

"Hallo, Mike," Phil said gamely, conjuring up a smile.

"How are you feeling, old man?" Mike asked in a tremulous voice.

"Better than I did when I first came round," was the answer. "I'll be all right. Flying again inside a few weeks. You wait and see."

Mike and Skip exchanged a swift, anguished glance. There were tears glistening in Skip's eyes.

"Sure, Phil!" Mike managed to say. "You'll—you'll be all right."

There was a pause, and then all at once Phil Carter winced and uttered a half-stifled groan.

"My leg hurts—just below the knee," he breathed. "The left one— In an awkward position, I guess— Would you move it for me, Skip?"

His left leg was the one that had been amputated, and it was the pain of the operation that he was beginning to feel, an operation performed when he had still been insensible.

Skip looked at him in dismay, not knowing what to do or say. Then luckily the nurse entered, and, as Phil repeated his request, the woman made a pretence of shifting the leg for him—without removing the bedclothes, of course.

"There, that's better, isn't it?" she said.

"Yes, I—I think so," Phil rejoined weakly.

A minute or two later Mike and Skip left the ward, and, out in the corridor, the maimed lieutenant's sister burst into a fit of uncontrollable weeping.

Mike put a sympathetic arm around her and led her away from the door of her brother's room.

Ragged Nerves

PHIL CARTER'S crash continued to play on the mind of young Mike Stone in the days that followed, and, although he managed to convince himself that the fault had not been his, August 17th, 1925.

yet he felt that in a way he had been indirectly responsible.

It was a feeling that was not shared by others—least of all by Phil, who would have promptly disclaimed it. But every time he went to see his chum in hospital Mike came away with a heavy heart.

Meanwhile he and his fellow-students were being taught the more exacting features of 'plane control, and one afternoon they were again mustered for the purpose of showing Captain Cannon what progress they had made.

Out on the flying field, just prior to going up, Mike was accosted by his father and Joe Bags.

"You've got your assignments all right, son?" the big sergeant asked. "You know what you have to do?"

"Yes," Little Mike rejoined dully. "Slow rolls, lazy eights, and cross-wind landings."

"You'll eake-walk through 'em," his father told him reassuringly. "Just watch those cross-winds, that's all."

Young Mike nodded dumbly. He seemed nervous, ill at ease. That morning he had visited Phil Carter again, and he could not forget Phil's attempts to be cheerful, attempts that were too obviously forced, for the injured pilot knew by now that he was crippled for life and would never realise his ambition to be a flying ace.

"You're feeling all right, aren't you, kid?" Big Mike said to his son.

"Sure, I'm—I'm all right," the younger man answered with an effort, and then moved off towards the 'plane in which he was to ascend.

Big Mike watched him, and was gazing after him when Joe Bags spoke in gloomy accents. He had been consulting his book on astrology.

"You know to-day ain't no day for Venus to be in the house of Mars," Joe muttered. "It's a bad sign, Mike."

Big Mike was about to make some retort when he observed a familiar automobile passing along the main carriage-way of the airport, and as it halted he recognised Dare Marshall sitting behind the steering-wheel.

"There's that dame again," he growled. "She'd better lay off my boy, or she'll see more stars than ever were mentioned in that fool book o' yours, Joe."

Followed by his comrade, he walked over to where Captain Cannon was standing with some other officers, and he was hovering near that group when the names of his son and a student known as Jaskerelli were called out.

Cannon had decided to take the cadets in pairs, and instructions were given to young Mike Stone and Jaskerelli to go up in their ships and carry out the various manœuvres which they had been detailed to perform.

One after the other, the youthful pilots took off in their respective 'planes, and soon they were high up in the blue vault of the heavens, Captain Cannon studying the evolutions of the two machines with an appraising eye.

He seemed satisfied by what he saw, and was congratulating Big Mike upon these first two pupils when the ships began to glide earthward.

Jaskerelli was approaching from the south to effect a landing that required no extraordinary skill, but according to his assignment papers young Mike Stone had to combat stiff cross-winds, a ticklish business; and suddenly, when young Mike's craft was only a few feet from the ground, it started to waver precariously.

"The cross-winds have got him!" jerked Cannon.

The onlookers became tense. Then Big Mike spoke in a hoarse tone.

"He'll come out of it all right," he said. "He'll come out of it all right."

But he was mistaken. One wing-tip of the swaying 'plane grazed the surface of the field, and the ship slewed round. At the same time it rose sharply into the air as the man at the stick "gave it the gun" in a desperate effort to avoid complete disaster.

Young Mike Stone then found himself sweeping into the line of Jaskerelli's descent—Jaskerelli, who was gliding in from the south.

The two 'planes rushed towards each other, and a collision seemed imminent. Young Mike banked wildly, veering away from the other craft, and if Jaskerelli had kept his head all would have been well. But Jaskerelli had been thrown into confusion, and lost control.

His ship hurled itself into the ground nose-first, with terrific impact. Then it vaulted into the air and smashed down on the landing-field fifty yards further on, bursting into flames almost immediately.

Little Mike was now speeding westward, crouching in the front cockpit of his 'plane with fear and horror written on his face, and all at once he found himself making straight for one of the airport buildings.

He was still only a few feet from the ground, but he had no room to land, and any attempt to do so would have hurled him into the wall of that building ahead of him.

He pulled back the stick with last-minute presence of mind. The machine zoomed again—cleared the roof of the building—but fouled an observation tower, and beneath the roar of his engine he heard the crumpling of metal as his landing gear was torn away.

Down on the field a fire-truck was racing towards the blazing wreck of Jaskerelli's craft. Meanwhile, Big Mike Stone and Joe Bags were standing beside Captain Cannon, staring anxiously at the 'plane in which the sergeant's son was climbing.

It had survived the brush with the observation tower, and, minus its wheels, it continued to answer the pull of the stick and gain height. Then its anguished pilot began to circle above the airport aimlessly.

"If Little Mike tries to set her down with that smashed landing gear he'll bust himself wide open!" Joe Bags gasped. "Maybe he don't know that his landing gear's gone!"

The boy's father was already alive to that possibility; was already asking Cannon to let him go up and see what could be done; and, as permission was granted, Big Mike called upon another instructor and scrambled into a 'plane with him.

Bidding his colleague take the controls, Big Mike sat tensely in the forward cockpit. A few seconds later the ship was on its way heavenward, and not long afterwards the man in its rear compartment was steering it into a parallel course with the damaged craft occupied by the sergeant's son.

Big Mike waved to the youngster in the other machine—shouted to him and tried to indicate, by gestures that the wheels beneath his ship were missing. But he did not command him to bail out.

"Pancake landing!" he bellowed, making a descriptive movement with his hand. "Pancake landing!"

Young Mike's face was turned towards him, a face that was sickly white and panic-stricken. He could not hear his father's words, and appeared too bemused with fear to grasp the meaning of his signals.

"Get above him!" Big Mike said to the comrade who was at his back.

The other instructor obeyed him, and presently the 'plane containing the two older men was immediately over the damaged machine flown by the hapless student.

Big Mike climbed from his seat, and, waiting his chance, dropped to the upper wing of his son's craft. For one awful moment it looked as if he must slide off into space and plunge to his doom far below, but he gained a grip, and, after lying there breathlessly for several seconds with the wind tugging at him, he managed to lower himself to the fuselage and tumble into the cockpit behind his boy.

"Your landing gear's gone!" he panted.

"I know," the youngster moaned. "What can I do? What can I do?"

He checked himself, and then, with a shudder, he looked down at the field, in the middle of which a swarm of men were vainly endeavouring to extinguish the flames that were rising from Jaskerelli's ship.

"Jaskerelli's burning!" he sobbed. "Jaskerelli's burning!"

Big Mike tried to rouse his son, tried to make him turn his eyes from the grim scene away on the landing field.

"Listen, kid," he jerked, "listen, you've made a mess of things but you can still pull out with some credit, and you've got to—you've just got to. Set her down in a pancake landing. You can do it."

The youngster looked at him wildly.

"You take the controls! You take 'em, dad! I'm through—I'm finished!"

"Don't be a fool," Big Mike rasped. "Keep your hand on that stick!"

His son began to struggle up from his seat all at once. His mind was in a chaos, but he had remembered the parachute he was wearing.

"I'm going to bail out!" he cried.

"No you don't!" Big Mike roared, shoving him down again, and then, with no alternative but to handle the ship himself, he pushed the joystick forward and sent the craft into a swift earthward dive.

He straightened out when it seemed as if the 'plane must hurl itself into the ground as Jaskerelli's had done, and, cruising across the field at a height of only two or three feet, he at last brought the machine into contact with the turf, well away from the spot where that other vessel was blazing.

The ship scraped across the field for thirty or forty yards, swung around viciously, and finally came to a standstill—the relief and admiration of all who had witnessed the feat.

Big Mike clambered out of the machine and helped his son to alight. Out of the corner of his eye, he could see Captain Cannon and several other men hurrying from the vicinity of the hangars, and he looked at his trembling youngster grimly.

"You made this landing," he said. "You brought that 'plane down and pancaked her. You understand? As far as anybody else is concerned, you made the landing!"

"Why should we lie about it?" young Mike blurted in a voice that was choked with emotion. "Why should you lie for me and gain me some credit that I don't deserve?"

"Listen, I wouldn't lie for you if I thought you were plain yellow," his father bit out.

The student-pilot made a desperate gesture.

"I am yellow!" he cried. "Can't you see that? I'm finished—finished. First Phil—and then Jaskerelli! Can't you understand? Look over there at Jaskerelli's burning 'plane! Can't you see what that means to me, or isn't there any feeling in you?"

"Aw, listen, Mike, you're shaken up—"

"I'm through!" the younger man flung at him with rising voice. "Wash me out before I stop being human! Wash me out before I become a machine—like you, with your blackboard diagrams that show how a fellow can cripple himself for life, or die!"

The men of the escort halted simultaneously, brought their left hands across the stocks of their rifles, and then wheeled smartly to retrace their steps, leaving the degraded sergeant to proceed alone.

"Mike!"

"I'm through, I tell you, and I'm going to let them know it!"

The sergeant raised a clenched fist.

"Don't be a fool," he said fiercely, "and don't tell me that Big Mike Stone has gotta beat some manhood into his boy!"

The young lieutenant lost his temper at that. Indeed, he was so overwrought by the events which had taken place that he scarcely knew what he was saying.

"Get out of my way!" he shouted. "And in future you'd better remember your rank! Stand to attention when you talk to an officer!"

Big Mike glared at him. Only once before had the youngster mentioned their difference in rank, and then only in jest. But now he was in deadly earnest.

"Stand to attention when you address an officer!" the lieutenant repeated furiously. "That's an order—and you'll take it as such—the way you've taken orders for thirty years!"

Those bitter, stinging words filled Big Mike with a rage that was ungovernable; words that he had never thought to hear from the son he idolized. A red mist seemed to gather before his eyes, a mist in which he beheld an impassioned face that he wanted to hit—yes, wanted to hit, for the first time in his life.

Big Mike's right shoulder swung forward, lending full force to the punch that he aimed at the younger man. He felt his bunched knuckles crash home, and then he was standing above a prone form, with the wrath subsiding in him and remorse taking its place.

An outcry reached his ears. It came from Captain Cannon and the other men who were hurrying up. Dimly and vaguely, Big Mike realized that in laying out his son he had not only hurt someone who was dear to him, but had committed the unpardonable crime of striking a superior officer.

Dishonourable Discharge

A COURT-MARTIAL was the inevitable result of the quarrel between father and son, and the verdict was a foregone conclusion, despite the fact that young Mike Stone pleaded eloquently on the accused's behalf.

The youngster was ashamed of himself—not because of the manner in which his nerves had gone to pieces, but because of those cruel words he had spoken in the heat of altercation. And in the room where the court was sitting he told the whole story in frank and straightforward fashion, blaming himself for all that had occurred and asking his father's judges to show the prisoner clemency.

One of those judges was General Carter, and he for one would have longed to grant the plea. But the discipline of the Army could not take sentiment into consideration, and there was no clause in the regulations to justify a man striking a superior officer.

The fact that the principals in the case were father and son could have no significance, so far as the court was concerned. In delivering that blow, Sergeant Michael Stone had shown heinous disrespect to the uniform of the Service, and consequently there was no choice but to order his dismissal.

The sentence of the court was carried out a few hours later, when Big Mike

August 17th, 1935.

Stone was marched out on to the parade ground before the eyes of the entire personnel of the airport, and the hand that stripped him of his chevrons and other regimentals was one that trembled—for it was the hand of General Carter.

Big Mike could not meet the general's eyes—did not dare to, for fear of breaking down. Then, after the grim ceremony of degradation had been carried out, the sergeant returned to his former quarters to don civilian clothes.

He rigged himself out in a crude shirt, a pair of thick trousers and a hat that had seen better days. Then he said "Good-bye" to Joe Bags, and went forth to meet two riflemen who had been detailed to escort him from the aerodrome.

Walking between them with drooping head and weary steps, Big Mike trudged along the main carriage way, a forlorn and miserable figure, heavy-hearted at the thought of bidding farewell to the Service he had known for thirty years.

Where the drive of the aerodrome met the public highway, the men of the escort halted simultaneously, brought their left hands across the stocks of their rifles, and then wheeled smartly to retrace their steps, leaving the degraded sergeant to proceed alone.

Big Mike turned his head to take a last look at Randolph Field, and then, stiffening his upper lip and wiping a hint of moisture from his eyes, he moved off down the road.

Two or three days afterwards, ex-Sergeant Stone might have been seen working on a dilapidated plane that he had bought with his savings, a second-hand crate which he hoped would gain an airworthy certificate when he had overhauled it.

He had also rented a shed in which to house it, and it was here that his son located him about a week later.

A placard had been nailed to the shed, and it advertised that the owner of the plane within was prepared to show Texans their native state from the air at the low cost of five dollars per head.

Entering the makeshift hangar, Little Mike found his father sprawled beneath the fuselage with a spanner in his hand, and the youngster could have wept to see him—a tourist aviator trying to eke out a living with a junk machine.

Big Mike crawled from under the ship as he beheld his son, and after a moment of awkward silence he smiled.

"How are yuh, boy?" the older man greeted.

"Dad," the youngster began huskily, "dad, I want you to know how sorry I am—about everything—"

"Aw, forget it," Big Mike told him with a fine attempt at cheerfulness.

"How's tricks? How's everything at the—at the field? Say, I understand there's gonna be general manoeuvres to-night—a sham engagement between attacking planes and anti-aircraft batteries. Are you gonna be in it?"

Little Mike looked at him uneasily.

"I'm supposed to drop flares on a battery at Eagle Creek, four miles downriver," he muttered, "but I won't be there."

"What do you mean—you won't be there?"

"I'm resigning," young Mike jerked. "I'm scared, dad, you understand? I've tried—tried hard—but every time I go up now I see Jaskerelli—burning—and I think of Phil."

His father laid a hand on his arm.

"Mike, you can't quit," he said in an agitated voice.

"I've got to, dad," was the answer. "It's no use, I've made up my mind. I'm through with flying. I—I just can't stick it, and they'll never get me in a plane again."

In vain the older man appealed to him. Lieutenant Michael Stone had come to a decision and did not intend to alter it.

"I'm finished, dad, and in resigning I'm doing the right thing. Dare agrees with me that I—"

"Dare, huh?" Big Mike cut in. "So you've been listenin' to her."

"No," his son protested. "She hasn't tried to put any pressure on me, although I figure she's glad that I won't be risking my neck any more."

"Listen," the ex-sergeant said hotly, "do you want to go through the rest of your life remembering that you ran out on your pals, remembering that you were a quitter? For Pete's sake, Mike! You can't do a thing like this."

"Nothing you say can make any difference, dad," the youngster rejoined in steady, deliberate tones.

Big Mike suddenly clenched his fists and thrust out his jaw.

"All right, then," he breathed, "you quit if you want to. I'll take your place."

"What are you talking about?"

"I'm telling you that I'll be up in that sky to-night, with the guys that you're desertin'," he ground out. "I'll be up there doin' your job for you—yeah, Big Mike Stone that was kicked out of the Service. I know where I can get hold of some flares to drop on that battery at Eagle Creek. And here's my plane."

He pointed to the second-hand crate that he had purchased, and his son looked at him with horror and incredulity.

"You're crazy, dad," he said. "You couldn't make a power dive in that puddle jumper. It would break up in mid-air."

"Let it break up," Big Mike declared. "Maybe I won't finish in the Army, but I'll finish in the act of doin' an Army job. And that'll be better than eating my heart out because my son ain't got the right stuff in him."

He paused, and then tapped the youngster on the chest.

"You look over that Marshall dame's shoulder to-night and you'll see," he announced prophetically. "Maybe this flyin' assignment will be the last Army order that a Stone will carry out, but it's goin' to be done by one of us."

He sounded as if he meant every word that he had said, but, though he had been momentarily alarmed at the prospect of his father throwing away his life in the second-hand ship that he had bought, young Mike convinced himself that the threat was an idle one.

And that night, when he visited the hotel suite of Dare Marshall, Lieutenant Stone was still of the same mind. The "old man" had simply tried to frighten him into entering the manoeuvres, but—it wouldn't work.

"And you really do mean to resign?" Dare asked the youngster, when they were seated together on a chesterfield.

"Yes," her admirer told her, "I'm definitely leaving the Army."

"Then why not write out your resignation now?" she suggested. "Let me get you pen and ink and paper, Mike."

He nodded, and she crossed over to a bureau, returning presently with the writing materials and setting them down on a small table in front of him.

Mike began to write the letter of resignation, and was on the very point

A young man is murdered under strange circumstances in the grounds of a Casino. The police threaten to close the place, and the owner gets a free-lance detective to pit his wits against the police. A thrilling and gripping drama, starring Edmund Lowe

Strange Happenings

JARL DVORJAK, the internationally famous pianist, had just concluded the final concert of his tour at the Civic Auditorium in Boston. The papers announced that this was his last tour, but that had been said about previous tours.

The vast auditorium had been packed with people, and the majority were women. Dvorjak was a very handsome man, and the carefully-brushed grey hair gave an air of dignity to his well-built body.

Behind the stage a dark-haired, thin man, whose face looked lined from poor health, was chatting to a fat, complacent fellow.

"They adore him still," said the thin man, who was Dvorjak's business manager.

"They do, Mr. Williams, and to-night the house record has been broken," chuckled the theatre manager.

They watched the great pianist go back for bow after bow, and glanced significantly at each other when several ladies appeared in the wings. The Society ladies had come to pay court to the man they revered.

At last Dvorjak was allowed to leave the stage, and then like a king he bowed and thanked the ladies for the great honour they had bestowed upon him by admiring his playing. A great courier and flatterer was Dvorjak.

Hesitating in the background was a pretty, fair-haired girl, and it was obvious that Dvorjak was anxious to get rid of his admirers to speak to the girl. In his gracious manner he excused himself, and at last was able to talk to the girl. Williams winked at the manager.

"Kind of you to come. I played only for you," said Dvorjak softly.

"That's very flattering," laughed the girl. "Even if it isn't true."

"Let me prove it. To-morrow night my new piano-organ console will be installed in the music-room. Be the first to hear it." His words were eager and the eyes compelling. "I will have a few friends there."

"I should love to hear it. What time?"

"Shall we say—ten-thirty?"

"I'll be there!" The girl gave him her hands. "I must get back to my party. Good-night!"

"An revoir!" Dvorjak smiled at her ardently.

"Who's the dame?" whispered the manager.

"Mona Lewis, daughter of Clark Lewis—"

"You mean Gambler Lewis," interrupted the manager. "Phew! Now you have surprised me. Hallo, here's another!"

A tall, graceful woman, beautifully gowned and glistening with diamonds, swept into the scene and smiled in rather a curious manner at Dvorjak.

"Excuse me," whispered Williams, and added even more softly: "It's Madame Dvorjak."

"Charmion, my dear, this is a great pleasure." The pianist kissed his wife's hand. "I am touched—a little surprised—"

"You shouldn't be—I like my toast buttered—and butter seems to be going up—frightfully!" Her smile was mocking.

"I'll have Williams mail you a cheque."

"Thank you, Jarl." The woman gathered her magnificent ermine cloak more closely round her. "We really are a perfect married couple. Good-bye, Jarl. You won't forget to remind him, Mr. Williams, will you?"

"Certainly, madame," answered the manager. "We shall hope to see you again, madame."

"That depends entirely on the cheques I receive," answered the beautiful woman. "Good-night!"

"I thought she would be around," Dvorjak muttered when he was alone with his manager. "I guessed she'd find out my tour had been a success. At any rate she won't worry me for a bit if I send her a cheque first thing in the morning. But one day, Williams, I shall put my foot down. To-night I feel generous, and I feel I am in luck." He smiled at a sudden idea. "We'll go to the Casino."

A luxurious car drove them to the Casino, owned by Gambler Lewis. A restaurant, dancing, gambling for high and low stakes, cocktail bars, lounges, reading-rooms, Gambler Lewis had made his Casino a very perfect paying proposition. A shrewd business man, and there was nothing phoney about the gambling.

Dvorjak and Williams heard on arrival from the talkative cloak-room attendant that someone on table five had broken the bank.

"A young man, and if I might say so a little merry," laughed the attendant. "They say he threw on his money in a most blapazard way and always found the winning number."

The two men laughed and went to get a drink.

Lewis had been told by one of his men about the young man's good luck, and he went across to see if everything were satisfactory. Lewis was a tall, broad-shouldered man—strong of body and strong of face. He found that a boastful, excited young man by the name of Matthews had won the money.

"A perfect evening!" The young man held up a pile of chips and beamed triumphantly at the curious spectators. "Now I'm quitting. Where do I cash in?"

"Right over there," Lewis said politely. "I'll show you."

Over ten thousand dollars had been won by Matthews, and Lewis himself handed the young man his money.

"Would you like one of my men to see you home?"

"I think I can find my way." The young man's tone was most unpleasant. "I'm sticking to this dough."

"Are you insinuating that my men might rob you of your winnings?" Lewis said angrily.

"I wouldn't go as far as that!" laughed Matthews. "But I might drop it and they might pick it up." He patted his pocket. "I can well look after myself, thank you very much."

"Have it your own way," Lewis shrugged his shoulders. "I can give you a cheque if you don't like carrying all that money."

"Cheques are sometimes not met," sneered Matthews, and walked away.

Gambler Lewis shut his eyes for the moment because the temptation to hit the young man almost broke down his iron control. He opened them to find two of his plain-clothes attendants by his side.

"Say, boss, it would be a pleasure to toss that guy out on his ear," muttered one of them.

"I nearly gave myself the pleasure," Lewis laughed. "Know anything about him?"

"Registered as D. H. Matthews, and it was just luck got him that pile."

"Yes, the croupier told me that," Lewis scowled. "If he calls again let me know."

Dvorjak and his manager, coming from a drink to go to the tables, passed the cloak-room and bumped into young Matthews coming out. They started back and glared at each other.

"I believe the misunderstanding was that we were not to meet," Dvorjak spoke coldly.

"I didn't invite you here!" came the sneering rejoinder.

"You didn't even have the courtesy to use the seats for my concert."

"I don't go in for piano-playing. I'm not one of those dumb dames who listens to you with goggling eyes."

Dvorjak stiffened as if he would strike the young man.

"I see you've been drinking again. You're a disgrace!" With head erect he passed the grinning Matthews, who appeared highly amused.

"Don't let him upset you, Jarl." Williams took his master's arm. "He's not worth it."

Matthews, swaying a little, went out to a somewhat snappy two-seater car, waved aside the commissionaire and climbed in. The engine roared and he was off down the winding drive through picturesque grounds towards the main road.

Another car was coming towards him, and the headlights were suddenly switched on. The approaching car was right in the middle of the road. Matthews hooted, cursed and shouted to the driver to "Get over." A collision seemed inevitable. Matthews swung to the edge of the drive, and then as the two cars came abreast two shots rang out. Matthews slumped over the wheel, his car with brakes released went over a slight embankment and overturned. The body of Matthews was flung out.

August 17th, 1935.

The car with the headlights backed, turned swiftly and was gone.

Someone shouted that there had been a collision, and officials from the Casino and guests hurried to the scene. Dvorjak was amongst them.

"What's happened?" He heard various remarks. "I think he was drunk. I heard two shots. It looks like murder. Someone forced him off the road—I was just leaving and I know."

Gambler Lewis pushed through the crowd, and Dvorjak was close to his heels. Lewis stooped down and felt the boy's heart.

Dvorjak gazed with awe at the face of the young man, with whom he had been quarrelling a few minutes before.

"I warned him not to go out with that money," cried Lewis. "I felt it was coming to him." He pushed open the dead man's jacket. "That's funny." And from the pocket he took out a great bundle of notes.

Lewis became aware that the pianist had taken his place by the side of the still figure.

"Did you know this man, Dvorjak?" he asked.

Dvorjak hesitated, then he got to his feet.

"No—I never saw him before in my life."

The sounds of several sirens told the horrified spectators and the Casino officials that the police had arrived on the scene of the murder.

Lewis Hires a Detective

NEXT morning Clark Lewis was summoned to police headquarters, where he was shown into the office of James W. King, chief of detectives.

King was a hard-faced, sneering person. He was on the side of the law, and not particularly fussy in his methods of getting information from a prisoner. His eyes would narrow and his teeth would be clenched on these occasions—amazing how he frightened the truth out of some poor wretches.

San Francisco was at the moment conspicuous for a crime wave, and King had had his knuckles rapped. The killing of Matthews enraged him.

"Lewis, I've sent for you about this killing in your grounds—"

"You can't pin this business on the Casino?"

"This guy was bumped off in your grounds," King rasped out. "Ain't that a fact?"

"Yes," admitted Lewis. "But all the money he won at my place was found on him. There's nothing on the Casino."

"I can't help that—we're closing you up!" King raised his hand against interruption. "I gotta hand it to you that the Casino appears to be on the level, but you've had one or two ugly scenes there. The papers are full of this crime wave, and places that encourage crime. The Commissioner gave me hades, and we'll have to close you down until we crack the Matthews' case."

"And what am I supposed to do whilst the Casino's losing from twenty to thirty grand a week?" Lewis argued. "I've at last got this place on the map."

"Practise economy," King turned up his lip. "I won't close you down for a day or so, but if the case ain't cracked pretty quick the Casino has to shut its doors."

"If I could locate Dynamite this case would be cleared up overnight."

"Don't get me hysterical!" guffawed King. "We threw that chiselling dick out of town six months ago."

"That was your mistake," Lewis answered. "Dynamite isn't above a bribe, but then who isn't? The police never do." He stared accusingly at the detective. "Dynamite may be a rascal, but he's an amusing one, and, moreover, he knows his business. If you had a few men like him in the force this town wouldn't know what crime was. Where is he?"

"San Berdoo. He's opened an office and going straight." A chuckle. "Probably one of the town's most respected citizens by now. That dumb fool couldn't crack this killing."

"You wouldn't care to wager me a hundred bucks on that, would you?" asked Lewis. "No, I see you wouldn't. You wouldn't care to back the police to solve the mystery for a hundred dollars. Well, there seems no business, so I'll be going. I'm going to get Dynamite from San Berdoo."

Actually at that very moment Dynamite was shaking the dust of San Berdoo off his shoes. The detective stared out of the window at the receding town and sighed contentedly.

"You look as if you were pleased," grumbled the good-looking, intelligent woman by his side. "What for beats me. You get chucked out of the town, and we haven't a cent, so why laugh?"

The private detective was a bold-eyed, handsome fellow, and his grin was appealing.

"I laugh, sweetheart, because San Berdoo was about the dullest town I've known. I enjoyed that last show—first excitement for months."

"Why did you withhold that evidence?"

"Because I didn't like the cops and their methods. They wanted to put that poor little guy away for years for letting daylight into a skunk, and I had the evidence that would have sent him for a vacation." He shrugged broad shoulders. "I admired the little fellow's pluck, and so here we are."

"I can't understand you." The woman looked discontentedly at the countryside. "If you had been paid big money to withhold that evidence I could appreciate this line. You're slipping, Dynamite. All this while in San Berdoo and we haven't a dime. Where do we go next?"

"Lynne Marlo, I have no idea," Dynamite picked up the paper. "I know San Berdoo have given us a ticket for any station on this system, and the farther away the better they'll be pleased. Perhaps the paper will give me an idea. Relax, girl, and let the master mind concentrate."

"You're crazy!"

"Young man seeks honest employment," he read out. "Guess I'm on the wrong page." He turned it over. "Ah, a grand murder mystery." He read a few lines, then nudged his secretary. "Wako up and listen to this."

"Matthews murder baffles police. District Attorney threatens to close Casino." You remember Clark Lewis' place? I've done one or two jobs for him. I bet you anything you like he'd jump for joy if I were to walk into his office. Toots, we're going to San Francisco!"

"We've been thrown out of San Francisco," Lynne reminded him. "We shall probably be thrown out again."

"This train stops for twenty minutes at some junction to pick up some connection—I'll get through on long distance to Lewis." He chuckled. "And break the news to him."

Dynamite was rubbing his hands together when he joined his secretary some time later.

"Lewis is having red carpet put down at the station, and the mayor is organising a reception committee," he told her. "The streets will be lined with cheering throngs—"

"You're delirious." Lynne gave him one look. "And I'm starving. Try and talk the conductor into letting us have a free-meal ticket. And when we get to Frisco I pray the reception won't be from the police."

A Bad Loser

THAT very same night Dynamite and his secretary walked into the Casino as if they had bought the place. Both were in evening dress, and Lynne looked really beautiful in a black satin dress and a white cloak trimmed with white fox fur.

"Stop worrying," he whispered to her. "Clark Lewis is at the back of all our purchases."

"You told him you needed office supplies." She fingered her cloak. "I suppose this comes under the heading of a blotter?"

"It looks grand on you." He smiled at her, then became serious. "Let's have a look round before reporting to Lewis."

Hearing voices raised in anger they went into the baccarat-room, and saw two attendants gripping a gentleman firmly by the arms.

"That's Jarl Dvorjak," Dynamite told his secretary. "Our foremost concert player. Seems as if he's lost more than he can afford. Always did hear he was a poor sort of fish. Amuse yourself for half an hour, girl, I'll go and find Lewis."

Clark Lewis was in his office, and glowered at his visitor.

"You've been in this town about five minutes and you've opened largo accounts at several stores in my name. What's the idea?"

"Oh, I just gave your name as reference," was the bland answer. "I'll pay the bills."

"How?"

"Out of your retaining fee."

Lewis smiled.

"You're a chiseller, Dynamite, but I admire your nerve. You've got brains, and I need them. The D.A.'s threatening to close me up. I want to know who bumped Matthews off, and I want action."

"And I want four thousand bucks to oil my brains," boldly answered the detective.

"I'll give it you right now," Lewis went to a wall safe. "You solve this murder and you'll find me generous. You can come as close as you like. Don't bother to memorise the combination of this safe—we change it every day."

"Nice guy, but so suspicious," Dynamite laughed. "Lucky I've got a hide like a rhino. Thanks, Lewis, now, first I intend—" He broke off.

Outside the door there was shouting and scuffling. Then it was flung open and the two attendants forcibly escorted the great Dvorjak into the room.

"Take your filthy hands off me!" the pianist shouted.

"What is the matter, Mr. Dvorjak?" Lewis asked politely.

"I wish to protest against your methods and establishment."

Lewis glanced at his attendants, and one stepped forward. "He tried to start a riot, boss."

"I've lost forty thousand dollars," Dvorjak was pale with anger. "Lost at your tables in the last three nights—I doubt your cronier and your wheel."

"We're carrying his paper for eight grand." The attendant winked significantly at his chief.

"I do not intend to pay," Dvorjak sneered. "Why should I pay for the privilege of being cheated?"

"I don't take that sort of accusation passively, Mr. Dvorjak," Clark Lewis answered.

"So I perceived the night of the Matthews murder," the pianist laughed unpleasantly. "Fortunately, I do not leave your grounds alone and unprotected."

"We don't cater here for welters."

"May I impress upon you that the District Attorney is a friend of mine." The pianist straightened his dinner jacket. "A very close friend."

Lewis gave a slight sign, and one of the attendants opened the door. Dvorjak walked out.

"That guy is trying to pull a bluff to keep from paying off," the attendant said, after shutting the door.

"Give him time to cool down," Lewis ordered. "Then pay him a visit. A hint that the Press might like to hear the facts will soon make him pay up. Throw a seare into him—but no rough stuff."

"You know us—we work delicate," the attendant answered with a grin. "You leave him to us, boss."

When they had gone Dynamite, who had stood in the background, came to the side of the big desk. "That's the wrong way to handle that guy. If those two mugs should try rough stuff this dump will be closed for ever and a day."

"You find out who killed Matthews," angrily cried Lewis. "I'll handle the rest of my business."

"Well, I don't think much of the handling up to date," mocked Dynamite. "I'll be seeing you."

Lynne was busy gambling and most annoyed when he insisted that she come away at once.

"And I was on a winning streak," she grumbled. "Where are we going?"

"For a drive, so put on your cloak."

"Why a drive?"

He smiled mysteriously.

"To satisfy my curiosity about concert pianists."

The Second Mysterious Killing

JARL DVORJAK went straight back to his modern luxurious villa. In a small sitting room he found a large, fair haired middle-aged Dutch woman fast asleep. He shook her gently.

"Wake up! Jan, wake up!"

The woman opened her eyes, gazed at him for a moment uncomprehendingly and then got to her feet.

"Oh, I'm so sorry, Mr. Dvorjak, but I fell asleep. I've had a tiring day, sir."

Dvorjak studied his watch.

"The other servants out, Jan? And they won't be back till after midnight?"

"I told them midnight."

"Has the young lady called?"

"The young lady was expecting guests, but only Mr. Williams showed up."

Dvorjak pondered.

"Where are they?" he asked at last.

"The lady's in the music room and Mr. Williams is in the library," answered his housekeeper.

"Very well I'll look after them."

Dvorjak said with a decisive nod. "You're tired, so off you get to bed."

Dvorjak went to the library where he found his manager seated at a desk studying an evening paper.

"I was out when you called, Jarl," Williams smiled ingratiatingly. "When I got the message I came round at once."

"A little matter of business," Dvorjak's voice became sharp. "I find myself ten thousand short on the proceeds of the tour."

"That's impossible."

"I have definite proof in my safe."

"May I see it?"

"Not now, because I have company." The pianist eyed him coldly.

"I shall expect your cheque to-morrow to cover the deficit."

Williams' attitude changed to defiance.

Lewis became aware that the pianist had taken his place by the side of the still figure.

"Don't you think ten thousand is cheap for my silence, Jarl?"

"That sounds like blackmail."

"The papers would call it news."

"To-morrow I shall wish to see your cheque." Dvorjak held open the door. "You realise that this terminates our association?"

"I will be here in the morning when we can destroy the evidence you say you have," Williams laughed. "But I don't intend, Jarl, to pay you ten thousand."

"We shall see. You know your way out," Dvorjak smiled. "And I advise you to pay up, Williams, or else I may call in the police. Good-night."

Dvorjak went to the music-room, where Mona Lewis was waiting. The girl rose nervously at sight of him. There was fear, and yet adoration, in her expression.

"It was very kind of you to come, my dear. My other guests are inexcusably late."

"Perhaps I'd better go, Jarl."

"No, no, no!" He took the two slim hands in his own. "I beg you to stay. Before they come, let me play for you alone. A love song that you will be the first to hear. It is almost as lovely as you, my dear."

Dvorjak seated himself before the piano organ, smiled at the girl, and began to play.

Two men muffled in coats came stealthily along the street. They went up the stone steps of the porch, and one was about to press the bell when the notes of the organ rang out. They glanced round and saw the lighted windows of a big room—there was a low balcony.

"Fancy playing at this time of night."

"Let's climb on to that balcony and see what's going on."

"Okay," agreed the first speaker. "Can't understand how some folks like that sort of music."

They scrambled on to the balcony by means of the ivy, and peered into the music-room. Then they looked at each other.

"Do you see who it is?" one whispered.

"Sure I see." A chuckle not very pleasant. "And somebody might pay us well to keep a still tongue."

A sound of a car pulling up made the two men duck down beneath the balcony.

Dynamite helped Lynne out of the smart two-seater car he had hired by using Lewis' name.

"See those two guys on the balcony," Dynamite said softly. "Of course you didn't see them. Well, I did, and I know who they are." They heard a rustle and a faint oath. "That is the same two climbing down the other side of the balcony. Any moment they will be running for dear life."

"You're too clever to live," mocked Lynne. "In all probability they're just ordinary thieves."

"They're ordinary enough, but—" Dynamite broke off because clearly he had heard a shot.

"The organ's stopped!" gasped Lynne. Dynamite hastened up the stone-flagged pathway and his hand reached out for the bell when the door flung open. A very pretty, but distressed young woman stood there. She recoiled at sight of him. She tried to rush past him, but his arms held her.

"Just a minute, little girl. What happened?"

"Let me go! Let me go!" The girl twisted like an eel. Like a wildcat she sank her teeth into the hand that gripped her left wrist. Dynamite gave a cry,

August 17th, 1935.

and next moment the girl was free and scurrying down the path. Lynne made a futile, ineffective attempt at stopping the girl.

Dynamite hastened to Lynne's side. "Why the dickens didn't you hold her? That dame—"

"Look!" Lynne cried, and he swung round in time to see someone muffled in a cloak slip out of the door.

Dynamite rushed after the man, who dived round the house. Like a cat the cloaked figure sprang for a wall and was on top when the detective arrived.

"Wait a minute, you!" Next moment Dynamite was flung backward by a wild kick from a swinging leg.

Dynamite cursed when he got to his feet—two valuable witnesses had escaped. He had a hunch that something had happened inside Dvorjak's house, and if he only knew who these two people were it might make such a difference.

"I suppose he escaped?" Lynne said sharply. "Just as I expected."

"Cut out the wise-cracking!" rasped Dynamite. "We're going inside!"

"Suppose the police should come?"

"They won't be here till someone calls them," was his reply. "Besides, I've got to take chances. Come on, and don't argue."

Slumped over the keyboard of the piano they found Dvorjak. The detective lifted the limp hand and then gave a significant shake of the head.

"Is he dead?" whispered Lynne.

"If he isn't he's giving a swell imitation," Dynamite answered callously. "He stopped a dose of lead in the head. I wonder which of those two did it? I wonder what connection this has to do with young Matthews?"

Very quickly the detective went round the room, but there seemed nothing that indicated a clue.

"We can't stay all night" Lynne urged. "Also, the sight of that dead man gives me the creeps. You ought to ring the police."

"Okay; I'll warn them." Dynamite came and stood by the piano. "Guess I'll take this music."

"What ever for?"

"Because I can't see a vestige of a clue anywhere else." He rolled the music and placed it in his pocket. "Also, this music has a lot of personal notes, and they might give me a line. Now I'll call the police."

Madame Dvorjak was in bed when the telephone bell rang and her maid answered it. The police were calling.

"You'd better come over right away," drawled Detective King. "Your husband's met with an accident."

"Not a serious accident?"

"I'm afraid so—he's been shot."

"You mean he has shot himself?" Madame asked.

"As there ain't a gun lying around it don't look like it." King rasped into the 'phone. "It looks more like murder. I'm sending a car round to your hotel. Better get down here right away."

"Oh, my poor husband! This is terrible. I can't believe it possible. Yes, yes, I will come at once. Good-bye." Madame hung up. "I've got to go over to the house. My husband's been shot. I think I'll wear my grey suit, Marie."

Blackmail

CLARK LEWIS was at his breakfast when the 'phone bell went. He listened and muttered imprecations. When he hung up, his face was the picture of anger and dismay. The headlines of the papers—"Jarl Dvorjak Murdered at His Home!" "Famous Concert Pianist Mysteriously Shot!" made him seew.

A discreet cough, and there stood the grinning Dynamite.

"How much do the boys want?" he asked with a grin.

"Twenty grand. How did you know they wanted money?" Lewis cried suspiciously.

"Deduction, just simple deduction." Dynamite helped himself to a piece of toast. "Your worthy butler admitted me, and one could hear your voice all over the house. You called your friends rats and other names. Moreover, if you pay it you'll have two dependants for life. You sent them round there to collect and they were there when Dvorjak was shot. If they said you had sent them it would be good-bye to the Casino—am I right?"

"You've got most of it," admitted Lewis. "But how are you wise?"

"I called about three seconds before someone shot Dvorjak," Dynamite answered. "The boys didn't do it—they're just after easy money."

"Then find the real murderer—don't sit there munching toast!" stormed Lewis. "Any clues?"

"Yes, but nothing definite. I saw your two thugs, heard the shot, and the door opened—" A violent shake of the head by Lewis quietened him, and he glanced round for the reason.

A charming, but pale, young woman.

"May I come in?"

"Of course, dear," Lewis smiled at her fondly. "Mona, dear, this is Dynamite—you've heard me speak of him."

"How do you do, Miss Lewis?" Dynamite glanced at his hand.

The girl gave him a frightened glance. "How do you do?" she whispered.

"I'm grand. Hand hurts a bit." He grinned. "Scraped it against something tough—I'm a careless sort of chap. Won't you sit down?"

"No, thank you very much." The girl smiled nervously. "I'll come back later when you've had your talk."

"Mona doesn't look very well this morning." Her father stared after his daughter. "Too many late nights."

"The Casino's no background for a nice kid like that."

"I'm sending her to Paris to study."

"Good idea, and while you're about it, send those two mugs abroad as well," the detective suggested. "They didn't do it as I told you, but if they tell the police you sent them to collect from a corpse it won't sound too good."

"Maybe you're right," agreed Lewis. "But I'm not paying 'em twenty grand."

"You go to one of your numerous safes, take out some money whilst I'm not looking and let me have it." Dynamite's eyes twinkled. "I'll put such a scare into them that they'll be pleased to take a couple of grand. You go and get the dough."

Directly Lewis had gone, Dynamite hastened out on to the balcony and looked round eagerly. Sure enough, there was the girl, almost hidden behind a large ornamental tub containing some sort of palm. She was dabbing her eyes with a handkerchief.

"Crying isn't going to help." Dynamite made his words as friendly as he could manage. "Suppose you talk to me?"

"What do you want of me?"

"I'm going to ask a few questions, and, for your own sake, please answer them." He drew a chair close to her. "You didn't tell your father about last night?"

"I don't know what you're talking about." She edged away.

"I should, because it would be better to talk to me than the police."

"The police?"

"They're bound to ask questions, and I'm the guy to tell you the answers." He patted her hand. "Don't bite, lass, and be sensible. Did you tell your father?" She shook her head. "Did you shoot him?"

"I had nothing to do with it. Why should I kill him?"

Dynamite stared at her intently.

"I believe you, but hundreds wouldn't. You've got to come clean if you want me to help you. Who else was in the room?"

"Nobody."

"Nobody?"

"We were alone in the room; he was playing for me. Suddenly there was a shot. It seemed to come from nowhere. I looked round, but the room was empty." She leaned forward, "That's the truth."

"Were the doors closed or open?"

"Closed," she answered. "I opened the door I had come in by and ran out blindly. Then you stopped me."

"Yeah, I remember that part." He glanced at his hand. "Why did you go to see Dvorjak?"

"Because I'm crazy about music and he fascinated me," she admitted. "I was thrilled to be his friend. He told me there were going to be others present, but they must have been delayed. Then he began to play and I had to listen. You do believe me?"

"Calm down, Mona, and get a grip on your nerves," Dynamite said sharply. "Not a word of this to a soul—not even to your father."

"You'll help me?"

"Yes. This looks like one case I'll do for your father without a retaining fee; but"—he paused significantly—"you've got to do exactly as I tell you without a single question. Is it a go?"

"It's a go!" A tremulous smile appeared.

"Then you go off and powder your nose and try to look as if you haven't a care in the world." Dynamite stood up. "Stay around this joint and wait till I 'phone. Now I must get back to your father. Mind, not a word!"

A smile and he hurried back to the breakfast-room. Lewis was there and gave him a suspicious glance.

"Just been admiring the view. Grand place you have here, Lewis." Dynamite spoke easily. "Got the money?"

"Two grand, and you'll find the boys at the Golden Gate Hotel. Don't slip up on this, Dynamite."

"I'll have 'em heading for the Philippines within twenty-four hours," was the confident assertion.

But Dynamite found it was not going to be so easy. He had left Lynne outside in the car, and she had witnessed the police swoop down and collar Lewis' two men.

"King or some flatfoot must have sent men down here to watch Lewis' house," Dynamite mused aloud. "Maybe we got here before the cops. Lewis' pals came here to be certain of their money, and the cops must have decided to collect them. Why?" He considered that for a moment. "King has found out that Dvorjak lost money gambling and sent them to watch for suspicious characters or any clues. These two birds don't usually come to Lewis' place, and so the cops collect them on suspicion. Also, some patrolling cop may have spotted them in the vicinity of Dvorjak's place."

He started the engine.

"Where are we going?" Lynne demanded.

"Police headquarters." He grinned at her. "And if you're a good girl I'll introduce you to the chief."

"If it's just the same to you, I'd rather be introduced to some breakfast," Lynne said significantly. "Drop me on the way to gaol."

Squealers

BY various methods the police got Lewis' men to admit that they had gone to Dvorjak's house, but they said nothing about seeing Mona. If they did, what chance was there of collecting the twenty grand? They admitted they had been detailed to watch Dvorjak's house, as the pianist owed their boss money.

"Take 'em away!" King ordered. "I'll talk to the scum later. Show that guy Williams into here."

Williams was brought in.

"I sent for you because you were Dvorjak's manager," King leaned back in his chair. "From your lodgings I got wise to something else—Dvorjak sent for you. What were you doing there at midnight?"

"We often spent the evening together. I was his friend as well as his lawyer and manager," Williams answered.

"No trouble about money?"

"Certainly not."

"You talked with Dvorjak, then what happened?"

Williams smiled slightly.

"He did not wish for my company that night. We arranged a meeting for the morning. You see, there was someone interesting waiting for him in the music-room. A lady, but I had no chance of finding out who she was."

"That checks with the housekeeper's story," King nodded. "She did not know the lady's name."

"I presume it could not, therefore, be Mrs. Dvorjak?"

"She was at her hotel in bed," King answered. "We rang her and got her over. She was most upset. She knows nothing about any other dame, but she hinted that she and her husband were very good friends, but no more. Joe!" He shouted. A thin, dark, fierce young man answered the call. "There was a dame at Dvorjak's place, as the housekeeper stated. Those rats of Lewis' may have seen her. Do your stuff!"

"We'll have a work out," Joe smirked unpleasantly. A policeman entered and touched his helmet. He handed over a card, which King scowled at.

"Who's T. N. Thompson?"

"He said that if you were to say that I was to add Dynamite," the policeman explained. King sat up with a jerk.

"Dynamite and trouble arrive at the same time. Blast him in!"

Dynamite entered, beamed at King and glanced sharply at Williams.

"Morning, chief! You're taking on weight, aren't you?"

"I've thrown you out of Frisco once and I'll do it again, but harder!" King banged his desk. "What are you doing here?"

"Legitimate client—Clark Lewis by name."

"Oh, so he found you after all!" King chewed at his cigar. "If that's on the level, you can stay; but no funny business."

"Okay!" Dynamite calmly helped himself to a cigar before glancing at Williams. "How are you?"

"Do you know Williams?" King sharply asked.

"Oh, yes—yes! We've kicked around together, haven't we?"

"Yes, indeed," Williams answered smoothly. "I must get in touch with you and talk over old times."

"I'm at the St. Francis." Dynamite's eyes were expressive. "You should come and see me."

"I'll give you a ring," Williams glanced at the chief detective. "Do you want me any more, Mr. King?"

"Not for the moment, but don't leave town!" King rapped out.

"And if you need any help you know where to find me," Dynamite added, with a slight wink. He waited till the door had closed on the manager, then tantalisingly lit the cigar. King sat back and watched him with angry gaze. A contented puff. "So you have two murders on your hands. Well, it's nice to see that business is looking up."

"Why have you come to see me?"

"To see how you're getting along on the Dvorjak case."

"Listen, you stick to Matthews. I'll let you stay on if Lewis wants you, but don't butt into anything else. I'll 'phone Lewis."

"Promotion hasn't improved your suspicious nature," Dynamite answered. "You have my word I'm for Lewis, so save your breath 'phoning. Also Dvorjak's all yours."

"All right, I'll take a chance that you're not lying." King was somewhat appeased. "What do you want to know?"

"Will you tell me what they found on the body of Matthews? King, I've cracked a lot of cases. I don't want to fight you, I want to work with you, so give me a break."

"All right, I'll play ball with you." King pulled open a drawer and took out a satchel. "Here's what they found on Matthews, and it won't help you much."

"A pair of pliers." Dynamite picked them up. "Curious thing to carry about. A key ring—doesn't seem much to that. Money, and plenty of it. I presume his winnings. Theatre tickets." These he took up. "For the Dvorjak concert. Why didn't he use them?"

"We'll dig him up and ask him," jeered King.

"A connection between these murders ever strike you?"

"Matthews escaped from the morgue, came over and shot Dvorjak, and then went back for his own funeral," said King with bitter sarcasm.

Dynamite was unperturbed.

"Who was Matthews?"

"Don't know. Popped up about four months ago. Had a shack at Aptos—doing some sort of work there. No criminal record we can find. Matthews was an alias."

"Trace the car he was driving?"

"Rented—wrong address. No clue there. Anything else you—" The dictagraph buzzer interrupted him. He switched it on. "Yes?"

"Okay, chief," it was Joe's voice. "They've spilled. The girl was Mona Lewis."

"Great work!" King grinned exultantly. "Hold those two mugs. Pick up a warrant and bring in Mona Lewis."

"What do you want her for?" Dynamite asked.

"Nothing much," King answered. "Just a simple charge of first degree murder."

"So you're planning to arrest her." Dynamite picked up the pliers, examined them, and put them back. "Think she did it?"

"Sure, jealousy. Think you can do anything with the Matthews case?"

"I'll have a try." Dynamite pocketed the concert tickets. "I'll ring you up some night if it won't disturb your beauty sleep. So long, chief."

Outside, Dynamite moved quickly to a telephone-box and rang Lewis' house. To his relief Mona answered.

"Don't get shaky and just do as I tell you," he spoke swiftly. "Meet me outside Post and Powell's store within twenty minutes. You must be out of the house within ten minutes. Don't tell anyone where you are going."

"But, Dynamite, I can't leave without telling dad where he can find me."

"He'll find you at the county gaol if you don't move quickly," was his stern retort. "Did you or did you not agree to trust me? Stick to it!"

"But where are you taking me?" Mona was uncertain.

"Where the cops can't find you," he told her. "There's a warrant out for your arrest. Now will you hurry?"

"But why should they want to arrest me?"

"Because they think you killed Dvorjak, and I've got to keep you in hiding whilst I find out who did do it. Now hurry, Mona. All answers when I see you. Twenty minutes at Post and Powell's store, and try to sneak out without anyone seeing you. 'Bye!'"

The Shot

LYNNE MARLO smiled politely when Dynamite walked into her suite of rooms with a pretty girl. She was extremely fond of Dynamite, but she knew how susceptible he was to youth and beauty. Moreover, Lynne had stood by the detective when he was down to his last cent and she did not welcome the intrusion of a young woman.

"This is Mona Lewis, and we've got to hide her. Listen!"

Briefly, the detective explained all that had happened, and how the squealing of Lewis' two men had necessitated this drastic action.

"Why?" Lynne wanted to know.

"Because Mona did not kill Dvorjak and she's too nice a girl to get into the hands of King and his toughs," replied Dynamite. "We know their methods of intimidation and third degree, also Mona, free, may have drastic results."

"Such as all of us going to prison for years and years?" Lynne smiled blandly.

"You haven't gone to prison yet," he reminded her. "Mona, free, might upset the plans of the real killer, because I've a hunch the death of Matthews has something to do with the Dvorjak case."

"What's the next bright idea?" Lynne asked.

"To find the connection between the two cases. I believe—" The 'phone bell rang. "Excuse me."

"Hallo, hallo, Thompson speaking!"

"This is Carey Williams. I must see you at once. It's most important."

"You haven't wasted much time, Williams," Dynamite chuckled. "What can I do for you?"

"There's something you should know." The voice was hoarse with excitement.

"Valuable information on the Dvorjak case."

"I'll come and see you at once. Where are you?"

"At—" The sound of a shot came distinctly over the line.

"That was a shot!" gasped Lynne.

"Hallo, hallo!" shouted Dynamite. He turned quickly. "Get on the 'phone in the next room and trace this call whilst I keep the line open." He proceeded in this endeavour by talking into the 'phone. "Yes, yes, I'll be there. What time suits you best. I hope—" He put back the receiver. "That's funny!"

"What's funny?" asked the horrified Mona.

August 17th, 1935.

"You can tell by the noises on the wire if a line is clear," he explained. "That line was clear till a few seconds ago when there came a distinct click. Someone at the other end put back the receiver."

Lynne bustled into the room. "The call came from the Dvorjak house."

"Guess I'll have to go out." Dynamite grabbed up his hat. "Put Mona up for the night, and sit tight here. Don't go out of this room, answer the 'phone or go to the door."

"What do we do for food?" Lynne demanded.

"Bite your nails," was his sarcastic answer. "They say the polish is very nourishing."

Dynamite went straight to the Dvorjak house and rang the bell. Jan, the housekeeper, answered.

"What do you want?"

"Mr. Williams, where is he?"

"In the book-room, but he gave orders no one should disturb him."

"Don't worry, auntie, no one will." The detective pushed past her. "Better come with me."

On the floor of the book-room lay Carey Williams. Dynamite knelt and made a swift examination.

"What do you know about this?" He turned on the woman, who was staring down with sorrowful expression.

"Poor man—he's always been sickly."

"Well, those days are over. You been here all afternoon?"

"I've been downstairs in the laundry."

"Did you hear a shot?"

"I didn't hear nothing till you rang the bell." She pointed at the body.

"You don't think that Mr. Williams is very bad, do you?"

"I don't think—I know," Dynamite said tersely. "You say you heard nothing till I rang the bell—how did you hear that?"

"The bell is connected with the laundry."

The front bell rang, and both glanced round.

"Jan, bring whoever it is in here. The police are behind me, so do as I say," he ordered. "And don't say anything."

The fat Dutchwoman waddled away, and swiftly Dynamite ran his practised hands over the body. Like a flash he searched a pocket-book and put it back, then his sharp eyes spied a piece of paper in the dead man's hand. Carefully he removed it, and found that it was covered with figures. A frown of perplexity, and then the paper he placed in his pocket. A glance at the telephone, and Dynamite was certain that the killer was clever and that there would be no finger-prints.

Voices and footsteps. Dynamite turned expectantly.

"Leave the bags, Jan," said a clear, refined voice. "I'm going to 'phone all the servants to come back. Yes, I'm going to live here now."

"But, madame—"

"You seem worried, Jan. What's the matter?" Madame Dvorjak asked, and then saw the tall man. "Oh!"

"How do you do?" The detective stood as much in front of the body as he could.

"May I ask who you are and what you're doing here?"

"Well, it seems to me that up till now, I'm the official body finder." Dynamite stepped to one side and pointed.

Madame Dvorjak stared, her eyes opened wide, and then a terrible scream came from between those red lips. She swayed and collapsed in Jan's arms.

Dynamite went to the 'phone and got in touch with King.

"This is Dynamite. I'm over at Dvorjak's—there's been a murder. What? My boy, that was yesterday—this is another. You'd better come over right away."

Who is Boris?

MADAME DVORJAK was somewhat recovered by the time that King and his special henchman, Joe, arrived on the scene. Another car arrived a few minutes later, with several policemen and a doctor.

King would not hear anything till he had got the doctor's verdict. Shot through the heart at fairly close range—death instantaneous. After that, with Joe, he made an examination of the book-room, and found two of the three doors were locked.

"Someone shot Williams from that door," King stated.

"How did you deduce that?" jeered Dynamite.

"Mister Clever, you got a lot of things to explain," rasped King. "I told you to stick to the Matthews case. How did you get in here?"

"Williams rang me, wanted to talk over old times, and was cut off. I heard the shot, came right over, and like a good little boy rang you at once. Anything else, sir?"

"I'll check up on you later," King turned to the pale, but conscious, lady on the couch. "Suppose you tell us, Mrs. Dvorjak, how you spent the afternoon."

"I've been out at Carmel to friends. I don't remember the exact time I left their place, but if you care to ring them they can tell you. It was not long after lunch. The rest of the afternoon I spent driving to town."

"And what time did you arrive?" asked King.

"This gentleman can testify." She indicated Dynamite. "He was here."

"Pardon me, madame, my name is T. N. Thompson." A deep bow. "My friends know me as Dynamite."

"How do you do?" Madame extended a limp hand.

"When you've all finished I'd like to ask a few questions," King said with heavy humour.

But his questioning did not solve who had killed Williams, or even disclose any sort of clue. After a while Madame Dvorjak showed signs of fainting again.

"I was coming back to this house," she said in a weak voice. "Now, I never want to come here again. Can I go to some hotel?"

"Go where you like, as long as it's in the city limits and I know where you are," King agreed.

"I'll be at the St. Francis."

"Splendid, Madame Dvorjak, that's where I'm staying," Dynamite grinned affably. "I shall take the liberty of calling on you, madame, some time, and I trust you will honour me by receiving me."

"Perhaps," madame smiled pathetically. "You give me a ring."

King took his arm.

"Outside, you!" he ordered. "And just remember you're nothing more than a detective, and not a very good one at that!"

Madame Dvorjak beckoned to the Dutchwoman.

"See the gentlemen out—then I want you."

Madame Dvorjak was sitting up and sniffing at snuffing-salts when Jan returned.

"You are better, madame?"

Charmion Dvorjak put the stopper back in the bottle and then eyed the housekeeper intently.

"Jan, who killed him?"

"I tell the truth—I hear nothing!" gasped the woman.

"You let someone in—who was it—Boris?"

"No—no—no!" The Dutchwoman shook her head in denial.

"You'd lie for him—you always have," madame said fiercely.

"He wasn't here." Jan shook her head even more vigorously. "I haven't seen him for weeks. I swear it."

"All right, Jan, help me to my feet." Madame staggered up. "I'll go now. I'll send for my trunks. Any messages will find me at the St. Francis."

Nearly Caught

LYNNE was a fine secretary, a believer in Dynamite, had faced poverty with him, and loved him. Who can blame her if she were not frightfully friendly to Mona, who she could tell was fascinated by Dynamite. Also, to her way of thinking, it looked as if harbouring a girl, for whom there was a warrant of arrest, would mean several years for those responsible. She made this quite clear to Mona, who was a high-spirited and perhaps a trifle spoilt young beauty.

All that evening Mona thought over the problem. She was placing Dynamite in danger, and yet he had forbidden her to tell anyone where she was. Surely her father was to be trusted? At midnight she decided to 'phone her father.

Mona had vanished, so the Lewis household was alive with plain-clothes men, and the things that they had to check were telephone calls. Joe was in charge, and when the 'phone went he instructed the butler to be discreet.

"I'm listening-in," Joe said, with a slight nod, as he picked up a special receiver. "You behave like you know we want you to act."

"Hallo, Quiney, is dad there?"

"No, Miss Mona."

"Get in touch with him. Tell him I'm with Dynamite and to come and get me. Hurry!"

"Very well, Miss Mona." The wretched butler hung up the receiver.

In the head detective's room at headquarters, at midnight, that great personage was doing his best to bully and bluff the truth out of Clark Lewis.

"Are you gonna come clean or not?"

"I tell you I don't know where she is."

"You knew she was at Dvorjak's the night he was killed!" King shouted. "That's why you sent those two pigeons of yours over. Maybe to help her."

"What a malicious lie!" Lewis had a temper. "Mona knew Dvorjak, but she never went to his house."

"She went that night, and we can prove it!" King was red in the face. "Why did she kill Dvorjak?"

"Three can yell louder than two—let me join in," said a cool, mocking voice. "Do you know where Mona is?"

King swung round. "You were here when I ordered her arrest. Better talk—talk fast—whilst you're in condition."

"Well, I rushed outside and hired an aeroplane," Dynamite said very seriously. "I flew over Lewis' place and let down a rope-ladder. The rest you can guess?"

"Stop fooling!" King's eyes narrowed. "How do you know Mona Lewis has disappeared?"

"You may have told your mugs to keep it under their hats, but one took off his hat," laughed Dynamite. "It's all over the city."

"Is he dead?" whispered Lynne.

"Are you sure you know nothing of Mona's disappearance?" demanded Lewis.

"You engaged me to find out who killed Matthews. If I'm supposed to abduct your daughter, I'm getting my cases all mixed up."

Lewis looked suddenly very old as he got to his feet.

"I'll get back to the house. There may be some message."

"Stick around—my men are all around your shack," King snapped out, and laughed harshly as the door slammed. Then he eyed Dynamite balefully. "We've got Lewis cold—either it was his girl or his two bouucers who picked off Dvorjak."

"I'm all against these correspondence courses," jeered Dynamite. "They get you boys so mixed up."

"All right, Mr. Fresh Guy, let's see you get Lewis out of this jam."

"Okay!" Dynamite comfortably seated himself. "Matthews was shot with a thirty-two bullet and someone had a nice boufire in his shack. Are those two facts correct?" King nodded. "Now, what did you find out about those ashes?"

"They were sheets of music," King opened a drawer. "One was almost untouched, and we could tell that the rest of the ash was music like this."

"Probably his favourite tune—can I borrow it?"

"Going to play it?"

"For my own benefit," was Dynamite's dry answer. "Well, I think that will be all." He selected a cigar from a box, and grinned at King's auger. "So long."

Dynamite arrived at his hotel, took the lift to the sixth floor, and found two men waiting for him.

"We had an idea you'd be breezing along," smirked Joe.

"Great of you boys to come round to see me!" Dynamite beamed at them. "We got a marvellous restaurant in this hotel. Come down and see the grill. I could manage some supper."

"We'd rather see suites seventy-eight and nine," Joe smiled. "One is where you work and sleep, and the other where our secretary lives. We don't mind which we see first."

"Why this eagerness to see over my rooms? Thinking of staying here?"

"Your bluff's no use, Dynamite. Mona Lewis 'phoned home, said she was with you," Joe sniggered triumphantly.

"You boys will clown." Dynamite did not betray himself. "Someone's having a joke with you."

"You open up those rooms and sharp," hissed Joe, and out flashed a gun. "Get going!"

Now, Lynne had found out from Mona what the girl had done, and she was worried. She kept mighty close to her door, and so she knew the cops were there because Dynamite was speaking so loudly—trying to warn her.

Dynamite conducted the two policemen round his rooms.

"You're doing all right, Dynamite," Joe glanced round. "There ain't a gaol like this in California that I know of. Well, let's go and see your secretary." He gave Dynamite an admiring glance. "She's clever. I thought she might try to walk out whilst we were here, so I hid another man in the corridor. She didn't fall."

"I shall protest strongly to the governor," Dynamite told them. "Mona Lewis isn't here or with my secretary. You want to stay in the force, I suppose?"

"You can't bluff us. Get going!" shouted Joe.

Lynne was there, but no sign of Mona. And Lynne gave the two cops a rating for daring to push into her rooms.

"Why not try the bath-room?" suggested Dynamite. "You might try a bath at the same time." He wondered where Lynne had hidden the girl.

"She's here and we'll find her!" Joe was livid with rage.

Those two ransacked the place, but no sign of Mona, and the more they searched the more Dynamite jeered at them.

"Serves you right for snooping on 'phone calls," he told them. "Maybe someone played a trick, as I hinted. It might have been Lynne, or it might have been someone who wanted to get a couple of dumb elucks away from Lewis' house. That makes you think."

The other man drew Joe to one side. "King'll yell his head off if he finds out we left Lewis. Dynamite's right—someone's pulled a fast one. We oughta get back and see what's happened with Lewis. Come on!"

Dynamite could hear the whispering. "Have a drink, boys, before you go?"

"It's going to be a pleasure to walk you out of this town," Joe scowled. "One day it'll be our turn to laugh."

When Dynamite was certain they had left the hotel he looked at Lynne and smiled.

"Where is she?"

A cupboard full of dresses and cloaks. Dynamite peered round. "I don't see her."

Lynne pointed to a number of zip-fastener hold-alls for dresses.

"Four of them contain dresses, but the fifth." Lynne ripped down the zip-fastener, and inside the hold-all was Mona.

"You Houdini!" shouted Dynamite. "Be gosh, you had me beat." In his joy he kissed both the women, and for once Lynne was not jealous. Maybe the gleam of appreciation in her chief's eyes had appeased her.

"I'm a fool to have done it," Lynne said. "Because now I'll get a life sentence."

"Maybe." Dynamite winked at her, and then fished out the roll of music. "Stop being the strong woman and look at this. Sing it!"

"Are you all right?" Lynne asked. "There's method in my madness," was his reply. "Just hum this music, and I want you, Mona, to listen carefully."

"I'm not a nightingale," argued Lynne. "And it's after one in the morning."

"Just to please me, sweetheart," he begged. "Just hum it, but be tuneful if you can."

So Lynne hummed it, and Dynamite watched Mona. A puzzled frown appeared on her forehead, and then the dawn of recollection.

"That's what Dvorjak was playing when he was killed!" she cried out excitedly.

"The answer to the problem." Dynamite rubbed his hands together. "I've not got all the links in the case. What Mona has said completes everything. Now we've got to get busy."

"At this hour of the morning?"

"Yes, Lynne, at this hour," he told them. "Put on warm things because it's cold outside, and get over as quickly as you can to Dvorjak's house. I got a key out of Jan. Use it if you can't wake her. Go into the music-room and wait for me. I'm going to phone your father, Mona, and call King. You get ready whilst I get these calls—I must get everyone to complete the case. Don't argue, girls, but hurry!"

The Hidden Gun

DETEKTIVE KING and his men arrived at the Dvorjak house. Lynne and Mona were there—he placed them under arrest. Clark Lewis appeared and King had to arrest him. Last of all Dynamite appeared with Madame Dvorjak.

"Dynamite—you're under arrest!" snarled King.

"Why not be original and shake hands?" jeered the detective. "I've got this little gathering together to try to clear up a problem that has completely baffled you, and which if not cleared up may cost you your job. I've brought Madame Dvorjak here because August 17th, 1933.

I thought she was entitled to hear what I have discovered."

"Well, if you've discovered anything, let's get at it!" shouted King. "And make it snappy!"

"Follow me to the music-room." Dynamite waved them forward, and when everybody was inside the room: "Better close the doors."

"Why?" King wanted to know.

"If I fail you can do the talking, King," the private detective said tersely.

"To prove my case I must be allowed to proceed without interruptions."

"Okay, I see you getting about twelve years."

Dynamite grinned and turned to Mona.

"Miss Lewis, I want you to go to the exact spot you were standing when the shot was fired." The girl stood by the piano. "Lynne, will you please sit at the piano." He placed the music before her. "I want you to pretend to be Dvorjak, and all you have to do is to play this tune to the best of your ability."

With a resigned shrug as if she thought Dynamite crazy, Lynne sat down at the piano and began to play. The notes of the organ swelled and billowed in the music-room.

Dynamite went over to the organ reeds and placed his ear close to each one in turn. Supposing the mechanism of these pipes went wrong, how could one examine them? The walls were oak-panelled, and that gave him an idea. He peered closely, and then ran his fingers over the woodwork—he pressed a knot and there was a click. A panel had snapped open. The detective pushed it open and flashed a torch. He was looking at the pipes and the mechanism of the organ. His eyes found what he was expecting—a gun.

Dynamite dived out of the panel and held up his hands.

"Stop, Lynne—stop!"

"Don't yell!" Lynne shouted back at him. "I'm doing my best. It's a grand piano."

Dynamite dived across the room, and to the amazement of everyone gave Lynne a violent push. Next moment a shot rang through the music-room and a bullet ricocheted off the walls. King, Joe and two of his men drew their guns, and glanced round to see who had fired.

"Are you all right, Lynne?" Dynamite asked of the angry woman, who sprawled on the floor. "You'd have been shot otherwise."

"Why didn't you let King play Dvorjak?" was her answer.

Dynamite helped her to her feet, and then went over to the panel that led to the organ loft. "King, Joe—here's your murderer!"

"A set-gun!" King was astounded. "Gosh, I've got it! The gun fired at a certain note on one of the organ pipes. Better remove it, Joe."

Madame Dvorjak stepped forward, in spite of the Dutchwoman clinging to her arm.

"Only one person could have thought out that trick." Her face was white.

"Jarl had a son by a former marriage," explained Madame Dvorjak. "A gambler and a spendthrift. Jarl paid him an allowance and forbade him the house and the use of his name. Boris hated his father."

"So he planted the gun to inherit the entire fortune?" questioned Dynamite.

"Yes!" The woman laughed shrilly. "But what he didn't know was that Jarl had legally disowned him. Boris killed his own father without reason or benefit. I brought him up when he was a little baby, and he often came here when his father was away on a concert. Jan must have been letting him in lately, and I've known nothing about it. Boris was a clever engineer and musician—now you understand how the gun was fixed to the pipe."

"And I'll tell you, King, something else," added Dynamite. "This Boris was Matthews. He dabbled in engineering, electricity and radio. That accounts for the laboratory at Aptos and the pair of pliers that was found on him. He perfected an electrical cell device that would react to the vibrations of certain combinations of tones, and would move the trigger of that set gun. That music was an old favourite of Jarl's, and one he was remodelling as a new composition. The boy knew it. Probably hid in the organ loft and heard his father play on many occasions. Boris had to get a number of copies printed for his own experiments, hence the burnt music ashes. He planned to remove the gun when all the outcry had died down." He paused. "Unfortunately someone got him first."

King stiffened.

"Yes, who did shoot him? Who shot Williams?"

"Don't rush me, King. You mustn't spoil my dramatic effect." The detective produced a piece of paper. "This I took from Williams."

"Thanks for not taking the body," sneered King.

"On the paper are written a word, some figures and some letters," the private detective explained. "The word is centre." He went to the middle of the room. "You observe the floor is done in black and white squares like a chess-board. After centre there is a W and a figure 4. That means west four squares." He walked to this square. "Then it says S. 3, and we move south three squares." He pointed down at a black square. "This should be the one." He examined his watch. "Joe, will you open the doors and see if your namesake has arrived?"

Sure enough a little wizened fellow with sly eyes had been detained by police guarding the house. King ordered that he should be brought into the music-room.

"Why, that guy is Chiseler Joe," King gasped. "You're under arrest!"

"Chiseler, don't take any notice of him," Dynamite elucked. "If you do what I want King will give you a free pardon and a hundred bucks as a reward. I want you to open a safe, and I think it's underneath this block of wood."

How they gaped when the block of wood came away and there was a safe in the floor. Chiseler Joe got his nimble fingers to work, and at last it was open.

"I'll tell you what that safe contains without you looking, King," the private detective stated. "Divorce papers. Williams knew they were there because he put them there for Dvorjak. Somebody wanted those papers to inherit a fortune and tried to buy Williams. He got scared and phoned me—it was his death warrant."

"For the love of Mike who did kill him?" King almost screamed.

"Dvorjak's son Boris, alias Matthews, and this unknown worked together. When the unknown knew that the gun was set, then someone was hired to bump off Boris. Plenty of guys in this town, King, would do the job for two or three hundred bucks. The problem was the gun in the organ loft. It must be left there until the hue-and-cry has abated before removal," Dynamite spoke tantalisingly slowly. "The other problem is the safe. The unknown doesn't know where the safe is, but knows what it contains. Williams was a

Into the jungle came men of the wild white youth's own race and colour, and he found himself the chief actor in a strange and perilous drama. A terrific serial story of a $500,000 quest that revealed a lost kingdom and restored to the world a medical formula of the first importance to humanity. Episode 2—"Captured by Cannibals"

READ THIS FIRST

In the hope of obtaining a cure for infantile paralysis, the Carnafellow Foundation sends two American specialists and their assistants to an experimental station in darkest Africa.

Dr. Trevor is one of them, and he and his assistant, Carl, are interested only in benefiting humanity. Not so their two colleagues, Braeken and Phillips, these being more interested in a $500,000 reward which has been offered for a cure.

Trevor discovers an antidote, and Braeken and Phillips attempt to secure the formula of it. To outwit them, Trevor writes one half of the formula on a parchment, and engraves the other half on a wrist-band worn by his little son, Jan.

At the experimental station there is a menagerie packed with wild animals, used by the doctors in their research. That same night these break loose, and in the excitement young Jan is led into the jungle by Chiema, a tame chimpanzee which has been his playmate.

Trevor follows them. His wife is slain by the escaped animals, and so is his assistant. Braeken and Phillips survive, and return to America, but fifteen years later they come back to Africa, learning that Trevor has suddenly shown up at the home of a trader named Andrews.

They reach Andrews' remote trading station only to discover that Trevor's mind is a blank.

About that same time Chiema and Jan, who is now grown to manhood, are captured by the crew of a steamer on which Andrews' daughter, Mona, is travelling. But the craft later runs into a storm and springs a leak, and in the resultant confusion Jan and his chimpanzee are assisted by Borno, a seaman who is something of a mystery.

Suddenly there is an explosion in the boiler-room!

The Survivors

THE explosion that ripped the deck of the Natal was followed by another blast that spread further destruction, and as a result of this second concussion the occupants of the lifeboat amidships were pitched head-long into the sea, one of the davits having snapped as the craft was being lowered over the side.

Meanwhile, Jan Trevor and the ape Chiema had leaped overboard, and the pair of them were being lifted on high upon the crests of the great waves when the white youth was swept against a floating hatch that had been hurled from the doomed ship.

It formed a kind of raft and, clambering on to it, he pulled Chiema after him. Then all at once, in the glare of a burst of lightning, he beheld the face of a man who was swimming near by.

Jan recognised him as Borno, who alone amongst the Natal's crew had shown him any kindness, and he made haste to reach out and clutch the older man, hauling him on to the raft.

In that same flash of lightning Jan had desecrated a girl struggling in the water a few yards farther away. She was Mona Andrews, who had been tipped from the lifeboat with Mrs. Torrance, the other woman passenger, and several of the ship's company.

Simple and uncultured as he was, Jan's instinct was to help a fellow-creature in distress and, sliding back into the sea, he struck out towards the girl and seized her. Then he fought his way to the raft again, and Borno assisted him to drag her on to the comparative safety of the floating hatch.

They crouched there in the storm-racked night, while their makeshift raft rose and fell with the vast motion of the sea. Now they would be carried upward on the summit of a mountainous, liquid ridge dappled with foam, then they would sweep downward into a deep, smooth trough, and all about them the wind howled, the thunder pealed, and the air was charged with elemental fury.

They kept a look-out for others to whom they might be able to render aid, but failed to discern anyone. While riding the crest of a wave, however, they looked back to gain a last impression of the shattered vessel from which the surge of the ocean was driving them—and they saw her go down by the bows, with forked fire from the heavens playing upon her luckless hull.

With the disappearance of the Natal they felt strangely alone—alone in the dark immensity of the ocean—and for hours they lay upon their raft wondering what their ultimate fate would be. They could not sleep, and indeed they did not dare to let themselves sleep, for they had to remain awake and alert to avoid rolling or slithering into the sea.

Actually they were not many miles off the coast, and they were being urged slowly yet surely in the direction of land. But there was a glimmer of dawn in the sky before they were finally cast up on a stretch of lonely beach.

Abandoning the raft, they waded through the shallows and then collapsed on the sands, where, in sheer exhaustion, they slept like logs through day-break, sunrise and the early hours of the morning.

Chiema was the first to awake. He had curled himself close to Jan, and upon opening his bright, intelligent eyes he lost little time in arousing the white youth, slapping him comically and almost humanly upon his muscular chest.

Jan pulled himself to his feet with a yawn, and Chiema began to caper around him, chattering the while. It was the ape's chattering that presently disturbed Borno's slumbers, and he struggled up, this strange man of European complexion but Moorish costume.

Jan moved across to him and, indicating his mouth, spoke in monosyllabic English. It was as if he had never known any but the simplest words in that language, and even forgotten many of these. Yet though the sentences that he spoke were child-like in their construction, his voice was deep and melodious and manly and, strangely enough, there was a faint trace of an American accent in his pronunciation.

"Eat," Jan said. "Chiema and I—we go find food."

Again he touched his mouth, and for the first time Borno noticed that he was wearing a bracelet on his wrist, an ornament fashioned from some flexible but hard-wearing substance.

The flexibility of that bracelet had allowed it to expand as the years of Jan's childhood had passed, years during which he had grown tall, stout and strong. And upon the bracelet was still inscribed, in legible engraving, a number of medical symbols that would have meant nothing to Borno, but a great deal to two men named Bracken and Phillips.

Jan turned now and, bidding Chiema follow him, began to make his way towards a scowling wall of jungle that overlooked the beach, dark and menacing above the golden sands.

The white youth and the chimpanzee disappeared amongst the trees and thickets, and after a moment Borno walked across to where Mona Andrews was lying, still fast asleep.

She was stretched out on her back, and her arms were wide-spread, the hands open. Looking down at her, Borno thought how beautiful she was, and he was gazing at her in admiration when all at once he observed that curious mark tattooed in one of her palms.

As he beheld this mark the bronzed features of Borno underwent a startling change of expression—an expression that was transformed from keen admiration to sheer amazement.

Stooping, he peered at the girl's hand intently, and then, more surprising still, he suddenly dropped on one knee and made an obeisance that was slave-like in its humility.

"The Royal Lotus of Mu!" he breathed. "Princess, I salute thee!"

Had Mona Andrews awakened then, she would doubtless have eyed Borno in complete bewilderment. But she did not awaken for another half-hour, and on raising herself she found him standing near by with folded arms.

For a moment she could not imagine where she was or what had happened, but ere long the events of the preceding night came back to her, and she stood up.

The heat of the sun had dried her August 17th, 1935.

clothes upon her, and she felt little the worse of her experiences. It was with a pang that she thought of Mrs. Torrance, however, and all those others who had doubtless perished in the storm.

Then she remembered Jan and Chiema. "Where is that queer white boy?" she asked Borno.

"He has gone to search for food, and has taken the ape with him, princess," her companion rejoined.

Before Mona could comment upon the manner in which he had addressed her, Jan and Chiema reappeared on the edge of the jungle, the former being laden with fruits from the forest.

He hurried down the beach to where Mona and Borno were standing, and now, for the first time, he seemed to take particular note of the girl, eyeing her as if she had been some creature from another world—impressed by the loveliness of her features, watching how the sunlight seemed to play in her blonde hair. Then he gave her some of the fruit that he had gathered from the jungle trees.

"Thank you," said Mona.

"Thank you?" Jan repeated vaguely.

"Er—me Jan. You 'Thank you'?"

"No," she answered with a smile, shaking her head. "My name is Mona. You Jan—I am Mona. Listen, I want to thank you for saving my life last night."

"Life?" Jan had not heard that word "Last night?"

He was still staring at her, seemingly unable to take his eyes off her, and she turned to Borno.

"He puzzles me," she murmured. "He acts as though he had never seen a girl before."

"No doubt he has never seen a white girl before," Borno suggested.

He was right. Jan had never been close to a settlement until yesterday, when he had been captured not far from Pangani. Prior to that he had lived right in the heart of the jungles, seeing no other human beings except the native tribes, and he had long since learned that it was wise to keep away from these.

"Yes, princess," Borno went on, "you are probably the first white girl he has ever set eyes on."

"Princess!" Mona exclaimed. "That's what you called me a few minutes ago. Why the high-sounding title?"

"You are a princess," Borno answered gravely.

During her cruise on the ill-fated Natal, Mona had quickly come to the conclusion that Borno was an odd, but likeable, individual, and she felt she had reason to endorse that opinion now. She merely decided, however, that the seaman had taken a fancy to her, and that in calling her "princess" he was passing some word compliment.

"All right, then, Borno," she said in a merry tone, "I'll be a princess on one condition—that you take me to my home. We can't be so very far from it."

"Yes," Borno murmured, "I will take you to your home."

"You will?" Mona rejoined. "You know where my father's trading post is?"

"I know where your home is," Borno said ambiguously, "and it is my sacred duty to take you there."

Sacred duty. The words echoed in the girl's mind. What a queer man this Borno was, to be sure—with his "princess" and his "sacred duty." She began to think that he was a little crazy, and living in some world of his imagination. It might be as well to humour him.

Her reflections were interrupted by

Jan. He had been listening closely to the conversation between Mona and Borno, and had singled out one word which was familiar to him.

"Home," he said.

"Yes, Jan," Mona said. "After we've eaten I'll set out for home. Can you understand me? I—go—home."

"You go?" Jan said. "Then me go, too? Chiema go?"

"Why not?" Mona declared. "Yes, we'll all go. Borno, I think my father and mother would be interested in this white boy. How old would you say he is?"

"About your own age, princess," Borno opined. "Perhaps a year or two older."

"I wonder where he picked up the few words that he speaks," the girl mused. "I'd love to know his past history—how he came to be running wild in these jungles—and who his parents were."

Borno gave her a strange, penetrating glance.

"There are many who do not know their parents," he observed, and the conversation closed with this cryptic remark, which Mona did not attempt to comprehend.

Attacked in the Jungle

HAVING satisfied their hunger with the fruits from the tropical forest, the survivors of the Natal plodded across the beach and penetrated the dense thickets above the sands, Borno leading the way, Mona following him and Jan bringing up the rear with Chiema.

Borno seemed to know the jungle like the palm of his hand. Indeed, he knew it almost as well as Jan, and in some ways was even more familiar with it. Tramping on with purposeful stride, he never once was confused by the maze of paths that threaded it.

Towards noon the heat intensified, and, although sheltered to some extent by the foliage overhead, the travellers elected to call a halt and rest.

Borno and Mona sat down in the shadiest spot they could find, and Jan settled himself beside them. But the white youth possessed an amazing vitality, and ere long he was on his feet again, capering around with Chiema, tweaking the ape's ears, wrestling him and rolling with him on the ground.

A strange picture they made, the hirsute chimpanzee with its ungainly legs and trailing arms, Jan with his fine, straight limbs and sunburned body, muscles rippling with his every movement.

With interest, amusement and admiration Mona and Borno watched them.

Chiema seemed to be enjoying the game as much as his human companion, and, suddenly veering off, he began to lead Jan a dance, springing for the looped vines that festooned the trees.

Jan gave chase merrily, and the pair of them climbed and swung to and fro among the high boughs and the tough creepers. From the ground below, Borno and Mona continued to watch them, marvelling at the white youth's agility.

"He's as much at home amongst the tree-tops as the ape, isn't he?" Mona commented. "I—"

She stopped short, for in turning to speak to Borno she had detected a movement in the undergrowth some twenty or thirty paces away. Next instant a tawny figure breasted the vegetation and stalked into full view—the form of a young and powerful lion.

For a moment Mona was too confounded to utter a sound, and then she gave vent to a sharp cry.

"Borno!" she gasped. "Look!"

The man at her side turned his head to glance in the direction she had indicated, and he, too, was rooted to the spot as he saw that monarch of the jungle. Then all at once the brute came padding towards them at an ever-quickening pace, growling as it advanced.

A scream broke from Mona, and it was the sound of her voice that caused Jan to check himself in his headlong pursuit of Chicma through the tree tops.

Looking back and down, he saw the girl and her companion—saw the hungry lion that was making for them—and with a shout he spun around on his toes and leaped from the branch on which he had paused.

His sure hands clamped fast on a hanging vine, and he plunged through space in a long, sweeping arc, dropping lithely to another tree-bough thirty yards away. He was then above the spot fifty feet above them, to be exact—but he caught hold of another creeper and slid swiftly towards the ground.

The lion was bounding forward now, desperate to claim a human prey, roaring fearfully. Mona was cowering back in terror, and Borno was making frantic efforts to pluck out a knife that he was carrying—but the weapon would not come free, and the approaching brute was very close.

It seemed to single out Mona, and sprang for her, but even as it did so a hundred and ninety pounds of brawn and bone hurtled down on it from aloft in the shape of Jan Trevor, and, balked in its jump, the lion missed the girl.

Man and beast came down in a heap, and a fearful snarling filled the air as they rolled to and fro over the ground, Jan with his hands buried in the savage creature's thick mane, the lion striving to tear at him with its fangs. A few feet away, Mona screamed in terror as she watched the deadly combat, and her voice was punctuating the roaring of Jan's infuriated antagonist in shrill accents when Borno succeeded in extricating his knife.

"Jan!" he cried out hoarsely, and threw the dagger towards the white youth.

The knife fell beside the son of the jungle. He was sprawled under the lion's body, still clutching the animal by its mane and forcing its slaving muzzle away from his throat; but as he saw the glint of the blade on the ground close by, he let go of the monster's hair with one hand and snatched up the weapon.

Next second he was plunging it deep into the lion's body. Again and again he struck, until the roaring of the brute had sunk to a faint gurgle—until its last breath was drawn and it lay a dead weight across his chest.

He heaved the carcass aside then, and, scrambling to his feet, moved over to Borno and handed him back his blood-stained knife with an appreciative nod. Meanwhile, Chicma had descended from the tree-tops, and was now running forward to fling his arms around one of Jan's muscular thighs, as if thankful that his human comrade was safe.

Mona stumbled towards the white youth. She was as pale as death, and the hand that she laid on his arm was trembling violently.

"Jan, are you all right?" she faltered. "Simba—fight," Jan said grimly, glancing at the carcass of the lion. "I fight better—with Borno's knife."

"You saved my life, Jan," Mona breathed. "Borno, let's get on our way. The sooner I reach home, the better I'll be pleased."

But the girl's desire to make for home without delay was not to be fulfilled. For—unbeknown to her, unbeknown to Jan, Borno or even Chicma—other eyes had witnessed the scuffle between man and beast.

The eyes of black warriors of the bush, who had been attracted to the scene by the roaring of the lion and the screams of Mona!

The savages had crept towards the spot through the trees and the undergrowth, and now they were peering intently at the survivors of the Natal. All told, the bushmen numbered a score—a hunting party from a tribe inhabiting the wilds—and they had been engaged in a quest for meat.

It was animal meat that they had been after, but the tribe to which they belonged possessed cannibalistic tendencies, and as they gazed through the foliage at the white girl and her companions they held a whispered consultation—a consultation that was brought to an abrupt close at a signal from one who appeared to be their leader.

Next second they were charging from the thickets, black demons of the jungle, intent on securing three victims whose capture would be an occasion for a grim feast in the kraal of their people.

So sudden and unexpected was the onset that Jan, Mona and Borno were surrounded and seized before they could raise a hand to defend themselves, but Chicma came to the aid of his comrade, and created a diversion that enabled the white youth to recover himself and show fight.

Battling tooth and nail, Jan flung his assailants to right and left. In the meantime, those of the savages who had flung themselves upon Borno and Mona were having less trouble with their victims.

Already Mona had been overpowered and was being bound with thong—thongs which had been intended for use in carrying the carcasses of slaughtered animals. As for Borno, he had been knocked to the ground in the first moment of the attack.

He tried to rise and offer some resistance, but he was held down and made fast; and both he and Mona were helpless prisoners when a file of men suddenly appeared round a bend in the jungle path.

These, too, were natives, but they were obviously employees of some trader, for many of them were carrying hales of merchandise on their heads and others were armed with rifles of the latest pattern.

At sight of them the cannibals were thrown into confusion, and those who had secured Borno and Mona made haste to drag their captives off into the thickets. The group which had pounced on Jan attempted to follow suit, and managed to pull the young white man clear of the jungle trail, but in the thick of the vegetation he broke away from his assailants, and they abandoned him as too much of a handful.

Glaring after them, Jan saw them overtake their fellows, and within a few seconds the whole party of cannibals had disappeared with Mona and Borno in their midst. Nevertheless, Jan had no intention of losing track of them, and ere long he and Chicma were up amongst the trees, swinging through the high foliage and shadowing the pack of hostile warriors, whom they were now able to see distinctly from above.

Back on the jungle trail where the attack had taken place, the gang of natives who had interrupted the scuffle were holding an excited council.

They were headed by ono Kutu, and Kutu was an under-foreman in the employ of Trader Andrews, Mona's father. But he had not recognised his master's daughter in the brief glimpse that he had obtained of the cannibals and their prisoners.

The clearest impression which he had gained had been of Jan, as the latter was being hauled into the thickets, and he imagined that the white youth was still a captive in the hands of the savages.

"We are strong enough to fight that one party of warriors," Kutu said to his co-workers, speaking rapidly in the native dialect. "But if we follow, we may run into an ambush. No, it is better that we should hasten straight to the trading post and report this thing to Bwana Andrews."

The Watchers in the Trees

AT the trading post occupied by Andrews and his wife, Bracken and Phillips were making repeated efforts to revive Dr. Harry Trevor's memory. Right now they were seated in a back room with the derelict surgeon, plying him with questions, striving to draw the veil from his mind.

"Even if you can't remember Phillips or me," said Bracken, "surely you can remember the Carnafellow Foundation."

Trevor looked at him dully, and all at once Phillips cut in with a sharp query. "Listen," he snapped impatiently, "what have you done with the formula? Your formula for the cure of infantile paralysis?"

"Formula?" Harry Trevor repeated, and then suddenly it was as if some vague recollection was stirred in his brain.

"My formula," he breathed, reaching into one of his pockets.

Bracken and Phillips exchanged swift glances, and next moment the senior member of that crooked partnership was leaning forward eagerly.

"Here, give it to me, Trevor!" he commanded.

A queer light dawned in Harry Trevor's eyes. He looked at Bracken steadily for several seconds, and then withdrew his hand from his pocket, empty. But if some slight understanding of the past had come to him, it was only temporarily, and in another instant his mind was a blank again—a blank except for wild, disconnected thoughts that sped through it.

"Jan gone!" he said. "Everything gone!"

He began to mutter incoherently, and gradually his voice rose until he was crying out in loud and anguished tones. In vain Bracken and Phillips tried to calm him. He struggled to his feet and flung away from them, blundering aimlessly to and fro with the sweat of fever on his brow and his face twitching.

"Jan!" he shouted. "Jan, where are you?"

His cries brought Mrs. Andrews and her husband, and the wife of the trader wrung her hands as she saw the derelict's condition.

"The poor man's having another one of his spells!" she said distressfully. "They usually lay him up for days."

"Don't worry, Mrs. Andrews," Bracken said quickly. "I think I can do something for him. Help me to get him to a room where I can be alone with him. Phillips, get the medicine chest!"

By main force Bracken and Andrews dragged Trevor into another apartment and put him to bed. Then Phillips appeared, and, after helping his senior to give the sick man a palliative, he retired with Andrews.

The trader went off to attend to his own affairs. Mrs. Andrews had already gone back to the kitchen, where she was generally kept busy looking after the black servants of the ménage. Phillips remained outside the apartment where Bracken had been left with Trevor, and he was still kicking his heels in the vicinity of that room when his confederate emerged half an hour later.

August 17th, 1935.

"Well?" Phillips asked.

"That draught put him to sleep," Bracken said in a tone of satisfaction, "and gave me a chance to run through his pockets."

"You found the parchment?" Phillips jerked.

"Yes," answered Bracken. "One half of that five-hundred-thousand-dollar formula is ours. And now we've got to keep plugging away at him until we can make him remember the other half of it."

Phillips pursed his lips. "I wish we knew where that flexible bracelet was," he muttered. "You remember? The other half of the formula was engraved on it."

"Yes," Bracken grunted, "and it disappeared that night fifteen years ago—on the wrist of the boy Jan."

It was at this juncture that the pair of them heard a commotion outside the building, and, making their way to the stoep, they discovered Andrews in the act of haranguing a party of clamouring bearers who had just arrived at the post.

"For the love of Mike stop your jabbering!" he was shouting at them. "Cool off, will you? Cool off! Hey, Kutu, you do the talking. What's the trouble, anyway?"

The native whom he had singled out proceeded to explain, and, when Kutu had finished his narrative, Andrews glanced at Bracken and Phillips.

"What's up?" the latter inquired.

"These black boys of mine say that they saw cannibals making off with some prisoners," Andrews rejoined. "One of them was this wild white boy who lives deep in the jungle."

Phillips gave a start.

"A wild white boy?" he echoed. "Who is he? Have you ever seen him?"

"No," the trader answered, "and I never expect to. I think it's a silly legend."

"Maybe not," breathed Phillips. "Your men say they saw him, anyhow. Bracken, do you suppose—"

He did not finish the sentence, but Bracken knew what he was thinking.

"It's worth investigating," he said curtly. "Andrews, do your men know where that cannibal village lies?"

"Yes," came the reply. "There's only one bad bunch of niggers in these parts. They're the people who live near the river."

"Will these blacks of yours lead Phillips and me to this cannibal kraal?" Bracken asked.

Andrews frowned.

"They'll lead you close to it—but not too close," he murmured. "I wouldn't advise you to go, though. You'd be taking your lives in your hands. What's this wild white boy to you, anyway—even if he really does exist?"

"We can't stop to explain that now," Bracken said. "Will you tell your boys what we want them to do?"

Andrews reluctantly agreed, and with still more reluctance his employees prepared to take the trail. It was clear that they did not relish the business, and looked upon their master's two guests as foolhardy.

As for the Americans, their mood was one of intense excitement and expectation. They were alive to the dangers ahead of them, but were willing to undergo any hazards if there were a chance of obtaining the other half of Trevor's formula and the five hundred thousand dollars that the complete script would bring them.

How they were to gain possession of the missing half of that formula if the youth who innocently carried it were in the hands of a hostile tribe—this they did not know. Nor was it a question that occupied them yet. They would have to wait and see how events turned out.

Fifteen minutes later, Bracken, Phillips and the gang of natives in Andrews' employ were trekking into the jungle, Kutu acting as guide. They were also accompanied by Allen, the trader's right-hand man, who had volunteered to join the expedition.

At the close of the afternoon they were still on the march, and Bracken and Phillips were showing signs of fatigue.

"How much farther?" Bracken demanded of Kutu.

"One more hour to village mebbe," the native headman replied, glancing uneasily to right and left. "But no go too far."

"You'll go as far as you're told," cut in Allen, to whom the Americans had made themselves particularly amiable. "You're headman to the black boys, but you take your orders from me—"

He paused, for at that moment a weird and awesome sound came to the ears of the travellers, a sound that was borne from afar—throbbing through the hot, breathless air.

"What's that?" said Bracken.

"Jungle drums," Allen vouchsafed. "Seems like the people of the river are getting ready for a fiesta."

He and his party were not the only ones who were listening attentively to the savage rhythm of those tom-toms. Several miles away a youth was harkening to them grimly—a youth who had posted himself high up in the fork of a tree not far from the kraal of the cannibals.

He was Jan Trevor, and with him was Chicma. They had been there for some time—ever since the hunters of the tribe had gained the village with their two captives.

Unseen amid the foliage of the trees, Jan had been close up with them when they had arrived at their destination, and from the lofty eyrie which he now occupied he had watched the welcome they had received, a welcome that had become clamorous when the news had spread throughout the tribe that prisoners had been taken.

He had been watching, too, when Mona and Borno had been dragged off to a hut, to be closely guarded until the hour fixed for their doom was at hand.

With the setting of the sun, the village had become a scene of great activity. Men, women and children had mustered in the dusty patch of ground enclosed by the huts, and had begun to dance to the throb of drums beaten by supple fingers.

Jan looked down upon that fearsome spectacle. He saw strange rites performed, ceremonies that were prolonged into the twilight of evening and the gloom of night, when the flare of torches lent an even more sinister aspect to the proceedings.

The burning brands gleamed upon the faces of the milling savages, gleamed upon the dark river that flowed near the kraal—and shone blindingly in the eyes of Mona Andrews and Borno when man and girl were brought forth into the open.

Amid a tumult of shouts and yells the prisoners were dragged across to two stakes that had been driven into the ground at one side of the village, and, struggling vainly, they were made fast to these.

Borno looked about him with awe-stricken gaze. The muscles of his face were working, and the blood in his veins was running cold. He was no coward, but a great fear was upon him, and it was sheer will power that kept him from crying out. He must not lose grip of himself, he kept thinking. Whatever happened, he would show these black scum that he knew how to die.

He turned his glance towards Mona, a few yards away from him. Her body seemed limp and slack in the imprisoning thongs that lashed her to the stake. Her eyes were closed, and her breath was coming in spasmodic, half-strangled sobs.

Borno forgot his own terrors then, in sympathy for the girl who was sharing his plight.

"Courage, princess," he called out to her hoarsely. "Courage!"

Her eyes opened and her head moved round. She tried to steady herself, and her teeth bit into her quivering lower lip.

Some of the cannibals had hurried across to the edge of the encroaching jungle a few minutes previously, and these now began to reappear with masses of dry brushwood in their arms. The vegetation was soon being piled around the two captives, who then divined the fate that was to be meted out to them.

They were to be burned alive.

The brushwood in position, two witch-doctors advanced with blazing torches and began to caper in front of the prisoners mockingly, going through the movements of some wild, barbaric death-dance. Borno remembered that these creatures had been with the party which had captured Mona and himself—probably accompanying that party so that good fortune might attend the hunters.

Well, good fortune had certainly attended them, according to the lights of the tribe. A human sacrifice was more to the liking of these savages than the slaughter of mere animals.

While the assembled cannibals looked on, the witch-doctors pranced and postured before their victims, making as if to plunge the burning brands into the brushwood from time to time. But they did not let the flames touch the masses of twigs and foliage heaped around the stakes.

It was as the fiendish tormentors were carrying out their ritual that Jan started to work closer to the village, leaving Chicma and stealing from bough to bough until he was actually above the huts of the kraal.

He was then considerably nearer the ground, though still some fifteen or twenty feet above the heads of the savages, and still hidden by the thick greenery of the trees.

He was bent on a desperate plan—to risk his life by staging some sort of diversion, a diversion that might possibly provide him with a chance of cutting Borno and Mona loose.

Jan lowered himself carefully to a far-reaching branch that extended above the stakes to which the prisoners were tied. Then he proceeded to crawl along the bough, but, unfortunately for him, it was rotten through and through, and suddenly it snapped under his weight.

A sharp cry escaped him, and next second he was plunging through space, to crash into the pile of brushwood in front of Mona Andrews.

For a moment there was a blank silence, witch-doctors, warriors, women and children seeming too astonished to make a movement or utter a sound: and then a great howl went up and there was a concerted rush towards the sprawling figure of Jan Trevor!

"WEST POINT OF THE AIR"

of attaching his signature when the steady drone of a squadron of bombing planes became audible to him.

He paused, hesitatingly, uncertainly. Then, with a furtive glance at Dare, he wandered over to a pair of french windows that opened on to a balcony.

She followed him out on to that balcony and found him gazing up at the sky. There was a wrapt and thoughtful expression on his handsome face. He was remembering how he had once looked forward to becoming an ace flyer—how hard he had studied at West Point so that he might fit himself for the Army—how keen he had been when he had graduated and come down to Randolph Field as a student-pilot.

He had been brought up in the atmosphere of aviation. It had been instilled into his blood. Ever since childhood days it had been his ambition to earn his wings.

He would never earn them now.

Miko suddenly realised that Dare's eyes were upon him, a pensive look in them.

"The note of those motors still gets you, doesn't it?" she said shrewdly.

He could not deny it. Lately, he had tried to tell himself that he hated the sound, but it was not so. Despite everything, the drone of the aeroplane engine could still quicken his pulses and send some queer, remote thrill through him.

"I wonder if it will always be the same," Dare went on slowly. "I wonder if I'll always be afraid of losing you—every time you hear a squadron passing overhead."

She was sincere enough in her affection for him. When she had first met him, she had perhaps been attracted by him because he was in the public eye. But since then she had learned to care more deeply—as deeply as she could have cared for anyone, for Dare Marshall's love was essentially selfish. She had wanted him to give up flying because of the risks, and, if he had still been keen on that career, she would have done all in her power to tempt him away from it.

Young Mike had told his father that Dare had put no pressure on him to regard to his resignation. Neither had she, but now that she sensed there was a danger of him wavering from his decision she began to use persuasion.

"Mike," she said, "let's go away from here. Let's go to some place that's as far away from any military aerodrome as possible."

He drew back into the room with her and closed the french windows deliberately.

He strode across to the table where he had written the letter of resignation, and, picking up the pen again, he scrawled his signature. Then he turned to her once more.

"I'll take this to Randolph Field right now and hand it to General Carter personally," he announced.

She kissed him, and he made for the door. In the very instant that he opened it he came face to face with a flushed and breathless girl—Skip Carter.

"Mike," Skip gasped, "I thought I'd locate you at Dare Marshall's place, and I managed to find out where she was staying."

"Why are you here, Skip?" he asked her.

"Listen, Mike," she said, "this evening I brought Phil away from the hospital. He wanted to wish you luck in the manoeuvres, and I took him straight to your quarters. You weren't there, of course, and when we asked one of the boys about you he told us that he didn't think you'd be flying to-night—that you'd mentioned something about resigning your commission."

"Well?"

"Mike, it isn't true!" Skip exclaimed.

"It can't be true."

"Yes, it's true," he answered tersely, showing her the document he had just written. "This is my official resignation, and I'm going to hand it in right now."

"But, Mike," she protested, "won't you take a little more time to think it over?"

He shook his head.

"I've done all the thinking I need to do," he told her.

"But it isn't fair!" Skip cried. "It isn't fair to yourself—to your father. It isn't fair to my father, who helped you in your schooling. Those two men had ambitions for you, Mike—ambitions that you once shared as well."

Dare Marshall came forward. She spoke to the younger girl coolly.

"Don't you think, Miss Carter," she observed, "that Mike is at liberty to suit himself?"

"I think he ought to consider his duty to others, and to the army," Skip retorted. "But I wouldn't expect you to know anything about that."

Dare shrugged her shoulders, and glanced at Mike. The latter was beginning to look uncomfortable.

"It's no use talking," he blurted suddenly. "Skip, Dare is right. I'm at liberty to make up my own mind, and I've reached my decision. I'm going to hand in that resignation now!"

He brushed past her, and she was left alone with Dare Marshall, who now regarded her with a slightly mocking smile on her features.

For a moment Skip looked at the other girl steadily, and then she turned into the hotel corridor to make her way downstairs. When she reached the street she found Mike standing on the kerb, his arm raised to beckon a passing taxi.

Skip moved up to him and plucked at his sleeve.

"Mike," she urged, "won't you—"

"It's no use, Skip," he cut in. "I'm through with the Service!"

He had scarcely spoken the words when he again heard the note of a plane's engine, a note that swiftly developed into a roar as a machine swooped above the roof of Dare Marshall's hotel, flying low.

In the upflung glow of street lights and electric signs young Mike Stone recognised the decrepit "puddle jumper" that he had seen in his father's shed earlier that day.

Aghast, he watched it circle the hotel three or four times. Then it veered off in the direction of Randolph Field.

So his father was making good his promise! He had known where his sor-was likely to be—had come to the vicinity of the hotel to show him that he meant business—and was now on his way to the locale of the manoeuvres.

"It's dad all right!" young Mike panted. "I didn't think he'd do it!"

"Do what?" Skip Carter demanded. "Never mind!" he jerked. "We've got to get to Randolph Field as quick as we can! Come on!"

Power Dive

GENERAL CARTER and a number of his staff were assembled on the landing-ground at Randolph Field, and in the beams of shifting searchlights they were watching the groups of fighting planes that had been ascending at intervals into the air.

Close by, Phil Carter was leaning on a pair of crutches, dividing his attention longingly between the departing squadrons and a number of machines that had still to take off, their pilots awaiting the signal to leave.

It was as he was eyeing these remaining planes that a taxi appeared, and as the cab drew up outside the officers' quarters young Mike Stone and Skip Carter emerged from it.

Phil caught sight of them, and as he recognised them he hobbled across to the carriage-way, reaching it just as Mike was paying off the taxi-driver.

"Mike," the crippled youngster ejaculated, "what's this rumour I hear about you handing in your resignation?"

His chum had turned towards him. There was a gleam of resolution in his eyes—and Phil noticed, too, the light that was shining in Skip's.

"You'll find my resignation on the floor of that cab, in forty pieces," Mike rapped out. "Phil, I'll see you later. I've got to grab myself a flying suit."

He dashed off, and, with Skip accompanying him, Phil returned to the spot where General Carter and his staff were gathered. As they approached the group, the two of them saw that their father was pointing up at the sky and talking in a startled tone to Captain Cannon, chief instructor.

"There it is again," the general was saying. "Look, it's caught in that searchlight beam!"

"Yes, that's it!" exclaimed Cannon. "And it's some crate of a civil plane right enough. I thought so when I got a flash of it a few minutes ago, only I couldn't believe that I'd seen aright, sir."

"Tell them to keep a searchlight trained on it," General Carter ordered testily. "The fool, he's probably some civilian amateur who's liable to get mixed up with our men and do some damage before he breaks his own neck."

The general might have expressed less anxiety but more surprise if he had learned that the "civilian aviator" in question was none other than ex-Sergeant-instructor Michael Stone, better known as Big Mike.

Up there in a gloomy void that was patterned by moving beams of saffron, Big Mike had been circling high over Randolph Field for some little time. He was taking a last look at the only home he had known for thirty years, believing that never again would he see it after to-night's work was done.

He continued to fly above it for several more minutes, and then he struck southward on his fatal mission. What was there to live for, anyway—with the army no longer wanting him and his son a quitter?

About the time that Big Mike turned to make for Eagle Creek, the last of the machines from the aerodrome took off. Among these was one piloted by the ex-sergeant's son, and from the cockpit of his plane the young lieutenant saw his father's craft limned in the ray of a searchlight.

Little Mike climbed rapidly and veered in the direction that the civilian ship was taking. When the latter slipped the searchlight beam which had held it, the pursuing youngster was close enough to keep track of the "crate."

He was gaining on it, for his army plane was much the faster, but Eagle Creek was only two or three miles from the aerodrome, and the civilian craft was still slightly ahead when the objective was reached.

Big Mike pushed the stick forward, and with open throttle swooped toward the creek in a fierce power dive. He saw the guns of an anti-aircraft battery on the banks of the water, and dropped his flares—in lieu of bombs that would have obliterated the artillery if this had been genuine warfare and not a sham action.

A split second afterwards young Mike was dropping similar flares, for he had followed his father downward in a terrific, headlong rush.

And then all at once, as it roared over the heads of the gunners below, the older man's frail ship seemed to crumple sickeningly, and next instant it was falling into the waters of the creek.

Right there and then it came to the mind of Lieutenant Michael Stone that he had seen, a week or so before, a magnificent example of a pancake landing. Gliding out of his dive, he attempted that same feat with the black sheen of the tributary lying below him—attempted it with his hand gripping the control-stick and his teeth clenched hard.

Afraid? Yes, he was afraid, and had felt the restlessness of fear from the time when he had begun to taxi across the turf of Randolph Field a little while ago. But it was an emotion that he had fought down resolutely, and now, with his father's training standing him in good stead, he brought his plane down on the gleaming surface of the water flat and square.

The craft started to sink, and he scrambled out of it, flinging himself into the creek and swimming to the sagging wreck in which the older man had come down. As he gained it he discovered a huddled and insensible figure in the forward cockpit.

The personnel of Randolph Field was on parade before General Carter, and the men assembled there were about to witness two momentous ceremonies—the reinstatement of an instructor who had been dismissed the service, and the presentation of winged badges to a file of that instructor's former pupils, these having passed all tests to qualify as full-fledged pilots.

The name of Sergeant Stone was called, and Big Mike stepped forward—as smartly as a stiff leg would permit, for he had only recently come out of hospital.

He was in uniform again, and, advancing to General Carter, he saluted the commanding officer.

"Sergeant Stone," the general said, "it is our business at Randolph Field to make flyers and men, and the full facts having come to light, there is no doubt that you contributed largely to making a man and a flyer on the night of the manoeuvres."

He paused, and then: "I am glad that the Secretary of War has seen fit to restore you to your former grade," he added.

A few minutes later, Big Mike was carrying out the task of tendering his students their Service wings, personally affixing a badge to the tunic of each young officer as name after name was read out by the general.

Among those names was that of Lieutenant Michael Stone, and from a vantage-point not far away a girl looked on with pride as Big Mike presented his son with one of the coveted badges.

That girl was not Dare Marshall, for she had returned to New York following a quarrel, during which Mike the younger had lost his infatuation for her.

The girl who watched the ceremony that was now being enacted was pretty Skip Carter, and she was waiting for Little Mike when the parade was over.

They met near the corner of one of the aerodrome buildings, and, believing that they were free from inquisitive eyes, they kissed each other fondly. But two interested parties had discerned them, these being none other than Little Mike's father and Joe Bags.

"Y' know," Joe Bags declared, "the general's daughter wuz born under the planet Jupiter, and, takin' all the circumstances into consideration, I've figured out from the book that she'll pick a winner for a husband."

Big Mike gave him a sidelong glance. "For once, Joe," he said, "I'll admit that there's some sense in this stargazin' racket of yours. But let me tell you that my boy Mike will be pickin' a winner for a wife, on the day he asks Skip Carter to marry him."

double-crossing, spineless twister, and out for money, but Williams guessed who was the real brains of this little party, got scared of getting a long sentence for accessory to a crime, and phoned me. Bang—that was Williams."

King shook both fists under Dynamite's nose.

"If you don't say who it was I'll punch you into a jelly." They crowded round Dynamite, who stared at them all mockingly.

"At the back of the organ loft is another door," he told them. "Someone could leave this music-room by the panel I opened, and then out by the other door. A minute ago this room had nine people—now there are only eight."

The express moved out of Frisco, and it took Dynamite and Lynno Marlo. They left quietly and without any ceremony. The main reason being that King had declared that Frisco could not hold two brilliant detectives, but Dynamite did not mind. He had collected a nice sum from Lewis, and through allowing King to take most of the credit for unravelling the Dvorjak mystery he had turned an enemy into an ally.

Lynno opened the morning paper and pointed to the headlines.

"So your unknown escaped justice after all," she said. "Deliberately drove in a car over a precipice to an instantaneous death. I believe you knew more about that escape than you care to say."

"Sometimes it's as well not to see everything that's happening, and what has happened—something like I expected—is for the best," Dynamite relaxed. "Let's talk about something else. Such as going to Atlantic City."

"To open an agency?"

"No, not yet, anyway. I thought it would be a good idea if we got married there. What do you think?"

"Dynamite! Now, I know you're not crazy!" And Lynno flung her arms round his neck much to the amusement of other passengers.

They Missed Him

There are many tales current about the "discerning" movie executives who casually drop in on amateur performances and immediately find unknowns who boomed overnight as motion-picture stars.

But those discerning executives must have been away on a holiday when Joe Morrison first visited the American film capital.

Morrison, who has made sensational progress in his brief year in the films (his latest film is "Four Hours to Kill"), is no stranger to Hollywood. In fact, if producers were as astute as legend tells us, then Morrison might have been procured for the screen years ago.

At that time Morrison was featured in a musical show called "The Nine O'Clock Revue," which played a successful run in a Los Angeles theatre. Virtually every important person in the cinema city went and saw the show, but not one considered Morrison as a film prospect, or had the temerity to make an offer for his services.

It remained for Morrison to return to New York and rise to world-wide fame with his singing of the song, "The Last Round-up," before Hollywood took him back amid shouts and hurrahs.

Hectic Gambling

Vast fortunes are being made—and lost—in Samuel Goldwyn's Hollywood studios. But Sam himself is quite un-concerned and goes on his lawful occasions in a perfectly normal manner, despite the unaccustomed tension and excitement.

The reason for his placidity is simply that the financial fever is confined to the set on which "Barbary Coast" is being made.

The scene is a garish, noisy gambling casino where the size of the stakes would make the eyes of a Monte Carlo croupier bulge with mingled envy and incredulity.

At the cry of "camera!" the dice roll—and a dollar millionaire becomes a pauper. The roulette wheel spins, and a woman, laughing hysterically, grabs a fortune with eager, jewelled hands. At another table sits a group of hard-faced men playing poker with grim determination and stacks of chips a foot high.

A little way off, out of focus of the camera, another game of poker is in progress. But the gamblers are playing for pennies. You see, they are merely extras, whiling away the time until the camera should claim them.

Fast-moving Action

The oft-expressed idea that "moving pictures should move" has reached its ultimate in execution in the latest feature film to go into production at a Hollywood studio. It covers a period of eight hours and crams hectic events that crowd those eight hours into an hour and a quarter of screen entertainment. Studio executives believe that it is one of the fastest pictures, in point of lightning-like succession of action, ever made.

August 24th, 1935.

NEXT WEEK'S BIG FILM THRILLERS

PRESTON FOSTER

IN "THE PEOPLE'S ENEMY"

Thirty-four times George Stuart, a clever attorney, had managed to save his gangster client, Vince Falcone, from the clutches of the law; but the law triumphed in the end, and Falcone—in gaol—became convinced that Stuart had double-crossed him and swore vengeance upon his benefactor.

"STRANDED"

The man was a builder of bridges, the strong, fearless he-man type, and the girl was the mainstay of the Travellers' Aid Society. Both were independent and strong-willed, and but for a gang of crooks they might have been "stranded." Starring Ray Francis and George Brent.

"BULLDOG JACK"

Bulldog Drummond is incapacitated by a gang of crooks and Bulldog Jack nobly promises to undertake a difficult and dangerous commission. A comedy thriller centring round a girl in distress, a valuable necklace and a deserted underground railway station, starring Jack Hulbert and Fay Wray.

Also

Another splendid episode of the thrilling serial of jungle adventure:

"THE CALL OF THE SAVAGE."

Starring Noah Beery, Jun., and Dorothy Short.

This is "Woman Wanted," which George B. Seitz is directing for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Maureen O'Sullivan and Joel McCrea are teamed for the first time. In it Lewis Stone starts the new contract that marks his twentieth year on the screen. The cast also includes Adrienne Ames, Ralph Morgan, Louis Calhern, Claude Gillingwater and Robert Craig.

Events crammed into a single evening's entertainment in the action of the picture include a girl's conviction of murder; wrecking of a police car by criminals to aid her escape; breathless escapes from pursuing detectives in her lawyer's apartments; wild chase with police to trail the real murderer; kidnapping of the heroine; battle on a boat in the harbour; raid on secret hide-out of criminals; re-enactment of a crime, and amid all the action several comedy sequences are introduced!

In the New Tarzan Film

Jock Buckler, the heroic Ham Peggotty of "David Copperfield," won a long-term contract with the studio that raised him to film fame—and the rôle of Major Fry in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's new Tarzan picture.

Buckler's part in the new jungle film is second in importance to those of Johnny Weissmuller and Maureen O'Sullivan, who again portray the famous Edgar Rice Burroughs characters, Tarzan and Jane.

Since "David Copperfield," Buckler has appeared in two pictures, "Eight Bells" and "Black Room Mystery."

Born in Cape Town, South Africa, Buckler toured the British Colonies all over the world with his father's company, then went into American repertory companies and finally on to the Broadway stage, with Katharine Cornell in "The Green Hat."

The opening sequences of this new Tarzan film begin with under-water swimming shots of Weissmuller and Maureen O'Sullivan, the latter now an accomplished swimmer under her co-player's tutelage. Animals galore and an entire tribe of African pygmies are features of the new production.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

H. Calvert; Ahmed Haidou, John Davidson.

A gangster is betrayed to the police, but while being taken by a detective on his last journey an unexpected delay gives him a chance to escape, and he has four hours in which to get his revenge. An amazing thriller, starring Richard Barthelmess

Mako Tells His Story

TWO men sat in a crowded theatre watching a performance. One of them was a big burly man with a square jaw, yet kindly eyes which every now and again strayed to the man at his side, when they wore a rather troubled expression.

The latter, a much smaller man, though of sturdy build, was obviously in the early twenties. He was gazing stolidly at the stage, but his thoughts were evidently not on the piece. For his thin lips were set in a hard line and his eyes were sullen and resentful. He gave the impression that he was miles away in thought brooding revengefully over some very definite wrong.

He addressed his companion abruptly, but in low tones.

"Say, Mr. Taft, can we get out of here for a bit? It's devilish hot, and this show ain't mighty interestin' up to now."

"Goes with me," replied the big man. "I can find out about our train to Wyoming at the same time."

Had anyone been watching them closely they might have noticed that the big man, before they moved from their seats, took some little trouble to arrange his macintosh which lay between the two of them; and that when they quitted their seats they were apparently arm-in-arm and the macintosh was still between them, covering their arms. Though had that same watcher followed the pair outside to the telephone-box he would have noticed even more than this. And he would have registered considerable surprise.

For he would have seen that both of them entered the telephone-box. And the smaller man was closely handcuffed to the big one!

They came out of the box together.

"No train to Wyoming for four hours," said the big detective with a frown. "We'll have to hang on for a while, Mako. There's four hours to kill."

The other shrugged his shoulders indifferently.

"I'd love a smoke, Mr. Taft," he said.

"You can have one. May as well come and sit down."

In a quiet corner they sat down side by side together. The detective produced cigarettes and matches and lit the other's cigarette for him.

"Thanks, Mr. Taft. I reckon you're a bit different from most cops."

The other shrugged his shoulders.

"What's the good of hitting a man when he's down?" he asked. "What did you break prison for, Mako? You might have guessed that you wouldn't have a chance, with no one to help you make your get-away."

The other laughed sullenly.

"I broke prison because I couldn't stiek it any longer," he replied. "It was just drivin' me plumb crazy. It was the waitin' that was doin' it. I was for the chair—I knew it. Not that I cared a row of beans for that, for I ain't got nothin' I want to live for. But as I saw never a chance of gettin' that, I just wanted to die, and die quickly."

He puffed moodily at his cigarette gazing stolidly in front of him.

"I guess you don't know what it's like sittin' and waitin' for the trial that's comin' along, knowin' they're goin' to take days fightin' over legal points, and the chair waitin' for you at the finish. You die a million times, I reckon, while you're waitin' for it. I used to try holdin' my breath, but it wouldn't work."

He paused again, eyes fixed on the carpet in front of him.

Then he went on:

"When the chance came to break prison I jumped to it. Most chaps, I reckon, break prison for the chance of life and freedom. I didn't. There were only two things I wanted. One was to kill Anderson, and the other to die myself when I'd done it. And if I could get the first"—he smiled grimly—"I reckon I'd die real happy."

The detective's face was expressionless. He actually felt sorry for the little man by his side because he knew that Anderson, one of his partners in many a shady transaction, had sold him to the police originally.

"Afraid I can't give you your wish, Mako," he replied.

The other laughed.

"No, I reckon you can't," he said. "Let's talk of somethin' else."

The conversation drifted away then into other channels. Mako wanted to know all about Taft's private life, and became quite interested when the latter acquainted him with the fact that he had a daughter aged nineteen who apparently was the light of her father's eyes.

"Must be fine to have a daughter," he said. "Guess you're mighty proud of her."

The detective admitted the fact—added

August 24th, 1935.

that it was her birthday on the following day, though he hadn't been able to make up his mind what he should buy for a birthday present.

Mako sat silent for a while.

"Say, Mr. Taft," he said presently, "get your hand into my breast-pocket and take out my pocket-book, will you? There's something in it I want."

And when the other had drawn it out he went on:

"Inside it, Mr. Taft," he said, "you'll find three hundred dollars and—"

But the detective interrupted him, shaking his head.

"Lay off that, Mako," he said. "It's not a bit of use tryin' to get me to—"

"Oh, you're barkin' up the wrong tree, Mr. Taft," broke in the other. "I ain't tryin' to bribe you. That three hundred dollars ain't no good to me now. I want you to take it and buy a real swell present for that kid of yours, and—"

"But, Mako, I can't take it—I really can't!"

"Stuff!" retorted the other. "You've got me, and I'm sure for the chair. Well, what's the good of three hundred dollars to me? I can't take it with me, and if I did I reckon it would only melt. Why not take it and buy a swell present for that kid of yours? There's no need to tell her where it came from if you don't want to. Say you'll do it, Mr. Taft! It will be real nice of you if you do."

He got his own way at the finish, and the detective slipped the notes into his cigarette-case.

"It's fine of you, Mako," he said. "I only wish I could do something for you in return."

"If you'd give me a chance to kill Anderson," replied the other grimly, "I'd be real grateful. But you can't do that and I know it. Let's go back and see a bit more of the show. We've got the thick end of four hours before our train goes."

Eddie Miller Gets a Shock

YOU can have your choice—two hundred dollars by to-morrow morning, or marriage."

"But, Mae, you're crazy. I couldn't possibly find it."

"Please yourself. It's all the same to me, whichever I get."

Eddie Miller strolled staring blankly after her as she strolled away across the foyer of the theatre. His face had gone very white. But he pulled himself together with an effort as a beautifully dressed girl strolled lazily across to the cloak-room of which he was in charge and handed him her big fur coat. Mechanically he took it, gave her a check, and saw her drift away.

But he started as a soft voice sounded at his elbow.

"Eddie, what's the matter?"

He swung round in a moment. At his side stood a young and pretty girl; but her brown eyes were very troubled.

"What's Mac Danish been saying to you?" she demanded.

And then as he hesitated she added in gentler tones:

"You needn't be afraid, old boy. I know it's all over now between you two."

"I thought it was, too," he said miserably. "But I reckon you've got to know, Helen. She's just told me that—she's going—to have a baby. Unless I pay her two hundred dollars by to-morrow morning I've got to marry her."

"Oh!" Helen gave a little frightened cry, and all the colour drained from her cheeks.

"I can't possibly raise it," he went on dully. "You'd better let me go, Helen. I'm no darned good to you."

Her small hands clenched.

"I won't let you go!" she exclaimed viciously. "She knows we love each other—she can't mean to do this thing. I believe she's only trying to blackmail you. Wait here a minute."

She went swiftly across the foyer, and Mae Danish turned and gazed coldly at her as she approached. She was a slender, fair-haired girl, very smart, very sophisticated.

"Well, want me?" she demanded.

"Yes, I do! Eddie's just told me what you've been saying to him. You can't do such a thing. You know perfectly well that he means nothing to you—that he and I are engaged to be married. Besides, I don't believe a word of your story."

The other girl shrugged disdainful shoulders.

"If you want him so much," she retorted, "you'd better tell him to find the two hundred dollars. My story happens to be true."

"You know perfectly well he can't find such a sum."

Mae Danish laughed scornfully.

"Can't he?" she retorted viciously.

"Then you can take it from me that he's got to marry me. And I hope he drops down dead after the ceremony."

Without another word she turned on her heel and walked away. For a few moments Helen stood there with her eyes fixed on her. Her little hands were tightly clenched and her breath was coming fast.

Then, very slowly she walked back towards the cloak-room.

"What did she say?" asked Eddie anxiously.

"She refused," answered Helen very slowly.

And then, forcing up a smile, she went on:

"Don't worry, Eddie. We'll find a way out of it somehow. I—I must be going now. But I'll try and look in before the show's over."

He stood gazing forlornly after her.

Then slowly he turned back into the cloak-room, but as he did so something caught his eye as it lay glittering on the floor.

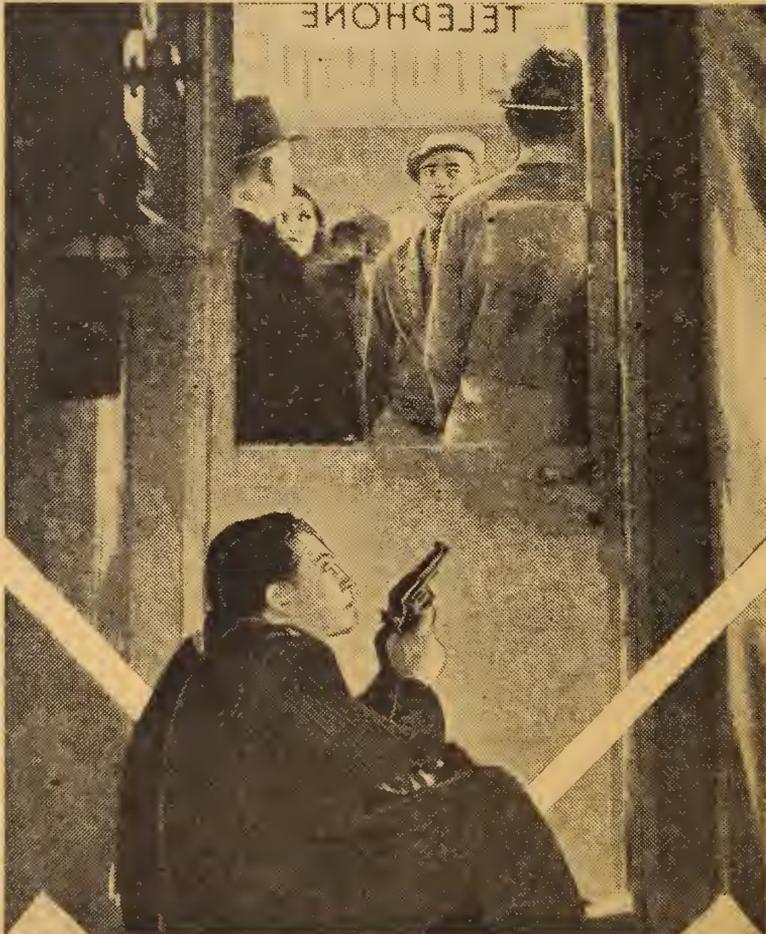

Stooping he picked it up and stood staring at it as it lay in the palm of his hand. He knew in a flash where it had come from. He had seen it when the girl had given him her expensive fur coat.

He gave a quick glance round him. His breath was coming fast. He had never stolen a thing in his life before, and the idea of doing it now horrified him.

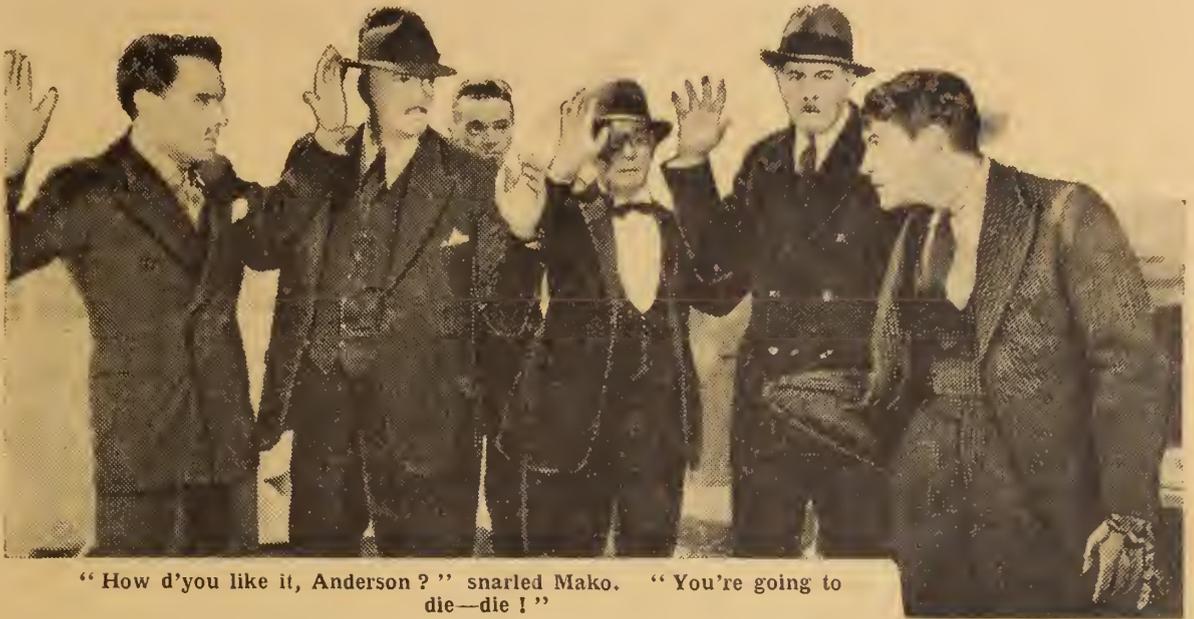

But there rose up before him the vision of a smartly-dressed, fair-haired girl with hard eyes and a gloating smile. And once again he could hear her scornful tones.

"Please yourself. Two hundred dollars by to-morrow morning—or marry me."

With his breath coming even faster he stood staring at the jewelled brooch in his hand. Anyone would give him two hundred dollars for this pretty toy, and it would be so easy to say that he'd never seen it.

Mako crouched down inside the telephone box, his gun ready in his hand.

"How d'you like it, Anderson?" snarled Mako. "You're going to die—die!"

Mako Sees His Chance

It was while Taft and his prisoner were strolling through the lounge of the theatre that Taft was hailed by the commissionaire, who knew the detective well.

"Hallo, Mr. Taft, how are you?"

Taft pulled up his prisoner. The macintosh that hid the handcuffs still lay across their arms, and he could see from the commissionaire's face that he had guessed nothing of the relationship in which he stood to Mako.

"Hallo, Mac, how are you?" he queried.

"Been in to see the show?" queried the other.

"Sure. Came out for a drink and just going back."

Mason started to grumble. It seemed that one of the telephone boxes had got out of order, and though the electricians had been working on it, they had so far failed to discover what was wrong.

Mako was standing quietly, but suddenly he gave a perceptible start, for down the staircase had come a girl, a fair-haired, smart-looking girl, with rather hard eyes, who had never even glanced at them, but had gone straight down the staircase.

"What's up, pal?" asked Taft, addressing Mako.

"Thought I knew that dame," replied Mako quietly.

"You might," replied the commissionaire. "She's Mae Danish—well known here to everyone. She's one of the ushers."

"Then I don't know her," replied Mako, but if Taft had seen the sudden gleam which had come into his eyes he would have known that he was lying.

"You were saying, Mae?" went on the detective.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Taft," replied the other. "I was just sayin' what queer times we live in these days. Even I have to carry a gun. The boss has got a permit from you folks, and I always go heeled these days."

He pulled a gun out of his jacket pocket and Taft nodded approval.

"Don't blame you, Mac," he said. "You never know."

The other replaced his gun. Mako's eyes followed every movement intently. Then, as the two started talking again, leaving him entirely out of the conversation, an observer might have noticed that though his eyes seemed to be following the conversation, his hand was stealthily creeping round to the pocket where the commissionaire had just deposited his gun.

"Well, I must be off, Mr. Taft. So-long," said the commissionaire at length.

"So-long, Mac!"

As the commissionaire walked away the detective addressed his prisoner.

"Shall we go back to the show?"

"Sure, but I'd give something for a sluice down. I'm feelin' sort of faint-like."

"That's easily done," replied the detective.

He steered his prisoner into the little room where there were a couple of wash-basins. As he switched on the electric light his trained eye noted the fact that there were no windows in the room, only an electric fan.

So secure did he feel of his prisoner that he unlocked the handcuffs from his own wrist, leaving them dangling to Mako's. Then he strolled to the door.

"Don't be long, Mako," he said.

He walked up and down the lounge. His hand was in his pocket and it was fingering his gun. For though the room in which he had left his prisoner had no exit of any sort, and though there was no other way out of the corridor where he was standing except past himself, being a good detective, he was leaving nothing to chance. For he had searched Mako when he had first arrested him, and he knew well enough that no weapon was on him.

He glanced at his watch. Five minutes had elapsed.

"Quite long enough," he muttered as he strolled to the door.

But he stiffened in a moment and, with a quick exclamation dashed down the corridor towards the door, for, from inside the room where he had left his prisoner had come the sound of things breaking, and breaking furiously.

The Escape

Mako broke off in his washing the moment Taft left the room, gazing hurriedly and anxiously around him. Then he tiptoed over to the door and, opening it an inch, peered anxiously out. Down the corridor, thirty feet away, he could see the broad back of the detective.

He closed the door and stood for a moment gazing at the ventilating fan which was whirring softly round. His gun that he had stolen from the commissionaire was in his hand and his breath was coming fast. It was a desperate venture that he was going to risk—he knew that well enough.

"But it's worth it," he muttered as he caught up a chair and proceeded to attack the ventilating fan with furious blows.

As it gave way under his frantic attack he leaped up and swung himself up into the shaft, though his heart was thumping like a sledgehammer. For he had staked everything on the fact that there was a passage on the other side, in which case his chances of getting clear were materially increased.

He saw in a flash that he had been right in his surmises, and his heart leaped with grim delight. To force himself down the narrow shaft would be easy; but he knew his liberty hung on seconds. The noise that he had made would surely bring up Taft.

What followed then was merely a series of impressions. Already three-quarters of his body was down the shaft, and only his head and arms were exposed to view. But the lavatory door at that moment burst open, and as he gave a last convulsive wriggle he saw Taft's gun spring up and a stinging pain shot through his arm.

He dropped into the passage beyond, holding tightly to his gun. There was no one about, one quick glance told him that as he scrambled to his feet. But from the other side he could hear shouts and running foot-steps and knew that already they were after him. Outside he saw a fire-escape, and flinging open the window he was on it in a moment.

When a desperate criminal is obsessed with the idea of killing—even at the cost of his own life—the man who has betrayed him to the police, he will always take the most incredible risks in order to accomplish his ends.

So now with Mako. For the moment he had seen Mae Danish in the theatre—Mae Danish, whom he knew to be Anderson's wife—hope had leaped up once more into his heart.

Opportunity then had offered him another chance when Mason had produced his gun, and he had not hesitated to take advantage of it.

Now temporarily free, and with a loaded gun in his hand, his one aim was to get to the telephone and ring up Anderson. If he could manage to do that, get him to the theatre, and meet him face to face for just one minute, nothing else would matter, he told himself.

He risked discovery a dozen times during the next half-hour. Detectives, it seemed, had been called up in bunches, but while some of them were searching the building, most of them were guarding every possible exit under the belief that their man would try to bolt for freedom.

But Mako, in that well-nigh impossible journey to the telephone, neither hurried nor took risks unnecessarily. It meant hiding behind pillars, dodging round corners, slipping behind furniture. But he managed to gain the floor on which there was a telephone box at last.

So near to his longed-for goal now! With the telephone receiver to his ear and shooting glances quickly and continually all round him, he gave in his number, telling the operator to hurry, as it was important.

"I want to speak to Mr. Anderson. Will you tell him I have a message from his wife. I'm speaking from the theatre."

Nearer still now to his goal, and the light of triumph in his eyes as he waited! But even then he forgot nothing. And as he heard Anderson's voice from the other end he whipped out his handkerchief and spread it over the transmitter.

"Is that Mr. Anderson?" he queried, disguising his voice. "That is good. Your wife is rather queer, Mr. Anderson, and she asked me—I am one of the attendants here—to ring you up and ask if you would come and take her home. She hopes you will come at once."

Ho hung up the receiver. He had done it! The man he had sworn to kill had said he would come round at once. And he, Mako, knew that to get down to the theatre where Mae Danish was, Anderson would have to pass this way!

Yet where should he hide? Not in this telephone box, for someone else might want to use it.

And then suddenly, as he glanced at yet another telephone box that stood in the far corner, his heart gave a bound. For on it was a notice written and pasted on: "Out of order."

In another minute Mako was across the floor and crouching down inside the box. And his gun was in his hand and his eyes were on the staircase. Cold, gloating triumph and incredible hate lay in his eyes as he fingered his gun.

The Chief Gets Busy

CAPTAIN SEAVER was very angry, and when Captain Seaver was very angry, those who were his subordinates generally experienced an uncomfortable time. He was a tall, soldierly looking man of smart appearance and fine build, but he was known as a bully and his fists were always as quick as his tongue.

And now he was listening while Taft endeavoured to excuse himself over Mako's escape.

"What I want to know," he snapped, "is how the blazes he managed to get hold of a gun? Didn't you search him when you first arrested him?"

Taft explained quietly that he had done so; that Mako was not then in possession of firearms of any sort.

"But I fancy he managed to steal it from Mason, the commissionaire, chief, August 24th, 1935.

while the three of us were standing down below talking together."

"A darn fine detective you are!" snarled the other. "Your prisoner, according to your account, is handcuffed to you, and yet—"

He broke off and glared at the detective.

"Perhaps you'll be good enough to show me," he said sarcastically, "exactly how you think he did it."

"I was standing, say, here," said Taft. "Mako, handcuffed to me, was standing next to me on my right-hand side—"

But that was as far as he got, for the other broke in fiercely:

"Oh, he was, was he?" he exclaimed. "And since when have the rules of the force told you to chain a man to your right hand?"

"I happen to be left-handed," replied Taft quietly.

The other coloured up.

"Get on with your story," he growled.

He was still holding suspicion in his eyes when Taft came to the end of his story.

"You'll get into trouble over this, Taft," he said, "and serve you right, too. You'd got no business to unhandcuff your man, even to wash. And you had still less business to leave him alone—I don't care what the room was like."

Taft shrugged his shoulders. Seaver could make it exceedingly uncomfortable for him, and he knew it. But he knew equally well that it was no use arguing with him.

He took out his cigarette-case, entirely forgetting the notes that Mako had given him. But Seaver's eagle eyes lighted on them the moment he flicked his case open.

Ho snatched it sharply out of the other's hand. His fingers extracted the notes and ran swiftly over them.

Then his eyes bored Taft.

"Come into a fortune, Taft?" he asked in a soft voice that held a very ominous ring.

"I don't know of any police rule, sir, that prevents a man from carrying his own money about with him," replied the detective.

Seaver glared at him.

"Since when have you, on twenty dollars a week, been in the habit of carrying three hundred about with you?"

And then, as the detective hesitated, he went on:

"So now we know how Mako got away," he snapped.

The other coloured up.

"If you're insinuating that he bribed me," he said hotly, "it's a lie."

"Then where did you get all this money from?"

"That's my business."

"And it's goin' to be mine, too," snapped Seaver, as he started to go downstairs, followed by one of his men and Taft.

In the lounge below there was at that moment a third drama being played out. Eddie Miller was present, looking strangely uneasy, for the girl who had given him her fur coat had sent for him. She had lost her diamond brooch, and she and the well-dressed young man who was with her were both questioning him about it.

Actually, had he known it, Eddie was not the only uneasy one of those three. The girl, Sylvia Temple, was uneasy because she had slipped away to the theatre to meet the young man who was her lover. And if she failed to find her brooch she knew she would have to tell her husband, and the young man—Carl Barrett—would be drawn into it, too.

Carl Barrett was uneasy on the same account. He was equally anxious that the brooch should be found without calling in the police.

And Eddie, though he had hidden the brooch upstairs, was, at the moment, denying that he had found it. For Mae Danish and the two hundred dollars that she was demanding of him were hanging like a horrible cloud over him.

So, for a time, he had persisted in saying that he hadn't seen it at all, though when Carl Barrett had declared for the last time that he was going straight to the police, Eddie had thrown up the sponge and had said that he hadn't stolen the brooch, but that he had put it on one side and would produce it if nothing more was said about it.

And it was at that moment that Captain Seaver, his man and Taft came clattering down the staircase.

They all pulled up short. Seaver had heard something of Eddie's last remark, and his suspicions were alive in a moment.

"What's going on here?" he demanded sharply.

There was an ominous pause. Eddie was shifting uneasily on his feet. It came to him as very cruel that the police should have butted in just at this particular moment. Carl Barrett would have taken the brooch and the matter would have ended there. But now—

To his utter relief and amazement, however, Carl Barrett answered in smooth tones.

"As a matter of fact," he replied, addressing Seaver, "this lady has just lost a brooch. But this young man says he's found it, and we were just going upstairs to see if it's the right one."

Seaver frowned heavily. He had not failed to notice how uncomfortable Eddie looked, and at the thought that the three of them were trying to hide something from him his temper was flaming up again.

"Where did you find it?" he asked truculently, addressing Eddie.

Eddie, even more uncomfortable, explained that he had picked it up on the floor of the cloak-room.

"And if it's the missing one," said Barrett, "then everything is all right."

Seaver's eyes flashed ominously. He could see they were trying to hush something up.

"Go upstairs and get and bring it down to me," he snapped. "All three of you, I mean."

"But surely—" began Barrett, when the other interrupted him.

"Do as I tell you!" he exclaimed harshly.

He turned to his man.

"Go with them," he said.

The Finish of It

LEFT alone with Taft, Seaver stood for some moments scowling fiercely at the carpet.

"There's something goin' on here that I don't understand—" he began, but the sentence was never finished, for at that moment both caught sight of a man who had slipped out of one of the passages and was trying to get away up the staircase.

In a flash both of them were after him, and, as the man tripped, Taft was on him, had hauled him up by the collar and brought him to where Seaver was standing.

The latter surveyed him with gloating triumph.

"So you're in this, too, Anderson, aro you?" he exclaimed. "I was sort of expecting you would be."

They said it was a freak train, but after he had rushed it half across a continent in nineteen hours to save the lives of men, they changed their tune! When once he had started, nothing could stop Tony Caldwell—not even a crazed murderer. Starring Charles Starrett and Sally Blane.

Tom Caldwell's Plan

B. J. DEXTER, president of the G. B. and D. Railroad, glanced at the sheet of figures his secretary had put before him, and frowned. The G. B. and D. was doing badly; had been for the past two years. In a few minutes he was to preside over a board meeting, and he would have the same sorry tale to tell—freight returns down, passenger receipts down.

"This isn't going to make our directors feel any happier," he announced glumly. "I was hoping we might have some good news to tell them for a change."

The door had opened while he was talking, and a fresh young voice said:

"Well, dad, at any rate I've got some good news for you."

He wheeled in his chair, and his eyes lit up as he saw his daughter Ruth. She was so pretty, so gay and light-hearted, that the sight of her always cheered him up.

"Well, what is it?" he grinned, as she came over and ruffled his hair. "I'm afraid I haven't much time."

"You remember that respirator that we persuaded you to buy for the railroad hospital last month?" she began.

He nodded. "You mean the thing you called an iron lung?"

"Yes. Well, this afternoon they brought in a little girl who had run into a live wire. She was playing around some construction work back of the round-house."

B. J.'s face hardened. "How did a live wire happen to be unguarded?" he almost snapped.

A stern disciplinarian, he reached for the telephone to institute immediate inquiries, but Ruth's hand on his arm stopped him.

"Never mind that now," she said. "Listen. The child was paralysed from the shock and hardly breathing when we brought her into the hospital, so Dr. Franklin put her right in the iron lung. It was really too marvellous. The bellows did all the breathing for her; actually took the place of her own lung muscles, and in a little while she regained consciousness, her pulse came back, her colour returned, and now—"

"Well, I'm glad to hear that," interrupted Dexter, who had little patience with anything new. "I didn't think it would work. I was afraid it was just another of those new-fangled gadgets we have to put up with."

Again the door opened. This time it was his son Allan.

"Hallo, sis!" greeted the newcomer, with a friendly smile at his sister.

"Have you come to spread happiness and light amongst the railroad department?"

"Right, Mr. Assistant to the President," countered the girl.

Allan laughed and turned to his father.

"Dad, the board's waiting."

As the older man excused himself and made his way towards the board-room. Allan gave his sister a meaning glance and jerked his thumb towards a door leading to the ante-room.

"Tom's in there," he whispered, with a knowing wink. Then he turned to follow his father.

J. B. Dexter had never liked board meetings, and he felt that this was going to be a more than usually unpleasant one. As he looked at the shrewd, hard-headed business men gathered round the long table he knew they were expecting him to announce a dividend. And there was no dividend. As he went into details, explaining how the returns had unavoidably declined, he saw their expectant smiles fade.

One of the directors, blunt and disapproving, rose to his feet.

"Mr. President, skipping dividends has become a habit of this railroad," he remarked coldly. "Now, before it becomes a tradition, I would like to know what plan, if any, you have for increasing our freight and passenger revenue."

Allan got to his feet and spoke to his father.

"Let me tell the board about Tom Caldwell's plan," he suggested.

Dexter hesitated. He hardly knew what the plan was, and he was not enthusiastic about anything new. But it might keep 'em quiet for a bit.

"Um," he muttered, stroking his chin thoughtfully. "there is a plan, but owing to my recent absence I believe my son can present it better than I can."

All eyes were immediately turned upon Allan. The young man cleared his throat, and spoke confidently.

"Gentlemen," he announced, opening some folders on the table before him, "at least one department of the G. B. and D. Railroad is definitely looking into the future. For several months the mechanical department has been working on an idea designed to bring back to the railroad some of the passenger business we've lost to the automobile."

The directors looked at each other inquiringly. What had this youngster got up his sleeve?

"Some time ago," went on Allan, "we were fortunate enough to employ Tom Caldwell, winner of the Shottswell Prize for Mechanical Engineering. What he had done for us already seems to justify the award. Thanks to his resourcefulness we shall once again be able to put travel by rail where it belongs—at the head of all recognised means of transportation. Excuse me a minute."

As he left to fetch Tom he heard a buzz of conversation break out behind him, and he knew that he had at least aroused their interest. When he pushed open the door of the ante-room he surprised Tom and Ruth on the floor, apparently looking for something.

Allan grinned.

"May I ask if you're here for business or pleasure?" he asked Tom, with mock severity.

The couple laughed and climbed to their feet.

"I was showing Ruth my fraternity pin," explained Tom, "and one of the pearls fell out. We can't find it anywhere." He was tall, broad-shouldered and dark, and when he smiled his teeth gleamed white in the sunburn of his face.

"Come on, Tom!" urged Allan. "I've got 'em all set. Bring your drawings."

Tom's brown eyes widened.

"Fine!" he exclaimed.

Ruth caught his hand, and her frank gaze held his.

"Best of luck," she said softly.

"Thanks," murmured the young engineer. "Wait around for the triumphal return, will you?"

She nodded and smiled, and it was with a feeling of elation that Tom followed his friend into the board-room.

"This is Mr. Caldwell," said Allan, leading him to the top of the table next to B. J. Dexter. "Go ahead, Tom. You tell them all about it."

At first Tom felt a bit nervous, for so much depended on his making a good impression. He felt implicit faith in his own invention, but it wouldn't be easy to convince these hard-boiled, unsympathetic business men.

"It seems to me," he told them, "that in order to bring back the passenger traffic to the railroad we must give the public more frequent and better train service."

"More service!" interjected an impatient voice. "They won't use the service we're giving them now."

"With the present-day, heavy-weight passenger trains which are so expensive to operate," Tom explained, "it might seem impractical to increase the service, but"—he stopped to unroll a large drawing—"a train like this is light and inexpensive to operate."

The directors stared in amazement at the queer-looking steel monster depicted in the drawing. Never before had they seen anything like it. The front part sloped backwards like a receding forehead; the wheels were almost invisible, covered by a hood-like shell of steel.

"Train!" grunted the director who had interrupted before. "Preposterous! It looks like a fish!"

Somebody laughed, and someone else said:

"Why, it looks like something hideous out of the magazine section of a Sunday paper!"

Tom felt a stab of disappointment. His idea wasn't getting much of a reception. Still, they hadn't heard it all yet.

Doggedly he went on:

"Built of new high tensile steel, it can, by reason of streamlining, be driven at speeds above one hundred miles an hour."

"Why, my boy, you can't keep a train on the rails at that speed!" broke out a fat man who, up till now, had seemed half asleep.

"Pardon me, sir, but that is one of the principal advantages of streamlining," pointed out Tom. "The centre of gravity is lower, so that it hugs the rails and can negotiate curves much easier. And this slanting nose and high bulge on the top of the front car builds up a tremendous downward air pressure which hold the train on the tracks."

The fat man snorted.

"Heaven help us when we have to rely on air pressure to hold our trains on the rails!"

August 24th, 1935.

Tom smiled and appealed to Dexter himself.

"What do you stop 'em with?" he asked.

Dexter, somewhat taken aback, took the cigar out of his mouth.

"Why—uh—air pressure!" he admitted.

"Exactly," returned Tom. "And that same air pressure is what keeps a streamline train on the tracks."

The men around the table shrugged their shoulders and shook their heads, and, looking at them, Tom knew that he had lost.

B. J. Dexter rose and addressed the others with an apologetic air.

"Gentlemen, I had, of course, some previous knowledge of the employment of this young man, but I had no idea his efforts would result in anything like this. Why, I am no more in accord with this absurd plan than you are!" He turned to Tom, disapproval and impatience on his rather hard features. "Young man, this is not the sort of thing in which we're interested. It is impractical, costly—"

"On the contrary, sir," interrupted Tom, "this train is driven by Diesel power with a fuel saving of seventy-five per cent. It is what the railroads will come to sooner or later."

"Oh, thank you, but I don't need any prize scholar with the ink still wet on his engineer degree to tell me what the railroads will come to!" bellowed Dexter, purpling with anger. "May I suggest that you devote your time as an employee of this railroad to more useful and less visionary fields of inquiry?"

Tom flushed and his mouth set hard.

"Very good, sir," he said quietly. He felt like telling the whole bunch of them just what he thought of them, but he held himself in, rolled up his drawing, and, with a sardonic: "I'm sorry to have taken up your time!" he strode out, followed by Alan.

An Old Friend

"WELL, where are the trumpets?" inquired Ruth as they came into the ante-room. "You hardly look like conquering heroes."

"We didn't even take the first trench!" returned Tom bitterly.

"Oh!" exclaimed Ruth, her face falling in disappointment.

"It's a rotten shame!" burst out Allan. "They could have listened, but father and the other mossbacks just blinked their eyes, pulled their heads back in their shells, and then pulled their shells in after them."

"Well, they've made it impossible for me to stay here, Allan," pointed out Tom, shrugging. "I've no choice but to resign."

"Resign?" Allan stared at him.

"You can't do that!"

"I can't do anything else," persisted Tom. "Your father and I just can't think the same."

"I know," admitted the girl. "He's frightfully conservative."

"Conservative?" snorted Allan. "Say, he must be slipping into his second childhood. The next thing you know he'll be running round naming Pullman cars!"

Ruth flared up immediately, for she would never hear a word spoken against her father.

"Has it ever occurred to you that father might be right?" she demanded hotly.

"He's right only because he's head man," retorted Tom. "Anyway, it's no go. I'm through!"

Ruth tried hard to conciliate him, and suggested that she might be able to get on the right side of her father, but Tom was stubborn.

"No, thanks," he told her, with the square set of his jaw that she knew so well. "The idea doesn't require any favours. I'll take it to some firm that isn't still living in the past." He made for the door, but as he reached it he turned and looked at her. "I'll call you—when I'm on someone else's pay-roll." When he had gone, Ruth shook her head rather sadly.

"I thought I liked independence in a man," she murmured, fingering the fraternity pin, "but now I'm not so sure."

For a long while she thought things over. She was determined to help Tom, and at last she had an idea. She would see an old friend of hers, Mr. Tyler, head of the Tyler Locomotive Works, which was a subsidiary of the G. B. and D. He was a much younger man than her father, always on the look-out for new ideas, and he, at least, would be sure to give any friend of hers a fair hearing.

She called on him that same afternoon, and he, as always, was pleased to see her. He was a well-dressed man of about forty-five, with a keen, intelligent face, full of force and character. His shrewd, but kindly eyes regarded her affectionately.

"You're looking prettier than ever," he told her.

Sitting on the edge of his desk with the familiarity of an old friend, she smiled across at him.

"Listen," she said. "How would the president of the Tyler Locomotive Works like to subscribe to a good idea?"

He raised his eyebrows.

"Well, that depends. You're not trying to get me interested in a charity bazaar or a little theatre movement or anything like that?"

She shook her head.

"The other day a certain young man was showing dad plans for a new kind of fast train. I happened to be in the office. Oh, it was a beautiful-looking train, Mr. Tyler, all streamlines. Of course, I don't know much about the technical side of it, but he said something about using Diesel engines."

"Diesel power," muttered Tyler thoughtfully, a sudden gleam of interest lighting up his eyes. "What did your father think of that?"

"Oh, you know what dad is! He wouldn't even listen to Tom."

"Tom, eh?" Tyler looked amused. "So that's the good idea."

"Nothing of the sort," declared Ruth, blushing. "My interest in him is purely scientific. If Tom's—if the boy's idea is good, I'm doing you a favour."

"Well, if you'll give me this purely scientific young man's name and address, I'll send for him," promised Tyler.

"His name is Caldwell. I've got his address right here in my purse." She handed him a card. "Thanks a lot, Mr. Tyler. You're a dear. And when you find I'm right you may send me orchids!"

Tyler was as good as his word, and in answer to his invitation, Tom called on him two days later. The young engineer, quite unaware that he owed his chance to Ruth, was naturally excited at having a man like Edward Tyler interested in his work. As for Tyler, he was impressed by the plan from the first moment that Tom unrolled his drawing. Not only that, but as a judge of men he took a liking for Tom for his determination and frankness.

Tom explained the economy of the scheme—how the proposed train ran on far fewer wheels, thus saving weight and wear and tear on the track; how it would run smoothly and save fuel. But, above all, he stressed the factor of speed—speed that would revolutionise train construction.

"Yes, I think this looks like a step in the right direction," said Tyler. He appealed to Maclean, a shrewd old Scot, who was his consulting engineer, and who, so far, had remained silent. "What do you think about it, Mac?"

"I like it," grunted Mac. "I like it."

Tyler knew that this, coming from Mac, was unheard-of enthusiasm.

"Of course, there's one great difficulty," pointed out Tyler. "Finance. Although this company is a subsidiary of the G. B. & D., I'm given a pretty free hand when it comes to spending money. But we can't put this over with the directors until we actually show them one of your trains. Railroad directors have to see, feel, and smell a thing before they'll believe it. That's certainly true of Dexter." He turned to the Scot again. "How much would this cost us, Mac—roughly?"

Mae thought for a bit, and made a few calculations on the back of an envelope.

"We could save something by using our new Diesel plans," he muttered. "Uh, it would work out around two hundred thousand dollars."

"Umm!" Tyler looked thoughtful. "You know, we have the outstanding Diesel engine man with us now," he told Tom. "He's working on some new experiments. We'll have him in on this." He spoke into the dictagraph. "Send Mr. Bronte up to my office right away."

"Bronte?" The name roused a chord of memory in Tom. "There was a Bronte who built aeroplane engines in Europe."

"Doubtless the same man," said Tyler. "And to my mind they don't come any better on Diesels. But don't worry—if we go ahead with this plan, you'll be in charge of construction. We'll make this an all-American train."

"Nothing would suit me better, sir!" exclaimed Tom, highly elated. Once again things seemed to be coming his way. There was Ruth, too. If he made good on this he would have something to offer her then.

Bronte came in and was introduced to Tom. He was a foreign-looking man of about forty, with dark hair brushed back from his forehead, blunt features, and a strange, masked expression in his rather oblique eyes. He showed immediate interest when Tom's scheme was explained to him, especially when he saw the drawing.

"It ought to be right up your alley," Tyler told him. "Mr. Caldwell is recommending Diesel electric power; the main generator to be run with an eight-cylinder, two-cycle Diesel."

Bronte nodded approvingly. "Great efficiency with a minimum of weight," he remarked, speaking with a slight guttural accent. "I designed one once for the high command, to be used in—well, no matter." He broke off abruptly, as though he had let his tongue run away with him, and had suddenly realised he had said too much.

The three discussed the details for a long time, and after Bronte had gone Tyler turned to Tom.

"Some modification will be necessary, of course, but I'm going to try this idea, Caldwell," he announced. "Barney Dexter will be certain to oppose it, but he's only one member of the board, and I'm sure I can convince the others."

Tom flushed with pleasure, and tried to stammer his thanks, but the words stuck in his throat.

"Mae, you can arrange for what shop facilities Caldwell needs," went on Tyler, "and Bronte can build his engines."

"Ay, sir," assented Mac.

The Trial Run

THE ensuing months were the busiest Tom Caldwell had ever spent, but they were also the happiest. He threw himself into his work with an enthusiasm that infected everybody under him, and made friends of all with whom he came into contact. There was one exception, and that was Bronte. Not that he found an enemy in the Diesel expert, for Bronte proved himself a keen and willing worker; it was just that Bronte seemed too reserved and taciturn to make friends with anybody, and at times Tom found himself speculating about the man's past. There was something unfathomable, mysterious about him.

Among Tom's most faithful henchmen were a strangely assorted couple who were almost inseparable—Higgins and Crawford. Higgins was a big, ruggedly built man, slow thinking and rather simple, but a good mechanic. Crawford was a weedy, bespectacled youth who took his job very seriously and studied hard. Of an intelligence beyond the ordinary, his speech was full of technical terms, and it used to amuse Tom to hear him discoursing learnedly of "acrodynamics" and "equations of motion," whilst his stolid partner, making no attempt to listen, would get on with the work in hand.

Gradually the shining steel monster took shape, the generators were mounted, and at last the great day arrived when the Silver Streak, as Tom had named it, was ready for its trial run.

It was arranged to start the run from the station at Franklin, and to time it from a point some miles west of Maryville. On this, its first trip, the Streak was to carry only a handful of passengers, among whom were Tyler, Dexter himself, Allan and Ruth. Tom was to be at the controls, and with him in the operators' compartment were Bronte and Lowry—a man who had been sent over by the superintendent to act as pilot. The passengers were in the luxuriously fitted solarium in the rear car.

"Smokey's still comin'!" crowed Lowry. "He's gonna pass you, sure!"

The trial was supposed to have been kept secret, but somehow the news had leaked out, and a cheering crowd had gathered at Franklin to see the start.

When Tom climbed aboard Ruth came up to him. Although he had shown her around the works many times, and although she had shown great interest in the building of the Streak, he still had no idea that he owed everything to her.

"I'll be thinking of you," she told him. "Good luck!"

"I'll be thinking of you, too," he said. "This means an awful lot to me." Then he added meaningly: "To us."

Leaning through the open window, he held out his hand, and her soft fingers closed over his. Then she turned back to join the others in the solarium.

Tom waited a bit before taking his place in the driver's seat. Behind him Bronte was attending to the engine. Lowry, the pilot, seated beside Tom, looked about him with contemptuous amusement.

"Funny kind of train," he grunted. "I suppose she's fast?"

"Tie your hat under your chin," returned Tom grimly. "You're going to see plenty!" With the words he jerked the whistle cord twice and pushed over the starting-lever.

As the motors purred into life and the Silver Streak moved forward smoothly, Lowry muttered a scornful: "Oil engines, huh? You can't beat steam."

Tom smiled to himself. He'd show him!

Back in the solarium B. J. Dexter was still sceptical.

"Well, Ed," he said to Tyler, "in a few minutes you'll either be famous or foolish."

"In a few minutes, B. J.," retorted Tyler, "you'll be sorry you ever turned down young Caldwell's idea."

Dexter shrugged his shoulders and looked unconvinced. Tyler rang for the waiter and ordered two "highballs."

When they came he lifted his glass. "Here's to Tom Caldwell and the Silver Streak. A fine lad and a fine train."

"I hope you're right, Ed," said Dexter, as they both drank. "Here's luck!"

The Streak moved easily, almost silently, but some minutes passed and still it was not going particularly fast. Suddenly Ruth, gazing out of the window, gave a little cry of astonishment.

"Look! That—that freight train is overtaking us!"

The others followed her glance and saw an engine, belching black smoke as it hauled a long line of flat-cars on the neighbouring track, gradually catching up with them.

"Huh, Ruth's right, Ed," grunted Dexter. "That Red Ball freight is climbing up on us."

"That doesn't mean a thing, B. J.," returned Tyler. "The minute Caldwell opens her up she'll make that freight look as if it were running backwards."

"Sure he will," put in Allan reassuringly.

The seconds passed, but instead of being left behind the freight drew steadily nearer.

"How about it now, Ed?" demanded Dexter ironically. "This new-fangled contraption of yours doesn't look as though it's going to break any records—not if it can't even hold a heavy freight!"

A puzzled frown corrugated Tyler's August 24th, 1935.

forehead. He fidgeted uneasily, then got to his feet.

"Guess I'll go up ahead and see what's wrong."

Failure

MEANWHILE, in the driver's compartment, Tom was getting worried. From the first Lowry, an unyielding disciple of steam, had waxed sarcastic.

"Don't sound like you got much power in that oil engine," he had remarked before the Streak had even covered a mile.

"When I build an engine you don't have to worry about the power," retorted Bronte harshly. "It has plenty."

"You've done a fine job, Bronte," said Tom to soothe the expert's ruffled feelings.

"It's taking a lot of time to get up speed," persisted Lowry.

"It's doing all right," countered Tom. "I haven't opened it up yet."

A little later it was Lowry who first saw the freight.

"Hey, here's 'Smokey' Bishop comin' with Number Seven!" he chuckled gleefully. "He's goin' to pass you."

Tom's mouth tightened. "I don't think so," he said quietly, and his hand pushed the control lever right over.

His eyes were on the speed dial, and gradually the hand turned from thirty to forty. It climbed a little beyond forty, wavered, then stuck there. For the first time Tom felt the icy fingers of apprehension, and his eyes clouded with worry. Surely the Streak was capable of more than forty miles an hour!

"Smokey's still comin'!" crowed Lowry. "He's gonna take you, sure!"

"Something's wrong," muttered Tom through clenched teeth. He turned to Bronte.

"How's the engine?" "Nothing wrong here," was the answer.

It was a bitter moment for Tom when he had to sit helpless and watch the Red Ball overhaul him steadily. As the freight passed, the engineer on her opened her exhaust and let loose a screeching blast of steam right in the Silver's Streak's path, just like a man blowing a cloud of cigarette-smoke in another man's face.

Tyler stepped in through the communicating door just at that moment. "What's wrong, Tom?" he wanted to know. "Is this the best you can do?"

"Seems so," admitted Tom, the picture of dejection. "I have her wide open."

Tyler's face fell. "This is a terrible disappointment. I'll never hear the end of it."

Lowry put his spoke in. "This speed demon turned out to be a tortoise," he scoffed.

"I'm awfully sorry, Mr. Tyler!" burst out Tom. "I can't figure it out."

Tyler shrugged resignedly. "Well, you might as well stop at the next station."

"It's like I said," grinned Lowry. "You can't heat steam."

Tom felt like smashing his fist in the jeering pilot's face, but he held himself back. Defeat was bitter in his mouth, and the worst ordeal was yet to come. There were the others to face; excuses to be made, explanations. And the worst of it was he had no explanation to give.

When he stopped the Silver Streak at Marshalton and got out, Ruth was the first to descend from the passenger car. She ran to meet him.

"What was the matter, Tom?" she asked anxiously.

Tom shook his head.

"I certainly wish I knew." She saw the look in his eyes, and her glance softened.

"Oh, don't take it so hard!" she pleaded. "You did your best."

"But it wasn't good enough," Tom said. "I don't know why. There must be something we've overlooked that caused its failure. I checked and re-checked the plans and specifications. It stood up under every test while we were putting it together."

He saw Dexter alighting from the solarium, and decided to take the bull by the horns. "Well, come on," he urged, walking forward. "Your father will be saying plenty. I want to get it over."

As it happened, B. J. Dexter was torn by conflicting emotions—chagrin at a subsidiary company of the G. B. & D. having wasted a lot of money, and gratification at having his own judgment vindicated. At first he ignored Tom completely and addressed his remarks to Tyler.

"Well, Ed," he said, "I told you this toy was nothing to sink money into."

"Maybe you're right, B. J.," admitted Tyler reluctantly. "But it was a good gamble on paper. If the Streak had been successful, passenger traffic would have been revolutionised."

"Well, we all make mistakes," responded Dexter with irritating condescension. "Even I do. But I was smart enough not to make this one." He gave a short laugh. "Silver Streak, eh? Silver Freak'd be better!"

"Don't rub it in now, B. J.," said Tyler. "The board will do enough of that at the next meeting."

"You'll have plenty of explaining to do all right. Going the whole hog on this boy's crazy theory."

"Don't blame Tom too much," pleaded Tyler. "The idea is still good, even though it isn't completely worked out."

Dexter shook his head. "You can't tell me that. It was never any good."

Tom stepped forward. He saw that he had a staunch supporter in Tyler, and it hurt him to think that he had put the man who had backed him into an awkward position.

"That was a pretty bad showing, Mr. Tyler," he said apologetically, "but if you'll only give me a couple of weeks I'm sure I can find out the trouble and correct it."

Tyler hesitated. "Well, Tom—"

"Ed, you don't mean you would consider throwing any more money into this crazy scheme?" interrupted Dexter, seeing that Tyler was in two minds. "I'm sure I speak for the rest of the board when I tell you to drop this idea wholly and completely. Don't spend another cent."

"That's unfair!" broke out Tom heatedly. "Just give me a little more time, and—"

"You have already had more time than the experiment warrants," snapped Dexter.

"Listen, Mr. Dexter," persisted Tom, his jaw thrust forward pugnaciously, "this is not an experiment. We're living in a new age that requires drastic change. You can't keep on running railroads by tradition. Your passenger traffic is off over eighty per cent, and no hope of getting it back. That's what your obstinacy has done!"

"Tom, please!" put in Tyler, trying to quieten him down.

"Tom! Come on!" urged Ruth, taking him by the sleeve and pulling him away.

As he allowed himself to be led off, Tom heard the president of the G. B. & D. and D. spluttering and choking with anger. Ruth, too, was indignant.

Ruth caught a glimpse of a man being laid on a stretcher.

"You mustn't talk to dad that way!" she reproved him.
 "I mustn't? Why not?" demanded Tom. "He is stubborn, and he is unfair."

"And he is my father," pointed out Ruth, the colour rising to her cheeks.

"Well, that's your misfortune!" flared Tom. "He's a self-satisfied, conceited, opinionated old fogey!"

"Do you mean that?"

Ruth's voice was ominously soft.

"Yes, I mean it!" declared Tom defiantly, losing the last shreds of his temper. "It's the truth, and I don't expect to apologise, either!"

Ruth's chin came up.

"I'll not have you speaking to me like that!" she told him, her eyes blazing. "I thought you were a man, but you're behaving like a spoilt child. I'm sorry, but this is 'good-bye,'" and with the words she turned and left him.

Watching her go, Tom felt tempted to run after her, to apologise. Then the stubborn streak in him stopped him. Why should he? He was in the right, and he wouldn't take back a word he'd said. If she wanted to end things between them, that would be okay with him! She'd been mighty sweet at times, but women caused more trouble than they were worth, anyway.

Meanwhile, Tyler had succeeded in calming Dexter down, pointing out that Tom was young and enthusiastic, and had been carried away by his feelings.

"Well, if you still want to keep him in your employ, that's your look-out," said Dexter. "As for this monstrosity—and he jerked his thumb at the train—" "I shall recommend to the board that we send it over to the Century of Progress Exhibition. Call it an experimental model in streamlining; call it anything you please. I only hope it gets sufficient publicity to justify charging off at least a part of the cost to advertising."

"Oh, father, be reasonable!" protested Allan, who was still loyal to Tom.

Tyler, however, eventually acquiesced. "I see your point, B. J.," he said, "however much I may differ with you on the fundamental principle. Under the circumstances, this may be the wisest thing to do."

Tyler saw Tom standing where Ruth had left him, and, going over to him, he told him of their decision.

"But," he added, to soften the blow, "I'll arrange for you and your mechanics to take it over to the exhibition and to stay in charge of it."

"Thanks, Mr. Tyler," returned Tom gratefully. "It'll give us a chance to work on it." His mouth tightened in determination. "I'm not licked yet. I'll find out what's wrong with the Silver Streak if it takes the rest of my life!"

"I'm Leaving To-day!"

ONE evening about a week later, B. J. Dexter was lounging in an easy-chair, smoking an after-dinner cigar, when Allan came in and started to walk up and down in a fidgety way, obviously with something on his mind. Ever since the fiasco of the Silver Streak's trial run, Dexter had noted a change in his son's manner.

Suddenly Allan startled him with the blunt announcement:

"Dad, I'm through with railroading."

Dexter took the cigar out of his mouth and sat up. He stared, hardly knowing what to make of it. Then he nodded.

"I see," he said slowly. "You're still a little displeased because I wouldn't undertake to rebuild the railroads of the country in accordance with your young friend's unsubstantial dreams, eh?"

"That's only part of it, dad," was the answer. "It's your general attitude to progressive, new ideas. You go on in the same old way, year after year, even though we're losing money. Every suggestion I make—air conditioning, coast to coast trains—you veto simply because it's never been done before."

Dexter shook his head.

"You're wrong, Allan. My argument is that you're attracted by anything new just because it is new. Anyway, our system has stood the test of time. My father, your grandfather, started to build railroads over this country when the only people living here were Indians in tepees."

"I admit all that, dad, and I, too, want the pride of building something. Something that will go on serving people; something that will endure."

Dexter looked puzzled.

"Why, what do you mean?"

"I've taken a job with the Six Companies," replied Allan. "The construction firm at Boulder Dam."

It was a hard blow for the older man, and the suddenness of it left him dazed. He had a great admiration for the Boulder Dam project—one of the most stupendous pieces of engineering ever attempted in America. But railroading was in B. J.'s blood, and Allan was his only son. It was some time before he could find anything to say.

"My son," he said at last, "there has always been a Dexter at the head of the G. B. & D. Railroad, and I had hoped there always would be. Go to Boulder Dam if you want to; but if you do you'll be tearing down something that two generations have been building for you."

"No, dad; the building has stopped. There is really nothing for me to do here." Allan held out his hand. "Good-bye, dad."

Dexter got up, staring at his son, bewildered.

"You don't mean—"

Allan nodded.

"I'm leaving now."

He gripped his father's hand hard, then turned and walked out quickly, as though he did not want to prolong the leave-taking.

Dexter went back to his chair, a stunned look on his face. Gradually doubts began to assail him, and he wondered whether, after all, there might not be more than a little truth in Allan's accusations. Maybe he was a bit of an old fogey in his ideas. And you couldn't cramp a youngster; you had to give him his head.

Then, only a few days afterwards, he received another blow, for he came on Ruth sitting at the piano with her head buried in her hands.

"What's troubling my little girl?" he asked.
 August 24th, 1935.

asked her, putting his arm around her shoulders.

"I'm afraid it's heart trouble, dad."

She looked up, and he saw that her eyes were bright with unshed tears.

Dexter rubbed his chin thoughtfully.

"I think I understand. You were rather keen on that Caldwell boy, weren't you?"

Ruth nodded.

"I need a change," she told him. "I want to take a trip west, to California. I could visit Myrtle in Santa Barbara."

Dexter sighed.

"Of course, it'll be mighty lonesome in this big house without you and Allan," he said regretfully. "However, if you've made up your mind to go, I'll arrange transportation. When do you want to leave?"

"Right away—to-morrow."

"As soon as all that?" A shadow crossed his face. He was losing both his children in the space of a few days. "All right, Ruthie, I'll see to it."

Meanwhile, the Silver Streak, on exhibition, was proving a great attraction, rivalling the other shows, and people thronged to see it. But the atmosphere of the exhibition ground, the raucous voices of the barkers, the blare of music, the crowds all irked Tom Caldwell. He had planned and built something that he had hoped would make railroading history, and here it was, little more than a side-show at a circus! Moreover, though he had checked and rechecked the engine, he knew no more what was wrong with it than he had when he started.

Eventually it was a pure stroke of luck that put him on the right track. He happened to be passing when Crawford was holding forth to his pal Higgins upon some abstruse question dealing with electricity. He heard one or two words—something about "distance between the poles" and "saturation"—and he pulled up short.

"Wait a minute. What are you trying to say, Crawford?" he asked.

Crawford was only too pleased to explain.

"I was just telling Higgins that the induction index of the magnetic fields is the saturation rapidity of the gap between the poles."

"That gives me a hunch!" exclaimed Tom, gripping Crawford's arm. "Come on—bring those test-meters!"

Approaching the problem from an altogether new angle, Tom soon saw that the root of the trouble was a minor error in the adjustment of some of the parts. When he corrected this, and tested the amount of power generated, he found that he could get twice as many volts as before. Elated by his discovery, he wired to Tyler, who came along that same afternoon.

"This was a factory assembly, and we assumed it was all right," explained Tom, "but the gap between the rotor and the field was three thousandths too wide."

"A manufacturer's error that wouldn't happen oftener than once in a hundred times," marvelled Tyler.

"The only possible adjustment that could have escaped detection so long," added Tom. "Watch that voltmeter."

Tyler watched whilst the needle climbed past the seven hundred mark. "Well, that certainly looks as if you've found it," he admitted.

Tom got to his feet and wiped his hands on a piece of cotton waste. His eyes were shining with excitement.

"Now may I have another trial and take the Streak out of the dog-house?" he pleaded. "It's for your sake as well as mine, Mr. Tyler."

"Sure you can," agreed Tyler enthusiastically. "But let's wait until this fair is over. It won't hurt to keep it dark for a while—or not exactly dark," he corrected himself.

"What do you mean?" Tom wanted to know.

"Well, Ruth might like to hear the good news."

Tom shook his head.

"No, I don't think so," he said a bit wistfully. "Not after what happened on the trial run."

Tyler smiled at him—a rather strange smile.

"Tom, did you ever wonder how I happened to send for you?" he asked.

"Sure, I thought you'd heard about my streamline plan."

"Exactly," said Tyler. "You see, Ruth has a pleasant little habit of dropping into my office to see me every once in a while."

"You mean it was she who told you?" broke out Tom, realisation flooding over him. He owed everything to her, and like a fool he had quarrelled with her, insulted her! If he had only known! "Excuse me, Mr. Tyler! I'll be right back!" he jerked out, taking a flying leap out of the door.

Pushing through the jostling crowds, he made for a telephone booth. He'd phone her and make a date with her. She was a good sport, and she wouldn't refuse to see him. And when he did see her, when he got face to face with her, he would explain then. He'd apologise, ask her to forgive him. It was no use writing; he had to see her.

But when he got on to the Dexter home he found he was too late. Ruth had left an hour before for California.

Bad News

THE train in which Ruth was travelling to Santa Barbara was some way east of the California border when the conductor ushered an old lady into the Pullman. She sat by herself in a seat almost opposite Ruth's, and after a while Ruth saw that she had her handkerchief to her eyes and was sobbing.

There was nobody else in the Pullman, and, moved by pity, the girl went over to her.

"Is there anything I can do?" she inquired gently.

The old lady looked up at her through her tears.

"Thank you, miss," she said brokenly, dabbing at her eyes. "I just got word about my boy. He—he's been taken down with infantile paralysis."

"Oh, I'm so sorry!"

"He's at Boulder Dam," the old lady went on. "Last night they wired the station agent to tell me. They're afraid it's going to spread to the other men."

Ruth's thoughts immediately flew to Allan, and she felt an unreasoning stab of fear. She knew what a terrible scourge infantile paralysis was, and how hard it was to get it under control.

"Oh, my—my brother's there!" she exclaimed.

"Then get him away from there, miss, as soon as you can," urged the old lady. "Before it's too late."

There was nothing further Ruth could do for the weeping mother, so she went back to her own seat. Worried and anxious, she mullied things over in her mind. Should she go to see if Allan was all right? Could she get him away from Boulder Dam before the danger spread, or would he laugh at her? At length she sought out the conductor and asked him where she could change for Boulder City.

He stared at her in mild surprise.

"Why, Miss Dexter—"

"I must get there right away," she broke in impatiently.

"Well, the dam is thirty-five miles from Las Vegas," he told her. Knowing that she was the daughter of B. J. Dexter, he saw that he would have to do everything he could for her. "I can wire ahead and arrange for a motor-car to meet you at the station."

"Please do," she requested. "And get the fastest car you can."

He hurried off to obey, and Ruth waited impatiently for the train to reach Las Vegas. It seemed to her to crawl, as did the car which was awaiting her, and it was early afternoon before she alighted at the offices of the Six Companies on the edge of Boulder Canyon.

In front of her, rising from the canyon bed and completely blocking the immense gap between the rocky walls, was the huge dam. From it came a bedlam of sound—the clang of mighty hammers, the scream of winches, and the rattle of the elevators that carried men and material. A mile from the workings a veritable town of huts and buildings had sprung up.

Inquiring for Allan, she was told that he was over at the upper concrete-mixing plant, and that she would have to get a pass from the engineer's office. Whilst she was waiting for the pass she overheard two men in conversation. One of them was obviously a man of some authority, and he addressed the other as "doctor."

"Maybe it started in town," he was saying.

Ruth immediately pricked up her ears, for she knew the "it" was the outbreak of infantile paralysis.

The doctor shrugged.

"Well, we don't know where it started, of course," he replied, "but we must assume that everyone here has been exposed. I'm sorry, Morgan, but a quarantine is necessary. Any delay is dangerous."

"But, Dr. Flynn, we've got to bring in material by rail in order to keep working," protested Morgan.

"All right, but you'll have to load across the river and carry no one but the train crew," the doctor told him.

"Remember, no one will be able to enter or leave Boulder Dam after four o'clock!"

Ruth had been listening in ever-growing alarm, and her one thought was to find Allan as quickly as she could. After getting the pass, she travelled down to the canyon floor on one of the elevators, and was directed to a gang of men working about half a mile away. As she approached she heard the screech of a siren, and a lot of gesticulating and shouting from a "skip," or swinging platform, that was carrying men to the top of the dam. Immediately the skip was lowered, and when it reached the ground other men, their heads covered in steel helmets to protect them from falling stones, crowded round.

"Man hurt!" Ruth heard someone shout.

In less than a minute an ambulance swept up, and two white-clad ambulance men pushed through the knot of men. They went on to the skip, and Ruth caught a glimpse of a man being laid on a stretcher. He was borne quickly to the ambulance, which sped off as swiftly as it had come.

Ruth felt a terrible premonition clutch at her heart, and she hurried up.

"I'm looking for Mr. Dexter," she told the staring men.

For a moment they were silent, looking at one another awkwardly; then one of them said:

"Gee, I'm sorry, miss, but we've just sent him to the hospital."

Ruth's hand went to her throat.

"What—what happened to him?" she gasped.

"We don't know," was the answer. "He seemed all right, and suddenly he started gasping for breath. Then he just collapsed."

Ten minutes later, white-faced and shaken, the girl was in the hospital which lay on the far side of the workmen's huts. Confronting the doctor in charge, she demanded to be taken to see her brother. Gently, but firmly, the doctor refused permission.

"I understand just how you feel, Miss Dexter," he told her, "but we can't permit you to expose yourself. Your brother has contracted paralysis."

Ruth had expected this, and her eyes searched the doctor's kindly face.

"He's going to live, isn't he?" she asked fearfully.

The doctor's glance showed pity, and his voice was grave as he answered:

"Well, the paralysis germ has affected his lungs. Now he'd have every chance in the world if we could provide artificial respiration for him until the serum takes effect. There are machines for that purpose, but, unfortunately, we have none of them here, and all those in San Francisco and Los Angeles are in use."

"I know—the 'iron lung,'" exclaimed Ruth, her mind going back to the little girl who had been nearly killed by the live wire.

"Yes, that's it."

"Oh, I can have one shipped here in twenty-four hours by 'plane,'" Ruth told him, hope welling in her. "It'll arrive in time to save Allan's life; perhaps the lives of others."

"The doctor shook his head sadly.

"Twenty-four hours will be too late for your brother. He should be in a respirator now, or at least before tomorrow noon."

Ruth refused to lose heart.

"Planes are fast," she insisted. "They can get here from Chicago in time if they start at once. Let me telephone my father."

There was a telephone on the table, and, seizing it, she dialed long distance, and in a minute was through to her father.

The Silver Streak Gets Its Chance

ON receipt of the dire news, B. J. Dexter acted with characteristic energy. He telephoned the nearest airport to send a truck to the railroad hospital where the "iron lungs" were kept, and himself hurried to the hospital to supervise their loading.

He was met by an official of the airport, to whom he explained what he wanted done.

"Get this machine over to the airport at once and load it on the fastest 'plane you have,'" he told him.

The official looked at the "iron lung"—a huge, case-like machine—and shook his head.

"Sorry, Mr. Dexter, but it can't be done," he announced.

"What!" bellowed Dexter, seizing him by the lapels of his coat and shaking him. "It's got to be done! My son's life is at stake!"

"We have the largest transport 'planes in the country,'" protested the startled official, "but even those are not big enough to handle this machine."

As Dexter released him he continued: "I tell you what you could do—take the machine apart and we could handle it."

"Oh, but you can't do that!" interposed a young doctor standing near.

Dexter wheeled on him.

"Why not?" he snapped.

"Well, because this machine is welded around its delicate mechanism to make it airtight," was the answer. "It wouldn't operate otherwise."

B. J. Dexter was nothing if not a fighter. He turned to his secretary, who had accompanied him.

"Call the train-master," he directed. "Tell him to make up a special with my car at once. Highball it through all the way."

It was in an early edition of an evening paper that Tom Caldwell first read the news. The thick, black lettering of the headlines seemed to dance before his eyes.

"BARNEY DEXTER RUSHES SPECIAL TRAIN TO BOULDER DAM WITH 'IRON LUNGS' TO SAVE SON'S LIFE!"

The young engineer read on; then, flinging down the paper, he charged out of the door of the control compartment of the Silver Streak, nearly knocking over Higgins and Crawford in his haste. Stopping only to telephone Tyler and to explain what he proposed to do, he caught a down-town street car and went straight to Dexter's office. Dexter, harassed and angry, refused to see him, but the youngster forced his way past the protesting secretary, and before Dexter could order him out, Tom managed to blurt out his proposition: namely, that the Silver Streak should be used to transport the "iron lungs."

"What!" roared Dexter. "Have you come here at a time like this to worry me with a fool scheme like that?"

"But Mr. Dexter," protested Tom, "we've discovered what was wrong. Now the Streak is three times as fast;

"Got you!" growled Higgins, seizing Bronte by the throat and hauling him to his feet.

speed enough to get to Boulder City before noon to-morrow."

"Do you think I'm mad enough to depend upon that crazy train of yours to save my son's life?" demanded Dexter. "I know what steam can do, and that's what I'm going to bank on." "Mr. Dexter, you've got to believe me!" pleaded Tom.

"I've told you I want nothing more to do with that train," reiterated Dexter stubbornly.

Just then the door opened to admit Tyler, and Tom appealed to him.

"Mr. Tyler, he won't listen to me. Tell him about—"

"Oh, please, please!" entreated Dexter, lifting his hands to his ears. "Ed, this young idiot is worrying me to death about the impossible speed of his train."

Tyler crossed over to his friend's desk, his face deadly serious.

"I don't know what Tom has told you, B. J.," he said quietly, "but I do know the way to get 'iron lungs' to Boulder City in time to save Allan's life; and that's on the Streak."

Dexter got up out of his chair.

"Are you crazy, too, Ed?" he muttered.

He took a turn up and down the room, and it was obvious that Tyler's sincerity was beginning to make an impression upon him, even though he hated to admit it.

Tyler pressed home his opportunity.

"Barney, you've got to take a chance," he pointed out. "No steam locomotive can make two thousand miles in nineteen hours. You've got to gamble, B. J. It's the only chance Allan's got."

"I'm afraid to take a chance, Ed," groaned Dexter, "and I'm afraid not to." Suddenly he threw his arms out in a gesture of resignation. "All right, you win. Bring on your Silver Streak!"

Having once made up his mind, the hard-bitten old railroader became the man of action again. He wheeled on Tom.

"I'll get every 'iron lung' in the hospital trucked over to the exhibition ground right away," he snapped. "And you'd better have that darned train of yours ready by then!"

"Okay, Mr. Dexter. We'll get there in time. You'll see."

"Tom, I'll run you back to the ground in my car," volunteered Tyler. "Let's go!"

Arriving back at the Silver Streak, Tom found the two inseparable mechanics, Higgins and Crawford, playing cards.

"Higgins, go and find Bronte," he ordered. "Round up the crew. We're leaving for Boulder City just as soon as we can get rolling!"

"Dead Men Tell No Tales"

AT the very time when Higgins was searching for him, Bronte, at a loose end, was wandering about the fair. Suddenly a man caught him by the arm.

"Bronte! Captain Bronte!"

Bronte wheeled, and as his startled glance rested on the man's soldierly figure and scarred, hard face, he stiffened.

"Vasczunsko!" he gasped. Automatically he started to bring his hand up in a salute; then he stopped.

"I'm glad you remember me, Bronte," returned Vasczunsko with a thin smile. "I've been looking for you for a long time. You know why, don't you?" His slate-grey eyes were cold, implacable. "The General Staff is quite interested to know why your plans of an armoured aeroplane fell into the hands of an unfriendly Power."

August 24th, 1935.

Bronte changed colour.

"But Vasczunsko," he stammered, "I—I—"

"Do not tell me," snapped the other. Then, in a purring voice: "You come back and explain to the High Command."

Bronte, knowing that he was cornered, shrugged fatalistically, and as Vasczunsko moved off, he fell into step beside him.

For a moment he thought of bolting, but he knew that once Vasczunsko had trailed him down he would never be able to shake him off. And though the High Command had no legal power to take him back, anyone who disobeyed them was as good as dead. They had agents, well-paid agents, who would see to that. What a fool he had been ever to sell those plans!

To avoid the crowds Vasczunsko led the way behind some booths in a quieter corner of the grounds, heading for a side exit. To reach it they had to pass by a narrow alley between a skating-rink and a large marquee. A little way up the alley a mallet, apparently used for hammering in the pegs of the guy-ropes, lay on the ground.

Bronte's eyes fastened on the mallet. He gave a quick glance round. There was no one about. And with Vasczunsko out the way he would be safe!

One tigerish spring, and Bronte had an arm about Vasczunsko's neck, choking the cry that rose to his lips. Vasczunsko struggled madly, but Bronte bore him to the ground, his free hand groping for the mallet. The engineer's fingers closed over the handle, and he struck once, twice, and yet again—vicious, murderous blows.

Vasczunsko crumpled up and lay very still, a thin trickle of blood oozing from his head. His eyes were fixed in a terrible, glassy stare.

Bronte rose to his feet, brushed the dust off his knees and picked up his hat. Quietly he slipped out of the alley, but hardly had he gained the shelter of the crowd when he heard a woman's scream, followed by an excited shout. He swore beneath his breath, cursing the ill chance that had brought discovery of the body so soon. Had anyone seen him? And if they had, would they recognise him as one of the engineers on the Silver Streak?

Trying to look calm and unhurried, he threaded his way through the crowd and arrived at the rear of the Streak. As a hand fell on his shoulder he started, but it was only Tom Caldwell.

"Bronte—gosh, I'm glad you're here!" exclaimed Tom. "I was afraid they wouldn't find you."

"Find me?" Bronte looked puzzled. "You were looking for me?"

"Yes, we've got our great chance. Non-stop run to Boulder City—two thousand miles by noon to-morrow!" Tom was almost breathless with excitement. "Go ahead, climb on and turn 'em over. This time we'll show 'em what speed really is!"

Bronte, climbing into the control car, smiled to himself. Fortune was favouring him after all. He had wanted to get away, fast and far, and chance had taken the matter out of his hands!

Whilst Bronte was overhauling the engine, the trucks arrived with the iron lungs, which were soon put on board; B. J. Dexter and Tyler spurring the men on and getting the last ounce out of them.

Just before the train was due to start Dexter brought along a bald-headed man in engineer's overalls whom he introduced to Tom as Dan O'Brien.

"Dan's an old-time engineer," he told Tom. "He knows every inch of the track from here to the coast. He'll ride up there with you and try to keep you from smashing us up."

Tom shook hands. He remembered Lowry, who had ridden with him before, but Dan looked a different type, and he took a liking to him.

At the last moment newspaper reporters crowded around Dexter and Tyler, clamouring for a statement for their papers.

"You can say for me," replied Dexter, "that this represents the only possible chance of saving the lives of my son and others, and we are going to try it regardless of any risks."

The two men climbed into the passenger car, in which were a doctor and nurse, who were being rushed off to Boulder City to help combat the epidemic, and Higgins and Crawford. There came the screech of a whistle, and slowly the Silver Streak backed out of the siding.

A Race Against Death

ONCE Tom had got the Streak past the Harrison Street Station and on to the main line he put the control lever over and soon proceeded to show what his train really could do. Fields, houses, telegraph poles—all flashed by in dizzy procession as the Streak sped like a bullet along the humming rails. At Marsden Centre the speedometer needle hovered round the ninety mark; at Crayvill it was ninety-five.

"It's fast," admitted Dan, a trifle nervously. "Yes, siree, it certainly can travel!"

The train carried a radio, with a loud-speaker extension into the control car, and suddenly the voice of an announcer was heard, telling the world the story of the Silver Streak's epic attempt.

"Tracks have been cleared over the whole distance to allow the Silver Streak to try a non-stop run at speeds never before dreamt of in railroad history. To achieve its mission the train must maintain an average of more than one hundred miles per hour for the whole distance, regardless of the many cities, mountain grades and curves it must traverse. Hourly bulletins of its progress will be broadcast from this station."

Tom glanced at his watch.

"I guess I'll have to open it up, or we'll never make it on time," he remarked.

Dan shrugged.

"You're drivin'. I don't know a thing about these Diesels."

In a few minutes they were doing well over one hundred and ten miles an hour, and Tom began to notice a buzzing in his ears induced by the terrific speed.

Gradually darkness fell, and on and on through the gathering night swept the Streak. Bronte, Higgins and Crawford took it in turns to watch the engines and nurse them along, but for Tom there was no rest. He took risks several times an hour; had to take them. When Dan implored him to slow down for a dangerous curve, Tom did so grudgingly, and even then took it at a speed that had the old engineer clinging to his seat, muttering incoherently. From time to time they heard the voice of the announcer blaring through the loud-speaker.

"Ladies and gentlemen, the Silver Streak is now approaching the Mississippi River. In the last two hours it has travelled two hundred miles. Remarkable as this speed may be, it still is not fast enough to reach Boulder Dam by to-morrow—the dead-line set by the

A Strange Murder

PROFESSOR TROWBRIDGE had conceived the idea of erecting a huge, up-to-date observatory, and had found many eminent astronomers and scientists willing to back the project. As a result, the Trowbridge Planetarium was erected on high ground on the outskirts of Washington. The observatory had a sliding roof that enabled scientists to study the skies with the third largest telescope in the world.

One evening a very select audience of men and women were listening to the pleasant, clear-carrying voice of Professor Ernst Einfeld, who was considered one of the most learned men of the age.

And, as he talked, an almond-eyed Egyptian took a gun out of his pocket and hid it under a handkerchief before pointing the weapon at the man he had come there to kill.

"I always considered that one of the most interesting of the stars is Arcturus," Professor Einfeld smiled benignly at his audience. "This star is forty light years away from the earth, or, in other words, light from the star, travelling at the amazing speed of 186,000 miles per second, takes forty years to reach us here—"

The sliding roof rolled back at a signal from the professor to the man seated by the control board. It was this official's job to lower the lights and work the mechanism of the telescope. The lights already had been dimmed, but now sank to a mere glow, so that the audience could stare through the open roof at the gleaming stars. A small reading lamp and a light reflected on the telescope gave an unusual effect.

"This calculation sounds fantastic and absurd." The professor gave a quiet laugh. "But many of you here know that some stars are even farther away from the earth. But though Arcturus is so far away, the ray from that star is very powerful. I must compliment Professor Trowbridge on this planetarium projector that enables us here to see so easily. This complicated optical mechanism projects a moving image of any selected group of stars visible from the earth. In other words, you are gazing at a much magnified sky. I am not clever enough to reveal how this miracle comes about, but I believe Professor Trowbridge intends very soon to lecture on this very subject. Isn't that so, Professor Trowbridge?"

A laugh out of the darkness. "I am considering the matter, but I shall have to get my lecture sanctioned by the inventor. Thank you for your remarks on my observatory."

"I seem to have wandered from my subject," continued Einfeld. "But I felt I must say a few words about this marvellous observatory. And now to return to Arcturus. At the recent Century of Progress Exhibition in Chicago a ray of light from this star, operating a photo-electric cell, opened the proceedings at a given hour. Arcturus, forty light years away, actually opened that great exhibition. It is incredible, but a fact."

He raised a long pointer. "I will now point out Arcturus to you. To-night she is very clear and easy to discern. You observe the Great Bear and Little Bear; well, you will notice a large star—"

Crack!

The roar of an explosion drowned the voice of the professor.

The official switched on the lights and jumped to his feet. Everyone was staring round to see the cause of the explosion.

"It sounded like a gun," Professor Einfeld exclaimed. "But that is impossible."

A woman screamed and all eyes were focused in her direction. She was pointing to one of the seats on the platform that encircled the walls of the observatory. A figure was sprawled there, and an ominous stain was seeping down the wooden steps. One of the audience had been murdered.

A Maze of Facts and Suspicions

IT was Professor Trowbridge who restored order and took charge of the proceedings. He was a shrewd, alert man, with commanding blue eyes that were particularly stern as he gazed at the frightened people through the powerful lens of his spectacles.

"Ladies and gentlemen, silence, please. Something terrible has happened. I am now going to call the police, and I regret that no one can leave this room until permission is granted. Please do not touch anything."

Detective-lieutenant Ted Mallory was instructed by Headquarters to proceed at once to the observatory and take charge. Mallory was considered one of the smartest of detectives. Within ten minutes of the professor's call he was at the observatory.

This clever, strong-featured man of thirty listened quietly to the few words of explanation from Professor Trowbridge, and silenced with a gesture a huddle of voices and questions.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I've got to detain you all. It appears that Dr. Stone has been murdered, and it is a simple deduction that the murderer is in this room. Professor Trowbridge, have you a big lecture hall or room handy?"

"Yes, I have."

"Good, Regan"—he beckoned a gaunt plain-clothes man—"you will see all these people taken to that room. Professor Trowbridge and Professor Einfeld I wish to remain. Directly I have made some inquiries I will allow all you ladies and gentlemen to proceed to your various homes, but, at the moment, I must detain you. Okay, Regan."

The audience filed towards the door, anxious to get away from the grim spectacle, and old Jim Gray, the round-shouldered doorkeeper, silently pointed the direction they should go.

A pretty, dark-haired girl rushed up to Mallory and smiled at him.

"You don't want me, do you?"

"You were at the lecture, weren't you?" He did not like her assurance.

"Yes, but I've got to 'phone."

"Phone?"

"Yes, I got to spill this story. Gee, I'm lucky!"

"You're lucky—someone else wasn't." Mallory glanced significantly at the still figure, over which the police doctor was bending. "I don't know what you're talking about, but you've got to go with the others."

"But I'm Kay Palmer, of the 'Record,'" cried the girl. "I've got to tell the editor my story. This is a great news scoop."

"Someone in this room killed a man, and because you're a reporter doesn't say you didn't do it. You're as much under suspicion as any of the others!" rasped the detective. "I'm sorry, but I can't do otherwise. Now if you'll kindly go—"

"I think this is absurd," stormed the girl. "The grandest murder story this town's had for years, and you try to tell me I can't 'phone my editor. You know very well—"

Mallory, turning, saw that Regan was back in the room.

"Regan, just take this lady away, please, and watch her."

Mallory's train of thought was distracted by the sound of scuffling and a girl's voice raised in anger. Outside the doors of the observatory he found his man Regan reposing on the ground, whilst a police-officer and Jim Gray, the doorkeeper, stared at the angry girl reporter.

"She smacked my face, chief," moaned Regan.

"A swell-headed flatfoot trying to lay hands on me," stormed the girl. "You haven't heard the last of this!"

"If you don't go away you won't get any dope on this business at all," Mallory said significantly. "If you're wise you'll beat it."

Kay Palmer opened her mouth and then thought better, but she glared at him as Regan escorted her from the room.

"Now that's over we'll get busy."

Mallory leisurely went over to the scene of the crime. He stared down curiously at the body of a middle-aged man. A neatly trimmed black beard; smart, rather foppish clothes, and a monocle.

"What's the report, doc?"

"Shot through the heart, death instantaneous, gunshot wound at close quarters; that seems all."

"What do you mean by close quarters?" questioned the detective.

"Within a few feet?"

"No, no sign of powder burns." The doctor waved his hand vaguely. "A matter of yards—the limit of this room."

Mallory prowled round the room, August 24th, 1935.

glanced at the telescope and looked at the switchboard, then he got Professor Einfeld to show the place he was standing at the moment of the shot.

"The dim lighting would make it difficult for you to see anyone move," the detective remarked. "You have volunteered the information that you saw and heard nothing."

"That is so—the lightning makes the audience completely in shadow," Einfeld answered. "Nor did I hear anything."

"Get the engineer or electrician here that worked the switchboard," directed Mallory. "I'd like to ask him a few questions."

Mr. Gorman was a thin-faced, tall man, whose hair was thin, and his eyes would never look squarely at a person. Mallory listened to all that he had to say.

"You also do work here as under-manager," stated Mallory. "And Professor Trowbridge tells me you sent out the invitations for this lecture?"

"That is so. One hundred were sent out and eighty accepted."

"Were there eighty present at the lecture?"

"Eighty invitation forms were handed in to Gray the doorkeeper, who placed them in my office."

"Well, I guess we'll have all of them back in here," Mallory decided.

"Regan, fetch 'em back."

When all were in the room they glanced expectantly at the lieutenant. They were relieved to find that the body had been removed. They were asked to take the same seats that they occupied during the lecture.

Mallory questioned them, and found that several people were of opinion that someone had been moving about in the audience—one swore it was a woman, whilst another swore it was a man. Several people had felt the draught of the bullet and were certain the gun had been fired close to their ears.

"Professor Trowbridge and Mr. Gorman." The lieutenant detective beckoned the two officials. "You two should know a good bit about those people invited to this lecture. Is there anybody here who was not invited?"

"I can vouch for a great number, but Mr. Gorman handles the social side and would know more than I do on this point," Professor Trowbridge said nervously. "There are one or two faces here that seem strange to me, but I've not a good memory for faces."

Mallory glanced at Gorman, and thought the man seemed nervous.

"There is one person here who was not invited!" someone shouted. "That man over there!"

Mallory turned quickly to stare keenly at a youngish man, whose top lip was adorned with a small black moustache.

"Who are you?"

"John Morgan, and I was confidential secretary to Dr. Stone," was the reply. "I came here because Dr. Stone has had several threats made against his life."

"Now we're getting at something," Mallory came across and studied Morgan closely. "Why did you come here?"

"I thought the threats were idle ones, but I wanted to be on the safe side," Morgan explained. "I watched everyone carefully, and especially that man. I know he hated Dr. Stone."

The detective lieutenant followed the direction of Morgan's gaze and beheld the Egyptian, who leaned back in his seat without displaying any great interest in the proceedings.

"What is your name?" Mallory asked.

"Ahmed Haidru," said the man in a soft whisper, and almond eyes looked at the detective defiantly.

"I know he was not on the list for invitations," cried Trowbridge. "You never sent him an invitation, Mr. Gorman?"

"N-no," Gorman answered. "Certainly not."

"You've got a gun," the detective accused the Egyptian. "Hand it over."

A shrug of the shoulders and Ahmed Haidru produced the gun, which was wrapped in a silk handkerchief. All barrels loaded. Mallory removed the bullets and examined the gun closely. This weapon had not been fired for weeks. The Egyptian seemed amused.

"I came here with that gun and I waited my time. I would shoot the man who cheated me of my money," The Egyptian shrugged his shoulders. "I told him he should die, and I came here to kill him with this gun, but someone else robbed me of my revenge."

"What do you mean by that?"

"I mean that I did not shoot Dr. Stone, and I am very sorry that someone deprived me of the pleasure." The Egyptian smiled sadly. "You can use your third degree or any method you like—I did not kill Stone, but I did come here to kill him."

"Regan, take this man," Mallory snapped out. "Detain him on a charge of unlawful carrying of firearms."

The Egyptian seemed resigned to what fate had in store for him, and with head held high was marched out by Regan.

Mallory had had several years of crime investigation, and had met all types of crooks and killers. Was this Ahmed Haidru telling the truth? An unbelievable story, and somehow for that very reason Mallory felt Dr. Stone had not been killed by this man. He instructed Regan to hand him the report on the rest of the audience. Regan, acting on instructions, had obtained particulars when the audience had been herded into the next room.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I won't detain you any longer," Mallory told them. "But if you have business out of town I recommend you to notify the police of any change of address. Mr. Morgan, I should like a few words with you."

The detective went across to Professor Trowbridge.

"I have noticed one man, who is one of your officials, and no doubt he is above suspicion. He helped me have the body removed and assisted Regan to get all those names and particulars of your audience."

"That's Langsdale," Trowbridge explained. "He holds no definite post here yet, but he assists both Gorman and myself. I shall give him a position some time in the near future."

"Then Langsdale's a new man?"

"Yes, I took him on a few days ago." Trowbridge peered intently at the detective. "I have known of Langsdale for years, and have great belief in his abilities."

"Okay!" Mallory signified that that line of questioning was at an end. He turned to beckon Morgan, and found Kay Palmer looking at him with mocking though angry eyes.

"I presume I may telephone the story to my paper now?"

"You may," Mallory decided that when angry this girl looked most attractive, but like most journalists a little queer.

"Thanks, and will I give them a story?" Kay Palmer paused at the door. "Of all the incapable people you take the prize. You've footled around asking asinine questions, and where are you? Nowhere!"

"And what's your theory?" A smile twitched the strong mouth.

"You know the direction of the shot, and it must have come from someone on that side," Kay Palmer answered. "That Egyptian was sitting in the place from whence the shot was fired. But why should I tell you your job? Good-evening."

"Good-evening to you," grinned Mallory. "I'll enjoy your story."

Morgan's cough reminded him that there was still one witness.

"You carry a gun?"

"Yes." Morgan produced the weapon. Mallory examined it.

"Loaded. You have a permit?"

Morgan handed over a permit.

"The second person with a gun at a lecture on astronomy, and I think one can assume that there was a third person with a gun. Yet no one of the audience had a gun besides you and Ahmed Haidru. Curious."

"Examine the gun, and you'll find the barrels spotless." Morgan was not perturbed. "That gun hasn't been fired this evening."

"Dr. Stone received threatening letters—got any of them?"

"No, the doctor destroyed them all. He used to laugh over them and put them in the fire."

"And yet you thought these threats so serious that you came to this meeting armed?"

"I did not think much of the threats until that Egyptian came to the office a few weeks back. Haidru has been there several times, and though not present I heard them rowing, and when the Egyptian left he shouted that he would kill Stone very soon. And believe me the look in that slit-eyed guy's face wasn't nice."

"How long have you been with Stone?" questioned the officer.

"Six months. A good boss, but close with his money. Besides doctoring he was a drug manufacturer, and because of some drug this Egyptian had it in for Stone." Morgan gave a significant nod. "Stone was pretty sharp at business, and maybe he did do this Egyptian fellow out of some secret process. That's only an idea."

"Thanks for all you've told me." Mallory handed back the gun and permit. "One last word—don't leave town."

Only Trowbridge remained, and after a final look round Mallory decided to do no more till morning. The old doorkeeper got up as the two men came out of the observatory.

"Shall I lock up, sir?" he asked in a hoarse, tired whisper.

"Yes, Jim, lock up," answered Trowbridge.

"You're Jim Gray, the doorkeeper." Mallory stared at the old fellow. "Did anyone leave the observatory during the lecture?"

"No one, sir." A shake of the big head, with its mop of untidy grey hair. "I was sitting just inside the door, and no one attempted to leave. They could not have opened this door because it was locked. Whoever did it, gentlemen, must have been inside that observatory, and no person got past me."

The Missing Page

MALLORY was not pleased when he read the headlines of the "Record" on the Planetarium Murder Mystery. A scathing article on the inability of the police to find the criminal and methods used by their detectives. He was not surprised to have a call from the District Attorney.

"The elections are coming on, Mallory, and this case will give the opposition a handle if it isn't cleared up sharply," said the D.A. over the phone. "You've read the 'Record' this morning?"

"Yes, and I know the reporter who is responsible. If she weren't a dame, I'd feel like socking her!" Mallory granted back.

"Don't give her or her paper a chance of any more wisecracks." The D.A. was emphatic. "Any clues on the case?"

"Ahmed Haidru seems to be the guilty person, but I haven't proof positive. I'll come round and talk the case over."

After an unsatisfactory interview with the District Attorney, he decided to see the Egyptian—that did not help him much. Dr. Stone had stolen some secret process that the Egyptian considered of great value. His story was the same as last night.

At the Planetarium Mallory first saw Trowbridge, but gained no information of any value, then he went to see Einfeld in the office that had been set aside for this important little foreigner.

"Did you know this Dr. Stone, professor?"

"I have heard of him for his interest in drugs, but I do not know him," was the reply. "I had no idea he was a student of astronomy. I gave Professor Trowbridge a list of some well-known people I wanted invited, and Trowbridge added a few names on his own."

His next interview was with Gorman. "How did Ahmed Haidru get that invitation?"

"That's a mystery to me."

Gorman gave the detective a furtive glance.

"It's no mystery to you," Mallory answered. "You sent the Egyptian that invitation. Why?"

Gorman hesitated, then faced his accuser.

"Yes, I lied just now. I did send Haidru that invitation. The man came to me and said he was very interested in astronomy and especially in the star Arcturus. I thought he was genuine, and as one ticket had come back I let him have it."

"Without getting Trowbridge's sanction, and thus endangering your own position here," Mallory shook his head. "Wasn't there something more to this act of generosity?"

"Haidru offered me a hundred dollars," Gorman admitted. "I was desperately hard up because my wife has been very ill. A hundred dollars staved off my creditors until my next month's salary comes due. The man seemed genuine, and I took the chance of being found out."

Mallory went off and made a few inquiries about Gorman, but could not tie up any other connection between the official and the Egyptian. Seeing old Jim Gray shuffling around he inquired where Langsdale could be found, and was shown the latter's office.

"You have just joined the staff at this observatory. Have you always been interested in the stars and their courses?"

"I've always been a delver into the unknown." Langsdale glanced frankly at the detective. "I've dabbled in science and engineering, and in my time tried many kinds of jobs. If I lost this job and someone offered me another with an insurance company I'd take it. Beggars can't be choosers, but I prefer something interesting and baffling like astronomy."

"What was your previous job?"

Langsdale took so long to answer that Mallory's interest quickened.

"Guess I've been dreading that question like going to a dentist." The official gave a wry grin. "I was in my last job five years, and I didn't enjoy it. Prison isn't a pleasant place."

"Prison?"

"Got six years, but good conduct reduced it to five. My name isn't Langsdale, but Weston."

"Does Professor Trowbridge know this?"

"Oh, yes, he's known me since I was a youngster!" Langsdale explained. "But for Professor Trowbridge, I should be lining up with other tramps for food and a place to sleep."

Mallory studied the ex-convict closely. "What is your real name, and what was the reason of the sentence?"

"Name is Weston, and the reason assault with intent to kill." Langsdale laughed bitterly. "Sounds bad, but when you're up against a man who has a fortune and all the lawyers in the

"A swell-headed flatfoot trying to lay hands on me!" stormed the girl. "You haven't heard the last of this," world behind him, it is possible for an unfortunate like myself to be framed. I admit that when I attacked this man I was mad with rage and wanted to do bodily harm, but to kill is another matter. Any rate, the other side laid it on hot and strong for me, and I got a heavy sentence."

"Why did you attack this man?"

"Because he had robbed me of a valuable formula," said Langsdale with a shrug of his shoulder. "But I've only my word for it and not a scrap of proof. They laughed at my story. One day, Mallory, I'm going to meet that guy again, and I may fix him for keeps. Foolish thing to tell a police officer, but that man robbed me of a fortune and made me give up the girl I was going to marry."

"Who is this man, and where is he now?"

"The name is Harold Skinner," Langsdale confessed quite frankly. "But I have no idea of his whereabouts. I've made inquiries because I intend to get something for the secret that made thousands for Skinner, but he's vanished, and, more than likely, changed his name."

"Thanks for telling me, Langsdale." Mallory eyed the self-confessed criminal. "Of course I'll have to keep my eye on you, for this assault and crime sheet bring you under suspicion. Stick around."

Lieutenant Mallory went to see Professor Trowbridge to demand why the professor had said nothing of Langsdale's criminal record.

"Because I hoped he would tell you himself. If you had come to me and Langsdale had not told you, then I should have done. I have complete trust in the man."

"Well, I hope your trust isn't misplaced," Mallory said significantly. "By the way, have you a book on Arcturus? I'd like to read about that star."

"No, I haven't, but there are sure to be books about Arcturus in Professor Einfeld's room."

Mallory went along to the professor's room and found old Jim Gray tidying up the place.

"Jim, is there any book here on that star Arcturus?"

"Arcturus?" Jim Gray rubbed his wrinkled chin. "Not that I know of, sir. I'll have a look round."

Mallory also had a prowling round the book-shelves, and found nothing of any importance. He looked round to find that Jim Gray had gone, and he was glad, because that enabled him to look through the professor's papers. The first book he saw on the desk was on astronomy, and the index gave two pages dealing with Arcturus. He opened the book to find that two pages had been torn out hurriedly.

"That's mighty funny."

Mallory's eyes narrowed. He flicked over the pages, and a picture dropped out.

"To my old friend, Professor Einfeld," and it was signed by Dr. Stone.

"And he told me he had never met Stone," Mallory spoke softly. "There's some funny business going on."

A Threat on Einfeld's Life

NEXT morning the headlines of the "Record" startled Mallory, and he was reading what Kay Palmer, special correspondent, had written with bulging eyes when the D.A. told him to come over right away, and make it snappy.

The D.A. was in a furious rage.

"What's all this about Professor Einfeld knowing the person who killed Stone? What's it all mean?"

"That's what I would like to know."

August 24th, 1935.

Mallory shook his head. "I did not grant the girl an interview, and I know she hasn't seen Einfeld. She must have seen someone to get this extraordinary story."

Mallory was accompanied by Regan, and chance made the lieutenant glance at his assistant. He knew the slow-witted detective and his habits, and Regan was at the moment registering acute uneasiness.

"Regan, do you know anything about this?" he asked.

Regan shuffled his feet, grinned nervously, twisted his hat in his hands, and was speechless.

The District Attorney now observed the signs, and scowled.

"Regan, did you talk to Kay Palmer of the 'Record'?" The wretched man nodded. "Then what in thunder did you say to her?"

"Well, sir, it was a joke. I was kidding her, same as Mallory kids people," Regan admitted. "I was round at the observatory, and they told me the dame wanted an interview with someone in authority, preferably someone intelligent, and she didn't wish to see Mr. Mallory. So I saw her."

"If I weren't a cop," groaned Mallory. "What did you tell her, you big egg?"

"She kinda wheedled round me for a story, so I used my inventive faculties," Regan admitted. "She fired questions at me, and among others wanted to know if Einfeld had any theories, so I laughed and said that maybe Einfeld might know. Maybe the professor has a past, and he ain't letting on that he knew Stone. Maybe he didn't like Stone, and was glad to see him bumped off, or maybe he saw an enemy of Stone's there, and when the deed was done didn't like to say anything lest he himself be implicated. I thought she knew I was kidding her."

"You and your maybes," raved Mallory. "She's swallowed all you said and added plenty. According to the 'Record,' Einfeld knows the name of the killer. Of all the dud cakes you're the prize."

"I'm sorry, boss."

"The deed's done," Mallory turned to the D.A. "This has changed my plans. I've got to get busy. Regan and this girl have got the old professor in a jam. I'll go and see that clever dame."

Kay Palmer was proudly triumphant when Mallory came into the reporters' room and strode up to her desk.

"I hope you're proud of what you have done," he said harshly. "First of all Regan was trying to kid you. That big sap knows nothing. Moreover, you've endangered a man's life."

"What do you mean by that? Your slow, stupid methods—"

"Shut up!" Mallory interrupted.

"You don't think Einfeld killed Stone, do you? No, I see you don't. Then why sentence the old boy to danger? Terrible danger, Miss Palmer. This mystery is a baffler, and yet you say in your rag for all to see that Einfeld knows who did the deed. The real murderer will read that, and though I know your story is a lot of bunk, the murderer won't know that, and he'll think he's heading for the chair. What will he do to save himself? He'll try to kill Einfeld. Now, perhaps, you realise what your cleverness has done. If Einfeld should be killed one person is to blame. Think it over. Good-morning!"

Without a backward glance Mallory strode from the room, leaving behind a white-faced, horror-stricken girl.

His next call was at the hotel of Professor Einfeld, and he told the reception clerk that he didn't care if the professor was in bed, he was going to see him.

Without his teeth and his hair all awry the professor looked a strange spectacle. The funny little man was peering and blinking at that morning's paper.

"I'm so glad to see you," he beamed his relief. "Do you see what they're saying in the papers? I know who killed the poor man—but I don't. You don't think I know, do you, Mr. Mallory?"

"Did you know Dr. Stone?"

"No—no! You asked me that once before." The professor blinked his eyes. "Why?"

Mallory produced the photograph and the professor denied that he had ever seen it before. He did not know Stone, so why should Stone send him a signed photograph?

Mallory peered closely at the picture and the writing—the ink seemed very fresh—he would have an expert examine it. He explained to the professor that the papers had made a big mistake, but did not say that his fool assistant and a charming high-spirited girl were the cause.

"You're angry, professor, because the papers print a wrong statement, but I'm annoyed because it puts you in danger."

"Danger? Me?"

"If the killer thinks you know his identity he may have nasty intentions towards you," Mallory said grimly. "From now on you're going to be guarded night and day."

The telephone rang beside the bed, and the professor answered the call. Mallory was looking round the room when a startled exclamation made him turn. The professor was shakily replacing the receiver, and when he looked at Mallory his face was drawn and white.

"What's wrong?"

"My life is in danger."

"What do you mean?"

"A strange voice on the wire. Threatening me with death if I dared to squeal."

"Did you recognise the voice?"

"It was a man," the professor replied. "But very husky and hoarse as if he were trying to disguise his tones."

Mallory sprang to the 'phone. "Trace that call. Police orders!"

Ten minutes passed and Mallory again went to the 'phone. It was a new girl who answered; the other had gone off but left no message. Vehemently Mallory explained.

"I expect she thought you were having a joke with her," came the reply. "Or else the call came from a booth."

"In every direction I am baffled or else balked by imbeciles," Mallory cried, after ringing off. "Regan, get hold of the management, take him by the scruff of the neck and make him conduct you to the exchange. Get the name of the girl who has gone off duty and find out what happened."

"I have to return to Germany in a few days, and there are many things I must do before then." The professor shook his head gloomily. "I can't stay in this hotel all day. I must go about my business even if my life is in danger."

"Research work?"

"Yes, at the Planetarium."

"You don't want to spend the rest of your life wondering if someone is going to shoot you or jump on you from behind with a knife, do you?" Mallory said suddenly. "You'd like this business settled and so would everybody else. This killer has got to be found. This newspaper report we can use as a trap, if you'll allow yourself, professor, to be the bait."

"The cheese for the mouse?"

"That's the idea," Mallory smiled.

"Loaded, eh?" said Mallory. "Have you got a permit?"

"You want to work at the Planetarium. You shall at six this evening. Two of my boys and an armed motor-cycle escort will bring you over to the Planetarium, and I'll get the Press to announce that the brave professor has gone back to his studies in spite of the fact that his life has been threatened."

"I am not very brave, and perhaps

"Professor, leave this to me." Mallory was confident. "The killer won't get away with it a second time."

The Second Shot

MALLORY sent word to the observatory that he was coming over to see Professor Trowbridge, to whom he explained all that he wanted done.

"I'll get all Professor Einfeld's papers and his desk moved into the observatory so that he can continue his studies. If you'll excuse me I'll see about that at once."

When Professor Trowbridge had gone Mallory walked across to the large desk and idly glanced at the various objects. His attention was attracted by an open telephone book. Open at the Su's. Curious, because Professor Einfeld's hotel was named Sutton. More curious still when Mallory saw a faint pencil mark under Sutton Hotel. Trowbridge had a voice that varied in tone and would be easy to disguise.

At how many more was the finger of suspicion to point?

In the observatory he found Jim Gray placing the desk near the great telescope.

"How will this do here, sir?" cried the old fellow. "The professor will be as safe as houses with the doors closed and your men mounting guard. All the professor's papers and books are here."

"Thank you, Jim. That will be all."

Mallory made another close study of the observatory, and for some while found nothing unusual. Near the desk was an old box, placed by the side of the platform, to which the base of the telescope was fixed. Probably placed there because the step was a high one. Mallory believed in searching everything and inside the box was a gun.

Mallory broke open the gun and found one chamber fired and the rest loaded. Thoughtfully he placed the gun where he had found it and stood by the desk. He made a motion of falling, and shook his head. He went nearer the telescope and did the same trick—that seemed to satisfy him. One more look round, and then Mallory went down to the main hall to wait the arrival of Professor Einfeld.

Regan and other detectives were waiting around. Except for certain officials there were no others in the building, nor would anybody be admitted unless with a police pass. Mallory instructed them to watch the roof.

"When they want to observe the stars part of the glass roof slides back. I don't think any danger will come that way, but one must be on the alert. Professor Trowbridge, Gorman, Langsdale and old Jim are the only officials in the building. Keep tab on them so we can check their movements should anything happen."

"Do you think anything is going to happen, chief?" asked Regan.

"I think someone will try to kill the professor," was the grim answer. "And that reminds me. Ring up that dame at the 'Record' and ask her to come across. I'd like her to see how her clever remarks endangered a man's life."

Kay Palmer was over within ten minutes and not quite so sure of herself. She had to admit that she had been a bit hasty, but it was nice of Mallory to have her over on the chance of a story.

"Let's hope it isn't another killing," Mallory added significantly. "And remember you're here on the understanding that you do as you're told and no wild ham-scaram stories to the editor. Ah, here is Professor Einfeld."

Mallory took the professor to the observatory, and he was careful to lock the door. On the desk was the book on astronomy, and Einfeld was very angry when he found the torn-out pages.

"It seems to me that somebody doesn't want to know anything about this Arcturus star," Mallory said. "Professor, will you give me a brief talk on this star?"

The professor slid back the roof, remarked that they were fortunate to have such a clear sky, and showed him the crescent-shaped Arcturus. He talked about light taking forty years to reach the earth, but what interested him most was the use made of the star to open the Century of Progress Exhibition at Chicago. He got the professor to explain that in detail.

"Professor, have you had your life threatened before?"

"No, no, I can't say I have." The professor shook his head. "But I have been in many countries and been in very lonely places, and often my life has been in danger from bandits and such like. I have a gun." He laughed. "Thank goodness I've never had to fire it—I've never fired one in my life."

"You carry the gun on you?"

"Oh, no, I keep it in my desk." The professor opened a drawer. "That is very strange—the gun has disappeared."

"Not so strange as you think." Mallory went to the box. "Is this your gun?"

The professor nodded and looked at the detective in amazement.

"Your life is in great danger, and I don't quite know how the person who shot Stone plans to get you. I've an idea, but I'm not sure. Before I leave you to get on with your studies I want to be sure no one is in the observatory, and that you are quite safe."

Fifteen minutes later Mallory opened the observatory, and shouted for Jim Gray. The old janitor could not be found, and none of the detectives knew where he had gone. The mystery was soon explained when Trowbridge reported the District Attorney on the line.

"I've got Jim Gray here," the D.A. explained. "It's been on his conscience to reveal some facts that he has kept back because of the observatory. He knows that Professor Einfeld and Dr. Stone were intimately acquainted, and that both men knew Ahmed Haidra."

"Best thing you can do, sir, is to come over here and bring Jim Gray with you," suggested Mallory. "I daren't leave here, and I'll be obliged if you'll hurry. 'Bye!'"

Mallory found Kay Palmer and smiled at the girl reporter. "You stick around with me, and maybe I'll get you an exclusive story."

"I'm very dubious about this attempt on the professor's life," she said with a flash of her old spirit. "I think you're imagining all this danger."

"You know how a train starts—slowly at first." He smiled at her. "And how it gains speed later. Well, just imagine this night as a train and this place the station. The red light is at danger and yet the wheels of the train are slowly moving. Kay, by that I mean that things are moving."

They were on the roof, looking at the stars and talking about various subjects of interest when distinctly they heard a shot.

"The observatory!" shouted Mallory. "Come on!"

They found several of the detectives trying to open the door, which was locked. They were thinking of breaking down the door when Professor Trowbridge appeared.

"Have you got a key that fits?"

The professor hesitated.

"Yes, I have."

"Thanks," Mallory opened the door. "All you boys guard this door well and no one to come in. Professor, you will accompany me." He saw two figures hurrying to the scene. "Langsdale! Gorman! You come in with the professor."

The place smelt of powder and the lights were out. Mallory switched them on and gave a gasp of horror. He pointed across the room at the prone figure.

"The professor!" shouted Langsdale. "They've got him!"

Mallory was first beside the body.

"Stand back, gentlemen, please. Don't touch anything."

"There's a gun near his hand!" gasped Gorman.

Mallory examined the body.

"Gentlemen, I regret to say that Professor Einfeld is dead."

"Dead?" they cried.

"Yes, dead!" Mallory got up.

"Who killed him?" shouted Trowbridge. "Aren't you going to have the place searched?"

"He shot himself," Mallory explained. "I think we shall find that Professor Einfeld killed Dr. Stone."

The expressions on the faces of those three men interested Mallory very keenly.

"Trowbridge, no one must know of this yet. Will you please get through to police headquarters and ask the coroner to come here at once. No, don't use this 'phone. It may have fingerprints. Langsdale, will you go downstairs and wait for the D.A. to arrive, and bring him here as soon as he appears? You can tell him that the professor has been shot. Gorman, I'd like you to go downstairs and keep any Press hounds at bay. Tell Miss Palmer that if she wants to make a big scoop to wait, and if she attempts to 'phone the 'Record' stop her."

Directly the officials had gone Mallory locked the door. He clapped his hands, and then the body of Professor Einfeld moved.

The Time Gun

LEUTENANT MALLORY helped Professor Einfeld to get to his feet.

"You played the part magnificently," the detective enthused. "Trowbridge and those other two thought you were dead. Tell me what happened?"

"After you left me I lay down by that box, upsetting the box and pushing out the revolver so that it lay close to my hand. Then I remembered about the lights, and I quickly put them out and lay down on the floor. It was very eerie lying there and hardly breathing. I got such a pain in my neck after a while that I turned my head very quietly and looked round, but all I saw was the open roof with the stars." He gave a shaky laugh. "And Arcturus looked so big and strange, as if the star laughed at me."

"Then what happened?"

"The crash of an explosion almost in my ear and I think I really am dead, but then I moved and knew that I'm not touched," the professor said excitedly. "I keep very quiet as you tell me, but there is not a sound. Then a few moments later you come into the observatory with the others. Thank goodness they did not look too close—I was shaking from head to feet."

"The crash of the explosion almost in your ears," Mallory looked round. "As if the killer were standing over you?"

"Yes, but I heard no one."

"Because no one was here!" The detective jumped on to the platform of the big telescope. "This is where we're going to find your killer."

"I see no one." The professor was alarmed.

Mallory pointed to the telescope.

"This is the fellow we're after. Come closer, professor."

Professor Einfeld climbed on to the platform.

"The smell of powder is very keen."

"Yes, and if you'll glance at the telescope you'll see marks of a powder explosion and you'll also see something else. Look!"

"What is that thing?" The professor peered through a powerful eyeglass.

"This is something I have never seen before. It is not part of the telescope, and yet it is fixed with wires. It looks like—like—"

He gaped at Mallory.

"It's a gun!"

"A time-gun," Mallory climbed up for a better look. "Painted the same colour as the telescope and easily fixed. You mentioned the photo electric cell that was used for opening the exhibition at Chicago, and here's another. But instead of opening gates this cell is connected to a trigger of a gun, and when Arcturus is in a certain position the star's ray is taken by the telescope to the cell. The time of the gun-shot was, roughly, eight forty-two, and in a few minutes I'm going to ask you, professor, to move the telescope so that the ray will again cause that cell to function, firing the gun."

"Why?"

"Just to give the murderer the shock of his life," grimly smiled Mallory.

"Let's take the direction of the shot." He went over to the steel walls and made a close examination. "Ah, here's the mark."

"But I don't see how that gun could get me?"

"Professor, the murderer knew that, when working, most of your time would be spent close to the telescope. If you had been using the telescope to look at Arcturus at the time that gun went off, the bullet would have lodged in the brain. Why did the killer know you would be using the telescope at eight-forty-two?"

"Because I have notes stating when Arcturus is best observed," instantly answered Einfeld. "For instance, tomorrow the time would be nine-five—all the officials know of these times."

"So you're beginning to suspect someone at the observatory," Mallory chuckled. "Your gun was hidden by that box and, when you fell, would have been revealed. The idea being to make it look as if it were suicide. Remorse on your part for killing Stone, and the murderer confident that the only person able to reveal his secret dead. Ingenious. The set gun would have killed you at close quarters, and your gun lies on the floor with one barrel fired; you would have fallen near the box, and the natural assumption would be suicide. A somewhat clumsy deduction on the killer's part—he thinks the police have no intelligence."

"You know who tried to kill me?"

"One of four persons, and I think I know the one," Mallory pointed to the telescope. "It is now nearly nine-fifteen. I want you to make careful adjustments so that the gun would fire again at nine-forty-five. Can you do that?"

"Certainly," the professor answered. "I'll do it now."

The telescope was in its new position when there came a rapping on the outer door. Regan bellowed so that Mallory could hear—the D.A. and the coroner were outside.

"Wait a few minutes!" the detective shouted back.

"Sham death again, and don't get up till I give the word," he whispered to Einfeld. "I'm going to let them all in, and I hope to get proof positive on the identity of the murderer. Curiously enough, I can't find the motive for the crime by the suspected person. One of my four suspects has a motive, and yet I don't think he did the deed. All I can surmise is that the murderer is crazy or that there is something I don't know. So please act nicely, professor, and maybe we'll find out everything. Don't forget to keep your knees from shaking."

"I'll do my best." The professor got down on the floor. "I shall be glad, my friend, when all this acting is finished."

The Four Suspects

THE people crowded into the observatory and Mallory took up his position near the prone figure.

"You kept us outside a long time, Mallory," complained the District Attorney.

"I didn't want anything disturbed until I had made a thorough search and investigation," the detective explained. "It was important that I should take these precautions. I should like the coroner to examine the body."

The D.A. came nearer.

"A grave risk you're taking, Ted. Suppose Professor Einfeld was only badly wounded—they might hold you

Episode 3.—“Stampeding Death”

READ THIS FIRST

In the hope of obtaining a cure for infantile paralysis, the Carnafellow Foundation sends two American specialists and their assistants to an experimental station in darkest Africa.

Dr. Trevor is one of them, and he and his assistant, Carl, are interested only in benefiting humanity. Not so their two colleagues, Bracken and Phillips, these being more interested in a $500,000 reward which has been offered for a cure.

Trevor discovers an antidote, and Bracken and Phillips attempt to secure the formula of it. To outwit them, Trevor writes one half of the formula on a parchment, and engraves the other half on a wrist-band worn by his little son, Jan.

At the experimental station there is a menagerie packed with wild animals, used by the doctors in their research. That same night these break loose, and in the excitement young Jan is led into the jungle by Chiema, a tame chimpanzee which has been his playmate.

Trevor follows them. His wife is slain by the escaped animals, and so is his assistant. Bracken and Phillips survive, and return to America, but fifteen years later they come back to Africa, learning that Trevor has suddenly shown up at the home of a trader named Andrews.

They reach Andrews' remote trading station only to discover that Trevor's mind is a blank.

About that same time Chiema and Jan, who is now grown to manhood, are captured by the crew of a steamer on which Andrews' daughter, Mona, is travelling.

The craft is afterwards wrecked, but

Jan, Chiema and Mona Andrews gain the shore, together with a seaman named Borno, who is something of a mystery. Later, Borno and Mona fall into the hands of cannibals, and in an attempt to save them Jan drops down into the native village from the trees.

The Burning Village

AS the mob of cannibals rushed towards him Jan sprang to his feet and, on the spur of the moment, he leaped upon one of the two witch-doctors, who had been capering in front of the prisoners, Borno and Mona.

Acting like one inspired, Jan seized the witch-doctor wrested from his hand the blazing torch that he was carrying, and then hurled the native to the ground. Next instant the young white man was making for the trees, with a swarm of blacks in full cry.

He plunged into the darkness of the thickets, and heard the spears of his foes come slashing through the foliage. Yet it was as if he bore a charmed life, for none of the missiles struck him, and escaping with a grazed shoulder, he jumped for an overhanging bough and pulled himself upward.

He was climbing high into the trees when his pursuers appeared below him. They could tell where he was by the flaming torch that he was now grasping in his fist, and with insensate yells they hurled more spears at him, endeavouring to bring him down, but the shafts were turned by the branches amidst which he was clambering.

Suddenly he began to work back towards the village, swooping through the trees with the rapidity and the agility of an ape, and all at once he was immediately above the outer ring of huts.

Before the confused and scattered savages knew what was happening he had set fire to the thatched roofs of some seven or eight of the dwellings, and then, flinging the torch aside, he vanished into the upper foliage of the trees again—vanished almost as swiftly as he had appeared.

The huts into which he had thrust the burning brand were soon ablaze, and a wind that was blowing through the jungle carried the gathering flames to adjacent hovels. Meanwhile, anxious groups of natives were running to and fro in utter consternation, some striving to save the dwellings that were now alight, others doing all they could to prevent the conflagration from spreading.

To fight the blaze they had to fetch water from the river, and the delay caused in hurrying back and forth rendered their efforts futile. Indeed, a trained brigade of firemen could scarcely have hoped to quell the inferno, so quickly did it sweep from hut to hut.

The warriors who had pursued Jan into the thickets were back in the village by this time, helping to wage war on the fire. Almost every man of the tribe, in fact, was engaged upon this task, as well as many of the women and children. But they could do nothing to stem the surge of the flames through the close-grouped dwellings, and in the space of fifteen minutes half the kraal was burning.

From a leafy cyrie high above the scene of destruction Jan watched the efforts of the natives and awaited his chance, and at last, when he judged that the moment was ripe, he began to lower himself quietly from bough to bough.

August 24th, 1935.

Reaching the ground, he crouched down in the undergrowth on the fringe of the clearing, and directed his glance towards the bound figures of Borno and Mona, lashed to a couple of stakes not far away.

Complete chaos reigned in the village, and the cannibals seemed to have forgotten their captives. Taking full advantage of the situation he had created, Jan braced himself for action and made a dash towards the abandoned prisoners.

Unnoticed he won his way to the spot where they stood, and was about to untie their thongs with his hands when he discerned a knife lying close by. It must have been dropped by one of the natives and, snatching it up, Jan speedily cut the bonds that fastened Mona and Borno to the two wooden posts.

Mona was in a fainting condition, and slumped to the ground just after she had been released. The instant he had set Borno free, Jan wheeled to raise her in his strong arms and lift her across his shoulder; then he made for the jungle with the other man close behind him.

It was as they were on the point of entering the thickets that a party of warriors saw them, and with angry shouts these gave up the vain fight against the spreading fire to take after the escaping captives and their rescuer.

Jan and Borno dived into the heart of the vegetation, but had only gone a few paces when the older man laid a hand on his companion's arm.

"Jan," he gasped, "you save the girl. She is precious—more precious to me than my own life. I'll try to lead the cannibals away from you, and if it is my lot to survive I'll meet you near the spot where Mona and I were captured."

Without waiting for a reply he struck off to the right and, as he vanished amidst the thickets, Jan turned in the other direction.

He did not keep to the ground, however, but pulled himself into the trees, and so great was his strength, so lithe the rippling muscles of his clean-cut body, that the dead weight of the girl who lay across his broad shoulder seemed scarcely to hamper him.

He was moving almost silently through the upper foliage of those jungle trees when the pursuing band of savages gained the spot where he and Borno had separated, and as they heard the seaman threshing through the underbrush somewhere ahead of them they pushed forward determinedly.

Keeping to the tree-tops, Jan continued his strange journey with the unconscious daughter of Trader Andrews, and presently he was joined by Chiema, who must have kept track of his activities. Together the young white man and the chimpanzee then passed rapidly from bough to bough, making use of trailing vines to swing themselves through space wherever there was a gap too wide to jump.

They were sure of foot—Jan equally as sure as the ape. Never once did the son of Harry Trevor slip or falter, and never once was Mona Andrews in danger of crashing to the earth away below. Whether he was treading the branch of a tree, or swooping through mid-air with one hand clasped on the fibrous tendril of a creeper, his hold on the girl was tight and secure.

Behind them the shouts of the cannibal villagers died away, and in the sky the lurid glow of the doomed huts faded gradually into the star-spangled darkness. Then at last Jan reached the locality where Borno and Mona had first been taken by the savages.

Mona was now beginning to recover consciousness, but her rescuer had descended to the ground with her before she was fully in possession of her wits.

"What happened?" the girl asked tremulously. "Where's—where's Borno?"

"Borno, he come here later," Jan replied, hoping against hope that the seaman would be able to give his pursuers the slip.

He smiled at her reassuringly, and then proceeded to gather a quantity of twigs and fronds, providing her with a makeshift but comfortable bed.

"Mona sleep," he said to her. "Jan keep watch."

He persuaded her to lie down, and before long she was slumbering from sheer exhaustion. Close by, with Chiema squatting beside him, Jan sat with his broad back against the bole of a tree, and his arms folded across his deep chest.

He did not sleep, but remained on the alert, ready for any emergency.

The Taking of Borno

ABOUT the time that Jan was rescuing his friends from the clutches of the cannibals, the search-party, headed by Bracken and Phillips, was some three or four miles from the native village, and as the Americans and their followers marched onward through the jungle they presently beheld that dim glow thrown up into the sky by the blazing huts.

Allen, the foreman of Trader Andrews, was walking abreast of the two doctors, and he volunteered a comment.

"According to Kutu, that's the direction in which the cannibal kraal lies," he said. "I wonder what's happening there."

"That's what we've got to find out," Bracken rejoined. "Do you think you can get our men to go much farther?"

Allen looked grimly at the negro employees of Trader Andrews. All of them were armed, some with spears, some with bows and arrows, others with rifles; and the expedition was sufficiently strong in numbers to give a good account of itself. Nevertheless the black boys were clearly ill at ease, Kutu especially.

"I'll talk to them," Allen declared. "Don't worry, they'll stick with us all right after I've had a word with them."

He mastered the kafirs around him and harangued them in vigorous tones. Meanwhile, Bracken and Phillips drew aside, and the former addressed his colleague guardedly.

"Whatever else happens, we've got to lay hands on Jan Trevor," Bracken said. "Once we have possession of that bracelet on his wrist, the formula is ours."

"And the five-hundred-thousand-dollar trust fund that goes with it," breathed Phillips. "But we can't be sure, Bracken, that this mysterious white youth is the fellow we're after."

"It's Jan Trevor all right," Bracken retorted. "From what Kutu told us, I'm convinced of it."

"Kutu said there were two other people with the wild white boy when he saw him fighting that bunch of cannibals," Phillips observed. "A man and a girl. I wonder who they were?"

"I don't know," growled Bracken, "and I don't much care—"

He paused as he realised that Allen was approaching. The Andrews' foreman had finished talking to the natives, and there was an expression of satisfaction on his countenance.

"They don't like the idea," Allen stated, "but I've told 'em that there's to be no turning back, and I've promised 'em that there will be plenty of trouble for them if they desert us."

The journey was now resumed, and before another mile had been covered the moon was up. Then all at once a commotion reached the ears of the three white men and their negro companions, and the whole party came to an abrupt standstill on the edge of a big clearing.

"Look!" Phillips jerked suddenly, and with outflung arm pointed to a track at the far side of the jungle glade.

Down that track Borno was coming at full pelt, running as hard as he could, and some distance behind him was a group of savages, bent on overtaking the fugitive and slaying him.

"Say, that man is wearing a queer kind of get-up," Bracken ejaculated, peering at the advancing figure of Borno, "but he looks to me like a European, all the same."

"He's not Jan Trevor," Phillips avowed. "That fellow is a man of our own age, if not older. Kutu, do you know who he is?"

"No, bwana," the guide answered. "Maybe he is the one I saw with wild white boy—I cannot tell."

By this time Borno had gained the clearing, and, without noticing the party at the other side of it, he struck across to the left, disappearing into the thickets.

Bracken spoke swiftly.

"You're right, Phillips!" he ground out. "That man isn't Jan, but he may be able to give us some useful information concerning Harry Trevor's son. Kutu, take one of the boys with you and trail him—then send back word to us when you have found out where he goes to. Allen, the rest of us will drive off that bunch of cannibals. There's enough of us to handle them!"

Allen nodded briskly, and next instant he had given a terse command to the native employees of Trader Andrews. In swift response to that command they prepared themselves for action, and as Borno's pursuers swarmed forth into the glade they were met by a volley of lead and arrows.

Three or four of the cannibals pitched to the ground, and the others recoiled in alarm. Then a chorus of angry yells went up, and the band of savages rushed forward to the attack, hurling spears as they came on, and shouting in vengeful accents.

A fearsome spectacle they made as they dashed across the clearing, the moonlight playing on their black bodies and throwing their hideous, tattooed features into sharp relief. But the odds were completely in favour of the party headed by Bracken, Phillips and Allen, and, as the jungle echoed to the blatter of firearms again, still more of the savages bit the dust.

The onrush of the cannibals was checked, the survivors wavering uncertainly. Then a third volley was poured into them, and those who were left standing at once spun around and took to their heels, fleeing back in the direction whence they had approached.

"Come on!" shouted Bracken. "Keep them on the run!"

Revolver in hand, he led his companions across the glade at the double, and a few seconds later the party from the trading post was pressing forward along the jungle path down which the remnants of Borno's pursuers were speeding.

Firing at the routed cannibals, Bracken and his followers continued to harry them until the thickets had swallowed the last of the savages. Then the victors retraced their steps to the glade when the sharp engagement had taken place.

As they entered the clearing they saw two or three of their foes crawling away into the undergrowth, badly wounded. Several others lay silent and inert in the moonlight, never to move again.

"Well, what do we do now?" Allen demanded of Bracken.

"Wait to hear from Kutu," was the reply. "Let's hope he doesn't miss the trail of that queer-looking bird the cannibals were chasing."

At that very moment, away in the heart of the jungle, Borno was sinking to the ground in a state of complete weariness. He had heard the shooting that had broken out just after he had struck across the clearing, but he had kept going almost mechanically, until now he was at the last gasp.

He had reason to believe that he was no longer being pursued, but even if those black demons of the bush had still been on his track he could not have taken another step, and it was with a groan that he stretched himself out beside a fallen log, filling his lungs with great gulps of air, resting his aching muscles.

It was thus that Kutu found him—Kutu and the other black whom the guide had selected as a messenger; and from behind the fronds of a tropical plant the two natives gazed at Borno's recumbent form.

"Go back to Bwana Allen and the white doctors," Kutu whispered to the other negro in the Bantu dialect. "Bring them here. If I am gone when you return, you will know that the man over there has moved on, and that I am following him. Go, Kala."

Kutu's companion stole away, and some time later he was back in the glade where Bracken, Phillips and Allen were waiting with the rest of the natives.

"White man lie down," Kala reported. "Kutu, him watch. I lead you to Kutu."

"Good," Bracken said. "Go ahead, then."

Kala conducted the party through the thickets of the jungle, and at length they came to the spot where Kutu was keeping his solitary vigil.

"Where's our man?" Bracken asked softly.

"He sleeps," was the answer. "Look—over there."

Kutu pointed, and, glancing in the direction indicated, the American saw the prone figure of Borno lying beside the fallen tree.

"All right," said Bracken, "close in on him."

They moved forward in a body and surrounded the sleeper. Then Bracken stooped and gripped him by the arm, and, awakening at the touch, Borno sprang up with a cry.

"Take it easy—take it easy!" Bracken growled. "We're not going to harm you. Kutu, is this the man you saw with the wild white youth?"

"Yes, Bwana," the negro answered. "I am sure of it now."

Bracken looked at Borno again. "Where is that wild white youth?" he demanded.

The seaman kept silent. He did not know what Bracken wanted with Jan, but imagined that the American might wish to capture him in order to sell him to some circus—just as the skipper and mate of the ill-fated Natal had planned to do. And though Borno had been compelled to assist in that scheme, he was now determined to be no party to the seizure of the youngster.

Jan had become his friend, and he made up his mind there and then that nothing would cause him to betray his whereabouts.

It was in vain that Bracken strove to make Borno talk, and at length he instructed three or four of the blacks to take the seaman prisoner and bind his hands behind his back.

As the natives closed in on him, Borno promptly showed fight, but he was overpowered by weight of numbers, and his wrists were tied in accordance with the American's directions. Then Bracken turned to Phillips and Allen.

"In an hour or two it will be daylight," he said. "As soon as dawn breaks we'll scour the district, leaving this fellow in charge of some of the boys. If we fail to locate Jan Trevor, we'll come back here and find a way of forcing our man to talk."

Phillips and Allen agreed to this proposal, and at break of day they set out with Bracken and a number of the safari, ordering the rest of the natives to stay with Borno.

The Jungle Pool

WHEN Mona Andrews arose from the couch of dry twigs and ferns that Jan had made for her the sun had risen above the horizon and the creatures of the bush were beginning to greet a new day.

Up in the trees the birds were singing to the morn, and the apes were chattering with animation. Mona, however, was scarcely aware of these sounds. She was looking at Jan, who had dropped off into a light slumber, from which he awakened as soon as the girl began to move about.

He stood up, and almost at the same time Chicma dropped to the ground beside him from the fork of a tree near by, the chimpanzee having climbed thither at some time during the night.

"Jan," Mona said anxiously, "Borno hasn't showed up yet."

"You mean—Borno—not here?" Jan murmured, and then shook his head with a frown.

Perhaps Borno would come yet, he reflected. Perhaps he had escaped from the cannibals, but lost his way and decided to wait until morning before attempting to find Mona and himself.

"Maybe Borno—show up—later," he volunteered in his queer, halting way. "Meantime, Jan get food. You—stay here."

The girl nodded, and Jan moved off, Chicma shambling after him. Soon they were out of sight, and, still wondering what had become of Borno, Mona wandered a little way along the jungle track.

Presently she saw a pool glistening through the trees on her right, and the freshness of the water induced her to take a dip. She did not bother to undress, for her clothes were already tattered, and she knew that they would dry on her very quickly in the tropical heat of the sun.

Threading her way through the trees she entered the pool and started to swim towards the far bank. It was a pool of some size, and when she had covered a distance of sixty or seventy yards she was still only half-way across it.

She was pulling herself through the water with clean, lithe strokes when she detected a movement on the opposite bank, and suddenly her pulse missed a beat as she recognised the loathsome form of a crocodile sliding from a muddy lair that had been partially hidden by overhanging foliage.

"Look!" Phillips jerked suddenly, and with outflung arm he pointed to a track at the far side of the jungle glade.

Turning, Mona swam back in the direction whence she had come, but as she looked round she saw the gruesome head of the reptile cleaving the surface of the pool. The brute was after her—was travelling much faster than she—and as she realised her peril so the movements of her limbs became less expert and skilful.

Terrified, she felt that she would never gain dry land in time, and a sob escaped her as she visualised the awful jaws of the reptile closing upon her and dragging her down.

Actually she could have reached the bank with yards to spare, even though she was swimming with ever-increasing awkwardness. But when she was only a stone's-throw from the edge of the pool, and just as she was beginning to take more heart, a dappled figure padded into view from a belt of undergrowth.

It was a dreaded serval, better known as the African tiger-cat, and it had come down to the pool to slake its thirst; but at sight of the girl in the water it showed its fangs in an ugly snarl—a snarl that seemed to challenge the pursuing crocodile for the right to seize the human prey.

With the big "cat" standing there on the bank and the monster of the pool cruising towards her from the rear, Mona lost her nerve completely and uttered a piercing, agonised shriek. Then she began to flounder, and with her arms thrashing the water into foam she screamed again and again.

Her cries were heard by Jan, for, luckily, he was not far away. He was up among the trees at no great distance from the pool, in fact, and was engaged in the task of gathering fruit from the boughs when the voice of the pan-stricken girl reached his ears.

In swift response the young white man bounded in the direction from which Mona's horrified shouts were coming, and, springing from branch to branch, swooping through mid air via the festoons of creepers, he found himself overlooking the pool within a few seconds.

He took in the situation at a glance and plunged from a high branch, the clean swoop of his dive carrying him far down towards the bed of the jungle lake. Then he rose to the surface, his head breaking the water quite close to the struggling girl.

He caught hold of her and struck off to the left, swimming parallel with the bank. Instantly the tiger-cat leaped into the pool, hungering for a kill, and at the same time the crocodile altered its course to follow Mona and her would-be rescuer.

Each bent on an identical purpose, the serval and the reptile met in the wake of man and girl, and each saw in the other a rival that must be exterminated before the human prey could be taken. Next instant a fierce battle was in progress between the two monsters, a battle that proved the salvation of Jan and Mona, for the big cat and the hideous denizen of the pool abandoned all thought of their quarry in the terrific conflict that they waged.

A ghastly snarling arose from the throat of the tiger-cat, and the tail of the crocodile lashed to and fro. With the sounds of that primeval combat in their ears, Jan and Mona swerved in towards the bank, and, scrambling thankfully from the shallows, they blundered away through the thickets of the forest, the white youth almost carrying his half-fainting companion.

They never learned the outcome of the August 24th, 1935.

fight between those two jungle brutes, though Jan fancied that the serval would finish second best, since the crocodile was in its natural element. As for man and girl, they did not stop running until they were back at the spot where they had parted some time previously.

Mona was badly shaken, and an interval of several minutes elapsed before she fully recovered from the ordeal through which she had passed. Then Jan spoke to her a little breathlessly.

"Mona stay here," he said. "I go look for food again. Mona no swim—stay here."

"Mona no swim," she answered fervently, and with a smile he turned away, striding off into the undergrowth once more.

The girl awaited his return, and a quarter of an hour must have passed by when she heard the snapping of twigs. Someone was approaching, and, expecting to see Jan, she looked round quickly. But the man who stepped into view was not the wild white youth whose acquaintance she had made. He was a man twenty years Jan's senior, tall and sallow and clean-shaven, wearing helmet, shirt, breeches, and field boots.

He was Dr. Frank Bracken, late of New York, an authority on that dreaded malady known as infantile paralysis.

There was a loaded revolver in Bracken's hand, but at sight of the girl he lowered the gun and stared at her agape, astonished by the unexpected encounter.

"Gee," he breathed, eyeing her with candid admiration as well as surprise, "I didn't think to see a pretty face like yours in this cursed jungle! Who are you, and what are you doing here?"

Before Mona could offer a reply, Bracken's companions appeared on the scene. These included Phillips, Allen, and Kutu, and, on seeing the daughter of their employer, foreman, and guide, uttered startled exclamations.

"Wamunke—Mona!" Kutu gasped. "Wh-why, Miss Andrews!" Allen stammered.

"Say, what is this?" Bracken interposed. "Will somebody let me in on it?"

The girl turned to him. She looked prettier than ever now, for her face was flushed with pleasure and excitement.

"I'm Mona Andrews," she explained. "These men who are with you—they work for my father."

"So you're Andrews' daughter," the American declared. "Well, my name is Bracken—Dr. Bracken—and this is my assistant, Dr. Phillips. We're staying at your father's trading post just now, looking for an old colleague of ours who has been missing for fifteen years."

Allen came forward at this juncture and addressed Mona in a tone of concern.

"Miss Andrews," he said, "I can't understand what you're doing out here in the wilds—alone. What happened? You were supposed to disembark from the Natal at Mombasa and put up there until your father could find time to come for you and bring you home."

"I know," the girl replied, "but the Natal was wrecked two nights ago, and since then a lot has happened. But, thanks to Jan and Borno—"

"Jan!" Phillips ejaculated involuntarily. "Yes, a strange young white man who seems to have been brought up in the heart of the bush," Mona said. "He saved Borno and I from a pack of cannibals last night."

"Cannibals!" Allen struck in. "Then it was you whom Kutu saw! By gad, if he'd recognised you and brought back news to the post that you were in the hands of savages, your father and your mother, too, would have been with us."

Meanwhile, Bracken and Phillips were looking at each other in a significant fashion, and presently the former addressed himself to Mona again.

"Miss Andrews," he said, "I think this man Borno must be the fellow we ran across last night. We've left him with some of our party a mile or two north-east of here."

"Then he did escape from the cannibals," the girl breathed. "Oh, I'm so glad!"

"But this youth Jan whom you've mentioned," Bracken observed guardedly, "Where is he?"

"He was here only a little while ago," Mona declared, "but he went off to look for food. He's been wonderful. I wouldn't be alive now if it weren't for him."

"Your father will want to thank him," said Bracken with cunning. "I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll have Dr. Phillips take you back to the trading post with some of the boys, and the rest of us will wait here for your friend Jan. Then we'll follow on with him when he shows up."

Innocent as she was of the American's real intentions, Mona readily agreed to his proposal.

"All right," she murmured, "and you'll bring Borno, too?"

"Yes, we'll bring Borno, too," Bracken rejoined.

A minute or two later Mona was setting off along the jungle track with Phillips and a handful of the blacks, and when the girl and her companions had disappeared from view Bracken spoke to Allen and Kutu.

"Apparently this wild white youth is kind of elusive," he mused. "No doubt he mistrusts human beings when he sees them in fairly large parties. I think it would be a good idea if we concealed ourselves."

They took to the undergrowth with their followers, crouching in readiness to surround Jan the moment he returned; and they had been skulking there for some little time when a strange medley of sounds reached their attentive ears—sounds that came from afar, a confused tumult that gradually became more and more distinct until the listeners were able to distinguish the trumpeting of wild animals, the clangour of many instruments beaten by human hands, and the less penetrating tones of human voices.

"What does it mean, Allen?" Bracken demanded.

"An elephant drive," the foreman said. "A crowd of native hunters are urging them through the jungle, probably towards some distant stockade where they intend to imprison them. It sounds to me as if we're right in their path, and I don't like it."

"You mean the hunters may belong to that cannibal tribe?" Bracken asked, but Allen shook his head.

"No, the cannibals look upon the elephants as sacred," he informed the doctor. "It's not the beaters I'm afraid of—"

He stopped short, for at that very instant a tall, strong figure appeared on the jungle track thirty or forty yards away. It was the figure of Jan Trevor, and, peering searchingly for Mona, he moved nearer to the spot where Bracken's party was hiding.

On perceiving the young white man, Bracken had forgotten the elephant drive. The doctor was now gazing through the fronds of the shrubbery before him, his eyes fastened upon Jan's wrist—fastened upon the flexible bracelet that the youth was wearing.

Bracken waited until Jan was only a few paces away, and then he leaped to his feet and sprang into the open, with — He frowned because Mallory had winked. "Oh, well, have it your own way!"

As the coroner was about to bend over the body, Mallory touched him on the shoulder. "This piece of paper was found in the professor's hand."

The coroner had difficulty in concealing his surprise.

"This is a fake killing. The professor is shamming death. Examine body carefully and then declare that in your opinion it is an obvious case of suicide."

The coroner was a great admirer of the young detective and acted his part well.

The professor had died instantaneously and, in his opinion, a clear case of suicide.

"Suicide?" The D.A. was astounded. Mallory was watching the faces of his four suspects.

"I found this picture of Dr. Stone in one of the professor's books," Mallory handed it to the D.A. "That seems to indicate that Einfeld did know Stone. Einfeld shot Stone, and then, unable to forget, shot himself. Who would suspect the worthy Professor Einfeld of having a gun and killing Stone? What do you think of that for a deduction, Professor Trowbridge?"

"I don't believe you're right," Trowbridge was emphatic. "I don't believe Einfeld knew Stone, and I can't imagine Einfeld having the nerve to take his own life."

"Naturally, several people were suspected, and you amongst them, Professor Trowbridge," Mallory stated. "On your desk is a telephone directory, and there is a mark under the name of Sutton Hotel. Why did you mark the number?"

"Because I was going to ring the professor and tell him his life was in danger." The professor spoke sharply. "It seemed obvious to me that the Press reports would place him in danger. Then I thought it would look queer if I rang him up, and thus did nothing in the matter." A gloomy shake of the head. "Maybe if I had rung the hotel the professor would have been alive now."

"Maybe." Mallory smiled and glanced at Gorman. "Naturally, I had to suspect many people, and for a little while I wondered if you, Mr. Gorman, had anything to do with this murder. I make a point of studying faces, and I'm glad to say that you are no longer suspected."

"Thank you."
"Then there is your ease, Mr. Langsdale." The detective glanced at the ex-convict, who wondered if he were going to be exposed. "You told me a most interesting story, which I checked and found correct. There was a certain person, in your ease, against whom you had a grudge. Naturally, I suspected you when I found that Dr. Stone was an assumed name—his real name was Harold Skinner."

"Harold Skinner!" Langsdale had gone very white. "But the Skinner I knew hadn't a beard, and—"
"Did you see the dead man and look closely at the face?"
"Yes, I helped carry him out." Langsdale frowned thoughtfully. "I did think the face was familiar, but I can't believe—"

"The dead man's hair was dyed, the beard was another disguise, and plastic surgeons had experimented with the features. Dr. Stone had no desire to be recognised as Skinner. I'm afraid, Mr. Langsdale, that you will never be able to settle your quarrel with Skinner. Perhaps it is as well for you."

The phone bell rang. It was Regan. "You told me that calls could come through to you once everyone was in the observatory. This is a call from an outlying station and concerns Morgan."

"Put the call through," Mallory smiled as he heard a gruff voice.

"Just picked up Morgan going out of town. Tried to give us the slip, but we got him. He seems to be carrying a lot of money."

"Hold him and bring him to the D.A.'s office in the morning," said Mallory, and hung up. "Gentlemen, that completes another link. A great number of people dislike Dr. Stone, and John Morgan might easily have killed his employer. Morgan came here with a gun, and his story was thin. Also he had been helping himself to his chief's money and was in fear of being found out. The speed patrol have just picked up Morgan going out of town with what was left of his chief's money."

Naturally, we couldn't allow that. Ahmed Haidru was so brazen in his statement that he had come to the observatory to kill Dr. Stone that I was forced to believe him. I think I have made it clear that the theory that Professor Einfeld killed Dr. Stone and then shot himself is not one that I am in agreement with. I mentioned a photograph of Dr. Stone, autographed and sent to Professor Einfeld and hidden in a book where I should find it." He smiled.

"That signed picture was a fake, placed so that I might think Einfeld in some way connected with Stone. He had never seen him in his life, and never will. Will you, professor?"

Professor Einfeld hoped that this was the signal.

"May I come back to life, please?"

"Help the professor to his feet, doc," Mallory called out to the coroner.

The District Attorney's eyes bulged, and so did all of them when Professor Einfeld stood up and dusted his trousers.

"I let you all think that the professor was dead for a purpose," Mallory explained. "I knew the murderer was in this room, and I wanted to watch how he would behave. That brings me to my fourth and last suspect." He pointed an accusing finger. "Jim Gray, you killed Dr. Stone and attempted to kill Professor Einfeld!"

Arcturus Decides

JIM GRAY blinked at the detective as if he did not understand what was being said.

"It's no use you're trying to act, Gray!" Mallory rasped out. "You knew the power of the ray from Arcturus, and you fixed that gun so that it was pointing at the seat, which you knew had been allocated to Dr. Stone. You knew the time that gun would fire, and you planned a similar scheme for the professor, whom, you feared, had guessed your secret. You knew the professor was coming here to-night, and so you went to see the District Attorney so you should be a long way from the observatory when the second death occurred—your way of proving an alibi. You placed that forged picture in that book, you tore out the page from this book"—Mallory held up the book—"and you took the professor's gun from the drawer of this desk and hid it in that box by the telescope platform. There is a time gun on the telescope, and it fires by the rays of Areturus. The professor would have fallen, and it might have looked like suicide. I expected an attempt such as this—"

"Not a move from any of you!" came a harsh voice.

Jim Gray was pointing a wicked-looking gun first at the D.A. and then at Mallory.

"You needn't bother about demonstrating anything!" There was the light of madness on that wrinkled face and in the blazing eyes. "I shot Dr. Stone, who killed my son. Professor Einfeld I had to kill to hide the truth. I'm glad now that I failed. I killed the man who killed my son, so what more do I want?"

"Put that gun down, Gray!" ordered the D.A.

"I've got you all covered." The mad eyes were alert. "Not a move or I'll fire. I'm getting out of here, and then you'll never find me. You'd like to know why I killed Stone? He killed my only son. I was recommended to him by some fool. Stone was drunk and did something wrong. The knife slipped, and then he ordered them to give my boy more gas, so that he could finish his foul deeds. He mutilated my son because his drunken hands could not hold the knife steady, and my son died in agony."

Jim Gray was standing by the wall and cackling horribly.

Crack!

Kay Palmer screamed because she thought for a moment that the madman had shot Mallory. To her surprise, Jim Gray sank limply to the ground.

The detective was first at his side, and saw that ominous spreading stain.

"I'm glad—glad!" croaked Jim Gray. "Now I can go and see my son. My son, I'm coming to you. Help me on the way—"

Suddenly he stiffened in Mallory's arms and then went limp. "I got the professor to set the telescope so that the rays of Areturus would fire that time-gun," Mallory explained. "Just to demonstrate how the crime was committed. Fate stepped in and played a part. Guess Areturus did the right thing. We would have caught him, and though Gray was a murderer, he seems to have had some sort of justification—Stone was no loss."

And when Detective-lieutenant Mallory was on the final stages of the inquiry, he was told by Regan that the "reporting dame" was still hanging around.

"Thank you for letting me in on this scoop." Kay Palmer looked at the big man admiringly. "It was awfully nice of you not to say anything about me. I know now what a dreadful thing I did—I might have killed the professor."

"Incidentally, you helped to solve the case," Mallory assured her. "Your action in saying that Einfeld knew the name of the murderer brought instant action. I might never have solved the crime but for your help." He glanced at his watch. "It is now ten-thirty, and just the right hour for supper. Now supper is most dull alone."

"I've sent in my story." Kay Palmer's eyes twinkled. "I feel terribly hungry."

"Then supper it shall be," Mallory put an arm round her shoulders.

A discreet cough, and there stood Professor Einfeld.

"Areturus is very bright and clear." The professor beamed at them. "I was wondering whether you'd care to see the star for yourselves, but somehow I think it's the moon you want to see."

"THE SILVER STREAK"

doctors on the lives of those in hospital there."

Tom gritted his teeth.

"We'll do it!" he muttered. "We'll do it!" He turned to Bronte. "Switch in that subsidiary generator."

The Streak was fairly swallowing distance now. It flashed through Creston, Council Bluffs, and on to Lincoln, Nebraska. Dawn found it sweeping through Denver, where, in spite of the early hour, a huge cheering crowd had gathered to speed it on its way.

Higgins and Crawford were drinking coffee preparatory to going back to the control car when Bronte came in to snatch a few minutes' rest. Instead of joining the two mechanics he dropped into a seat near the door. From the loud-speaker came the announcer's voice:

"Nine-thirty a.m.—The Silver Streak has passed Prove, Utah. It now has three hundred miles to go and only two hours and thirty-five minutes left. There still is a remote chance." There was a pause, and then: "Here is a news flash. Just before dying, the man mysteriously struck down behind the skating-rink at the World's Fair named Erdmann Bronte as his assailant. Connected with the building of the Silver Streak, Bronte is known to be on the train. The police at Boulder Dam have been notified."

For a few seconds there was a shocked silence in the car.

"Bronte!" gasped Tyler. "You!"

The engineer was on his feet and at the door in a bound. His face was livid. "I'm getting off this train, and I'll kill anybody that tries to stop me!" he snarled.

Higgins was the first to move, but as he jumped forward Bronte slid through the connecting door and barred it. Hearing a thundering on the door as those locked in tried to break out, Bronte hurried along to the back of the control-room, opened a switch-box and threw one of the switches.

Both Tom and Dan heard the snap of the switch, and whipped round, startled. They could not see anything, but felt the train slowing down.

"Something wrong back there," jerked out Tom.

"I'll go and see," volunteered Dan.

The old railroader left his seat and went back behind the long bulk of the generators. The next thing Tom heard was a thud, a muffled cry and the sound of a heavy fall. Slipping a band over the control button to keep it in place, Tom, too, hurried off to investigate.

As he rounded the main part of the engine he caught a glimpse of Bronte crouching in a corner, a heavy wrench in his hand, murder in his eyes. Stretched senseless on the floor was Dan O'Brien.

Almost before he could take in what had happened, Bronte leaped at him, wrench uplifted. Tom ducked, but only partially evaded the descending wrench, which caught him a glancing blow and brought him half-stunned to the floor.

Again Bronte lifted the wrench. With a superhuman effort Tom dived forward, his arms clamping round Bronte's knees in a flying tackle. Bronte went over with a crash, Tom on top of him. Together they rolled on the floor, fighting desperately.

Although the power had been cut off, the Streak was on a steep downward grade now, gathering speed with its own momentum. With no one to control it, it thundered on, rocketing dangerously round some of the steepest curves it had encountered on the whole journey. The road-bed was in bad repair at this point, too, and Tom knew that it wasn't loss of speed he had to fear now, but the probability of the Streak leaving the rails and piling itself up.

Bronte worked his thumb round Tom's throat, jabbing it agonisingly into the youngster's Adam's-apple. With a desperate heave, Tom broke loose and grabbed for the wrench which had fallen from Bronte's grasp. His fingers had almost closed on it when Bronte managed to kick it out of his reach. Then, lowering his head, Bronte butted Tom in the stomach and forced him against the compartment wall, his fists raining blows upon the younger man.

The salt of blood was in Tom's mouth, and one eye was already closed. Bronte was more like a frenzied beast than a man, and Tom felt himself getting weaker.

In those red seconds Tom's thoughts centred on Allan Dexter and the others at Boulder Dam who were gasping their lives out, waiting for him to rescue them. He couldn't give in—he had to beat this devil! He had to!

Summoning every ounce of strength, every nerve and sinew, he brought his fist up and round in a smashing short-arm jab that caught Bronte on the angle of the jaw. With a little moan Bronte went limp and slid to the floor like an empty sack.

Tom staggered across the compartment and snapped back the switch which Bronte had thrown; then he made for the controls. Through the window he saw a freight yard which seemed to be rushing towards him, so fast was the Streak moving. To his horror he saw something else—a freight train on a converging line moving towards the main line. For a moment he hesitated. It was too late now to slacken speed; his one chance was to accelerate and get the Streak past the points ahead of the freight. He pushed the lever over, and the train shot forward at an incredible speed, the speedometer needle hovering around one hundred and forty. He saw the confused blur of the freight, heard the scream of a whistle—then he was safely past.

There was a noise behind him, and turning he saw Bronte struggling to his knees. At the same time the communicating door burst open and Higgins rushed in, followed by Dexter, Tyler and the others.

"Got you!" growled Higgins, seizing Bronte by the throat and hauling him to his feet.

"Are you all right, Tom?" gasped Tyler.

"Okay," replied Tom. "Nothing to stop us now. It's a straight run to Boulder City. We'll make it on time!"

It was twenty minutes before twelve when the Silver Streak pulled up at Boulder City, and hardly had the train stopped before men were unloading the "iron lungs" and rushing them off to hospital.

Dropping exhausted to the platform, Tom Caldwell saw a girl's trim figure hurrying towards him. It was Ruth.

"Thank Heaven you're in time!" she broke out. "Everything will be all right now."

"You bet it will!" murmured Tom. "Gee, honey, but I've missed you!"

The next moment she was in his arms.

"FOUR HOURS TO KILL"

The other stared at him as if hardly comprehending.

"What's this?" he queried. "Is it a frame-up?"

"Where's Mako?"

"How should I know? He's in prison."

The other surveyed him with bitter scorn.

"You don't, of course, know he's broken prison, do you?" he said.

"Of course I don't," retorted the other. "I don't know what the game is—"

But he didn't get any further, for at that moment Seaver leaped at him with the snarl of a tiger and shook him furiously as the words poured out of his mouth.

"I'll teach you to try and play about with me, Anderson!" he flung out fiercely. "If you don't come across, I'll break every bone in your miserable body, you miserable little skunk. Where have you hidden Mako? Come on, out with it!"

He hurled the other down on the sofa and stood glaring at him.

"You're wrong, you're wrong!" panted Anderson, with real terror in his eyes. "I don't know where he is—how should I? Mako hates me because I told you where you could get him."

"Then what are you doing here? Out with it!"

"I've got nothing to hide. My wife telephoned me to ask me to come over to the theatre and see her. That's why I came. Mako's the last person in the world I want to see—indeed he is."

Taft broke in, nodding.

"That's right," he said grimly. "Anderson's got no particular wish to meet Mako. I'm sure of that."

"We can soon check up on his story," replied Seaver. "Who's your wife?"

"Mac Danish. She works in this theatre."

While he had been talking, Sylvia Temple and Barrett had been coming down the stairs. But as Anderson said his last words Eddie gave a tremendous start of amazement and was rushing back up the staircase when Seaver hailed him.

"Come down here at once," he snapped.

There was another long discussion. Barrett assured Seaver that he was thoroughly satisfied now. The brooch had been found, he was certain that Eddie was guiltless, and, as far as he and Sylvia were concerned, the matter was at an end.

Finally Seaver seemed prepared to accept the explanation. He told them they could go, but that he was keeping the brooch and they would hear from him later. Eddie was apparently eager to follow them upstairs, but Seaver ordered him curtly to remain.

Then he turned to his man.

"Go upstairs and see this Danish girl and find out if she did really telephone her husband," he said. "Then come down and tell me."

But half-way up the staircase the man gave a cry.

"Good heavens!" he exclaimed. "Look at this!"

Seaver was by his side in a flash, so was Taft. Both of them were examining some stains on the thick carpet. Seaver had drawn his finger over them, and his finger was now ominously and horribly red!

"Blood!" he exclaimed laconically.

He swung round to Taft.

"You hit Mako, you said, when you shot at him?"

"I'm sure I did."

"But he didn't come up this way?"

"He certainly didn't."

"Well, he seems to have come down this way. This blood is new."

"Then he's not far off," replied Taft.

He came slowly back to the lounge. Anderson was still cowering on the sofa. Seaver wiped the blood from his fingers. There was a big frown on his face.

"I don't understand this—" he began, but in a flash Anderson was on his feet and had flung himself at him, clutching him in positive terror while the words came streaming out of his mouth.

"Don't you see what's happened?" he screamed. "It was Mako who telephoned me—he's trying to get me."

Seaver shook him as a terrier shakes a rat.

"Pull yourself together, you miserable little skunk," he snapped. "You told us just now that your wife telephoned."

"It was a man who telephoned," answered Anderson, whose trembling lips could scarcely frame the words.

"His voice was strange to me. He said he was telephoning from my wife and I had to come here at once. He'll get me—I know he will!"

"It would serve you darn well right if he did," retorted the other contemptuously.

"But he can't—he can't! You must hide me, arrest me, do anything you like with me! He's waiting to kill me—I know he is!"

Seaver, however, ignored him. His mind was busy now on the new and utterly unexpected turn which this affair had just taken. Just for the moment the affair of Eddie Miller, Carl Barrett and Sylvia Temple and her diamond brooch had drifted away into insignificance. If what Anderson had said was true, Mako, at large somewhere in the building and in possession of a loaded revolver, had now become a very serious menace. If it was indeed he who had faked the telephone message and fetched up Anderson, then it could be for one purpose, and one purpose only.

He swung round on Taft.

"Have you searched this building?" he rapped out.

"Your men are doing it now, chief."

"I'm! You'd better dig up for a few more in that case. We can't call any of my men away from outside."

"But where can you hide me?" almost screamed Anderson, who had dropped into a chair and was positively trembling with fright.

Seaver hauled him up from his chair.

"Keep with us," he snarled contemptuously. "You'll be all right."

"Let me hide over there in that telephone box," exclaimed the frightened man.

But even as he went quickly over to it he stopped suddenly and a frightened squeal left his lips. The door half opened and Mako slipped out of the telephone box, and he menaced the group with a revolver that was concealed in his jacket pocket.

Their hands went up in a flash. There was little else to be done. Anderson was gazing at Mako as a rabbit gazes at a snake. He seemed now to be almost petrified with terror.

The chief was glaring at Mako in sullen fury; but his hands remained above his head.

"Don't be a fool, Mako," he exclaimed. "You haven't a dog's chance. The place is surrounded and—"

But the other cut in swiftly.

"Keep quiet," he said sharply, "and you won't get hurt. I'm not bothering about you. It's this little rat I'm after."

He addressed himself once again to the terrified Anderson.

"How d'you like it, Anderson? How does it feel now you've got it coming to you at last? You're goin' to die!"

With a swift movement Mako jerked the gun from his pocket.

Crack! Mako's gun had spoken and Anderson staggered back. Crack again, and he sagged horribly to the floor.

"Too quick, far too quick," exclaimed Mako, and there was a dreadful smile on his face. "I wish I could have made it slower."

And then, once more, with his gun covering the others, he began to step back to the staircase.

"Stay where you are, all of you! The chair's waitin' for me and I know it. Any more murders are on the house," he said grimly.

Step by step he retreated to the staircase, backed slowly up with his gun still menacing them. But he had failed to see Taft, who had suddenly appeared at the head of the stairs.

The next moment a couple of sharp shots rang out, and Mako stumbled forward at the banisters. For a second or so he swayed there; then he toppled over and fell in a crumpled heap to the ground.

They gathered round him silently. Seaver had lifted his head. Taft, the smoking revolver still in his hand, was bending down over him.

Mako opened his eyes. They were already filmy with death, but there was a smile on his face as he gazed up at Taft.

"Thanks, old pal," he whispered, and fell back.

Seaver straightened himself up. Taft was still gazing down on the dead man.

"He said something," he murmured with a puzzled frown. "Did you hear what it was? I couldn't get it."

Seaver allowed a grim smile to flicker to his lips.

"He said, 'Thanks, old pal,'" he replied dryly. "But I guess a lot of these guys wander a bit in their minds just before they hand in their checks. Good shootin', that of yours, Taft."

"THE CALL OF THE SAVAGE"

Allen, Kutu, and the rest of the party close behind him.

As he beheld the strangers Jan recoiled. He had already had a sample of the treatment meted out by men of his own colour when the crew of the Natal had seized him, and even if the appearance of Bracken had been less threatening, the son of the jungle would have distrusted him.

As it was, he attempted to make his escape, but the doctor was on him in a flash, closing with him, grappling with him, striving to hold him until Allen and the other members of the safari came up.

Infuriated, Jan laid violent hands on Bracken and broke the man's grip. Then he lifted him high above his head and dashed him to the ground with an impact that drove the breath from the unscrupulous surgeon's body. Next second, however, the wild white youth was assailed by Allen and the blacks.

He fought like a maniac, beating down man after man, but the odds against him were too overwhelming, and at last he was borne to the dust, where he continued to struggle until a blow from the butt of a rifle scattered his wits.

By that time Bracken had picked himself up, and with an ugly expression on his face he elbowed his way through the circle of Jan's opponents as they were rising from his prone form.

"Murderous young savage!" he snarled. "I'd like to bind him to the nearest tree and tame him with a whip! If I had my way—"

The sentence was never finished, for it was at this juncture that the hush became alive with terror. Even while Jan and his antagonists had been fighting, the herd of elephants which had been stampeded through the forest had been drawing closer and yet closer, trampling the thickets, battering down the trees that stood in their way, sending flocks of startled birds into the air, scaring off troops of monkeys that had inhabited the upper branches.

And now the foremost brutes of the maddened herd were bursting into view, grey mammoths of the jungle. On they came, charging blindly towards the locality where Bracken and his companions had attacked Jan Trevor, and the earth trembled under the drumming of their massive feet.

"Run for it!" Allen bellowed. "Run for your lives!"

He set an example by taking to his heels and striking off to the right. Bracken followed him, and at the same time the blacks scattered in all directions, fleeing hither and thither in abject panic.

Jan Trevor was abandoned. He lay there in an inert heap, directly in the path of those trumpeting, stampeding giants that were smashing their way through the tropical forest!

LONE WOLF RETURNS

A Drama of a Debonair Crook

Evading the police after a jewel robbery, Michael Lanyard, alias the "Lone Wolf," mingles with the guests of an heiress next door, named Marcia Stewart. He falls in love with the girl and resolves to go straight; but other jewel thieves involve him in the theft of Marcia's emeralds—and a very clever detective is called in to run him down. A gay, yet thrilling, mystery drama, starring Melvyn Douglas and Gail Patrick

The LONE WOLF RETURNS

A Way Out

"ALL these jewel jobs in the past three weeks," declared Angus McGowan, chief of detectives, addressing the plain-clothes men he had summoned to his room, "point to one man and one man only—the 'Lone Wolf.'"

Three pairs of eyes expressed surprise, if not, indeed, incredulity, and McGowan thumped his fist upon the desk at which he was seated.

"I'm not basing that statement on my own opinion," he rasped. "More than a month ago I had word from the Paris police that he was headed for New York."

Detective-Sergeant Benson, heavy of build, gruff of voice, and not half as capable a sleuth as he believed himself to be, said airily:

"I'd like to have a crack at your Lone Wolf, chief."

"You're gonna get it, Benson," retorted McGowan. "I've had a tip that the Lone Wolf intends to lift the Bancroft pearls."

"When?" asked Benson.

"To-night. So take all the men you need and surround the house. But lay low and get him coming out. We want to catch him with the goods."

Benson nodded sagely and rose from the chair which had been creaking beneath his weight.

"Don't worry, chief," he said with a wave of his hand, "he's as good as in the bag. They never get by Benson!"

The two other plain-clothes men went out from the room without comment, and Benson was more than half way to the door when McGowan called him back.

"Come here!" he said curtly; and as June 13th, 1936.

the ponderous detective returned obediently to the side of the desk, frowned up at him. "I said you were going after the Lone Wolf, the slickest jewel thief on the loose on either side of the Atlantic. Don't forget that!"

"I won't," promised Benson.

"There was only one man who ever knew who he was, and that was Crane. I don't think he really knew—only had a hunch." McGowan compressed his rather full lips, then heaved a sigh. "If only Crane was in the force now!"

Benson liked that last remark not at all. He was sick of the name of Marmaduke Crane, a predecessor whom he had never seen, but of whom he had heard too much.

"Why don't you get him back, chief?" he asked.

"Maybe you think I haven't tried," McGowan growled. "When he retired he bought a little farm up-State, and it's mighty hard to separate him from his flowers." His voice became sharper. "So in the meantime, will you try to fill his shoes? Crane was a real detective. That's all, Benson."

Detective-Sergeant Martin Benson went off muttering to himself—a lamentable habit of his.

"Crane! Crane! That's all I ever hear! You'd think he was the greatest detective in the world. Crane! Crane! Ugh!"

The Bancroft pearls were famous. Their owner, a middle-aged millionaire, lived in a house of stately proportions set in its own grounds far back from the road in West 120th Street. At ten o'clock that night Benson stood in the shadow of a chestnut-tree on the front lawn of the house, his hands on his hips and a self-satisfied grin on his fat face.

"I've got a copper planted behind every daisy in this garden," he said to a plain-clothes man who was with him. "They never get by Benson!"

The house was in darkness, except for one window on the upper floor at the back; but heavy curtains screened the windows of the drawing-room, and in that room there was a man who had no lawful right to be anywhere upon the premises. He was tall, good-looking, and faultlessly dressed in evening clothes, with an opera-hat upon his head. The collar of his overcoat was turned up about his ears.

His name was Michael Lanyard, but the police of several countries knew him only as the Lone Wolf. Through underground channels it had reached his alert ears that the New York police expected him to steal the Bancroft pearls, and so he had stolen them.

To one so practised as himself, it had been easy enough to enter the house—and equally easy to open the wall-safe in the drawing room, after he had found it, to pull the curtains across the windows and light a reading-lamp which stood on a side table.

The most valuable of the pearls were in the form of a necklace. With the utmost composure he dropped the necklace upon the table to take a heavy silver cigarette-case from one of his pockets. One side of this case he opened, but not the side in which cigarettes reposed, and an empty cavity was revealed.

Into this cavity he stowed the necklace, a secret spring clicked, and the case was restored to his pocket. Then he switched off the light and strolled across a thick pile carpet to the french window at which he had made his entry.

He pulled slightly aside one of the curtains he himself had drawn, but immediately let it fall back into position. A uniformed policeman was standing on the terrace outside.

More cautiously he proceeded to another window, but through one of its panes he saw two policemen on a gravel path and a plain-clothes man on the grass close behind them. He went out into a dim and spacious hall, and from it entered the dining-room, which was in the front of the house; but from the windows of that room he glimpsed more policemen than ever.

Without a sound he returned to the hall and sped along it to the servants' quarters. He found the kitchen door open and stole across to a window overlooking a vegetable garden enclosed by bushes. There were almost as many policemen out there as there were cabbages!

Once more the Lone Wolf made for the hall, and as he reached it heard footsteps on the landing above. He whipped off his hat and flung it on a chair, and he turned down the collar of his overcoat.

Down the stairs lumbered an elderly man, presumably the butler, in dressing-gown and slippers, his hair untidy as though he had just deserted his bed, yet with a pair of pince-nez at an angle upon his nose.

Not till he had reached the foot of the stairs did this man become aware of the motionless figure in the doorway of the drawing-room.

"Mr. Baneroft," he quavered. "Is that you, Mr. Bancroft?"

The Lone Wolf stepped forward.

"You're being robbed," he said.

"Oh!" gasped the butler; and a gloved hand was clapped over his mouth.

"Stop that!" commanded the Lone Wolf in a very low voice. "There's a crook—a desperate criminal—in the house."

"Y-yes," faltered the butler, "but—but who are you?"

"Headquarters," was the reply. "We've got the place surrounded. They're coming up the front way, the back way, and around the side as well. I really hate to inconvenience you, but you see how it is."

"Yes, but—"

The butler was given no opportunity to complete whatever it was he intended to say, because a handkerchief was suddenly and none too gently used as a gag and knotted at the back of his neck.

He was deprived of his pince-nez and of his dressing-gown, and, in his pyjamas, he shivered more with fright than with cold. But the Lone Wolf invested him in a fur rug from the polished floor before he bundled him into a cupboard under the stairs and turned the key in the lock.

In the drawing-room, just inside the door, a bust of Julius Cæsar stood upon a wooden pedestal. Michael Lanyard draped his overcoat about that ancient emperor's shoulders, then carried bust and pedestal to the french window.

He enveloped himself in the butler's dressing-gown, roughed his hair with a hand, and adjusted the butler's pince-nez upon his own nose. Thus disguised, he went quite boldly to the french window, flung back the curtain, turned the handle, and stepped forth on to the terrace.

The policeman out there gaped at him; Detective-Sergeant Benson bounded up the steps from the garden with a plain-clothes man at his heels, and Benson had a gun in his hand.

"I hope I'm not interrupting anything," he said gruffly, "but I just want to take a look round."

"Why, I'm glad you've come, officer," declared Lanyard in a voice not at all like his own. "You know, I've been a bit uneasy all evening."

"There's nothing to fear. Why, nothing ever gets by—"

"There he is!" cried the other detective.

Benson fired through the glass, and the bust fell and the pedestal went down with it. The two officers brushed past Lanyard into the room, and Benson groped for the light switches while his subordinate stood on guard.

"Did I get him?" asked Benson, as the room became flooded with radiance.

"You shot too late to get this guy Cæsar," gurgled his assistant, pointing to a noseless bust. "About two thousand years too late!"

Michael Lanyard, clasping his hands in apparent agitation, said to the policeman on the terrace:

"Oh, dear, this is dreadful! We can't stand here like this! You've got to tell Mr. Baneroft—he's at the reception next door. You've got to go!"

"I've got to go?" snorted the officer. "No, I'm stationed here. You go."

"Thank you, sir," mumbled Lanyard.

He descended from the terrace to the grounds, and he passed quite a number of policemen as he crossed a lawn on that side of the house and stepped through a gap in a hedge into the grounds of a brilliantly illuminated house next door.

In the cupboard under the stairs of the house he had left behind an unhappy butler pounded on the woodwork of a locked door. Detective-Sergeant Benson opened the door, and he and his companion stared at the strange figure that emerged from the darkness.

The handkerchief was ripped from the mouth it had gagged, and a pair of watery blue eyes blinked at the gun in Benson's hand.

"Please don't shoot, sir!" implored Lanyard's victim. "I'm the butler."

"Butler, eh?" said Benson incredulously. "That's all right with me, Tarzan; but just hold them hands up—and keep 'em up!"

The Pendant

SCREENED by the box hedge through which he had passed, Lanyard thrust the butler's pince-nez into a pocket of the dressing-gown, then took off the dressing-gown and rolled it up and flung it in amongst the bushes.

The imitation Sherlock Holmes swept forward. "Just a moment," he said, pointing a finger at Lanyard. "I think this gentleman is one of your friends I haven't met!"

He smoothed his hair and sauntered with cool assurance across a lawn and a gravel path hung with Chinese lanterns to a terrace that stretched along the side of the house for which he was bound.

Three french windows were wide open on to the terrace, and as he mounted broad stone steps, the strains of a Viennese waltz floated pleasantly out to him.

He approached the nearest of the french windows and peered round it into a ball-room where a number of masked people were dancing. Some were dressed as historical characters, others even more fancifully. A "man-ape" had a "Quaker girl" for partner; an obviously padded and perspiring "Henry the Eighth" was escorting an inevitable "Columbine" towards an improvised bar farther along the room.

Lanyard became particularly interested in a more or less convincing "Sherlock Holmes," complete with caped ulster and cloth cap, who was holding a magnifying-glass in his left hand and talking to a blonde girl just inside the doorway.

"Don't you think you're doing a lot of drinking for a working man?" asked the girl rather petulantly, as it seemed to the listener.

"Now don't hurry me," returned the pseudo Sherlock. "I told you it's the next dance."

"Why wait?" protested his fair companion. "There she is now!"

"Sherlock Holmes" followed with his eyes the direction indicated by a lace fan—and so did Lanyard. A black-haired girl whose perfect shoulders rose above a very low-cut gown of the Second Empire period had just entered the room.

"Well, here goes," said the make-believe detective. "Keep your fingers crossed."

"Crossed?" quoth the blonde girl. "I've got them clenched!"

"Sherlock Holmes," known under more prosaic circumstances as Geoffrey Mallison, reached the black-haired girl just as the "ape-man" deserted his partner to claim her.

"Throw him a peanut, Marcia," said Mallison. "I'm cutting in!"

"Oh, hallo, Mal!" exclaimed the girl, who was Marcia Stewart, owner of the mansion and orphaned daughter of a railroad millionaire, and she submitted to the arm that promptly encircled her waist.

They danced together, and Michael Lanyard deserted the french window for another one to watch their progress.

"I like your friends," Mallison presently remarked.

"Yes," said Marcia, with a little pout beneath her lace-fringed mask, "they're nice. Dull and respectable—they do the same things over and over in the same way."

Mallison had put the magnifying-glass away. His left hand swept clumsily across her neck, and Lanyard, now at the third french window, did not fail to notice that bungling attempt to secure an almost priceless emerald pendant.

Marcia stopped short, arresting the progress of several other dancers.

"My pendant!" she exclaimed.

"What? Mallison blinked at her.

"It's gone!" She felt something cold against her flesh inside her bodice, and she laughed in an embarrassed fashion. "Oh, it didn't fall all the way! I—I'm afraid I'll have to be excused."

She threaded her way to the door and disappeared. Mallison rejoined the blonde girl near Lanyard's hiding-place, June 13th, 1936.

and he heard that girl's scornful greeting:

"Your technique is rotten!"

He moved away from the window and looked up at the side of the house. There was a balcony above the terrace, and pillars supported it. Without the slightest hesitation he swarmed up one of the pillars and heaved himself over a rail.

On the balcony he dusted himself down, straightened his dress-bow, and stole to the open window of a lighted room. It was a bed-room of considerable size and elegantly furnished. On a chesterfield a youngish and quite good-looking woman was reclining at full length as Lanyard's head rose up over the sill, but the woman sat up as the door opened and Marcia entered.

"Oh, Julie, I'm covered with embarrassment!" Marcia cried.

"Proposed to again?" suggested the occupant of the chesterfield, who was, in fact, her aunt, though far too near her own age to be addressed as such.

"No, no, no!" Marcia laughed and plunged a hand into her bodice. "The emerald misbehaved!"

"What?" Aunt Julia Stewart jumped to her feet in dismay, but was almost immediately relieved to see the pendant, attached to a string of emeralds, which her niece retrieved and held aloft. "Oh, you startled me!"

"Something happened to the catch," said Marcia. "Will you help me fix it?"

"Of course." Aunt Julia took the pendant and passed it round a shapely neck. "Tell me, has that crowd of rascals down there become any more interesting than they were when I left them?"

"Oh, Julie, they're not half bad!" laughed Marcia.

"There's something wrong with this catch." As a matter of fact, the catch had been broken by Mallison's hasty grab. "I think I'd better put it away for the night."

"But what'll I wear instead of the pendant?" Marcia asked bleakly.

"You don't need a thing, my dear. You're a beautiful young woman!"

Marcia laughed gaily while her aunt, who was also her companion, went over to a little circular safe in the wall and put the emerald pendant away in it.

"And what's to be done about that?" she asked.

"What a silly question," rebuked Aunt Julia, shutting the safe and locking it. "You should fall in love."

"It's very simple to say 'fall in love,' Julia," sighed Marcia, "but it isn't something one can make happen."

She drifted to the window, and Michael Lanyard promptly backed away from it and crouched against the wall.

"Oh, what a lovely night!" she breathed, gazing up at a newly risen crescent moon and down at the lantern-lit grounds. "Far lovelier than the nights in Europe."

"Marcia," said Aunt Julia, following her to the window and standing behind her, "there's something on your mind. What is it?"

"Oh, a lot of vague things, Julia!" Marcia stretched out her arms and sighed. "Moonlit lake, perhaps—a song full of shaming words—I don't know!"

"That settles it," decided her aunt. "You're in love! Who's the man?"

"But there isn't any man," lamented Marcia. "That's the trouble. Oh, a night like this, with a moon like that, and music! A night when you can almost breathe romance in the air. There should be a man, shouldn't there?"

"There are plenty downstairs."

"Yes," Marcia sighed again. "And they're all nice boys, too; but I want to meet someone who is as romantic as this night. If I do, and he smiles, I'll know he's the man."

Out on the balcony Michael Lanyard smiled.

"Well, you won't find him up here," said Aunt Julia, "and if we don't hurry downstairs we won't find any men down there, either. Come on!"

She picked up a mask from the dressing-table and put it on, and she and her niece went out from the room. Michael Lanyard was inside the room almost as soon as the door was closed, and he went straight to the circular safe in the wall.

It took him no more than a few minutes to work out the combination, using a handkerchief because he had left his gloves in the house of Melville Bancroft. With the handkerchief he fished out the morocco-covered case containing the pendant, and the pendant itself was in one of his tail-pockets when he sallied forth to find the stairs.

He reached the upper hall, and there a fat monk lurched up against him and clung to his arm. The monk had not merely a tonsure, but a head completely bald, and it was evident that he had been inbibing too freely at the bar.

"What a small and pleasant world," said Lanyard, and jerked the fellow's mask down over his eyes. "The last time I saw you was in—"

"Help!" exclaimed the monk. "Help! It got me! It got me!"

"What seems to be the trouble?" asked Lanyard.

"Trouble?" echoed the sufferer with a hicough. "My dear sir, I've gone blind! I can't see a thing!"

"At such an early age, too!" said Lanyard. "Now don't give up. Nowadays there's nothing that science and a little patience can't cure."

Through an open doorway he propelled the reveller into an unoccupied dressing-room, where he caught hold of his hands and swung him round and round till he was too giddy to stand.

"Whoa!" he said, after he had become a trifle giddy himself. "Sit down! That's it! Now everything's going to be all right. Shut your eyes!"

The monk, who had been dumped on a couch, obeyed. Lanyard unfastened the mask and removed it.

"Now open your eyes slowly," he directed.

A pair of bleary eyes were opened and blinked.

"Doctor, 'smiraculous," declared their owner thickly. "You saved my life!"

But Lanyard was no longer in the room. Having obtained the mask he needed to mingle with Marcia's guests, he had put it on and gone off to the stairs.

The Police Arrive

IN the hall, at the foot of the stairs, Marcia was talking to a Puritan.

Lanyard leaned over the banisters to listen.

"There are sixty reasons why, Terry," he heard her say, "and they're all over the house. I can't walk out and leave my guests just to marry you."

"Well, how about to-morrow?" asked the Puritan.

"I have to buy a hat to-morrow."

"Well, if you won't marry me, then dance with me."

"I'm sorry, Terry," she said, "but this dance is taken."

"Well, hero I stick till the taker comes!"

A very determined suitor, Lanyard gathered, and one whose attentions were not too welcome. Without a sound he descended several stairs, then paused again.

"What's he dressed as?" he heard Terry inquire. "Come on, tell me!"

Marcia gnawed her underlip.

"It's a very difficult costume to figure out, Terry," she said slowly. "I don't know whether you'd call it the Duke of Wellington, or Sitting Bull, or—Uncle Tom, or—"

"There's no Uncle Tom or Sitting Bull at the party," the Puritan broke in, "and if there is, he's too late for this dance!"

Down the rest of the stairs flashed Lanyard and stood between the two.

"Beg the young lady's pardon," Terry, he said smoothly. "He has arrived." He bowed to Marcia. "Hallo! Sorry to have kept you waiting!"

Marcia smiled, and her brown eyes were very bright behind the slits in her mask. But the Puritan was distinctly annoyed.

"Who are you?" he demanded curtly.

"Uncle Tom," replied Lanyard. "In modern clothes, and without his cabin, but the same old fugitive."

"I'm glad you've come," said Marcia, and slipped her arm through his.

"Now, look here!" exploded the baffled Puritan; but Lanyard put his arm round Marcia's waist and danced her away. "All right, don't look here!"

Across the hall into the crowded ball-room Lanyard piloted his lovely partner to the tune of a slow fox-trot, and there circulated with her amongst the other couples.

"He takes hints very nicely, doesn't he?" said he.

"Yes," said she. "But who are you really?"

"Uncle Tom."

She laughed, but was not satisfied. He had the manners and the appearance of a gentleman, and he danced delightfully well, but she was almost positive she did not know him.

"Without sheriffs?" she challenged. "Without bloodhounds?"

"No, they're chasing me," he informed her. "They should be crossing the ice any minute now."

"Well, a crowded dance-floor's as good a place to hide as any."

"It's perfect," he assured her. "I've never risen to such heights before. It's amazing!"

"It's amusing," said she.

While they were drawing near to one of the french windows, "Sherlock Holmes" and the blonde girl reached the hall.

"Marcia's room is the first door on the left at the top of the stairs," said the blonde girl in a low voice. "And remember you climb stairs by lifting one foot above the other, not by kicking the stair-roads."

She turned back into the ball-room, and the man who was really her husband went up the stairs. Lanyard danced with his partner out on to the terrace, and all the way along it in the light of the Chinese lanterns to the far end. There they stopped, and Marcia leaned against a rail entranced with the beauty of the night.

"Oh, it's divine!" she exclaimed.

"You under-rate yourself," said Lanyard.

"Oh, I didn't mean the masquerade ball!" she laughed. "I meant the night. I hear they're getting shorter—it's a shame, isn't it?"

"A dreadful shame," agreed Lanyard. "Please will you forgive me?"

"For what?" she asked quickly.

"For kissing you."

"But you haven't—that is, you're not going to!"

"But I am."

"Are you?" She found herself in his arms with his lips on hers. Her hands

He removed the pendant from the handkerchief, and slowly, almost reluctantly, lowered it into the case.

went up to his shoulders. "And you did!" she said. "It was as simple as that. Well, it's partly my fault, but I can't forgive you."

"I don't want you to forgive me," returned Lanyard calmly. "I'm not sorry."

A white-haired butler, who had been searching for his mistress, coughed discreetly beside them.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Stewart," he said, "but I can't locate your aunt. There are two gentlemen to see her, and they say it's important."

"How important, Joseph?" asked Marcia.

"They're from police headquarters," replied the butler.

"I'll see them. Show them into the hall."

The butler bowed and disappeared. Marcia looked at Lanyard, who had not betrayed the slightest sign of discomposure.

"The sheriff!" she said.

"Uhuh!" nodded Lanyard. "With his bloodhounds."

"This should be fun."

Detective-Sergeant Benson was in the hall when they reached it, and another plain-clothes man was with him. Benson was staring at some of the strange characters through the doorway of the ball-room, and to the ape-man, who returned his stare, he said facetiously:

"I suppose you're gonna tell me you're the butler?"

The ape-man made himself scarce with his partner of the moment, and Marcia stepped forward.

"This is Miss Stewart," said the real butler, and Benson had the grace to remove his hat from his head.

"Sorry to break in like this, lady," he began in his gruff voice, "but the name's Benson, and I—"

"Are we making too much noise?" interrupted Marcia. "Did the neighbours complain?"

"The house next door's been robbed," said Benson. "We're looking for a dangerous criminal, and we think he might be hiding somewhere in the neighbourhood."

"Oh, I'm sure you'll find him here!" declared Marcia gaily. "The house is full of dangerous criminals. Just take your pick." She waved a hand towards the ball-room. "Now there's Captain Kidd in there, and Jesse James, and Ali Baba, and—"

"No, no!" broke in Benson's assistant; and Benson himself said brusquely:

"Will you have all your guests unmask, please? I just want you to identify them yourself."

"Why, of course."

Marcia led the way into the ball-room, where she went over to the conductor of the orchestra.

The music stopped abruptly, and the dancers stopped with it. A bugle call rang out, and Benson and his colleague stood beside the platform Marcia had mounted.

"By special arrangement with the police department," she announced, "we've decided to turn the clock ahead to high midnight. All those not instantly removing their masks will be arrested for carrying concealed faces! Masks off!"

While the guests were removing their masks the blonde girl drifted to the doorway and whispered to Geoffrey Mallison, who had just descended the stairs.

"Get rid of that emerald," she said.

"Get rid of it?" he returned bleakly. "Somebody beat our time. It's gone!"

Her mask was off. He removed his own and they entered the ball-room. Lanyard was taking off the mask he had borrow from a fat monk now fast asleep on the couch upstairs, and she saw his face.

"You were right," she said. "I'm afraid somebody did beat our time!"

Detective-Sergeant Benson looked up at Marcia, whose beauty was now completely manifest.

"You know everybody here, do you, Miss Stewart?" he asked.

"Yes, everyone," she replied, and smiled with her eyes at Lanyard. "You may search the rest of the house now, if you like."

"Oh, no!" The detective shook his head. "That satisfies Benson, Miss Stewart."

She bowed mockingly to him, made a sign to the conductor, and stepped down from the platform. The music burst forth again, and the surprised guests resumed their dancing. Mallison and his companion retreated to the hall as they saw Benson and his colleague coming towards them with Marcia and Lanyard.

"What might his pedigree be?" Mallison inquired.

"One of the best in Europe," was the reply.

"We'll see about that!"

Benson and the others reached the hall, and Benson actually bowed to the girl whose party he had disturbed.

"We'll move along," he said. "Sorry to have bothered you."

The imitation Sherlock Holmes swept forward.

"Just a moment," he said, pointing a finger at Lanyard. "I think this gentleman is one of your friends that I haven't met, Marcia."

Benson stared, and Marcia was rather taken aback; but Lanyard did not turn a hair.

"You're quite right," he said blandly. "We never have."

"Why, this is Tom," said Marcia. "Colonel Thompson, of Kentucky. Mr. Mallison—Colonel Thompson."

"A pleasure," murmured the defeated Mallison.

"A great pleasure," bowed Lanyard.

"It's quite all right, gentlemen," said Marcia.

Benson turned away and received his hat from the butler who had taken charge of it. He and the other plainclothes man were conducted to the door.

"Dance?" suggested Mallison.

"Why, yes," agreed Marcia.

Off they went into the ball-room, and for a few moments Lanyard watched them as they danced together, then threaded his way to the bar and filled a glass from a punchbowl.

"Colonel, eh?" said a mocking voice beside him, and he looked round at the blonde girl. She was wearing a Grecian costume, and evidently represented Helen of Troy, but he remembered her face.

"Well, well, well," he said over the rim of the glass. "From the past!"

"Remember me?" she challenged.

"Of course I do." He smiled reminiscently. "Norah, and that little apartment on East Twelfth Street."

"It's Liane," she informed him. "and the apartment happened to be in Vienna, at forty-four Godignasse."

"Oh, yes!" He held the glass between his hands and nodded solemnly over it. "I remember now—except did I catch you going through my desk, or was it the other way round?"

"You caught me," she replied quite shamelessly.

"Oh, well, it all worked out very pleasantly. You've come into the higher brackets, haven't you? What happened to Mr. Powers?"

The police retired him. Geoffrey Mallison has a much better clientele, only he gets a little jealous."

"Jealous?" Lanyard raised his brows.

"Of Miss Stewart?"

"Oh, no!" she assured him. "The jealousy is purely professional."

"I see. Well, even so, that little scene just now was a trifle too dramatic, don't you think?"

June 13th, 1936.

"Forget it." She put a hand on his arm. "Now that I've found you I want you to join us."

"Join you?" He laughed slightly.

"Oh, no, no, I'm afraid I can't do that!" "You don't understand. I want you to join us for a small party to-morrow night at the Club Rendezvous."

"Morphew's place?" He shook his head. "Not interested."

"But you are," she insisted. "The party's for Marcia—and there are the Stewart jewels. Obviously you're interested in one or the other."

"Is it really as obvious as that?" He put down the glass, took out his heavy silver cigarette-case, opened it, and presented it to her. "Oh dear!"

She helped herself to a cigarette, and he took one for himself, then ignited a lighter.

"To-morrow night, then, colonel?" she said, blowing a smoke ring.

"All right," he surrendered, "to-morrow night, Mrs.—"

"Mallison," she completed for him.

"Is he the third husband?"

"The fourth."

He offered her the glass he had filled.

"Have some punch," he said.

Nobody saw him steal upstairs to Marcia's room some little time later, and if anyone had seen him it was unlikely that they would have recognised him, for he was wearing the mask once more.

On an elaborate dressing-table stood a framed photograph of Marcia Stewart. He contemplated it for quite a while before he picked it up and opened the back of the frame. The photograph itself was stowed away in one of his tail-pockets, and from the other pocket he took out the handkerchief in which the emerald pendant was wrapped.

He had left the morocco-covered case on a little round table. He opened the case and removed the pendant from the handkerchief, and, slowly, almost reluctantly, he lowered the pendant into the case.

A few minutes afterwards the pendant was back in the wall-safe and he was back in the ball-room, claiming Marcia for a dance.

"Maggie!"

DETECTIVE-SERGEANT BENSON was not at all happy in the presence of his superior officer, Angus McGowan, next morning.

"So what?" snapped the chief of detectives.

"So I took a shot at him."

"And bounced a slug off Julius Caesar!" McGowan made a derisive noise in his throat. "Nice work!"

"How about that hat and overcoat I was telling you about?" asked Benson hastily. "I figured they ought to give us a swell lead."

"Well, figure again!" was the crushing rejoinder. "The hat comes from Budapest, and the coat from some London tailor who isn't even in the book! What about those footprints in the garden?"

"They don't help, either," growled the discomfited detective. "He must have had the soles of his shoes tricked up. One foot's larger and a completely different shape from the other."

"So he walked in and he walked out the same as he's been doing for weeks!" McGowan leaned over his desk, gripping the edge of it with both hands. "He's fast company, Benson, out of your league! This job needs a man like Crane. Since he left the department everything's gone wrong."

Benson writhed in his chair.

"I've got a plan," he stated defensively.

"That's fine! When you get it finished make a dog-kennel out of it and crawl inside. That's all, Benson."

Benson rose and rammed his hat on his head.

"Build a dog-kennel out of it," he muttered as he progressed doorwards. "Who does he think he is, talking to me that way, eh? I don't have to stand for that sort of thing, not me. I've got a standing offer from a big city out West to take charge of their Peeping Tom problem, but not me—not me! I'm sticking to Mac. I'm the best man he ever had around here."

McGowan heard as much as he was intended to hear, but paid no attention whatever. The door was reached, and Benson strode out into a waiting-room and closed the door behind him.

"Why, even as a cop on the beat," he informed a police-sergeant who was writing at a desk, "I showed unusual ability."

The sergeant did not look up, and Benson became aware of a man, more heavily built than himself, who was sitting patiently on a bench and holding something wrapped in paper between his knees; a grey-haired man with a pair of very mild blue eyes.

"Stranger," he said, advancing towards the bench thoroughly upset, "I'm a man of reputation. Maybe you've heard the phrase 'They never get by Benson.'"

Apparently the stranger was not acquainted with the phrase, for he merely shrugged very broad shoulders.

A buzzer sounded and the sergeant at the desk looked round.

"Will you please go in, Mr. Crane?" he said.

Up rose the ponderous stranger and vanished into McGowan's room, leaving a very startled detective behind.

"Crane?" gasped the detective.

"Did you say Crane?"

"Yeah, Crane," drawled the sergeant. "A real detective, Benson. Have you ever seen one before?"

"Why didn't you tip me off?" Benson thrust his thumbs under his braces and projected his chest. "Now there's a man that's in my class," he blustered. "Me and him could have done each other a lot o' good, swapping ideas."

Beyond the closed door Angus McGowan beamed at his visitor.

"Sit down, Crane," he boomed. "I'm right glad you've turned up."

Crane deposited himself in a chair, holding with care the object wrapped in paper.

"D'you know what time of the year it is?" he asked discontentedly. "Mac, my garden's coming along. I work all May and June, and now that I've got a chance to see results you keep wiring me to leave it for this place. I wouldn't have come down here if we hadn't pounded the pavements together, Mac."

"I need you badly," said McGowan.

"Well," announced Crane, "I'll help you if you'll help me with Maggie."

"Maggie?" Angus McGowan blinked.

"Who's Maggie?"

A sheet of white paper was removed from a flower-pot in which a scarlet begonia flourished, and the flower-pot was set down upon the chief of detectives' desk.

"There she is!" proclaimed Crano proudly. "That little plant's going to take all the medals at the garden show, Mac. I didn't dare to leave her at home all day, so you'll have to detail a man to take care of her day and night."

"All right," gulped McGowan. "All right. I—er—I'll put Benson on it."

He went to the door and Benson was called into the room. Crane had transferred the flower-pot to a table nearer the window than the desk.

"Don't you ever let any sunshine in here, Mac?" he demanded, proceeding to pull up the Venetian blinds that covered the window while Benson watched him open-eyed and open-mouthed.

"What do you know about flowers?" McGowan rapped.

"Flowers?" echoed Benson. "Oh, why Tiger Flowers, he was one of the greatest lightweight—"

"He'll do!" interrupted Crane, making for a filter at which he filled a glass with water for his precious begonia. "He'll do!"

The bewildered Benson was told to wait in the outer room.

"I'll give you the details of this assignment later," McGowan informed him.

"Well, what's troubling you, Mac?" inquired Crane, after the begonia's thirst had been quenched. "Your last wire sounded worried."

"I'm in a spot," was the reply. "In the last three weeks—"

"Just a second, Mac—just a second."

A gleam of sunshine was slanting into the room and the flower-pot had to be moved into its warmth. The chief of detectives became almost frantic.

"Crane," he exploded, "it was bad enough when you quit to take a sheriff's badge in some hick county and left me with a bunch of stooges who can't even catch a cold. Now you come in to do a tough job, and you bring a flower. What's the matter with you?"

"Say, you ain't sore about Maggie, are you?" asked Crane in a pained voice.

"Sore?" McGowan banged a fist on his desk. "Listen, the Lone Wolf's operating again."

"What's that? The Lone Wolf? What have you been wasting all this time for? He's the only man who ever got a decision against me, Mac. Come on, what are we waiting for?"

McGowan had no reason to complain of lack of attention on the part of the retired detective after that. Crane extracted all the information available concerning the Lone Wolf's activities in the past three weeks.

"I'll get him," he said, at the end of a quarter of an hour's talk.

Crane Pays a Call

IN the days when the Lone Wolf had before troubled the city of New York, Michael Lanyard had occupied an expensive flat on the fifth floor of an apartment-house in Park Avenue. Crane had always been convinced that Michael Lanyard and the Lone Wolf were one and the same person, but he had failed to prove it to the satisfaction of a judge and jury.

From headquarters he proceeded by taxicab to the apartment-house. An elevator whisked him up to the fifth floor, and in a carpeted corridor he rang the doorbell of the flat.

Lanyard's manservant, Jenkins, who was quite a character, was in his master's bed-room. He was in his shirt-sleeves and a green apron was tied round such waist as he possessed. He had been plying a feather duster, but had paused in front of a tall chest of drawers to pick up a heavy silver cigarette-case which was lying there, and he had opened first one side of the case and then the other.

He was contemplating the Baneroff necklaces with expert eyes when the doorbell startled him. He closed the case, restored it to its former position, picked up the feather duster and went out across the hallway of the flat to open the door.

Crane brushed past him without a word. He knew Jenkins, and Jenkins knew him.

"Well, of all the infernal effrontery!" exclaimed the servant, who was given to rather an elaborate mode of speech.

Crane bent with interest over a curious waxy plant in a brass-bound tub.

"Special type of tropical plant called the Ocuba," he remarked. "That's a good specimen, too. Where d'you get it?"

"That," replied Jenkins stiffly, "was a purchase."

"I suppose you're going to tell me the master's not at home?"

"Mr. Lanyard is not at home."

Quite calmly the detective walked into the bed-room and looked thoughtfully round it. The door of the bathroom was closed, but a sound of splashing was distinctly audible. Crane made for the door, but Jenkins reached it first and opened it. Michael Lanyard, perfectly naked, was in the bath.

"What is it, Jenkins?" he inquired, sponging his chest.

"It's Crane," replied Jenkins.

"Oh, dear old Crane."

"He's waiting for you out there. You don't want to see him, do you?"

"Jenkins, you take life far too mysteriously. Of course I want to see him. I've missed him."

Jenkins went back into the bed-room to find Crane rummaging in one of the drawers of the tall chest.

"Spending big, isn't he?" said the detective, displaying silk socks and a handkerchief of superb linen.

"It's not money," Jenkins retorted. "It's a matter of good taste."

Marcia's photograph was propped against a vase on the dressing-chest. Her name was written across a corner of it as though she had intended at some time to give it to a friend. Crane studied the pictured face, then picked up the silver cigarette-case.

He opened it, helped himself to a cigarette and lit it, but to Jenkins' relief he put the case down again.

"Hi, Crane," shouted Lanyard from his bath, "everything's hidden under the carpet."

"Oh, I wouldn't think of taking up the carpet," said Crane, and crossed into the bath-room and seated himself on a chair. "Nice picture of Marcia Stewart," he went on, puffing at the cigarette. "A little different from the type you usually go for, isn't she?"

"She's a little different from any type I've ever met," said Lanyard.

"Yes, a little wealthier."

Lanyard groped for the soap.

"Now that's a detail I hadn't noticed," he declared. "I found the difference in her eyes. Gorgeous eyes! What colour would you say they are?"

"Off-hand, I'd say they were blue-grey."

"That's just what they're not," said Lanyard. "Crane, would you mind bringing me a cigarette?"

Quite readily the detective vanished into the bed-room and returned with the cigarette-case; and as Lanyard's hands were wet he himself opened the case, took a cigarette from it and put it between a pair of ready lips. He left the case on the edge of the bath to grope in his pockets for matches.

"You know, Crane," said Lanyard as the cigarette was lit, "you're getting harder to fool every day."

"I was wrong about the eyes," said

Having made two noughts and one cross on the smeared polish, Jenkins glanced artfully at the policeman.

Crane, "but I can't be fooled about the girl. She looks awfully nice, Lanyard."

"Nice? Man, she's perfect!"

"And the young lady has one of the finest emerald collections in the world."

"That remark, you old so-and-so, strikes me as containing malice aforethought."

"All right," laughed Crane. "I'll come to the point. They're talking about the Lone Wolf again."

"Oh, really?" Lanyard had completed his ablutions. "Say, you might stop playing detective for a moment and give me a hand with that bath towel."

Crane rose to get the indicated towel, and immediately the other side of the cigarette-case was opened and the stolen necklace disappeared into the depths of the soapy water. The case was back on the side of the bath when Crane returned with the towel.

"Headquarters has him spotted for the Bancroft job the other night," remarked the detective as Lanyard took the towel and began to dry himself with it.

"Well, it's a matter of opinion."

"That's why I dropped in to get yours. You never can tell who can give you the right steer. Besides, I wanted to greet an old friend, anyway, and see how he was doing, and to have a look at the picture of his latest girl."

Mild blue eyes and very keen brown ones met and challenged.

"All right, Crane," said the owner of the brown ones with an air of sincerity. "I have got a hunch. My hunch is that this Lone Wolf you're talking about is just about through. No more prowling. Done for. Finis!"

"Good!" said Crane emphatically.

"In all the years I followed this man I never did get to him, but there was always a hope that I might some day. It's become a sort of ambition, but if you say he's quit, I'll forget that ambition."

"You can, Crane," Lanyard stepped out from the bath, enveloped in the towel. "I finished him myself last night."

The detective jabbed the end of his cigarette in an ash-tray.

"I'm counting on you being right about this, Lanyard," he said slowly and significantly. "If you're not, I won't rest till I swap his name for a number. I'll be seeing you around, I hope."

"So-long," nodded Lanyard. "Glad you dropped in."

Jenkins was hovering in the hallway, only too eager to open the front door for the unwelcome visitor, and Lanyard had repaired to the bed-room, clad in a dressing-gown, when he returned to it.

"I still don't like that man," remarked Jenkins plaintively, and perceived that his master was swinging a necklace with his right hand. "Why, Mr. Lanyard—why, that's the Bancroft string, isn't it?"

"How did you guess?" rapped Lanyard.

"Well, I—er—I don't understand," evaded the servant. "Why, before you had your bath you were positively brooding—talking about your misspent youth, and repairing your ways. You made quite a little talk on the subject, sir, avowing in a manner of speaking that crime does not pay."

With his left hand Lanyard tossed the bath towel over his servant's shoulder.

"It does not pay, Jenkins," he said solemnly.

Jenkins looked thoroughly upst.

"I heard you make a solemn promise, June 13th, 1936.

sir," he lamented, "that we were going to mend our ways."

"Did I?" laughed Lanyard. "Well, don't take it so to heart, Jenkins."

"Oh, I see!" The face of the servant brightened. "It was all a pleasantry. You didn't mean it, and everything you told Crane was just to mislead him. We're going on the same as usual, aren't we, sir?"

"No, Jenkins. As from to-day you and I are honest citizens."

Jenkins drew a long breath. "Well, I'm sorry to hear that, sir," he said.

A Job for Jenkins

LATE that afternoon Angus McGowan, in his room at headquarters, flung upon his desk a special edition of the "New York Chronicle" in which he had just read that the Bancroft mansion had been invaded in broad daylight by someone who had returned the missing pearls.

"This is incredible!" he exclaimed. Benson, instructed in his duties, was fussing round the begonia in its flower-pot; Crane was hovering beside him with his hands in his pockets. McGowan glared at them.

"You're worried about a begonia," he fumed, "and we're up against the toughest proposition we ever had. Here's a thief giving things away."

"What's troubling you?" asked Crane cheerfully. "He's taken himself off our hands."

"It's an act," snorted the chief of detectives. "Some kind of a build-up. They don't make a switch like that for nothing."

"I think you're wrong," said Crane. "I still can't understand it. I wish you'd stick around."

"All right," said Crane. "I will. Benson, you'd better take Maggie up on the roof for her afternoon sun-bath."

While Benson was conveying the flower-pot and its precious contents to the flat roof of headquarters, Geoffrey Mallison stood beside a desk in a private office on the first floor of the Club Rendezvous.

Liane, his blonde wife, was perched on the arm of a chair, smoking a cigarette and seemingly quite undisturbed by the rage of the man who was seated at the desk. That man was Leonard Morphew, whose name Michael Lanyard had mentioned the night before, proprietor of the club and the acknowledged head of a gang of clever jewel thieves.

He was rather a sinister-looking person with a nose that contradicted the weakness of his chin and a pair of deeply set brown eyes. A little moustache failed to hide a mouth that suggested a thoroughly unscrupulous nature.

"I'm not interested in your explanation," he snarled at Mallison. "I don't care what happened last night. All I know is I spent a bank-roll paying your bills all over Europe. You meet a Society girl named Marcia Stewart in Paris, and you become friends. You get into a position to grab the biggest collection of emeralds in the country, and what happens?"

"Well," protested Mallison, "something went wrong last night."

"You don't have to tell me that."

"What happened was—"

"I don't care what happened last night!" roared Morphew. "All I know is that you fell down on the job."

Liane rose up and flicked ash from her cigarette on to the carpet.

"Stop crying, Morphew," she said calmly. "It's all fixed."

"Fixed?" Morphew slewed round in his chair to scowl at her. "What's fixed?"

"Four of us will be here to-night to dine and dance and—"

"Four of us?"

Liane nodded. "The guests to-night will be Marcia Stewart, Geoffrey, myself, and Michael Lanyard."

"Lanyard? Who's he?"

"The smoothest and cleverest jewel thief on either side of the Atlantic."

Morphew sprang up from his chair. "I'm not cutting anyone else in on this!" he raged. "I'm afraid you haven't much choice," Liane retorted. "Miss Stewart has cut him in already. She likes him."

"I don't care how much she likes him!"

"But you don't even know him."

Liane blew some smoke from her painted lips. "Perhaps you'll be more interested when I tell you that Mr. Lanyard is the Lone Wolf."

Morphew's expression changed completely. Mallison's eyes widened.

"Why didn't you tell me?" he exclaimed.

"You shut up!" said his wife.

"Lanyard's the Lone Wolf?" Morphew rubbed his receding chin. "How do you know?"

"We once lived at the same hotel."

"And the Stewart girl likes him?"

Liane received a pat on the shoulder. "Smart girl!"

"Well," began Geoffrey Mallison, "I think that we should—"

"Save it!" Morphew curtly interrupted. "I'll do the thinking from now on."

The Club Rendezvous was situated in Sixth Street, near Broadway, and it had a very mixed clientele. Some of its regular patrons came only to dance and to dine in a rather garish restaurant on the ground floor; others came to gamble in rooms on the floor above.

The restaurant was fairly crowded with diners and dancers that evening when Marcia entered it in company with Liane and her husband, but the three were promptly provided with a table which had been reserved for them—a table on a raised portion of the floor from which the whole of the room could be seen.

Morphew joined them at that table, perfectly dressed and perfectly mannered. An excellent dinner was served, and Marcia thoroughly enjoyed herself; the presence of underworld characters intrigued her. Morphew, pandering to her mood, pointed out several notorious characters.

"That's 'Pinch' McCullough, the gambler," he said, indicating one of five men at a table near the orchestra. "He made a fortune, last week, at Pimlico."

"Not really?" breathed Marcia.

"And who are the men with him?"

"Well," laughed Morphew, "one of them is the owner of the other four horses in the race! The man on the right is 'Red' Dugan."

"Not the Dugan we read about in the papers?" exclaimed Marcia. "The gangster?"

"That's right," Morphew assured her. "Oh, do you suppose you could get him to autograph a serviette for Aunt Julia? She'd be thrilled!"

"You'd be a cinch," said Morphew, "if he could write!"

Marcia turned excitedly to Mallison.

"Oh, Mal, this place is fascinating!" she cried. "I'm so glad you thought of coming here!"

"Suppose," suggested Morphew, "we go to one of my private dining-rooms for coffee, and make this an exclusive affair?"

"Let's do that," urged Liane, accepting her cue.

Marcia agreed, and Morphew rose.

"If you'll excuse me, I'll arrange it," he said.

In a parking place outside the premises a very smart grey coupé had edged past a variety of cars to the only vacant space that was left. Jenkins was at the wheel, and Lanyard was seated beside him. The vacant space was a forbidden one, because it was too near a fire hydrant, but Lanyard had his own reasons for wanting the coupé to be parked there. He was quite well acquainted with the Club Rendezvous.

"Jenkins," he said, pointing upwards, "do you see that window on the corner?"

"Yes, sir," responded Jenkins. "Very beautiful, sir, but if I might say so, a trifle menacing."

"Right," agreed Lanyard. "Well, Jenkins, you keep your eye on that window, at present quite brilliantly lighted, and remember that on this occasion the play starts when the curtain comes down."

"Yes, sir. And what part do I play in this little drama?"

"You call the police."

"When the curtain comes down," nodded Jenkins. "And what shall I tell them, sir?"

"I'll leave that to you, Jenkins."

Lanyard descended from the coupé, crossed to the pavement, and disappeared into the Club Rendezvous. Jenkins tipped his bowler hat over his eyes and viewed the fire hydrant with some misgiving.

Sixth Street is not a fashionable thoroughfare. Some very untidy youngsters appeared round the corner, bent on mischief, and the drooping figure of Jenkins engaged their attention. From some neighbouring thoroughfare of the Bowery they had armed themselves with discarded tomatoes and damaged eggs, the car park outside the Club Rendezvous frequently providing them with targets for such things.

An egg, the shell of which was already broken, smashed and splashed against the side of the coupé; an over-ripe tomato followed. Jenkins roused himself to rebuke the youngsters.

"Oh, you mustn't do that!" he admonished. "You'll scratch the car! Run along—run along! I polished this car this morning!"

"And he's going to polish it again, too!" shrilled one of the boys; whereupon another egg and two more tomatoes were hurled at the coupé.

Jenkins descended in wrath, and the youngsters made themselves scarce. Jenkins frowned at the mess they had made and reached under the driving-seats for rags and a large bottle of car polish. He wiped off a quantity of tomato juice and egg, and he proceeded to smear the body of the car with the polish.

Noughts and Crosses

LANYARD, having given his name to an attendant in the vestibule of the Club Rendezvous, was conducted up thickly carpeted stairs and through a number of doorways to a room in which Marcia was seated at a table with Liane and Geoffrey Mallison.

"I promised you a big surprise," Liane said to Marcia, "and here it comes!"

Marcia looked up, and her face flushed a little and her brown eyes sparkled.

"I hope I'm not intruding," said Lanyard, reaching her side and clasping the hand she offered him.

"Why, you're the big event of the evening!" she declared.

"It's a pleasure to have you with us, Mr. Lanyard," said Mallison, pronouncing the name very distinctly.

"It seems to be a pleasure every time we meet," returned Lanyard with calm, and he bent over Marcia. "Am I entirely forgiven?"

"For what?" she asked. "For your thievery? I was robbed last night! A picture of mine was stolen!"

"With so much treasure about," he informed her, "I couldn't leave the place empty-handed."

Down in the restaurant the orchestra began to play the slow foxtrot to which he had danced her away on to the terrace of her home the night before. She smiled at him, and he asked her if the music was familiar.

"I believe that's where we left off," said she.

"We might pick up again at the same place," he suggested. "Shall we?"

She rose immediately, and with murmured apologies took his arm. They went out from the room and down some stairs into the restaurant, and they danced together.

"I don't think Morphew will be able to do anything with him," grunted Mallison after they had gone.

On the polished floor in the middle of the restaurant, Lanyard informed Marcia that he had planned to telephone her that day.

"What changed your mind?" she asked softly.

"Oh, there were a lot of things I wanted to say that I'd rather say in person," he replied.

She wanted to hear those things, and she suggested that they should sit out the rest of the dance. An unoccupied table was quite near, and he led her over to it. A waiter almost immediately appeared with a Welsh rarebit which he set before them.

"Sorry it was delayed, sir," he said. "Is everything satisfactory?"

"Yes, fine, thanks," returned Lanyard.

He was hungry and the Welsh rare-

Mallison would have seized Morphew by the throat, but his elbow was gripped and his wrist was twisted downwards in a trick of ju-jutsu.

bit was delicious. The fact that there had been a card on the table announcing that it was engaged did not trouble him in the least.

"Tell me," he said presently, "how long have you known Mallison and Liane?"

"I met them in Europe several weeks ago," she replied. "Why?"

"They don't seem to be quite your sort of people."

"They're much more interesting than my sort of people."

"Do you think that's wise?" he asked gravely. "I mean, these sudden friendships?"

"After all," she retorted, "I've only known you through two foxtrots and a Welsh rarebit!"

An elderly man and an elderly woman, both of considerable bulk, bore down on the table and stared at the two who were seated at it.

"Of all the nerve!" bridled the woman.

Lanyard instantly rose and offered his arm to Marcia.

"Let's dance," he said, and, with a grin, addressed the fat and over-dressed woman. "Let me recommend the Welsh rarebit—it's excellent."

On the floor above, Morphew passed through several rooms to one in which there was a roulette table. Several patrons of the place were gathered round the table, and Morphew greeted them, then moved towards a divan on which two particularly ugly fellows were sprawling. They were in dinner-jacket suits—clothes that suited them not at all.

One of them was swarthy, thick-set, and rather deaf, and his name was Mastro; the other looked like a pugilist, and his name was Coster. Both could be dangerous when occasion called for rough stuff.

"Do you want me, boss?" inquired Coster, jumping to his feet.

"No," Morphew replied. "I just wanted to see if you could walk. Extend yourself and stay sober to-night. I might need you two and the other boys. Tell Mallison I'm all ready—he can bring the party up."

Coster moved across to a doorway and Mastro hurried after him.

"What did he say?"

"Never mind what he said," Coster shouted in the deaf one's ear. "You stick around."

Down in the car park, Jenkins, by this time, had covered the bodywork of the car with the polish and was about to clean it off again when a policeman sauntered up, seated himself on the top of the fire hydrant, and very significantly took out his notebook and pencil.

Jenkins, who had discarded his coat but was still wearing his bowler hat, promptly traced two horizontal lines with a finger in the smear of polish on the coupé door, intersected them with two vertical lines, and began to play the ancient game of noughts and crosses. Having made two noughts and one cross, he glanced artfully at the policeman, who was young enough to accept the mute challenge.

Deserting the fire hydrant, the officer traced a cross above the cross.

Jenkins let him win that first game, just to encourage him, and started another one. The policeman put away his notebook and his pencil, and, like two small boys, they played noughts and crosses all round the car, while in a room on the upper floor of the Club Rendezvous, Marcia tried her luck at the roulette board on a system Geoffrey Mallison recommended to her.

Again and again she won, while the others—including Morphew—looked on with interest.

"Oh, this seven system Mal gave me is marvellous!" she exclaimed. "And it's so simple, too! Seven, fourteen, twenty-eight and thirty-five—any multiple of seven."

"Sounds almost too good to be true," commented Lanyard sceptically, his eyes on Morphew; and Morphew said:

"Oh, you know how it is when you get a run on a certain set of numbers—it's almost uncanny. You wouldn't like to try it yourself, would you?"

"No, not for me, thanks," returned Lanyard.

"We have other games that might interest you."

A challenge, obviously. Lanyard turned to Marcia.

"Shall we try one?" he asked.

"No," she laughed. "I'm doing very well right here."

"How about you?" purred Morphew. "I'll take a look," Lanyard decided. He was conducted through other rooms into the private office. Lanyard looked round it and said:

"This is a nice place, but where's the game you spoke of?"

"Stop acting simple, Lanyard," returned Morphew coolly. "You know we're after the Stewart jewels, and you know we won't let you pull that job without a beef from us."

"Well, beef away," said Lanyard. "It's a free country. Or have you a monopoly on the jewel market?"

"This is no time for wisecracks. I'm making it easy for you. You're going to operate with me, and I'll declare you in for twenty-five per cent. But twenty-five per cent is tops, you understand. I've a lot of dough tied up in those emeralds."

"I'll bet you have," said Lanyard, rejecting a cigarette which was offered and taking one from his own case and lighting it. "Mr. and Mrs. Mallison must have run up a pretty expense account in Europe."

"When we do anything, we do it in a big way," boasted Morphew. "You'll do yourself a lot of good operating with me."

"No sale. I have a system of my own. I like it."

"But it's behind the times, Lanyard. You need a mob to-day. Organisation. I'm not making you a proposition. I'm telling you the way it's gonna be!"

"Really?" Lanyard smiled, but his eyes glinted. "I like you and I hate to turn you down, but I'm afraid I must." He pointed to the door. "Go ahead."

"Oh, no, Mr. Lanyard," said Morphew. "After you. If anyone does any back-patting to-night it's going to be me."

They went out from the office, Lanyard first, and they progressed through two crowded rooms and reached a third one.

"I wonder how difficult it is going to be to get out of this place," remarked Lanyard; and Morphew frowned at him.

"There you go, being stubborn again," he said. "What sort of a host would people think I was if I let you leave so early? We like you, Lanyard. We want to keep you here."

Lanyard knew the room he was in now. He turned suddenly to the window he had pointed out to Jenkins and pulled back a heavy curtain. Jenkins and his policeman were playing noughts and crosses on a sedan which had been smeared with polish.

"Don't start figuring that way," said Morphew sharply. "It's a long jump to the street!"

Lanyard pulled down the blind and turned away from the window.

Jenkins, who had just won another game against his policeman, had not failed to watch the window.

"Here's where the play starts," he announced.

"What d'you mean, 'starts'?" asked the puzzled officer. "We've been doing this for an hour!"

"And it would be a pleasure to continue," Jenkins assured him, "but it's way past Aunt Mathilda's bed-time, and the poor soul won't close her eyes unless I 'phone to wish her good-night. Believe me, sir, I am very happy to have met you in a social way."

A Game of Wits

MARCIA was still winning at the roulette board when Lanyard and Morphew re-entered the room. Mastro and Coster were looking on from a distance; Liane and Mallison appeared to have become rather bored.

Morphew stopped the game and suggested to the other players that they might meet with better fortune in one of the other rooms. Marcia gathered up her winnings.

"I wonder what Aunt Julia will say when she hears about this," she laughed.

"I wonder what Aunt Julia would say," drawled Morphew, "if she knew the sort of company you're keeping!"

"Oh, she'd love it!"

"I wonder!" The room had cleared, except for the four of them. "I'll wager it would bowl her over when she reads in the paper that Marcia Stewart, the owner of the famous jewel collection, has been running around with an international jewel thief!"

"Jewel thief?" Marcia echoed in astonishment. "What do you mean?"

"The gentleman next to you will explain."

Marcia turned blankly to Lanyard. "What's he talking about, Michael?" she asked.

Morphew, with a very evil smile, said blandly:

"Michael Lanyard is the name you know him by, but with us he's known as the Lone Wolf."

"Why, that's ridiculous!" she cried, staring at Lanyard's set face. "I don't believe it! It isn't—it isn't true, is it, Michael?"

But Lanyard bowed his head, and she knew that it was true.

"Liane, I want to go home," she said miserably, and Liane went out from the room with her.

"That wasn't a very nice thing to do, was it?" suggested Morphew.

"Oh, I don't know!" shrugged Lanyard. "It's a gentleman's privilege. He can introduce his guests any way he pleases."

"Will you have a drink?"

"Sure, I always like to drink to a winner."

Morphew called to Coster, who approached with his right hand in his dinner-jacket pocket.

"Give the gentleman a drink."

"If," added Lanyard dryly, "you can take your hand off that gun long enough to get it!"

Coster vanished, presently to reappear with drinks upon a tray; and Mastro was with him.

"I've another little treat in store for you," Morphew informed Lanyard as he handed him a whisky-and-soda. "A week-end visit to Jersey City."

"Oh," said Lanyard, "with the play-mates here? Either one of you two boys sing bass?"

Marcia had reached the restaurant with Liane when plain-clothes men and uniformed officers invaded the vestibule, and a red light flashed in each of the upstairs rooms.

"That's trouble!" exclaimed Morphew. "Go down and see what it is!"

Coster and Mastro obeyed, but they had not been gone a minute before a number of scared gamblers swarmed into the room, crying out that the police were raiding the place. The commotion already created in the restaurant had spread upstairs.

In the confusion, Lanyard squeezed through the crowd, reached the stairs, and sped down them to the vestibule. Police were guarding the front doors and plain-clothes men were trying to compel order. Lanyard caught sight of Marcia, near the open gate of an elevator, looking for Liane, from whom she had become separated. He swept her into the cage, slammed the gate, and pressed a button.

The cage shot upwards, but midway between two floors above the club he stopped it.

"There, now we're all right," he said. "Small world, isn't it?"

"I want to go," Marcia frigidly informed him. "I want to get out of here."

"Which way?" he inquired genially. "Up or down? The police are waiting at both ends, and from what I saw of that raiding party they're really not worth meeting."

"They can't be any worse than—" She broke off and bit her lip.

"Than the criminals they chase?" he suggested. "Marcia, I've got to tell you something."

"I won't listen!" she stormed, and turned her back on him.

"I'm afraid you can't help yourself. I want to tell you about the Lone Wolf. He doesn't exist any more."

"I can't believe that," she informed the wall of the cage.

"It's the truth," he declared earnestly. "It happened when first I met you."

"People don't change like that!"

"I know they don't," said he, "but this one has."

By the time the noise in the Club Rendezvous had died away he had convinced her because she wanted to be convinced; but it was not till the shriek of police sirens had faded away in the distance that he brought the cage of the elevator down to the level of the deserted vestibule.

All the cars that had been parked outside the premises had disappeared, save his own coupé. He helped Marcia into it and got in at the wheel, while Jenkins opened the dickey for himself.

The self-starter buzzed, the car swept out of Sixth Street into Broadway and joined the up-town stream of traffic.

"The Marines arrived almost too late, Jenkins," said Lanyard over his shoulder in the region of Union Square.

"I called the police, sir," responded Jenkins, "just as soon as the blind came down. I told them that Butcher Willinger, the murderer they wanted, was in the gambling den. They seemed delighted."

Times Square was reached, and then Lanyard spoke again to his servant.

"What are all those marks on the car, Jenkins?"

"Oh, a little game of wits, sir," was the reply. "We were too near a fire hydrant, sir, and were in danger of being charged with that offence against the regulations. But we defeated the enemy again, sir."

West One Hundred and Twentieth Street was reached, and the coupé came to a standstill in the drive of Marcia's home. Jenkins transferred himself from the dickey seat to the driving-seat while his master escorted Marcia to the front door of the house.

She gave him her key to open the door, then retrieved it and entered the dark hall.

"Thank you," she said. "Good-night."

"Good-night," returned Lanyard desolately, and the door was closed upon him.

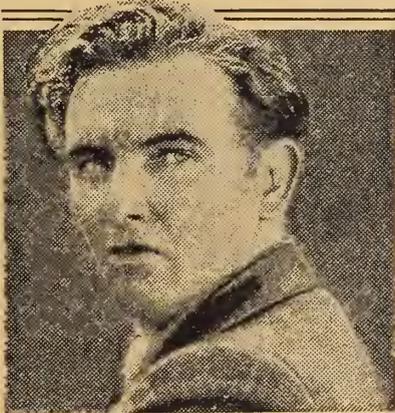

He stepped back on to the front lawn and looked at the unlighted windows of the ball-room. He wandered up on to the terrace, and in the light of the moon he saw her face at the french window beside which he had lurked the night before. He took out a handkerchief and affected to wipe his eyes with it.

She vanished, but not before she had smiled at him, and with hope in his heart he went back to the front door. It was open, and she was waiting for him on the top step.

"I can't have you prowling around," she said. "You'll have to come in!"

He entered the hall with her, and she shut the door, marched him over to the stairs, and pulled him down beside her on the second tread.

NEXT WEEK'S BIG FILM DRAMAS!

PRESTON FOSTER

—IN—

"WE'RE ONLY HUMAN"

As a detective, Pete McCaffrey was daring enough in tackling crooks, but that was because he did not know fear. A bullet that caused his eyes to be bandaged for a week reduced him to quivering cowardice—and then the girl who loved him stung him into facing the guns of a gang with true valour, because he was afraid. A gripping drama.

"ANNIE OAKLEY"

The shooting of this girl was so wonderful that the manager of Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show signed her up. Toby Walker, the rifle champion of the world, was with the show and his arrogant, boastful ways made him far from popular. Eventually, Annie wrests the title from him and Toby starts on the down grade. In a contest, he wounds her and is fired by an irate Colonel Cody—they thought it was revenge! A smashing drama, starring Barbara Stanwyck and Preston Foster.

"I wish you'd tell me," she said wistfully, "why I shouldn't see you again—why I should never see you again."

"There are dozens of reasons," he sighed. "I've been notorious, I've been disreputable, I've been one step ahead of the police all my life, I've been—"

She put a very soft hand over his mouth.

"It's no use, Michael," she said with a little catch in her voice. "All those reasons don't mean a thing, somehow. I want to believe in you, Michael."

"Marcia," said he, "I've no right to be going on like this, but I've got to tell you that I—"

"I love you!" she breathed.

"Are you quoting me?" he inquired.

"No, I'm speaking for myself."

They sat there talking till a clock they could only dimly see struck four; then Marcia rose and tugged Lanyard to his feet.

"You'll have to excuse me for being such a wretched hostess," she said.

"I've kept you in the hall all this time!"

"Nicest hall I've ever been in," declared Lanyard.

"Remember, on the way home, you're not to climb any porches. Promise?"

Lanyard promised.

"And no stealing milk, or morning papers!"

"You'll have to allow me just one more theft," he said, and kissed her on the lips. "That's it!"

He went out on to the porch and the door was closed. Across the grounds Morphew was lurking behind some bushes, and Coster and Mastro were with him. As Lanyard descended the steps he became plainly visible in the moonlight, and Mastro saw him.

"There's the Lone Wolf!" he said in a hoarse whisper.

"Good!" said Morphew.

Evidently Lanyard was in no haste to go home. He strolled over to a bench under a tree and sat down on it and lit a cigarette. Time passed, during which Morphew and his companions waited with more or less patience among the bushes. Coster glanced towards the road and perceived a dark car standing there with its lights out.

"There's a police car over there," he whispered nervously to Morphew; but Morphew seemed to be delighted.

"Perfect," he murmured. Crane was in the police car, watching Lanyard; a plain-clothes man was at the wheel. A second cigarette was half-consumed, then Lanyard tossed it from him on to the grass, stood up and stretched his arms, gave one last glance at the house, and walked slowly to his coupé. He got in behind the wheel without disturbing Jenkins—who was fast asleep—and drove off.

"Follow him," said Crane to the plain-clothes man as the grey coupé swung out from the drive into the roadway.

The purr of two motor-engines died away in the distance and the three lurkers in the bushes moved out from their hiding-place.

"Get me that cigarette," directed Morphew as they crossed the lawn. "No, that one!"

He pointed to the half-consumed cigarette Lanyard had discarded; but Coster went to pick it up with his fingers.

"Wait a minute," Morphew growled. "I don't want your finger-prints on it!"

He took a handkerchief from his pocket and picked up the end with it. Lanyard had his cigarettes made for him, and every one of them bore his initials. Most of the "M" and a portion of the "L" remained on this particular piece of one.

Crane Calls Again

CRANE, in the police car, followed Lanyard all the way to the apartment-house in Park Avenue, and from a discreet distance watched him descend and waken his man-servant.

"Drive on," he said; and Lanyard had no idea that he had been trailed till eight hours later, when the slow-moving, but fast-thinking, detective invaded his flat with a special edition of the "New York Herald" in his pocket.

"I'm sorry, sir," said Jenkins, "but Mr. Lanyard is—"

"Never mind the butler stuff!" rapped Crane, thrusting him aside. "Where is he? Where is he?"

Lanyard walked out into the hallway from his bed-room, clad in the waist-coat and trousers of a smart lounge suit and looking as fresh as if he had spent a full night between the sheets.

"Hallo, Crane," he said affably. "How're the posies?"

"Never mind the cover-up!" roared the detective. "I've seen some dirty, slimy tricks in my time, Lanyard, but you've beaten them all. I fell for that routine you handed me on the Stewart girl, but this is curtains."

He wrenched the newspaper from his pocket and opened it out for Lanyard to see the flaming headlines:

"STEWART JEWELS STOLEN.
"MARCIA STEWART'S HOME ROBBED."

"You don't think I did this?" asked Lanyard after a moment's dead silence. "I've got a perfect case against you." Crane rammed the newspaper back into his pocket.

"Well, if you have it's a frame-up." "Sure!" scoffed the detective. "Sixty thousand guys sitting in gaol to-day and they were all framed. I've got you, Lanyard, and I'm sending you so far up the river that it'll be a mere trickle where you're going."

Jenkins dived into the bed-room and reappeared with Lanyard's coat into which he helped his master.

"Now listen, Crane," said that master gravely, "I can't deny I was in her house last night."

"We know all about it," Crane retorted. "Our records show that you left Miss Stewart at four o'clock, but we didn't pick you up coming out of the grounds until four-thirty. What did you do in that half-hour?"

"You won't believe it, but I sat up against a tree, smoked a cigarette, and watched the moon. Did you happen to notice the moon last night?"

"Lanyard," said Crane, "you're slipping. We found a cigarette-end, but it was in the same room with an open safe. It had your fingerprints on it and most of your initials. How did it get there? Maybe your man in the moon can explain that."

"Ho can make a guess," said Lanyard.

"Yeah? Well, I don't have to guess. Come on, get your hat on. We're going down to pick out a number for you."

Lanyard twisted the end of his tiny moustache.

"Now listen, Crane," he said impressively, "I'll take the rap for any case you've got against me, but not this one. I didn't do it. Give me a chance to prove that— Give me until midnight."

"You'll get your chance before twelve men and a judge," snapped Crane.

"It's no use, Lanyard. I told them I'd bring you in, and you're coming along."

"All right," Lanyard turned to Jenkins. "Bring me my hat and gloves."

June 13th, 1936.

"Very good, sir."

Jenkins went to a wardrobe cupboard in the hallway and returned with a bowler hat, upside down, and a pair of chamois-leather gloves.

Lanyard took the hat, and from it an automatic which he levelled at the startled detective.

"I'm sorry, Crane," he said regretfully. "I hate to do this, but I've got to clear myself. All right, Jenkins."

Jenkins retreated behind the detective and ran expert hands over his clothing. From a pocket he withdrew a long-barrelled six-shooter.

"You won't give me a chance," said Lanyard, "so I'm forced to take it. Go on, Crane—inside."

Crane, with his hands raised, advanced slowly towards the cupboard.

"You'll never get away with this, Lanyard," he said. "You won't get out of the city."

"I'm not going to try," Lanyard informed him. "I'm going to bring in the people who did this thing. I'm going to clear myself with you—and Marcia Stewart. If I don't I'll be in your office at midnight."

Crane entered the cupboard, and Jenkins shut him in and turned the key in the lock. Lanyard made for a telephone in the sitting-room and rang up Marcia's home, but it was Aunt Julia's voice that sounded in his ear.

"The idea of degrading yourself by falling in love with that man!" he heard her say, obviously to Marcia, and then: "Hallo!"

He slammed down the instrument. Crane was trying to burst open the door of the wardrobe cupboard as he went into the bed-room. Jenkins was packing a suitcase, and he asked him why he was doing it.

"We're leaving town, aren't we?" asked Jenkins.

"We may be leaving town," returned Lanyard, "but if we do it'll be after midnight to-day, and Mr. Crane will be buying the tickets."

Jenkins looked horrified.

"You're not going to be sentimental about keeping your word to Crane, are you?" he asked. "And if it's the girl, may I suggest that 'tis better to have loved and lost? Much better."

"Very good, Jenkins," said Lanyard, "but a trifle out of place."

"Then, sir, if you'll forgive my saying so, I humbly suggest that we scramble."

"You mean 'scram,' Jenkins. 'Scram.'"

"No one has greater faith in your ability than myself, sir, but it strikes me that a million dollars' worth of stolen jewellery in a large city is something like a needle in a haystack, if you follow me, sir. And we've just eleven hours and twenty minutes. Oh, I beg of you, sir!"

"Come on, Jenkins," said Lanyard calmly. "We're spending the afternoon housebreaking."

Obediently but reluctantly Jenkins got his bowler hat and accompanied his master from the flat to the elevator. Crane persisted with his efforts to burst open the door of the cupboard in which he had been imprisoned, but the door resisted those efforts for the better part of an hour, and by that time Lanyard and Jenkins were far away.

At two o'clock in the afternoon Geoffrey Mallison sprang up from an armchair in the sitting-room of a flat he and Liane had occupied ever since their arrival in New York City, and he faced the door with a gun in his hand because someone was turning the handle.

Morphew opened the door and looked round it.

"Put that down!" he commanded. "How—how'd I know it was you?" stammered Mallison, pocketing the gun.

"What's the matter with you?" Morphew entered the room, closed the door, and stood viewing his assistant with contemptuous eyes. "Gone all nervous?"

"Who wouldn't with all that jewellery about?" asked Mallison plaintively.

"Forgot it!" Morphew seated himself on a chesterfield and lit a cigarette. "By seven o'clock to-night we'll be on our way to Europe with nothing to worry about except getting seasick."

"Yes, but—but that Stewart collection's gonna be plenty hot," complained Mallison. "The police—"

"That's the Lone Wolf's worry. He's on the spot with the cops, not us. Besides, no one will connect us with the Stewart job when they find out who's going to Europe with us."

Mallison gaped at him.

"Who is going with us?" he asked. "Miss Marcia Stewart," was the reply. "The Miss Marcia Stewart. Liane will talk her into it; she's over with her now."

Morphew laughed cynically. "The poor girl's so upset about the whole thing she'll be glad to get away."

"Are you sure she'll fall for it?" asked Mallison dubiously.

"So sure," declared Morphew, "that I'm going out to buy an extra ticket right now. You'd better come along and I'll buy you a drink. You look as though you need one."

Liane at that moment was doing her best to persuade Marcia to return to Europe. She had been at the house in West One Hundred and Twentieth Street for some little time.

"Sitting at home brooding won't help matters any," she wheedled. "The sooner you leave the quicker you'll forget all this trouble. By the time we've finished with Biarritz and got to Nice it'll be hard even to remember what happened."

"It certainly sounds very interesting," admitted Marcia with a sigh.

Marcia Decides

DAYLIGHT had faded into twilight that evening when Lanyard walked briskly out of East Forty-Sixth Street into Fifth Avenue and found Jenkins waiting for him at the corner in the grey coupé.

"Any luck, sir?" inquired Jenkins, as his master got in beside him.

"No."

"Then now we've got to leave town, sir! You found nothing in Mr. Morphew's apartment, and now you've searched the Liane person's room, and that was our last hope."

"There's one more chance," said Lanyard, "though it's a slim one."

"The Grand Central Station is just two minutes from here, sir. It's so beautiful out of town at this time of year. The leaves are turning—and then there's the shooting. You need a rest. Please let's leave town."

A policeman was walking along the pavement in their direction, and cars were not permitted to park on the corner.

"Let's leave here first," said Lanyard; and Jenkins hurriedly started the coupé and joined the down-town stream of traffic.

"If you were thinking of Mr. Morphew's office at the Club Rendezvous, sir," said Jenkins, after a while, "I've

"EXCLUSIVE STORY"

The Numbers Racket

"FOUR HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-TWO AND five hundred and sixty-four," muttered the nigger. "My friend he want thirty-nine and one hundred and ninety-seven."

The nigger shoe-shine wrote the numbers down in a book and held out his hand. Money passed. The other two niggers grinned and went on their way.

The customer, who had had to wait whilst this business was transacted, was interested. Ace Acello was an Italian half-breed, brown-skinned, wiry of frame, cunning of expression, with eyes hard and mocking and a soft manner of speech.

"Sam," he drawled, "what was that pretty little game? Nothing to do with horse-racing?"

"No, sah," Sam chuckled. "Just an easy game, sah."

Acello took out a new five-dollar bill. "Tell me more about it, you black imp."

Sam took the note avidly.

"All black boys like gamble, sah. For a few cents dey buy numbers. If numbers sold they take other numbers. Some weeks all numbers sold and other weeks all numbers not sold. The boss shake der numbers and the winning number it get paid six hundred to one. About six prizes the boss give every week, sah. Sometimes winning number never sold and boss take most of der pool."

"Yeah, I bet that happens pretty often," chuckled Acello. "A cute racket, Sam."

Some half-hour later Acello met one of his cronies in a saloon and they repaired to a quiet corner.

"Most of the rackets in this burg are played out." Acello raised his narrow eyebrows. "Booze rackets, protection societies, gambling joints, smuggling Chinese and those easy-money games are played out. We've been up against it, Dan. The Press and the police have been running a campaign that ain't helped us any. Well, I got wise to-day to a racket that's so simple that it beats me no one ever thought of it. Money for nothing, and within the law."

"Spill it, Ace, I'm all of a fever," Dan demanded eagerly.

Quietly Acello explained the numbers racket that was so popular among the black inhabitants of Chicago.

"I know who is the black boss of this racket." Acello half-closed his eyes. "I think we can make him play ball."

The next day found Ace Acello in a down-town office. In a small room at a large mahogany desk sat a nigger. He was very fat and very greasy. He was dressed in a blue lounge suit minus the jacket, which was on a chair behind him, a stiff collar with bow tie, spats on his patent shoes, and smoked a smelly cigar. On the fat fingers glittered several diamond rings. He had listened in silence to Acello's proposition, and a sneering smile creased the thick-lipped mouth. Acello's proposition was that his company should take over the numbers racket and pay a comparatively small sum for the privilege.

"Well, what's the answer?" demanded Ace Acello. "Will you come in on the deal?"

"No!" The black boss spat out his words, and contemptuously puffed the smoke of his foul cigar in the other's face.

His action wrought a miraculous change. In a second Ace Acello had changed from a smooth, smiling man of business into a passion-distorted killer. On the table was a cut-glass water-jug. Acello picked this up and brought it down on the edge of the desk. Acello was skilled at tricks of this kind. He had broken off half of the jug, leaving an uneven surface of jagged glass. This he thrust forward until it was a few inches from the terrified nigger's face. Acello's expression was fiendish as he gripped the nigger's shoulder with his left hand.

"Now will you play ball?" he snarled out.

The black boss knew that refusal meant horrible mutilation. There was no time to shout for help, and if he did it would do little good, as a desperado of this character would have his men handy. Sick with fright he nodded his ugly fat head.

At once Acello's anger had vanished and he smiled. He put down the terrible weapon.

"I'm glad you've seen sense. I'll take over this joint this afternoon, and if you want to enjoy the rest of your days in peace don't try any funny business."

Acello took over the numbers racket and he did it on a much larger scale. He chose the number of people attending baseball meetings or race-tracks as the deciding factor, and when he did pay out made a great song about the fact, though often the winning number was never taken. The price of the numbers was half a dollar each, and a winner got as much as six thousand dollars—sometimes. Acello began to advertise in the papers, and got agents to sell his printed tickets. Publicity was his undoing.

One month after taking over from the black boss he sat in the same office with his partner Dan.

Acello was busy with pencil and paper.

"A very pretty little sum." He sat back and chuckled. "We've re-decorated this joint, hired agents, had stacks of tickets printed, advertised in the papers and spent a small fortune, and yet on the first month's working we show a profit of a thousand bucks. Next month the expenses will be less and the takings more. We're on a fortune, Dan, and—"

The door burst open suddenly and unexpectedly. Four men stood there. Thick-set, ugly customers, and their expressions were foreboding.

Acce Acello's eyes narrowed, but he tried not to betray his fear. He grinned broadly.

"Come in, gentlemen. This is indeed an honour."

The four men entered, and they closed the door. Dan stood up, and one of the men at once hit him in the mouth with a cruel blow. Dan tried to get up and was crashed back again.

A huge man of similar origin to Acello leered across the desk.

"We're hornin' in on this racket of yours."

"But this is my business!" shouted Acello. "I ain't tried to horn in on your district. This—"

The huge man lashed out and hit Acello in the face. The four men joined in, and by the time they were finished Acello was a bruised, pitiable wreck. His smart clothes were in rags, one eye was blackened, and blood trickled from a cut face.

The four men leered at him.

"You play ball with us?" demanded the spokesman.

Acello knew that to refuse meant death.

That afternoon the numbers racket became part of the business of Martin Werther, politician, financier, and at that time the Underworld King of Chicago, and Ace Acello just became one of the many pawns among his chessmen.

Ace Acello at once resigned himself to the inevitable. He valued his life, and Martin Werther did not believe in bumping off people that were useful to him. With his powers this numbers racket could be made a big thing, and if Acello would in his turn play ball he could receive a percentage on the takings.

Thus a month after the visit of Werther's men to Ace Acello one might have seen a number of men drinking champagne in a luxuriously appointed office.

Martin Werther was a tall, powerfully built man with high cheekbones and an aggressive jaw. His nose was large through having once been broken. He sat at his huge desk—the King of the Underworld. Round him were grouped his chief men. Werther had rons in many fires—race-track, gambling, baseball, night clubs, and anything shady. Ace Acello felt no grudge against Werther and thought himself privileged to be there as one of the king's right-hand men. He felt no grudge because he knew the meaning of fear.

Werther waited till everyone had slaked his thirst.

June 15th, 1936.

"We have spent a lot of money lately, and the takings have not been correspondingly high. Every man must speed up the business which he is running." He glanced at Acello. "There are a number of stores that want hotting up, Ace. Get busy on them."

"I'll beat 'em up," leered Acello.

"Chief"—one of his men acted as spokesman for the rest—"you've told us a lot about this paint racket that's going to make thousands. When you gonna spill it?"

"Not yet," Martin Werther rapped out. "I am not yet ready. Never spoil a thing by haste. That's why I need every cent. This paint requires money and organisation. Everything is progressing satisfactorily, but I need money. That's why I've sent for you boys." His face hardened. "So all of you get busy and put on the pressure."

Acello Uses Threats

THE next morning Ace Acello strolled into the small store owned by Michael Devlin. The old Irishman gave his visitor a nervous glance. Ace helped himself to a packet of chocolate biscuits and insolently perched himself on the counter.

"Hallo, Ace," muttered Devlin.

The crook looked round the empty store and munched complacently.

"Business seems a bit slack, Mike."

"Never much doing about this time of the day." The Irishman gave a wry grin. "May look up a bit later."

"You're not selling enough tickets," Ace mentioned, and did not bother to see the effect of his words. "You gotta do better."

"I do my best," was the irritable answer. "I can't force 'em to buy, can I?"

"You can encourage them." Tired of the biscuits, Ace tossed them on to the floor and selected a cigar from a glass case. "Your sales have fallen off badly of late, and yet this numbers game is a greater rage than ever." He did glance now at Devlin. "What's the reason?"

"Maybe they're going somewhere else?"

An excitable Italian rushed into the store and asked for a certain number, and Devlin said it was sold. Ace suggested that he'd look to make sure. The number was not sold. Reluctantly the storekeeper took the money.

"The prize money is being doubled this week—so I hear." Ace smiled pleasantly at the buyer. "There are also prizes for mystery numbers. Five hundred bucks each, and a dozen of 'em. My friend, you want to have more than one chance."

So the Italian bought three tickets and hurried away with dreams of avarice.

"I hinted that you might encourage custom—you discourage," Ace remarked when they were alone.

"Those numbers are nothing but a ramp," stormed old Devlin. "That man, I know, is out of work. His family is starving. He got that money to buy provisions, and he spends it instead on these cursed numbers." "Who cares?" Ace puffed at the cigar.

"You, for one, don't," snapped a voice.

Ace smiled round at an extremely pretty and clever-looking young woman. This was Ann Devlin, the storekeeper's daughter. She was a nurse attached to the personnel of a nursing-home.

"Hallo, Ann," drawled Ace. "How about making a date for to-night?"

"I heard what you were talking about and I saw old Mariano leave here. He babbled something to me about winning a fortune." Her eyes blazed defiance at Acello. "The poor wretch has already spent most of their savings on this dirty numbers racket."

Michael Devlin looked anxiously at his frank-spoken daughter. He had been lured into selling numbers when his business was bad, but when he wished to discontinue selling he was told by Ace that it would be a pity if his store should be burnt down with him inside it.

"You are not in a good mood, my beautiful one," mocked Ace.

"It should be somebody's business to put you and your gang of thieves where you belong!" Her eyes blazed contempt.

Ace Acello was roused.

"Those are pretty strong words, sister," he spoke slowly. "If you was to take my advice, you'd stay out of this." He smiled and looked at the white-faced storekeeper. "You keep on selling numbers, understand, Devlin? And keep your daughter out of this. Wouldn't it be a shame if something happened to her pretty face?" He helped himself to another cigar and slid off the counter. "Think it over, Devlin. I'll drop in again, Ann. Maybe you might like then to make a date with Ace." A wave of his hands and he was gone.

"The oily swine!" muttered old Devlin. "If only I were ten years younger."

Devlin sighed despondently. He would have to do what the racketeers ordered—keep on selling "numbers" to people who could not afford the money. They would not hesitate about injuring Ann if she aroused their enmity.

But Ann Devlin was not going to see her father bullied by men like Ace Acello, and she was not afraid of their threats. In that morning's issue of the "Chronicle" there was a front-page article exposing a city-paving graft. The story was the work of a reporter by the name of Timothy Higgins.

"Dad, don't look so dismal." She kissed her father. "Don't pay any heed to what that nasty piece of work says. He's small fry."

"I know, Ann," cried Devlin. "But the big shots are behind him. Men so powerful that they could burn up this city if they wished. What chance have you and I against them? Please, Ann, keep out of this. Ace likes you, and—"

The soft answer that turneth away wrath is something on the lines you mean," laughed Ann. "But if you expect me to kiss that mug, you're mistaken. Now, dad, I just got to run out for a moment. I've got to see about a little business."

"For the nursing-home?" he questioned sharply.

"How would it be anything else?" Her smile was so bright that he managed to smile back. "I'll be home for tea."

But when Ann Devlin was outside the little store she headed for the offices of the "Chronicle." Her face was very determined. These cheap crooks should feel the power of the Press.

The Climb-down

IN the editorial sanctum were five men. In the big swivel chair sat

James Witherspoon, editor of the "Chronicle." Sprawled in an armchair was Martin Werther, and on a seat beside him was Daniels, his attorney. The dark, handsome young man swinging a golf club and looking bored was Richard Barton, youthful counsel for the "Chronicle." The bullet-headed, thick-set young man standing near the editor's desk and looking as if he could murder someone was Timothy Higgins, special reporter.

Higgins was usually a good-natured and genial fellow, but he had been roused. He had carried out his editor's wishes in trying to expose the graft and corruption now rampant in the city. He had got a grand story about the paving-graft scandal, and now the editor was climbing down when Martin Werther threatened to bring an action. Werther was the contractor in the case.

"I shall bring a million-dollar libel suit on behalf of my client if an immediate apology is not published in the next issue," Daniels stated.

James Witherspoon turned a watery eye on his chief reporter. Could Higgins prove his statements? Higgins shouted loudly that what he had written was the truth, but he had to admit that his proof was not very strong.

At last, after a great deal of argument, the editor turned to the young fellow with the golf club.

"What's your opinion, Dick?" he answered, and then laughed. "Oh, I'm sorry. You mean this paving business. Personally, I think Higgins' article is correct. It's obvious that there's a distinctly bad odour to that paving deal."

"Is that final?" Daniels asked, with a glance at his chief.

"Oh, no." Barton shook his head. "I was merely expressing my personal opinion. As attorney for this newspaper, I'm forced to admit that Higgins' lack of positive proof does leave us open for a libel suit."

"Now you're talking sense," muttered Martin Werther with a triumphant grin. "I'm willing to be magnanimous in this matter. I admire the attempts of the 'Chronicle' to expose corruption, but not to blackguard innocent people like myself. Print an apology and there the matter will end."

"You'd better get busy on another story." The editor looked at Higgins. "I want all those statements in regard to Mr. Werther retracted. Get going, Higgins."

"I'll resign. That story's true, and I'm not taking back a word of it." Higgins was a stormy petrel. "I resign!" He stormed out of the editor's den.

"That'll be all right, Mr. Werther," the editor assured. "He'll write it. Dick, just go and have a word with Higgins, and tell him not to be more of an idiot than he looks."

It was unfortunate that Ann should choose that moment to enter the offices of the "Chronicle" and make her way towards the desk where Higgins worked.

Higgins slouched back to his desk and flung himself into a chair. Dick Barton perched himself on a radiator and grinned at the back of his friend's head.

"Tim, cool off," he murmured. "It's bad for your blood pressure. I know, Witherspoon knows, and lots of people know that every word of your story is true, but you haven't any proof. With proof, old Withy would back you to the last cent, and so would the owners. The fact that Werther is willing to accept a retraction shows that he isn't too keen on the case going to court. I think we'd win, but it would stir up a lot of mud, so it's best for both sides to lay off."

"What a spineless policy!" sneered Higgins. "Every self-respecting citizen wants to see this racket smashed up, and at the first attempt we cry off like a bunch of frightened kids. Now I gotta do a lot of mush about Martin Werther and eat humble pie. Say what a bad blunder I've made, and all the other papers will scream their heads off at Tim Higgins having to write an apology."

"No, they won't, Tim. They know as well as you do that the story is on the level, and they'll be mighty sorry to see the 'Chronicle' climb down," said Barton. "If we could have carried on they would have tried the same line. At any rate, I don't believe in stirring up hornets' nests. Safety first is my motto."

"And every day Werther and crooks like him gain in power till this city won't be fit for a pig," raved Higgins. "Why—"

"Excuse me," said a soft voice. Ann had grown tired of listening to their argument. She hated to hear people admit defeat.

Dick Barton glanced round and saw one of the most charming girls he had ever seen. He gave her a friendly smile.

"Well, what do you want?" snapped Higgins, still very ruffled.

"I've come about that story you printed in the 'Chronicle,'" began Ann. "As you've exposed this paving graft I thought you might like to do something about the numbers racket, and—"

"Lady, not another word," blazed Higgins. "Not another word. I've heard quite enough to-day about rackets. I'm through—in fact, I've just resigned."

"But aren't you Timothy Higgins? The man who wrote—"

"Yeah, I'm that unfortunate mortal," Higgins grinned angrily. "And if you want to know, I've now got to sit down and write a retraction of everything I said."

"But surely it was true what you printed?"

"What the heck difference does that make if you ain't got the proof?" He turned to his typewriter. "Lady, this lad is out of the crusade business. My efforts to clean up the city are not appreciated. I'm sorry, but you've had a wasted journey."

"My name is Ann Devlin, and my father owns a store." Ann looked at Barton for help. "He sells numbers and is forced to do it. I thought that if Mr. Higgins was starting a campaign against these crooks I might be able to give information—"

"Which you can't prove, and get me into a worse jam than before." Higgins swung round. "I got a wife and two kids to think about, and I'll sure lose my job if I try telling the truth. Lady, you're wasting all our time."

"Very nice of you to come forward, Miss Devlin," politely murmured Dick Barton. "But I would advise you to forget anything you know about this numbers racket. At any rate, for the time being. Mr. Higgins may get proof that will enable him to have another attempt at exposing the racketeers, and then he might like a talk with you. Maybe you could give him a card?"

Ann took a card from her handbag and placed it on Higgins' desk—mechanically he pocketed it. The girl looked at the two men as if she did not think very much of them.

"I don't expect to hear from either of you, and I think I've wasted my time," Ann said quietly. "It seems to me that the 'Chronicle,' that has done so much boasting about its principles, is a

"Now will you play ball?" he ground out.

worthless sort of rag. A turn-coat. Good-day!" Barton whistled softly as he stared admiringly after the girl. "There's spirit. I don't think, old pal, she's crazy about either of us."

"I'll go crazy if you don't leave me to write this cursed story," Higgins muttered. "In future I'm sticking to news, and if this city has got to be saved from going to the dogs, then let somebody else do it."

Ann went home in not a very good frame of mind. A couple of weak-kneed specimens she termed Barton and Higgins. Thinking of themselves first, and seared stiff at the first sign of trouble. She reached there just as a special edition of the "Chronicle" was on the streets. She bought a copy, and read with a bitter smile Higgins' apology and retraction.

It was a surprise to find her father all smiles and to notice a number of good things on the table.

"I've sold the store, Ann," her father cried.

"Oh, dad, I'm so glad." Ann flung her arms round his neck. "Who to?"

Michael Devlin hesitated. "Steve Comos."

"Comos?" The girl frowned. "Comos? Isn't that the man who tried to start a rival numbers scheme?"

"Sure, that's the man, but I don't know his business." Pa Devlin shrugged his shoulders. "I know he's an enemy of Acello. They were partners once and one double-crossed the other, but I ain't knowing a thing about it. Comos wants to muscle in on this numbers racket, and he's buying up a few places which he reckons he can use. He ain't scared of Acello and the others and he aims to sell his numbers from this store. That lets us out, honey."

"Are you sure, dad?"

"I ain't bound to stay here, loosing good money or refusing good offers, but while I'm here I gotta do what Acello orders as I'm a sort of agent. I don't know Comos' business, and if they say anything I just state that I've handed over to a new man. I asked six thousand for the store, and I've got three. We were loosing money fast, so it's a fair price. With that three thousand and my pension, honey, we can take a nice little vacation."

"You shall go on a cruise, pop," smiled Ann. "Ever since you retired from the Navy you've been itching to get back." She glanced at several models of sailing-ships and battleships that her father had carved and made. "You'll be able to walk the deck again."

At seven that night there was a ring at the bell.

"That'll be Comos with the money," cried Devlin. "He's early."

"I'll go and let him in," cried Ann.

Ann opened the door and gave a scream of horror as a figure swayed forward and sprawled full-length on the floor. It was the bullet-riddled body of Steve Comos. When Devlin rushed downstairs and saw the body a face flashed into his mind. He seemed to see the hideous, leering features of Ace Acello.

Timothy Higgins was playing with his two boys, aged six and four, whilst his attractive, pleasant-featured wife sewed and watched her husband crawling about the floor. A battle with model forts and soldiers was in progress. The telephone-bell shrilled.

"If that's the office they can ring till June 13th, 1936."

they're blue in the face," shouted Higgins. "I've done all the crawling—save on the floor here—that I'm doing this day. Answer it, Nell."

"Do your own dirty work," laughed his wife.

Higgins picked up the 'phone and heard the voice of Ann Devlin.

"What?" his wife heard him gasp out. "Steve Comos! I'll be round in five seconds. Listen, girl, not a word to the cops till I show up." He banged down the receiver and looked all round for his hat. "Gee, what a front-page story!"

"So you've changed your tune now a story has turned up." Tim's wife knew her man. "Who's the girl this time?"

"A blonde." Tim had found his hat and coat. He kissed his wife. "Back some time, old dear. Don't wait up for me. This may be the big thing in my life." He rushed out of the room, and his wife smiled as she heard him going down the stairs three at a time.

"Are You a Coward?"

THE sleuth in Timothy Higgins was aroused. He had hated having to retract on his paving-graft scandal, but in the killing of Steve Comos he had a grand front-page story. Witherspoon allowed him to play the story for all it was worth, as it helped to cover up the apology to Martin Werther. After seeing Ann and hearing the reason why Comos had wanted to buy the store he was convinced that in this girl he might gather information that might prove of great value.

In order to have a quiet talk with Ann he invited her to have supper with him at the most exclusive of clubs—the Pandora—on the evening following the shooting.

Over an excellent supper Ann told Timothy all she knew about the numbers racket and Ace Acello, winding up with the rivalry of Steve Comos.

"Ace ran the numbers racket on his own once," stated Timothy. "But we know the big shots are behind him these days. They must have kept a close tab on Comos and known his every move."

"Have the police any clue to the killing?"

"No, ma'am." Higgins shook his head. "If there were any witnesses they're far too scared to come forward, because to do so means finish for them. This bunch sticks at nothing. This killing has roused a wave of indignation, and I've got the okay from the editor to write articles demanding a clean-up of Chicago. I bet the gang will keep mighty quiet till this blows over, and it's my job to keep the affair alive. Still, we can't do any more for the moment, so let's dance."

When they left the dance floor they had to pass a table just occupied by some newcomers. Dick Barton, James Witherspoon jun., the editor's son, and a fashionably garbed, beautiful, but somewhat disagreeable young woman. Jim saw Higgins and hailed him.

"Hallo, Tim, you old scoundrel."

Timothy Higgins grinned and gestured towards Ann.

"Miss Devlin, this is James Witherspoon, my boss's son. Some day he'll inherit me and a lot of other junk."

Gallant young Witherspoon jumped up.

"And this is Miss Tess Graham, Miss Devlin. Won't you join our party?"

Dick Barton found a chair for Ann on his right side. He stared at her admiringly. She had been quite attractive when he had seen her at the "Chronicle" offices, but in this well-cut but simple white satin evening dress she looked stunning. Tess Graham, who was engaged to Dick, curled her lips ever so slightly. Then she regarded Higgins with a sarcastic smile on her red lips.

"I thought you were a married man, Mr. Higgins."

Higgins chuckled. "I wonder who starts such rumours?"

Ann laughed gaily.

"It's all right. He's shown me the picture of his wife and his two sons. This is strictly business."

Barton stared at her with open amusement.

"I see you finally sold him in on your crusade, Miss Devlin."

"It's a good one, isn't it?"

Barton gave a dubious shake of his head.

"Tim'll probably get the sheet involved in a libel suit and then I'll have to go to work."

"You'll probably advise us to retract," retorted Higgins.

Barton smiled in his lazy way. "Isn't it a lot of fuss to make over nickel-and-dime gambling?"

At once Ann Devlin stiffened and her pretty features underwent a change. She regarded him with open scorn.

"Perhaps there is something funny about people being robbed and bullied and murdered." She spoke fiercely. "But I guess I haven't your sense of humour, Mr. Barton."

Dick Barton still smiled, but it was a sickly grin. He was a spoilt young man, and not used to being spoken to in this frank manner. The part that annoyed him was that he knew this frank-eyed young beauty was justified in her scorn.

"Look, Dick!" Young Witherspoon leaned eagerly forward. "Dad's getting the Governor to appoint a special prosecutor in the numbers racket. Why not you?"

"That's not an idea. That's a below-the-belt blow," Dick drawled with a twisted grin. "Besides being opposed to unproductive work in all forms, I have no desire to have underworld characters popping at me with machine-guns."

"Quite right, Dick," cried Tess, with a defiant glance round the table. "I don't want Dick mixed up in a mess like that. It's a silly suggestion."

"I can think of sillier things," Ann said quietly.

"What, for instance?" Tess asked, her eyes unfriendly.

"Being too lazy or indifferent to do one's duty."

Barton grinned at the open antagonism of young Ann. He still smiled.

"I can see that Miss Devlin is one of my staunchest admirers," he commented.

"Well, you ought to do something to earn your salt," Higgins said in his direct way. "Think of the publicity and what it'll do for your future."

"Dick doesn't have to worry about his future," indignantly spoke Tess.

"When we're married he's going to handle my father's estate."

"Besides," Ann added with a nasty little smile, "you've got to think of the machine-guns, Mr. Barton."

Dick was nettled by the scorn in her voice.

"Are you suggesting, dear lady, that I'm a coward?"

"Oh, no, Mr. Barton," mocked Ann.

"If I collected autographs of heroes I'd have you on page one."

Barton looked round the table and tried to read the expressions of Timothy and young Witherspoon. He decided that they looked decidedly doubtful. Tess looked anxious, and he knew the reason. She was, like himself, a spoilt child—one that considered herself before

"Dick, you can't go!" cried Tess Graham wildly. "I won't let you. It's too dangerous!"

anyone else. She wouldn't care what happened to anyone provided he was safe and she didn't have to suffer. He frowned—maybe that was love, and maybe it wasn't. Finally he looked at Ann Devlin. The cool, calm gaze from her beautiful blue eyes settled the argument.

"Well, just to surprise you all, I'll take that job. No one is going to doubt the courage of the Bartons. What do you think of that, Miss Devlin?"

"I think it's grand." Now those eyes were brimming over with admiration, and Dick Barton had a thrill that made him look speculatively at his fiancée. Tess seemed to him at that moment like a dark wild-cat.

It was a pleasant evening, but soon after midnight Ann insisted upon Timothy taking her home. She did not want to leave her father alone too long. The Comos affair had made the old man very jumpy.

Ann got home to find her father extremely merry—in fact, he confessed that he was a trifle tipsy.

"I've sold the business."

"What, again?" Ann was surprised.

"Yes, and I got four thousand," chuckled Michael Devlin. "No funny business about this. I looked in at the Marine Club like I told you, and a Captain Martin was introduced to me. We got talking, and finally he told me that maybe he could do something about selling the store. Not only did he sell the store for me, but I'm going back to sea." He seized his daughter's hands and waltzed her round. "That surprises you, don't it?"

"Not to serve as a mate?"

"Sort of caretaker job," gasped Michael, pausing for breath. "The man that bought the store does a lot of business in Cuba, and he's hired me to take charge of a shipment of paint that's to go on the steamer Mochado next week. I'm to deliver it personally to a man in Havana. At Havana I shall receive goods, which I have to bring back. Ann, it's like taking a cruise with everything found. Gee, ain't we lucky?"

"When do you leave?"

"In a few days, Ann," her father told her. "Will you be all right, my dear?"

"Don't you worry about me, dad." Ann kissed him. "Our luck certainly has turned."

It is never wise to count one's chickens before they are hatched, or to talk of luck until absolutely certain that fortune has changed. If Ann and her father had known more about that consignment of paint they would not have been so happy that night.

Ship on Fire

MICHAEL DEVLIN sailed on the s.s. Mochado, and there was one small incident that was disturbing at the time but was soon forgotten. Timothy Higgins and Dick Barton had accompanied Ann to the docks, and they were waving farewell to her father as the gangways were being removed when Higgins thought he saw Ace Acello come out of the hold and leave by a staff gangway. Higgins rushed forward and darted among the crowds, but he returned to say that they must have been mistaken.

The incident was forgotten. Actually they had seen Ace Acello leave the Mochado.

A very pleasant fortnight passed for Ann. Timothy liked her, and Mrs. Higgins had no objection to her husband taking the girl to one or two places of amusement. Dick Barton usually joined them, with Tess. As Ann was so eager to help in the campaign against the racketeers, Higgins managed to secure for her a job on the "Chronicle," as his assistant. Tess was not too pleased, as this meant that Barton saw rather too much of Ann for her liking.

Then one evening there came through a message that the s.s. Mochado, on her return trip, was on fire off Cape Hatteras and ablaze from stem to stern.

A white-faced Ann hastened to the offices of the "Chronicle," where she found the reporter hard at work.

"The Mochado's on fire, Tim," she said in distressed tones.

"Lucky for you it didn't happen on the voyage out," was his answer. "She has eighty-five passengers on board and is in a bad way. The fishing-boat Addie is reported fifty miles from the stricken ship. I'm doing a story now. Why are you crying, Ann?"

"Dad cabled me he had some trouble and was coming back on it." Ann sank into a chair. "What can we do, Tim?"

"Gosh, your pop on that boat!" Higgins gave her shoulder a sympathetic touch. "Well, don't worry yet. It may not be so bad."

The next radio message reported that the Mochado was a mass of flames, but the Addie was within a mile of the blazing ship, and would attempt to get alongside. The city editor appeared and shouted at Higgins to write up an exaggerated story of eighty-five people trapped in a blazing inferno. It would sell the "Chronicle" like hot cakes.

"This girl's father is on that boat." Higgins pointed to Ann. "So you won't get any inferno from me."

"I'm sorry." The city editor turned to Ann. "Say, have you got a photograph of your father at home?" She nodded. "Good, I'll send a boy for it if you'll give me the key."

Dick Barton had been out to a night club, and was thinking of leaving when he heard from one of the attendants of the fire on the Mochado. He suggested to Tess that they go along to the offices of the "Chronicle" and get the full story. Tess tried to make reasons for not going, but he waved them to one side. After a great fight she had persuaded Dick that his first duty was to her first and the community last, and he had agreed not to accept the post of District Attorney, which had been offered him. He arrived at the "Chronicle" offices to find bustle and excitement, and to hear with horror that Michael Devlin was on the Mochado.

The "Chronicle" was on the 'phone to the coastguard station. The Mochado was ablaze, but owing to fog it was impossible to give the exact location.

"We'll have to handle it from here," decided the city editor. "This is a big story, and we want to put it over big. Send someone out in an aeroplane. Get pictures! Do something!"

One of the sub-editors came rushing up to report that the coastguard station did not think anybody could be alive on the Mochado, as there had been no messages for over an hour.

"Higgins, take a cab to the airport," decided the city editor. "The 'plane'll be waiting to fly over the Mochado. Steve! Steve! Where's the photographer?"

A man in shirt-sleeves dived out of a room.

"There aren't any left, chief. You sent 'em out to get pictures of that train derailment."

"You can't handle a camera by yourself, Higgins." The city editor looked at the chief reporter. "What a chance for a scoop, and just because there ain't any gosh-darned—"

"How's the chances of horning in on this?" quietly spoke Barton. "I won prizes at college for photography." He glanced at the bowed figure of Ann Devlin. "I could take these pictures."

"Good for you, Barton," grinned the city editor, and bellowed for someone to bring a camera.

A boy appeared with a camera. "Sure you know how to handle this?" cried the city editor.

"Absolutely, chief." Barton squared his shoulders. It was a tonic to see the admiring looked that flashed from Ann Devlin's eyes. There was something in this hero stuff. Pity he had to turn down that job as D.A. How would Ann take it?

"Dick, you can't go!" Tess Graham rushed up to him and clutched at Barton's arm. "I won't let you. It's too dangerous!"

"Dangerous my eye! I've been up in the "Chronicle" 'plane a dozen times." He spoke a little defiantly. "It's the safest crate in town. I'm just going along for the ride. Now, don't you worry, Tess. If there were room enough I'd take you along, too."

Higgins got in touch with his wife, and that sweet woman insisted upon getting into a car and coming over to the office at once. She was glad Tim was going, because it was his duty, but she wanted to be at the office so she could hear how the night flight got on. It would not be possible to sleep when Tim was in danger. They waited till she arrived, then Tim and Dick left.

"The old girl will take care of Ann and Tess," Timothy panted as they raced down the stairs. "She'll be as worried as either of 'em, but she'll just smile to hide her anxiety."

Barton and Higgins got to the airport. They donned flying togs and each man was fitted with a parachute. They clambered into the 'plane, and the pilot took off down-field.

After two hours' flying the pilot pointed and they saw a red glow far below. It was the Mochado. The machine planed down through wisps of fog, and after a while they got a better view of the blazing ship. The stern was a roaring furnace, but the bow was not alight yet. The fog suddenly lifted and they got some wonderful pictures. They flew low and Dick managed to secure one of the large fishing steamer Addie, trying to get alongside the bow, June 13th, 1936.

where a number of people were waving their hands and screaming for help.

"We've got enough pictures," yelled Higgins. "Let's go home."

"Just one more," yelled back Barton. "I want to get people jumping from the Mochado to the Addie."

The pilot brought the machine round in a quick turn. Barton had handed the plates he had taken to Higgins, and now he leaned over the side to get a picture that would be a startler. He undid his waist-strap in order to lean farther over still, and at that moment a gust of wind or an air pocket caused the ship to roll. Dick Barton and camera slid over the side. Luckily his groping hands caught a guy wire, and he hung, dangling, in mid-air.

Dick knew he could only hold on for a few seconds.

"Let go and pull the ring!" bellowed Higgins.

Dick dropped and then jerked the ring of the parachute's rip-cord. He felt himself pulled up with an enormous jerk. Quickly he was dropping now towards the sea and the blazing Mochado. Higgins and the pilot saw the parachute flop into the water. The reporter gave a cheer as he saw the Addie appear out of the gloom and saw the white blob that was the parachute dragged to the side of the fishing steamer. The pilot hastened back to the city, and Tess Barton fainted when she heard the news.

The Mochado Fire

DICK was lifted on board, and except for the unpleasantness of wet clothes, was not hurt in the least. Providence had flung him out of that 'plane. He must try to get on board the Mochado and rescue old Michael Devlin.

The Addie came slowly near the blazing wreck. The heat was tremendous. He saw several people with their clothes alight leap into the sea. As the Addie drew nearer and nearer the bow of the Mochado, the people clustered there seemed to go mad with fear and excitement. They fought like wild beasts to get close to the rails. The crew were trying to keep order, but it seemed quite hopeless. Twice they heard the crack of a gun. Before the Addie touched, several people leapt, and several misjudged and fell screaming horribly into the sea.

The captain of the Addie had told his crew to hurry everyone aft as they scrambled aboard. That would enable the rescue work to proceed quickly, because it would be impossible to stay more than a few minutes, as otherwise his own ship might catch fire.

Barton had told the captain that he would volunteer for any work, and was detailed to assist the crew. Eagerly he scanned the faces of the people that swarmed aboard the Addie, but he saw no sign of Michael Devlin. Someone shouted that several passengers were trapped down in the cabins. Dick leapt from the Addie on to the deck of the Mochado. Several of the seamen bravely followed his example.

So fierce were the flames that already one of the life-boats swinging from the davits of the Addie had been licked by the flames and was blazing. Several men rushed along the deck. They were mad with fear and screamed horribly to be let pass. One man tried to fell Barton with a life-preserver. Dick landed two or three punches, and that checked that mad rush. There were still some women and children to be helped aboard the Addie—these scum could wait.

"Where's your captain?" Barton shouted at one of the crew of the Mochado. "Are there any officers to control this mob?"

"The captain's dead," was the answer. "The other officers were the first to quit. I'm bos'n. There are one or two trapped below."

"I'll go with you," cried Barton. They dived into the smoke.

"Hurry! Hurry!" the captain of the Addie was yelling. "My boat'll catch fire. Hurry! Hurry!"

Down in the second-class saloon they almost fell over the sprawled figure of a man who groaned feebly. Barton managed to lift the body on to the seaman's shoulder.

"I'm all right," the sick man muttered. "Save the old man over there." Feebly he pointed. "He saved Pete and Hans, and was trying to help me when the smoke overcame us both. Over there—old man Devlin."

"Devlin!" gasped Barton. "I'll get him!"

"You can't make it!" cried the seaman.

"I've got to go. You take this fellow up and send help if you can."

The seaman staggered up the stairs, now well alight, and finally got through the smoke to the bow. The Addie was about to cast off as two of her boats were alight. Willing hands relieved the seaman of his burden.

"They're all out!" shouted someone.

"Cast off!" ordered the captain.

"Wait! Wait!" hoarsely panted the seaman. "Two men are below deck!"

"I've got to think of my ship and the passengers," the captain yelled back.

"I'll have a small boat stand by."

In that hell of flame and smoke Dick Barton groped round till he found the prone figure of Michael Devlin and managed to get the heavy body across his shoulders. As he reached the stairs the Addie backed slowly away from the blazing Mochado.

The pilot got Higgins safely back to the airport, and the reporter rushed off to the offices of the "Chronicle" to report all that had occurred. Tess made an awful scene and swore that Dick had been killed and that it was all Higgins' fault. It was Mrs. Higgins who managed to calm the distressed girl.

On the teletype the names of the survivors came through, and Michael Devlin and Dick Barton were not on the list. Ann bit her lip and tried to be brave, but Tess sobbed like a child.

An hour passed and then a boy came in with a radio message. It was from Barton.

"Dick's safe and so is your father," Higgins shouted to Ann. "They've been picked up by the Addie. I'll read out Dick's message."

"Devlin saved two lives and then got trapped. I got him out. What he told me of reasons behind fire will melt your presses. Tell Witherspoon I withdraw resignation and will prosecute numbers gang to the limit."

Higgins finished reading out the message and stared in bewilderment at the city editor.

"What in the world could the fire have to do with the numbers gang?"

A Callous Crime

NATURALLY there was a large crowd present when the survivors of the Mochado were landed. Dick Barton seemed a changed young man. The fact that he had done something rather big had been like a tonic to him. He realised he had been lazy and useless. The chance to make a name for himself had come and he was seizing it with both hands.

"Mr. Barton"—Ann gave him a glance that thrilled—"I won't even try to thank you. There are no words."

Dick grinned like a schoolboy.

"If you have any, use them on your father," was his answer. "He's the bravest man I know."

"Say, Dick," interrupted Higgins. "What did you mean by that message about the numbers racket gang?"

Barton was serious at once.

"I'll tell you later." He turned to Devlin, who seemed strangely quiet. "Will you come to the 'Chronicle' office when you get a change of clothes?"

"Yes, I'll be there."

Ann drove her father home to the new apartments she had rented, and he answered all her questions in monosyllables. Even when she showed him the room that was to be his den he took little interest in the carpenter's bench—he adored making model ships. He grinned and looked away.

"Something's worrying you, darling?"

Michael Devlin did not answer at once, but walked up to the bench where Ann had placed some of his models of windjammers. Viciously he knocked one to the floor and stared at it balefully. "Boats!" he muttered.

"Pops! Pops!" Ann was alarmed. "What is it?"

"You want to know what's the matter with me? I'll tell you. I'm responsible for the deaths on the Mochado. That's what!"

"You're out of your head."

"Oh no I'm not." His face seemed haggard with despair. "I might have known that Acello and his gang would be in on that paint deal. Only it wasn't paint."

"What do you mean—not paint?"

"It was liquid fire. They were selling it to be used in a labour fight in Havana," he told her. "I didn't know it till I got there. The agent was drunk, he thought I was one of the gang, and told me all about it. The police became suspicious and the agent refused to accept the shipment. It had to come back. I didn't dare tell the captain what it was. I let them pile it on the rest of the cargo. The liquid fire got loose, and you know the rest. I told it to Mr. Barton and that's why he wants to see me. Now do you understand why I'm responsible for all that's happened?"

"Go and see Mr. Barton," Ann said after a moment's quiet thought. "He'll tell you you're not to blame. I know he will."

"I'm going to see him—it's the only thing I can do." He picked up the model from the floor. "I'll look in on Mr. Castello's son. The kid is sick and might like it. I'll drop it in on my way up town. I won't want it any more. I hope I never see another ship."

"Go at once." Ann fetched his raincoat. "It's eight o'clock, pops, and I'll have a nice supper ready by the time you return."

Clutching the model, Michael Devlin went out into the storm and slowly made his way up town. Behind stalked a menacing shadow.

At the offices of the "Chronicle" Barton had been recounting to Higgins the dramatic story of the burning of the Mochado. This story would appear in a special edition. Then he went on to explain his reasons for his message about the numbers racket.

"That's why I want a deposition from Devlin," he concluded. "Once I have legal proof I can give you a story that'll rock this city from stem to stern."

They had been discussing the affair for some time when Barton looked at a clock. Devlin was taking his time getting there. An hour passed, and Barton was just thinking of ringing Ann when the 'phone-bell shrilled.

It was a police message. Barton hung up.

"They murdered Devlin," Barton said slowly. "Shot down."

"Any arrests?" shouted Higgins.

"No, and no witnesses." Barton sunk limply into a chair and stared unseeingly at the floor. "We've got to tell Ann."

Ann knew directly the two men came into her apartments that something was wrong. The expressions on their faces told. Very white and trembling was Ann when she had heard how the gang had murdered her father.

"With your father's deposition I could have acted quickly," Barton told her angrily. "Now I'm afraid it's going to be a long, hard fight. I'll have to ask you to do your part. Will you come to my office to-morrow and tell me everything that might help?"

"Best come along to my place, Miss Devlin," suggested the reporter. "Mrs. Higgins will be mighty glad to have you."

The next morning the "Chronicle's" front page was splashed with bold headlines:

"RACKETEERS LINKED WITH MOCHADO FIRE. WAR TO THE FINISH DECLARED BY BARTON SENSATION PROMISED IN NEW CRIME DRIVE."

The Bomb and the Bombshell

REPORTERS from all the papers in the city came to see Dick Barton in the morning. They had to get an interview with the new D.A. and find out his views, to get a line on his crime drive, and to curry favour many brought gifts from their editors and themselves. Cigars, cigarettes, bottles of champagne, and even flowers. Some one even mailed a square packet, which Barton had not had time to open.

Finally the reporters were told the interview was at an end. Only three people remained. Dick Barton, Timothy Higgins and Detective-lieutenant Jim O'Neill.

Dick poured himself out a long drink. "Thank heavens that's over." He raised his glass to O'Neill. "Nice of the chief to send you along as a body-guard, but it was quite unnecessary."

"That looks rather like an electric chair," bit out Barton. "You'd look natural in the hot seat. Ace, we've got you right where we want you!"

"When you know the underworld as I do you'll think different." O'Neill gave an ominous shake of his head. "Desperate men will go to any extremes, especially if they look like being cornered."

"What's in that?" Higgins pointed to the square packet.

"Cigars, I expect." Barton reached out a hand and unwrapped the packet. "Hallo, a cardboard box." He held it to his ear. "Darn me if someone hasn't sent me a cloek."

"What?" shouted O'Neill. The officer leapt across the room, snatched the box from the surprised Barton and rushed across to a bucket of iced water that had been brought in for the champagne. They saw him submerge the gift.

"He's nuts!" Barton whispered to Higgins.

O'Neill made no answer, but hastened across to a small wash-basin. He filled a jug and poured a lot of water over the packet.

"Into the next room." O'Neill spoke sharply. "Come on—questions later. Get going!"

They obeyed in bewilderment.

"You may think me crazy, but I hate presents that tick." O'Neill gave a twisted grin. "I think you'll be surprised when you see the contents of that box."

Some ten minutes later Dick Barton found himself staring at the contents of that packet. There was a cloek right enough, but wires and tubes were attached to it. A time bomb.

"Phew!" Barton gasped out. "That was a close shave."

Ann arrived for her interview, and the first thing she saw was the now useless bomb. It looked sinister, so she asked what it could be.

"It seems that our friends, the racketeers, decided another little murder wouldn't do any harm," he told her with grim humour. "They picked me for it. It was all nicely wrapped up and mailed to me. When I opened it the thing began to tick. And, thanks to my bodyguard, who dumped it into water; it didn't go off."

"Thank heavens for that!" Ann cried, and in her anxiety she looked at him in a manner that caused the young man to leap forward and seize her hands.

"Would it mean so much—to you?" Ann looked away, then gently released her hands.

"Aren't you forgetting something? A lady, for instance?"

"Yeah, I'm forgetting that a long time ago a couple of families made a lot of plans and I took them for granted." He gave a sigh. "I'm sorry, Ann."

"There's nothing to be sorry about." She managed a smile. "Didn't you want to ask me some questions about the numbers racket?"

"I'll find Higgins." Barton rang a bell. "You're very brave to help. I'll try not to ask too many questions."

When Ann had told all she knew Higgins gave a shake of his head and glanced at Barton. She had told them a grand story, but it lacked proof. The phone-bell rang, and with a frown of annoyance Barton picked up the receiver. Ann and Higgins saw the startled look in Dick's eyes. After a while Dick spoke:

"All right, all right, but wait a minute—" He jerked the telephone bracket vigorously. "Try and trace that call."

"What's the matter?" questioned Ann.

"They've kidnapped Tess," Barton June 13th, 1936.

told them. "They got her last night. They have given me five days to drop my investigation. If I don't, they say I'll never see her again."

"What are you going to do?"

Barton gave a despairing gesture.

"Well, what would you do? I've got to quit, of course."

"You're not going to let them get away with this, too?" Ann's voice had hardened.

"Well, what else can I do?"

"Well, you can fight, can't you? You've got five days, haven't you? Can't you do something in that time?"

Barton looked at her as if she did not understand.

"But they've got Tess."

"And they got my father, too!" Ann's voice was hoarse and her eyes were blazing. "They got Steve Comos and they got those fourteen people on the Mochado. There's no telling how many more they'll get. Wouldn't Miss Graham be willing to sacrifice a few days of her freedom in order to help end this murder racket? Do you propose to fight back, or act like a jellyfish?"

"You have an uncanny way of getting through my thick skin," Barton told her sharply. "I'll not have anyone call me a jellyfish."

"Then you're not going to quit?"

"Not for four days, at least."

The Dope Victim

IT was the morning of the fourth day. Barton had done everything possible, but they had not been able to find where Tess had been taken. They could not find out who had killed Devlin, and it looked as if the D.A. would have to abandon his crusade.

"Can't think what's become of Ann," Barton muttered gloomily. "That girl always has a lot of sound ideas, but she seems to have lost interest. I haven't seen her for two days. I've phoned her several times, but she has been out. Can't understand her."

There was a rap at the door and a messenger entered. Barton opened a letter and stared across at Higgins.

"This comes from the Bellevue Hospital. Ann wants to see us there at once."

"Let's not waste time thinking—let's scram!" cried the practical reporter.

They were shown into a private ward and there they found Ann seated beside the bedside of a patient—a dark-skinned man, who moaned and tossed restlessly. Higgins gripped Barton's arm. "It's Ace Acello," he whispered.

"What's the matter with him?" Barton whispered to Ann.

"He got an overdose of dope."

"Dope!" Barton exclaimed. "How did he get hold of the stuff?"

"I gave it to him," was the calm answer. "I expect you may have wondered where I've been the last two days. When I realised that we were getting nowhere and time was urgent, I decided on a desperate means to an end. Ace Acello always tried to flirt with me when he came into my father's store. He gave me a restaurant where he often dined. I found him there and renewed our acquaintance."

"Gosh, I admire your pluck." Barton stared at her with awe. "But you with this swine—it's horrible to think about."

"I was very elusive." Her smile was hard. "I made him think it was just a chance meeting. I told him that I thought my father had been killed by one of the Comos gang, because they thought dad was responsible for their leader's death. To have been very friendly would have made him sus-icious, but I allowed myself to be persuaded into dining with him last night. Now you know how he got doped. Got him here about two in the morning as a fever case. I worked for a doctor, so I knew the ropes. When I saw signs he was coming round I sent for you—people under dope often talk."

"Has he talked yet?"

"Not a thing, except burbling a lot of meaningless words and names," Ann said with a gloomy sigh.

Acello began to mutter, but all his incoherent talk was worthless, and except for crying Ann's name, did little else but groan.

"How long will it take him to come out of this?" Barton asked after a while.

"In about three or four hours he will be normal."

"When he does he'll be all shot to pieces, won't he?" Barton asked, and Ann nodded. "It gives me an idea. An idea that with my authority I can carry through. It's a desperate chance, but worth trying. Tim, fetch in O'Neill. We've got to get this guy up to my apartments."

"What are you planning to pull off?" Higgins wanted to know.

"A stunt to make this crook talk," answered Barton. "Go fetch O'Neill, and jump to it."

Desperate Measures

WHEN Ace Acello recovered his senses he found himself in a room with several men, obviously plain-clothes detectives, guarding him. When he cursed and railed and demanded why he was there no one answered him.

At last big O'Neill marched into the room and gave a significant gesture. Two men seized Acello and yanked him to his feet. The crook cursed and O'Neill struck him violently in the face with a clenched fist.

"I'll cut your ears off for that, copper!" snarled Ace.

They dragged Ace into the next room and flung him into a chair. He glared round and saw at an open doorway Ann and Higgins, and at sight of the girl a cruel grin showed.

"So you double-crossed me, sister, eh?" he leered. "When these mugs —"

O'Neill struck him again, and now Ace Acello cowered back.

"Going to try to beat me up, are you?" he rasped. "When I get through with you flatfoots there won't be much of you—" His voice trailed away, because Barton had appeared. The young attorney carried leather thongs.

"What are those for?" He started out of the chair.

Roughly Barton hurled him back, and then men seemed to converge on Ace from all quarters. He struggled futilely as they pinioned his arms, and then he was strapped up securely.

"I might have known you wasn't on the square!" Acello shouted defiantly at Ann. "You wait till I get out of this!"

"If!" significantly interrupted Barton, and grinned down at his victim. "That looks rather like an electric chair. You'd look natural in the hot seat. Ace, we've got you right where we want you."

"You can't bluff me!" Ace cried, but beads of perspiration stood out on the crook's forehead.

"Did I say anything about bluffing? Why do you think I had you brought here?" asked Barton.

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

Read This First

A strange planet, hitherto unknown, has shifted from its orbit and loomed into the view of the peoples of the earth. It is the planet Mongo, and its overlord is Ming, a sinister figure who has probed the fundamental secrets of Nature.

Dr. Zarkov, an American scientist, sets out in a rocket ship to penetrate the stratosphere. He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart, but they reach the new planet only to be seized by Ming.

Flash and Dale escape with the aid of Aura, Ming's daughter, who is attracted by Flash. They are also assisted by Thun, a prince whose father rules a territory on Mongo which has not yet been subdued by Ming.

Dale and Thun, however, are captured and carried off by winged men in the pay of King Vultan, who dominates an amazing sky-city poised thousands of feet above the surface of the great planet.

Meanwhile, Zarkov finds an ally in Barin, rightful heir to the throne that Ming occupies. They locate Flash and Aura, and in Zarkov's rocket ship they make for King Vultan's sky-city in the hope of rescuing Dale Arden and Thun.

But as they approach Vultan's aerial stronghold a powerful ray is directed upon them from a lofty turret, and with its mechanism paralysed the rocket ship falters, then drops at an amazing speed towards death and destruction!

EPISODE 6:—
"Flaming Torture"

In Vultan's Power

THE ray that had struck the rocket ship had left the occupants of the machine unscathed. It was clear that it did not affect the human body. But it had rendered the motor of the craft useless, and to Flash and his companions this in itself spelled disaster and death.

For the vessel was falling, plunging swiftly to destruction upon the stones of that wondrous and uncanny city of the skies which lay below.

Flash and the others were thrown together in a heap and lay huddled in the forward portion of the ship as it nose-dived through the void. But suddenly the rapidity of the machine's descent was checked, and the motor became audible again sputteringly.

The ship seemed to level itself, and, unable to guess the reason for this occurrence, Flash and Zarkov struggled to their feet. And the instant they looked out through the windows the truth dawned upon them.

The vessel had dropped out of the ray that had been trained on it from the palace turret, and since the light-beam was no longer focused upon it, it appeared as if the craft might yet be saved.

"The controls, Doctor Zarkov!" Flash shouted. "Get to the controls! And if they try to play that beam on us again do your darndest to keep clear of it!"

Zarkov stumbled to the switchboard of the rocket ship, but even as he did so Barin and Aura joined him.

They had risen from the floor shakily, and their faces were white.

"We are lost, doctor!" said Barin. "The beam may no longer be upon us, but the damage has already been done."

"But the motor is operating again," Zarkov retorted. "That shows there is still power in it."

True the motor was in action once more, yet how uncertainly it functioned, missing its stroke, hesitating, faltering in an ominous manner. At one moment it would burst out triumphantly, in the next fade away to a broken chatter of mechanism; and the ship was going down, slowly, perhaps, and on an even keel, as it were, but going down nevertheless.

Zarkov could not recover height for all his efforts with the controls. He could not even arrest the gradual descent, and was forced at last to seek a landing-place in the hope that he could bring his craft safely to rest.

The ship was now within a few hundred feet of the sky-city's roofs. When first the party in the vessel had appeared over the metropolis they had seen it as a fairy realm riding on a carpet of fleecy clouds, clouds through which the distant plains and peaks of Mongo's surface were dimly visible far down. But by this time they were so near to Vultan's amazing domain that they could see nothing else but that great panorama of stately dwellings and a network of streets in which throngs of winged citizens were gathered with upturned faces.

Meanwhile the ray from the turret of Vultan's palace had been extinguished, the men who had directed it obviously being confident that the rocket ship could not escape.

They were right. Zarkov could do no more than guide it towards an open space which the turret overlooked, a kind of courtyard on which the ship finally grounded with a faint jar.

Light as the impact was, the inmates of the vessel were sent staggering. Yet thankful to be alive, it was with feelings of indescribable relief that they blundered towards the door in the ship's side, which Zarkov made haste to open.

One after another they emerged from the craft, and Flash, the last to step forth, had scarcely set foot on the paving-stones of the courtyard when a band of Hawk Men came running across from the palace.

They were armed, and looked threatening enough, even when Aura moved forward and attempted to address them imperiously. Brushing her aside they closed with Barin, Flash and Zarkov, and next second an ugly scuffle was in progress.

Zarkov was quickly overpowered, and if the Hawk Men found it more difficult to deal with Barin and Flash the odds that favoured the attackers at length prevailed, the athletic American and his stalwart companion being mastered after a fierce tussle.

The three prisoners were panting from their exertions, but helpless in their captors' arms, when Aura cried out in a voice that commanded the attention of the soldiery.

"In the name of the Emperor Ming I order you to release those men!" she snapped.

She was answered coldly by one of Vultan's minions.

"We already have our orders from the royal master whom we serve. He saw your ship come down in the courtyard, and bade us seize you all forthwith."

"Do you know who I am?" Aura asked furiously.

"Yes, the daughter of Ming. A daughter who by all accounts has displeased her father to some purpose, even as you have displeased King Vultan. He was greatly enraged when he learned that you had been responsible for the slaying of two of his soldiers on the shore of the Great Sea. Come, you and your friends are to be taken before him."

Struggling, Flash and Zarkov and Barin were marched towards the palace, and in spite of her angry protests, Aura was also clutched by the arms and forced in that direction.

Once over the threshold of the palace, the three male prisoners were shackled with fetters that were brought from a guard-room, and, although spared this indignity, Aura was hustled forward with them as they were thrust along a corridor leading to the audience chamber in which King Vultan was waiting.

Within a few minutes of their descent to the courtyard, the captives were in the presence of the gross, chuckling potentate who ruled that city of the skies. Yet Flash, for one, seawardly had eyes for Vultan. It was Dale who claimed his gaze; Dale, whom he saw cringing at the beefy monarch's side; Dale, who cried out as she beheld her lover amongst the prisoners.

"Flash!" she screamed, and ran forward to embrace the young American with tears in her eyes.

"Steady, honey," he whispered, keenly aware of her distress. "Steady."

She clung to him, and he did his best June 13th, 1936.

to console her. Meanwhile Aura had moved towards the immense throne in which Vultan sat, and was addressing him wrathfully.

"How dare you attack a ship in which the daughter of the Emperor Ming is travelling?" she challenged.

The big man looked at her ironically. "How was I to know that you were aboard that ship?" he inquired.

"Perhaps you did not know," Aura granted. "But at least you ordered your men to seize me and my companions as soon as you saw us land. And I warn you, Vultan, that unless more respect is shown to me, my father will send an army to destroy your city. I may have displeased him, but I can assure you that he will not overlook any insult to his own flesh and blood."

Vultan was still regarding her with his piggish, twinkling eyes, but though the corners of his thick-lipped mouth were uplifted, there was deadly quality in his smile.

"Ming would not dare to destroy this city," he observed, "while I was holding his daughter hostage."

"You would dare to make me a prisoner?" she flung at him.

"Shall we say—er—a guest?" he rejoined with a wheezy chuckle.

She glared at him, but, turning his attention from her, he rose and stepped down to where Flash and Dale were standing.

"So you are the young man named Gordon whom I have been hearing about," he said to the fair-haired American.

"Yes," Flash answered steadfastly, "I'm the fellow. What of it?"

Vultan studied his captive's physique in an appraising fashion.

"You are strong," he remarked. "And I have always need of strong men like you."

He nodded his big head once or twice, and then glanced at the other two who had been shackled.

"Ah, Prince Barin!" he declared. "Welcome! I suppose you are still nursing your grievance against the Emperor Ming, who assassinated your father and deprived you of your rightful heritage?"

Barin made no reply, and King Vultan slid his eyes upon Zarkov.

"And who is the elderly Earth man?" he asked.

"Doctor Zarkov," Prince Barin volunteered then. "A great scientist, your Majesty."

"A great scientist?" Vultan reiterated with a show of interest. "I might be able to employ a great scientist."

He paused, and, after scrutinising the doctor for a space, he signed to the group of soldiers who had marched the prisoners into the throne-room.

"Remove Zarkov's fetters and take him to my laboratory," he commanded. "As for the young man Gordon, conduct him to the furnace chamber, where he will be kept warm."

He laughed boisterously, his whole body shaking flabbily as if in enjoyment of some joke best understood by himself, and his laughter was still ringing in the ears of Flash and Dale when Barin gave vent to an exclamation of protest.

"You can't do that to Gordon, your Majesty!" he blurted. "You can't send him to the furnace-chamber, sire!"

King Vultan seemed to stiffen, and he looked at Barin with a changed expression, his eyes grown baleful.

"No?" he said softly. "Maybe you do not wish to be separated from your friend. Very well, you shall go with him."

"Vultan, release Flash Gordon!" It was the terse voice of Aura. "Do what you will with Zarkov, Barin and Dale Arden. But release Flash Gordon, or I will see that you—"

"Silence!" the monarch of the sky-city broke out. "You are in no position to offer threats to me! Guards, do as I have ordered! Wait, leave Zarkov to me. I will show him to the laboratory personally."

The doctor's shackles were unlocked, but, still in chains, Flash and Barin were propelled from the room, Dale being swept to one side as she tried to cling to the young American. Then the two men who had been condemned to the furnace chamber were bundled along a wide passage that ended in a flight of steps, at the foot of which was a tremendous door wrought in a metal that resembled lead.

This door was pressed open, and Flash and Barin were east into a room where all was tumult—a tumult consisting of the babble of many voices, the scrape and clang of strange machinery, the roar of hellish fires in colossal furnaces, the rasp of shovels wielded by the hands of sweating, half-nude slaves.

It was a room of immense dimensions, lofty as a cathedral, and the most striking feature of it was the row of furnaces tended by the wretches who were armed with the shovels; begrimed and perspiring creatures who had doubtless been pressed into Vultan's service.

None of them was a Hawk Man, but there were a number of the latter present in the rôle of guards, some of them carrying whips with which they lashed those of the slaves who appeared to shirk.

Other Hawk Men were stationed beside the machines already mentioned, studying instrument dials upon these machines and occasionally moving switches whose purpose could not even be guessed.

Meanwhile, behind a kind of parapet constructed of the same lead-like metal as the door, a crew of weary figures were squatting with bowed heads. The lead wall afforded them shelter from the heat of the furnaces, and they were obviously slaves who had been given a spell of rest. Apparently the work which had to be done in this fetid, sweltering room was so arduous that the prisoners were divided into many shifts—yes, many shifts, to judge by the number of men who were huddled behind the wall.

It was as Flash Gordon and Barin glanced in the direction of those resting slaves that they beheld one who seemed familiar, and when the fellow chanced to raise his head they recognised him at once.

"Thun!" Flash shouted.

Thun it was, and, starting, he peered across the room at the newcomers. At the same time Flash attempted to move towards him, but was dragged back by the men who had charge of him, and who were now in the act of unfastening his shackles.

Those who held Barin were engaged on the same task, having already stripped him to the waist, and the chains had been discarded when two or three of the furnace-room guards approached, long whips trailing from their hands.

"More slaves?" one of them grunted. "We need them. Even working in short spells, the rogues die off all too quickly. We lost four in the last moon-month. These can start with the next shift. They go on almost immediately."

The soldiers who had brought Flash and Barin to the furnace-room trooped off, and long-handled shovels were pushed into the fists of the two new prisoners. Then they were thrust towards the lead wall.

At crack of whip a dozen of the slaves resting there were roused to their feet, and Thun, who was among them, at once joined Barin and Flash.

"Careful, Flash," he warned, seeing the glint in the American's eye and the ominous thrust of his jaw. "Do nothing rash, or the consequences may be fatal. Better to accept the situation."

It was shrewd advice, perhaps, but at that instant one of the guards slashed at them with his whip, accompanying the blow with a harsh command.

"This is no place for gossip!" he snarled. "Get forward to the furnaces!"

The thong of the whip had caught Flash across the back, and the cruel sting of it spurred him to retaliation. Uttering a bellow, he flung himself at the guard and would have smashed him to the floor if the man's comrades had not come upon him from all directions and grappled with him.

Flash fought like a madman, but his antagonists were too many for him, and the rest of the slaves were kept at bay by others of the guards who had rushed to the spot. Before long the infuriated American had been subdued, and, though he glared at his foes with unbroken spirit, he was compelled to go forward to the furnaces with Barin, Thun and the remainder of the captives who formed that particular shift.

They relieved the miserable wretches who had already been tending the fires, and soon they were driving their shovels deep into the supplies of jet-black fuel which had been loaded into bunkers close at hand. Soon, too, they were envying those of their fellows who were resting beyond the lead wall.

The heat from the red maws of the open furnaces was terrific—a deadly, penetrating heat that seemed to reach the innermost fibres of the body. It drove into their backs as they stooped to fill the shovels; it smote their chests as they swung around to heave the contents of those shovels into the vents where the flames roared ceaselessly. The very Pit of Hell could not be worse than this, Flash told himself.

He noticed that the Hawk Men were careful to avoid exposing themselves to that heat overmuch. Those at the machines were too far away from the furnaces to be affected by it seriously, and, if this was not the case with the guards who plied the whips, these guards nevertheless kept their distance most of the time.

Only when their vigilant eyes detected some unfortunate slave weakening at his work—only then did they draw close to flay the shirker into renewed activity.

Flash and his comrades of the shift toiled on, sweating, suffering, some of them cursing; cursing, for in the mere utterance of words they gained an outlet for their feelings.

News of Ming

WHILE Flash was slaving in the furnace-room, King Vultan was addressing Aura, Zarkov and Dale in the presence of two or three of his vassals who had remained in the audience chamber.

His remarks were chiefly directed to Aura, who still appeared to be in defiant mood.

"You have threatened me with the vengeance of your father," he was saying, "but let me tell you, my dark-eyed beauty, that your so-called Emperor of the Universe holds no terrors for me."

"You formed an allegiance with him, didn't you?" the princess retorted. "Was it not fear that made you seek his friendship?"

"Fear?" King Vultan echoed the word mockingly. "Bah, I fear no man. It suited me at the time to court your father's aid, but now I do not need his friendship—and if he thinks I am a puppet who will bend the knee to him, then, by all the gods, I'll show him he's mistaken!"

"My father is powerful, Vultan," Aura warned. "I advise you to let me go, and also to surrender Dale Arden and Zarkov to him. As for Flash Gordon, I command you to spare him—"

The monarch of the sky-city silenced her with a gesture of one great hand.

"Flash Gordon remains where he is, together with Barin and Thun and the slaves of the furnace-room. Zarkov goes to my laboratory, where he will be as useful to me as he might have been to Ming."

He paused and leered at Dale, then glanced at Aura again.

"And the Earth girl," he continued, "she will grace my palace. Ming desired her hand in marriage, didn't he? Well, he won't have her. She gladdens old Vultan's eyes too much. A rare treasure for my palace of the skies—a rare treasure, indeed."

And he chuckled throatily, so that Dale drew back from him in fear.

Vultan frowned a little as he saw her recoil, but after studying her in silence for a moment he grinned again.

"I've a mind to tell your esteemed father my plans and see what he has to say," he told Aura in hearty accents. "Yes, I'll communicate with him by the televisual ray and let him know that you are all here. First, however, I must show Zarkov over my laboratory."

Bidding his retainers keep watch on Dale and Aura, he took Dr. Zarkov by the arm and led him from the throne-room, the scientist accompanying him gloomily enough, and a little while later the two of them might have been seen in an apartment that was fitted out with all manner of apparatus.

Just as the Emperor Ming had shown Zarkov over his incredible workshop, so Vultan conducted the doctor around this laboratory of the sky-city. And once again, as he looked upon the marvels which the room contained, Zarkov had cause to reflect upon the curious way in which the barbarism of bygone ages was coupled, on this planet of Mongo, with scientific miracles that were far in advance of the discoveries Earth men had made.

All the time Vultan was explaining in his rough, boisterous fashion the pur-

"Back!" shouted an officer in command of the detachment. "Back, or we'll destroy every man of you!"

poses which the various units of apparatus served; and one thing of especial interest Zarkov learned—that the sky-city was sustained by the terrific forces emanating from a great supply of radium.

"The radium fuel is cast into the furnaces at which your friends are working now," Vultan stated. "And my realm is supported in space by the gravity-resisting rays which are thus generated."

Zarkov eyed him thoughtfully. "What if something should happen to your furnaces?" he suggested. "What if your supply of radium fuel should become exhausted?"

"That would mean complete destruction," Vultan replied, "and, as our supply of radium is not inexhaustible, such a disaster must overtake us in the course of time—unless a substitute can be found. That's why I spared you from the atom furnaces, Zarkov. It seems to me that you may succeed where others have failed."

Suddenly the doctor's face became white and tense.

"King Vultan," he said, "if I understood you correctly, my friends are in a deadly plight. Radium can be of great benefit to medicine, but it can also have fatal consequences if used to any great extent. Do you realize that it is a substance which ultimately kills them if they are exposed to its effects too long?"

"Yes, that is another difficulty we have to face," Vultan announced callously. "The slaves last no time, even though they have frequent spells of rest behind a thick wall of lead, which, as you know, is a protection against the harmful properties of radium."

His eyes narrowed craftily, and a sly note came into his voice.

"But, doctor," he continued, "the danger to your friends should be an incentive to you. Find me a substitute for radium fuel, and they will live."

With these words he turned on his heel and left Zarkov, and on his way out nodded significantly to a sentry who was posted at the laboratory door. Then he passed into a room opposite, and here he was ensconced for some time.

It was a room fitted out with televisual equipment, and when Vultan finally emerged from it again there was an expression of amusement on his bloated features, an expression that was still lingering upon his countenance when he rejoined Dale Arden and Aura in the audience chamber of the palace.

"Well, my illustrious guest," he remarked to Aura jovially, "I have just been in contact with your imperial father. Thunder, he was like a man demented with rage when I had finished telling him that you and the Earth girl were here—and that I intended to keep you here. He swore he'd send his fleet of rocket ships against me, as soon as they had returned from some expedition on which they are engaged."

"He'll keep his word, Vultan," Aura said.

"Let him!" the other scoffed. "His fleet may have a warm welcome. Meanwhile, I have a mind to get better acquainted with the little dove who has come to us from the Earth."

He turned towards Dale, and, though she attempted to retreat from him, he took her by the hand and pulled her towards the dais on which his massive throne was set.

"Come, my dear," he urged, "you will sup with me. Guard, see that food and drink are brought immediately!"

He had called over his shoulder to one of his men-at-arms, but before the fellow could hurry off in response to his command another soldier entered the audience chamber.

"Your Majesty," the newcomer reported, "the Earth man Gordon is giving us a good deal of trouble in the furnace-room. Already he has turned on us twice."

Vultan frowned, and was silent for a moment. Then, still grasping Dale by the hand, he moved towards the door.

"Return to the furnace-room with a detachment of guards armed with ray-guns," he said to the soldier who had told of Flash Gordon's defiant attitude. "That rascal's spirit must be broken. I shall be watching, with my fair and lovely companion. And Aura, you may join us, since you seem to be interested in the Earth man."

Mutiny

DOWN in the furnace-room Flash was toiling grimly with the other men of his shift, but, unlike them, he was far from resigned to his condition as a slave. His mood was one of dark, seething rebellion, and in his own headstrong way he had tried to give vent to his wrath—only to be driven back to his ignominious task.

Thun and Barin stood one on each side of him, hurling fuel into the furnaces adjoining that which Flash was tending. They could hear the American muttering under his breath, and took every opportunity to warn him against any further show of resistance.

"It is as hard for Barin and me to suffer this treatment as it is for you," Thun said to him once. "But do nothing foolish, my friend. If we all bide our time a chance of escape may present itself. Where's the sense in throwing away your life? The wonder is that you have been spared after attacking the guards twice."

There was wisdom in Thun's counsel, and there was no doubt that Flash had behaved in foolhardy fashion. Yet it was not in the nature of the young American to hold himself in check, and despite the advice of his companions he was soon in trouble again.

This fresh outburst took place when one of the slaves collapsed in a heap. The man, less hardy than the other members of the shift, had obviously reached the end of his endurance, but two or three of the guards sprang forward to lash his huddled body with their whips and drive him to his feet.

The eyes of Flash Gordon blazed. He could not watch the cruel spectacle without the blood running hot in his veins. Besides, it seemed to him that here was an opportunity to make a bid for freedom, when attention was focused on the wretched man who grovelled under those stinging thongs.

And suddenly Flash was springing upon the group of soldiery who stood about the fallen slave, suddenly he was springing upon them with shovel upraised to strike.

"Come on, men!" he yelled to his comrades in misfortune. "Follow me!"

As he roared the words he brought one of the Hawk Men to his knees with a terrific blow, and in another instant a second guard thudded to the floor. Then pandemonium broke loose, the other slaves of the shift rushing to the attack with loud cries.

Hawk Men ran to the spot from all quarters, but the drudges of the furnace-room were thoroughly aroused, and they were quickly joined by those who had been resting behind the lead wall. Like wildfire the spirit of mutiny had spread throughout the ranks of the prisoners, and they fell upon Vultan's minions tooth and nail.

Confusion reigned supreme in that sweltering chamber, and, outnumbered, the guards fell on every hand, beaten down by fists or shovels. The whole room seemed to resound to the shouts of stricken soldiers and the infuriated howls of mutineers who were battling for their liberty, and, above the mad din, the voice of Flash rang high and clear—bellying defiance to the foe and encouragement to his fellow-rebels.

Thun and Barin were close beside the American. In their hearts they felt that the revolt was doomed to failure, for even if the guards in the furnace-room were overpowered the slaves had yet to face the city's garrison and a whole population which would be hostile to a man.

No, Thun and Barin would have preferred to wait for a chance of making an escape from the palace unobserved—repairing Zarkov's rocket ship if possible—then cruising off through the void.

They would have had some plan to work on. Flash apparently had none.

And yet out of loyalty Thun fought side by side with him, and so did Barin; fought until suddenly the great door of the furnace-room was thrown open and a troop of Hawk Men burst across the threshold, armed with ray-guns.

The guards in the chamber had been overwhelmed almost to a man. The triumphant slaves had been on the point of swarming out of their place of captivity. But now they recoiled before the threatening muzzles of those deadly weapons which the newcomers were grasping.

"Back!" shouted an officer in command of the detachment. "Back, or we'll destroy every man of you!"

Flash would have continued the fight and courted death, but Barin restrained him.

"It's no use," he breathed. "It's no use."

Covered by the ray-guns, the slaves were compelled to retreat. In the meantime the guards who had been struck down were beginning to pull themselves to their feet, and with savage looks they wielded their whips might and main, driving Flash and his party to the furnaces, and the rest of the prisoners to the lead wall.

It was as the thongs were descending upon the tortured flesh of the mutineers that a burst of mocking laughter rang out across the chamber, and, raising their eyes to a lofty gallery at the far end of the room, the men who were being herded towards the furnaces saw the figures of Vultan, Aura and Dale Arden there—Dale in a half-fainting condition, sickened by the punishment that was being inflicted on her fiancée and his comrades.

"Flay the skin off their bodies!" Vultan called. "Teach the rogues a lesson! Show them that you are their masters!"

The flogging was continued until blood was running from the raw weals on the backs of the suffering slaves, and the staccato reports of the whip-lashes were still echoing about the walls of the great room when Dale Arden sank in a swoon. Vultan catching her as she slid to the floor of the gallery.

He held her in one powerful arm, and glanced at Aura, who had watched the scene below with a tense expression on her countenance.

"The Earth girl cannot bear to see her lover's plight," he commented sourly. "She thinks too much of him. Perhaps if he were to be removed, she might forget him."

Aura directed an anxious look at him, but already he was leaning over the railing of the gallery again.

"Wait!" he called to his minions. "Hold, there!"

"EXCLUSIVE STORY"

"That's what I'd like to know. Why did you?"

"Because we already had the goods on you. You squealed, Acello. You squealed on yourself when you were coming out of the dope."

"You're wasting your time, pretty boy," retorted Acello. "I don't scare easy."

"Personally, I don't think you've the courago of a worm." Barton laughed softly. "Better watch him, boys. He's liable to bite himself and die in convulsions. You know what this is, don't you?" Barton picked up a square packet or box. "You should—you sent it to me. Didn't you?"

"No, I didn't," Acello writhed futilely. "I don't even know what it is."

"All right, I'll explain." Barton held up the box. "It's a species of fruit called pineapple. I had it all put back together—just the way you sent it to me. Clever boys, those cops, down at the bureau of explosives. They put it back together—oiled it up—got it all working, then they wired in five new sticks of dynamite. And here it is—all set to go. You just pull off this tape, release the spring, and in about a minute you forget to worry about anything."

"Take—take that thing away," Acello wheezed as Barton held it close to him. "Oh, I see you know what it is." Barton gave a satisfied grin. "Well, here's the plot, Acello. You came here to plant this pineapple, but a terrible accident happened. The pineapple got ripe too soon. Well, I had to serape you off the walls and redecorate the apartment. Do you like the plot?" His voice hardened. "Do you?"

"Listen, you can't do this!" Acello's eyes were bulging from his head as Barton drew up a table near the chair and placed the bomb on it. "I got rights! I ain't had a trial!"

"Sure you had a trial," mocked the District Attorney. "Only there weren't any crooked attorneys to fix the jury for you. We were the jury." He indicated the cops who had backed to an open door. "And the verdict was guilty!" He caught hold of the tape. "We saved the state the cost of a court hearing, and now we're going to save it the cost of burning you."

"Call him off, Ann," Acello appealed to the girl, who was staring at the scene in horror. "The guy is crazy. I ain't done nothing to you, Ann. I've always liked you, Ann."

She gave him a look of repulsion, and let Higgins lead her away. Only Barton and O'Neill remained in the room.

"You'll have about a minute to do some remembering, Acello," Barton cried. "I want you to remember a harmless old man that died in the gutter. I want you to remember every dirty trick you've played. Remember all you can, Acello. Breathe deeply these next sixty seconds. They'll be all you'll get." He ripped off the tape, and dived for the door.

The door slammed. Ace Acello was alone. Ominously came the ticking of the time-bomb. Mad fear gripped him, and he struggled to get free, but in vain. The ticking seemed to grow louder.

"Stop it! Stop it!" he screamed, foaming at the mouth. "I'll squeal! I'll tell everything!"

In the next room O'Neill, Barton and some of the detectives were crowding round a switch-board. Ace Acello did not know that there was a dictaphone near the chair. Directly Acello shouted that he would squeal. Barton spoke into the specially prepared apparatus.

"All right, talk, Acello," Barton shouted. "But talk first! It's your only chance!"

"I killed Devlin!" screamed the half-demented crook. "I killed Comos! And put that stuff on the Mochado, but Werther made me do it. Martin Werther, the big shot! And there was Roth, Rinelli, Coxony—" His dilated eyes stared at the bomb. "Hurry—hurry, I'll tell everything."

"Don't—don't be a sap, Dick," cried Higgins, as Barton flung himself at the door and dragged it open. They saw him dive across the room and grab up the bomb, and press a knob on the contraption.

Slowly they all came into the room, because they knew now that the bomb would not explode. They saw that Ace Acello had fainted. Barton gripped Ace and shook him but the man's head only lolled drunkenly. The attorney picked up a glass of water and dashed it into the wretch's face.

That brought Ace Acello to his senses. "Where's Miss Graham?" Barton demanded. "Quick!"

"The old Fensler Mansion—near Stanford," rasped out the cowed scoundrel.

"I know the place," said O'Neill. "It's near the water."

"If you're lying"—Barton held up the bomb—"you'll not get a second chance."

"It's the truth," Acello stammered. "Take it away—take it away!"

Barton chuckled and opened the box. Out rolled an ordinary alarm clock. "Just a simple clock, and you didn't like it. That's too bad. Here, take a good look," and he tossed the clock into Acello's lap.

The clock, as if in derision, began to ring, and then Acello began to laugh hysterically. They left him laughing. He was quite mad by the time he was freed from his bonds.

Barton Knows His Own Mind

IN a luxurious office at the Fensler Mansion sat Martin Werther, and round him were his chief cronies. Werther's face was lined with anxiety, though he puffed at a large cigar and tried to appear at his ease. The others shifted uneasily.

"Say, chief, we ought to be hearing from Acello any minute now," said Rinelli. "You told him what to do."

"Do I ever make mistakes?" raged Werther, striking his fist on the desk. "He was told to give Barton a final warning this morning, that we were tired of waiting, and that unless he vowed to resign and chuck up his campaign the Graham girl would die at noon to-day. We'll hear any minute now."

In the next room Tess Graham paced up and down. An unshaven rascal sprawled in a chair and watched her with a cruel leer, whilst at a table sat a red-haired, berouged young woman, who was playing solitaire with a greasy pack of cards.

"Getting nervous, dearie?" mocked the woman. "Well, I don't blame you. You've only got a few more hours."

"Do you mean they'll really—" Tess could not finish.

"They've taken dames for an airing before this." The woman placed a card.

"But—but he can't know they're holding me."

"Oh, yes, dearie, he knows." The woman grinned evilly. "He's been watched. Instead of laying off he's sticking the cops on every mug in town. He's tried everything he knows to find this hide-out. Maybe he's not so anxious to see you again. They tell me every where he goes there's a dame with him named Ann Devlin."

"It isn't true."

"Don't you call me a liar, you hot-house geranium," shrilled the woman. "I'll tear your eyes out for you." She leaned forward. "Don't you expect any mercy if Barton don't lay off. It's queer he ain't chucked in his hand, and the chief won't stick at anything to gain his ends. If—" She stopped as if she had been shot because there had come three loud buzzes. "What's that?"

The sprawling crook was on his feet in a flash.

"The warning signal," he cried. "We gotta get outa here, if—" Clearly there came to their ears the scream of sirens. "The cops!"

Martin Werther and his men leapt to their feet when they got the warning, but the place was taken by surprise. One man tried to hold the stairs, but the police shot the crook down. The police burst into Werther's sumptuous den, and Rinelli whipped out a gun. Crack! The Italian dropped in a heap. O'Neill clapped the handcuffs on Werther.

"Hey, what is this?" he shouted.

"I've got a warrant for your arrest for murder," cried O'Neill.

In the next room the one crook guard fired as the police rushed in. A detective clasped his arm with a groan. Someone fired and that was the finish for the crook. The woman dived behind a table and crouched there with gun in hand.

Barton appeared.

"Tess! he cried. "Are you all right?"

The girl swayed towards him.

Ann ran into the room, and stopped as Tess moved towards Barton. It was then that the woman jumped up and pointed her gun. Ann impulsively jumped forward. The gun exploded and Ann stopped the bullet in her shoulder.

Before the woman could fire another shot the police had wrenched the gun away.

"Take your dirty hands off me!" she shouted.

Their answer was to slip handcuffs over her wrists.

Barton saw Ann drop in a heap, and forgetful of Tess dropped down on his knees.

"Ann, are you hurt?" he demanded in distressed tones. "Darling, answer me." "It's all right—" Ann's eyes fluttered open.

"Get a car ready," Dick Barton shouted. "Phone the Stamford Hospital—we'll be there in five minutes!"

Dick lifted the still form in his arms, and staggered out of the room. Tess was forgotten. She knew that Dick Barton was lost to her for ever.

And when the place had been cleared and all the crooks taken away to prison a certain reporter used Werther's 'phone.

"This is Timothy Aloysius Higgins, the father of your children," he said into the 'phone. "What have you got for lunch?"

"What! You mean to say you're coming home at last?" came the astonished tones of practical Mrs. Higgins.

"Yeah, might as well," chuckled the reporter. "My other girl ditched me. I think she's gonna get married. Yeah, that's right—to Dick Barton. How did you guess?"

"THE LONE WOLF RETURNS"

been thinking of a way to get rid of those two uncouth creatures of his, Mastro and Coster, so that the way would be comparatively clear for you."

"Yes?" said Lanyard with interest.

"It involves a telephone, sir, and a taxi-cab. You could, if occasion demanded it, tell a very convincing lie, couldn't you, sir?"

"I'm afraid I could, Jenkins."

"A very exciting tale would be useful, sir—a tale about hi-jacking the Stewart jewels, for instance."

"Jenkins," said Lanyard heartily, "you're a genius!"

"Oh, no, sir," protested Jenkins with becoming modesty. "Just a gentleman's gentleman in search of a taxi-cab."

Half an hour after this conversation, a waiter at the Club Rendezvous entered a room in which Coster and Mastro were playing cards at a table. He informed Coster that he was wanted on the telephone, and that ugly rough rose up and went into an adjoining room.

Mastro followed him, after an interval, to see him banging the plunger of a telephone up and down.

"What's up?" he asked.

"The Lone Wolf's on the loose," replied Coster excitedly. "He broke away from the cops, and he's found out about the boss' apartment on the West Side."

"How?" demanded Mastro.

"How should I know?" howled Coster. "I just got a tip that he's on his way there row to hi-jack that Stewart stuff!"

"You'd better call the boss."

"What d'you think I'm doing? I can't get any answer!"

"Well, what are we waiting for? We'd better get up there!"

A taxi-cab was standing at the kerb when the two emerged together from the club premises. Jenkins was at the wheel, and he had exchanged his bowler hat for the peaked cap of the vehicle's lawful owner.

The grey coupé was parked very near the spot it had occupied the night before, but Lanyard was not in it. He was sitting on a bootblack's stand, only a few yards away, having his spotless shoes polished. Over the top of an evening paper which concealed most of his face he watched Morpew's henchmen jump into the taxi-cab.

"Where to, sir?" inquired Jenkins.

"Five-forty-seven West Eighty-Sixth," Mastro instructed him. "And step on it!"

Off sped the taxi-cab, and Lanyard threw down the paper and got down from the stand, tossing a coin to the bootblack.

The taxi-cab proceeded up-town. It reached West Sixty-Eighth Street, turned into that thoroughfare, careered wildly along it, mounted a pavement, and crashed into the front wall of a police station.

Startled officers streamed out from the building, and one of them caught hold of Jenkins' right arm and said fiercely:

"What's the idea?"

"I beg your pardon, sir," returned Jenkins in the mildest of voices, "but where could I report a stolen car?"

"Right here!" rapped the policeman.

"What kind of a car?"

"Oh, this car, sir."

"Who stole it?"

"Why," replied Jenkins with a sweep of his hand towards his dumbfounded passengers, "we three gentlemen."

While the police were dealing with this remarkable circumstance in West Sixty-Eighth Street, Marmaduke Crane called at the Stewart mansion in West One Hundred and Twentieth Street and was left in the hall while the butler informed Marcia of his presence.

She went out to him from the drawing-room.

"I'm sorry to bother you, Miss Stewart," he said with a little bow, "but I'd like to have another look at that carpet in the library. There is not the slightest doubt the thief broke in that way."

"I believe this is the third time you've looked at the carpet in the library today," returned Marcia rather stiffly. "Do what you like, but you'll have to excuse me. I have a friend waiting."

Through the open doorway of the drawing-room Crane had already glimpsed Liane, who had picked up a fur cloak and was putting it on.

"I know," he nodded sagely. "Mrs. Mallison. She's sailing on the Normandie to-night."

"You're not by any chance checking up on Mrs. Mallison?" Marcia challenged.

"No, no, no," said Crane. "You see, I'm what they call a shipping news fan. I read the sailing lists. Always a chance there's somebody sailing I'd want to send some flowers to! I raise beautiful posies, you know."

"Very interesting," said Marcia with incredulous scorn. "Is that all?"

"Oh, just one thing more. What kind of perfume do you use?"

"Perfume?" she echoed. "But what has my perfume to do with it?"

"Oh, you never can tell. We're dealing with a smart man. It might be the one clue we need."

"Mr. Crane," she cried, "look at the carpet in the library! Sample my perfume! Read your shipping lists! Do anything you like, but I can't help you any further!"

She flounced away from him into the drawing-room, but he did not cross the hall into the library; instead, he slipped behind a curtain over the drawing-room doorway.

"Sorry, my dear," said Liane, "but I'll have to run."

"I've just made up my mind," said Marcia. "I'm going with you to Europe."

"Will you take long to pack?" Marcia assured her that packing would be the easiest part of the business.

"I'll make arrangements," said Liane. "As soon as we're ready, we'll call you."

Marcia went with Liane to the door and saw her off in a car which was waiting in the drive. When she returned to the hall Crane stepped out from behind the curtain.

"The carpet you wanted to see is in the library," said she sharply.

"Oh, I've seen the carpet," said Crane. "I've got to take a look at the garden now. Good-bye."

In Morpew's Room

WITH Mastro and Coster out of the way, it was a comparatively easy matter for Lanyard to enter the Club Rendezvous without being seen and to enter Morpew's private office.

To find the stolen emeralds, however, was a very different matter. He had ransacked every drawer in the desk, turned flowers out of a vase, and searched in every likely and unlikely place when the telephone bell rang and he sped to it lest its strident noise should attract attention on the part of the staff downstairs.

The voice of Laine sounded in his left ear.

"Morpew?"

"Yeah," he replied.

"Listen, and don't ask any questions. We're in a jam! Crane knows we're sailing!"

Morpew's voice was not a difficult one to imitate, and Liane was far too agitated to be critical.

"Well, what about the stuff?" Lanyard asked as Morpew might have done.

"If everything's clear, I'd get it out of your room."

"Why? They'd never find it there!"

"That fireplace," he was rejoiced to hear Liane retort, "is the first spot they'd go to! Hurry, I'll be right over."

Liane had been speaking from a telephone-box in the General Post Office, and she had no idea that Crane had followed her in a police car all the way from Marcia's home. He was in the next box when she mentioned the fireplace, and he remained crouched in an exceedingly uncomfortable position for one of his bulk till she had left the building.

The mantelpiece in Morpew's private office was rather an elaborate one with a wooden overmantel. It took Lanyard about five minutes to find a spring that caused a panel at one end of the overmantel to open like a little door, and then he fished out from quite a sizeable recess not only the emerald pendant, but practically the whole of the Stewart collection.

He transferred the jewels to his pockets, and on a card he took from the desk he wrote with his fountain-pen:

"Crane,—I have returned the jewels to the Stewart home. See you at midnight."

"LANYARD."

He put the card in the secret recess and closed the panel, and he restored the flowers to the vase and set the vase upon the mantelpiece.

He heard voices outside the door that was near to the stairs he had ascended, and in a flash he was behind dark-blue plush curtains that screened another door and his automatic was in his hand. He had just time to whisk a little table and a palm in a pot that stood on it into his retreat before the other door opened.

Morpew entered the room with Mallison, and Morpew slammed the door.

"Yeah, that's right," said Mallison—and then Lanyard's voice from behind the curtains made both of them jump.

"It's over here, boys!"

They swung round and stared at the blue barrel of an automatic which projected between the curtains.

"This is one of those set-'em-up exercises," said the invisible Lanyard. "First movement, hands above head. I said up!"

Two pairs of hands were raised.

"Take a deep breath and hold 'em up! Second movement, up on your toes! I said on your toes!"

The unwilling pupils raised themselves on their toes.

EATON & CO., (Dept. 43), Eatonian House, Leeds, 12
June 13th, 1936.

"That's one," Lanyard informed them, "and two is down. One up—two down! Now altogether! Count off!"

In impotent fury Morphew and Mallison rose on their toes and descended on their heels, counting as they did so:

"One up, two down. One up, two down. One up, two down."

The door behind them was opened and Liane entered. She stared in astonishment at the pair—and followed the direction of a hasty nod on the part of her husband. She saw the barrel of the automatic, gasped, and joined in the exercise.

"One up, two down. One up, two down."

Crane walked in at the open door with two plain-clothes men, and for a while Crane listened and looked on as though fascinated. Then, very slowly, he sidled along a wall towards the curtains and peered behind the nearer of the two.

Suddenly he pulled that curtain aside. "That'll do for to-day," he said, after the manner of a physical drill instructor. "You can all get to showers now."

An official six-shooter was in his hand, and equally official six-shooters were in the hands of his subordinates. But the automatic which had kept Morphew, Mallison, and Liane so busy was resting on a pot whence a palm had been removed by its roots. There was no sign of Lanyard, and the door against which he had stood was not quite shut.

The exercise ceased and Crane took up the automatic. He walked to the mantelpiece, and where the vase of flowers was standing he found the spring.

"Say, where'd you get these posies?" he asked, thrusting the automatic in his hip-pocket; and then the spring was pressed and the little panel flew open.

There was nothing in the recess but the card Lanyard had placed there. Crane read the message that was on the back of it, then crumpled the slip of pasteboard in his hand and dropped it in his coat-pocket, smiling broadly at the three crestfallen crooks.

"Where are your credentials?" defied Morphew.

"A little mistake," purred Crane. "You know how it is—they will happen."

"Your apology comes too late! You'll hear more of this from the Commissioner!"

"Won't you tell me where you got those posies?" asked Crane.

"You get out!" cried Morphew.

Crane motioned to the men who were with him and they followed him out from the room. The door was closed, and Morphew listened for receding foot-steps and heard them. But Crane erept back to the door, light-footed as any cat, and he put his ear to the keyhole.

The three inside the room had relaxed.

"That was smart of you, Mal, to get rid of the stuff," said Morphew appreciatively. "It was plenty hot."

"Don't give me the medal," returned Mallison. "Give it to Liane. She's the smart girl!"

"Me?" shrilled Liane. "I've never been near that thing! What's the idea, Morphew? You told me you were taking care of the emeralds!"

"I told you that?" shouted Morphew.

"Certainly you did, over the 'phone!"

"Now, just a minute, Morphew!" Mallison broke in furiously. "Let's get this straight! We all get a share of that Stewart stuff. What did you do with it?"

"I haven't been near the mantelpiece since this afternoon when I put it in there," Morphew declared.

"You put the jewels in, and you took them out, you dirty double-crosser!" howled Mallison; and he would have seized Morphew by the throat, but his elbow was gripped and his wrist was twisted downwards in a trick of judo.

Liane held on to Morphew in alarm—and then the door flew wide, and Crane, with his gun in his hand, said chidingly:

"Now, now, children, you'll get nowhere by calling each other names! We'll just hop down to police headquarters and talk things over quietly with the Commissioner. You tell him what I did, and I'll tell him what you did."

He moved towards Liane, and the two plain-clothes men re-entered the room with quite a number of policemen.

Morphew, in the act of being handcuffed by a stalwart sergeant of police, said bitterly:

"Every time I get set to go to Europe somebody always slaps me in gaol!"

A Card from Crane

LANYARD had secured the release of his man Jenkins, by standing bail for him, long before Marmaduke Crane sauntered into Angus McGowan's room at headquarters that evening. The chief of detectives was following into a telephone.

"I don't care when your edition goes to press!" Crane heard. "I can't tell you who made the arrest! No!"

Down crashed the telephone, and McGowan looked up at the man he had coaxed away from the quiet of a farm.

"Where've you been?" he asked complainingly. "What are you dodging bouquets for? All the confounded newspapers in the city have been ringing up for the last couple of hours! They're ready to plaster your name on all their front pages."

"It's quite simple," returned Crane placidly. "A gentleman we both know is entitled to full credit for the job, Mac. His name is Michael Lanyard."

"Lanyard?" gasped McGowan. "Is he in on this?"

"Plenty, but on our side of the road all the way."

"It'll take a lot of talking to make the District Attorney believe that!"

"Yeah!" drawled Crane. "Well, I'm prepared to do a lot of talking, and for Lanyard, when I get him to the D. A.'s office to-morrow."

"We'll pick him up to-night!"

"No," said Crane, "hold it, Mac. We'd be sort of out of place to-night."

Benson, within an hour, was sent off to Marcia Stewart's home, not by McGowan, but by Crane. On reaching the mansion in West One Hundred and Twentieth Street he rang the front-door bell, and to the huttler who answered the summons he said, with all his customary importance:

"Tell Mr. Lanyard that Mr. Benson's here to see him."

"Benson?" The butler had not forgotten the night when the masquerade ball had been interrupted by the police, but he affected not to remember the detective.

"Yes," said Benson. "The man they never get by!"

"You must be mistaken," said the butler icily. "Mr. Lanyard's not here."

"I only know what I've been told, brother, and I was told to leave this."

The butler accepted a card at which he barely condescended to glance, and he slammed the door in Benson's face. From a table in the hall he picked up a tray and deposited the card upon it, and carrying the tray into the drawing-room he presented it to Marcia.

"It's a message," he said. "It was handed to me at the door by the gentleman they never get by—Benson by name."

Marcia picked up the card, which bore Crane's name and was one of the sort he had used when he was in the force. With a frown, she turned it over, but the frown vanished as she read what was written on the other side:

"Lanyard,—Thanks for your help in the Stewart case. Marriage Licence Bureau opens at 10 a.m. Congratulations!"

"CRANE."

"But this is for Mr. Lanyard, Joseph," she said.

"I told the detective person that he wasn't here," responded the butler.

"You may go, Joseph."

Joseph went; Benson had gone. A few minutes later Marcia crossed the hall, past a quantity of luggage that had been deposited there, and entered the ball-room, in darkness except for the moonlight that streamed in at the french windows. One of those french windows was wide open, and beside the grand piano on the platform where an orchestra had functioned, two nights before, she saw a tall and shadowy figure.

Swiftly she crossed to the platform, mounted it, and switched on a lamp. The Stewart collection sparkled in the light, but Lanyard, who had spread all the jewels out upon the piano, pretended to be caught.

"All right," he said with an air of resignation, "I'll talk."

"You don't have to," Marcia informed him happily. "I hoped you would return to the scene of the crime!"

She stood very close beside him, and she looked down at the jewels instead of looking into his face.

"Michael, what's that?" she exclaimed, pointing to a ring of platinum set with white diamonds. "That doesn't belong here! It's not part of the collection!"

"Oh," said Lanyard casually, "it's just a little something I picked up."

"Picked up?" she challenged.

"Well, there it was all alone on the counter," he informed her. "Nobody was looking. All I had to do was to stretch out my hand—and pay for it!"

The grey coupé was in the drive, but Jenkins had deserted it to peer in at the french window. He saw Marcia nestle in Lanyard's arms, and he saw Lanyard put the ring on Marcia's finger.

He shook his head from side to side.

"Now," he said gloomily, "we'll never get out of town!"

"FLASH GORDON"

The guards with the whips ceased to belabour the slaves, and Vultan raised his voice once more.

"Who started this revolt?" he demanded.

"Gordon, the Earth man, sire!" came an answering chorus.

"I thought as much," the monarch of the sky-city growled. "Very well, take him out of there and bring him to the Static Room."

Flash was singled out by four or five of the Hawk Men and was dragged from the furnace-chamber, not knowing what was in store for him, and, as the young American disappeared from view, Vultan wheeled around, lifted Dale as if she had been a child and left the gallery by a small door at the end of it.

Aura followed him, and a minute or two later they were back in the audience chamber, where Vultan laid the unconscious Dale on a low divan. Then he turned to Ming's daughter.

"Look after her," he said. "But do not try to escape, for there is a sentry at the door. In a little while I'll return."

He made his way from the room, and, left alone with Dale, Aura attempted to revive her by striking her across the face with her open palm. Yet some time elapsed before the other girl recovered her senses and struggled up from the divan.

For a space she looked about her dazedly, and then, recalling the incidents that had taken place in the furnace-room, she clutched Aura by the arm.

"Where's Flash?" she panted. "What did they do to him? What did they do to him? I saw them striking at him and those other poor wretches with their whips, and then—and then—"

"And then you fainted!" Aura cut in viciously. "Listen, you little fool; if you took the trouble to show less concern for Flash you might be of some help to him. Can't you see that King Vultan is attracted by you, and resents your interest in another man?"

"What do you suppose I'm made of?" Dale retorted bitterly. "Stone? Do you think I could stand there and see them flogging someone who is dear to me—and not show any emotion? Oh, how can you understand? You're not in love with Flash."

Ming's daughter eyed her narrowly.

"No?" she said. "Let me tell you, Dale Arden, that no man has ever interested me as Flash Gordon interests me. I have not known him as long as you, but—perhaps I am in love with him as well."

Dale stared at her, and there was a long silence. Then Aura spoke again.

"That is why I am trying to make you realise that your attitude towards him may seal his doom," she declared. "He has been taken to what they call the Static Room. I don't know what fate awaits him there, but perhaps if you can convince Vultan that Flash Gordon means nothing to you, then Vultan may at least spare him."

She proceeded to make it doubly clear to Dale that her affection for Flash weighed heavily against him, and that in spite of the part he had played in the mutiny Vultan might let him live if he imagined the Earth girl was indifferent to his fate.

"Vultan does not wish to kill off prisoners if he can avoid doing so," she pointed out. "He needs them too much for his atom furnaces. True, the men who tend those furnaces do not live long, but if we can only play for time we may be able to help Flash to escape—"

MAKE SURE OF YOUR COPY OF BOY'S CINEMA BY ORDERING NOW!

She stopped short as she heard the door open, and a moment later saw Vultan cross the threshold.

"Ah," he exclaimed, on observing that Dale had recovered, "so my fair-guest is herself again. Too bad that you cannot bear to see your lover undergo punishment."

"Your Majesty, you are mistaken," Aura interposed quickly. "The Arden girl has just been telling me that Flash Gordon is not her lover, and that she cares little for him. She says that she prefers the men of Mongo to the men of the Earth."

Vultan looked at Dale suspiciously.

"Is that true?" he asked.

"Yes, your Majesty," Dale answered, bearing in mind Aura's advice.

"Then why did you faint on the gallery?" Vultan wanted to know.

Dale hesitated, racking her brain for a reply, and after a delay that was scarcely noticeable she invented an explanation.

"It was the heat of that furnace-chamber, your Majesty," she said. "It—it seemed overpowering."

Vultan fingered his fat chin for several seconds, and then, taking her by the wrist, he drew her to her feet.

"You are certain it was not on account of Gordon that you fainted?"

"Why should I faint because of him, your Majesty? Since we came to Mongo he has paid far more attention to Aura than to me."

To Dale that comment seemed like an inspiration, but Vultan still regarded her with some doubt.

"Come, you must prove your words," he said, and led her from the audience chamber, Aura bringing up the rear.

They passed through the doorway, and, crossing a wide corridor, entered a smaller room. It was the so-called Static Room, and as Vultan took her into it Dale saw a group of soldiers gathered there. Then she caught sight of Flash, strapped to an upright frame of metal that stood a few feet from a large switchboard.

He was struggling in his bonds, and as she set eyes on him Dale had to exercise all her self-control to prevent herself from running to his side.

She felt Aura move close to her and grip her surreptitiously by the hand. Fighting down the impulse to rush towards Flash, she turned to Vultan and somehow managed to speak in a calm voice.

"What are you going to do to him?"

"You will soon see, my pretty one,"

Vultan answered, with a leer, and at the same time he signed to his vassals.

In response to that gesture one of the soldiers stepped to the switchboard and gripped a lever. Then, slowly and deliberately, he began to draw it back.

A low, droning sound became audible. In the same instant a crackle of galvanic fire played over the frame to which Flash Gordon had been strapped, and a half-stifed gasp escaped the prisoner.

The man at the switchboard pulled the lever farther back, still in that same slow, deliberate manner. The drone of hidden dynamos rose to a higher key, and vivid sparks showered all about the body of the captive on the frame.

Dale saw Flash writhing in agony, saw the look of anguish on his distorted face and knew that he was being electrocuted by an ever-increasing charge of dynamic energy. For all her resolution a shriek burst from her lips, and, even as that scream rang through the room, Flash Gordon sagged lifelessly in his thongs.

Cowboy Kit

Ten-gallon sombreros, bright neckerchiefs, snug-fitting trousers and high-heeled boots—all part of a cowboy's regalia—are certainly picturesque in appearance, but according to Charles Starrett, the hero of "Gallant Defender," in this week's issue, few persons realise that each item is designed to serve a practical purpose in the range-rider's performance of his duties.

Next to his horse, says Starrett, a cowboy's best friend is his hat. He uses it to feed and water his horse, to carry water any distance, to shade himself under a sweltering sun, and, when he pulls it down over his eyes, to protect his head while riding through the brush.

The brightly coloured neckerchief, knotted tightly around the neck, keeps dust and grime from sliding down inside the cowboy's shirt, and, when riding behind cattle, he will tie it round his mouth and nose to keep the dust kicked up by flying hoofs from his air passages.

Cowboy boots are high-heeled in order to enable a rider to keep hold of the stirrups while riding at breakneck speed down steep canyons.

Chaps not only protect a cowboy's clothes while riding through briars and brush, but also serve as leg protectors during cold or rainy weather.

Mowbray Meets Many Deaths

The cat with nine lives has nothing on Alan Mowbray.

The versatile free-lance actor, who flits from scoundrels to heroes and back again with the greatest of ease in his screen portrayals, is alive and happy and busier than ever in real life, but, cinematically speaking, he's Hollywood's most killed-off personality.

Among other untimely ends, he has been guillotined, hanged, crushed to death, machine-gunned, electrocuted, turned to stone and stabbed, without mentioning any number of natural demises. He can't recall any fatal poisonings on the screen, although it happened to him in his stage career.

Currently Mowbray, who, of course, is an Englishman, is leaping to his doom from a court-room window, after being exposed by George Brent as an unscrupulous San Francisco lawyer, in Walter Wanger's Paramount production, "The Case Against Mrs. Ames."

He stepped right into this rôle from another Wanger production, "Fatal Lady," in which he plays a wealthy Brazilian roué and gets a knife through his heart for falling too violently in love with Mary Ellis.

In "Embarrassing Moments" Mowbray's villainy earned him the electric chair.

The script writers made sure that he well merited the hanging that was his lot in "Charlie Chan in London." He was filled with machine-gun lead in "Man about Town," while a plain pistolling was good enough for him in "Guilty Hands."

NEXT WEEK'S SMASHING FILM DRAMAS!

PRESTON FOSTER

—IN—

"HOUSE OF FATE"

A dog is found shot, a man's life is threatened, a man on the point of disclosing a secret is murdered, and a girl is kidnapped. A free-lance detective succeeds where the police fail. A baffling and thrilling mystery drama.

"LUCKY FUGITIVES"

Because of his remarkable resemblance to a gangster wanted by the authorities, Jack Wyckoff, a successful young author, is pursued by a blundering detective—and experiences a series of exciting adventures in the company of a self-willed girl. A first-rate comedy thriller, starring David Manners.

Also

Another grand episode of the dramatic serial:

"FLASH GORDON"

Starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers.

Mowbray was beheaded in "Voltaire," he turned to stone in "Night Life of the Gods," and they let him die a lingering death from fever in "Becky Sharp."

In private life Mowbray is one of the most popular members of the film colony. He's a novelist and playwright as well as an actor, a crack polo player, an amateur photographer of note, and a flyer. He served in the air during the War, and has just completed the writing of a war trilogy.

Oliver Hardy Continues to Gain Weight
Oliver Hardy, Stan Laurel's robust and jolly partner, is gaining weight! And when you consider that he has always raised the beam around 250 pounds, that his father weighed 251, his mother 220, his four brothers and sisters and four uncles and aunts all were 200 pounds or better, it is something when Oliver starts to balance scales upwards.

During the filming of the latest Hal Roach-Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer feature comedy, "Our Relations," Hardy was induced to measure the pounds on his six-foot-one frame, and the marker went to 285—the most Oliver has ever reached, and also making him the heavy-weight of a heavy-weight family.

The reason for the increase in weight is difficult to fathom. It is a matter of fact that for a big man Hardy is a light eater. He eats much less than his co-star, Stan Laurel, who goes along his merry way at the table and otherwise and averages in the neighbourhood of 150 pounds.

Hardy exercises regularly. He's an enthusiastic golfer, and whenever he is not working in a picture at the Roach studios, he is out on the golf course, walking miles. Perhaps it's laughter that does it, because Oliver is a jolly soul and is continually laughing.

Think what a calamity it would be if he fell off to a feather-weight! Such things have happened.

"Red" Commerce

Henry King found an ideal spot for the background of one of the scenes in "Ramona," the Twentieth Century-Fox Technicolour production now being filmed in the highlands of the San Jacinto Mountains.

An Indian resident accepted £20 as a day's rental of the property.

In mid-afternoon, on the last scene of Loretta Young and Don Ameche, who have the leading rôles in the early California romance, another Indian rode up in front of the cameras.

"Pay!" he commanded.

"We paid an Indian £20 this morning," explained Director Henry King.

The brave was completely uninterested. "Wrong Indian," he said. "Pay me."

He was paid.

Unseen Heroes

Phillip Reed, who plays the rôle of Uncas in the screen version of the Fenimore Cooper classic, "The Last of the Mohicans," is very proud of his baritone voice. His part of an Indian brave gave him plenty of opportunity to use it in emitting the customary blood-curling war-whoops.

But his singing master, fearful, no doubt, of having a broken Reed on his hands, thought that an excess of whooping would wreak havoc with his pupil's delicate membranes.

The producers were in a quandary until a certain Mr. Harvey Shepherd gallantly offered to lay down his own vocal chords in the cause of realism and act as voice "double" for the more raucous cries.

He was discharged from the Marines with ignominy and joined a renegade white man in smuggling guns and ammunition to a Chinese bandit, but when his former pals are in danger he goes to their rescue through a hail of bullets. A fighting drama, starring Lew Ayres

Their Last Chance'

"PARTY, halt! Right turn! Cadets MacDonald, Waters and Davis, all present and correct, sir!" Sergeant Regan saluted and clicked his heels.

Captain Halstead of the United States Battle-Cruiser Washington looked at the three prisoners. On the right stood a tall, handsome young Scotsman, in the centre a fat, very nervous youth, and on the left a slight, wiry and defiant person with a black eye—Cadets MacDonald, Waters and Davis.

"So this time you spent the night in a Cuban gaol," remarked the captain. "May one ask how you got there?"

MacDonald just stared straight to his front, but Waters gave an apprehensive glance at the youth on his left. The captain did not miss very much.

"I have an idea, Davis, that you can tell me best what happened. I might add that but for the kindness of Sergeant Regan, who went out looking for you, you might have spent some time in that gaol." The captain gave a sarcastic grin. "And Cuban gaols are not over clean. Tell me, Davis, in your own words what happened."

Woody Davis took a pace forward and gave a slight cough.

"Well, sir, it was like this. Leave was given to go ashore, and, having been warned that there were a peculiar crowd down in the native quarter we kept to what we thought were the civilised parts." He paused because he did not want to make any mistakes with this story. "We got tired of sight-seeing, and Tubby—I mean Waters—suggested we should have a bite of food. We found a nice quiet saloon restaurant—"

"The name?"

"Some foreign name, sir, I think—"

"It was the Mexicana," snapped the captain. "You left a pretty good trail. One of the most notorious places in the town. Continue."

"Well, it seemed quiet enough, sir, when we entered," Woody murmured with his eyes on the ceiling. "We had a drink and something to eat and were thinking of leaving when a Spaniard came in and sat down at a table near us. He hadn't been there a second or so when a girl, probably a Mexican, came over and spoke to him. As far as we could gather, sir, it was his wife. They had a violent quarrel and he slapped her face. Well, sir, a Marine could not stand for that sort of thing, and—"

"As a result," interrupted his superior officer, "you leapt on the Spaniard, who probably drew a knife and then the fun commenced. Several other Spaniards joined in, and so your two friends decided to take a hand. In about five seconds that saloon was one mass of struggling forms. Eventually you were hurled out into the street, collected by irate police, and marched off to prison. The amount of damage that the proprietor says you have done would build a palace." He held up a piece of paper. "The sergeant and I have gone into this bill and reduced it to a reasonable charge, and it means that it will take at least three weeks' pay for you three to settle."

"Thank you, sir."

"I haven't finished, Davis." The captain's voice became stern. "As Marines I have nothing to say against you boys whilst on board this ship or when on duty, but give you leave ashore and you seem to forget the uniform you wear and act like hooligans. If this were the first time you had appeared before me I might have been inclined to take a lenient attitude, but it happens with a regular monotony every time we touch port. I have been far too lenient because I have imagined that each time would be the last time. All three have passed exams and tests, and yet once you get ashore your wits seem to desert you. You, Davis, are quick-tempered, and you act without thinking. You never heed the consequences, and as a result you get into a fix, out of which your companions strive to get you. I'm not saying that all the blame is yours, Davis, because I think they're almost as hasty themselves."

"Oh, no, sir!" cried Davis. "I was to blame, sir. I never thought that Mac and Tubby—I mean Waters—would join in."

"You never do think!" the captain frowned angrily. "At any rate, I've decided this sort of thing shall stop. It gives the U.S. Navy a darned bad name. You, MacDonald, have applied for a commission. Except for these foolish black marks you have every chance, but I tell you this: One more black mark and your papers will be torn up and you will never get a commission. You, Waters, wish some day to obtain a commission. Take my advice and stay out of trouble if you want promotion. I suggest that you stay away from your two friends and away from trouble, Davis. One more row like this and it won't be a question of promotion. You will be fired out of the navy, Davis. You will be stopped three weeks' pay, and all shore leave cancelled for three months. Sergeant, see that they serve an extra fatigue for a month."

"Very good, sir!" The sergeant clicked his heels. "Escort and party, right turn, quick march!"

The prisoners were marched out of their commander's room and dismissed.

"I'm staying away from you," MacDonald spoke significantly. "Just the same as if you were poisoned ivy."

"I'm sorry, pals," Woody Davis grinned. "But I swear on my word of honour to stay out of all fights and scraps in the future."

"You said that before," Waters said dubiously.

"This time it is a solemn oath," Davis answered. "No matter what happens I won't get involved in any brawl or scrape; in fact, I shan't even take the risk of going ashore."

MacDonald was not impressed.

"I bet you'll think different when the three months are up."

The Russian Gunman

NOT many days after the expiration of their three months' stoppage of leave the Battle-Cruiser Washington steamed into Shanghai. It was a glorious day, and Shanghai is a great place to go ashore. Needless to say, Woody Davis had amended his vow not to go ashore, but had promised to stay out of trouble.

The battleship berthed, and leave was not granted to anybody. The reason for this was explained two days later when the captain explained that Marines from the battleship were to be sent to the International Settlement in relief of an American contingent stationed there. It was expected that these land duties would last about a fortnight, and during that time the men would be granted leave to go into the town.

The three friends were in the party detailed for land duty, and after fixing up their quarters in the large barracks an orderly announced that those desirous of leave should apply to the officer in charge. Woody Davis announced that he intended to take a stroll down town, and Waters, after a moment's hesitation, decided to go with him; but MacDonald shook his head decidedly.

"This lad is staying right here," he announced. "I'm not going to endanger my chances of a commission."

"But Shanghai's a swell dump," urged Woody.

"Yeah, but I'm not taking chances," grinned MacDonald. "I've been lured astray before, and I haven't forgotten what was said the last time I was on the mat. My papers have passed through a good many hands since that incident, and the authorities appear to have overlooked that last escapade in a Cuban gaol, but I'm mighty sure it'll be remembered quick enough if I get into further trouble. Don't think, old lad, that I expect you to get into a jam because you made a solemn promise, but I'm not taking any chances. When I've got that commission it'll be a different matter." He turned to Waters. "Tubby, I'm glad you're going with Woody, but for the love of Mike steer him clear of all trouble."

"We're taking a stroll and no more," vowed the fat lad.

"Nothing's going to happen," promised Woody, with a laugh. "I don't care if I see a hundred damsels in distress, people having fights, wars, battles or anything, I am not going to interfere. Come on, Tubby, let's get going."

The two young Marines sallied forth, and for a while they kept to the main thoroughfares, until Woody remarked that there would be no harm in going to some nice quiet saloon for a drink. They looked at several, and as they looked dull went on their way, and then came to a place with a band. They entered the Bar Russe, and sat down at a table.

A fat Italian was behind the long bar, and he was kept pretty busy attending to the needs of his customers, who lounged against the rail. Most of the tables were full, and Woody stared curiously at the people of many nations. After a while he gave Tubby Waters a nudgo in the ribs, and that cadet looked up startled. Woody gave a discreet nod of the head in a certain direction.

A fair-haired, not bad-looking girl sat alone at a table, and she was staring moodily before her, the iced drink untouched. Her coat and skirt were of a loud check, but in spite of her clothes there was something appealing in that whimsical little face. She seemed very bored with life, and they saw her yawn—a yawn stifled when she saw the interested gaze of the two young Marines.

Tubby grinned across at the girl, and she gave a faint suspicion of a smile in response.

"Looks English or American to me," whispered Tubby. "Did you see her smile?"

"Sure. Why don't you go and speak to her?"

"Just to show you you ain't the only lady-killer in the world I will!" cried Tubby, and got to his feet.

Woody grinned as he saw his fat friend amble across the room and, after saying a few words, sit down beside the girl. Woody had expected to see his friend receive a rebuff, and he was quite annoyed. He toyed with his drink and a few minutes later turned his head. Tubby and the girl were laughing, and that was more than he could stand, so he got up and strolled across.

"This is my buddy, Woody Davis," introduced Tubby. "We joined up together."

"Howdy?" answered Woody, and pulled up a chair. "What do you say to a drink?"

"Suits me," the girl answered. "Bout all there is to do in this hole."

"I reckon Shanghai is a swell dump," Woody was surprised. "What's the matter with it?"

The girl stifled a yawn.

"Sorry, Woody," she said in her easy way. "But if you had been in Shanghai as long as I have you'd be bored."

"You're from our old country," stated the young Marine. "Why don't you go back if you don't like it here?"

"Yes, why don't you?" chimed in Tubby.

"I was in the chorus on Broadway." She shook her head sadly. "Ah, those were the days! I came out here with an act, and the act was broken up when the chief dancer quit. I swore I wouldn't go back without making good, so here I am, sailors, doing a song-and-dance act whenever I get the chance at the various restaurants. Some days I have money and others I haven't. At the moment I am what the profession call 'resting.'"

"That's tough," Woody muttered.

"What's your name?"

"Brooklyn, and if you offer to lend me money I'll throw this drink in your face!" Her eyes flashed.

"As we got docked three weeks' pay for a bit of fun way back in Cuba that ain't likely," Woody said, with a disarming smile. "Though you're welcome enough to the few cents Tubby and I possess."

"Sorry I got so hot up." Brooklyn was apologetic. "But this place gets me that way at times—all nerves. If you want to do a girl a good turn just talk about Broadway, Fifth Avenue and all the rest."

So the two Marines bought the girl a drink and told her about New York and anything they could think would interest. She listened avidly, and confessed that she was trying to save so that one day she could get back.

"I'd rather starve there than in this pesky hole." She twisted her face into a grimace of disgust. "It's done me good talking to you boys. Staying in Shanghai long?"

"We're at the International Settlement. Here to-day and gone to-morrow," Tubby told her. "Maybe we'll be here for a fortnight."

"Will you show us round?" suggested Woody. "You'll know all the places worth seeing, and we could eat some place. How—"

He broke off with a muttered curse because someone had given him a vicious kick in the shins. He turned angrily, and saw the most unpleasant face leering down at him. A sallow, leering face, with the lips twisted in a snarl—a foreigner of some sort.

"Why don't you keep your great feet out of the light, sailor?" the man spoke with a queer accent.

"Why the dickens don't you look where you're going?" Woody jumped up.

"Go and fry yourself, baby face!" derided the man.

"Woody!" Tubby tugged at his coat. The anger died in Woody Davis as he remembered his vow not to get involved in a brawl, and reluctantly he sat down. The foreigner grinned in his unpleasant way and strolled over to the bar, where he lounged grinning all the while at Woody.

"I'd like to sock that guy just once!" Woody turned to his pal.

"He looks evil to me." The girl's face was rather white. "Some queer characters come into these places. They carry knives and guns. Finish your drink and let's get out of here."

"Okay!" Woody drained his drink.

"Yellow!" came the sneering voice of the foreigner. "Just like all you dirty Yanks!"

Woody went very red and his fists clenched; even Tubby Waters glowered at this insult.

"Come on—pay no attention," urged the girl.

"All Marines are spineless," came that mocking drawl. "See 'em shaking like a jellyfish!"

Woody threw off the detaining hand of the girl, and walked towards the bar. The old Italian proprietor watched the little scene nervously. The sallow man continued to grin.

"I dislike your remarks just about as much as I do your face," Woody said slowly. "If you think I'm scared of you, then you're mistaken."

"All froth!" snarled the man. "You're nothing but a kid playing at being a Marine. Like all the rest of your kidney you're yellow. A United States Marine—pah! You wouldn't stand up to a half-starved coolie. And that goes for all you pretty boys. You and your rotten navy make me laugh."

"Better mind your tongue, stranger."

Whereupon the man spat straight in Woody's face. There was one answer only to such an insult, and without thinking of the consequences Woody's fist crashed into the evil face. The man fell back half over the bar, and several glasses crashed to the floor. Suddenly the man, snarling all sorts of unintelligible oaths, hurled himself at the young Marine; but Woody had been taught to box, and he landed another stiff punch to the unshaven jaw. A foot lashed out and caught Woody on the shin, and the pain made him see red. He flashed a vicious uppercut and grinned as the man grunted. A hand slid down, and Woody guessed a knife was coming into play, and he jumped forward, gripped the man by the coat-collar and brought round his right with a blow that landed full to the mouth.

Then Woody stood back and wiped his hands.

Everyone in the Bar Russe stared and seemed spellbound. The foreigner slid from the counter to the floor and sat there sprawled with his head sagging grotesquely.

"That's that!" said Woody with a triumphant grin. "That'll teach him not to insult our navy. Let's go!"

The girl glanced at the sprawled figure.

"Look out!" she shouted.

"You skunk!" Tubby yelled as he saw the gun. The fat Marine hurled himself forward, and then the gun roared. Tubby spun round and sank in a heap on the floor.

Woody stared in horror, and with fury blazing in his eyes he leapt forward, but the gunman did not want to feel again the punch of the Marine's hard fists. He jumped to his feet and his gun roared, but Woody had ducked. The next bullet smashed a lamp, and in the confusion the man darted towards an exit. After him rushed Woody, but the gunman dived headlong through the swing doors.

The Marine lost the gunman in the darkness and after running a few yards came to a halt. Was Tubby badly hurt? He darted back to the saloon.

Woody pulled up with a jerk. A silent group were looking down at something on the floor. Very slowly Woody stepped forward and looked down at Tubby Waters. The Marine's head was pillowed in Brooklyn's lap and his eyes were closed. A flicker and the eyes were open and staring up at Woody.

"Not your fault, old pal," came the faint whisper. "I always wanted to die this way. Say good-bye to Mac. We've had great times together, and maybe one day—" Tubby's face twisted with pain and then his head went limp.

Then Woody Davis realised that his pal Tubby Waters was dead.

Dismissed the Service

IT was two days later that the Marines paraded in the courtyard of the International Settlement to hear the verdict and sentence on Marine Woody Davis.

With two armed Marines as an escort, the prisoner was brought on to the parade ground. Captain Halstead read out the finding of the Courts Martial. He was guilty of causing a disturbance that was responsible for the death of Tubby Waters, and it was the opinion of the court that his services were no longer required by the United States Navy. As from that day he ceased to be a Marine.

Woody raised his head and stared fearlessly at all those boys who had been his friends. Then Sergeant Regan rapped out an order to the escort, and Woody realised that it would be the last command he would obey. Sergeant Regan followed him into the barracks, ordered him to pack his kit and leave directly he was finished.

Only one person came to wish him good-bye and good luck—it was MacDonald.

"Don't take it too hard, Woody." He laid a hand on his friend's shoulder. "It was your past record that counted against you. Maybe in some of those other scrapes we were foolish, but in this last business you weren't to blame. But as the authorities kicked up such a fuss the captain had little alternative. Tubby wouldn't have had you act otherwise—he didn't blame you. What are you going to do, Woody? Going back to the States?"

"I'm not going back to the States till I've found the man that murdered Tubby," fiercely came the answer. "I'll never rest until I find that skunk."

It was decided that the body of Tubby Waters should be buried at sea, and when a solemn party carried the draped coffin from a gun carriage to the ship Woody Davis was in the small crowd that was present. His eyes were cold and hard. There was a touch on his arm, and there by his side was Brooklyn.

Davis rented a room in a cheap doss-house and spent the days prowling the city in search of the sallow-faced gunman. Except that the man he sought was Russian he could find out little. The Italian proprietor of the Bar Russe had seen the man drinking there once before, but he knew nothing that could help the ex-Marine.

It was Brooklyn, coming from a restaurant after an audition, who was chosen by fate to meet the Russian. She chose to cross the road and had to jump back as a large lorry came thundering round a bend. She got a glimpse of a sallow evil face at the wheel and her heart stood still. It was the Russian.

Brooklyn did not go direct to Woody's diggings, but went to the Bar Russe. She sat so long at a table staring vacantly before her that the kindly proprietor asked her what was wrong.

"I have seen the man that killed the Marine," she answered in tragic accents. "What shall I do?"

The Italian nodded his head understandingly.

"If you tell the boy that got dismissed the Service he see red and go after this man. Very bad Russian, he get all he deserve. You go tell your friend."

Brooklyn went to the doss-house and told Woody Davis that the man he sought was a Russian lorry driver in the employ of the International Portage Transport Company. Woody grabbed up his hat and was out of the room and down the stairs almost before Brooklyn had finished speaking, then the girl broke down and sobbed, for she thought she had sent him to his death.

With two armed Marines as an escort, the prisoner was brought on to the parade ground and Captain Halstead read out the finding of the Courts Martial.

Revenge

IT did not take Woody long to find out the situation of the warehouses of the International Portage Transport. The place seemed to be deserted and the gates were padlocked. Spikes were on the walls, but they presented little difficulty in this grim-faced youngster. He noted a light in one of the offices, and from his pocket drew out a gun, which he broke open to satisfy himself that it was loaded.

Stealthily Woody made his way among packing-cases and bales of merchandise. He saw a number of huge lorries with the name of the company in large letters on the sides. This was the place, but was it likely his enemy would be here? If there were no sign of the Russian he must hide in the warehouse until he showed up.

Woody did not consider the results of the showdown. He was out to kill the man who had brutally shot his friend, and the consequences were of little account as long as Tubby was revenged.

He darted behind a packing-case as a figure came out of the lighted office and strode across to one of the lorries. Difficult to see in the dim light, but Woody felt a queer tingling in his spine. Was this the man he sought? Very cautiously he went forward until he reached the engine of the lorry. He could hear the person working at the end of the lorry and guessed the contents were being unloaded. Very slowly he edged along the side until he could peer round the end of the lorry.

A figure was carrying a huge sack, which was dumped in a corner, and then Woody saw the face. With his eyes blazing and his lips parted in a grin he stepped from hiding. The Russian looked up at the sound and his lips parted in a snarl.

The Russian did not ask why the ex-Marine was here, and in a flash he had whipped out a knife, but Woody was expecting trouble. He was across the intervening space like a flash and his fist crashed into that evil face. His strong hands gripped a wrist and the knife tumbled to the ground.

He backed away, and shouting hoarsely the Russian rushed in with arms whirling, but Woody side-stepped and crashed home two mighty blows to the other's face.

The Russian was hurled back as if hit by a battering-ram. He spun round and sank to the ground.

Very slowly he got to his knees.

"I kill you, like I kill your fat friend!" he rasped.

The Russian drew out a gun, but a second quicker appeared the gun of Woody Davis. Two guns roared, but one was a split second quicker. The killer of Tubby Waters spun round, coughed hoarsely, and clutching at his side crashed to the ground. Woody had revenged the death of his friend.

As he knelt beside that still form he did not hear movements in the lighted office or see the shadow of a figure on the glass. As the ex-Marine got slowly to his feet the door of the office quietly opened and a tall man armed with a gun was framed in the opening. Moving stealthily he came up behind Woody and saw the sprawled figure of Drenov, his Russian lorry driver.

"Drop that gun!" he drawled.

Woody turned, saw the tall, alert man who covered him, and with a shrug of his shoulders tossed the gun at the other's feet. Neatly the man frisked Woody for a gun before standing over the body of the Russian driver. Satisfied the man was dead he motioned Woody to move towards the office.

July 11th, 1936.

Having no alternative the youngster obeyed. The tall man closed the outer door and pointed to a door, on which was marked the name of "L. Corrigan, Managing Director." Woody entered and found another man, an Oriental who looked a mixture of Jap and American. The latter covered Woody with a gun.

But the youngster was past caring. He had done what he set out to do, so what did anything matter? Seeing an open box of cigarettes, he helped himself to one, and picking up a box of matches calmly lit up. The two men watched him narrowly.

"You killed my driver Drenov. Why?"

Woody Davis blew out a cloud of smoke.

"I did kill him, but it was a show-down. If I hadn't been a split second quicker he would have had me. He'd tried a knife, and when that failed he drew a gun, so I had to let him have the heat. My name is Woody Davis, late of the Marines, and your man Drenov was the skunk that shot my pal Tubby Waters."

"I thought your face was kinda familiar," Corrigan drawled and pocketed his gun. "Hansen, you stand by the door and keep this guy covered."

He pointed out a chair to Woody Davis.

"Take a seat. I'm gonna talk to you. Maybe I can do something for you. If you help me then I might not have to tell the police about Drenov."

"What do you want me to do?"

"Are you game to risk your life?" "Sure," answered Woody. "I'll do anything bar murder. I had planned to hire out to the Chinese as a machine-gunner."

"Then you're just the man I need," Corrigan nodded his satisfaction. "We hired Drenov because he was supposed to be the toughest fellow in Shanghai. He was scared of nothing. Well, you seem to have walked in and made rather a mess of him. Drenov was doing very useful work for me as a driver and messenger. Will you take his place? The money's good."

"I presume he didn't only have to drive and run messages?"

"Davis, I can afford to be frank with you," Corrigan muttered. "This company ain't really portage. That's just a bluff to hoodwink the authorities, but of late they've been getting mighty suspicious. I had to have a man like Drenov to get any of my stuff through."

"What is it—dope?" questioned Woody.

"Gun-running," Corrigan answered. "And why not? China has a little war going on against the Royalists under General Cheng. Cheng is having a bad time getting guns, so the International Portage supplies him machine-guns, rifles and ammunition. I want someone to carry on the good work of getting the stuff through. Two hundred dollars a consignment."

"Make it three and you can count me in," grinned Woody.

The Chinese Funeral

WOODY DAVIS slept that night in the warehouse of the International Portage and in the morning he started work. He found that Corrigan had under-estimated the attention of the authorities. They were combing Shanghai to find out who was supplying Cheng with guns and ammunition.

Woody went out into the city to try out the lorry, and he was twice stopped and searched. He reported this to Corrigan when he got back. The tall man rubbed his chin.

"The warehouse is packed full of stuff," he muttered. "It is only a matter of hours or days before they search this place. We've got to get the guns away or else dump 'em in the river."

"Which means I lose a good job and you lose a lot of money," said Woody. "I'm going out into the city to have a walk round, and I might have an idea by the time I get back."

"What can you do?" Corrigan cried.

"There isn't a chance!" "Well, I've got the germ of an idea here." Woody tapped his forehead and grinned. "See you later, buddy."

He was back in two hours. Corrigan was giving orders to Hansen to have all the guns and ammunition dumped.

"They're searching warehouses—they're closing in on us!" Corrigan shouted in angry tones. "It means a terrible loss, but that's better than going to prison for about ten years."

"You're not going to prison and you're not losing your dough. Listen." Woody drew him out of hearing. "I've found a way to get through. By night-fall we can get on board the junk. Here's my plan."

Briefly Woody outlined his scheme, and Corrigan gasped at the daring simplicity of the scheme.

"Davis, you're a genius!" he cried. "I'll get down to the warehouse at the docks and give orders that we'll be loading this evening."

"What's the move after leaving Shanghai?"

"Simple," Corrigan grinned. "We have a warehouse at Yun Kiang. I send a messenger to Cheng, whose headquarters are forty or fifty miles away over the hills, and the Royalist leader makes a raid on our store. We put up a fake defence, but Cheng gets away with the stuff, and we collect a big dividend."

Early the next morning Woody Davis set out on foot for the docks, and he was amused at the attention displayed by the police and soldiers of all nations in every vehicle and lorry—the world was seeking the gun-runners. But Woody did not grin quite so much when he saw a number of Marines marching through the streets. They were halted and then dispatched in two's and three's about various duties. It was a shock for Woody when he saw who was in charge. It was MacDonald. He would have gone down a side turning, but the big Marine had seen him and came racing across the road.

"Woody, I'm glad to see you," MacDonald cried. "I was worrying over what had happened to you."

"I see you've got your commission—congratulations!"

"Come through the day after you left us," MacDonald grinned nervously. "You look as if you're fixed up with a job."

"I'm working for a trading company," Woody said casually.

"Did you find that guy that—"

"I did!" interrupted Woody, with a hard smile. "That account's squared." He pointed to a number of Marines holding up a lorry. "That looks like Tex Bond—what's he doing?"

"Tex is my corporal—great fellow," MacDonald explained. "We are searching all lorries and civilian cars for guns and ammunition. Someone has sent guns from Shanghai to the rebels and it is expected that this someone is trying to get another load through. We're going to stop this war by seeing it don't get through."

"Better start searching me," Woody said with an impudent grin. "I might be a gun-runner for all you know."

"I can see you helping a lot of blood-thirsty rebels," MacDonald answered with a shake of his head. He pointed. "Tex seems to be having a spot of trouble, so I must be going. When shall I be seeing you, Woody?"

"Who knows?" Woody shrugged his shoulders. "Your path and mine, buddy, seem to lie a good way apart. I'm off to some outlandish depôt of my company, but if I get back before you boys leave I'll look you up. Best of luck, Mac, as an officer."

"It's your turn for a break, Woody." MacDonald spoke with terse conviction. "Don't forget I'm still your buddy."

Woody Davis watched the tall athletic figure stride across the street and sighed a little sorrowfully. All the good old days were over, and the future was far from rosy.

A funeral procession came slowly into the large square, and Woody saw Tex make an effort to hold it up. Woody grinned in a curious way as MacDonald pushed Tex aside and waved the funeral on—he made his men stand stiffly to attention. Twelve big Chinamen bore the coffin, which must have been someone of importance because there was a gorgeous silk covering. With slow, solemn step the mourners bore their burden to its last resting place. It passed through the square on its way to the docks.

Woody waited till the funeral was out of sight, and then he, too, set out for the docks. The coffin was carried into the warehouse of the International Portage Transport Company, where doors were closed and people took up points to see that there were no watchful eyes. Off came the silk covering and the lid of the coffin. Inside was not the body of a mandarin, but machine-gun parts and boxes of ammunition. The funeral had been Woody's way of getting past the authorities.

They placed the parts of the machine-guns in sacks and filled them with rice, corn and flour. So well was it done that when complete the sacks looked quite innocent. The ammunition was hidden in a similar sort of way, and when the job was complete coolies carried the sacks aboard a large junk.

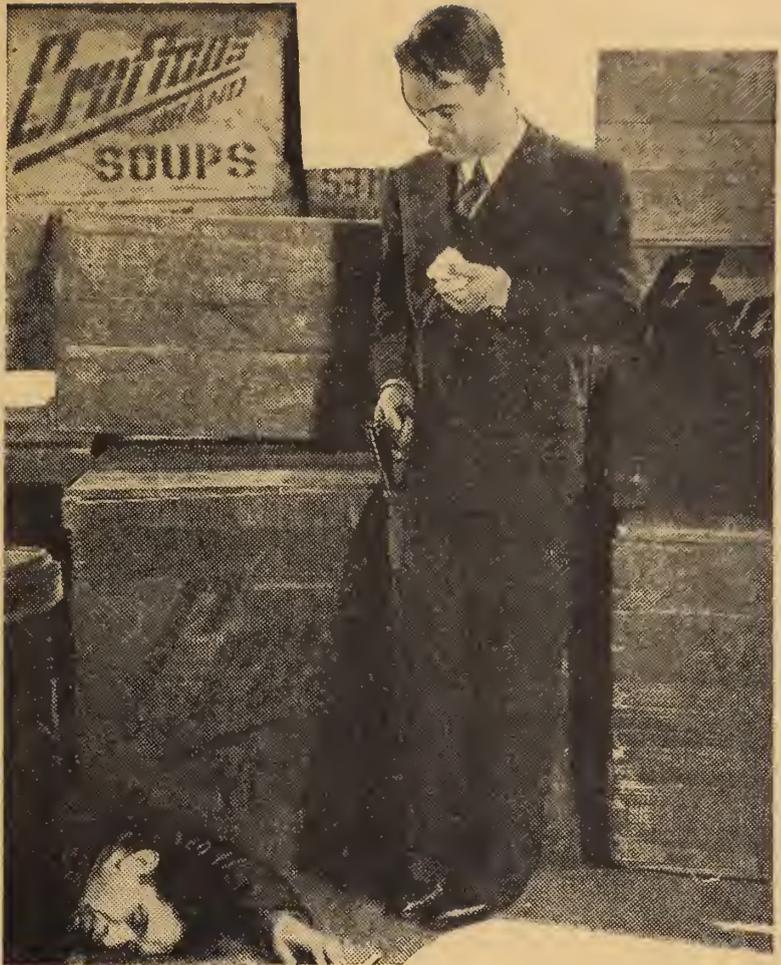

When Corrigan had settled all his business the junk sailed away from Shanghai. The clumsy sailing vessel passed quite close to the United States Battle-Cruiser Washington, and Woody stared at her with tragic eyes. What wouldn't he give to be back on her decks again? What was the use of wishing for the impossible? With a bitter smile he resumed his task of putting together one of the machine-guns—a precaution against being attacked by pirates.

Shanghai became a speck on the horizon and it seemed to Woody, as he sat huddled up in the stern, that he heard the sound of a distant bugle—a mocking reminder of the times that he had given up for ever. He squared his shoulders—one part of his life had ended, now to face a new life. He felt there was little hope for the future.

Brooklyn Hears Startling News

WOODY DAVIS did not see Brooklyn before he sailed, but he had not forgotten the girl. But for the girl he would never have squared the account with Drenov. From the bazaar he sent her several yards of expensive silk and a note that he would look her up when he got back to Shanghai. In the letter he stated that he had a job with a transport company and that his destination was the depôt at Yun Kiang.

Brooklyn missed him and realised that if she wasn't careful she would find herself falling in love. Woody Davis had flashed into her life, and maybe she would never see him again. Something made her go the morning after the junk had sailed into the Bar Russe.

The place was empty and so the Italian proprietor was delighted to have someone with whom he could talk.

"You are the young lady I wish to see." He came and sat beside her. "I not tell the policemen anything."

Brooklyn gave him a searching glance. "What does that mean?"

"You know you come here in much distress." The Italian spread wide his fat hands. "You tell me that you see the man that kills that poor boy, and you not know if you should tell his buddy what gets thrown out of the navy for making disturbance."

"Yes—yes." Brooklyn felt something dreadful was going to be told her.

"You tell him, but I no tell the police."

"Yes, I told him," Brooklyn said slowly. "But what do you mean about not telling the police?"

He stabbed a finger at her.

"You not know. That Russian guy what kill Waters—they find him. In the river—quite dead—shot." He saw her look of horror. "Drenov was his name. I have to go identify body. I know him at once." He touched his forehead. "Long scar here. Police take very big interest."

"Why?"

"Drenov very bad mans," answered the proprietor. "Crook, gunman, thief—everythings. Police know how Waters die and how Davis get turned out of Service. They say Davis kill this man for revenge and so they look for Davis. No business of mine, because I like that boy. You tell him go long way away and quick."

"He has gone—sailed last night."

"Good." The proprietor beamed. "When I go to view the body many questions they ask me. Why they take all these interests in dis dirty Russian gunman? I hear plenty whispers. They find out something about this Drenov." He winked. "Gun-runner."

"Gun-runner!" Brooklyn gasped.

"They think so, and they want to find out who he work for and everythings. I just identify man and no more. I do not say I think I know how Drenov die, or what you tell me."

"Thank you, signor." Brooklyn finished her drink. "I am more than grateful for what you have told me and what you have done. I do not know how this Drenov died, but I did tell Woody Davis, and if I get the chance I'll warn Davis. Good-day, signor."

Brooklyn's brain was racing as she tried to piece together the details. Davis had found Drenov and there had been a show-down in which the Russian was killed. Davis, in his note to her, had said he had got a job with a transport company and mentioned his destination, Yun Kiang, and Brooklyn knew that the International had a depôt there. Davis had got Drenov's job. And the authorities had been looking for Drenov because they thought he was a gun-runner. Woody Davis was in one of those desperate moods when he would do any sort of foolish act, especially if there were danger and adventure attached to it.

Woody had gone off in a hurry and had not come to say good-bye. What would happen if the authorities found out that she had told Davis where Drenov was working? They would go to the International Portage firm and they would find out that—what would they discover? The company did not appear to have made a stir over the loss of Drenov. She became more and more certain that Davis had got a job with the International Portage as a gun-runner. Everything seemed to point to that fact. Why, Yun Kiang was but fifty-odd miles from the storm zone.

Brooklyn decided that she would go over land to Yun Kiang and warn the ex-Marine of his danger.

An SOS for Protection

THE journey to Yun Kiang was long and uneventful. It was somewhat of a shock to find that the troops under Cheng were rebels and deserters. But Woody consoled himself with the fact that Chinese were fighting Chinese, so it wasn't his fault if he helped the wrong side.

The junk was slow and had to run into small coves for shelter, but eventually a wide river was reached and the junk nosed her way up-stream. The craft was fitted with a small oil-engine and she could just managed four knots. Naturally, Davis was very glad when Yun Kiang came in sight round a bend. The junk berthed and coolies began to unload her. Davis saw everything packed on ox wagons and carted off to the company's warehouse, which was at the north-west end of this small port.

When everything had been stored to the satisfaction of Corrigan the two white men went across to a small but comfortable bungalow, where they proceeded to pour themselves out a well-earned drink.

"Good work, Davis," Corrigan relaxed his long frame into an easy-chair. "Lucky day for us when you bumped off Drenov. The Russian could never have got us clear of Shanghai. I bet Cheng will be glad to get the news this little lot has arrived."

"He's short of ammunition?"

"If he doesn't have guns and ammunition, he's sunk," Corrigan laughed. "I sent a special code message from Shanghai that we were on the way, and I made certain instructions about the money for the guns." He picked up an envelope. "I bet this is an okay." He had read the contents. "Cheng has sent a messenger to our head office at Canton with the deposit. The rest he passes over on getting the guns."

"What's the next move?"

"Did you see that queer old fellow that tried to sell me some fruit?" Corrigan laughed. "You did. Well, that's one of Cheng's spies. He was waiting here for our arrival. I gave him a message that his master should have the raid in about six days from now. Don't want to hurry this show and give anyone a chance of getting suspicious."

"Any likelihood of officials searching your warehouse?"

"No, they're a sleepy lot in these parts."

"Well, this job seems easier than I expected." Davis yawned.

"But if we try to run another load we may not find—" He turned as there came a knocking at the door. "Hallo, wonder who this can be?"

An elderly, tired American came into the room and nodded to Corrigan.

"Hallo, Hewitt, glad to see you." The gun-runner turned to Woody.

"Davis, meet Mr. Hewitt, of the American Oil Company. Mr. Davis is a new assistant."

"How do you do, Mr. Davis?" The American shook hands and turned to Corrigan. "I heard you had arrived with stores and merchandise, so I came across for a serious talk."

"Serious?"

"Do you know Cheng is in these parts?"

"Oh, Cheng!" Corrigan frowned. "Let me see—he's the leader of the Royalists, isn't he?"

"Rebels, you mean," angrily spoke Hewitt. "Cheng is the leader of an army of cut-throats and pillagers, and they tell me he's less than fifty miles away."

"He won't dare come any farther south."

"What's to stop him?" Hewitt spoke sharply. "I sent out some of my boys to get news, and they returned looking scared. They reckon Cheng is heading this way, and if he swept down on this place you know it would be a shambles. He would murder everyone, pillage, and then raze the place to the ground."

"Nonsense," scoffed Corrigan. "Cheng's not a fool. He'd have half the countries in the world up in arms against him. Yun Kiang is a sort of international settlement, and he would respect it. You don't really imagine, Hewitt, that Cheng would bring his men here. He might get cut off from the mountains, where he has his headquarters. Cheng's come as far south as he dares."

"Well, I don't think so," argued Hewitt. "I reckon Cheng is headed for Yun Kiang. My wife is here, and there's her sister, then there are my two assistants, Brown and Hutchins, and their families. That's my company only. There's that English rice firm, the French planters, and a lot more. Why, man, there must be twenty white women alone in this place and the same number of children. I think something should be done to protect them."

"What do you suggest?"

"The Battle-Cruiser Washington is in these waters," eagerly spoke Hewitt. "I can get an SOS message to them to land a party of Marines."

Woody Davis gave Corrigan an anxious glance. How would he deal with this problem?

"My dear fellow, you mustn't do this," Corrigan cried. "You'll get the Marines here, Cheng will never come within miles of the place, and you'll probably get fired by your oil combo for causing international complications."

"I want your co-operation," Hewitt retorted. "If this call to the Marines comes from you as well, then—"

"Now I see the whole idea," Corrigan sneered. "You know you'll get fired if you put through this call on your own, and so you want to drag me in to share the responsibility. You've probably tried the others and had no luck. Then when there's a devil of a row for getting the Marines here you'll slide out of it by pretending you were coerced. You're scared over

"Put your hands up, Davis!" MacDonald rapped out. "And that goes for you, too, Mr. Corrigan." July 11th, 1936.

nothing, Hewitt, and you want to get protection without having to take any consequences."

"I have wasted my time appealing to you, Corrigan." The other drew himself up. "I am afraid, for I have two white women on my hands. You do not think there is any chance of Cheng coming this way, and I think very differently, so much so that if no one else will back me I shall send that SOS through to the Marines on my own responsibility. I've been in China for thirty years, and I know what I'm talking about when I say Cheng is heading this way. Also I do not exaggerate when I say that that callous rebel would not hesitate to rob and murder white people. Good-night, Corrigan."

A stiff little bow to Davis and the American had gone.

Corrigan used a lot of strong language when the oil man had gone. All their plans were ruined.

"If Cheng comes there'll be the deuce of a scrap, and Cheng will get driven off." Corrigan banged a fist into an open palm. "No, I can't allow that—I must warn Cheng. What will that mean? Cheng will have to keep away, and, without arms and ammunition, will be defeated. We shall have all that stuff on our hands. Looks like ruin to me. Curse that fool, Hewitt!" He dragged out a gun. "I'm half a mind

"Leave the murdering to Cheng," coldly interrupted Davis.

Corrigan gave a foolish, sickly grin as he pouched his gun.

"I was just fooling, but for the moment I was so mad, I could have done anything."

"It's still not too late to do something," Woody Davis spoke. "If Cheng is no more than fifty miles away a fast time before a certain ex-Marine tried his hand at gun-running again. He was an outcast, but he had not sunk so low that he had to help a lot of cutthroats, and if he had known that the Royalists were just dissolute rebels he would never have listened to Corrigan's project. He grinned at that—he had not really had much option. At any rate, he was packing up directly they left Yun Kiang, and perhaps if he joined up as a machine-gunner in the Chinese Army he would stop a bullet that would end his worthless career.

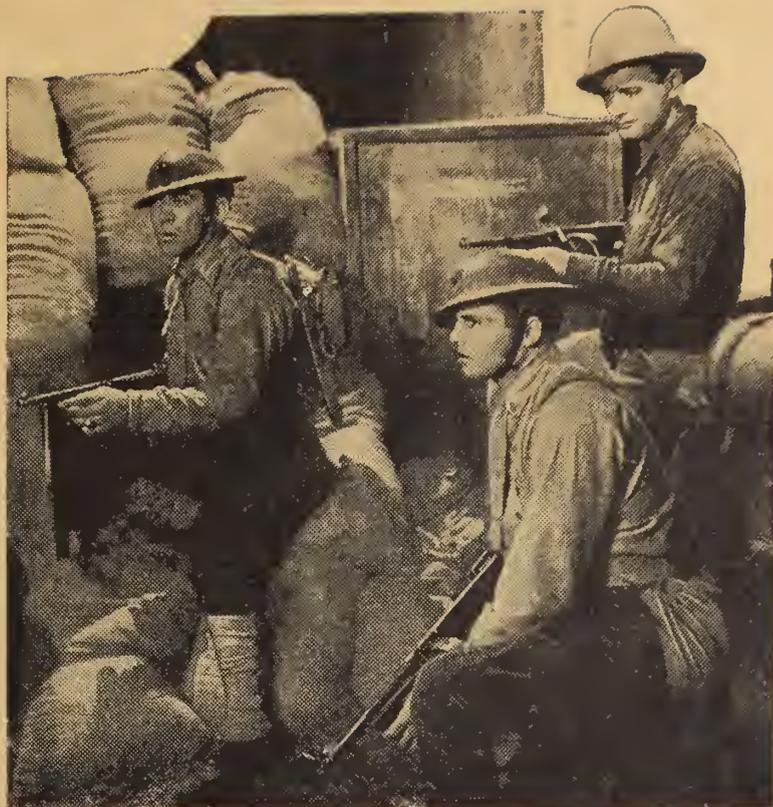

"Yes, I know it." Corrigan turned eagerly to his assistant. "You got us out of Shanghai, and if you can fix this jam I'll not forget it."

"The solution is simple," Woody Davis grinned. "You get on your fastest horse and you go like the wind for Cheng's camp, and you get the general to come here by forced marches. Those Chinks can walk for miles and miles, and they should be here in two or three days. Impossible for the Marines to be here by then. Cheng does his raid, and this warehouse is the only place touched, Hewitt grins and tells us that it serves us right, we depart from Yun Kiang to report to headquarters "at Caution." The youngster winked. "I'll stay here and hold the fort till you get back."

"My boy, you're a marvel." Corrigan slapped him on the back. "So simple, and yet I never thought of it." He shoved a flask of whisky into his pocket. "I'll start right away."

Woody Davis paced the untidy living-room when Corrigan had gone. Gun-running had seemed to him a most stirring sort of life—that had been his childish belief—but now that he was actually involved in the game he was not so stirred. They were supplying guns and ammunition to Chinks who called themselves Royalists, and as far as he could find out, Cheng and his men were nothing more than a bunch of looters.

Woody found the waiting very trying. Two days passed and he guessed that Cheng and his men should be on the move. He was surprised that Corrigan had not shown up, and the only explanation that he could think was that the white man was acting as a guide. He decided that once Cheng had got his guns it would be a long time before a certain ex-Marine tried his hand at gun-running again. He was an outcast, but he had not sunk so low that he had to help a lot of cutthroats, and if he had known that the Royalists were just dissolute rebels he would never have listened to Corrigan's project. He grinned at that—he had not really had much option. At any rate, he was packing up directly they left Yun Kiang, and perhaps if he joined up as a machine-gunner in the Chinese Army he would stop a bullet that would end his worthless career.

"Let them have it!" cried Mac, as the doors began to sway and splinter.

Woody's thoughts were not very cheerful, and he jumped nervously on the evening of the second day after his chief's departure when there came a rapping at the door. That couldn't be Corrigan. Perhaps it was old Hewitt again. He opened the door, and got the shock of his young life when Brooklyn walked in.

"What on earth are you doing here?" "I've come here to warn you." The girl closed the door and then flopped down in a chair. "Give me something to eat and drink. Travelling across country in filthy trains and ox wagons has nearly finished me."

Woody Davis poured her out a drink and got out some cold food. He wondered what she meant by her ominous words. At last she pushed away her plate and gave a sigh of satisfaction.

"That's better," she remarked, and then gave him a reproving glance. "You didn't tell me the whole story back in Shanghai, and now the cops are looking for you."

"The police?"

"Yes—listen. First of all, thanks for the note and the present. It's lucky for you that you mentioned Yun Kiang. The day after you vanished I went into the Bar Russe, and I got talking with the proprietor. The body of Drenov was fished out of the water, and he had had to identify it. He admitted it was the man who had shot Waters in his saloon, but because he felt sorry for you he did not say anything about my visit to the Bar Russe when I asked his advice. You see, I was worried when I saw Drenov driving that lorry, and hesitated whether I should tell you, because I knew you would go after the Russian. The proprietor said that Drenov deserved all that was coming to him, and so I came and told you. You rushed out, and I can piece together the rest. You met Drenov and killed him."

"Not quite." He smiled. "I found the transport company, and I got inside, and by luck found Drenov unloading a lorry. He drew a knife on me, and I knocked him down, then he drew his gun, and it was his life or mine. I was just a fraction of a second quicker."

"I'm glad you didn't shoot him down in cold blood. Then you took his place with the company?"

"You guessed right, sister. Corrigan appeared with a gun and hauled me into his office. I had the option of taking Drenov's place or being handed over to the authorities. Corrigan was gun-running for the Royalists, and as that sort of life seemed exciting, and I was not keen on a prison, I joined up."

"You know these Royalists are rebel deserters—the scum of the earth?"

"Yes, I found that out when I got here. After this"—he pulled himself up—"I am resigning in a few days."

"Don't stall." Brooklyn spoke fiercely. "You managed to get guns and ammunition past the authorities, and the stuff's here." He nodded. "It is known that Drenov was mixed up with some gun-running joint, and it won't be long before they know the name of the company. They were bound to question that proprietor again, and then they would want to talk with me—that would have spilled it. I quit town and came up country."

"You're a great pal." He grinned at her fondly. "Guess I'll have to tell you everything."

Briefly Woody told her of the funeral procession and of the journey to Yun Kiang. He explained how Corrigan had gone off to get Cheng to hurry because Hewitt of the oil company had radio'd the Marines.

"They'll be here any time, and you're not going to be on the scene when those Chinese bandits show up," he concluded. "I'm sending you down to Mrs. Hewitt."

Brooklyn did not want to go, and they were busy arguing when the door swung open and Corrigan strode into the room. The tall man pulled up short with a look of amazement when he saw the girl.

"Take it easy, chief. She's one of us," the youngster cried. "She's come all the way from Shanghai to put me wise to the fact that Drenov's body has been found and that the authorities are making a lot of searching inquiries."

Corrigan gave the girl a suspicious glance, but Woody persuaded him to sit down and listen.

"She can't stay here," Corrigan said when he heard everything. "I found Cheng and acted as a guide. His men are only a few miles away. I rode on so that I should be here when the fun commenced. Directly the show's over we'll get down to Canton until this has all blown over. Now, young lady, you had better get going. Cheng and his rebels are nasty customers, and there may be lead flying around."

Corrigan gave her a note for Mrs. Hewitt and Woody saw her on her way. He could not go far as Cheng might arrive at any moment. Brooklyn found Mrs. Hewitt a kindly soul. The girl told some story about coming to Yun Kang because she had an uncle who was a missionary, and Mrs. Hewitt, whether she believed the story or not, did not question it. Brooklyn was very welcome to stay.

Brooklyn had not been there more than a few minutes when she heard a lot of commotion out in the narrow street. Chinamen were rushing about and talking excitedly. Her heart missed a beat when she saw a body of blue-coated, steel-helmeted figures.

The Marines had landed, and with grim determination had made their way overland through marsh lands and forests to reach Yun Kiang much sooner than anyone had expected.

An Order for Arrest

HEWITT met the Marines, and he had arranged where the men should be billeted. The two officers in charge of the party were Captain Halstead and Lieutenant MacDonald, and what more natural than that they should be billeted with the Hewitts.

The Marines had no sooner got back to the Washington than the S O S call had been received from Hewitt of the American Oil Company. Captain Halstead was not sorry to get the call, because he felt that a slight stigma rested on the Marines. It was felt that gun-runners had got out of Shanghai by some ruse, and it must have been done under the noses of the Marines.

Captain Halstead knew that after the finding of Drenov the city had been combed, and he had attended a secret conference of representatives of those nations concerned with the China Seas. They expressed themselves willing to lend all help to China to stamp out July 11th, 1936.

rebels such as Cheng, especially as this renegade general was a callous murderer of innocent people. The warehouses of the International Portage Transport Company were found closed up and deserted, and an opinion was expressed that it was suspicious that Corrigan had left Shanghai about the time of the gun-running. The dock warehouses showed signs of recent activity. That the International Portage Transport Company had a depot at Yun Kiang was a factor that puzzled the captain, especially with Cheng threatening to sweep down on the place.

Hewitt informed the captain soon after his arrival that the responsibility of the S O S was his, as Corrigan was all against sending for the Marines. That item of news made the shrewd captain more and more certain that the transport company was not all that it should be.

The two officers went to the Hewitts house, and the first person they saw there was Brooklyn.

MacDonald saw the look of fear in this girl's eyes, and he wondered where he had seen her. Suddenly he remembered a picture in the paper. This was the girl that had been with Davis and Waters on that tragic night at the Bar Russe. It was Mrs. Hewitt, who forged another link. She explained that Brooklyn had been sent to her for refuge by Mr. Corrigan of the International Portage Transport Company.

"Why couldn't you have stayed with the company?" the captain questioned Brooklyn.

"They're only men there," she countered.

"There are only two white men," interposed Mr. Hewitt. "Corrigan and a new assistant—a Mr. Davis."

"Davis—Woody Davis!" cried MacDonald, staring at the girl. "That's why you're here?"

"She's got an uncle who is a missionary," said kindly Mrs. Hewitt.

"You came here to see Davis," MacDonald was certain. "It is Woody Davis that is working for the International, isn't it?"

"Yes," Brooklyn admitted, "and I have got an uncle who is a missionary. Why the excitement?"

"Young lady." Captain Halstead stepped forward. "I know who you are now. Just before I left Shanghai the authorities were very anxious to have a talk with you, but you had vanished. Young ladies don't travel all this way under most difficult conditions unless they have some very good reason. The body of the man who shot Cadet Waters was found in the river, and Drenov is suspected to have been a gun-runner."

"Woody Davis spoke to me in Shanghai and said he had a new job," MacDonald chipped in. "He seemed interested in the fact that we were searching all lorries and cars for arms."

"Drenov was an employee of the International Portage." The captain nodded his head. "This puzzle is beginning to fit together. Drenov shot Waters, is killed, and Woody Davis gets a job with the same company. What as?"

"Search me!"

Brooklyn tried to feign indifference.

"You cleared out because you did not want to be questioned," accused the captain. "Maybe you also heard something that you thought Woody Davis should know. Davis is the kind of wild, desperate fellow who would take on a risky job like gun-running."

"You're jumping to conclusions," Brooklyn cried. "Suppose Drenov did die, mightn't Davis have gone round looking for a job and got his place?"

They might have hired Drenov in the first place without knowing his character."

"The police have a strong idea from what they have learnt from the proprietor of the Bar Russe that Davis knew Drenov was working for International, a company about whom they have their suspicions." The captain turned to MacDonald. "I've a hunch that if there are any guns about they're in their warehouse in this town. I—"

The door burst open and an exhausted Chinese villager staggered into the room and began babbling to Hewitt.

"This is serious," Hewitt cried when the man had finished. "I sent out spies, and they informed me that Cheng was heading this way. This is another of my men, and he reports that Cheng and his men are but a few miles away. He has run all the way with the news."

"What has Yun Kiang got to offer that is so attractive?" Captain Halstead gave a grim smile. "There are towns and villages that would give Cheng rich pillage and easy to get, yet he must head for Yun Kiang. Besides the oil company and a few stores there are no rich merchants or mandarins here, and Cheng is a good distance from his retreat in the hills. He has a mission to this town, and that mission is to get guns and ammunition—we know he is short of both. MacDonald, take Tex with you and go to the International and arrest Woody Davis."

"On what charge, captain?"

"Take a look round that warehouse and see if you can find guns for gun-running. If you don't, bring him along here to be questioned concerning the death of Drenov the Russian. Warn the boys to stand by ready to repel an attack by handits. Tell them to keep under cover. We may spring a warm reception on General Cheng."

"Suppose we find guns at the warehouse?" asked MacDonald. "If we bring Davis away the Chinks may get them."

"You'll have to use your own initiative, MacDonald," decided the captain. "If there are guns Cheng mustn't get them. I must stand by to see where Cheng will attack. If the attack develops round the warehouse I'll move up the men to counter-attack."

"You haven't got anything on Woody Davis, and you won't find any guns," raged Brooklyn. She curled her lip at MacDonald. "I thought you used to be his friend."

MacDonald stared in shamed manner at the floor, then remembering that duty must come first strode out into the night.

A Callous Fiend

CORRIGAN and Davis went into the warehouse, and it was Corrigan's suggestion that Davis should take the lids off some of the cases.

"These Chinks will tear the place to pieces if they don't get the stuff quickly, and the sooner Cheng and his bunch have gone the better for us."

"Any news of those Marines?" questioned Davis.

"They can't get here for two or three days yet," was Corrigan's opinion.

Davis was busy opening a box marked "Danger" when two steel-helmeted figures quietly entered the warehouse. The box contained rifle parts, and Corrigan was staring at the contents when they heard a sound. Both men glanced round and stiffened.

"Put your hands up, Davis!" MacDonald rapped out. "And that goes for you, too, Mr. Corrigan."

Slowly they raised their hands, whilst Tex in the background covered them

As a roving cowboy, Johnny Flagg would neither throw in his lot with the homesteaders nor work for an unscrupulous rancher; but when he met Barbara McGrail, and heard her story, he risked his life quite readily to help her regain the ranch that had been stolen from her murdered father. A fast-riding, fast-shooting yarn of the West, starring Charles Starrett

"GALLANT DEFENDER"

Caught in the Act!

AT the bottom of the long hill, Johnny Flagg, on his milk-white horse, Pal, ambled out from a shady lane into a broad and dusty coach-road stretching from east to west, and there stopped short.

Pulling the brim of his ten-gallon sombrero over his eyes to shield them from the sudden glare of the sun, he looked about him. He had rather lost his bearings in the last half-hour, being in strange territory, but as he was a roving cowboy in quest of a job, he was not particular in which direction he rode.

His keen brown eyes surveyed a landscape consisting mainly of rolling grass-land, bordered by wooded foothills, and rested upon a signboard attached to a tree-trunk, its wooden arms pointing to left and to right.

Slowly he rode over to the board, a care-free young man in the early twenties, good-looking, broad-shouldered, and tall even in the saddle he sat with easy grace.

According to one of the pointing arms, the town of Ore Grande was twelve miles away to the west; according to the other, the town of Whitewater was fifty-one miles away to the east. As Johnny was not acquainted with either of these places, and had been in the saddle for some hours, he turned in the direction of Ore Grande—and so changed the whole course of his life.

He had ridden no more than two of the twelve miles when he heard the unmistakable crack of rifle-shots somewhere beyond a clump of trees he had yet to reach, and he spurred forward to investigate.

Under the trees he dismounted, and, with his own rifle in his hands, made his way to the edge of the coppice and looked out across a wide expanse of grass.

Sixty or seventy yards away stood a covered wagon, towards which three horsemen were galloping, and on the ground beside it a girl was crouching over a prone figure. Johnny heard the piteous cry of the girl:

"Grandpa! Grandpa!"

It seemed evident to him that the horsemen had fired the shots he had heard, but he waited to make sure before he took any action, and he did not have to wait long.

Two of the riders swept towards a pair of horses which had been detached from the wagon to graze, and the third made for the vehicle itself and heaved himself from the saddle into it.

Everything was only too clear to Johnny now. He raised his rifle to his shoulder, and as the fellow who had entered the wagon jumped down from it, pulled the trigger.

His aim was true enough: the fellow sank to his knees, holding a damaged wrist and calling to his companions.

More shots rang out, and a bullet embedded itself in the massive tree-trunk behind which Johnny had taken cover; then one of the riders galloped over to his fallen accomplice and turned to below:

"Never mind the horses! Give me a hand with Smitty!"

The canvas cover of the prairie schooner was in flames and a crackling sound was issuing from its interior: a can of kerosene and a couple of lighted matches had done their work. The third rider put away his rifle and sped across the turf to help lift the wounded ruffian on to his horse, and presently all three were in full flight.

Johnny did not wait till they had disappeared. He ran out from the coppice to the weeping girl, and he tugged her bearded grandfather away from the burning wagon.

"Is he gonna die, mister?" she whimpered as he opened the neck of a red shirt and bared a nasty wound in the old man's chest.

"Oh, no, I reckon not!" said Johnny reassuringly. "Let me have your apron, honey, quick!"

She whipped off the none-too-clean apron she was wearing over her grey frock, and he tore it into strips and staunched the wound and bound it. The old man was unconscious, but he was breathing, and his pulse was regular, though weak.

"He won't die?" faltered the girl, who was fair-haired and little more than a child.

Johnny shook his head.

"I reckon an old fellow like him takes an awful lot to kill him," he said cheerfully. "He's one of the tough sort that can generally carry off more lead than a timber wolf. He's good for another forty years!"

A slight exaggeration, this last statement, considering that the old man was at least seventy; but it had the desired effect of allaying the girl's fears. The bandaging process was completed and Johnny got to his feet.

"Now if we can only get him to a doctor's," he said, "so as—well, so as he can be rightly patched up, you know—"

A pair of eyelids quivered and opened; a pair of rather bloodshot grey eyes looked up at them.

"He's coming to already!" exclaimed Johnny, and dropped on his knees again to raise the old man's head.

"Where can I take you?" he asked. "I'm a stranger in this district."

Samuel Hathaway was the old man's name. He replied with much effort:

"I've got—kinfolk—just this side of—Ore Grande. Up Las Flores Creek. I—"

The eyelids closed, the grey-haired head fell back.

"Oh!" lamented the girl.

"That's all right, honey," said Johnny. "Don't you worry—he's gonna be all right. We'll just get him on a horse and take him right out of here."

The wagon had become a flaming mass, utterly beyond redemption, and nothing could be saved from it. Johnny lifted up the limp form of Samuel Hathaway and deposited him gently across the back of one of the horses, then whistled to Pal.

The white horse came trotting out to him from the coppice, the girl was helped up into the saddle, and Johnny mounted behind her. A few minutes later they were moving slowly along the dusty road that led to Ore Grande, the spare horse close behind them.

That morning, in the town, a meeting of the local cattlemen was being held at the headquarters of their own association, a wooden building with a balcony situated just below a bridge that spanned a creek at the top of the main street.

Many years before, Ore Grande had sprung into being as the result of a misguided gold rush, but the land around it had proved excellent for cattle-raising, though completely devoid of precious ore, and the town had prospered, despite the eventual departure of the disappointed pioneers who had founded it.

Harvey Campbell was the chairman of the Cattlemen's Association, an elderly man of dignified presence and a fine type of rancher. He was one of the last to arrive for the meeting, and in company with a number of other ranchers and foremen, he paused on the steps of the building to look back as a covered wagon came rumbling over the bridge; but he did not join in the unfavourable comments of the rest.

Instead, he passed in at the doorway and went to a table at the top of a long room, whence he faced rows and rows of chairs, many of them already occupied. The men who had lingered on the steps straggled in after him and became seated, and then he stood up and addressed the assembly.

"That wagon we've just seen is only another proof of what I've maintained all along," he said. "When the Government throws land open to homesteaders, it's going to be homesteaded, and we might as well like it."

Barr Munro rose from his chair in the second row, tall, dark-skinned and aggressive. He was not generally liked, but he owned a lot of land.

"If the association stand together," he said truculently, "we can keep 'em out!"

"It's been tried by stronger groups than ours," retorted Campbell. "Men have been killed and their outfits burned, but behind them came others and others—and in the end they got the land."

Munro twisted the ends of his little dark moustache.

"It sounds like you're in favour of 'em comin' in," he sneered.

July 11th, 1936.

"Well, I'm not!" declared Campbell emphatically. "I hate it, the same as all cattlemen. They'll fence off water we need and cut up our range with bob-wire until there's no range left. We all know that."

Murmurs of approval greeted that statement.

"They won't if you fellows'll do what I've been advising for over a month," shouted Munro. "Organise! Patrol the roads! Run 'em out and keep 'em out!"

"Your advice is the purpose of this meeting, Munro."

"You're gonna act on it?"

"No," replied Campbell sternly. "We want to go on record officially as being against the war you're making on homesteaders."

"Who says I'm making war on homesteaders?"

"We all do."

"That's rather a serious charge to make, Campbell, without proof!"

Harvey Campbell shrugged his shoulders.

"The proof we've got might not stand in a court of law," he admitted, "but it's enough for us. You've engaged twice as many men as you need. They're all from out of the district, and they're all named Smith or Jones."

"That don't make 'em gunmen!" snapped Munro.

"It's a common trick for killers to use those names. Makes 'em hard to trail. Men have been shot, and their outfits burned, in the past fortnight. That's murder, Munro, and we'll have no part in it!" Campbell rapped on the table with a little mallet. "Am I right?"

"Yes," chorused fully a score of voices, and Munro scowled at many earnest faces.

"I've got a paper here that covers our sentiments on the subject," said Campbell, and he picked up a document and held it out across the table.

Munro walked forward and took it, but he did not trouble to read it.

"Are you asking me for my resignation from this association?" he demanded.

"We thought you'd rather have it that way," was the quiet answer, "instead of going on record as being kicked out."

Munro screwed up the sheet of paper and flung it across the room in a fury.

"All right!" he raged. "Let it stand as a resignation. You never wanted me in this association, anyway, and you all know why. You're sore because I've got the best range in the county! You're sore because I got it right out from under the rest of you!"

"You're wrong, Munro," said Harvey Campbell grimly. "We don't mind your having the range, but we don't care much for the way you got it."

A man in the back row stood up—an oldish man with a double chin. His name was Sherman, and he was a highly respected rancher.

"That land belonged to the McGrail family," he stated, "and we're not going to fight to help you keep it."

"I got it legally," roared Munro, "and I'll keep it with or without your help!"

"There's a good many things done legal that folks don't like," said Campbell, and the mallet descended again upon the table. "The meeting's adjourned."

Chairs were pushed back and the cattlemen streamed out into the sunlight. Barr Munro stopped on the boardwalk to bite the end off a cigar. Another covered wagon was passing down the street as Harvey Campbell stepped down from the doorway, and he directed Munro's attention to it with a nudge.

"As I said before," he remarked, "you can't keep 'em out!"

The Five "Smiths"

SIX miles east of Ore Grande the creek flowed through low-lying land beside the coach road, and there—on grass considered too poor for cattle—many covered wagons had congregated and a camp had been made. Johnny Flagg, riding slowly along the coach road with the girl between his knees, viewed the camp with interest.

"Looks like this oughta be the place your granddad meant," he said. "I guess this is the creek all right."

"Yes," cried the girl excitedly. "There's my uncle, over there! The one at the anvil."

A forge had been set up in the camp and a horse was being shod. Johnny reached out to hold the head of the animal that was bearing the unconscious Samuel Hathaway, then forded the stream.

Many pairs of eyes watched him, and as he reached the opposite bank, men and women gathered round, clamouring to know what had happened and who was hurt. But the girl slid down from the saddle and ran towards the anvil, crying out:

"Uncle Marvin! Uncle Marvin!"

The man at the anvil turned round with his hammer in his hand. He was middle-aged and bulky with a wide face and a ragged moustache. He stared at the girl and then at Johnny.

"Why, Millie, honey," he exclaimed, "how come you're travelling around the country with strangers?"

"He's no stranger!" she shrilled. "He's the one that drove 'em away when they shot grandpa!"

Marvin Hathaway strode over to Johnny. The wounded old man was being carried off to a wagon, and one of the campers was saddling a horse to ride into town for a doctor.

"What happened?" asked Hathaway.

"Where's his outfit?"

"They burned the wagon," Johnny replied. "All I could save was these two horses."

"Who done it?"

"There were three fellows. I winged one of 'em, and then they scattered."

Hathaway frowned.

"Munro's men, more'n likely," he growled.

"I've had enough!" blurted a nervous-looking little man. "If we're smart we'll pack up and head out of here!"

"A better idea," declared a black-haired man who had just joined the group, "is to get together and go after Munro."

There were several who agreed with him, but Johnny intervened.

"Just a minute," he said. "The old fellow I brought in needs attention. He's got a pretty bad chest wound."

"Hank's gone for Doc Ramsey, Dave," Hathaway stated. "Guess we'd better wait till he's been."

"I'm gonna stay here and fight 'em!" declared one of the campers, possibly because his wife was clinging to his arm.

"What is all this?" inquired Johnny curiously. "A gold strike?"

"We ain't struck any gold," grunted Dave, whose surname was Larkin. "but we've uncovered plenty of lead!"

"It's a kind of land rush," explained the little man who had suggested departure. "The Government's opening up part of the Jackson Reserve for homesteading, starting to-morrow morning."

"Should have done it long ago," said Larkin. "There's no timber on it."

Johnny rubbed his smoothly shaven chin.

"I guess the cattlemen don't like the idea much," he remarked.

"I wouldn't call 'em very encouragin'," returned Larkin dryly. "Would you?"

"Not very."

"None of 'em wants us," said Abe Nelson, the timorous, "but there's only one that's actually ornery about it."

"This fellow Munro?" suggested Johnny.

"Yeah," nodded Larkin, "Barr Munro. He's been leasing the land for years, and he don't aim to lose it."

"Bringing in gunmen, eh?"

"Plenty!" said Nelson with a grimace. "They'll never let us homestead."

"Well," said Johnny, "they certainly won't if you don't organise and do something about it."

"You ever had any experience in this sort of business?" asked Larkin.

"Not much," replied Johnny briefly. "Couple of sheep wars. Why?"

"I've got a hunch we could make good use of a man of your character."

"How's that?"

"Well, we're mostly farmers, but we're willing to fight if someone will tell us what to do."

"No," Johnny shook his head. "I reckon not."

"Don't say 'No' too quick," urged Larkin. "We could make it worth your while."

But Johnny was not to be persuaded. "I'm not a professional gun-thrower," he said. "I lend it sometimes when I think it's needed, but it's not for sale. Well, good-bye—and good luck!"

"We'll need a lot o' it if we're to reach that land office to-morrow," commented Larkin; and then Johnny swung himself up on to his horse and went back across the stream to the road, where he loped off in the direction of the town.

Barr Munro, after leaving the headquarters of the Cattlemen's Association, had walked down the street and entered the Equality Saloon. As he pushed open the swing-doors from the veranda he saw the three men who had wounded Samuel Hathaway and burned his wagon in the act of seating themselves at a table. He went to the bar, obtained a bottle of spirits and a glass, and carried them to the table.

"A fine pack of gunmen you are!" he said scornfully, as he poured himself a drink. "Sitting around here when you're supposed to be drivin' them nesters back where they came from! Do you crochet as well as you fight?"

Smitty hurriedly removed his bandaged wrist from sight.

"There ain't none of us can crochet, boss," he said gruffly.

"Oh, you can't?" Munro surveyed the unpleasant features of the three hired gunmen. "Well, you should take it up—I'll bet you'd be good at it!"

Out on the boardwalk Harvey Campbell was approaching the steps that led up to the veranda of the saloon, when the ugly but perfectly honest sheriff of the county, Luther Davies, hailed him from the middle of the roadway.

"Harvey!" he cried. "Just a minute! Wait a second!"

Campbell stopped and turned, puffing at the pipe that was in his mouth. The sheriff arrived, scant of breath because he had rushed over from his office, and he panted:

"You've got to get yourself a new sheriff, because I'm resignin'!"

"What, again?" Harvey Campbell removed the pipe from his mouth, blew a cloud of smoke from his lips, and laughed derisively. "This is getting to be a sort of habit, ain't it?"

The sheriff, whose snub nose and wide upper lip suggested Irish parentage, in spite of his name, screwed up a pair of beady brown eyes as though in pain.

"It ain't no laughin' matter, Harvey," he protested. "Look who's ridin' into town!"

Six horsemen were cantering down the street from the bridge, an ill-favoured bunch, all of them in need of a shave, and one with a black shade over his left eye. The elderly chairman of the association viewed them without comment.

"It's Joe Swale with another flock of gunmen for Munro," said the sheriff unhappily. "This town don't need a sheriff—it needs an army! I—I'm resigning."

"No, you ain't, Luther," returned Campbell firmly.

"Yes, I am!"

"No, you ain't! We elected you, and you're gonna stay put if we have to nail you to your chain!"

The horsemen drew rein outside the saloon and dismounted to hitch their horses to a rail. Luther Davies greeted the one who was most in need of a shave, a diminutive fellow with a pair of cunning, close-set eyes.

"Howdy, Swale?" he said gloomily. "Looks like you brought your boss some more punchers."

"Yeah," Swale stepped on to the boardwalk, and was joined by his five companions. "We've got a big drive on."

"So I understand," said Harvey Campbell, tilting his head. "Wouldn't be surprised if one or two of 'em wasn't named Smith."

"That's funny," Swale chuckled quite shamelessly. "Why, come to think of it, they're all named Smith! Now, that one on the end there is called Soap Creek Smith. The next

Once more the back of the wagon was visited, and this time Johnny returned to offer three guns to the dismayed Munro.

one is One-Eyed Smith, and next to him is Wind River Smith. Next comes Salty Smith, and the last one is Goose Neck Smith, who's a sort of a tender-foot out here for his health."

Of the five, the one described as Salty Smith had the least ruffianly appearance; but for the grime and the growth of hair upon his face he might have looked almost a respectable cow-puncher.

"Nice bunch of boys," said Campbell, surveying the five. "Very friendly!"

Swale grinned, but the sheriff scowled.

"Now look here, Swale," the dismayed official rapped, "this thing's gone far enough!"

"I reckon I don't understand what you mean, sheriff," drawled Swale.

"Oh, yes, you do, and it's got to stop, or I'm gonna—"

"You're gonna what? What is it you're gonna do?"

"Well, I ain't gonna stand for any more killings! I—I— Well, I'll resign."

Barr Munro's face appeared over the top of the swing-doors of the saloon.

"You'd better, if you can't keep a civil tongue in your head!" he shouted.

"I've heard all the lies I want to hear about what my men are doing!" He pointed a finger at Campbell. "And that goes for you and the rest of the district!" he added.

"But, Barr," the sheriff called complainingly back to him, "there ain't a day passes without a nester being way-laid and burnt out, or shot."

"There's a lot of other people to do that," retorted Munro. "There isn't a cattleman in the district that wouldn't like to see them all run out. They're trying to make me the goat for it."

The sheriff gulped.

"Oh, be reasonable, Barr," he said. "Why should they want to make you the goat?"

Barr Munro pushed open the swing-doors and stepped out on to the veranda.

"Because they want to see me run afoul of the law and get gunned out of the district," he replied, with an air of fierce indignation. "That's why I'm having all these men. Now, if the Cattleman's Association would like to have war, they can have it and in plenty!"

The sheriff looked at Campbell as though for help, but Campbell stepped down off the boardwalk and crossed the street, so the sheriff went disconsolately back to his own office. Munro descended the steps and looked the five hired men up and down.

"What's your name?" he asked abruptly as he came to the last but one.

"Salty Smith," was the reply.

"Salty Smith, eh?" Munro's dark eyes narrowed, and he beckoned to a man who had followed him out from the saloon—one of the three concerned in the shooting of old Samuel Hathaway. "Here, Tuscan, take these fellows down to the restaurant and feed 'em."

Tuscan, a lean-jawed and swarthy crook of Italian parentage, went off along the boardwalk with the five. Munro turned to Swale.

"What do you know about this man Salty?" he asked sharply.

"Why, no more than the rest," said his fornican. "Why?"

"Seems I met up with him somewhere, but I just can't place him."

Swale scratched his scrubby chin.

"There's a funny rumour floating around the south of the State, boss," he remarked.

"Yeah? What is it?"

July 11th, 1936.

"Well, they say there's a United States marshal on his way up here to pry into this nester business."

"A marshal?" Munro echoed, in obvious concern. "What's his name?"

"That I couldn't find out," replied Swale, "but he aims to join up with you, get the dope, and then start things popping."

"Oh!" Munro plucked reflectively at his little moustache. "I've got a hunch he's here already."

"Why?" asked Swale in surprise.

"Have you seen him?"

"No, but three of the boys had a run-in with him this morning and came out second best. I reckon they'll be glad to see him again!"

A Second Refusal

MUNRO re-entered the saloon, and Joe Swale went with him. They were leaning against the bar when Tuscan burst in upon them.

"That puncher we had a run-in with a while ago has just drifted into town!" he announced breathlessly.

"Where is he?" asked Munro.

"Stopped at the sheriff's office. Who d'you reckon he's after?"

"I know what he's after! He's a United States marshal."

"A marshal?" Tuscan's jaw dropped.

"Yes, and he'll be in here shortly, tryin' to join up with us—probably under the name of Smith!"

Joe Swale grinned.

"I suppose you'll hire him, too, eh?" he suggested with intended irony.

"Why not?" countered Munro. "It's the easiest way to take care of him."

Johnny had entered the town on its eastern side, having crossed the creek by a wooden bridge some distance from it. He had passed the restaurant in Gold Street without being aware of Tuscan's startled scrutiny, turned the corner into Main Street by the blacksmith's shop, and proceeded straight to the office of the sheriff, conspicuously situated opposite the local premises of the Wells Fargo Express Company.

The sheriff was in the doorway, talking to Harvey Campbell, and Johnny hailed him without dismounting.

"I'm looking for a job," he said.

"Maybe you can help?"

Luther Davies thrust his thumbs under his braces and leaned against the door-post.

"Oh, you're looking for a job, are you?" he drawled. "Well, I'm tryin' to lose one! Know anybody that's hiring any men, Harv'cy?"

Campbell, thus addressed, replied caustically that he knew of one, but that he wouldn't hire anybody whose name wasn't Smith.

"I've heard of that outfit," said Johnny, "and I don't want any part of it."

"Try the bartender up the street," suggested the sheriff. "He's the closest thing we've got to a newspaper in Ore Grande."

Johnny thanked him and rode on to the saloon, where he left his horse at the rail. Munro was lounging beside the bar, with Tuscan and Joe Swale, when he pushed open the swing-doors, and Munro promptly said in a low voice:

"You fellows scatter; I want to talk to him alone. If anything goes wrong, be ready to back my play."

Tuscan drifted over to the table at which Smitty and the other man were still seated, Swale dropped into a chair not far away from them, and Johnny reached the bar.

"What would you like, mister?" inquired the shirt-sleeved attendant behind it.

"Well," replied Johnny, "I'd like a job, if you could steer me to one." He pushed some coins across the mahogany. "Pour yourself a drink and think hard."

Munro moved towards him.

"Did I hear you say you were looking for a job?" he asked smoothly.

"I guess you must have," said Johnny.

"What sort of a job?"

"Well, I'm not particular, long as the elow's all right and the pay's pretty fair. Your name don't happen to be Munro, does it?"

"Yeah, that's right." Munro eyed him shrewdly. "Yours happen to be Smith, or Jones?"

"Smith'll do for the time being," said Johnny without the slightest trace of surprise. "What're you paying?"

"A hundred a month."

"That's what I thought! The deal's off!"

"Why, what's wrong?" Munro raised his heavy brows. "Not enough?"

"Too much! You're not hiring cow-pokes; you're hiring killers!"

Munro bore that accusation without flinching.

"So you don't want the job, eh?"

"No," said Johnny very definitely.

"My name's not Smith, and my gun's not for sale."

"Don't tell me your name," sneered Munro. "You've got 'marshal' stamped all over you!"

Johnny chuckled in a fashion that irritated.

"So you thought I was the law sneakin' upon you?" he said.

"Yeah," rapped Munro, "and if you know when you're well off, you'll sneak right out again!"

Johnny turned and rested his elbows on the bar.

"As a matter of fact," he said, "I'm not the law, which makes you pretty lucky."

"How come?"

"Well, if I was the law, I'd make four arrests right now."

"Yeah? Who and why?"

"Those three men over there, for tryin' to kill a nester this morning, and you for hirin' 'em to do it!"

Munro raised a hand and dropped it again, whereupon Tuscan leapt to his feet.

"You aceusin' us of a killin'?" he demanded menacingly.

"No," replied Johnny, "I'm only aceusin' you of tryin'. You did fire his outfit, and you tried to steal his—"

Tuscan whipped out his gun, but before he could use it Johnny fired from his hip and it fell from a damaged hand, smashing a glass on the table.

The others stared, not daring to move; they had never seen a swifter draw than Johnny's, or a truer aim practically from the holster. For several minutes there was silence in the bar-room; then Munro, standing beside Johnny, brought out his own shooting-iron and pointed it at his own men.

"Lay off your guns, all of you!" he shouted.

Johnny's right hand shifted.

"If you've got another trick," he said patiently, "you'd better put up that gun and forget about it."

The gun was stowed away without a word.

"Now walk over to the door with me," commanded Johnny; and because he had no option Munro obeyed, keeping step with the cowboy who had forestalled him and acting as his unwilling shield to the door.

"Better stand back, boys," said Johnny, "might be a trick! All right, Nelson, ride in—and ride slow!"

"I guess I was wrong about you," he said on the way. "My offer is still open."

"Well, I wasn't wrong about you," retorted Johnny, "and my answer is still 'no.'"

"I'll double the pay."

"I rode into town looking for work," said Johnny, "and I'm riding out still looking."

"Then," snarled Munro, "I'd advise you not to come back ever!"

"If I was the kind to take advice, I'd have stayed home and raised sheep."

The swing-doors were reached and Johnny backed out from them. On the veranda he put his gun back in its holster, and on the steps he encountered the sheriff, who inquired rather anxiously:

"Say, what's all the shootin' about in there?"

"I just had a little run-in with the Smith boys," replied Johnny cheerfully, and he jumped the steps and heaved himself lightly on to his horse.

The sheriff descended in haste.

"Hi! Hi, you can't leave town like this!" he shouted.

"Why not?" asked Johnny. "Am I arrested?"

"Certainly not! You're deputised!"

"Oh, no, I'm not!" Johnny flipped a gloved hand. "When I want to fight for a living I'll join the army!"

Joe Swale as well as Munro watched over the top of the swing doors as he ambled off up the street and over the bridge.

"Get a couple of men," directed Munro, "and trail him out of town—and see that he doesn't come back."

The Girl with Green Eyes

THE road out of town to the west was a pleasant one with varied scenery on either side of it. Johnny progressed slowly up a hill, munching some cold pork and bread he had taken from a saddle-bag. It had been his intention to procure a proper meal in Ore Grande, but circumstances had rendered that inadvisable.

Having satisfied his hunger and permitted Pal to satisfy his at the top of the hill, he descended at leisure into a long valley where trees abounded as well as grass.

At the side of the road, some distance ahead, a covered wagon was standing at a grotesque angle because its near-side rear wheel had come off. A small boy was down on his knees at the side of the vehicle, trying to slip a jack under the axle, and a tallish girl of about twenty was striving to raise the back high enough for his purpose with the aid of a pole she used as a lever over two heavy logs.

"A little higher, sis!" shouted the boy. "A couple of inches!"

"Can't make it," panted the girl. "Look out for your foot, Jimmy!"

The small boy backed away from the axle and she let the pole go up and the side of the wagon settle down. The weight had proved too much for her, but she had an idea she could get a better leverage by shifting the logs nearer to the tailboard.

"Jimmy, come here!" she called; but Jimmy had caught sight of a lone horseman, rapidly approaching, and he was clambering up into the wagon over the driving-seat.

The girl looked round at the hoof-beats, and then Johnny rode up, stopped his horse, and slid down beside her.

"Well, I guess you could use a little help, couldn't you?" he said pleasantly, raising his hat.

"Thanks," she returned rather stiffly, "but I think I can manage."

He nodded and smiled. She was a very beautiful girl and evidently one of independent spirit, but he had judged at a glance that the task she had set herself was quite beyond her strength.

"I guess you could, miss," he said, "but it'd be a lot easier not to."

"Hi!" piped a shrill voice; and up went Johnny's hands as the barrel of a rifle was projected at him over the tailboard of the wagon. Jimmy was holding the rifle, and two of his very small fingers were on the trigger.

"Don't let your thumb slip, young fellow," urged Johnny with a whimsical grin. "You might have to do this job yourself!"

The grin decided matters, so far as the girl was concerned.

"You may as well put that down, Jimmy," she said. "It looks as if we're surrounded."

Down went the rifle, and the youngster scrambled over the tailboard.

"Thanks," said Johnny gravely. "Another minute and I'd have sold out pretty cheap."

He stooped to move the two logs several inches forward, then picked up the pole she had let fall to the ground.

"Live in this district, miss?" he inquired.

"Not yet," she replied.

He thrust the end of the pole over the logs and under the wagon while the small boy looked on with his hands on his hips.

"Aiming to file on a homestead, eh?" suggested Johnny, testing the leverage.

"Yes."

He pointed to the axle.

"Now get that jack again, son," he said, "and let's see what happens."

"You betcha," said Johnny, and he crouched once more at the side of the wagon.

"You shouldn't have come on a trip like this without your husband," Johnny informed the girl as he bore sturdily upon the pole. "They're mighty handy things to have around at times."

"I haven't any," she informed him.

"I reckon that can be fixed." He raised his voice. "How're we doing, sonny?"

"You ain't getting anywhere!" the youngster shouted back.

"I guess I'm sorta out of practice."

Johnny looked in the girl's eyes as she stood beside him, adding her weight to the pole, and he noticed that they were green. Unfortunately, he did not notice that three horsemen were riding out through a gap in some bushes a hundred yards away to the left, for one of them was Joe Swale, and the other two were Wind River Smith and Salty Smith respectively.

The voice of Swale rang out:

"Hold it, all of you, just like you are!"

Up went the pole, down went the wagon, and Johnny swung round with his hands raised. Jimmy ran to his sister. Each of the three horsemen had his gun out.

"You shot one of our friends this morning, stranger," said Joe Swale harshly. "Get over to him, Salty, and get his gun."

Salty Smith put away his own six-shooter, got down from his horse, and went over to Johnny. The gun in that young man's holster was removed and pocketed.

"Keep him covered till I take care of this nester outfit," directed Swale, and he also dismounted.

Out came Salty Smith's gun again, and Swale put his away.

"Give me a match!"

Wind River Smith groped in his pockets for matches, and to Johnny's infinite astonishment a forty-five was thrust into his hand by its owner, who whispered:

"Don't shoot me!"

Johnny whirled round on Joe Swale and the alleged Smith from Wind River.

"Drop that gun and get off that horse!" he rapped.

In dumbfounded consternation Swale held up his hands, and his companion let go of his six-shooter and descended. Johnny said to the girl:

"Get his gun before it gets him in trouble."

She went quite calmly to Swale without getting in the line of fire, and she took his gun from its holster. Jimmy recovered Johnny's gun from Salty Smith without being asked.

"Now get back on your horses and peel your saddles off!" commanded Johnny. "Go on!"

Reluctantly the three unfastened the girths of their horses and dropped the saddles on the turf. Johnny grinned down at Jimmy.

"Now haze 'em up the road, sonny," he said, "away from town."

The small boy obeyed with alacrity. He set the horses running and flung pebbles after them to speed their departure.

"If you ever catch 'em," Johnny informed the disgruntled trio, "you'll find 'em, and your saddles, with your boss in town. Now move out, pronto! Come on, get goin'!"

The three crooks started off in pursuit of the horses, and Johnny fired over their heads as they ran, then picked up two of the saddles and tossed them into the wagon while Jimmy dragged the other one over. The girl handed him the guns, and he put his own back in its holster and deposited the rest beside the saddles.

The horses had disappeared over the hill at the far end of the valley. Swale and his companions were puffing up the hill.

"There's one little mystery we'll never know the answer to," Johnny remarked as he picked up the pole again.

"What's that?" asked the girl.

July 11th, 1936.

"That big fellow deliberately slipped me his gun!"

"He did?"

"Yeah," Johnny looked into her green eyes and found them fearless. "What I said about your needin' a husband still goes, miss, but seeing as how you haven't got one, why, you'd better turn around and head out."

She pointed across the landscape.

"See that ranch over there amongst those trees?" she asked quite calmly.

"Yeah?" Johnny viewed a wide expanse of rising grassland.

"That's the place I'm going to file on."

"Nothing like being ambitious!"

"It used to be ours. It was stolen from us!"

"How come?"

"Grandfather McGrail settled on it in the fifties, intending to file on it when the Government finished its survey."

Johnny inserted the pole between the tail of the wagon and the logs and put all his weight upon it. The girl helped and Jimmy crouched under the axle with the jack. Up rose the back of the wagon.

"Got it?" asked Johnny.

"Got it!" cried the boy triumphantly.

The axle rested on the jack, the pole was discarded, and Johnny raised the fallen wheel and rolled it back to its proper position with the nave over the end of the axle.

"When the surveys were made," the girl went on, "the land was thrown into Government reserve not open to homestead."

"I'm listening," said Johnny. "Go ahead."

"All he held was squatter's rights. He kept them by leasing from the Government."

"Where's the axle grease, sonny?" shouted Johnny. "Oh, excuse me. Go ahead with your yarn."

Jimmy brought a tin of axle grease and Johnny removed his gloves to use it.

"My father held it the same way," continued the girl, "leasing it for a year at a time. Then one day my father disappeared."

"Right about leasing-time, I reckon," said Johnny, and received the fallen hub-cap from Jimmy and screwed it on.

"They found him a week later, shot through the heart."

"And meanwhile, this fellow Munro had grabbed the lease," Johnny suggested, removing the jack from under the axle.

"Yes, our foreman!" she exclaimed.

"How did you know?"

"I didn't," said he. "I guessed it."

"He may have been the one that killed dad, but Jimmy and I were too young to know anything, so we went south to my uncle."

Jimmy took the jack. He was a quaint little fellow, no more than nine years old, but he was intelligent.

"It's open to homestead now," he said in his piping voice, "and we're gonna grab it!"

"Don't blame you," returned Johnny, and grinned at the girl. "All the same. I still advise you to head back and forget about it."

"Do you expect me to?" she challenged.

"No, but you ought to." Johnny wiped the axle grease from his hands on a piece of rag presented to him by the boy and pulled on his gloves. "Being as how you won't quit, and you haven't got a husband," he said, "there's one thing you've got to have, and that's a foreman. I thank you for offering me the job. Sonny, get in the wagon."

Jimmy made for the driving-seat, but the girl gazed blankly at the self-appointed foreman.

"But I—I haven't got any ranch yet," she stammered.

"No," said Johnny, "but you will have if our luck holds out." And with that he took her arm and marched her round to the front of the wagon as though there were nothing more to be said about the matter.

Johnny Takes Charge

A WOODEN building between the office of the Wells Fargo Express Company and a hardware store in the main street of Ore Grande had been taken over by a Government commissioner as a temporary land office, and a notice across one of its windows stated that it would be open for claims at eight o'clock on the following morning.

This notice had been posted after Johnny had ridden away from the Equality Saloon, and Munro was scowling at it from the boardwalk, with Tuscan beside him, when Harvey Campbell walked up from the restaurant where he had lunched.

"Making faces won't get you anywhere, Barr," he said coldly. "Why don't you forget the nesters? In the morning you can file on the section with the buildings on it."

"I aim to," snapped Munro, "but that doesn't give me any range for my stock."

"Well, as I said before, you'll never keep out the homesteaders."

"No?" Munro put his hands on his hips and spat. "Well, there hasn't been any in here—"

He broke off with an imprecation. A covered wagon had just crossed the bridge, driven by a girl with curly brown hair, and beside it, on a white horse, rode the cowboy he thought he had got rid of for ever. He bit nearly through the cigar that was in his mouth.

"Hold it!" said Johnny, and as the wagon came to a standstill in the middle of the road opposite the land office he drew rein beside the boardwalk and looked down at Munro.

"I thought you'd be glad to know I've found a job, Munro," he said with sarcasm.

"Yeah?" bit back Munro. "What sort of a job?"

"I'm this young lady's foreman."

Munro frowned at the girl on the driving-seat of the wagon and at the small boy on her left.

"Where's her ranch?"

"She hasn't got one yet," replied Johnny in the calmest of voices, "but she will have, to-morrow morning, about eight."

Munro's eyes narrowed at that statement.

"So you're campin' with the nesters now, eh?" he said.

"Yeah, that's right."

"It's kinda dangerous, camping in the gulch in this district. Treacherous climate!"

"Liable to be a cloudburst, wash-outs, and thunderstorms, eh?" bantered Johnny.

"Yeah, something like that."

"Well, we're all good swimmers."

He slid down from his horse and went to the back of the wagon, returning with a saddle which he dumped at Munro's feet, and Harvey Campbell looked on with unfeigned satisfaction as he made a second journey and two more saddles joined the first. Once more the back of the wagon was visited, and this time Johnny returned to offer three guns to the dismayed Munro.

"If your boys ever have any trouble making thunder," he said, "give 'em back their guns. Give 'em back their saddles, too. They may need 'em—when they catch their horses!"

He swung himself up on to his horse. "All right," he said to the girl. "Let's go."

The wagon had turned the corner into Gold Street, and he with it, when over the bridge came three barebacked horses, and behind them, at some little distance, three labouring crooks. After these animals and their pursuers had passed Harvey Campbell walked off without a word. But Tuscan could not resist the opportunity.

"Looks like you need about three more crochet hooks, boss," he remarked.

Johnny escorted the covered wagon to the camp by the creek. He had become quite friendly with the green-eyed girl who drove it, and he knew by this time that her name was Barbara McGrail. She, on her side, had acquired quite an admiration for the way he handled things, and little Jimmy had appointed him a hero.

Once more the homesteaders gathered round Johnny, after the creek had been forded. Barbara and her brother they welcomed, but they were even more glad to see the cowboy again, especially after they had heard the story Barbara had to tell—with interruptions on the part of Jimmy.

David Larkin suggested that Johnny should run the camp.

"Well," said Johnny, "if you really want me to take charge I'm willing, but don't forget it means war."

"That's the only way we'll ever get the land," Larkin declared.

"We'll follow orders," promised Abe Nelson; and the rest endorsed the promise.

"It'll be no fun," said Johnny. "They're liable to raid this camp, and they're certain to try to keep us from the land office to-morrow. They may even follow us to our homesteads—when we've got 'em! All right, if you want to stand and fight, strike your wagons. Throw 'em in a circle, with the fires and stock inside. Later on we'll post guard."

The homesteaders carried out his instructions; the camp became a defensive one, guarded against any sort of surprise. Towards nightfall, Johnny, beside a fire that Jimmy had kindled, enjoyed a meal that Barbara had cooked.

While he was satisfying a healthy appetite, Barr Munro entered the Equality Saloon and sat down at a table with Tuscan, Joe Swale, and several of the alleged Smiths.

"I intended to raid that camp to-night," he said to Swale in the hearing of the others, "but I don't know whether I dare with this bunch of old women you've brought in as gun-slingers!"

He poured himself a drink and swallowed it.

"I guess I got to," he decided. "You go get the rest of the boys, Tuscan, and we'll meet 'em at Sycamore Draw about eleven."

"Want us to go along, too, boss?" inquired Salty Smith.

"No," said Munro curtly. "You don't know the roads yet. You'd probably get lost, anyway."

About an hour later there was singing round the main fire of the homesteaders' camp, under the stars, when Johnny rode out beyond the ring of wagons with Abe Nelson and others and approached a man on guard under a tree, who whirled round with his rifle and challenged:

"Who is it?"

"Change of guard," returned Johnny. "Everything quiet?"

"So far, yeah," was the reply. "Good! Come along with me. Nelson, you take Iliggins' place."

All round the camp the guard was changed while the singing continued to the accompaniment of guitars and a fiddle, and the men who were relieved made for their respective wagons or tents to rest. Johnny left his horse in Larkin's charge and sauntered over to Barbara, who was sitting on the grass near her own wagon. Jimmy, on his knees, was leaning against her.

"Well," Johnny said to him, "seems like you're up pretty late for a man who's got to get up so early to-morrow."

"Oh, it's not late!" protested the boy; but Barbara sided with Johnny.

"That's right," she said; "you'd better climb into bed, Jimmy."

"Aw, gee, sis," Jimmy expostulated, "I wanta listen to the music!"

"You can hear just as well through the canvas," she insisted. "Go on to bed! Here's your nightshirt, all mended."

He took the nightshirt with an ill-grace and climbed into the wagon.

"Might not be a bad idea," said Johnny, "for you to get some sleep yourself."

"Oh, I couldn't!" she declared. "I'm too excited!"

"You're not worried?"

She shook her head emphatically. "It would be mighty ungrateful, after all you've done for me," she said. "I mean, for us."

"You were right the first time," Johnny informed her with a grin, and a little silence fell between them.

"You seem to have brought new life to the whole camp," she said after a while. "Look at them."

Several couples were dancing, over by the musicians.

"Well," said Johnny gravely, "a lot of things can happen before we get to the land office to-morrow morning."

Somewhere away to the left the sudden crack of a rifle stopped the singing and the dancing, and guns were drawn. Johnny moved out with Barbara from the circle of wagons and saw two horsemen riding across the grass.

"Who's there?" he challenged loudly.

"Post Number Four coming in with a prisoner," was the shouted reply.

"Nelson," said Johnny, and then, to the men who had followed him: "Better stay back, boys—might be a trick! All right, Nelson, ride in, and ride slow!"

Abe Nelson arrived with his prisoner, none other than Salty Smith.

"One of Munro's gunmen," he said. "Caught him sneakin' through the line."

Johnny looked at Salty and recognized him.

"What business have you got in this camp?" he asked, not too severely because of the gun incident.

"I've got something to tell Barbara McGrail," was the astonishing answer.

"Barbara?" echoed Johnny. "Here, Barbara, do you know this man?"

Barbara did not reply.

"Better tell them, honey," urged Salty Smith, "or they won't believe what I've got to say."

"He—he's my uncle," Barbara faltered.

"Your uncle?" cried Johnny, staring at her incredulously. "One of Munro's men?"

"Tryin' to prove that he killed my brother Solon—her father," explained

Salty. "My real name's Daniel McGrail."

"Well, that sorta clears up that gun business this afternoon," said Johnny; and then Barbara asked eagerly:

"Did you find out anything, Uncle Dan?"

"Nothing about your father," admitted her uncle. "I've come to warn you. They're going to raid this camp to-night!"

Half a dozen of the homesteaders shouted questions simultaneously, but Johnny silenced them.

"What time?" he demanded.

"About midnight."

"Where's Munro now?"

"In town, at the saloon."

"Good! You get back there as quick as you can before he discovers you've gone!"

Daniel McGrail nodded, turned his horse, and galloped off in the direction of the creek. Johnny issued orders.

"Nelson," he said, "call in the rest of the guards. One of you fellows saddle my horse. Barbara, you'd better get in the wagon. Larkin, divide the men into watches, one hour each, turn and turn about till daylight. Douse all those fires, and you take charge while I'm gone."

"What d'you aim to do?" asked Larkin.

"Find Munro and stop this raid before it starts—if I can."

His horse was brought to him, and he rode away on it.

The Shooting of Daniel McGrail

HARVEY CAMPBELL and the sheriff were at the har of the Equality Saloon, and Munro was still at the table across the bar-room with Joe Swale and others of his hirelings, half an hour later. Swale looked up at the wall.

"If that clock there's right," he remarked, "we'd better be on our way."

Munro took out a watch attached to a very ornamental gold chain.

"Guess you're right," he said, "but it'd look better if we didn't all leave together. Meet you at the edge of the town in ten minutes."

He was moving towards the swing-doors when one of them was pushed open and Johnny strode into the saloon.

"You may as well sit down, Munro," he said in a voice that could be heard all over the room. "There'll be no raid on our camp to-night."

The sheriff swung round.

"What's this talk about a raid?" he exploded. "What raid?"

"They're all set to attack us at midnight," Johnny replied, "unless you can do something to stop it."

"Aw, the man's crazy, sheriff!" rasped Munro. "Stand aside and let me settle—"

He went to draw his gun, but the sheriff caught hold of his arm.

"Wait a minute!" he roared. "None of that, Munro! D'you know what you're talkin' about, young man?"

"I ought to," replied Johnny. "We've had a spy in his camp—a man who's been trailing him for something he did eight or nine years ago. I knew you couldn't handle him alone, sheriff, so we've organised a Vigilance Committee."

Harvey Campbell, with his back to the bar, frowned heavily. The sheriff said sharply:

"Well, now, you can't do that!"

"Yes, we can," retorted Johnny.

"No, you can't!"

"Yes, we can! We're goin' to drive gun law out of this valley, if only you and the Cattleman's Association will back us up."

The sheriff screwed up his eyes and looked at Campbell.

"I think he's right about that, Harvey," he growled.

"Aw, don't be a fool, Campbell," put in Munro. "He wants you to do his fightin' for him!"

"If you don't mind, Barr, I'll do my own thinkin'," said Campbell. "Us cattlemen have got no love for gunmen, sheriff, but we ain't got much more for nesters."

"We've got a right to settle this land," stormed Johnny.

"A right, yes," agreed Campbell. "But we've got to have land to range our stock, and feelin' as we do about you and your fences, we're more than fair in stayin' neutral."

"That's just the point," Johnny objected. "You can't be neutral. If you don't fight with us, then you might as well fight against us."

"How d'you figure that?"

"Why, without your help we're licked. We may get the land, but Munro's men will pick us off one by one after we're settled."

"He's right about that, Harvey," boomed the sheriff, "and you know it."

"I've heard all I want about what me and my men are doin'," blazed Munro.

"You ain't called on to listen," Campbell retorted.

"Well, if we're such killers, why don't the sheriff arrest some of us?"

The sheriff, thus challenged, shifted uncomfortably.

"If I was to arrest people for what they're gonna do," he said rather lamely, "I'd have arrested you long ago. I've got to wait till the crimes are committed—and then it's too late."

Munro laughed derisively, and Campbell came to a decision.

"Looks like you're forcing us into action," he said to Johnny. "I'll step over to headquarters and send for the members to come in."

The sheriff looked relieved.

"Now I knowed that—" he began.

"You mean you'll back us up?"

Johnny broke in.

"Well, not exactly. We can't let you get yourselves killed, but we can keep you out of the valley for your own good."

"Campbell," said Johnny grimly, "if you raid our camp to-night, there'll be a lot of empty saddles in Ore Grande by morning!"

"There won't be any raid," stated Campbell with acerbity, "but we'll be in town to-morrow to see that you don't file on any land!"

The sheriff puffed out his cheeks.

"Harvey," he said angrily, "you and me's been friends for a good many years, but this just about settles it. I'm sorry!"

"Me, too!" rapped Campbell.

The sheriff went out from the saloon in a teuper, and Johnny followed him.

Munro said:

"I knowed you'd come round to our way o' thinkin' eventually, Harvey."

"Well, I haven't, Barr!" Campbell retorted; and he, too, went out.

Joe Swale and another man, a killer named Slavin, rose up from the table and joined their employer, who said exultingly:

"He played right into our hands! He even tipped me off to the spy!"

"Who is he?" asked Swale.

"Salty Smith! I knew I'd seen him somewhere. He's McGrail's brother Dan. You two go trail him, and see that he doesn't talk any more."

Harvey Campbell walked up the July 11th, 1936.

street to the headquarters of the Cattleman's Association without a glance for the sheriff, who was standing by the hitching-rail where Johnny was unfastening his horse.

"What're you gonna do now?" the sheriff inquired.

"Ridin' back to camp," replied Johnny, and he swung himself up into the saddle and went slowly down the street.

He had gone no farther than the laud office when Daniel McGrail ran out from a yard at the side of the saloon and intercepted the sheriff, who was about to cross over to his office.

"I want to swear out a warrant for Barr Munro's arrest for murder," he stated.

"Murder?" exclaimed the startled sheriff. "Whose murder? Who are you?"

"I'm the spy Johnny Flagg was telling you about in the saloon—I heard him at the side window. Munro killed my brother eight years ago. I knew he did it, but I never could prove it till to-night."

Sheriff Luther Davies drew a long breath.

"You can prove it now?" he demanded.

"Yes," was the emphatic reply. "To-night, just before Flagg came into the saloon, I was seated at a table—"

A jet of flame pierced the darkness of the yard, a shot rang out, and Daniel McGrail fell forward on his face.

Out came the sheriff's gun, and he blazed away at two indistinct figures flying down the yard. Men streamed out from the saloon, heads appeared at windows, and Johnny turned his horse at the bottom of the street and came galloping back.

"What happened, sheriff?" he cried.

"Somebody shot one of Munro's men." The sheriff addressed the crowd at large. "Some of you boys go get Doc Ramsey, and some of you help me over to my office with him, will you?"

Two men sped off to get the doctor; others lifted up the wounded man, and he was carried across the street into the sheriff's office, where he was deposited upon a couch.

The doctor arrived, an experienced old fellow, white of hair and beard and ruddy of complexion. Daniel McGrail had been shot in the back and was unconscious. The bullet was extracted, the wound was dressed, and by that time the crowd had drifted away. But Johnny lingered and the sheriff paced up and down his office.

Finally Doc Ramsey put on his coat and picked up his little black bag.

"Still unconscious, doc?" asked the sheriff anxiously.

"Yes," was the reply. "Liable to be for hours. I think we'd better move him over to my place."

"I don't think you'd better," said Johnny. "If the killer's still after him he's a lot safer here."

"Yeah, that's right," agreed the sheriff gruffly. "Anyway, I want to talk to him when he comes to."

"All right." Doc Ramsey put on his hat. "I'll drop in on him from time to time, then. Good-night."

After he had gone and the door was closed, the sheriff perched discousolately upon his desk.

"Wouldn't you know this'd have to happen to me?" he complained. "Just when I could put Munro out of the running!"

"Munro?" echoed Johnny. "What d'you mean?"

"This fellow wanted a warrant for Munro's arrest for killing his brother.

He was just givin' me the facts when the shot was fired."

Johnny went over to the couch and looked down at the unconscious man. The sheriff flung his hat on a chair and followed him.

"Did he say he could prove it?" asked Johnny.

"Yeah, but he didn't say how." "That's funny!" he told me he couldn't."

"Well, he musta found out just before you came." The sheriff ran a hand through his jet-black hair and scratched the back of his head. "Oh, I say, I plumb forgot to ask you! You know who he is, don't you?"

"Sure," replied Johnny. "Don't you?"

"Not the least idea." "Why, that's Solon McGrail's brother Dan."

"He is?" The sheriff gazed again at the unshaven face on the rough pillow of the couch. "Well, I always figured Munro did that job," he said bleakly. "Now I know it, and I can't do a thing about it."

"You don't dare arrest him, I suppose?" asked Johnny.

"On whose testimony?"

That decidedly was a stumbling-block. Johnny frowned at a calendar on the wall.

"If you told the cattlemen," he said slowly, "it might keep them from backing Munro."

"And our friend here might never come to!" growled the sheriff. "Then where would I be?"

Johnny heaved a sigh.

"Well, I guess there goes Miss McGrail's chance of getting her ranch back," he remarked regretfully.

The sheriff started.

"What did you say?" he cried.

"Babs McGrail?"

"Yeah," nodded Johnny. "Why?"

"What's she doin' here? Is she with the nesters?"

"Sure. She's aimin' to file on the old ranch—take it right out from under Munro."

The sheriff's beady little eyes rounded with excitement.

"Say, you go up to headquarters and tell that to Campbell!" he cried.

"That'll stop him."

Johnny made for the door, but the sheriff stopped him as he was in the act of opening it.

"Just a second!" he said with a grimace. "Don't tell the old toad I sent you, because I don't want any truck with him at all."

His words did not carry conviction, but Johnny nodded and went out in haste.

A False Charge

JOE SWALE, who was lurking in the vcranda of the saloon as Johnny crossed the street, watched him till he had entered the balconied building near the bridge, then dived in at the swing-doors and went to Munro, who was drinking at the bar.

"I just saw Johnny Flagg go into the Association," he confided.

"Sheriff with him?" asked Munro.

"No, alone."

"Oh!" Munro looked round the crowded bar-room and beckoned to some of his men.

Johnny had found Harvey Campbell at a table in a little office at the side of the big room in which meetings of the cattlemen were held. There was an oil-lamp on the table and in its light the rancher was writing notes to all the members of the Association, summoning them to town.

He scowled at Johnny as he entered, but he listened to what the intruder had to say, and his expression changed completely when Barbara's name was mentioned.

"Little Babs McGrail?" he exclaimed. "Well, that sort of alters things. Her father was about the best friend I had."

He sat back in his chair to review the situation.

"It ain't in nature for cattlemen to fight for nesters," he said, "but we sure can't help Munro beat McGrail's kids out of what belongs to 'em. I reckon you win, son, and to tell you the truth I'm glad of it. Here, take this list and get word to the men named on it. I'll write a note."

On a sheet of paper that was lying on the blotting-pad he had already written: "Meet in town not later than 8 a.m." He added to it: "We have to back the nesters. Solon McGrail's kids are with them. Harvey Campbell, chairman."

He folded the sheet of paper twice, addressed it to Donald Sherman, the double-chimned rancher who was vice-chairman of the Cattlemen's Association, and handed it to Johnny.

"Better not lose any time," he said. "Oh, and when you see the sheriff, tell him I'm not such an ornery old cuss as he thinks I am."

"He never even suspected you were," Johnny assured him, and he pocketed the list and the note and went out through the big room to the street.

Barr Munro and Joe Swale were hiding in an alley at the side of the building as he emerged from it, and Joe Swale raised his gun. But Munro knocked it down.

"Don't shoot," he whispered. "We can use him later."

Johnny stepped off the boardwalk, and the two sneaked in at the door to Campbell's office. The elderly rancher sprang up from his chair at sight of the guns in their hands.

"So you thought you could turn on me, did you?" Munro rasped, and twice his gun spat fire.

Campbell spun round on his feet before he collapsed and fell on his back near a filing-cabinet.

"Quick!" cried Munro. "Let's get out the back way!"

There was a door at the back of the office. It was locked, but the key was in the lock. Joe Swale opened this door, and he and Munro were out in a yard behind the premises when Johnny raced back because he had heard the shots.

Gun in hand he burst into the room he so recently had left, and there his worst fears were confirmed. He went down on one knee by the head of the dead rancher and felt at his heart, but the grating of a key in the lock of the door made him look up. Swale was locking the door on the outside.

He was on his feet instantly, and he flew to a window and opened it. The yard was in darkness, but he fired twice in the direction of running feet, and he was about to climb out of the window when Slavin and a number of Munro's men crowded into the room.

"What's happened?" demanded Slavin.

"Someone shot Mr. Campbell," Johnny replied. "Take care of him while I trail the killer."

"Wait a minute!" Slavin seized hold of his arm and the hand that held the gun. "We don't have to go far for the killer."

"Don't stop me, you fool!" shouted Johnny. "I didn't do it!"

"No?" jered Slavin. "Why, your gun's still hot!"

"Of course it is. I fired a couple of shots out of the window."

"Any of you believe that?" Slavin asked scornfully of the others.

"No," responded several voices; but the sheriff pushed his way into the room, and he said authoritatively:

"Well, I do, and that's all that counts. Gimmo that gun!"

Slavin let go of Johnny with the utmost reluctance.

"You ain't gonna turn him loose!" he challenged.

"I'm gonna do what the law requires," the sheriff retorted, "if we have to blast our way out!"

Johnny was surrendering his gun when Munro stalked into the room with Swale.

"What's the trouble?" he inquired.

"Harvey Campbell's been killed," Slavin answered, and with clenched fists Munro thrust his face into Johnny's.

"So you got even with Campbell for not siding with you, eh?" he roared.

"I reckon you're the man in this town who knows best that that's a lie!" Johnny snapped back at him.

"Are we gonna let one man and a badge stand between us and that killer?" demanded Swale.

The sheriff promptly handed Johnny back his gun and drew his own; but there were several perfectly peaceable July 11th, 1936 townsmen in the room by this time, and Munro was artful.

"Wait a minute!" he commanded "That's up to the association! It's not our affair, it's theirs!"

The sheriff marched his prisoner out from the building and over to his office, and from the boardwalk Munro and his men watched them till they had disappeared.

"I guess that's the end of Johnny Flagg and his nesters," exulted Munro.

"Listen, boys, ride out and tell all the ranchers what's happened."

Eagerly the sheriff took down a halting statement upon his pad, but it was not complete when the wounded man lapsed once more into unconsciousness.

While Swale and Slavin and Tuscan were getting their horses and riding away on them Johnny was locked in a cell at the back of the sheriff's office. The sheriff was badly upset over Campbell's death, and he stared gloomily out of the window as the local undertaker drove by on his backboard.

"I kinda wish I hadn't told Harvey I was mad at him," he said brokenly, "cause I wasn't."

"He knew it," said Johnny. "I told him myself."

"Did you, Johnny?" The sheriff turned away from the window to the bars of the cell and there were tears in his eyes. "Honest? Why did you?"

"He told me to tell you he wasn't so ornery himself."

"Well, doggone it, now I know you didn't shoot him! I'm gonna prove it, too!"

"That won't be so hard," said Johnny, and he took the folded sheet of paper from his shirt pocket and held it out. "Read that!"

The sheriff had to wipe his eyes before he could read what Harvey Campbell had written.

"Why didn't you show me that sooner?" he asked reproachfully, and turned to his desk to get a bunch of keys.

"Here, don't unlock it!" pleaded Johnny as one of the keys was inserted in the lock of the barred door. "I want Munro to figure I'm under arrest when he comes ridin' in here to-morrow morning."

The sheriff stared. "And then what?" he asked wonderingly.

"Write a letter," suggested Johnny, "and send it out to the nesters' camp."

"Can't quite see the idea, Johnny," confessed the sheriff, "but I'll do that. I'll be glad to."

He threw the keys back on the desk and sat down at it with pen and paper. Johnny dictated a message which he wrote down, and when it was finished he said:

"Address it to Mr. David Larkin."

A Surprise for Sherman

THE note was delivered at the camp near the creek by a messenger whom the sheriff knew to be trustworthy. The messenger was conducted to Larkin by one of the men on guard, and Larkin read the note aloud in the light of one of the fires.

"Send Miss McGrail and Jimmy in with the bearer. All others be in town before eight in the morning, but no guns showing.—JOHNNY FLAGG."

"No guns?" growled Abe Nelson. "Sounds like a trick to me."

"No, it ain't," declared the messenger. "The sheriff's back of him. The sheriff sent me here."

"I'll take a chance," decided Larkin.

Barbara was in her wagon, fully clothed and wide awake. She was perfectly ready to do as Johnny wished, and Jimmy was wakened and dressed.

On one of the horses from her wagon she and her small brother rode double, and Larkin accompanied them and the messenger across the creek and into the town, returning with the horse after he had seen them enter the sheriff's office.

Through what remained of the night Munro's men called on one rancher after another, and dawn was breaking when Joe Swale hammered on the front door of Donald Sherman's home and its owner descended to him in his night-shirt and a pair of slippers.

"Round up the neighbouring ranchers," said Swale in his own crude July 11th, 1936.

fashion. "The nesters have killed Campbell."

"Campbell?" gasped Sherman.

"Yeah."

"All right, I'll get my clothes on. You go to the north side of the valley and I'll take the south."

"Meet us at the bridge west of town," said Swale, remounting his horse. "The others'll be gatherin' there."

With the dawn the homesteaders struck camp, under Dave Larkin's directions, and the long train of wagons crossed the creek and moved slowly towards Ore Grande.

Half an hour before sunrise Doe Ramsey paid another visit to the sheriff's office, and he was applying his stethoscope to the heart of Daniel McGrail when that wounded man recovered consciousness and murmured something.

"He may be able to talk in a minute," said the doctor, and thereupon the sheriff pulled up a chair beside the couch and sat down on it with a pad and pencil. Barbara moved her chair across the floor and Jimmy crouched beside her.

Presently her uncle opened his eyes and smiled feebly at her. He looked at the sheriff and began to speak in a voice barely audible.

Eagerly the sheriff took down a halting statement upon his pad, but it was not by any means complete when the wounded man lapsed once more into unconsciousness.

"Aw, he's fainted again!" lamented the sheriff. "Still, I can make out that warrant now."

He went to his desk, put the pad away in a drawer, and from another drawer took out a printed sheet of blue paper. Barbara and Johnny talked together as he wrote; the doctor announced confidently that his patient would recover and went home to breakfast.

At seven o'clock in the morning the sheriff yawned prodigiously and stepped over to Johnny's cell for about the twentieth time since sunrise.

"Don't be a fool, Johnny," he urged. "Get your horse and ride out o' town while there's still time."

"I said 'no,'" gritted Johnny.

"Oh, come on!"

Barbara went to the door of bars.

"The sheriff's right, Johnny," she said agitatedly. "It's too big a gamble to take."

"It's not too big a gamble," declared Johnny. "Not if I know cowmen."

The train of wagons had entered Gold Street by this time and was beginning to line up there. Jimmy cried excitedly from the window of the sheriff's office:

"Here come the nesters!"

Barbara ran to the window. Most of the homesteaders' womenfolk and children were left with the wagons while the men followed Larkin in a solid body to the door of the land office. Larkin tried the door and found it locked.

"Looks like we're in plenty of time," he said. "Guess we'll stay right here. First come, first served."

On the far side of the bridge at the top of Main Street nearly a score of ranchers and foremen had arrived on their horses. Swale and Tuscan were with them. Munro joined them and led the way to the land office, their self-appointed spokesman.

"You fellows might as well get back to your wagons and forget this land business," he shouted to the waiting homesteaders, but Dave Larkin stepped forward.

"How so?" he challenged.

"There's no one gonna file on this land but us cattlemen!"

"The law says—" Larkin began heatedly, but Munro cut him short. "The Cattlemen's Association is runnin' things for the time being."

Out came his gun, and all the cattlemen drew their weapons. The homesteaders were armed, but in accordance with Johnny's instructions they were not wearing belts and their guns were in their pockets.

"What have you done with Johnny Flagg?" demanded Larkin.

"Nothing yet," snapped Munro. "Now get back to your wagons!"

At a signal from their leader the homesteaders turned and streamed slowly back to the corner. Munro spoke to Donald Sherman, who had remained silent on his horse.

"All right, Sherman," he said. "my men will back you up while you attend to your business."

The rancher nodded and ambled over to the sheriff's office, followed by the rest of the cattlemen. Munro and his men dismounted and stood on guard outside the land office.

At the corner of Gold Street Abe Nelson looked back.

"What are you gonna do?" he asked apprehensively, as Larkin stopped short.

"When that office opens," was the determined reply, "we're goin' in to file!"

The sheriff emerged from his office as the cattlemen drew up outside it, and with his hands on his hips he addressed them from the doorstep.

"Well," he said gruffly. "I suppose you boys have come for the fellow who killed Campbell?"

"We have," replied Sherman, "and I hope you're not goin' to make too much fuss about it."

"No fuss at all," the sheriff assured him, "but there isn't room for all of you. Step right inside, Sherman, and take him."

Sherman descended bulkily from his horse and followed the sheriff in over the step. He saw Johnny, standing with folded arms behind the bars of his cell, and he had eyes only for him. "Wher's the key to the cell?" he rapped.

"He's got it," purred the sheriff. "He's got it?" howled the astounded rancher.

"Yeah. I tried to get him to leave town, but he said he wanted to talk to you boys first."

Sherman advanced to the bars.

"Have you got the key to this cell?" he hellowed.

"I have," replied Johnny, "and you can have it in just a minute. But first I want to ask you a couple o' questions."

"Go ahead."

"Did Munro tell you that I killed Mr. Campbell?"

"Yes."

"Did he say why?"

"Because Harvey refused to back you and the nesters."

Johnny smiled, unfolded his arms, and held out the note Harvey Campbell had written.

"Read that," he said. "See if you think he refused to back us."

Sherman stared, but he opened out the sheet of paper, and he read the message aloud as though it needed his voice to convince him that the words were actually there:

"Meet in town not later than eight a.m. We have to back the nesters. Solon McGrail's kids are with them. HARVEY CAMPBELL, Chairman."

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

Read This First

A strange planet, hitherto unknown, has shifted from its orbit and loomed into the view of the peoples of the Earth. It is the planet Mongo, and its overlord is Ming, a sinister figure who had probed the fundamental secrets of Nature.

Dr. Zarkov, an American scientist, sets out in a rocket ship to penetrate the stratosphere. He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart, but they reach the new planet only to be seized by Ming, who wants to marry the beautiful blonde Earth-girl and make her the Empress of the Universe.

Flash and Dale escape with the aid of Aura, Ming's daughter, who is attracted by Flash. They are also assisted by Thun, a prince whose father rules a territory on Mongo which has not yet been subdued by Ming. Dale and Thun, however, are captured and carried off by winged men in the pay of King Vultan, who dominates an amazing sky-city poised thousands of feet above the surface of the planet.

Zarkov and Flash visit the sky-city with Prince Barin, rightful heir to the throne Ming occupies, and they manage to gain the friendship of Vultan, who only returns them to Ming on condition that they are not harmed.

But Ming plans to destroy Flash, and a priest in his employ cunningly persuades Aura to drug the American, who is then carried to the lair of a beast known as the Fire Dragon.

EPISODE 10:—

"The Unseen Peril"

The Claws of the Monster

FURY and anguish were written on the features of the Princess Aura—fury at the manner in which she had been tricked, anguish at the sight of Flash Gordon's deadly peril.

She realised now that she had been but an instrument in the grim plot that her father and the High Priest had conceived. Lured by the prospect of carrying Flash to the remote Temple of Taos, and of persuading him to accept her as his bride when he should recover from the drug of forgetfulness, she had fallen all too readily into a cruel snare.

How clearly she saw it all! Her father and the High Priest could have brought about the American's destruction unaided, but it had suited them to draw her into the plan. It was Ming's way of punishing an unruly daughter—to make her an accessory in the slaying of the man with whom she was infatuated.

Frantically she struggled in the arms of the retainers who held her. The rest of the High Priest's minions were setting their shoulders to the door of the Fire Dragon's lair, but had not yet got it closed, and her blazing eyes were fixed on the scene that was being enacted in the tunnel beyond—where Flash Gordon lay prone and insensible on the abandoned stretcher, and where the huge form of the aroused monster was looming up amidst the sulphurous smoke-clouds that filled the cavern.

With a superhuman effort the Princess Aura managed to break away from her captors, and before they could pounce on her again she was rushing forward to the men who were on the point of closing the door.

One of those possessed a ray-pistol that was thrust into a belt around his waist, and with a swift gesture Ming's daughter snatched the weapon. Next instant she was directing it into the misty tunnel ahead of her.

She could see the Fire Dragon plainly now, a loathsome brute like a giant, winged lizard, its jaws agape and its fangs bared, its hot breath issuing from its nostrils in foul, vapourish jets. It had dragged its great body to the spot where Flash Gordon lay, and it was poised above him ghoulishly, its hideous talons reaching down to close fast on him.

Another moment and the claws must have dug deep into the unconscious American's flesh and then lifted him to the monster's hungry throat. But ere the dragon could seize its prey there came a withering stream of fire from the ray-gun in Aura's hand.

A death-current struck the massive reptile's breast, and it seemed to rise up on high, uttering a queer, half-strangled snarl as it did so. Then it toppled backwards and crashed to the floor of its den, to lie there in a quivering but lifeless heap amid the weird fumes that swirled about the tunnel.

There was a silence during which no one made a move, least of all the men who had been pressing against the heavy door in a concerted attempt to close it. Then the High Priest spoke in a voice that shook with emotion.

"You have killed the sacred Fire Dragon!"

Aura turned on him, and, awed as he was by the act which he had just witnessed, he forgot his superstitious in a thrill of personal alarm as the girl levelled the ray-gun at him.

There was a scathing hatred in the girl's expression, and for a second it looked as if the High Priest were about to share the monster's fate. But, even as the princess hesitated between blasting the life out of him or showing mercy, there came a rapid scuffle of footfalls that diverted her attention, and all at once King Vultan swung into view with Barin, Zarkov and Dale at his heels.

Aura looked at them uncertainly, and was still in a state of indecision when Vultan caught her by the hand and wrested the pistol from her grasp. At the same time his companions hurried forward into the cavern where Flash lay, and fell on their knees beside the insensible American.

"How is he?" Vultan called out presently, in his deep, gruff tones.

"He's alive," answered Zarkov, "but we can't rouse him. He is under the influence of some very powerful drug."

Vultan, King of the Hawk Men, glared at Aura and the High Priest one after the other.

"What devilry is behind all this?" he rasped. "Come, I want the truth!"

"I was tricked into it, Vultan!" Aura exclaimed hotly. "I believed the High Priest was helping me to get Flash away from the Earth girl, Dale Arden. But in reality he and my father had planned Flash Gordon's death."

Vultan looked at her from under his beetling brows, and then he riveted his eyes on Ming's priest.

"There will be no further opportunity for treachery," he said, "whether it concerns your master's desire to get rid of the Earth man, or the Princess Aura's ambition to marry him."

"The bride of Gordon's choice is Dale Arden," he added thickly, "and he was to wed her to-morrow. But in view of what has happened to-night there will be no delay. The ceremony will take place as soon as Gordon has recovered, and immediately after it we shall leave this accursed realm—I to return to my sky-city, the Earth people to return to their own world in the rocket ship that brought them here."

The High Priest glanced at him in a furtive manner.

"And you think Ming will consent to such an arrangement?" he said with a faint sneer.

"He would be ill-advised to offer any objections," Vultan ground out. "Go—tell him to prepare for the ceremony in the chapel. Go! Do you hear me?"

The last words were uttered in a bellow, and he stressed them the more by advancing on the High Priest threateningly, so that the latter quailed before him and made haste to remove himself from the vicinity. Then Vultan strode to the entrance of the tunnel, and, with one eye on the priest's servants, watched Zarkov and Barin and Dale as they strove to revive Flash.

As for Aura, she remained motionless for the space of two or three minutes. But suddenly a queer expression dawned on her pallid face, and like a woman with a purpose she slipped quietly away and retraced her steps to the upper corridors of the palace.

July 11th, 1936.

The suite of rooms which her father occupied was the objective that she had in mind, and on arrival there she found Ming in conference with the High Priest, a number of armed guards being present as well.

It was obvious that the priest had told his story, for Ming's countenance was dark with anger, and he was speaking in wrathful accents when Aura put in an appearance.

"The marriage will not take place," he was saying viciously. "Dale Arden will be my bride and no other man's—and Gordon's life is forfeit by reason of the defiance he has shown ever since he crossed my path. Nor will Vultan stand in my way. One false move on his part, and he shall be dealt with, even if it plunges us into a war with the winged Hawk Men. I—"

He paused as he became aware that Aura had crossed the threshold, and he launched a bitter glance at her through his narrowed lids. It was a glance that she returned steadfastly, however, and, approaching him, she addressed him in a calm voice.

"Father," she announced, "you and the High Priest played me false, but I have come here to tell you that you need no longer concern yourself with Flash Gordon."

"What do you mean?"

"Did the High Priest not tell you that he is under the influence of the drug that brings forgetfulness?" she replied. "Yes, father, the drug of forgetfulness. And thus, when he recovers consciousness, he will recall nothing of the past. He will not remember Dale Arden—and therefore he will have no desire to marry her."

A gleam of interest became apparent on Ming's face, and he looked at the High Priest, who at once confirmed Aura's statement.

"The princess is right, your Majesty. Gordon will remember nothing."

"So why kill him, father?" Aura went on quickly. "You only hate him, because Dale Arden is in love with him. But if he is no longer interested in her she may turn to you—yes, and turn to you more readily than she ever would if the thought were always in her mind that you had slain him. Let him live, father, for my sake."

Ming regarded her in silence for a spell, and then he gave an inscrutable smile.

"Let him live?" he murmured. "We shall see, we shall see. But the drug of forgetfulness—that is an intriguing factor. It might be amusing to go to the chapel in accordance with Vultan's wishes—very amusing."

And all at once, signing to the others to follow him, he made his way from the room.

Aura and the High Priest fell into step behind him, and were accompanied by the armed guards who had been assembled in the emperor's suite, these forming a procession which eventually trooped into the chapel wherein Ming and his court were wont to pay homage to the heathen deity known as Taos.

It was here that Flash had once rescued Dale from Ming's clutches and appalled the High Priest by shattering a sacred idol. But that statue had since been replaced by another, and it was in the shadow of this enormous figure of stone that the emperor and his party now took up their positions.

They had not long to wait before King Vultan entered the chapel with Dale, Zarkov, Barin and Flash, the latter being supported in the arms of his friends and walking with the air of one who was not yet in full possession of his wits.

Vultan strode across to Ming and glowered at him in a domineering fashion.

"I'm glad to see you thought it as well to obey me," he rumbled. "Gordon is still somewhat dazed, but he should soon be himself again."

Ming volunteered no answer, merely slid his cunning eyes upon Flash and watched the American as Zarkov and Barin stood chafing his hands and face; and presently their efforts seemed to meet with more success, for Flash drew himself up, and, looking around in a puzzled manner, stammered out a hesitant query.

"Where—where am I?" he asked.

It was Ming who offered a reply, advancing upon the younger man as he spoke.

"You are in the palace of the Emperor of the Universe, Gordon," he said, "and you are here for the purpose of choosing a bride. Whom shall it be? My daughter, Princess Aura; Or the Earth girl, Dale Arden?"

He pointed to Dale and Aura in turn, and Flash gazed at each in a bewildered fashion; was silent for the space of several seconds, and then managed to find his voice.

"A bride?" he echoed dully. "Why should I choose a bride—amongst strangers? Who are these two girls?"

Vultan a Prisoner

IF Flash Gordon's words had been anticipated by Aura and those who shared her secret, the reverse was the case so far as Dale and her friends were concerned, and at first they could only stare at him in amazement.

Then all at once Dale confronted him, and, clutching him by the arm, she looked up into his face with a piteous expression of appeal in her blue eyes.

"Flash," she cried, "what have they done to you? You know me! You know me, don't you?"

He regarded her blankly, without the least sign of recognition on his handsome features, and when Barin, Zarkov and Vultan gathered around him and began to speak to him they were met with that same puzzled scrutiny.

"He knows none of us!" Vultan blurted out at last. "Something has happened to him which has robbed him of his memory! And, by thunder, we don't have to seek far to learn the cause! Ming, this is the work of you and your precious daughter and that crafty High Priest!"

He swung round on the emperor savagely as he made the accusation, and was roused to a further pitch of anger by the mocking smile that he saw on the man's lips.

"What witchcraft has been practised on Flash Gordon?" he rasped. "Come, Ming, you'd better talk!"

The emperor continued to smile at him, however, as if inviting him to do his worst, and Vultan seemed on the point of laying violent hands on the scoundrelly potentate when Aura suddenly stepped close to Flash and thrust Dale Arden to one side.

"You and I are strangers, son of the Earth," she told the American in soothing accents. "I am your friend, though you may not remember me—a friend who has been true to you ever since we first met. Come with me, and I'll try to explain."

She took him by the wrist, and, submissively enough, he allowed her to lead him towards the door of the chapel. But before they had taken half a dozen steps Vultan was roaring a protest.

"Stop!" he shouted. "There has been trickery here—witchcraft—and I mean to defeat it! Ming, either you'll tell me what has been done to Gordon, or I'll—"

"Have a care, Vultan," the emperor interrupted menacingly. "Have a care lest your temper leads you into trouble. I am inclined to think you presume upon the privileges of a guest."

"Presume?" the King of the Hawk Men stormed. "I'll do more than presume! I'll drop you dead in your tracks unless you give me an answer to this mystery."

He was still gripping the ray-pistol that he had wrested from Aura in the vicinity of the Fire Dragon's lair, and now he levelled it at Ming. But on the instant some of the emperor's guards swarmed upon him, and there ensued a desperate mêlée that filled the chapel with the sound of oaths and blows.

It was a struggle in which Barin and Zarkov were able to play no part, for those of Ming's guards who had not flung themselves on Vultan had closed in on the prince and the scientist ominously, and prevented them from interfering.

King Vultan was, therefore, left to battle against his foes unaided, and, although the ray-gun had been knocked from his hand at the first onset, he put up a magnificent resistance with his bare fists, fighting with a berserk fury that scattered his antagonists again and again.

Towering above them, he might have been likened to some Viking of old as he stood there and drove his bunched knuckles into the flushed faces of the men who had assailed him, and with every blow that he struck a soldier measured his length on the floor. Yet each warrior was soon on his feet once more, and, despite Vultan's prowess, it was clear that the affair could only have one result and that weight of numbers must tell in the end.

The King of the Hawk Men was overpowered at last, and, held fast in the arms of his captors, he was finally reduced to uttering fierce, prophetic warnings of the disaster that would overtake the Imperial stronghold before long.

"You shall pay for this night's work, Ming!" he raved. "You shall pay dearly!"

"To the dungeons with him," the emperor drawled. "I grow weary of his voice."

"Fool!" Vultan bellowed. "Do you think you can treat me in this manner and live to boast of it? When I fail to return to my sky-city my faithful Hawk Men will come here as swiftly as the birds from which they take their name. And then, Ming—then you shall regret this piece of treachery!"

"We shall be ready for your Hawk Men, Vultan," the self-styled Emperor of the Universe retorted, "and we shall give them a warm welcome when they arrive. Meantime, you will cool your heels in one of my darkest cells. Away with him, guards, and put him under lock and key."

Writhing and cursing, Vultan was dragged out of the chapel, and little by little his irate shouts died away in the distance. Then Aura made her way from the hall of worship, still holding Flash Gordon's hand persuasively, and when she and the bemused American had departed Ming focused his attention on Zarkov, Dale and Barin.

"I trust that none of you shares King Vultan's disapproval in regard to what has taken place here to-night?" he said softly.

They were silent, knowing that it was useless to show defiance, and after grinning at them evilly Ming spoke again in his thin, sibilant voice.

"I suggest you return to your respective quarters and accept a situation which you cannot alter," he observed. "In the morning, Zarkov, I shall expect you to bring the lovely Earth girl to me in the audience-room, where I shall have something important to say to her concerning her future rôle as Empress of Mongo."

He paused, and then fixed his narrow, slanting eyes on Barin.

"As for you, my friend," he remarked significantly, "I advise you to be extremely careful so far as your conduct is concerned. One false move on your part, and it is liable to be your last. Remember that."

He dismissed them with a gesture, and slowly, heavily, the three of them filed out of the chapel. But they had not gone far when Dale laid a hand on Zarkov's sleeve and addressed him in a querulous tone.

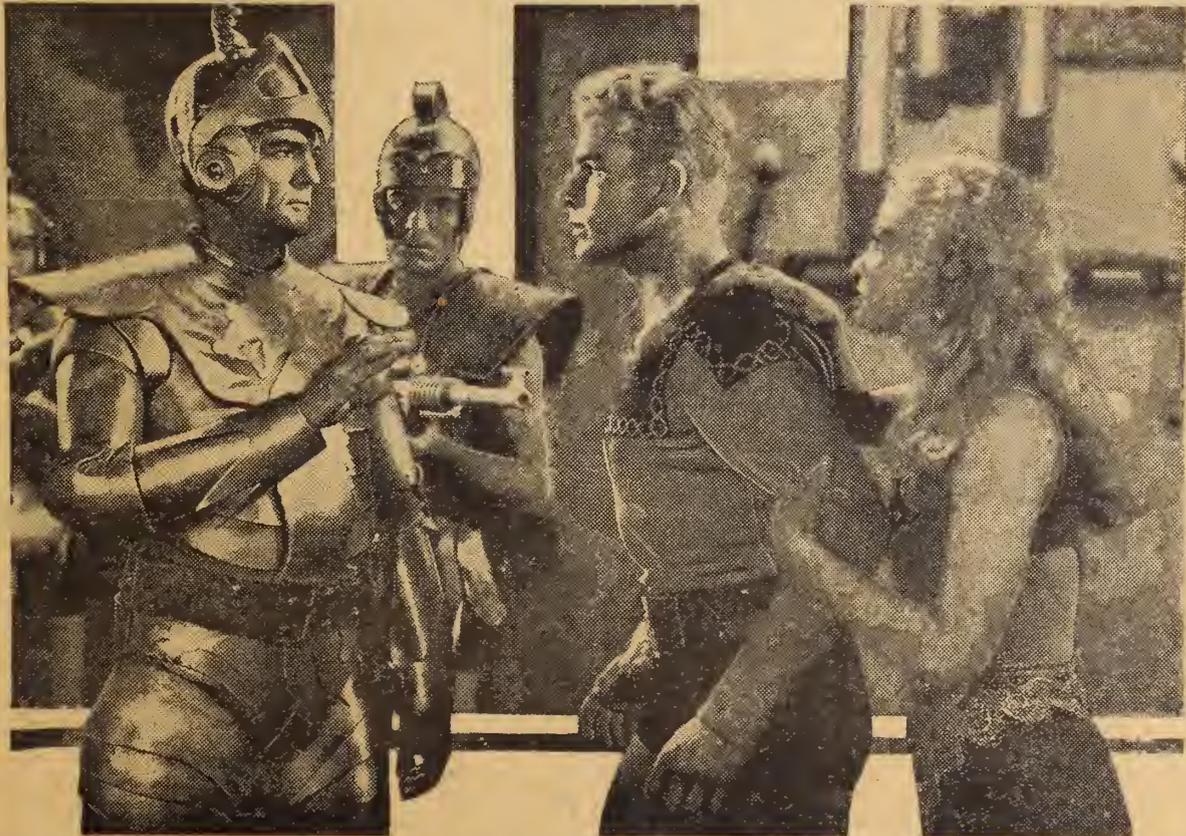

"Doctor," she faltered, "what could they have done to Flash to make his mind a complete blank? What's happened to him, that he failed to recognize any of us?"

It was not Zarkov who answered her, but Prince Barin.

"There is only one reply to that question," he muttered. "They must have given him the draught of forgetfulness."

"The draught of forgetfulness?" echoed Zarkov.

"A potion that kills the memory," Barin explained. "After receiving it, the victim becomes insensible for a while. When he recovers, his past life is like a closed book to him, and he can remember nothing of it. That is what has happened to Flash Gordon, and it was Aura who gave him the "Beware, Gordon!" Torch rapped out. "My men hold you covered, and if you offer resistance the death-fire will be poured into your body here and now!"

draught, of course—in the hope of winning him."

It was an explanation that Dale and Zarkov might have discredited if it had not been for the fact that they had encountered wonders far more staggering than this during their sojourn on the planet Mongo.

"Barin," the doctor said after a spell of silence, "how long does the effect of this drug last?"

"As long as a man lives," came the rejoinder, "unless he is given the antidote."

"The antidote!" Zarkov exclaimed hopefully. "Is it possible to obtain that?"

Barin looked him full in the face. "It is fortunate, doctor," he declared, "that I am your friend. It is even more fortunate that I was brought up among the priests of Mongo, who know the secrets of these drugs. I need only add that there is a cabinet in the laboratory filled with the ingredients necessary for making this antidote I have mentioned."

"And you will compound the antidote for us?" Dale began in an eager voice, then checked as a disturbing thought occurred to her.

"No," she added, "it would be better if you told us the formula and left us to make up the antidote ourselves. You mustn't risk the displeasure of Ming."

Barin clenched his fists and thrust out his strong jaw.

"Ming would know that the information had come from me, in any case," he announced. "But I'm not afraid of him, Earth girl, for I'd rather die than go on living with his heel upon my neck. Come, we must first seek Flash, and unless I am far mistaken we shall find him in Aura's suite of rooms."

He led the way to the upper realms of the palace, and before long they were on the threshold of a sumptuous apartment. It was an apartment in the suite of the Princess Aura, and she and Flash were seated on a couch there when Barin and his companions put in an appearance.

"You understand?" Aura was saying to the young American as the newcomers entered the room. "You came here in search of me from afar, and ever since you reached the palace our enemies have tried to keep us apart."

Flash could only look at her with the expression of a man who was trying to rack his brain.

"I can't remember," he groaned. "Everything seems so hazy—"

He stopped, becoming aware of the figures which had shown up in the doorway, and next moment Dale was running towards him, giving the lie to the Princess Aura's story, begging him to believe that she and not Ming's daughter was his fiancée.

Flash stared at her as if he did not understand, and then turned his glance upon Aura, who was watching Dale angrily.

"Who is this girl?" he demanded. "What is she trying to tell me?"

"Don't listen to her," Aura said. "She wants to make trouble for us both—"

"Aura." It was Barin who interrupted the princess, and he spoke the name tersely. "Aura, we're here in the Earth man's interests. I know that you've given him the draught of forgetfulness, and I intend to counteract its effect with the antidote."

"Flash," he added, taking the younger man by the arm, "you are going with us to the laboratory."

"No!" Ming's daughter cried out furiously. "Flash, don't be fooled by July 11th, 1936.

these people. They are your enemies, and they will do you harm!"

The American had risen to his feet in an uncertain manner, but at Aura's misleading words he started to resist Barin's efforts to draw him across the room, and the prince's urgent appeals only served to make him the more stubborn. Then suddenly, without warning, and in a spirit of sheer desperation, Barin struck him full in the jaw with his bunched knuckles.

All his strength was behind that blow, and Flash went sprawling to the floor, hitting his head against the decorative tiles as he fell.

He rolled over with a groan and lay still, and next second Dale was beside him.

"Barin, what have you done?" she exclaimed in dismay.

"I had no choice," was the answer. "Don't worry—he'll be all right. It would take more than that to hurt Flash Gordon. Quick, Zarkov, give me a hand with him."

Barin and the doctor lifted their friend and stumbled across to the door with him. They were accompanied by Dale—and by Aura, too—Aura, who beat at them with her clenched fists and did her utmost to impede their progress. But in spite of the princess they won their way to the corridor that led to the laboratory, and on reaching their destination they thrust the angry girl back into the passage and locked themselves in the workshop.

So incensed was Aura that she pounded and kicked at that laboratory door for several minutes, but, realising at last that she was exhausting herself to no purpose, she finally wheeled round and hurried off in quest of her father. Nor was she long in finding him, for she encountered him as he was walking from the direction of the underground chapel with the High Priest.

Breathlessly she related all that had occurred, and as he listened to her a scowl gathered upon Ming's brow. Then he gave vent to an imprecation and turned to the High Priest.

"Find Torch, captain of my bodyguards," he grated. "Tell him to take a file of men to the laboratory and execute Gordon without delay. I have had enough trouble with that accursed son of the Earth."

"No, no, father," Aura ejaculated wildly, "you can't do this. Flash Gordon belongs to me. Stop them from restoring his memory, but don't kill him."

Ming directed a cold, relentless glance at her.

"He dies," the emperor snapped. "From the very beginning I have never had any thought of sparing him."

He slid his eyes on the High Priest again, and spoke with an incisive curt-ness.

"You heard my command," he said. "What are you waiting for?"

With a bow the priest glided past him and departed to convey his instructions to Torch, captain of the royal bodyguard and executioner in chief.

The Invisible Ray

BEHIND the locked door of the laboratory, Zarkov and Dale were watching Barin as the latter filled a beaker with the contents of several flasks that he had obtained from a cabinet there.

They saw him mix his strange concoction with sure, steady hands, and then followed him to a table on which the body of Flash had been laid. Already the young American was beginning to show signs of recovering from the blow he had received, but before he could rouse himself Barin had forced him to swallow the drug that he had compounded.

Immediately it had passed his throat Flash became inert again, and for a minute or two he remained quite motionless. Then those who were bent over him detected a flickering of his lids, and presently he opened his eyes.

He looked at them, and Dale and Zarkov could have cried out for joy as they perceived the expression of recognition that crossed his face.

"Dale," he said, "Barin, Zarkov—where am I? What's happened? My head—it feels as if it's splitting."

"Barin's to blame for that," Zarkov told him, with a smile that indicated his relieved state of mind. "He had to lay you out, and you struck your skull on the floor."

"Had to lay me out?"

The three of them helped Flash down from the table and gave him an account of the events which had taken place during that interlude when he had been under the influence of the draught of forgetfulness. It was a narrative that filled him with incredulity, so that it had to be repeated again in detail before he could grasp the full facts. But at last, when all had been made clear to him, Zarkov took him aside and for no apparent reason led him towards an electrical contrivance that was bolted against the far wall—an appliance that was like an enormous switchboard, with a metal pedestal at its base on which a man might comfortably stand.

"Flash," the scientist stated, "it's been proved to-night that Ming is not prepared to stand by the terms of the bargain he made with Vultan. In short, we're not to be granted our freedom—and your life, perhaps Barin's as well, is in jeopardy."

He paused, and then went on speaking earnestly.

"In these circumstances," he announced, "it's well for you that I have stumbled upon an amazing discovery during my researches in this laboratory—a discovery, Flash, that left me astonished and—and not a little afraid, though I can see now that it may be of infinite value if I can only be sure of controlling it."

The younger man gave him a puzzled look, finding it difficult to follow him.

"Flash," Zarkov continued, "this machine before which we are standing is a device that supplies the radio-active forces which have helped the emperor to achieve so many of his sinister ambitions. But even Ming does not know to what fresh use it can be put. That's my secret—the secret which I blundered upon when I began some idle experiments with this very machine and discovered a new and hitherto unthought-of ray!"

Dale and Barin had moved across and joined Flash beside the instrument board which was under discussion, and he exchanged a glance with them ere turning to Zarkov again.

"I may be kind of slow in the uptake, doctor," he remarked, "but I'm darned if I know what you're driving at. Supposing you take the trouble to explain things a little more clearly. What is this discovery you've made? What is this new ray you speak of?"

Dr. Zarkov pursed his lips.

"I doubt whether you'd believe me if I told you the effect it produces," he muttered, "and, to be frank, I'm scared of demonstrating it—as yet. But perhaps—"

Again he paused, and then, as if he with his rifle. So the Marines had got here! A twisted smile appeared on Davis' lips as he stared at his one-time friend. It would be old Mac that would butt in.

MacDonald stepped forward. "Rifle parts—as we suspected." He gavo Davis a look of contempt. "So now you've turned gun-runner. You may get shot for this."

"Who cares?" the ex-Marine shrugged his shoulders. "A short life and a merry one."

"What made you become a gun-runner for a bunch of dirty, murdering Chinks, who have looted and raided villages and committed terrible crimes? You wished them to continue their murdering?"

"No, I'm not quite all that bad," Davis shook his head. "I'm not making excuses, Mac, but I had the idea that Royalists were soldiers supporting a good cause. China seems to change every day, with new generals in command, and I thought that Cheng might be the new leader. 'Fraid I didn't ask many questions about him. I agree he ain't all that I pictured. But once in this game I couldn't quit. I was aiming to join up with the real Chinese army if I got away with this business. Maybe I'm not sorry I've been found out."

"What're we gonna do, sir?" questioned the big Tex.

"Stand guard here until Captain Halstead turns up," was the immediate answer. "We've got to stop Cheng—"

It was too late. Into the warehouse charged a number of dirty-looking soldiers. All carried guns and swords. They covered the two Marines, who were hopelessly outnumbered.

"Drop those guns!" drawled an oily voice. "If not we shoot you stone dead."

MacDonald felt that it would serve little purpose trying to resist. They might kill about two before they were shot down. They lowered their arms, and instantly the rebel soldiers rushed forward.

With narrowed eyes Woody Davis watched the rebels bind MacDonald and Tex with ropes to two of the stout pillars of the warehouse. Then through the rauks stepped a smug-faced, fat little man, who wore a very dirty officer's uniform, and a thin, waspish Chinaman who had a green-peaked helmet and gold braid all over his uniform. The latter jabbered excitedly to the fat man.

"General Cheng want to know what this mean," drawled the general's chief-of-staff. "How come the Marines here?"

"When I came out to you I explained that someone had radio'd the Marines." Corrigan's eyes flickered nervously. "They got here quicker than I expected."

Suddenly General Cheng whipped out a gun, and there was an explosion. Corrigan screamed hoarsely, spun round and dropped in a heap. Woody Davis thought his last hour had come. With hands folded across his chest he stared defiantly at the two Chinese rebels, who were jabbering away. At last the chief-of-staff came close to Davis.

"General Cheng not quite understand," he said in the purring tones that made Davis want to strike him. "He think Corrigan make general hurry here and walk into trap. He shoot Corrigan by mistake. Corrigan was a fool so it make no difference. These two Marines stick you up—general wish to know why and who you are. Answer quick or you die like him."

"You don't scare me," retorted Davis. "I was Corrigan's assistant. I helped him get some of the guns out of Shanghai. Corrigan rode out to General Cheng because he knew the only chance you had of getting the guns was to get here before the Marines. You did not hurry and the Marines did. You murdered Corrigan and he was your friend. Where will you get more guns now he's dead?"

"Maybe you help us," grinned the evil Chinaman. "You wish to live you help general—yes, no?"

"I'll do my best," Woody Davis decided that after all life was very sweet, and he did not wish to die. These murdering thugs had roused his anger. To think that he had helped a bunch that were worse than any American gunmen. The general had brutally murdered Corrigan for no reason at all, and the manner in which Mac and Tex had been lashed to those pillars was making him see red. The general was at that moment amusing himself by striking Mac across the face with a whip.

The general desisted from torturing MacDonald and came across to stare at Davis, who faced him without flinching.

"The great general say he spare you, but no nonsense," drawled that evil voice. "You know where guns are—speak quick."

Woody Davis pointed to the cases. All the guns wanted assembling so they would be of little use. With a grim smile he watched boxes ripped open and guessed the general's remarks were not very polite.

When the chief-of-staff demanded the reason Woody answered that it was impossible to bring through the guns assembled as they would have been conspicuous. Several of the soldiers tried to put together some of the guns—their efforts were ludicrous. Next came a demand for ammunition. Davis managed to give MacDonald a sly wink, and that young officer knew his old pal was now on the side of law and order. Davis knew of some boxes of ammunition underneath bales of merchandise, and time was wasted at these boxes.

"Where the machine-guns and bombs?"

"Too dangerous—couldn't get them through," lied Davis.

The general rushed up to the youngster, and once more Woody thought his moments were numbered. The chief-of-staff purred that it would be wise for him to talk.

"I'm telling the truth!" shouted Woody, with assumed anger. "We managed to get through a thousand rifles and about a hundred cases of ammunition. Search the place if you don't believe me."

The sound of firing was a welcome interruption, and a soldier rushed in, and from the gestures Woody guessed that the Marines were converging on the warehouse. The general apparently had no desire to expose himself to danger and ordered his chief-of-staff to beat off the attack. Only Cheng remained, and his small eyes gleamed malevolently as he glanced round the warehouse. Cheng had a suspicion that the machine-guns might have arrived.

Revolver in hand, Cheng prowled round the warehouse, whilst Woody Davis lowered his hands to his side and waited. Again he winked at MacDonald. Cheng paused before some bags of rice, and he slit several with a knife, so that the contents spilled all over the floor. The ex-Marine's heart missed a beat, but the general only examined the top half of the bag and did not burrow.

Then Cheng felt one bag and saw something hard protruding. It was a bag that had been badly packed. Swiftly the knife went to work, and the magazine case of a machine-gun and butt of the gun were exposed. But as Cheng swung round on Davis the youngster leapt. His fist crashed into that evil, grinning face. Cheng was hurled backwards, but he still clutched the revolver as he sprawled against some cases.

A hullet whined past Woody's ear as he whipped out his own gun from its holster. Luckily, his blow had shaken Cheng and spoiled his aim, then Woody's gun barked, and the little general clutched at his side screaming horribly. He swayed before toppling to the floor.

The Siege

WITH his foot Woody Davis turned over the body of General Cheng, and a feeling of satisfaction could not be suppressed to find that this murdering little bandit was dead. He picked up the general's knife and quickly freed MacDonald and Tex.

"Mac, what I told you about going into this show thinking I was helping a worthy cause is true enough, though I didn't make too many inquiries. Maybe I wasn't in the mood. But I never reckoned I was helping a bunch of murderers. Cheng's men aren't going to have these guns if I can help it."

"Good for you, Woody!" gasped Mac. "You two mugs take it easy." Davis pointed to the machine-guns. "Get that assembled whilst I close and bolt the sliding doors."

By now the rifle fire had increased to an incessant crackling. Davis closed the great doors and bolted them in the nick of time. He had scarce finished when there came a rapping on the steel panels.

"Most of this place is galvanised iron and not bullet-proof," he spouted at MacDonald. "But if we pile cases against the three main doors and the windows we can hold out for some while." He pointed. "Tex, there are two more machine-guns in those sacks, and in the boxes marked 'Sugar' there is plenty of ammunition."

It was some while before the rebels realised that something had gone wrong, and that enabled the three young fellows to erect sound barricades. They were now armed with three machine-guns.

The main entrance began to sway as the Chinese tried to batter it in with great baulks of wood.

"Let 'em have it!" MacDonald cried, and pointed his machine-gun at the doors.

The leaden missiles poured through thin galvanised iron and mowed down the attackers, but the chief-of-staff was there, and he rushed more of his rebels to the attack. Unless they got into the warehouse and got those machine-guns and ammunition they were doomed.

Each took a door and kept up a rapid fire, until the Chinese began to shoot back. It was essential that they should not get hit, so they took up positions behind great bales of carpets. Now and again Woody or Mac would race to a window and pour out sweeping fire before the enemy could concentrate on him.

Then Tex's gun jammed through overheating. From the firing it seemed that the superior numbers of the rebels were keeping the Marines at bay. The three knew that they could not hold out much longer. The walls of the warehouse had been riddled with holes, and bullets seemed to be whistling all round them, so that they had to hug the floor. A face appeared at a window. Crack! Crack! Woody had not missed.

"Looks as if we're heat!" MacDonald shouted above the noise.

"I'll not let these seum beat me!" cried Davis through gritted teeth. He glanced round to try and see some way of beating their enemies. "I got it!" He pointed. "There's a small door over there that's seldom used—don't suppose the Chinks have seen it. We can unlock it and make a run for it."

"We can't quit here, Woody," argued MacDonald.

"Fifty yards away is an iron shed where petrol is stored," Davis explained. "If we can make it we can beat off the Chinks and hold out for some while, but that's not all." He jumped up and raced across the warehouse to start pulling packing-cases furiously to one side. He dragged forth a case, and when he staggered back they saw he was carrying hand grenades.

"They're the boys!" Tex cried gleefully.

"In that cellar we have a lot of high-explosive. It was brought here to sell to the various mines," Davis shouted. "As we quit this place we will blow it up. If Tex could make the shed he could open covering fire. Then you follow, Mac."

"What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to try to square myself!" The ex-Marine's eyes glinted. "I don't care whether you're an officer or what you are, but I'm blowing up this dump, and no one else is taking the risk."

They opened the door, and Tex made a run for it. He reached the shed without being seen. He had a good view of one of the doors, and he opened fire with MacDonald's gun. The officer was across and lying down beside him before the rebels had realised what was happening. MacDonald had his rifle and plenty of ammunition.

Woody Davis tossed several of the hand grenades down into the cellar and then raced for the door. There came the sound of an explosion, but there was nothing terrific about it. Half-way across to the shed Woody flung himself flat. He drew out a bomb, removed the pin, and then got to his knees. A bomb whistled through a window. There came a roar and a sheet of flame.

The rebels saw him, and bullets whined round him, but he bore a charmed life.

"The young fool!" yelled MacDonald.

Three more bombs Woody hurled before a red-hot needle seemed to go all up his side, and he toppled over, but he grinned as he lay there because there was one great mighty roar, and it seemed as if a volcano had torn the earth apart.

It was Tex who got to his side, and began to stagger with him towards the petrol shed. Then Tex dropped, lit in several places. MacDonald saw a body of enraged rebels rushing forward to kill two of the white men who had smashed their rebellion. His gun mowed them down.

From the trees charged a number of blue figures. The Marines had made a flank attack.

Woody Davis got to his knees, and though suffering agonies dragged Tex towards a heap of cans, whilst MacDonald poured out a withering fire on the almost demoralised rebels.

The Marines charged, and that completed the rout of all that remained of Cheng's army. Before the gleaming bayonets the Chinese turned and scuttled away into the darkness. Mac left his gun and tore across to Woody. That young man grinned inanely and flopped unconscious into his arms.

Woody Davis woke up in hospital aboard ship. He found that he had been unconscious for two days. He wanted to talk and ask questions, and as he threatened to get into a fever MacDonald came to see him.

"You're on board the Washington and you're at sea," MacDonald explained with a grin. "Tex has four bullet wounds in one leg, one through the ribs and a shoulder smashed. Being as tough as an ox he will pull through. I had the luck to get a slight graze only. The two bullets you stopped went dangerously close to your heart, but fate watches over some guys, and so you're here to hear some good news."

"Good news?"

"For your valour and courage Captain Halstead has decided to take you back into the Service."

"Say, that's swell!" cried Woody Davis. "But how about that guy Drenov?"

"Accidents do happen sometimes," Mac grinned. "That episode will be forgotten. It'll be just one of those things that will never be cleared up. You should be fit again in a few weeks."

Then Woody tried to sit up.

"I sent Brooklyn down to the Hewitts and—"

"Keep calm—keep calm—all in good time," laughed MacDonald. "That girl tried her hardest to make Captain Halstead and myself believe you were an innocent little lamb. You should have seen the way she carried on when we brought you back on a stretcher to the Hewitts. We had two men killed and four injured. The total the Chinks lost isn't known. Now you've gotta relax."

"But what happened to Brooklyn?"

"Swell dame that kid," MacDonald spoke quietly. "Up till now I haven't thought you were a good picker. She reckoned she would be a hindrance to your career, so she got Captain Halstead to fix her a passage on a junk bound for Shanghai. The captain offered to take her, but she just said that now she knew you were going to live she should get back to her job."

Woody Davis looked glum.

"I should be all fired up at being a Marine again," he muttered. "But this idea of not seeing Brooklyn again makes me feel as if I could howl."

"One last word," MacDonald edged to the cabin door. "In three months' time the Washington is due at the Philippines for a good two weeks' stay, Brooklyn knows that, and she'll be there, so that if you still feel the same way about her you can go on your bended knees. Now you rest or I'll have you chloroformed."

Woody Davis went to sleep with a contented grin on his face.

"GALLANT DEFENDER"

"Do you think I'd shoot a man for writing that note?" asked Johnny.

Sherman read the note again, to himself this time, and he studied the handwriting.

"It looks to me," he said slowly, "as though you're the one man that'd have every reason not to."

"I knew you'd see it that way," said Johnny.

"But what does he mean here about the McGrail kids?"

The sheriff pointed to Barbara and Jimmy, who were sitting beside the couch on which their uncle lay.

"Why, that's them," he said. "Babs and Jimmy have grown some since you seen 'em last, haven't they?"

Sherman gaped at the beautiful girl and her little brother, then eyed the prone figure upon the couch.

"Who's the man?" he asked.

"That's Solon's brother," replied the sheriff. "One of Munro's men shot him, too!"

"Munro's men? You sure o' that?"

The sheriff nodded.

"Somebody shot him just as he was tellin' me he could prove that it was Munro who shot Solon McGrail."

Sherman blinked.

"And was he able to prove it?"

"Enough so that I made out a warrant for Munro's arrest."

Silently Johnny held out the key of the cell, and Sherman himself unlocked the door. Johnny walked over to the sheriff's desk, where his belt was lying, and he picked it up and fastened it round his waist.

"I guess you won't need to bother about serving that warrant, sheriff," said Sherman.

"Why not?" countered the sheriff.

"Haven't we had enough gun-law in this valley in the past month?"

"Yeah, but this looks like an open-and-shut case to me."

"And you'd have said the same thing about Johnny Flagg when you came in, wouldn't you?"

"Yes," admitted the rancher in a shame-faced manner. "I reckon I would."

"And it would have been a pretty sad mistake, too, wouldn't it? Now you let the law make the mistakes." The sheriff pocketed the warrant he had made out. "That's what I'm hired for!"

At Bay!

FROM the front step of the sheriff's office Sherman explained matters at length to the waiting cattlemen and introduced Barbara and Jimmy to them. Munro, outside the estate office down the street, could not see what was happening, but began to chafe at the delay.

"I wonder what's keepin' 'em over there so long," he growled.

"You can search me," said Swale.

The homesteaders reappeared in force at the bottom of the street, and Munro saw that they were now wearing belts and that many of them had their hands on the butts of their guns.

"Hi!" he exclaimed. "Looks like the nesters are figuring on something, too. I wish this place'd open—there's no cover if they start anything!"

"No," said Swale.

Five more minutes passed, and Munro took out his watch. It was close upon eight o'clock.

Two more minutes, and then a

had come to a sudden decision, he stepped closer to the switchboard and drew down a lever that appeared to have been recently fitted to it.

If his companions had anticipated a surprise, they were sadly disappointed. So far as Flash, Dale and Barin could see, the gesture produced no result—not even the drone of mechanism such as one might expect to hear from forces that had been suddenly set in motion.

Flash stared at Zarkov inquiringly. "Well?" he asked.

Without a word the doctor set one foot on the pedestal at the base of the contrivance, but even as he did so there came an interruption in the form of a summons on the laboratory door, a loud knocking that was accompanied by a harsh, strident voice.

"Open! In the name of the Emperor Ming!"

Zarkov drew back and looked quickly at Dale, Flash and Barin. There was a moment of tense silence, and then that summons was repeated, a heavy hand beating upon the door so that it shook under the blows.

"Open, I say! In the name of his Majesty the Emperor!"

Barin spoke in a hushed tone. There was an anxious expression in his sombre eyes.

"Torch, captain of the royal bodyguard!" he panted. "Aura must have carried word to her father that you were here, Flash, and Torch and some of his men have come to fetch you."

The American bunched his muscles involuntarily and his face became grim—as grim as Dale's was frightened. Magnificent he looked as he stood there, a stalwart figure that seemed to radiate strength and purposeful determination.

"They won't take me without a fight!" he said through gritted teeth.

It was at this juncture that Zarkov laid a hand on his arm, and, turning his head, Flash saw that there was a queer look on the scientist's features.

"Wait," the doctor cautioned. "Wait, my boy. Do nothing rash—"

"Rash!" the younger man cried, breaking in on him. "Ming has shown that he means to have my blood, hasn't he? All right, if I choose to cut loose and go down fighting, I don't call that rash!"

Zarkov attempted to put forward some argument, but at that instant a sharp command reached his ears from beyond the laboratory door, and immediately afterwards he saw the lock transformed into molten metal—molten metal that dripped to the floor like boiling lead.

A destroying jet of electric fire had reduced it to pulp, and a kick sent the door swinging inward on its hinges. Another second and the form of Torch was striding across the threshold, clad in his strange suit of armour.

He was followed by a group of soldiery, each man carrying a ray-gun, and, coming to a halt in the middle of the laboratory, he glowered at its four occupants collectively before he finally riveted his attention on Flash.

"Gordon," he said, "stand away from your friends and get back against that wall!"

Flash made a movement, but it was not one of obedience, for he advanced upon Torch until he was face to face with him.

"What's the idea?" he jerked out.

The captain of Ming's bodyguard looked him full in the eyes.

"The emperor grows tired of the intrigues that are centred round you," he announced deliberately. "Therefore he has ordered your execution, and I am here to see that his instructions are carried out!"

There was a heart-rending cry from Dale Arden, and, rushing forward, she clung to her lover frantically.

"Flash, Flash!" she sobbed. "They can't do this to you—they can't!"

"Steady, Dale," he breathed, and then, taking a step closer to Torch, he made as if to grapple with the fellow.

Torch promptly lifted a hand to keep him at bay.

"Beware, Gordon," he rapped out. "My men hold you covered, and if you offer resistance, the death-fire will be poured into your body here and now. Would you imperil the life of the girl by your side as well?"

The words brought Flash to a standstill, and he caught Dale by the wrists and broke her hold on him.

"Keep away, dear," he said huskily. "I don't care what they do to me, but you mustn't suffer. Zarkov—Barin—look after her!"

"No, no," Dale wept. "I'm not afraid to die, Flash. Let them kill both of us. I couldn't go on living without you."

Barin and Zarkov were hurrying across the laboratory now, and while the doctor took charge of Dale, the prince thrust himself between Torch and the condemned American.

"This man's life must be spared," he began. "Is there no mercy in Ming's heart? Is there no honour in him? Gordon earned his freedom, as you yourself can testify. His freedom, and the right to wed Dale Arden! Can you deny it?"

The face of Torch was impassive, except for a glitter that played in his eyes.

"It is not for me to question his Majesty's orders," he said. "Nor is that privilege yours, Prince Barin. I would remind you that your own life hangs by a thread—and the emperor may choose to snap that thread—on the slightest provocation."

A defiant retort sprang to Barin's lips, but before he could utter it Flash pushed him aside. There had been enough futile talk, to his way of thinking, and he wanted to make an end of the business—to fling himself into the midst of his enemies and land a blow or two ere he was struck down by a shaft of withering fire.

To die fighting—such was the purpose that Flash had in mind. But as he was on the point of launching an attack that would have been directed mainly against Torch, a restraining hand closed fast on his shoulder.

It was Zarkov's hand, for abandoning Dale, the scientist had leaped upon his young friend to prevent him from hurling himself into the thick of the firing-squad.

"Don't, Flash, don't!" he cried out. "Come, it's useless to resist. Get back to the wall and show these men that you can face those ray-guns without flinching."

Flash glared at him—was about to shake him off when all at once it seemed to him that he caught a significant glint in the doctor's eyes—and it came to him then, in a split second of time, that Zarkov had some plan, some inspiration the nature of which was not to be guessed.

Flash only knew that there was a message in the scientist's glance, a message which he could not fathom; and next moment he found himself retreating with the older man.

"The doctor's counsel is wise," he heard Torch say, "and I can promise you, Gordon, that it will be a swift and easy death."

Flash made no comment. In silence he accompanied Zarkov to the far wall, and was brought to a halt before that switchboard which they had been contemplating when Torch had interrupted them by his summons on the door.

"On the pedestal, Flash!" Dr. Zarkov hissed under his breath. "Stand on the pedestal!"

The condemned American looked at him vaguely, and then he stepped on to the metal pad at the base of the switchboard, after which Zarkov held him in conversation for a brief interval, making a great show of bidding him farewell.

It was a conversation which was brought to a close by Torch, who soon showed signs of impatience.

"Enough, Zarkov," he called. "Get to one side. There has been enough delay."

The doctor obeyed, and as he moved clear of the line of fire, he saw Ming's guards take up their position with ray-guns held in readiness. At the same time Dale attempted to run towards Flash, but Zarkov seized her and pulled her out of harm's way.

"Aim at the prisoner!" Torch commanded sharply.

The men of the firing-party carried the ray-guns to their shoulders—trained them on the body of their intended victim—and it was then that an incredible change became apparent in the figure of Flash Gordon, a transformation that astounded everyone present excepting Dr. Zarkov.

The outlines of the young American's stalwart form were growing dim, were dissolving like those of some strange phantom that had walked amongst mortal men in human guise and then chosen to vanish into thin air and return to the limbo of a spirit world. Before the amazed eyes of Torch and his comrades, Flash Gordon was losing substance, and as with faltering hands his executioners lowered their guns, so the condemned prisoner disappeared utterly from their sight!

"GALLANT DEFENDER"

heavily built Government commissioner came walking along the boardwalk from the direction of the so-called Grand Hotel, a man of dignity, clad in dark clothes and wearing a collar and tie.

Munro moved aside as this official approached the door of the land office.

"Good-morning," said the commissioner, and took a key from his pocket and inserted it in the lock of the door.

The homesteaders began to march up the street, ready to draw their guns if there should be any opposition to their perfectly lawful purpose. Munro said hurriedly to his men:

"You wait here till I make the McGrail ranch mine accordin' to the law."

The commissioner opened the door and entered the office, but just as Munro was about to cross the threshold Sherman shouted at him:

"Hi, Munro, just a second!"

The crook swung round and saw the rancher striding across the street with all the cattlemen on foot behind him. With none too good a will he waited.

Johnny and the sheriff were also waiting, but they were inside the doorway of the sheriff's office.

"D'you figure you're fast enough to serve that warrant?" asked Johnny.

"Well, I don't know," was the frank reply, "but I'm gonna try."

Sherman reached the boardwalk.

"Flagg did not kill Harvey Campbell!" he said brusquely and without any preliminaries.

Munro was taken aback.

"What makes you think Flagg didn't kill him?" he asked blankly.

"This!" said Sherman, and gave him the note.

Munro read it, gritted his teeth, and handed it back. The homesteaders were very near now.

"That does sorta clear him, doesn't it?" he said hoarsely. "Are the McGrail children with the nesters?"

Sherman nodded.

"Are you figurin' on backing 'em like this letter says?"

"We've got orders from the law," replied Sherman, "to stay neutral."

"Well," said Munro with obvious relief, "then I'd better file before they do."

Johnny had approached unobserved. "Wait a minute, Munro!" he said sternly.

Munro, with an oath, reached for his gun; Joe Swale and Tuscan did likewise. But Sherman and the cattlemen instantly had them covered.

"Lay off those guns!" roared Sherman.

The homesteaders halted, only a few yards away, and all their guns were out. Munro and his men dropped their hands.

"I thought you said you were neutral," raged Munro.

"We are," returned Sherman, "and we're gonna see that everyone else stays neutral, too! Move on ahead, you, and hand over your irons before you're tempted!"

Joe Swale and the rest of the gang surrendered their weapons to the cattlemen and slunk off along the boardwalk. The sheriff crossed the roadway with Barbara and Jimmy.

"I've got a warrant for you, Munro," he said sternly, "for murder!"

"What are you tryin' to do?" snarled the crook. "Pin that Campbell death on me?"

"You're wanted for killing Solon McGrail. His brother swore out the warrant."

Munro was at bay and knew it; but he tried to keep up his bluff.

"What is this?" he howled. "A trick to stop me from filing? If we'd known who killed Solon McGrail we'd have hung him eight years ago."

"It took all those years," said Johnny, "to get enough evidence, and it all points to you, Munro! For one thing, you're wearing a watch that can be identified as his!"

Munro snatched from his waistcoat pocket the watch that was attached to an ornamental gold chain.

"This?" he cried scornfully. "Why, there's a thousand like this in the county!"

"Not with McGrail's name engraved inside the back case," said Johnny.

"There's no engraving in the back of the watch!"

"Then maybe you won't mind opening it up so we can all take a look for ourselves."

"Certainly I mind!" Munro thrust the watch back in his pocket. "Not you, nor anyone else, is gonna tell me what to do with my property."

"All right, Munro." Johnny stepped down off the boardwalk. "You can put your hands or go for your gun any time you're ready."

With his own hands loose at his sides he backed slowly away, and the cattlemen and the homesteaders gave him plenty of room.

Munro hesitated for the space of thirty seconds, then, with the swiftness of lightning, his right hand went to his gun. But Johnny beat him to the draw, swift as he was, and down he went, flat on his face in the roadway, with a bullet in his heart.

For several long minutes all eyes were on the sprawling form of the murderer whose death no one regretted, and it was the sheriff who broke the silence.

"All right, Sherman," he said, "I'll take care of his men. The law's got something to say to them!"

He marched over to Joe Swale and the others.

"Get out of here!" he shouted. "Go on!"

Some of the cattlemen helped to drive the crestfallen ruffians over to the sheriff's office, where they were bundled into cells. Sherman stowed away his own six-shooter and waved a hand towards the door of the estate office.

"Well, I reckon you folks can start filing your claims now," he said.

The homesteaders pressed eagerly forward, but Dave Larkin stopped them.

"Wait!" he commanded. "We seem to be forgettin' who's got the right to file on the first claim—the McGrails and their foreman!"

"That's right," agreed everybody; but Jimmy, standing between Johnny and Barbara, piped shrilly:

"Foreman my eye! It's a husband we need, ain't it, sis?"

AND
"FEDERAL AGENT"
Two Long Complete Film Dramas Inside!

" MURDER on a BRIDLE PATH"

Starring James GLEASON & Helen BRODERICK

When Violet Feverel is found dead in Central Park, apparently thrown and trampled by a horse, Detective-Inspector Piper decides that it must have been an accident. But Miss Hildegarde Withers convinces him that it was murder, and the two investigate a complicated case in which there is yet another killing before the guilty person is discovered. A first-class mystery, starring James Gleason

The Watcher

THE driver of the taxicab parked on the rank in East Eighty-Sixth Street was fast asleep, his arms on the wheel, his face on his arms, when Don Gregg left a doorway in which he had been lurking and ran across to him. It was five o'clock in the morning and the sun was rising redly over the East River, but the driver had been plying for hire all night and he was tired.

Don Gregg looked none too fresh himself. He was young, clean-shaven, and in a lean sort of way almost handsome, but his face was drawn and his grey eyes were heavy-lidded and bloodshot. The collar of his dark overcoat was turned up about his ears and the brim of his slouch hat was pulled down as though to hide his eyes.

Not very far along the street two cars were moving away from the canopied entrance of a tall apartment-house, and Don awakened the driver in haste.

"Follow that car!" he said harshly.

The driver blinked in the direction indicated by a pointing finger.

"Why?" he challenged.

"This is why!"

Don plucked his hand into a pocket of his overcoat, whereupon the man sat up, half expecting to be shown a detective's badge. But it was a five-dollar note that was flourished in his face.

"Okay, boss," he said, and Don scrambled into the cab and the self-starter roused a cold engine into activity.

There was not much traffic about in that particular region of New York City so early in the morning, and the two cars were trailed without difficulty round a corner into Madison Avenue and down that wide thoroughfare into East Fifty-Seventh Street.

September 26th, 1930.

Outside the double and cross-divided doors of a livery stable just beyond Park Avenue the leading car came to a standstill with a screeching of brakes and the other one stopped close behind it. Don Gregg instructed the driver of the taxicab to pull up at the corner and there descended and handed over the five-dollar note.

He made for a doorway, and the driver saw him peering out from it as he drove off. From the leading car a girl in riding-coat and jhodpurs was being helped down by a youngish man in evening clothes, and Don's attention was concentrated upon her.

Violet Feverel was her name, and but for a petulant droop about her mouth she would have been beautiful. Two other girls were in the car, and one of them leaned out to say:

"Sorry you're deserting, Violet. It was a grand party."

"Glad you could come," responded Violet Feverel, and turned to the man in evening clothes. "Thanks for dropping me, Tony."

"We don't want to drop you," he declared emphatically. "Why don't you come on to Harlem with us?"

"No, thanks." She smiled slightly. "I'm in the cavalry this morning. Have you got a cigarette?"

Tony groped in his pockets, but the last of his cigarettes had been smoked. She went back to the open door of the car.

"Have you got a cigarette in there?" she asked.

There were two men in the car as well as the two girls, but they hadn't a cigarette between them.

"Try Eddie," suggested one of the men.

Eddie Fry, a curly-headed young fellow with a muffer round his neck, was in the driving-seat of the car behind and a girl with pale red hair and large dark hazel eyes was sitting beside him. In the back were two other girls. He saw Violet Feverel walking towards him, and he said hastily to his companion:

"Babs, you'd better hide down there so Violet won't see you."

"But, Eddie," she said nervously, "do you think it's all right?"

"Sure it's all right," he returned. "Go on—get down!"

She slid from the seat and crouched down on the floor of the car just as her sister Violet reached the window. The girls in the back seat were laughing, and Eddie told them to shut up.

"Got any cigarettes, Eddie?" asked Violet.

"Sure," he replied, and held out a case, screening the girl on the floor as well as he could.

"And a light?"

He had to unfasten his overcoat to get at a lighter which he ignited and offered. She lit the cigarette, and in doing so looked down past him and saw the huddled figure of her sister. Immediately she flew round the car to the other door, opened it, and dragged the girl out.

"Well, ehiseller!" she cried furiously.

"What do you mean by that?" asked the girl, white of face and trying to free herself from the hand that gripped her arm.

"You know what I mean!" Eddie scrambled out from behind the wheel and rushed round to them.

"Oh, leave her alone!" he stormed.

"What have you got to be sore about?"

"Not a thing, Mr. Fry," Violet Feverel retorted scathingly. "And my own sister, too!"

"We were going to tell you," began Barbara, "but—"

"But it was more fun sneaking around behind my back, wasn't it?" raged Violet.

The upper part of one of the double doors of the livery stable swung back and the manager of the place looked out, thrusting his elbows on the lower part of the door. Heads were thrust out of the windows of the two cars, and from his hiding-place Don Gregg watched and listened.

"I wouldn't talk about sneaking around people's backs," cried Eddie Fry. "You seem to be doing pretty well with that stable boy of yours!"

Violet Feverel smacked his face and stalked away towards the stable, and he would have followed her but Barbara stopped him.

"Let's take a walk until you cool down, Eddie," she pleaded. "One of the others can drive."

Tony got back into the front car with a grimace.

"Violet's on the rampage," he said. "Let's get out of here."

The two cars were being started, and Eddie and Barbara were walking off together, when Violet reached the stable and the manager opened for her the part of the door upon which he had been leaning.

He was tall, young, and obviously conceited.

"You certainly have a fast right hand," he said as she stepped into a brick-paved yard between well-kept stalls. "I was going to help you, but—"

"But you found out I could take care of myself," she snapped. "It's a good thing for you to remember."

There was an office on the left of the yard, but she passed it with her chin in the air and he kept pace with her.

"Was there anything special meant by that crack?" he asked, twisting the ends of his little moustache.

"Have my horse saddled."

The expression on his face showed that he resented her tone.

"Highpockets is saddling him now," he returned curtly.

The grinning face of a negro stable-boy appeared at the bars of one of the stalls, and then a red stallion was led out into the yard.

"Good-mornin', Miss Fev'el," boomed the negro.

"Give me a leg up, Highpockets," said she.

He stared at her in a puzzled fashion and at the manager who usually helped her into the saddle. But the manager nodded and held the stallion's head, so he obeyed.

"I'm riding alone this morning," she stated icily as she took up the reins, "and that's the way I'm doing everything so far as you're concerned."

"But, Violet," protested the manager, "why all this—"

"You know why," she broke in, "so don't let's go into that again."

She rode out from the yard into the street and turned in the direction of Central Park. Highpockets went to close the lower part of the door after her, but the manager waved him aside.

"If anybody wants me," he said, "tell them I've gone to breakfast."

"Yassuh, Mis'r Wells," nodded the black, and Latigo Wells walked out past him and also turned to the right. The lower part of the door was closed and bolted, and the negro looked thoughtfully over it.

"This sho's gwine to be a bad mornin'," he soliloquised with gloom. "Sun come up red, everybody's actin' more like snappin' turtles than white folks, and I'se hungry. Yassuh."

He slammed the upper part of the door and was about to bolt that, too, when Don Gregg came running over from his lurking place.

"Hi!" he shouted. "I want to rent a horse!"

Highpockets reopened the upper part of the door and viewed the stranger.

"Boss gone to breakfast," he said with a shake of his woolly head.

"Won't be back till after a while."

"I don't want the boss," retorted Don. "I want to rent a horse."

"Yeah, but you gotta see the boss before you gits a horse. We don't rent hosses to strangers."

The upper part of the door was slammed, but it creaked open again a few seconds later, and Highpockets was surprised to see the young man who wanted a horse help himself to a tradesman's cycle that was resting against the kerb outside a shop across the street and ride away on it.

The Red Stallion

VIOLET FEVEREL cantered into Central Park by its southern entrance in Fifth Avenue and beyond the pond turned into a bridleway with bushes and trees. The early morning air was crisp and a breeze stirred her golden hair as she set the horse to a gallop.

"Yeah, I guess you're right," decided Piper. "No witnesses, eh?"

She had ridden nearly as far as the lake when suddenly the red stallion reared up on his hind legs and she was pitched out of the saddle on to the turf close beside a bush.

The fall jarred every bone in her body, but she was not otherwise injured, and she sat up to see the spirited animal disappearing round a bend. Slowly she rose to her feet and readjusted her hat, and she was about to start off in pursuit when a sound in the bush caused her to look round.

Her blue eyes widened with horror and she uttered a piercing scream. Then something struck her on the head, and down she went, flat on her back, with outspread arms.

Central Park is well policed, but ten minutes elapsed before a patrolman came upon her body and blew his whistle. Other officers came running to the scene, a few curious pedestrians gathered round, and from the nearest telephone-box a burly sergeant rang up the precinct station in East Sixty-Seventh Street.

Almost simultaneously with an ambulance from Bellevue Hospital a car arrived from headquarters, and Dr. Charles Bloom, the medical examiner, adjusted his pince-nez and knelt to ascertain the cause of death.

"It was an accident all right," he said after a while, and got to his feet. "I wonder what's keeping the inspector?"

Another squad car drove up close to the ambulance and from it Detective-Inspector Osear Piper descended, a sharp-featured man with steely blue eyes, a tight-lipped mouth, and a wisp of a moustache.

"Oh, here he is!" exclaimed the doctor, and a plain-clothes man named Burke hurried towards the car to greet the newcomer.

"Hallo, Burke," said Piper, mainly out of the corner of his mouth. "Gotta miss my breakfast again this morning?"

"Not to-day, inspector," replied the detective. "She was thrown, and it looks like the horse kicked her."

Piper joined the group round the dead body of Violet Feverel.

"Hallo, doe," he said. "What've we got?"

"Well," replied the medical examiner, "it looks like an accident. Apparently the horse threw her and trampled her. The hoofprint is clear."

Piper went down on one knee to look at a wound in the back of the girl's head—and at her hat, which lay beside her left hand. The hat was crushed and bore the imprint of a horseshoe.

"Yeah, I guess you're right," decided Piper. "No witnesses, eh?"

Burke, to whom the question was addressed, replied in the negative, and Piper rose and looked to left and right.

"Where's the horse?" he asked.

"Must've run away."

Concealed from view by the bushes, a tallish and middle-aged woman was leading the red stallion along the bride-path and carrying a little black and white rough-haired terrier in one arm. Her face was full and plain, her nose was long, and her jaw suggested a tenacity of purpose.

"I guess that's all," said Piper. "You can make out the death certificate doc. I don't see why I always have to miss my breakfast for these accidents."

"I had an uncle once," said a feminine voice close behind him, "who thought the world war was an accident."

He swung round with a start, and he saw the woman with the horse and the dog.

"It would be you!" he exploded, while all the others stared. "It's getting so, Hildegard, that a person can't be killed within the city limits without you showing up. Where'd you get this horse?"

"Mister Jones and I were out taking an early walk," she replied, "and we found it, so we thought we'd look for the rider."

He took the bridle from her and she set Mister Jones, the terrier, down upon his four feet.

"Well, it's all right, see!" snapped Piper. "It's nothing but an accident."

Miss Hildegard Withers viewed the body on the ground with quick blue eyes and emitted a characteristic sniff.

"I don't think so," said she.

"Oh," scoffed Piper, "got a theory, I suppose? Going to try and tell me she committed suicide? Hi, doe, you know Miss Withers!"

The lanky medical examiner walked over to them.

"How d'you do?" he said. "We met during that schoolhouse case—the one the Press called 'Murder on the Blackboard.' You helped us a lot on that case."

"Thank you, doctor," responded Miss Withers meekly. "And I may help you on this one, too."

"Aw, Hildegard," wailed Piper, "don't start gumming things up."

"All right, Osear." She flipped a hand at him. "You run along to breakfast, but I'm going to find out how this blood got on the horse by accident."

"Blood?" Piper gaped in astonishment at a little patch of crimson on the neck of the red stallion which she pointed out to him. "What d'you make of this, doe?" he exclaimed.

Dr. Bloom looked closely at the little patch.

"Why, I don't know," he confessed. "There doesn't seem to be any wound."

"Aw," growled Piper, "probably just scratched himself on one of these bushes."

"But there's no scratch," said Hildegard Withers.

The doctor instructed two internes from Bellevue Hospital to remove the body of the dead girl, and turned to a policeman from the squad car.

"Durkin," he said, "get me my kit. I'm going to do some probing."

Miss Withers had no desire to witness the probing of a spirited horse's neck for a bullet that might not be there, and she drifted away.

She saw Violet Feverel transferred from the ground to a stretcher, covered over with a sheet, and borne off to the ambulance, and then she kicked against something half-buried in the turf and stooped to unearth a well-used briar pipe.

She rose with the pipe in her hand, glanced round to make sure that nobody had noticed what she was doing, and opened a handbag which had been tucked under her arm. The pipe was stowed in the handbag, and she was looking thoughtfully from the spot where she had found it to a bush only a few feet away when two very obvious grooms came walking along the bride-path.

"What's going on here?" asked one of them with a nod of his head towards the ambulance.

"Accident," replied the other laconically.

"You ought to be on the police force," said Miss Withers. "Oh, by the by, do you know where that horse helongs?"

The two grooms became aware of the red stallion and of the men clustered round it.

"Why, yes," replied the one who had received a very doubtful compliment, "that's Siwash from the Thwaite Stables, East Fifty-Seventh Street."

"Thanks," she murmured.

The two grooms passed on, and she was looking about the trampled ground when Piper shouted to her:

"Hi, Hildegard, come here! Look what we've found!"

She went back to him, and he displayed, in the palm of his hand, a little bullet.

"A BB shot!" he exclaimed. "Somebody must have plugged that horse with an air rifle!"

"By accident," said she dryly; but Piper appeared not to hear that comment.

"You know, I knew there was more in this than met the eye!" he declared.

Dr. Charles Bloom joined them, wiping his pince-nez with a huge handkerchief.

"In view of this, inspector," he said, "I think I'd better make an autopsy."

"Yeah, that's right," approved Piper. "Go ahead, doc. The girl may have been dead before the horse kicked her."

The doctor went off to the ear that had brought him, and he was climbing into it when two plain-clothes men appeared round a bush carrying, between them, a damaged bicycle, from the bent front wheel of which a tyre was hanging limply.

"Hi, boys, what have you got there?" demanded Piper.

"Offhand," sniffed Miss Withers, "I'd say it's a bicycle."

The machine was set down in front of them.

"Don't handle it, chump!" Piper rapped at a man who had caught hold of the handlebars. "I want to have it dusted for finger-prints. Use your handkerchief!"

He turned exultingly to Hildegard Withers.

"Now we're getting somewhere!"

Miss Withers had nothing to say to that. She called to her terrier, and she caught hold of his lead. Piper spoke to one of the plain-clothes men.

"Sims," he said, "get on the 'phone and call all stables in the neighbourhood and see if you can find out which one that nag came from."

"It's from the Thwaite Stables in East Fifty-Seventh Street," Miss Withers stated quietly.

"Huh?" In his astonishment Piper nearly fell over the lead and felt tempted to kick the dog. His men were repressing grins with difficulty.

"Well, why don't you get busy?" he roared at Sims. "Get on that horse! Here, you take this ankle-chewing mutt, too!"

Miss Withers, with a pained expression on her face, held out the lead.

"Yes, Mr. Sims," she said, "take him to my apartment—and you might feed him. I'm going to be with the inspector all day."

Piper promptly strode away towards the squad car, but she ran after him.

"Thwaite Stables on East Fifty-Seventh," he said to the driver, but as he opened the rear door Miss Withers collided with him against the running-board.

"Where d'you think you're going?" he snapped. "What are you following me for?"

"I don't know, Osear," she returned demurely. "I guess it's because you bring out the mother in me."

"Oh, go ahead!" he growled,

At the Stables

IN response to a loud banging on the double and divided doors of the stable in East Fifty-Seventh Street, one upper portion was opened and the face of Highpockets looked out.

"Ah can't rent no hosses to no strangers," the negro informed Detective-Inspector Oscar Piper and the female beside him.

"All right, all right!" returned Piper sharply. "Never mind that." He held out his badge. "Come on, open up!"

Highpockets gulped, and his eyes bulged nearly out of his head.

"Oh, Lawsy, de polceese!" he gasped. "Yassuh, yassuh, openin' up right away, suh!"

Both doors were opened, top and bottom, and at that moment a plain-clothes man arrived on the back of the red stallion. Sims had gone off with Mister Jones to Hildegard's flat in West Seventy-Seventh Street, deputing to a colleague the task of riding the horse back to the stable where it belonged.

"All right, Grady," said Piper, "bring him in."

Highpockets gaped.

"What you all bringin' back Miss Fev'el's hoss for?" he asked wonderingly, as Grady dismounted and led the horse into the yard.

"Feverel, eh?" Piper whirled round on him. "Sounds like a phoney name to me. Where does she live?"

"Ah don't know," declared the negro, taking the bridle of the stallion. "She don't live here."

"Well," said Piper wryly to Miss Withers, "we've cleared that up. She doesn't live here. Okay, Grady, but you'd better stiek around."

Grady nodded, and drifted out in the street.

"Who's in charge here?" demanded Piper.

"Mistah Wells is the manager," replied the black, "but he's out to breakfast."

"Out to breakfast, eh?" Piper's eyes glistened. "How long's he been gone? About three-quarters of an hour, maybe?"

"No, not that long." Highpockets shook his head with vigour. "About an hour or two—maybe."

Piper looked helplessly at Miss Withers, whose face expressed nothing in particular.

"Okay, Hildegard," he said. "You're witness! Where's the office?" "Right over to your left, suh."

Highpockets pointed to a closed door, and led the horse away. Miss Withers followed him at a distance, and Piper opened the indicated door and entered a very plainly-furnished office.

A desk in it engaged his attention, and he proceeded to open one drawer after another.

Siwash, the red stallion, was led into its stall and unsaddled, and Highpockets, all unaware that Miss Withers was watching him, took a rabbit's foot from a pocket of his trousers and rubbed it on his rather shapeless nose.

"Rabbit foot," he said sepulchrally. "I knowed dis day was gonna be unlucky for somebody."

"You did, eh?" Miss Withers entered the stall, startling him nearly out of his wits, and he pocketed the rabbit's foot in haste. "Now look here, son—"

"Ah knows nuthin'!" he cried. "Oh, I'll take your word for that!" said she. "Suppose you tell me your name?"

"Highpockets, ma'am."

The name sounded incredible, but she accepted it with a shrug.

"Well, have it your own way. How long have you worked around here?"

"Thank you, doctor," responded Miss Withers meekly. "And I may help you on this case, too."

"About three month, ma'am—not countin' the week I was in gaol."

"What were you doing in gaol?"

The negro rolled his eyes and replied: "Shootin' dice."

"No, I mean, what did they put you in gaol for?"

"Shootin' dice."

She laughed a little, and after that Highpockets answered quite readily other questions she put to him.

In the office Piper had found a book in which accounts with regular customers were kept, and he was examining it at the desk when Latigo Wells stepped in at the door and stopped short to scowl at him.

"Well, good-morning," the manager barked. "What can I do for you?"

Piper put down the book. "You the manager here?" he inquired curtly.

"Yes, Wells is the name."

"Did you know Violet Feverel?"

Latigo Wells looked startled. "Why, yes," he admitted, dropping his tone of resentment. "She—"

"Just come back from your breakfast, haven't you?"

"Say, what is all this?" demanded Wells. "Who are you, anyway?"

"Inspector Piper, Homicide Squad." Piper displayed his credentials. "Come on, answer the question!"

"Yes, I've just got back from breakfast."

"Where'd you eat?"

"Fifty-Ninth and Madison."

"How long have you known Miss Feverel?"

The manager perched himself on the edge of the desk and appeared to be searching his memory.

"Quite some time," he said.

"Know her socially—away from the stables?"

"Yes, sort of. I've had a date with her occasionally."

"Ever have any trouble with her?"

Wells looked away from the keen blue eyes that were boring into his dark-brown ones, but he answered emphatically enough:

"Certainly not. We were the best of friends."

"Oh!" interpreted Piper. "Liked her a lot, eh? Matter of fact, you were a little bit in love with her, weren't you?"

"I wouldn't say that. She was— Say, I don't see why you're asking me all these questions."

"You don't, eh? Well, Violet Feverel's been killed under very strange circumstances." He stepped nearer to the young man. "Murdered!"

"Murdered?" The manager paled. "While you were out at breakfast," said Piper significantly.

"While I—" Wells bounced off the desk, trembling visibly. "What are you trying to do?" he screeched. "Hang it on me?"

"Take it easy, take it easy," urged Piper, and caught hold of his arm. "Come on, sit down. I'm not hanging anything on you—I'm just trying to find out all I can."

Wells sank on to a chair, and with fumbling hands took out a cigarette; but the cigarette remained unlighted.

"Now, come on, be a good fellow," said Piper. "Tell me all you know. Did she have any enemies to your knowledge?"

"No," was the hesitating reply. "I don't think so. Er—wait a minute—this might be something. She had an argument with a guy outside the stable this morning, and she slapped his face."

"Slapped a guy's face? Now we're getting somewhere!"

Miss Withers, by this time, had extracted what she considered to be some useful information from Highpockets. She rewarded him with a five-dollar note, and she said:

"You're a fine fellow, Highpockets, and I know I can trust you to keep quiet about all you've told me. Understand?"

"Yes, ma'am, Miss Withers," the negro assured her. "When Ah keeps quiet, Ah keeps quiet all over."

Miss Withers made her way to the office and looked in at the open door.

"Oh, Hildegarde," boomed Piper, "I want you to meet Mr. Wells, the manager here."

She crossed the threshold and she tilted her head at the young man in the chair.

"How d'you do, Mr. Wells?" she purred, and then: "Is this the murderer?"

"Mr. Wells," snapped Piper disgustedly, "has just given me some very valuable information."

"Well, isn't that nice? Then he's probably told you he had a row with Miss Feveler this morning?"

"No," said Piper, staring blankly at her, "he didn't say anything about that."

Wells jumped up from the chair in consternation.

"Hi, wait a minute!" he cried. "I can explain!"

"You can explain down at headquarters," retorted Piper, and he bellowed for Grady.

Latigo Wells was taken away in custody, and Piper beamed at Miss Withers.

"You know, I thought that guy was holding something back," he said shamelessly. "Nice work, Hildegarde."

"Umph!" sniffed Miss Withers. "Nice work if you can get it!"

In the Dead Girl's Flat

FROM the Thwaite Stables the inspector and his unofficial colleague travelled in the squad car to the tall apartment-house in East Eighty-Sixth Street; and there, after a brief conversation with the clerk in the glass-partitioned office on the ground floor, ascended to the fifth-floor flat in which Violet Feveler had given a party the night before.

"How long has Miss Feveler lived here?" Piper inquired as the clerk unlocked the front door with a duplicate key.

"About eight months," was the reply. "Anything else, inspector?"

"Yeah," drawled Piper. "In case she gets any 'phone calls while we're here, switch 'em through to me—and don't be listening on the wire."

"Of course not, sir," said the clerk.

From the carpeted corridor Piper and Miss Withers stepped directly into a large and well-furnished sitting-room which was in rather a state of disorder.

"Well, what's been going on here?" exclaimed the inspector, staring at littered music on the floor near a grand piano, scattered cushions, and pictures askew on the walls.

"Get out of here!" shrilled a voice.

Piper immediately pushed his companion down into an easy-chair, and standing in front of her, whipped out a gun.

"Come out of there!" he rasped.

"Get out of here!" shrilled the voice again. "Get out of here!"

Miss Withers suddenly began to laugh, and as she laughed she pointed towards the piano. Underneath it was a green parrot in a cage, and Piper put away the gun with a snort of disgust.

"A parrot!" he exploded. "How d'you like that?"

"You certainly had it scared," said she.

They wandered about the room, and Piper reached the mantelpiece, where he picked up a large framed photograph.

"Hi, look!" he called out. "Here's a picture of her with that guy Wells! September 26th, 1938.

They must have been pretty friendly, at that!"

Miss Withers looked, then pounced on another framed photograph—one of Violet Feveler with Eddie Fry.

"Here's another young man," she said. "I wonder who he is? Oh, listen!"

The sound of a key in the lock of the front door had reached her alert ears. Piper heard it, too, and together they dived across the room to a luxurious chesterfield and crouched down behind it.

Eddie and Barbara entered the room, and Eddie closed the door behind him.

"Just toss some things into a suitcase, Babs," he said. "We'll have to hurry if we want to get away."

"I'll hurry, dear," she promised, and ran across to a bed-room and disappeared into it.

Eddie went over to an ornamental desk near one of the windows, and Piper and Miss Withers watched him over the back of the chesterfield as he opened a drawer and took out what looked like a packet of letters.

"All right," said Piper, rising to his feet, "I'll take those!"

Eddie swung round and stared wide-eyed at the two who moved towards him.

"What is this?" he gasped.

"Come on, come on," said Piper, holding out his hand. "Come across with those letters."

"You know it isn't nice," rebuked Miss Withers, "reading other people's mail."

"Who are you?" faltered Eddie.

"Inspector Piper, Homicide Squad." Piper snatched away the letters, and Barbara emerged from the bed-room in a state of alarm.

"It's about Miss Feveler," said Miss Withers.

"Violet?" Barbara tottered forward. "Has something happened? She's dead, isn't she?"

"How did you know that?" demanded Piper harshly.

"Why, I—I can see it in your faces. Oh-h!" She burst into tears, and Miss Withers straightaway put an arm round her heaving shoulders.

"I'll take care of her," she said, and led the weeping girl back into the bed-room and closed the door.

"Young man," said Piper sternly, "what's your name?"

"Edward Fry," replied Eddie.

"Where were you two going in such a hurry just now?"

"We were going to get married."

"Oh!" Incredulously the inspector eyed the good-looking but rather agitated young fellow. "Is that why you said 'We'll have to work fast if we want to get away'?"

Eddie nodded.

"We didn't want Violet to know about it till afterwards," he explained.

In the bed-room Barbara had flung herself on a bed and was sobbing into a pillow, but she managed to answer the questions with which Miss Withers gently plied her.

"You were going to marry him," said the spinster, "and you've only known him a month?"

"Not quite a month."

"You're rather impetuous, aren't you?"

Barbara looked up and nodded.

"How long have you been living here with Violet?"

"About five months. I wasn't very welcome, and I'd have been terribly unhappy if it hadn't been for Eddie."

"Looks like you're in love with him," commented Miss Withers.

"Yes, I am."

Piper, standing on the hearthrug in the sitting-room, frowned at the photograph of Violet Feveler and Eddie that stood on the mantelpiece.

"So you didn't want her to find out about your marriage to her sister," he said. "Might have made trouble, eh?"

"She always made trouble for everybody," Eddie declared.

"Did you ever have any trouble with her?"

"Why, no."

"Why did she slap your face this morning?"

Eddie flinched, but made no reply.

"Thought I didn't know about that, eh? So you didn't go to Harlem with the rest of the party?"

"No, we took a walk."

"Oh, you took a walk?"

"Yes." Eddie sat down in a chair.

"Then we had breakfast."

"So you had breakfast?" Piper seemed quite annoyed to hear it.

"Well, it looks like everybody had breakfast this morning but me! Where'd you walk? In the park?"

"No," said Eddie, "we just walked and talked, and then we decided to elope."

Miss Withers had finished with that particular subject in the bed-room.

"Tell me, Barbara," she said in a friendly way, "is there anybody who had any reason for hating your sister?"

Barbara nodded, and then wished that she hadn't.

"Oh, it couldn't be!" she exclaimed.

"Who is it?" insisted Miss Withers.

"Don—but Don couldn't have done it! She divorced him, but he couldn't have—"

"Don who?"

"Don Gregg."

"Umph! Don Gregg, ex-husband!"

Miss Withers rose from the bed on which she had been sitting beside the girl. "You stay right here, Barbara."

She went out into the sitting-room, and Barbara immediately got up and went to a dressing-table, where she opened a drawer and took out a little diary bearing the dead girl's name in gilt letters upon its cover.

From another drawer she took out a box, and she put the diary in the box, then opened a hand-bag which was lying on the table and transferred from it to the box a little automatic of blue steel.

Miss Withers, meanwhile, had whispered to Piper, and Piper suddenly flamed at Eddie:

"Say, why didn't you tell me about Gregg?"

"Gregg?" Eddie looked round from a window to which he had discreetly retreated. Miss Withers sat down on the chesterfield.

"Yes, Don Gregg," snapped Piper. "Violet Feveler's ex-husband. What do you know about him?"

"Nothing—nothing much," said Eddie with marked reluctance. "She got rid of him about six months ago."

"Was he in love with her?"

"Naturally, Oscar," purred Miss Withers, "if he married her."

"Pah!" snorted Piper, and he repeated his question.

"I suppose so," said Eddie with a shrug. "She took everything he had, and jammed him up on his alimony."

"Oh, she did? Why didn't you tell us about this before?"

Eddie replied that he didn't think that it was important.

"Oh, you didn't think it was important."

Piper scratched his chin.

"An ex-husband," he mused, "alimony—trouble. Uhuh! He loved her—and she's dead! Hildegarde, this may be what the French call a crime of passion."

The bed-room door opened and Barbara reappeared. She had removed most of the traces of her tears, but she still looked badly upset.

"What do you know about Don Gregg?" Piper barked at her.

"Don?" she faltered. "Oh, I'm sure he's innocent."

"Oh, you're sure he's innocent, eh?"

"I know he is," stated Eddie definitely, and Piper swung round on him.

"How do you know?"

"Because," was the unexpected reply, "when he didn't pay his alimony, Violet had him thrown into gaol."

"What?" bellowed Piper.

"And he's still there."

"So the murderer was in gaol at the time of the murder," remarked Miss Withers. "Well, if this was a crime of passion, Oscar, it was pretty darned platonic!"

"All right, all right, all right," growled the discomfited sleuth. "Hold it!"

The bell of the front door rang, and Barbara would have answered its summons, but Piper stopped her and motioned to Miss Withers and to Eddie to go into the bed-room.

The bell rang again while they were obeying, and an excited voice rang out:

"Miss Feverel! Miss Feverel! Miss Feverel!"

Piper walked over to the door and crooked a finger at Barbara, and he was hidden by the door when she opened it. On the mat in the corridor outside stood a man who looked like a butler—a man with stooping shoulders, a thin, clean-shaven face, and a queer-shaped jaw. He was holding his hat in his hand.

"What is it?" asked Barbara.

"Please tell Miss Violet," said the man tremulously, "that her father-in-law wants to see her right away. Tell her to hurry, or it may be too late."

Piper swept out from behind the door.

"Why will it be too late?" he questioned sharply.

The man's jaw dropped and he blinked at the detective.

"Excuse me," he mumbled. "I—I didn't know—"

"What didn't you know?"

"That Miss Feverel had guests."

"Come in!" Piper snapped, and as the man stepped into the sitting-room he shut the door. "Who are you?"

"Abraham Thomas," was the nervous reply. "I'm working for Mr. Patrick Gregg—Miss Feverel's father-in-law. If you'll just tell Miss Feverel—"

"My sister is dead," blurted Barbara. "She was killed this morning."

"Killed?" echoed the butler, seemingly aghast. "Why—why it can't be!"

"She was murdered," said Piper.

"But nobody would want to murder her!" exclaimed Thomas. "It's old Mr. Gregg they're after!"

Miss Withers stepped briskly out from the bed-room.

"What makes you say that?" she asked.

The butler gaped at her.

"Well," he said in a quavering voice, "yesterday somebody poisoned old Rex, his dog, and Mr. Gregg is afraid he'll be next."

"Where does Mr. Gregg live?"

"Long Island, ma'am. I've got to be getting back there now."

"Just a minute," commanded Miss Withers. "We'll go with you."

She looked at Piper for confirmation, and he frowned.

"Might not be a bad idea," he conceded, "but I don't see what a dead dog on Long Island's got to do with a girl killed in Central Park."

"The dog belonged to her father-in-law," said Miss Withers tartly, "and he's afraid of his life. Now, you don't want another murder on your hands, do you?"

"Okay," surrendered Piper, "but I still think it's a snipe hunt."

"Excuse me," said Thomas diffidently, "but are you the police?"

"He's on to you, Oscar," laughed Miss Withers. "Better give yourself up!"

"All right, go ahead!" Piper picked up his hat and put it on his head, then turned to Barbara. "I'm not through with you two yet," he said menacingly. "Take my advice and don't try to leave town."

The House on Long Island

DOWN at the kerb in East Eighty-Sixth Street an old-fashioned limousine was standing close behind the squad car, a uniformed chauffeur at its wheel. The squad car was dismissed, and Piper and Miss Withers climbed into the limousine after the butler had seated himself beside the chauffeur.

A journey of some thirty-five miles followed, and then from a country road the limousine turned into a winding drive and came to a standstill in front of a house which Miss Withers decided was hideous.

It was large and gabled, but it was built in the worst possible style of the previous century, with wings that did not match, porches heavily porticoed, and a turret that made the whole place look lopsided.

The butler was the first to descend, and he preceded Piper and Miss Withers up the steps to the double front doors and rang the bell.

"Well, this is a nice cheery place," said the spinster. "It's just dying to be haunted."

"Yeah," drawled Piper, "and about all we'll find in there is moth-balls."

Having snapped one of the steel bracelets round Don's wrist, he gripped Miss Withers fiercely by the arm and snapped the other one round hers.

Thomas pressed the bell-button again, but without effect.

"Well, what's the matter?" complained Piper, trying to peer through the stained glass of a leaded panel. "Why don't somebody open up?"

He beat a tattoo with a knocker, but still there was no response from within. "Ever do any housebreaking?" he said to Miss Withers.

"I house-broke a Pekinese once," she replied.

Abruptly one of the doors was opened, and a queer-looking fellow stared out at them. He might have been almost any age between twenty and thirty, and his right shoulder was hunched and his head seemed permanently bent towards it.

"Joey," said the butler, "show the lady and gentleman into the back parlour."

They entered a gloomy hall, Joey limping ahead of them, and at the foot of some stairs Thomas said to Piper:

"I'll tell Mr. Gregg you're here, sir." He ascended the stairs, but the cripple moved past them and opened a door.

"You can wait in here," he said in a voice which sounded as though it had never finished breaking, and Miss Withers and the detective stepped into a room overcrowded with heavy furniture and full of gloom.

"This place would be great for an undertakers' convention," remarked Miss Withers with a sniff; and then the voice of Thomas rang out from above the stairs:

"Joey! Joey, come up here quick!" The cripple limped swiftly away, but Piper followed him, and Miss Withers followed Piper.

"What's the trouble up there?" shouted the inspector as he sped upwards; but he received no reply, and he reached a wide hallway on the first floor to find the butler rattling the handle of an oaken door and shouting:

"Mr. Gregg!"

"What's wrong?" demanded Piper.

"He doesn't answer—and the door's locked from the inside."

"We'll soon fix that," said Piper. "Get out of the way."

The butler and the cripple moved aside and the detective put his shoulder to the door in such a fashion that the lock gave way.

He burst into a bed-room as gloomy as the room below, and quite as heavily furnished, and he reached a massive wooden bed which might at one time have had posts and a canopy—and leaned down over an old man who lay upon it, his scanty white hair upon a pillow, his hands spread out on the coverlet.

"He's breathing!" exclaimed Piper. "Open a window! Get the doctor!"

The cripple went to a window and opened it; the butler ran out from the room. Miss Withers stood beside the detective, studying the thin and lined face of the old man. Joey limped out past them, and then Piper said:

"Well, I don't think there's anything we can do till the doctor comes. Looks like a stroke to me."

"Yes," returned Miss Withers, but without conviction. "Look, he has a big bump behind the left ear." How do you suppose that happened?"

"Oh, probably fell and hit his head when he had the attack."

"And then climbed back into bed?"

"Yeah," said Piper, and scratched his chin while she straightened the bedclothes.

Thomas reappeared while she was tucking in a sheet.

September 26th, 1936.

"Dr. Peters is on his way over," he said. "He lives just down the road. Poor Mr. Gregg— Oh, I'll do that, ma'am."

He finished tucking in the sheet and he straightened the tumbled coverlet.

"He has a bad heart," he said. "The doctor told him that any excitement was likely to prove fatal. He had a slight attack not long ago."

"What caused the excitement that time?" inquired Piper.

"Horse racing, sir. Mr. Gregg has been a horseman all his life."

Somewhere in the house a bell rang.

"Oh, if you'll excuse me, that must be the doctor," said the butler, and hurried off again.

Miss Withers promptly went to some clothes which were lying on a sofa across the room and proceeded to go through the pockets of a pair of grey trousers.

"Are you sure you've never been married?" chaffed Piper, watching her with amusement.

"If you're trying to be funny," she retorted severely, "there's a time and place for everything." She held out a slip of paper she had discovered.

"Here, look at this!"

He took the slip. On it was written:

"Received from Pat Gregg nine hundred dollars for back alimony due."

"VIOLET FEVEREL."

"I knew Don Gregg was the one—" he began.

"S-s-s-sh!" hissed Miss Withers, and the slip of paper was out of sight when Thomas ushered into the room a short and rather tubby man with a pronounced nose and a clipped moustache.

"Dr. Peters," the butler said introductively; but the doctor, with the barest of nods, leant over his patient, turned back the lid of one of the closed eyes, and held a skinny wrist.

"Hot water and some towels, please," he said.

"What is it, doc?" asked Piper, after Thomas had gone. "A stroke?"

"Umm," grunted the doctor. "I warned him."

"About what?" ventured Miss Withers.

"He has a very bad heart." With none too friendly grey eyes Dr. Peters surveyed his questioners. "Thomas told me that you are the police," he said, "and that Miss Feverel is dead."

"Murdered," corrected Piper.

"I'm not surprised. She was an evil woman."

"She certainly wasn't the most popular girl in her class," remarked Miss Withers.

Thomas reappeared with a jug of hot water and some towels, and the doctor frowned at her.

"Oh, don't mind me," she said casually. "I'll just look around."

She went out and shut the bed-room door behind her, and she glanced about the wide hallway out of which several doors opened, but it was a second flight of stairs that interested her and she flitted noiselessly up them.

On the floor above she entered a room directly over the bed-room and saw that it was fitted up as a sort of study. There was a big flat-topped desk in the middle of it, facing a window, and on the desk stood a mounted telescope of considerable size.

"Heavens, the man's an astronomer!" she exclaimed, and sat down in a chair behind the desk and applied an eye to the telescope.

There were many trees in the extensive grounds at the back of the house, but no trees were visible through the telescope. Instead, she found that she had a perfectly good view of the Belmont Park race track, and of two stable-boys riding horses upon it.

"My error," she murmured, "not stars—horses!"

With her gloved hands she went through the drawers of the desk, looked at all the papers on top of the desk, and under the blotting-pad found a scrap on which had been written:

"Bet $100 on Wallaby at 15 to 1."

She folded the piece of paper, slipped it into her glove, and went out from the room; and she reached the floor below just as Dr. Peters and Piper emerged from the bed-room.

"The doc say he'll pull through all right," said Piper.

"He'll recover all right," confirmed the doctor; "but I can't understand it. Somehow the hand of death must have slipped."

"Doctor," said Miss Withers, "could Patrick Gregg have gone into town, killed his daughter-in-law, and then come back here?"

"Impossible!" returned the doctor with ill-concealed scorn. "His heart couldn't have stood the excitement. Excuse me."

He made his way to the stairs and descended them, preceded by the butler.

"What a question!" jeered Piper. "Could Patrick Gregg have killed his daughter-in-law! Why, this alimony receipt proves that Don Gregg was out of gaol."

"I don't care what you say," she retorted with a sniff, "there's something phoney going on here."

The Forged Order

DETECTIVE-INSPECTOR PIPER went down the stairs, but the indignant spinster re-entered the bed-room and stood beside the bed looking down at the old man in it.

"Faker!" she said suddenly and loudly, and Patrick Gregg opened his eyes.

"What's that?" he asked in a feeble voice, staring up at her.

"I said 'faker,'" she replied, and calmly perched herself on the edge of the bed. "When you pretend to be asleep why don't you breathe naturally? When did you come to?"

"While the doctor was here," he said slowly. "He told me you were police, and about Violet."

"Must have been quite a shock," she suggested.

"Pleasant shock," he returned. "She was no good. Horse kick her?"

Miss Withers shook her head and informed him that the girl was murdered.

"Murdered?" said he in surprise. "When did it happen?"

"Early this morning. Why?"

"I was just wondering."

Miss Withers rose.

"Were you alone when you had this attack?" she asked.

"What's that? Oh, I suppose so. I can't remember. But I had a funny dream." He raised a hand and waved the forefinger back and forth. "I dreamed I was a pendulum in a clock."

He licked his lips and closed his eyes again, and she put the hand back under the bedclothes.

"Well, pleasant dreams," she said.

She descended to the hall, and there she heard the voice of Piper in the back parlour and made for the open doorway.

The inspector was squatting on an ottoman, his hands in his pockets, and he was speaking to Thomas:

"Come on now, just between you and me, the late Mrs. Don Gregg—otherwise Violet Feverel—wasn't very popular around here, was she?"

"No, sir," agreed the butler, "she was not. If I may say so, she was a trouble-maker, and Mr. Pat Gregg disapproved of her violently. So did Mr. Don, after a while."

"He did, eh?" Piper bounded to his feet and stood over the butler. "Why did you lie to me?"

"Sir?"

"Why did you tell me that Don Gregg was still in gaol when you knew he was released two weeks ago?"

"Well, but he wasn't released, sir." Piper produced the receipt Miss Withers had found.

"Here's the alimony receipt," he said fiercely. "It's paid!"

"Yes," said the butler, "but, you see, sir, Mr. Gregg paid only the alimony due at the time Master Don was arrested, not the amount that had accrued while he was locked up."

"Are you trying to tell me," howled Piper, "that Don Gregg was kept in gaol after this nine hundred dollars was paid?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I'm a speckled ape." "This is no time for a confession, Oscar," rebuked Miss Withers from the doorway.

"I don't believe it!" snorted the detective. "Don Gregg is the guy. The dame was a rat, and he knocked her off. I'm going to check on your story, mister. Where's the 'phone?"

"Just outside in the hall, sir."

Piper went out to a telephone on a table in the hall, and Miss Withers stopped the butler as he was about to pass her.

"Oh, tell me, Thomas," she said, "what kind of a pipe do you smoke?"

"A corncob, ma'am," the butler replied, without evincing any surprise at the question. "I paid twenty cents for it, and I've smoked it for twenty years."

"Really?" she murmured, and walked along to the inspector, who had rung up the gaol in Thirty-Seventh Street to which divorced husbands are committed when they fail to keep up their payments of alimony to their former wives.

"Listen," he was shouting. "Have you got a guy down there named Don Gregg? You what? Oh, you did, eh? Who's this talking? Oh, Warden Mahoney! Oh, Warden Sylvester Mahoney. Well, listen, Mr. Warden Sylvester Mahoney, I want you at my office in half an hour, and bring all the records of the case with you. Yeah!"

He slammed down the instrument, and turned to grin triumphantly at Miss Withers.

"Don Gregg was sprung out of the alimony gaol last night a few hours before the murder," he stated.

"Who let him out?" she asked.

"I don't know, but I'm going to find out."

He retrieved his hat from the back parlour.

"In gaol, huh?" he said. "Looks like I hit a bullseye!"

He strode towards the double front door, and Miss Withers kept pace with him.

"It hurts me, Oscar," she confessed as he pulled back the latch, "but I think you've got something."

"Stick around," he boasted, "and you'll see an arrest in twenty-four hours."

One of the doors was opened, and Thomas hurried forward to see the unwelcome visitors off the premises.

A full hour elapsed before Piper reached his own room at police headquarters in Centre Street, and Warden Sylvester Mahoney had been waiting in it for some time. He was a big man and a bulky one, with a florid face and a neck that bulged over his collar —a man of importance, in his own estimation.

Piper took the folder he presented, lit a cigar, and studied a document.

"So this is the court order that sprung Master Don Gregg, eh?" he suddenly burst out, and stabbed the document with a finger. "I suppose you've noticed, Mr. Sylvester Mahoney, that the seal is phoney and that the order is a forgery?"

The warden gulped and gripped at the hat on his knees. His flabby face seemed to sag.

"Dear me, dear me," he murmured; "but, inspector, how was I to know?"

"How were you to know?" roared Piper. "How were you to know anything? D'you know what city this is? D'you know what the date is?"

"I—I think," stammered the warden, "it's the seventh."

"You think it's the seventh, eh? Well, it ain't!" Piper consulted a calendar-pad. "It's the ninth!"

"My mistake."

Piper walked round the desk and flung himself into his chair behind it.

"Here was a guy who might have been a murderer," he raged, "and you sprung him out of gaol!"

"He couldn't have murdered anybody while he was in gaol, could he?" said the warden hopefully.

"No," returned Piper, "and if you'd kept him in gaol, I wouldn't be hunting for him now."

"Well, it—it's all very confusing. But, you see, inspector, one of the boys had a birthday, and a friend of his sent him some—well, some bottles for a little celebration."

That practically was a confession that the warden had imbibed the night before, and that as a consequence he had not been any too careful.

"Birthday!" repeated Piper. "Whose birthday?"

It appeared that Don Gregg had had

She was far too scared to answer, and she shrank back against the wall as he leaned menacingly over the side of the dressing-table.

the birthday, and this was added fuel to the inspector's wrath.

"Get out!" he bellowed. "Get out, Mr. Sylvester Mahoney, because I'm looking for myself for murder!"

The warden was only too glad to escape, and he almost ran from the building. Piper shouted at the top of his voice for a detective-sergeant named Kane, and after an interval a short and very tubby person put his head in at the door—a head from which a well-worn slouch hat had not been removed.

"Did you call, inspector?" inquired the owner of the face and the hat.

"Did I call?" snapped Piper. "What did you think I was doing—singing? Send out a general alarm for Donald Gregg."

"Yes, sir," responded Kane. "What do we want him for?"

"For the murder of Violet Feverel," was the reply.

A Shock for Miss Withers

BARBARA—whose surname was Foley, just as her sister's had been before she had adopted the name of Feverel for stage purposes—was alone in the flat on the fifth floor of the apartment-house in East Eighty-Sixth Street when she heard a sound as of someone trying to open the front door. Instantly she rushed into the bed-room and returned from it with the automatic in her hand.

A key grated in the lock, the door swung wide, and Don Gregg entered the sitting-room, but stopped short and held up his hands at sight of the girl and the gun.

"Don't shoot!" he pleaded hoarsely. "I'm Don Gregg. Who are you?"

"Oh!" The gun drooped in Barbara's hand. "I'm Barbara," she said in rather a shaky voice. "Violet's sister. I—I thought you were in gaol."

"I was," said Don, closing the door. "I got out last night."

"Last night?" she gasped. "Oh!"

"What's the matter?" He followed her as she sped to the little desk on which a telephone reposed. "What are you going to do?"

She pointed the gun at him again. "Stay where you are!" she shrielled. "I'm going to call the police!"

Outside the canopied entrance of the building Miss Withers descended from a taxicab and handed the driver the exact fare registered on the clock, much to his disgust. She was crossing the pavement when a newsboy thrust a special edition of the "Chronicle" upon her, and she paid for that, too, because she had caught sight of enormous headlines:

"INSPECTOR PIPER PREDICTS ARREST IN TWENTY-FOUR HOURS OF FEVEREL MURDER SUSPECT."

She looked at a picture of Don on the front page beneath the headlines, and she made a grimace at a picture of Detective-Inspector Oscar Piper which was close beside it, then folded the paper and marched firmly into the building and entered a lift.

Up on the fifth floor Don Gregg had persuaded Barbara not to telephone the police, and had listened in apparent astonishment to her statement that his former wife had been murdered early that morning.

"I came here to see Violet," he told her. "I didn't know she was dead."

The doorbell rang, and they looked at one another in dismay.

"Don't answer it," whispered Don. "Maybe they'll go away."

But it was Miss Withers at the door, and she had no intention of going away.

September 28th, 1936.

She continued to press the bell-button till at last Barbara bundled Don Gregg into the bed-room and opened the door.

"Hallo!" said Miss Withers, brushing past her and stopping beside a little table near the chesterfield. "I hope I'm not disturbing you. I just dropped in to ask a few more questions about your sister."

"But I've told you everything I know," protested Barbara, trying not to appear flustered. "Really, I have."

There was a briar pipe on the table, and Miss Withers had not failed to notice it.

"Do you smoke?" she asked abruptly. "Yes, a little bit."

Miss Withers picked up the pipe and found that it was warm.

"But not a pipe, I hope?" "Oh, that—er—that belongs to—"

"To the man hiding in the other room," Miss Withers completed for her, and raised her voice. "Come out, young man."

Don Gregg came out from the bed-room. The collar of his overcoat was still turned up about his neck, but his hat was on the back of his head, and his gray eyes were defiant.

"This is Miss Withers from the police," said Barbara.

"And you're Don Gregg," said Miss Withers, walking over to him with the newspaper in her hand. "Don't you think it's kind of silly for you to come here?"

"I came to see Violet," he stated, removing his hat. "I didn't know she was dead."

"Don't lie to me!" "I'm not lying to you!" he retorted.

"What did you do after you got out of gaol last night?"

He went over to the table on which he had replaced the pipe, and he thrust the pipe in his overcoat pocket.

"Why," he said slowly, "I went to a Turkish bath."

"Then what did you do?" "Well, I slept there, and this morning I came here."

She looked at him steadily for several seconds.

"All right," she said then, "if that's the truth come down to headquarters and tell your story to the police."

"And get thrown back in gaol?" he scoffed. "I should say not!"

Barbara ran to him, caught hold of his arm.

"I think you'd better go, Don," she said.

"If you're innocent," said Miss Withers, "you have nothing to worry about. And, besides, I have a great deal of influence with Inspector Piper."

"All right," growled Don, and he restored his hat to his head and went out from the flat with her.

There was a uniformed attendant at the entrance to the building and Miss Withers asked him to get a taxi. Detective-Sergeant Kane was lurking on the pavement with a colleague considerably taller than himself, but he did not know Miss Withers, and Miss Withers did not know him.

"Are you sure it's going to be all right?" asked Don nervously while the attendant was trying to find a taxicab.

"Now don't you worry," Miss Withers returned reassuringly. "Leave everything to me."

They moved towards the kerb, but Kane suddenly swooped.

"Well, where d'you think you're goin'?" he demanded harshly.

"And what do you think you're doing?" Miss Withers retorted.

"I'm arresting both of you in the name of the law!"

"B-but you can't!" she cried indignantly as he flashed his badge. "I'm a friend of the inspector's. I'll show you."

She opened her handbag and fumbled in it, intensely annoyed because a crowd was gathering round them. But Kane peered into the bag.

"Here, watcha got?" he cried, and plunged his own podgy hand into the bag and brought forth a small but very serviceable six-shooter. "A rod, eh? Well, you never can tell."

"I was looking for my courtesy badge," she said as laughter rang out behind her.

"What badge?" "The one the inspector gave me."

"Lemme see it."

"Just a minute," Miss Withers searched, but searched in vain. "I must have left it at home," she said blankly.

"Oh, sure!" jibed the detective. "On the bureau." Right beside the permit for this!

He pocketed the gun and produced a pair of handcuffs, and having snapped one of the steel bracelets round Don's wrist he gripped her fiercely by the arm and snapped the other one round hers.

"Call the wagon, Jim," he directed gruffly.

A patrol wagon arrived while the crowd grew in numbers, and the manacled pair were ordered to get into it.

"But you can't do this to me!" stormed the spinster.

"Oh, I can't, eh?" Kane bundled her up into the wagon while his colleague dealt with Don. "Well, it's done, ain't it?"

To the accompaniment of more laughter from the onlookers he followed his prisoners into the vehicle, and the doors were closed and fastened.

Some half-hour later the self-important little detective swaggered into Piper's office at headquarters with an expansive smile on his fat face, and Piper looked up at him from his desk.

"Well, what's on your mind?" snapped the inspector.

"It's Gregg," replied Kane boastfully. "I nabbed him right outside the apartment-house—him and a dame."

"Nice work," approved Piper. "Bring 'em in."

Kane went to the door, which he had left open, and shouted into the ante-room.

"Come on, you!"

Handcuffed together, Don Gregg and Miss Withers walked past him into the office, and the expression on Piper's face as he viewed the female prisoner was a study in mixed emotions.

"Hildegard!" he exclaimed.

Miss Withers held up her right hand, and with it Don's left hand, and the inspector laughed again at sight of the handcuffs.

"Kane," he gurgled, "you ought to be promoted for this!"

"You're as funny as a cry for help!" cried Miss Withers with a snuff.

"All right, Kane," chuckled Piper, "take the cuffs off."

"I was afraid," said the spinster as the discomfited little detective obeyed, "that we were going to have to get married. Oscar, I told Mr. Gregg that you'd just ask him a few questions and let him go."

All trace of amusement faded from Piper's lean features.

"Oh," he said with sarcasm, "so I'm just going to ask him a couple of questions and let him go?"

"Uhuh," she nodded. "I think you will, when you hear the answers."

"So he's got an alibi, eh?"

"The only evidence you have," she retorted, "is a BB shot in a horse. You can't hold him on that."

"I can't, eh? I'm going to ask him some questions that'll knock his hat off!"

Miss Withers smiled at Don.

"Better hold on to your hat, Mr. Gregg," she said.

"Sit down, Gregg," commanded Piper.

"Sit down, Hildegarde."

Don seated himself in a chair, but Miss Withers sailed towards the door.

"No, thank you," she said on her way out. "I'm afraid you might start questioning me."

"Deduction!"

KANE was dismissed, and Piper deserted his chair to sit on the end of the desk within a few inches of the young man he believed to be a murderer.

"Gregg," he said bullyingly, "we know you were released last night on a forged order. How did you do it?"

"On a forged order?" asked Don.

"Aw, come on, Gregg! We know the whole thing. We know that you were sprung from gaol on a phoney writ and killed the woman who had you locked up. Now you might as well come clean."

Don drew a long breath.

"Well, I got out of gaol, yes," he admitted, "but I—well, I spent the night in a Turkish bath."

"Yeah?" Piper glared at him incredulously. "What was the name of the baths?"

"The Central Baths."

A bell-button on the desk was jabbed, and Kane re-entered.

"Oh, Kane," said Piper, "find out who the attendant was at the Central Baths last night. Get him over here right away."

"Yes, sir," said Kane.

"And don't bring back Hildegarde Withers!"

"Oh, no, sir!"

During the period of waiting that followed, Don felt in one pocket after another, and Piper watched him.

"What's the matter?" he rapped. "Lose something?"

"Yes," said Don, "my pipe. It's gone. Somebody's picked my pockets!"

"Now who could have picked your pockets at Police Headquarters?" jeered the inspector.

Miss Withers, of course, was the guilty person. She went from Centre Street into Broadway, and there invaded a high-class tobacconist's establishment.

"Can you tell by examining a pipe what kind of a man might have smoked it?" she asked anxiously of an elderly and bald-headed man who leaned over a glass-topped counter as she approached it.

"It's quite possible, madam," was the reply. "Pipes are always like the men who smoke them."

Miss Withers differed from other women; inside her astrakhan-trimmed jacket there was a pocket almost as capacious as a poacher's. From this pocket she produced two briar pipes—the one she had found in Central Park and the one she had managed to filch from Don's overcoat. She laid them on the counter, and she said:

"Well, I'd like to find out all about the man who smoked these. It's very important."

The tobacconist picked up Don's pipe and examined it with care, particularly the mouthpiece.

"This is a very ordinary pipe," he said, putting it down again, and he picked up the other. "Ah, but this—this is interesting! It tells me quite a lot about the man who smoked it."

A pair of spectacles were readjusted upon an aquiline nose, and the mouth-piece of the pipe was turned this way and that.

"Such a man," declared the tobacconist, "would be of middle-age, probably a professor, or a chemist—and he has false teeth."

Miss Withers repossessed herself of the pipes, thanked her informant, and departed.

Meanwhile, Detective-Sergeant Kane had returned to headquarters with an enormous fellow from the Central Baths who had been whisked away from his duties in trousers and vest. He was a trifle over six feet in height and he weighed at least eighteen stone.

Piper viewed this mountainous person in some astonishment.

"So you're the rubber over at the Central Baths, eh?" he queried.

"Yes, sir, I am," replied the giant complacently. "And a pretty good one, too."

"All right," Piper gestured to Don, who rose to his feet. "Take a look at this man. Was he over at your baths last night?"

The attendant regarded Don from head to foot with a pair of critical brown eyes, but shook his head.

"I wouldn't know, sir," he said. "I couldn't tell."

"What d'you mean you couldn't tell?" rapped Piper.

"Well, a suit of clothes is just a suit of clothes to me, sir. I don't see 'em in any clothes."

"Oh," said Piper, "I get you. Strip yourself to the waist, Gregg!"

Don obeyed quite readily, and a smile of recognition spread over the giant's face.

"I can tell you now, sir," he boomed. "He was at the baths last night. In fact, I rubbed him myself."

"You rubbed him yourself?" Piper was obviously disappointed. "You sure?"

The attendant was positive.

"All right," growled Piper, "you can go."

Off went the witness, and Kane went, too. Piper relit a cigar that had expired in his mouth and turned none too happily to Don.

"So far your story's okay," he said. "I'm not going to hold you, but don't try to leave town."

Don, having resumed his garments, decided to go to his father's house on Long Island where he had lived before his unhappy marriage and after his divorce. But as soon as Patrick Gregg heard of his arrival from the butler he sent for him, and a none-too-pleasant scene occurred in the depressing bedroom.

The sick man, considerably better by this time, accused him of having murdered Violet Feverel.

"Why do you say that?" Don demanded heatedly. "I tell you I'm in the clear. I've got an alibi!"

"You're involved in a murder," shouted his father, sitting up in bed and pointing an accusing finger at him, "and I hope the truth comes out, even if you are my son!"

"That's a fine attitude for you—"

The butler burst into the room with upraised hands.

"Master Don," he expostulated, "you mustn't excite your father. The doctor said he'd have another attack if he wasn't kept quiet."

"Get out and stay out!" Patrick Gregg roared at his son. "I want no part of you!"

Don smothered his rage and went out to the stairs, and Thomas followed him. They descended together to the hall, and on the way Thomas said, regretfully:

"I'm sorry, Master Don."

"You'd have thought I could go to my own father," complained Don. "Oh, well, he never had much love for me, anyway—and I'm not so sure that I've much love for him, either."

The bell of the telephone began to ring as they reached the foot of the stairs.

"I'll get that," Don said, and he went to the table in the hall and picked up the instrument. "Hallo! Yes, this is Don Gregg speaking."

Eddie Fry was on the other end of the line, speaking from the flat in East Eighty-Sixth Street.

"I'm a friend of Miss Foley's," he stated. "She wants to see you as soon as possible. It's very important."

Don looked at his watch and found that it was just after eleven o'clock.

"Tell her I'll be there around noon," he said.

Thomas was standing by the newel-post as he put down the telephone.

"Get my car," he directed, and after the butler had disappeared he went slowly up the stairs.

Miss Withers, having had a very early breakfast that morning, had an unusually early lunch before she returned to Headquarters in quest of Oscar Piper. The inspector was munching sandwiches when she invaded his room and seated herself in a fairly comfortable chair near the desk.

"Oscar," she said impressively, "Don Gregg didn't do it."

The inspector, in his shirt sleeves and with his waistcoat unfastened, swallowed the last morsel of the last sandwich but one and scowled at her.

"Don't be a sap," he snorted. "Of course he did it!"

"How are you going to prove it?" she challenged.

"Well—"

"Exactly!" she cut in. "Oscar, the man who killed Violet Feyeel was middle-aged. He was a thoughtful man—possibly a chemist, or a professor—and he has false teeth."

Piper bounded to his feet. "What's his name?" he asked excitedly.

"I haven't the least idea."

"Then where'd you get all the dope?"

"Deduction, Oscar."

"Aw!" He forgot all about the remaining sandwich in his disgust, and he lit a cigar.

"How can you find out if a man has false teeth?" inquired the cause of his distraction.

"That's easy," he growled. "Get him mad enough to bite you!"

Dr. Charles Bloom, the medical examiner, looked into the room with a sheet of paper in his hand.

"Oh, come on in, doc," said Piper.

"What you got—the autopsy report?"

"Yes." Bloom advanced to the desk and handed him the sheet of paper. "But there's nothing new. The girl had been killed by a blow on the head, that's certain."

"Okay." Piper did not even trouble to look at the report. "Oh, by the way, Miss Withers wants to know how she can find out if somebody has false teeth."

"H'm." The medical examiner pursed his thin lips. "That's quite a problem. Well, you can offer him an apple. If he bites, the teeth are his own. If not—not."

He went out, closing the door behind him, and Piper grinned at Miss Withers. "Now all we need's an apple," he said dryly.

More Revelations

It was only a few minutes later that Schultz, the handwriting expert at headquarters, entered the room. He was a little man with a veritable mane of white hair, and he had a whole sheaf of papers in his hand.

These he proceeded to spread out on the inspector's desk, and they proved to be enlargements of different letters and words from the receipt for the alimony and the court order which had secured Don's release from gaol. He was demonstrating the difference between some of the specimens, and the similarity between others, when Piper impatiently interrupted him.

"Look," he said, "all I want to find out is, did Gregg forge that court order?"

"A forged court order?" exclaimed Miss Withers in astonishment.

"Yeah. Your friend Gregg got out of gaol on a forged order. I forgot to tell you about it, you were so sure he was okay."

"Huh!" she sniffed. "I still am!"

"Oh, you are? Well, come on, Schultz, did Gregg forge that order?"

"No," said the little handwriting expert quite definitely, "he didn't."

Piper's disappointment was manifest. Miss Withers, smiling triumphantly, took the scrap of paper she had found under the blotting-pad in Patrick Gregg's study and opened it out.

"Mr. Schultz," she said, "do you think this might be the handwriting we're looking for?"

Schultz studied the writing, and Piper leaned over the desk.

"What's that?" he demanded.

"That's a specimen of Patrick Gregg's handwriting," Miss Withers informed him tartly. "I forgot to tell you about it, you were so sure he was okay."

"Pat Gregg?" Piper could hardly believe his ears. "Well, how d'you like that? Here—here's an old man who had a stroke—"

"How about it, Mr. Schultz?" Miss Withers interposed.

"Well, I can't be sure from a casual examination," was the guarded answer. "I'll have to chart the handwriting."

"Go ahead and chart it," rapped Piper.

Schultz gathered up all the papers and retreated.

"Pat Gregg!" exploded Piper. "Next thing you'll be telling me—"

A telephone bell interrupted him, and he snatched up the instrument. Highpockets was on the other end of the line, speaking from a call-box, but he was too excited to be articulate, and Piper, gathering that the stable-boy wanted to speak to Miss Withers, handed the instrument to her.

"Who is it?" she asked.

"I don't know," said the inspector, "but he's hissing like a snake!"

At the sound of her voice the negro became a little calmer, and a lot more coherent. Her brows went up as she listened.

"Yes, yes," she said, "you stay there, Highpockets. I'll be right over."

She handed the telephone back to Piper and rose and picked up her handbag.

"Come on," she said urgently, "we've got something!"

"What?" asked Piper.

"I'll tell you on the way over."

In a squad car they travelled uptown to East Fifty-Seventh Street, and Kane accompanied them. Highpockets ran out from the Thwaite Stables as the car drew up near the wide-open doors, and, waving his arms about as though he himself were fighting, he bellowed at Miss Withers as she descended:

"Dey bin scrappin' with each other! I mos' seared to death. Better go in dere and do somethin'. Dey bin fightin'—"

Piper and Kane dived into the brick-paved yard, but Miss Withers remained with the shouting and gesticulating negro.

"Now listen, Highpockets," she said, when he had calmed down a little. "I've got a ten-dollar bill in this bag. You just quiet yourself and begin at the beginning."

Highpockets' eyes ceased to roll, and avarice shone in them.

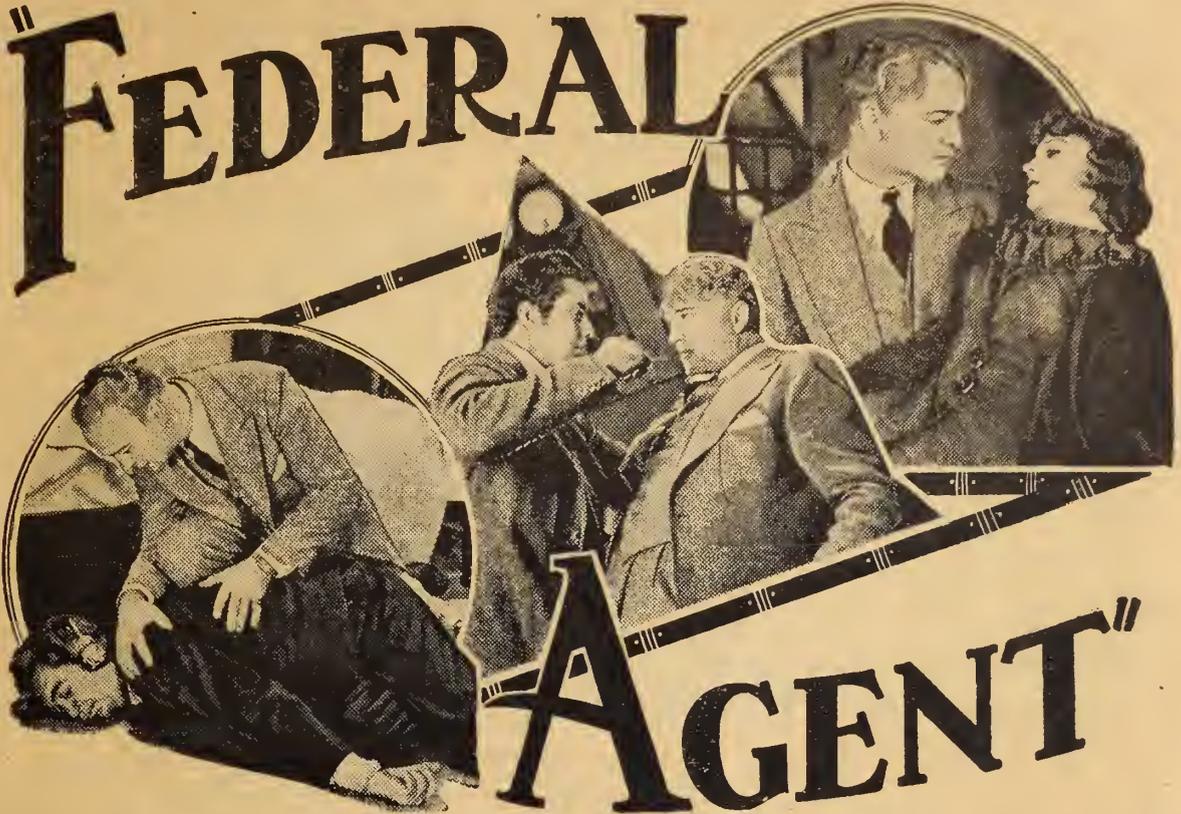

"Yes, ma'am," he said in his natural voice. "I'm awful calm, now. I'll tell you."

In the yard, outside the stall of the stallion, an altercation between Latigo Wells, recently released from custody, and Don Gregg ceased abruptly as the two detectives arrived. Eddie Fry was there, and Barbara was with him.

"What's going on here?" blazed Piper, and Don immediately pointed an accusing finger at Wells.

More Than the Call of Duty

READEAD this!" The commissioner in charge of the secret investigation department held out a sheet of official paper to his assistant.

"Good heavens!" gasped the other. "Lynch murdered! How did this happen, chief?"

"He hadn't a chance." The commissioner held up another sheet of paper. "I have here a full report, which came in a few moments after that note. They found a car had crashed on a winding mountain road, and they found Lynch's body in the wreckage, and he had been shot in the back. Lynch was working on the Sanderson case."

"Sanderson—that's the man who has a formula for some new explosive, isn't it?"

"Yes, and evidently a pretty good one, because I've a hunch that a certain gang are after it. We've been trying to locate Sanderson because our people might like to buy the formula. I reckon Lynch was on to something when he was bumped off."

"What's the next move?"

"Only one man can handle this case—Bob Woods."

"But he's due for a vacation, chief," cried the assistant. "First he has taken in six years."

"Jack Lynch was his buddy."

The assistant turned as he heard the sound of hearty laughter.

"I'll bet that's Bob. Like to see him?"

The chief nodded.

Bob Woods was a thick-set, muscular man. A frank, open face and a ready smile. He removed a straw hat as he came into the commissioner's room.

"Can't think why I bought this darned thing," he remarked in the easy manner that made him so popular. "Had to celebrate my holiday some way, I suppose." He stared at the two officials.

"Say, don't you two look bright and cheerful. I believe it's because I'm going away on a holiday."

"I wanted to see you, Bob, because there is something here that you're the only man could handle properly."

"I knew it—I knew it!" Bob gave a gesture of despair. "I knew something would stop me going on that fishing holiday with Jack Lynch. Tell me the worst, chief."

The commissioner's only answer was to hand across the desk the note that he had already shown to his assistant.

There was no expression on Bob Woods' face as he read the short message, but he sank into a chair as if he were tired, and sat there staring dully into space. The other two men glanced at each other, but wisely made no remark. After a while Bob roused himself, glanced again at the note, and then handed it back to the commissioner.

"So they got Jack?" Bob spoke slowly, and his eyes were hard. "I can start on this case, chief, at once. Have you any dope?"

Solemnly Bob listened whilst the commissioner told of an international spy ring, whose American operatives were attempting to buy from its inventor, Sanderson, the formula for a deadly explosive. That the authorities had not thought a great deal of Sanderson's discoveries until finding out the interest taken by outside agents. Sanderson's whereabouts were, at the moment, unknown. Sanderson was rather a crank, and though well known to scientists for his discoveries, had always remained very much in the background. Lynch had been instructed to look into the case, and had evidently made discoveries that had caused this spy ring to murder him in cold blood.

"You have worked with Lynch on many cases and know his methods," stated the chief. "We can show you where the accident took place, but we can't tell you very much else. Wilson had been giving some sort of assistance to Lynch—and Wilson, you can get in touch with at this tobacco store. Wilson should know all that there is about this case, and it's up to you, Woods, to pick up the threads."

That morning Bob Woods left New York for California.

The door of the laboratory opened and a dark, foreign-looking man entered. The ferrety, shifty-eyed individual standing by some bubbling retorts looked at him narrowly.

"What luck?" he questioned.

"Nothing on the body," was the reply. He held up a pipe. "But I have found something here." He pulled the pipe apart, and from the pipe-stem drew out a piece of paper. "A sort of wedge to keep the holder fixed into the pipe. You will notice that it is not stained with nicotine, and cannot have been here when the pipe was smoked. It is quite blank."

"Try the acid test."

That test brought no result.

"How about the light?" came the next suggestion.

The foreigner scowled when that had no result. He peered into the pipe and fished out a knife. He scraped out the bowl on to a piece of paper, and asked for some luke-warm water. The contents of the bowl he tipped into the glass, and noted the deposit was melting. He dipped the paper in the liquid and placed in on a blotting-pad. Nothing happened, so he held the paper near to a small flame. He smiled and beckoned the other man. Wording had appeared.

"Have located Sanderson. Explosive seems very powerful and deadly. Recard, head of spy ring, trying to obtain formula.—LYNCH."

Jule Recard smiled.

"It was as well that Lynch was removed. Now you see what a menace he would have been to our plans."

The Gramophone Records

ON arrival at San Francisco, Bob Woods went straight to the tobacconist and bought some cigarettes, for which he offered a two-dollar bill.

"Don't see many of these."

The man looked closely at Bob.

"You'll find it's genuine."

The owner of the shop was satisfied from this special answer—a password—that Bob Woods was a Federal Agent.

"What can I do for you?"

"Where can I find Wilson?"

"Through the telephone booth," was the answer. "Rap three times on the wall."

The back of the telephone booth swung back, and Woods walked into a room. He nodded to the little man with the comical smile, and glanced thoughtfully at a man who was seated before a large radio set.

"This is Andrews," said the little man, who was Wilson. "I thought we might pick up something on the air."

Bob tossed his hat on to a table, and sat down in a rickety chair.

"What can you tell me about the case?"

"Very little," Wilson hesitated. "We're terribly sorry about Lynch. He was a grand fellow, and we're sure he was on to something, or else this wouldn't have happened. He set off on the morning he was killed, and he was very excited. Reckoned he would be able to clear up the Sanderson case in a few hours and then meet you for a vacation."

"Jack always liked to play a lone hand." Bob Woods shook his head sadly. "I gather, Wilson, that you can tell me nothing more than I know already—that Lynch, hot on the scent, was trailed—was bumped off by persons unknown."

Wilson gave a faint nod.

"Anything from the air?"

"Nothing, though this message has come through three times." Andrews handed over a sheet of paper. "Looks like a code message. May be of no importance."

On the paper was written:

"V S 8 K G."

Bob frowned over it, and finally placed it in his pocket.

"Where was Lynch staying?"

"Some quiet apartments in Cedarville," answered Wilson. "Got a flatletto on the fifth floor. I've been through all his papers, but I didn't find a thing."

"We'll go take a look. You stay here, Andrews, and see if you can pick up anything else—we'll be back in an hour."

It was dusk when they reached Cedarville and the quiet block of flats where Lynch had resided. There was an amazed look on Wilson's face when the door of the flat would not open. The two men put their weight against the door and burst in.

Bob had drawn out a gun, and the first thing he noticed was the billowing curtains. He darted to the window.

Outside was a fire-escape, and, almost at the bottom he could see the scurrying figure of a woman.

"Wilson," Bob snapped out. "Come here." The other peered from the window. "See that woman—see that car she jumped into—tail it and then come back here."

"Okay, boss!" Wilson rushed out of the room.

Bob was thoughtful as he stared round Lynch's room. On the floor were a number of papers, and he guessed that the woman had been searching his friend's desk. He walked across, and at once his quick eyes noticed something sticking out of the centre drawer. It was a strap from a lady's handbag and it was wedged so tight that he had quite a task opening the drawer.

The woman must have been seated at this desk with the drawer open, and she had been so startled by hearing people at the door that she had hurriedly closed the drawer and in some way jammed her handbag. Unable to move it, she had wrenched the bag free and scurried down the escape.

A glance through the papers in the desk told him little, for they were mostly routine matters. Against the wall was a gramophone. Now Lynch and Woods had made an arrangement between themselves whereby they could leave a record of recent activities by an ingenious, secret method. Bob Woods also had a gramophone, and by means of records they had kept in touch with one another.

Bob looked through the pile of records, and he tried out several, but they were all dance tunes or light opera. Then Bob held the records near to the light and a slight smile appeared on his lips. On the desk were a number of pipes, and he scraped the bowl of one in the same way that Recard had done, and placed the residue in a glass of hot water, which he had obtained from a wash-basin. He was dabbing one of the records when Wilson returned, very much out of breath.

"It was a girl," he exclaimed. "A good-looker. I tailed the car to the Santa Barbara Hotel, but she gave me the slip in the lounge. She's in the hotel some place, and I've left two of the boys watching the various exits."

"Good work," Bob grunted, and walked across to the gramophone. "Keep quiet and listen to this."

Wilson looked at Woods in amazement as the Federal Agent placed the record on the machine. It was a popular waltz. Suddenly the music ceased, and there came the sound of a voice from the gramophone:

"Lynch!" gasped Wilson.

"Shut up!" snapped Woods.

"After many weeks of searching have at last got a line on the Sanderson case," Lynch's voice even made Woods shudder. "On June 19th I contacted Sanderson. Appears to have formula for a deadly explosive which will revolutionise modern warfare. June 20th—Sanderson inclined to be secretive and not disposed to tell me his hide-out. Has a secret laboratory. Apparently his formula is almost complete, and in a secret laboratory is working night and day. Very suspicious of all inquiries. June 22nd.—Again contacted Sanderson, who has promised to meet me at his laboratory. So far only had conversation from call booth. Learnt big organisation after Sanderson's discovery and offering big price. Only my threat that the sale of formula may cause the outbreak of a terrible war has stopped him selling. Have discovered that

"What luck?" questioned the foreign-looking man.

Quietly the curtains were pushed to one side, and Bob Woods stood there and watched her.

Recard is the ringleader of this organization. Recard is working to obtain formula, which he plans to sell for a fortune to some foreign country. Recard is wanted in many countries for spying and other offences. June 24th.—Have seen Sanderson but not at his laboratory. Have satisfied him that I am working for the Government. Sanderson desperately in need of money. Have decided to take a car trip to Silver Falls and discuss problem with Bob Woods. Sanderson wants some sort of note from the White House." After that followed some music. "Just before leaving to meet Woods found out that Recard is expecting to meet an accomplice. Vilma Santos is the woman, and imagine she has come from some part of Asia with money to help Recard buy the formula." The record ended with music, and Bob switched off. "Vilma Santos." He took out the paper from his pocket. "V S 8 K G—Vilma Santos arriving at eight on King George. Wilson, the King George docks at eight in the morning, and if I guess rightly the woman will be on board. We're meeting the liner, Wilson."

The Steward

NATURALLY the badge that proved they were Federal Agents assisted Woods and Wilson at the docks. An embarkation officer allowed them to take up a position near the main gangway, and behind some merchandise. They were able to watch without looking too much like watchdogs—the officials had orders to scrutinise everybody's ticket. A signal was arranged should they observe any irregularity.

Bob Woods began to finger his chin in perplexity when the stream of passengers began to lessen. They knew that so far no one had passed the officers with the name of Vilma Santos, nor had they observed anyone acting suspiciously. Bob had almost decided to go on to the King George and have a search made of the cabins, when he laid a hand on Wilson's arm. A solitary figure had appeared at the top of the gangway.

Wilson stared at his superior in surprise, for it was only a steward. The steward was carrying a heavy suitcase and walked very carefully. A very smooth-faced, almost feminine type of young man, who seemed a little nervous. The officer examined the steward's pass and nodded that it was all right to proceed.

Bob came to the officer's side. "Who was that?" "If anyone is suspicious that's the person," said the officer. "But that is a man."

"Ever seen a man walk that way?" Woods pointed. "Ever seen a steward with powder on his cheeks? I hope not."

"I've got it!" gasped Wilson. "The steward's a woman!"

"You're improving," laughed Woods. "Come on!"

Outside the docks a long, powerful car was waiting. Now the steward began to hurry. The back door was opened by a sleek, dark-skinned man, and the bag tossed inside, then the door beside the driver was opened and the steward jumped in—the car went off with a roar. When the car pulled up outside the Santa Barbara the taxi containing Woods and Wilson was close behind.

The steward entered the hotel and the car drove away. Woods was just in time to see their quarry enter a lift.

"Find out the room number," whispered the agent. "The lift has stopped at the sixth. Better take the stairs."

"And me with dropped arches," bemoaned Wilson.

Bob Woods studied the people sitting in the lounge, and his keen eyes detected a girl who was dressed very much in the same sort of clothes as the person seen escaping from Lynch's flat. She was reading a magazine, and yet she was constantly looking up from her reading. There was plenty of room on the settee, so Bob Woods took a place beside her.

A quick glance she gave him before before going back to her reading.

Her left hand was resting on a handbag, and she took it away to smooth an unruly brown curl, giving Bob the chance to have a good look at the bag. That twisted smile came to his lips as he noticed one end of the strap was torn and the other end missing. Quietly he took out the strap, and, holding it hidden, made a comparison—no doubt that this was the strap of the handbag.

Wilson, in the meantime, had found out that the steward had gone into Room 210. He proceeded to make himself comfortable in the corridor and wait till the woman—if it were a woman—reappeared.

The Treacherous Recard

JULE RECARD admitted the steward to his room, and after locking the door, would have taken his visitor in his arms. The latter dropped the suitcase and stayed him with outstretched hand.

"My darling, what is it?" Recard said in injured tones.

The steward removed the peaked cap and out tumbled a mass of black curls. The woman shook them into place, but her eyes never once wavered from the man's face.

"I understand that you've got someone else into the game. A woman. Who is she?"

"You're not jealous, are you, dear?"

"Oh, no!" The woman's eyes flashed. "I'm delighted about it. I can't leave you for a day without you prove unfaithful to me. I risk my life and my freedom for you and come back to find you carrying on with another woman."

Recard pointed to the bag.

"You have the money?"

"Yes, but—"

"My dear, I can explain." He smiled at her and held out his arms.

"You must not be so suspicious. I must have people to help me. This woman is of use to me." His eyes narrowed. "What did Mullins tell you?"

"Only what I could worm out of him," blazed the woman. "He mentioned that your plans were all in readiness, and by chance mentioned that a woman had helped in the negotiations with Sanderson."

"It's quite right, my dear," he smiled. "Sanderson's a most difficult person to contact, and only through her help have I been able to fix up almost complete arrangements. She is taking me to see Sanderson in the morning. Vilma, you have my word that this woman means nothing to me. It is only you I love."

The woman seemed slightly mollified. "Don't give me cause for suspicion, Jule, because if I find you have lied to me I am likely to get a little angry. One word from me and I could burst this scheme of yours wide open."

With difficulty Recard controlled the impulse to put his hands round her throat and throttle her.

"My dear, there is no one else." He rubbed his hands together. "Within a few days the secret formula will be in my possession. Then we can go down to Mexico, where I will hand the formula to special emissaries, and we shall be richer by a quarter of a million dollars. My angel, you haven't kissed me yet."

The woman submitted to his caress, but all the while she was wondering what was behind that inscrutable smile.

"All my plans are practically complete," explained Recard. "Now you have arrived with these bonds and securities, which can be converted into cash at a moment's notice, the prize is within our grasp. It would be as well if you went to our house."

"Whilst you stay here?" she asked quickly.

"My dear, do not be so suspicious." He was patient. "I am staying here under an assumed name, and it would not be wise to have my wife with me. If you go to the house with Mullins you can help me most. We must give these Federal Agents no chance of trailing us."

"But I don't see why your wife—"

"Vilma, please let me conduct this in my way. That house has been left long enough. Besides, I may require you to help me in the laboratory testing out old Sanderson's formula." He pointed to the bed-room. "Some people may have seen you enter here as a man. I have your clothes in my room. It would be best if you change and go back to the house."

Wilson was half-asleep when he woke to the fact that a very beautiful woman was standing by the lift. She gave him a slight smile. Poor Wilson had no idea this was the steward. The lift doors opened and madam disappeared, leaving Wilson goggling foolishly.

The woman downstairs had seen the steward enter, and knew whom she was, and was waiting for the reappearance of the other to go up to see Recard.

Bob Woods edged a little nearer to her.

"Looks as if we might have a war in Europe," he remarked.

The girl frowned at his impertinence in addressing her.

Bob was unperturbed.

"War is a terrible thing with these new engines of war. What with new gases and deadly explosives."

"I'm not interested."

"You should be," Bob grinned. "America might be involved. Airships might come over dropping bombs. There's a bit here about a new explosive discovered by some old crank named Sanderson."

The girl gave a slight start, then, without answering, turned her back.

"It says here that the explosive is more deadly and powerful than anything yet discovered." Bob rustled the paper. "Sanderson is reputed to be out for the highest bidder. Awful if that explosive got into the wrong hands, don't you agree with me?"

The girl hesitated as if she would call one of the bellboys, but there was something in his eyes that made her pause. A sort of knowing look. Who was this man?

"I've never heard of Sanderson."

"Oh, yes you have!" Bob chuckled. "You're trying to secure the Sanderson formula."

"What do you mean by that?"

"What I said, young lady. You're after the Sanderson formula. Well, so am I." He winked. "And maybe the syndicate for whom I'm working can pay better than the bunch for whom you're working. No good trying to bluff me. A lot of people know about the Sanderson explosive, and you'd be surprised if you knew the people for whom I'm working. Stand in with me and I'll guarantee you a small fortune."

"You must be quite mad."

"Lady, don't try to keep up that game." Bob shook his head. "We've got our agents and we know who are working against us. What do you say to working in with me on a fifty-fifty basis?"

Bob Woods was hoping to get some useful information from this girl. Usually money would open most mouths, and in his pocket was a big wad of notes. Not that Bob intended to part with them, but they might prove a good bait.

Suddenly over Bob's shoulder the girl sighted Vilma Santos. This man had been following Vilma, because she had seen the two men enter the hotel close on the steward's heels. Round her neck was a heavy bead bracelet. A cry of alarm and the girl clutched at her dress—she had cunningly broken the necklace. The heavy beads rolled on to the floor, and, unsuspecting, Bob went down on his knees. Some of the beads had gone under a couch.

Bob straightened his back and gave a rueful grin. An old trick, and it had caught him—the girl had vanished. But his sharp eyes saw something else. A beautiful woman getting into a taxi. His knowledge of disguises told him that the woman was Vilma Santos. He got to his feet, and as he hastened towards the swing doors Wilson came running down the stairs.

"No sign of that steward," said Wilson. "All I saw was a darned good-looking dame. She smiled at me, Bob. If I hadn't been busy I might—"

Bob clutched his arm.

"Is that her going off in that taxi?"

"Yeah. That's her."

"That is the steward, you dumb egg!" rasped Bob.

"You don't say." Wilson's eyes nearly popped out of his head. "Who would have thought it?"

"Go book a room in this hotel for two," ordered Bob. "And try to get the room next to 210, and don't tell everybody your business. Look like a travelling salesman. I'll be back."

Bob tailed the taxi for some distance. Vilma alighted and began to look at shops. Up drove a car, and Vilma entered it and was driven away. At traffic lights Bob got held up and cursed heartily at losing his quarry. He returned to the hotel, and was glad to find that Wilson had secured Room 209. He found Wilson sprawled on the bed fast asleep.

"You're a fine assistant."

"Sorry, Bob, but I've done so much running about I'm worn out," apologised Wilson. "Besides, what could I have done?"

"Found out what's happening in the next room."

Actually, the girl was in Recard's room, and was sitting on a settee with his arms round her.

"Thank goodness I got rid of Vilma," Recard smiled at her boldly. "Her jealousy nearly drives me crazy. After this deal is through I finish with her. There is someone else who means a lot to me. You say that Sanderson will see me. When we get that formula we can ask any price. I'll divorce Vilma and you and I can live in wealth and comfort for the rest of our lives."

"There will be no more bloodshed, Jule?"

"Accidents happen sometimes."

"Like Jack Lynch?"

"He would have spoilt our plans." Recard shrugged his shoulders. "What is one Federal Agent more or less? That reminds me of something important. You say you were disturbed in Lynch's rooms, but you had not found anything. I want you to go back there again and look for some gramophone records."

"Gramophone records?" questioned the girl.

"I have found out that Lynch was often experimenting with records, and, according to his landlady, talking to himself. Maybe some of those records may prove interesting. I must not leave a scrap of evidence against us."

"What Lynch found out might ruin your plans?"

"He knew too much, so that was why he had to go."

"You are very ruthless, Jule." Her eyes watched him intently, but she freed herself as he would have drawn her closer. "If I'm going to get these records I must go now."

When the girl left Recard's room she did not know the door of 209 was slightly ajar.

"I'm going to follow the girl," Bob Woods told Wilson. "Whilst I'm away bide your chance, and when Recard goes out of his room, slip in and fix dictaphones. Don't fail me, Wilson."

"It's as good as done."

Bob Woods was able to follow the girl easily, and when she headed for Cedarville he had a good idea of her destination.

Twenty-four Hours

THE girl had the key that she had been given by Recard, who had got it from the body of Lynch.

Swiftly she closed the door and switched on the light. She went to the gramophone and took out the records. She did not notice a faint movement of the curtains of the window that led to the fire-escape.

Very methodically she went through all the records, and it was not till almost the end that she came to the record of Lynch's own making. She clung to the gramophone cabinet as if she felt faint. Quietly the curtains were pushed to one side, and Bob Woods stood there and watched her.

"Found what you wanted, sister?"

She spun round with a gasp of dismay.

"You!"

"A clever gag with those beads." Bob was watching her every move. "Suppose you thought you had thrown me off the trail, but it takes a lot to get rid of me. Just keep your hand away from the pocket of your coat. I hate to use a gun on a woman, but in necessity one has to be quite callous."

"I have no gun," she answered him.

"A pity you didn't accept my offer to work with me." He lit a cigarette. "What do you know of the death of Jack Lynch?"

The girl shot him a startled glance. "I don't believe what you told me about working for another syndicate is true. Who are you?"

Bob Woods showed her his badge. "You're a Federal Agent!"

"I am!" His voice hardened. "And now you'd better talk, sister. I want to know what you know about Jack Lynch."

Again she avoided the question. "You think I'm working for Recard, don't you? Would it surprise you to know I hate him?"

Bob Woods came closer so he could see her better. This girl was not only good-looking, but she did not look like a wrong 'un. Her face might be set in hard lines, but the gaze from the blue eyes never wavered from his. He did not know what to make of her, though he had to admit she was uncommonly attractive, and felt sure that if she were to smile she would be most appealing. He squared his shoulders—if he were not careful he would be getting sentimental.

His voice became gruff.

"I'm listening."

"I hate Recard more than any person in the world." As she spoke those blue eyes never faltered. "What I'm doing may seem very suspicious, but I have a reason. Recard is a crook and a dastardly scoundrel, and it is my aim to bring him to justice. If you persist in interfering you will ruin all my schemes."

"Who are you?"

"My Christian name is Helen, my surname is my affair," she said fiercely. "But I swear that I'm not trying to aid and abet Recard, but luring a rascal into a trap. Give me twenty-four hours and I can succeed in my plans. Interfere and Recard is more than likely to get away with Sanderson's secret formula, and if that should get into unscrupulous hands you know what that would mean. Sanderson has discovered an explosive that is four times as destructive as anything ever discovered before. Please trust me."

By rights Woods ought to have arrested this mystery girl, but she seemed so in earnest that he hesitated. From his pocket he produced the strap of her handbag.

"I disturbed you the other day, and when I saw your handbag in the lobby of the hotel I knew you were the young woman who got away down that fire-escape. What did you want then and now from Lynch's apartment?"

"For many months your department has wanted to lay hands on Recard and men like him," was her reply.

"But there are many scoundrels who know how to evade the law. You might arrest Recard for the murder of Lynch, but you would have difficulty in pinning the crime on to him. You would have to let him go free. I'm out to get Recard so that he will not go free, but if I'm to obtain the evidence that is necessary I must have a free hand."

"I asked you before what you know of Lynch's death."

"I know Recard was responsible, but I have no proof, though he has boasted of men he has killed. Give me twenty-four hours and Recard shall not escape."

"Very well—twenty-four hours," Bob Woods decided. "I've never done anything like this in all the ten years I've worked for the department, and if my chief knew he would say I was crazy, but somehow you've succeeded in convincing me that you're on the level. I will hold up on my investigations. My name is Bob Woods, and you can get in touch with me at the Santa Barbara Hotel. I'm risking my job in letting you do this, and risking the chance of letting a scoundrel slip through my fingers, but you must have some magnetic will that makes me act this way."

The girl held out her hand.

"I won't fail you."

Bob gripped it.

"You have a grudge against Recard. Care to tell me?"

"At the end of the twenty-four hours you shall know why I hate him so. No person can hate him as much as I do."

"Jack Lynch was my friend," Bob walked towards the window. "If you fail I swear I will not rest till I have avenged his death. Why you should have a prior claim I cannot imagine, but a girl like you would not be taking all this risk unless your reasons were very great. Therefore, Helen, for twenty-four hours you have a free hand. I will leave by the escape."

It was not very long after that the girl left the block of flats. A taxi took her to the outskirts of the city. She told the driver to wait at some cross-roads, whilst she walked briskly down the quietest of the roads to a house surrounded by a high hedge. The house was in a bad state of repair and looked deserted. The girl had a key, and with a glance round to see she was not followed, let herself into a deserted hall.

She knocked at a door and entered when there was no answer. A bed was in one corner, and there were a few sticks of furniture. She looked round and satisfied the person she sought was not there, went back into the hall and up some stairs. She did not walk on tiptoe, but if well used to this old mansion, and was not afraid of being heard. After going down a number of corridors she came to some big doors, which she unlocked with another key.

A sort of lounge with stairs leading downwards into darkness. She touched a switch and a light appeared below. Eagerly she hastened down the stairs. There was an earthy, peculiar smell. She rapped at a door, and when there came no answer, placed her hands against the door. She knew the secret of that door which had no handle, because it swung back. The room beyond was a laboratory. Everywhere were benches loaded with queer retorts and vessels. Something spluttered in a pan, under which flickered a blue flame. On one side were great steel doors. The smell of chemicals was very strong. On a bench was a keyboard, and she pressed a button, and immediately a red light appeared over the steel doors.

"You asked for this, flat-foot, and you deserve all that's coming to you!"
cried Helen.

A moment later there came a rumbling and one of the doors rolled back, and thick smoke rolled sluggishly into the laboratory. Out of this murk appeared a masked and goggled figure. The door rolled back, shutting out the foul fumes. The mask and goggles were removed to reveal an old man with sharp, shrewd eyes. The very long nose and the almost bald head gave Sanderson the appearance of an owl.

"You quite startled me, my dear. I was not expecting anybody. Nothing wrong, I hope?"

"No, professor. I called to say that Recard has the money and we can sell him the formula some time tomorrow."

"I wrote to the authorities and they did not even bother to send anyone even to investigate." The professor looked worried. "I wonder if I'm right in letting this formula fall into foreign hands? You are sure this man represents the League of Nations?"

"Your formula will not fall into the hands of anyone who will throw the world into another terrible war," the girl cried. "You can rely on that. Where is the formula?"

"It is complete," Sanderson pointed. "It is in that safe over in the corner."

"Good!" Helen looked at the steel doors. "Are you any farther advanced with the new gas you are trying to make?"

"I have succeeded beyond my wildest dreams." The professor walked across to some levers. "I am able to fill those chambers with any sort of gases and be able to extract the most deadly fumes by means of touching these levers. All that remains is just waste material."

"Could a person live in it after you have released the fumes?"

"No; not even with this apparatus," answered the professor. "I could live for a little while, but soon I should suffocate. It would be a slow and very unpleasant death. Tell me, my dear, when will Recard come here to buy the formula?"

"To-morrow night, so there is no need for you to work any more to-day. You must rest yourself." Her eyes seemed to stare at those steel doors as if they fascinated her. "I can take you back into town with me."

There was a curious glint in those blue eyes as the girl assisted the old professor into the waiting car. Her zero hour was at hand.

Silenced

BOB WOODS called himself all kinds of an idiot because he had been influenced by a pretty face. He had promised to do nothing for twenty-four hours because this girl hinted that she had a prior claim. What did he know about the mysterious Helen? He was greatly attracted by her, but women, with their smiles and beguiling ways, had bluffed far cleverer men than himself. He decided to go back to the hotel and talk the matter over with Wilson.

Of course, Wilson would call him a sap, especially as the nit-wit had been tricked by Vilma Santos. Bob decided that he would use his discretion about discussing the matter with Wilson; he wondered if his assistant had succeeded in fixing a dictaphone.

It did not surprise Bob to find Wilson sprawled on the bed. Always sleeping. But he saw the earphones and knew that Wilson had succeeded in planting dictaphones.

"What luck, old timer?" he asked as he washed his hands.

September 26th, 1936.

There came no answer.

"Wake up, you old scoundrel," Bob called. "You can't sleep all the day."

Bob dried his hands and went over to the bed. This sleeping habit of Wilson's was getting beyond a joke. Important information might have come through, and Wilson not taking it.

"Wake up!" shouted Bob, and gave Wilson a shove.

To his surprise, Wilson rolled off the bed and lay there sprawled out. Puzzled, he stared down, and suddenly noted the pallor of his assistant's cheeks. With a sharp intake of breath he went down on his knees and shook Wilson roughly. A touch on the cheek and he drew back his hand with sudden dread.

It was now that he observed that the wires from the headpieces seemed to be round Wilson's throat. With hands that shook he turned over the body and knew that his companion was dead. He had been throttled to death. With difficulty he freed the wires and tried artificial respiration, but Wilson did not respond.

There was a grim, hard look on Bob's face as he got up and followed the wire to the wall. It was cut, but he found a place where a hole had been drilled near the door. Quietly he went out into the passage and noted a similar hole on the door of 210. He had a shrewd idea of all that had occurred. Wilson had planted his dictaphone, and either the wires, the holes in the door, or the instrument had been seen by Ricard. Ricard had entered 209 and killed Wilson.

Bob tried the door of 210 and found it open. It did not surprise him to find the room empty—the occupant had gone and taken all his luggage. From a picture hung part of a dictaphone, and a fierce grin came to Bob's face as he saw it—Ricard had guessed he would enter 210, and had left it as a sign of mocking defiance.

No good wasting time here—something had to be done. He thought suddenly of the girl. She must have been in on this killing. If only he could find her! He went back to his room to stare down at the body of Wilson. First Lynch and now Wilson—their deaths had got to be avenged.

Suddenly he dropped on his knees because he had noticed something protruding from the hand of the dead man. Just the edge of a piece of paper. He forced open the fingers and drew forth a crumpled ball. It seemed to be blank, but the agents often used an invisible ink. He smoothed out the paper, and from a drawer took out a flat instrument which he plugged into the wall. At once a powerful light ray appeared, and on placing the paper over it he was able to see a message:

"Recard seeing Sanderson to-night. Some dame, not Vilma Santos, has made contact for Recard with Sanderson. Recard plans to quit hotel. Has a hide-out at the Haven, in Yellowstone Park Avenue."

The girl had double-crossed him. She must have been wise all the time. Directly he had left her in Lynch's flat she had probably rung Recard. How they must have laughed!

Captured

ON leaving the hotel Recard had gone to a small restaurant to meet the girl, and he was inclined to be sharp because she kept him waiting. She stated that she had tried every record, but there was only music on all of them. She had ransacked the place and found nothing that could incriminate Recard.

They left the restaurant and went to the house in Yellowstone Park Avenue, and as they entered by the front door the bushes close at hand parted and Bob Woods peered forth. The agent was an expert at opening windows and soon found a means of egress into the house. Hidden behind a curtain, he was witness of a scene between Recard and his wife.

"Why have you brought this creature here?" demanded the jealous Vilma Santos.

"Vilma, will you hold your tongue?" Recard shouted.

"How dare you speak to me like that?" the woman countered. "Why is she here?"

"Because I can't contact Sanderson without her," Recard exclaimed. "She is his representative. It's not my fault that Sanderson does his business through a girl. But without her I can't buy the formula. Now do you understand?"

"I don't trust her," muttered Vilma. "It wouldn't surprise me if she was a Federal Agent."

"What right have you to say that?" demanded the girl. "I work for Sanderson, and I draw a commission on the deal. The higher the price the higher my commission. We tried the Government and they wouldn't even bother to send a representative. I've got no love for them, so it's absurd to make out I'm a Federal Agent."

"Vilma, I can't have my plans spoilt by disputes and suspicions," Recard argued. "Everything is set. Helen is taking me—"

"So you use her Christian name?"

"And why not?" Recard almost foamed at the mouth. "We have been negotiating and arguing over the price for the formula for days and weeks, so why shouldn't I? My dear, you carry your suspicions too far. One day I may lose my temper."

"And then what would you do?" His face contorted, but it ended in a smile.

"I should regain my temper and tell you not to be foolish." He held up his hand. "No more argument, please. Everything is arranged. I am going in a few minutes to see Professor Sanderson, and if the complete formula is handed to me I shall then conduct this lady to the house of a banker, where I will hand over the price named."

All this while Mullins, who was Recard's radio operator and right-hand man, had listened with an evil grin on his unhealthy features. He knew very well that Recard aimed to walk out on Vilma at the first opportunity, and if she made any trouble it would be just too bad for her. Recard aimed to get the formula, the girl and not pay Sanderson a cent. Once the formula was in his possession Recard could snap his fingers at Sanderson. The girl would have to obey orders or else be framed, but as Recard imagined Helen to be in love with him he had no fears about her.

"You'll come back here?" asked Vilma.

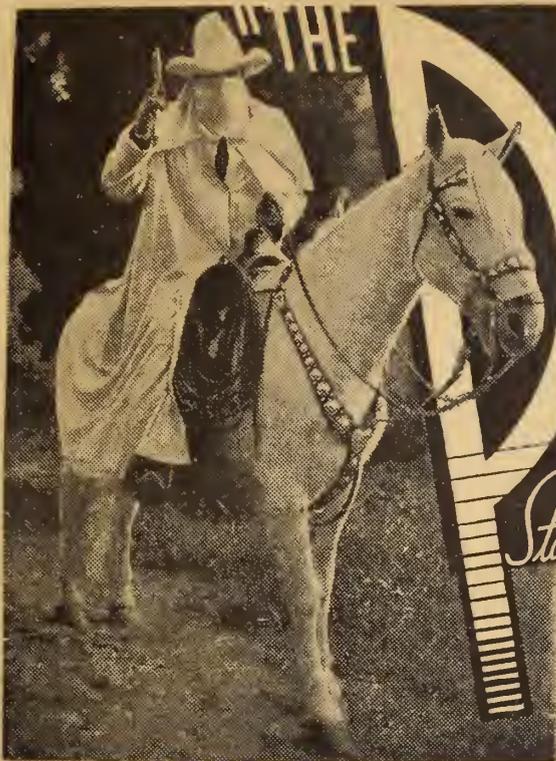

"No. I have fixed a meeting-place with Mullins," instructed Recard. "I want Mullins to help you in destroying all evidence in this house. The wireless must be smashed. Directly it is dark you will leave, and I propose to meet you at midnight. Then we will travel south."

"Who are 'we'?"

"You and I, my dear, with Mullins as the discreet chauffeur," Recard said

EPISODE 8—

"The Indian Attack"

READ THIS FIRST

Buck Grant, a settler in the Pecos Valley, is in reality a Ranger investigating stories of terrorism by a gang of outlaws whose leader's identity he hopes to discover.

Judge Holmes, of Maverick, is the only man who knows Buck is a Ranger. He is likewise the only man who knows that Buck is the Phantom Rider, a cloaked horseman who is defeating the activities of the outlaws at every turn.

One morning, however, masked gangsters butcher Shorty, another Ranger who is on his way to the Valley. Dying, Shorty tells Buck to go to the Hidden Valley Ranch, and later Buck learns this is the property of a man named Grayson.

He meets Grayson's beautiful daughter, Mary, who has returned from the East and brought with her a friend, Helen Moore.

Meanwhile, a Ranger known as Spooky has entered Maverick, and Buck instructs him to obtain work at the Hidden Valley outfit. That same night Buck casually drops in at that ranch himself, and is introduced to Harvey Delaney, a neighbouring cattleman who is on friendly terms with the Graysons.

Old Grayson is murdered the next day, and leaves Mary a wallet containing the map of a secret gold mine. Later, a railroad agent makes Mary an offer for her land, and she is on the point of signing away the property when an outlaw bullet smashed a lamp and caused the agent to sink to the floor.

Immediately afterwards the Phantom appears on the scene, but falls from his horse as two more shots ring out at close quarters.

The Wallet Disappears

"GOT him!"

The words were spoken simultaneously by the gangsters known as Gabe and Keeler, but they speedily discovered that they were mistaken, for in tumbling from his horse the Phantom had merely sought to deceive them, and now, from the cover of a clump of shrubs, their supposed victim opened fire on them with an accuracy that threw them into a panic.

The first shot blistered Keeler's cheek, and his second cut a hole in the sleeve of Gabe's shirt. In another moment the two outlaws were veering away from the ranch-house porch and sprinting in the direction of the thickets where they had parted with Dirk and the rest of the gang.

Crouching amidst the shrubbery into which he had plunged, the Phantom accelerated the departure of the fugitives with two more slugs that kicked up the dust at their heels. Then he saw the Grayson punchers come swarming from the bunkhouse, to be met with a volley from Dirk and his men.

The ranch-hands were forced to retreat into their quarters again, and thus Gabe and Keeler were enabled to rejoin the remainder of the outlaw band. Meanwhile, over at the principal building of the Grayson outfit, Mary had appeared at the front door with Helen Moore, Judge Holmes and Harvey Delaney, and from his covert in the shrubbery the Phantom obtained a clear view of them as they peered across at the thickets on the south side of the property.

The Phantom himself was not visible to the eyes of Mary and her companions. Nor did he attempt to show himself, but, striking off through the bushes, worked round to the rear of the ranch-house and slipped into the dwelling by a back door.

A few seconds afterwards he was in the lounge where Mary had been on the point of signing the railroad company's agreement when Keeler's six-gun had interrupted negotiations.

The lounge was in darkness, but, accustomed to the gloom, the Phantom perceived the body of a man lying on the floor, and recognised Blake. The latter had obviously been struck down by the same bullet that had smashed the lamp.

The Phantom knelt beside the railroad agent, and gave vent to an exclamation of relief as he discovered that the man was still alive, though unconscious and severely wounded. Then he turned towards the table, and spying the wallet that contained the chart of the Grayson gold mine, he snatched this up with a rapid gesture and thrust it into his pocket.

A moment later Buck Grant, alias the Phantom, was hurrying out of the room again, but as he emerged from it he was seen by a seared housemaid who was descending from her bed-room with a naphtha lamp clutched in one trembling hand.

The maid uttered a shriek, and the sound lent added speed to Buck's exit. He was clear of the house in the twinkling of an eye, and dodging forth through the kitchen doorway, he spied his brone Silver some forty or fifty yards from the building.

The animal was standing near a barn, to which it had trotted when its master had flung himself from the saddle, and Buck dashed towards the creature. As he ran he heard the frightened maid shrieking at the top of her voice inside the ranch-house, and guessed that her cries would bring

Mary back into the dwelling from the front door.

His guess was right. Followed by Delaney, Helen Moore and Judge Holmes, Mary came rushing into the hall and seized the hysterical housemaid by the arm.

"What's wrong, Lizzie?" she demanded. "What are you screaming for?"

"A ghost!" was the shrill response. "I've just seen a ghost! All in white, he was—from head to foot!"

"The Phantom!" barked Delaney. "Which way did he go? Mary, tell this fool of a girl to pull herself together!"

"A ghost!" Lizzie repeated wildly. "I've just seen him! He went out through the back door!"

Harvey Delaney made for the kitchen, and Holmes accompanied him. As they stumbled out of the house they obtained an impression of a robed figure mounting a silver-grey bronc in the vicinity of the barn, and Delaney promptly tugged out a six-gun.

He was prevented from using it by Holmes.

"Hold on, Harvey," the older man protested. "The Phantom is a friend." "You think so?" Delaney snapped. "Then how do you account for him shooting out the light in the lounge just now?"

"He didn't do that," the judge retorted. "It was one of those two fellows we spotted from the front door—the men who were heading for the thickets."

"And the Phantom was in cahoots with them," Harvey Delaney ground out. "I'd gamble on that, judge. Let go of my arm and give me a chance to pick him off."

But Holmes would not release him willingly, and by the time that the big cattleman had wrenched free, the Phantom had spurred off across the range, vanishing beyond a fold in the landscape, and it was in a disgruntled fashion that he jammed his forty-five back into its holster and returned to the hall with the judge.

They found Mary and Helen doing their best to pacify the abject Lizzie. At the same time they heard a snattering of gunfire coming from the direction of the bunkhouse, where the Grayson cowboys were answering the fire that had been opened up on them from the brushwood thickets, but the shooting was dying down as Delaney addressed the girl who had inherited the Hidden Valley ranch.

"It was the Phantom all right, Mary," he declared, "and, though Holmes won't agree with me, I think he's a wrong 'un."

"How can you say that, Harvey?" the girl exclaimed in a harassed tone. "Anybody who has ever had any dealings with him will tell you that he's on the side of law and order."

"He may appear to be," Delaney grunted. "But if he's an honest man why does he have to go around hiding his identity by a mask and a cloak? No, Mary, he's not a friend, and I'll stake my last cent that he was behind those men who surprised us from the lounge—the men who shattered the light and drilled Blake!"

Mary cried out at that.

"Blake!" she ejaculated. "I—I'd forgotten him! Yes—he cried out, didn't he? He must have been hit!"

She took the naphtha lamp from the quaking grasp of her maid, and together with Helen, Delaney and Holmes she tottered into the lounge.

There lay the railroad agent, and with a look of concern on her pretty face Mary dropped to her knees beside him. She was joined in this attitude by Harvey Delaney and the judge, who lost no time in examining the wounded man.

"I think he'll be all right," Holmes said at length, "but he's pretty badly hurt, and we'd better send for a doctor."

It was at this moment that there was a tramping of feet on the porch, and immediately afterwards Mary's foreman entered the house with some of the boys, Spooky being amongst them.

"What happened, ma'am?" the foreman queried huskily. "We heard shots, and when we came out the bunkhouse we was met by a volley that drove us back inside. Then we started to blaze at the thickets, and whoever the houbres were that had opened up on us, they cleared off pretty soon."

"It was some kind of an attack by outlaws, Steve," Mary answered. "I don't know what their game was, but they got Mr. Blake here, and you'd better take him upstairs to one of the spare rooms. Spooky, you and Bob give Steve a hand. Slim, you ride to town and fetch the doctor. The rest of you go back to your quarters, but be ready for trouble, in case those outlaws show up again."

Her instructions were obeyed, and it was while Blake was being carried up to bed that Harvey Delaney spoke once more.

"Is anything missing from this room, Mary?" he asked grimly.

The girl looked at him quickly, and then her eyes travelled towards the table at which she and her companions had been gathered when Keeler's gunshot had blasted out the light and struck down the railroad agent.

The deed which she had been about to sign was still there. The pen that she had been in the act of wielding was lying beside it, just as she had dropped it when the lamp had been extinguished.

"No," she began, "I—"

And then she stopped, for suddenly she remembered the pocket-book that contained the chart of her father's gold mine.

"The wallet!" she gasped. "I left it on the table, and it's gone!"

"I thought so," Harvey Delaney breathed. "And the Phantom was the man who took it, for your maid saw him coming out of this room. Now maybe you'll believe that he's a crook and that he was in league with those two men who made off into the brush."

Mary stared at the table in silence, her face pale, an expression of uncertainty in her eyes.

"I—I can't understand it," she faltered. "It—it just doesn't make sense. Judge Holmes, you told me that the wallet was given to you by the Phantom with a request that you would keep it safely for me until I wanted it."

"That's right, Mary," Holmes answered. "At least, it was sent to me with a covering note that purported to be from the Phantom."

"And yet the Phantom came here to-night and stole it," the girl said. "What kind of game is he playing?"

The judge looked at her helplessly, with the air of a man completely bewildered, though he had a shrewd notion of the truth.

"I have no explanation to offer, Mary," he murmured, "but somehow I can't bring myself to accept Delaney's theory that the Phantom was operating with the men who shot Blake and who scuttled off into the brushwood, where they apparently had a bunch of accomplices waiting for them."

"If you ask me," Helen Moore interposed. "the Phantom scared off those men whom we saw, judge. I wonder if they'll come back with their confederates and start some more trouble?"

Had she but known it, there was small fear of that, for the outlaws were at present riding in a south-easterly direction in the hope of picking up the trail of the Phantom, whose flight from the ranch-house they had witnessed.

They were not successful in their purpose, however, and after wasting a full hour in reconnoitring the country between Hidden Valley and the Pecos River they set out for their lair in the heart of the mountains.

Some time later they might have been seen drawing rein at the lonely cabin which was their hide-out, and as they dismounted from their ponies Dirk spoke in a lugubrious voice.

"I wonder if the boss has got here yet," he said. "I ain't looking forward to meetin' him—without that wallet he sent us to get."

His comrades exchanged uneasy glances with him, and then the whole gang filed into the cabin. As they crossed the threshold they found a lamp burning at a low glimmer in the front room, and by the thievish light of it saw an indistinct figure standing in one of the farthest corners.

It was the figure of the man who was their chief, and Dirk proceeded to address him sheepishly, but had not been talking for long when the gang leader cut in on him in harsh accents.

"Never mind the alibis, Dirk," he snarled. "You slipped up on the job, and all of you are to blame as much as Gabe and Keeler. You let the Phantom put one over on you—that's the long and short of it."

"We did the best we could, boss," Dirk expostulated, "and the boys will bear me out when I tell you that we hunted high an' low for that Phantom after we saw him ride away from the Grayson ranch. I'm tellin' you, boss, we did our level best."

The leader of the gang ripped out an oath.

"Your level best!" he blazed. "That's always your lame excuse. Well, it looks to me like I'll have to get some new men to help you make good."

"New men?" Dirk echoed. "Where you gonna get 'em?"

"That's my business," was the curt rejoinder. "But get them I will. Meantime, you'd better lie low until you hear from me again."

With those words he thrust his way through the pack of ruffians and slammed out of the cabin. Then, striding round to a lean-to that was attached to the dwelling, he led forth a sorrel pony and swung himself astride the animal.

A moment afterwards he was spurring savagely from the ravine in which the gang's hide-out was situated, and once clear of the canyon, he struck due north through the hills.

Delaney Sets a Trap

THE following morning Spooky slipped away from the Hidden Valley outfit and rode over to Dry Creek, where Buck Grant's homestead was located, and it was as the little Ranger was reining up outside the shack that his six-foot comrade appeared on the threshold.

"Hallo, Buck," Spooky greeted him cheerfully. "How's tricks?"

"Fine and dandy," the big fellow answered. "It's kinda' lucky I showed up at the Grayson ranch last night. I reckon those outlaws would have got the wallet if I hadn't been on hand."

His partner nodded.

"You're right," he agreed. "But what do you intend to do with that wallet now? Turn it over to Judge Holmes again?"

"No," Buck replied. "I've been thinking things over, and I believe it will be safer with me than with anybody else."

"It might be even safer with me," observed Spooky, "especially if the outlaws happen to discover that you were the Phantom."

Buck looked at him quickly, and seemed to ponder the other Ranger's suggestion. Then he produced the wallet and passed it up to Spooky.

"Not a bad idea, pal," he declared. "You'd be the last person in the world that anyone would suspect. Okay, you take care of it—for a while, at any rate."

Spooky placed the wallet in his hip pocket, and then, after a brief silence, he volunteered another comment.

"We oughta put Mary Grayson wise, somehow," he murmured. "I don't mean we should tell her that I'm holdin' the wallet, but we could let her know that it's in safe-keepin'. Suppose you write a note to her, settin' her mind at rest."

Once again Buck showed approval, and when Spooky left the cabin some time later he was the bearer of a message that his comrade had printed in pencil; a message which he carried back to the Hidden Valley ranch, and which he handed to Mary Grayson a few minutes after his arrival there.

He found her in the lounge, and, delivering the note, which was enclosed in an envelope, he told her a trumped-up story of how he had come across it.

"I was over at the barn just now and saw this pinned to the door," he stated. "It's addressed to you, Miss Mary."

The girl took the missive and ripped open the envelope, and, watching her, Spooky noted the expression of tense interest that dawned on her lovely features as she read the epistle. Then, all at once she rose from the couch on which she had been sitting, and, hastening out into the hall, she called Helen Moore by name.

The latter soon presented herself in the lounge, and Mary was in the act of divulging the contents of the note she had received when Lizzie, the housemaid, came into the room and announced Judge Holmes and Harvey Delaney.

Within a few seconds the judge and the neighbouring cattleman were entering the apartment in which Mary, Helen and Spooky were standing.

"Good-morning, Mary," Holmes began in his fatherly way. "I thought I'd drop in on you and see how things were, and it seems Harvey here was of the same mind. We met on the trail."

"I'm glad you came, judge," Mary said, "for I have news for you. Spooky found a note pinned on the barn door. It's from the Phantom, and must have been left by him last night, I suppose."

Both Holmes and Delaney immediately showed signs of curiosity, and listened attentively as the girl provided them with the gist of the message.

"The Phantom says that I've no need to worry," she told them. "He's going to take care of the wallet for me, and assures me that it will be quite safe with him."

Delaney frowned at that.

"And you mean to say, Mary," he exclaimed, "that you're willing to take it for granted that the wallet will be safe with him? Why, you're crazy! What's his idea in doing so?"

"This note makes his motive perfectly clear," Mary retorted. "His aim is to prevent the outlaws from getting it, of course."

Harvey Delaney seemed far from satisfied. His strong, keen face wore a look of impatience.

"If you ask me," he said, "the Phantom wrote that message as a blind, in order to prevent you from taking any steps to recover the chart of your father's mine. No doubt, while you're sitting quietly at home and making no effort to get the wallet, he'll jump that hidden claim and enrich himself by it."

"Harvey," Mary rejoined, "I don't know who the Phantom is, but I feel certain you're doing him an injustice. He's acted too honourably in the past to turn around and rob me of any part of my inheritance."

"In any case," she added, "what steps could I take to recover that wallet, even if I questioned his honesty? Why should he take the trouble to write a note setting my mind at rest if he means to steal my father's gold mine? I've no means of bringing the law on him, when I haven't the vaguest idea who he is."

Delaney moved a step nearer to her, and when he spoke to her again it was in a voice that was low and significant.

"But supposing you suspected his identity," he said, "and supposing you were to lay a trap that would put your suspicions to the crucial test."

The girl stared at him in a puzzled fashion. So did Helen Moore, Judge Holmes and Spooky.

"What do you mean, Harvey?" Mary demanded. "Do you suspect someone of being the Phantom Rider?"

Delaney answered her tersely.

"Yes," he rapped out. "I think Buck Grant and the Phantom Rider are one and the same man!"

Holmes and Spooky exchanged a swift glance, and then, looking at Mary and Helen, they saw the amazement that was written on the faces of the two girls.

"It's close on time," the cattleman said. "Now to see if the Phantom Rider shows up."

"Grant and the Phantom both appeared in this country about the same time," Delaney went on in an emphatic tone, "and to my mind, Grant's behaviour hasn't been straightforward. Anyway, I'd like a chance to prove my theory."

Hotly resenting the insinuation that Buck was a questionable character, Mary speedily made it clear that the young "nester" from Dry Creek occupied a high place in her esteem.

Delaney, however, was stubbornly intractable, and was arguing with the girl in a dogged manner when Judge Holmes broke in on the discussion.

"You say you'd like a chance to prove your theory, Harvey," he remarked. "Have you any plan in mind?"

"Yes, I have," the other man replied. "If a message was sent to Grant telling him that an attack was expected here—and if the Phantom showed up in response to such a message—that would establish my suspicions pretty conclusively, wouldn't it?"

"I'll be no party to a scheme like that," Mary interposed angrily, but the judge laid a hand on her arm.

"Harvey Delaney may be right, Mary," he told her. "I've heard the same theory expressed by other folks, and though I very much doubt it myself, I think we might put it to the test. Spooky here could carry the message, and drop it in at Grant's cabin."

He looked at the little fellow meaningfully as he spoke, and received an understanding glance in return. Then Delaney proceeded to scrawl a somewhat mysterious note which stated that an outlaw raid would be launched on the Grayson ranch at three o'clock that afternoon.

"Leave this at Grant's homestead," he said at length, tendering Spooky the missive, "but don't let him see you if you can help it."

Spooky nodded, and went outside to his horse, but, as he was preparing to mount, Judge Holmes followed him out of the ranch-house and addressed him in an undertone.

"I thought it might be as well to fall in with Delaney's suggestion, Spooky," he whispered. "You can put Buck wise, and he can kill, once and for all, this rumour that he is the Phantom."

"He'll kill it all right, judge," the little fellow murmured, and an instant later he was clapping his heels to the flanks of his pony.

Holmes stood watching him for a minute or two as he galloped across the range, and then he retraced his steps into the ranch-house and joined Delaney and the girls again, walking into the lounge just as Mary was making a caustic remark to her neighbour.

"Well, Harvey," she was saying, "since you've chosen to use my house as a bait to prove your suspicions, I suppose I'll have to invite you to stay to lunch."

Delaney grinned at her.

"Either that, or I'll break into the larder," he declared. "I'm going to be pretty hungry long before three o'clock, the time scheduled for the imaginary attack."

Judge Holmes seconded him on that score, and so Mary and Helen had company for the midday meal; a meal over which they lingered so long that the hands of the clock in the dining-room were pointing to the time of two-thirty when they eventually rose from the table.

With half an hour to wait, the two men and the two girls drifted back into the lounge, and here Delaney took the liberty of throwing the windows wide open. Then he assumed a position whence he was able to command a view of the country to the south.

Mary, Helen and Judge Holmes moved over to the windows as well, and they remained there while the minutes dragged by, till it seemed as if they had been gazing across the range for an eternity. But at last Delaney took out his watch, and, after glancing at it, uttered a grunt of anticipation.

"It's close on time," the cattleman said. "Now to see if the Phantom Rider shows up."

Scarcely were the words spoken when the figure of a horseman burst out of the brushwood thickets some distance from the ranch and began to career along the fringe of them. He was a horseman who forked the saddle of a white mustang, and who wore a voluminous cloak and a kerchief that concealed his features, and at sight of him Delaney gave vent to a triumphant cry.

"Friends," he ejaculated, "the Phantom! And right on the dot! Now do you deny that he and Grant are one and the same?"

Judge Holmes remained silent. As for Helen and Mary, they appeared to be denied the power of speech, and were still staring mutely in the direction of the thickets when the voice of Lizzie, the housemaid, became audible.

"Mr. Grant to see you, Miss Mary."

The quartet at the window spun round, and saw Lizzie draw aside from the threshold of the lounge to admit Buck, who was immediately aware of the astonished expression on Harvey Delaney's countenance.

Thunderstruck, crestfallen, Delaney gaped at the big fellow from Dry Creek, and then looked through the windows again to catch a final glimpse of the robed figure on the white horse as the latter re-entered the thickets. A moment afterwards the tall cattleman was listening to Buck's drawing tones.

"Looks like somebody has been playin' a joke on me," Buck observed. "I expected the ranch to be surrounded by outlaws. Can anyone explain this note to me?"

"You'd better ask Mr. Delaney," Mary answered, shooting a glance at the discomfited rancher who was her neighbour. "It was his idea."

Harvey Delaney eyed Buck sheepishly, and noticed that he was fingering the missive that Spooky had been instructed to deliver.

"Forget it, Grant," the cattleman said. "It was just a little misunderstanding, but it's all straightened out now."

He turned and picked up his hat, and then, making some reference to a certain business appointment that he had at his ranch, he made his way towards the door.

Helen and Mary accompanied him as far as the porch, both of them being anxious to show that they were not "bad friends" with him on account of what had happened, and it was during the brief absence of the two girls that Holmes spoke in an aside to Buck.

"Who was the bogus Phantom Rider we just saw on the edge of the brush?" he asked. "Spooky?"

"Sure," Buck declared. "As soon as he gave me the low-down I told him he'd better take my place."

"And where did he pick up the white bronc? That wasn't your horse, Silver."

"No," Buck said with a smile. "That's where the laugh comes in. Spooky lifted it from the north pasture of the Delaney ranch. He'll be on his way back there with it now."

Holmes chuckled softly, but managed to subdue his mirth when Helen and Mary reappeared in the lounge, and a little while later announced that he must return to town.

Departing, he left Buck with the two girls, and soon after the judge had gone Helen Moore went upstairs to attend to Blake, the railroad agent, who was still lying in the room to which he had been carried the previous night.

Buck, therefore, found himself alone with Mary, and was engaged in conversation with her when Spooky showed up at the outfit. Then, with the afternoon wearing on, the stalwart nester from Dry Creek suggested to his hostess that a gallop across the range would not come amiss.

It was a proposal to which Mary readily assented, and before long the two of them were riding off through Hidden Valley, little dreaming that ere they saw the Grayson ranch again they were to figure in an unexpected adventure.

Redskin Allies

ABOUT the time that Buck and Mary set out to enjoy a gallop across the range, a crowd of men might have been seen outside a remote cabin in the hills.

The men in question were the outlaws who had been terrorising Benson County, and the cabin was their hide-away and rendezvous. It was here that Dirk had put in an appearance after a brief interview with the mysterious leader of the gang, and from the saddle of his horse he was now repeating his chief's orders to the other members of the band.

"The boss wants us to run off a bunch of Mary Grayson's cattle," he declared. "They're located on the prairie west of Sandstone Bluff, and there's three punchers in charge of 'em."

"Sandstone Bluff?" echoed Keeler. "That's pretty close to the ranch, ain't it? We're liable to have the whole outfit down on us before we get far away with the herd."

"No," Dirk retorted. "The boss has decided on his new men. They'll cover our raid and hold up the main body of the Grayson cowboys if the alarm is given."

The other rustlers looked at one another, and then the ruffian known as Gabe voiced a query.

"Who are the new men?" he demanded.

"Red Eagle and his renegades, from the reservation. Yep—Indians. The boss has sent word to them to meet us near their camp."

"Can we bank on them?" another of the outlaws growled.

"Sure," answered Dirk. "Red Eagle's father is friendly to white folks—realises there ain't no sense in bein' anything else. But Red Eagle and some of the young braves are allus ready for trouble, especially if there's any dough in it. Come on, you fellows had better mount up. We've a lotta ridin' to do."

The rest of the gangsters were soon astride their ponies, and at the head of the outlaw band Dirk then led the way through the hills, striking deeper into the barren fastnesses of the mountain country until an hour later he espied another group of horsemen approaching from the opposite direction.

They were Indians of a degenerate breed, rigged out incongruously in garments that were a compromise between the picturesque attire of their forefathers and the clothing of civilisation. They were armed, too, with revolvers of the latest pattern, traded to them secretly by whites who had ignored the regulations of the Government.

in a soft, quiet tone of voice. "It will be a second honeymoon."

"I would like a few words with you, Jule," insisted Vilma. "It will be as well if we go to the laboratory. We can talk and then you can help me destroy everything. Mullins had better come with us."

"Will you please wait here?" Recard smiled at the girl as he followed his wife.

The girl gasped when the curtains parted and there stood Bob Woods.

"You promised me twenty-four hours."

"You tricked me," Bob countered. "It was all lies that you told me. Swearing to hate Recard, when all the time you're planning to go off with him. It's plain you aim to rob Sanderson of his formula, and then vamoos south with Recard with not only the formula, but the money."

"Not so loud—they'll hear you." The girl had gone very white. "I swear I hate Recard. Your coming here is likely to ruin everything. Why didn't you trust me?"

"Because I got back to the Santa Barbara to find my friend dead—throttled."

"You mean they killed Wilson?" the girl gasped. "I did not know. After leaving Lynch's room I met Recard by appointment—I did not even tell him of the gramophone record. I know nothing of your assistant's death. You must believe me, because I have Recard almost in my power. Do not ruin everything now."

"I've had enough of this," rasped Woods. "I've got you all in this dump and I reckon I can pin enough on all of you. I'm going to ring the police and get a flying squad here."

"Don't touch that 'phone!" begged the girl. "It's connected with Recard's laboratory."

But Bob Woods had taken the receiver from its hook. He raised the 'phone as if about to call a number and all he heard was an insistent buzzing. He hung up and stared at the girl.

"I wish I could believe you."

"They're coming down the stairs," whispered the girl. "You're trapped! Your only chance is to play up to me." She laid a finger on her lips, and then raised her voice. "Thought yourself clever, trailing us here. Well, you've been a bit too clever. I've tricked you into warning my friends."

"Keep still!" came the voice of Recard from behind heavy curtains. "One move and you're a dead man. Better raise your hands."

Slowly Bob raised his hands. The curtains were flung back, and Recard, Mullins and Vilma came into the room.

"Well done, Helen," approved Recard. "And now, Mr. Agent, have you anything to say before I shoot?"

"You don't think I should have walked into this dump without protecting myself," sneered Woods. "I've got other men besides Wilson trailing me."

"Better kill him," hissed Vilma.

"Search him," ordered Recard to Mullins.

Mullins frisked Woods and removed a gun, whilst Recard kept the Federal Agent covered.

"What are you going to do with him?" demanded Vilma Santos.

"We do not want to leave anything in this house that might be used against us," softly spoke Recard. "Mullins, get some rope and lash our friend to that chair." He turned to the woman. "As arranged, you and Mullins will finish the work of destruction, you will then take this interfering fool of a policeman out to the saloon car—I am using the open tourer. Mullins knows what to do with this man when San Francisco has been left many miles behind. I can leave this to you, Mullins."

"It'll be a pleasure, boss." "You had better keep a close eye on him," Recard went on. "He must not escape. Vilma, you had better get back to the laboratory. I will go now to see Sanderson."

"Yes, we mustn't waste any more time." It was Helen, and she looked intently at the bound man. "You asked for this, flat-foot, and you deserve all that's coming to you." In her hand she had secreted a knife, and she walked across to the chair. She laughed harshly. "I hope you have a pleasant ride. I'm almost sorry I shan't be with you, but I've got a date with Sanderson. As you're not long for this world I'll tell you his hide-out. It is near the Junction crossroads, and Sanderson lives in the old deserted Blue Mill." Her laugh was shrill.

Recard laughed. Little did he know that as the girl stood by the chair of the bound man her hand slid down towards his hands that were bound behind the chair-back.

The girl laughed again and moved away from the chair to stand beside Recard.

"We mustn't keep Sanderson waiting," she hinted.

Bob Woods was alone with Mullins, who sat on a chair with a gun on his knee, and leered at the man he was soon going to kill, whilst upstairs came the sounds of crashing glass—Vilma was smashing up the laboratory and the radio. All the while the Federal Agent was sawing at the bonds that secured his wrists.

Fortune favoured him, because Vilma Santos came to the top of the stairs and shouted to Mullins to come and help her. The task was more than she could manage.

When Mullins came back he stared at the chair aghast—it was empty. He had scarce got over his surprise when the gun was wrenched from his hands and powerful fingers were locked round his throat.

Mullins managed to break free, and then a mighty fist landed to the point of the jaw. He went down like a felled ox.

Vilma Santos heard the scuffling and came running down the stairs. Her eyes widened at sight of a battered Mullins sprawled at the foot of the stairs. One wrist was circled by a handcuff. Bob showed no mercy, and seized her before she could escape.

She screamed and tried to bite and claw, but his hands were like steel. There was a cлик, and then Bob stood back to survey his work. There was a handcuff on both their wrists, and the chain went between the stout iron banisters.

"You two can stay there till I come back for you," he mocked. "I might add, madam, that I'm doing you a service. Recard intended to walk out on you for that other dame, and never intended to meet you at midnight. Mullins would have met Recard and the girl later, but you wouldn't have been with them. I trust your darling Jule had not planned the same end for you as he had for me. Now I must leave you two for a while. I hope you have a nice friendly talk whilst I'm gone."

As Bob tore through the night he prayed he would reach the Blue Mill in time.

Helen in Her True Colours

ON arrival at the Blue Mill Helen admitted Recard to the old house.

The crook kept his hand near his hip, as if suspicious of a trap.

"This place seems deserted."

"It suited the professor," explained the girl. "Somebody was killed here, and as a result they can never let the place. The professor got it very cheap, and I don't suppose anyone knows he comes here as this road is seldom used—it leads to a disused quarry. Apart from this room"—she opened a door—"the whole house is bare, except for the cellars. Professor Sanderson is evidently down in the cellars, where he has done all his experiments."

Assured that all was well, Recard allowed the girl to lead him through the old place. She knocked at the doors of the laboratory, and when there was no answer, entered. She disappeared into the blackness and a light was switched on.

Recard looked round. This was evidently the place where Sanderson carried out his experiments.

"Where is the professor?"

"Like all professors very bad on appointments," Helen answered. "I told him that you would be here about nine. He's bound to be here at any moment. At any rate, while we're waiting you can have a look at the formula. The old fool trusts me with all his keys."

From the safe she took out a thick roll of parchment and handed it to Recard.

"With your knowledge of chemistry you should be able to understand this. Anything you don't fathom the professor will tell you when he arrives. There is a bench over there."

Recard unfolded the roll of parchment and smoothed it out on the bench. He was so eager that he did not observe the fierce light that blazed in the girl's eyes.

After a while Recard looked round.

"I can't make much of this," he said.

"You're sure it is the formula?"

"No, that isn't the formula." The girl's hand came from behind her back and it held a gun. "I've got you at last, Recard!"

"What do you mean?"

"You're at my mercy."

"So you are a double-crossing Federal Agent?"

"No, I'm Helen Lynch!" she cried.

"The sister of Jack Lynch, the man you murdered by shooting in the back."

Recard gaped at her as if he could not believe what he had heard.

"My brother told me a lot about the Sanderson case, and it was I who managed to find this hide-out of the professor's," Helen told him. "When you murdered my brother I swore to get even, and got the professor to act as a go-between." She gave a short, bitter laugh. "I learnt something of the secrets of this laboratory and what is behind those steel doors."

Recard looked at the doors and they seemed to fill his evil soul with terror.

"What do you want of me?"

"I'm going to hand out to you the fate you deserve." Still keeping him covered she moved across the laboratory. "When I press on this lever these doors swing back; when they close it is a slow death by suffocation for anyone that is imprisoned."

"You mean—"

"That like a rat you can die," Helen shouted. "You showed my brother no mercy and now it's your turn. You killed Wilson. Well, you can think of my brother, Wilson, and others that you have murdered as slowly you begin to suffocate."

"You'll go to the chair for this."

"That wouldn't worry me, but they may never find out. This shall be the perfect crime. I've told Professor Sanderson that it is to-morrow you buy the formula. You came here a day before and it is obvious that you have tried to steal the formula. Somehow you enter the gas chamber and stumbling against a lever close the doors, trapping yourself. You fail to escape and die miserably."

"Think of the money you are going to lose." Recard's eyes took in the whole place for some means of attacking this girl. "Besides, I didn't kill your brother."

"You gave the orders."

"I gave orders for Lynch to be stopped. Lynch would not stop and in the gun fight was—"

"Shot in the back," Helen interrupted. "Lies won't save you, Recard. You'll tell me in a moment you didn't tell that skunk Mullins to murder that Federal Agent. It may interest you to know that whilst I was talking I slipped him a knife, and if I know anything of him Mullins and your wife will be his prisoners."

"So you've been double-crossing me all the time?" He made a step forward as if he would leap at her.

The gun never wavered.

"Another step, Recard, and this gun goes off. I know how to handle a gun and I can't miss."

Recard hesitated. If he tried a rush she would fire and fire to kill. If he were not to die a horrible death he must find some way immediately. If he could think of nothing, then he would hurl himself at her on the chance that she was taken by surprise. He was standing near the long laboratory bench, and he wondered if there was time to grab one of these glass vessels and hurl it at her—he dismissed the idea as hopeless. It was then that he noticed at the end of the bench the light switch.

"You can't kill me like this without giving me a chance." He began to talk to gain time. He held out his hands pleadingly, and managed to edge along the floor. Helen did not suspect because though she saw him move slightly it did not bring him any nearer to her. "I got a right to live," he shouted. "Lynch had shot many of my men, and it he had stopped when ordered he would have been alive to-day."

"Did you give that chance to Wilson?"

"I told one of my men to put him to sleep," lied Recard. "And the fool strangled him. Was that my fault?"

"You're gaining nothing, Recard." Helen began to press on the lever. "Either be shot down or get behind these doors."

His hand slid forward and next moment the laboratory was in darkness.

September 26th, 1935.

Recard bent double as Helen fired. The bullet passed over him, and before she could fire again he had flung himself forward to seize her by the wrist. The gun exploded harmlessly again, and then Helen gave a cry of agony as Recard brutally twisted her arm, forcing her to let go of the weapon.

A Fight to a Finish

BOB WOODS found the cross-roads, but it was some little while before he came to the Blue Mill.

It was a gloomy old place. He tried the front door and found it locked. Actually, Recard had shot the bolt when Helen had not been watching. Easy for Bob to have broken down the door, but the noise would have warned Recard.

A tour of the house revealed wooden planks laid over some sort of coal shute. They removed easily enough, and a flash of his torch revealed a door into the house.

The sound of two shots and a woman's scream startled him. Helen was in danger. Quickly he dropped down and ran to the door, which was bolted, but his weight soon burst it open. He guessed he would not have been heard because of the noise coming from somewhere close at hand. He heard Helen scream again. With the aid of his torch he picked his way down a gloomy, dirty passage until he came to high doors. He placed his ear to the keyhole.

"I've got you now, my pretty." It was the voice of Recard. "No one ever double-crosses me and gets away with it. You want me to suffocate to death, and so, pretty lady, I guess you can sample some of your own medicine."

Very quietly Bob turned the handle and breathed a sigh of relief that the door was not locked. Moreover, the hinges did not squeak, and he was able to creep into the laboratory like a shadow. A moon cast a fitful shadow and Bob could vaguely glimpse two people struggling on the floor.

"One move and I'll throttle you like I did Wilson," snarled Recard. "Now you're going to tell me how to work these cursed doors—tell me the way to kill you."

Groping fingers found the switch and the laboratory was flooded with light. Bob Woods hurled himself forward at Recard's back.

Though Recard was winded he fought desperately. His clawing hands tried to get at the pistol, but Bob managed to kick it into a corner. Helen crawled away and watched the fight with agonised eyes. It never occurred to her to try to get the gun—she was too absorbed in the fight.

The two men were on their feet, and how her heart leapt as Woods got in a terrific punch to Recard's jaw. Recard went down, but he was game. Out went a leg as the Federal Agent rushed and down sprawled his enemy. Now it was his turn to rush, but Bob Woods doubled his feet under him and shot them out like pistons into the other's chest.

A table covered with bottles and paraphernalia crashed over, and the two men rolled amongst the broken glass. They staggered up, and faced each other before attempting to attack. Suddenly Recard darted to a table and swung up a huge glass jar. The Agent dodged and the jar smashed to pieces against the wall. Locked in each other's arms they rolled over the floor, with each trying to get uppermost. A punch below the belt caused Bob to relax his grip and Recard wriggled free. He grabbed up a chair with the full intention of smashing it down on his victim.

"Look out, Bob!" screamed Helen.

Bob Woods twisted sideways and the chair crashed on the floor, but when Recard swung up the chair for another blow a fist with the force of a mighty battering ram behind it caught Recard and hurled him back. The crook staggered into the long bench that was loaded with test-tubes, retorts, bottles, jars and beakers. The whole lot went over with a sickening crash, and Helen thought that the fight was over, but desperation often lends a man strength. Recard staggered to his feet, his face streaming with blood, and screaming curses rushed forward.

"Take that you rat!" shouted Bob, and his right laded with a thud to the point of the jaw.

Recard was hurled back to crash once more into the debris. Fear and rage seemed to drive the man mad, and though his hands were cut and bleeding he began to pick up broken bottles to throw at Bob, who had hard work dodging the missiles. Then the crook found an iron bar and tried to smash Bob over the head.

Strong hands wrenched the weapon away and Bob crashed a right and left to the jaw. This time Recard crashed against a cupboard that was loaded with bottles. They smashed and instantly white fumes burst forth.

"It's gas!" screamed Helen. "It's deadly!"

Bob would have rushed forward to try to help the wretched Recard, but Helen grabbed his arm.

"One whiff of that and you haven't a chance." Her voice was shrill with fear. "Come away before it is too late."

The blows that Recard had showered on her and the mental strain were too much for her, and Bob was just in time to catch her in his arms. Some more of the bottles exploded and there was an ominous sizzling noise. A flicker of flame showed in the dense fumes, which were moving towards him like a cloud.

Bob Woods decided that the best thing was to get out of the Blue Mill, and quickly.

But that was far from a simple matter. There was a sharp report and in a flash the choking fumes surrounded them. They coughed and spluttered. They tripped over a smashed table and sprawled on the floor, and when Woods got to his feet his outstretched hands could not find the girl.

"Where are you?" he gasped out.

A faint cry was his answer.

Stooping, he groped about the floor till he found her. The gases were making him faint and dizzy, but somehow he managed to pick up the half-fainting girl in his arms. Now he had no idea which was the way out of the laboratory till another sharp explosion gave him a rough idea of his bearings. What a relief to find himself out in a passage. Now he could use his torch.

A glance back showed that the laboratory was in flames, and he did not know how soon it would be before the explosives would go up like a volcano. At last he reached the shute, and he was in such an exhausted condition that he had to rest to get back his strength. Luckily, the air revived the girl, so that she was able with his assistance to clamber upwards. A moment later they were in the garden. They raced to the car, and scarce had they reached it when the Blue Mill rocked under a violent explosion.

"Best thing we can do is to get a call through to the fire squad," decided Bob. "That place will be ablaze in two shakes. Way goes old Sanderson's formula."

"MURDER ON A BRIDLE PATH"

"He's the one that did it!" he cried. "I tell you he killed her!"

"Aw, you're crazy!" roared the stable manager. "You're trying to hang it on to me."

"Quiet!" thundered Piper. "What are you three doing here?"

Barbara was the first to speak.

"Go on, Eddie," she said, "you'd better tell him."

"All right," Eddie stepped forward. "You see, Violet gave this fellow Wells nine hundred dollars."

"What!" howled Piper.

"We found an entry in her diary," Eddie held out the little book Barbara had taken from a drawer of the dressing-table in the bed-room of the flat. He pointed to an entry which Piper read aloud:

"Gave Latigo nine hundred dollars to put on Wallaby. Why didn't you tell me about this before?"

"Well," Eddie replied, "we didn't think it was important."

"Oh, again you didn't think it was important!" raged the inspector, and whirled round on Wells.

"Well, Mr. Latigo Wells, it looks like you've got some explaining to do. She gave you the money, and when she couldn't get it back you killed her."

Miss Withers sailed along the yard, and he shouted to her above the trembling manager's protests:

"I think we've got him, Hildegarde."

"Wait a minute," said she importantly. "I want to tell you something."

He stepped aside with her, and a whispered conversation ensued, during which Eddie and Barbara looked at one another and at Don.

Finally Piper stalked over to Don.

"Oh, Gregg," he said in an ominously quiet voice, "where did you go when you left the Turkish baths?"

"Why, I had my breakfast there," was the reply, "and then I went to the flat."

"What are you lying for? You tried to rent a horse to follow Violet Feverel. Why did you want to follow her?"

A telephone bell shrilled in the office, and Wells made a movement which was instantly stayed by the inspector.

"I'll take it," said Miss Withers. "I'll tell them you're in conference, Mr. Wells."

She sped off down the yard, and Piper faced Don again.

"You may as well spill it, Gregg," he gritted. "A wrecked bicycle was found near the spot where the girl was killed."

"So what?" challenged Don.

"That bicycle was stolen from across the street, and you were seen doing it. A little piece of cloth was caught in the sprocket wheel—dark cloth!" Piper picked up the skirt of Don's overcoat and found a little tear in it—a tear on which all eyes became focused.

"Say, wait a minute—" Don began hoarsely.

But Piper would not listen.

"When you couldn't rent a horse," he accused sternly, "you stole a bicycle, and you just happened to ride in the park where Violet Feverel was murdered."

"I did follow her," admitted Don frantically. "But I never saw her. I ran into a tree—"

Miss Withers came running up, a trifle scant of breath.

"It was Mr. Schultz, the handwriting expert," she panted.

"What did he want?" snapped Piper.

"He says," replied Miss Withers, "that the forged court order was in Pat Gregg's handwriting."

Piper emitted an ejaculation that sounded uncommonly like an oath.

"Well, how'd you like that?" he howled. "So your father forged the court order, eh, Gregg? Well, maybe you'll talk now, and maybe your father'll talk. Kane, get another car from headquarters and take 'em out to the Gregg home, all of 'em."

"Yes, sir," said Kane dutifully, and he made use of the telephone in the office.

The Knotted Sheet

DAYLIGHT had faded into dusk when the squad car containing Detective-Inspector Piper and Miss Withers drew up outside the front steps of the ugly house on Long Island, and in the gloom the place bore a more sinister aspect than ever.

The two descended from the car and ascended to the porch, but a repeated ringing of the bell and pounding of the knocker failed to elicit any response from within.

"Nobody home!" growled Piper.

"If I lived in a place like this," commented Miss Withers, "I wouldn't stay home, either."

"Well, a locked house never stopped me yet," Piper boasted. "If there's anyone in there at all, I'm going to sneak up on them."

He went off to look for an unfastened window, and presently Miss Withers tried the handle of the door, and found that the door would open.

She stepped rather timorously into the hall, which was in darkness, and she had groped her way to the stairs when she heard a crash in the back parlour. Piper had found one of its windows unfastened and had raised the sash and climbed in over the sill; but he had blundered against a table which overturned, and as he fell to the floor with it he had caught his hand in the shade of a reading-lamp, which had been sent flying.

He was rising to his feet and flinging the lampshade from him when Miss Withers reached the doorway of the room and cried out in a voice she herself did not recognise:

"Stand still, I've got you covered!"

Piper stood perfectly still, and then she found the switch and flooded the room with light.

"Relax, Hildegard, relax," rebuked Piper, not without relief, and in some embarrassment she dropped the hand she had been pointing as though it were a gun.

In the hall he switched on more lights. "The place seems kind of empty," he remarked. "I wonder where everybody is."

"I don't know," she said; "but old man Gregg's home, that's a cinch. Come on."

They climbed the stairs together.

"How did you get in, anyway?" asked Piper.

"The door wasn't locked," she replied, and it was his turn to feel foolish.

The door of Patrick Gregg's bedroom was wide open when they reached it, but the bed was empty.

"He's gone!" exclaimed Piper blankly.

"Right again, Oscar," said Miss Withers.

"Do you suppose somebody could have tipped him off we were coming?"

"It's possible," she conceded, "but I have an idea where he might be."

She led the way up the second flight of stairs and she pointed mutely to the closed door of the room in which she had looked through a telescope.

Piper opened the door and she reached round it to switch on the lights. Patrick Gregg was in the chair behind the desk in his dressing-gown, his face flat upon its leatherette surface, one arm close to his head, the other stretched out towards an inkstand as though it had fallen away from the telescope.

Piper felt for a pulse which had long since ceased to beat, and Miss Withers explained about the telescope.

"Umph!" grunted the inspector. "Looking at the races this afternoon, that's what did it. The doctor said he couldn't stand any excitement." He snapped thumb and finger in annoyance. "He would have to pop off at a time like this."

"I'm not so sure he popped off," said Miss Withers, and that caused him to examine the body more closely. Presently he went down on his knees, and he found red marks round the old man's bare ankles.

"Looks as though they've been tied," he said, and rose thoughtfully. "You know, Hildegard, he might have been murdered at that. But how did he—"

"I think I know," she interrupted. "Come on!"

They descended to the bed-room, and there she pointed out some sand upon the carpet, near the bed, which she had noticed that morning.

September 26th, 1936.

"If he had been sandbagged," she said, "it wouldn't show more than a lump on his head, would it? And look!"

She pulled out the bottom of a sheet, the corner of which was knotted.

"It was like that this morning," she said.

"Knotted!" exclaimed Piper. "And his ankles are chafed! That might mean that somebody—"

He broke off to look up at the ceiling. There were heavy beams across it, and in one of the beams there was a big hook—almost directly over the bed.

"Look!" he cried, and stood up on the bed to examine the hook. It had been pulled out of shape as though by a weight almost too much for it.

"Something's been tied around here!" he proclaimed excitedly.

Miss Withers stared from the knotted sheet to the hook.

"Oscar," she said suddenly, "he dreamt he was swinging like a pendulum—he told me so! Somebody tried to kill him this morning! He was hit on the back of the head with a sandbag and hung up there by his heels!"

"Uhuh!" Piper got down from the bed. "That would make the blood run into his head so it would look like he had a stroke."

"Whoever did it," decided Miss Withers, "tried it this morning, but something happened, so they came back this afternoon."

"Yeah," objected Piper, "but if he was killed here how did his body get up in that turret room?"

"Must have been carried there," she replied, "so that it would look as if the excitement of the races killed him."

"You've got it!"

A sound down in the hall as of a door being closed sent them out on to the landing, and over the banisters Piper caught sight of Thomas, who had stared at the squad car in the drive before he entered the house.

"Oh, it's you, is it?" shouted the inspector, and swept down the stairs. "Where've you been?"

Thomas stopped short, holding his bowler hat between his hands.

"Is anything wrong, sir?" he asked.

"Never mind that," snapped Piper.

"Where've you been?"

"Mr. Gregg said I might go to the races, sir, at Belmont Park," the butler replied.

"Oh, he did, eh? What time did you leave the house?"

"Why, it—it was shortly after lunch, sir. Pardon me, but are you alone in the house?"

"Why?" demanded Piper sharply.

"Mr. Gregg's up in his room, isn't he?"

"Yes, sir, of course." The butler appeared to be worried. "I was wondering where Joey was."

"Joey?"

"That's the cripple boy who works here," explained Miss Withers, who had followed the inspector down. "He opened the door this morning."

"Oh, yeah." Piper remembered.

"Was he here when you left?"

"Yes, sir, he was," Thomas replied.

"I'm his father, you know. The boy is not well, but there's no harm in him. Mr. Gregg will tell you—"

"Mr. Gregg won't tell me anything!" rasped Piper. "He's dead!"

"Dead?" The butler looked flabbergasted. "Why—why I—I left him all right this afternoon. Poor Master Don, he'll be broken up over this. He'll regret the quarrel."

"What quarrel?" Piper almost shouted.

"Oh, nothing, sir—nothing."

"Come on, what quarrel? What was it about?"

Thomas bit his lip and stared at Miss Withers, who was regarding him intently.

"It—it was— Well, Mr. Gregg thought Master Don had killed Miss Violet," he mumbled.

"He did, eh? What made him think that?"

"I can't imagine, sir."

"Listen, the—" The strident note of a motor horn out in the drive caused the inspector to break off abruptly. "Wait a minute!" he commanded. "I'll attend to that—and you stay right here!"

He went to the front door, opened it, and strode out on to the porch.

"By the way, Thomas," said Miss Withers in a friendly sort of fashion, "who won the big handicap?"

"Wallaby, ma'am," replied the butler.

"Did you have a bet on him?"

"I would have liked to, ma'am."

"Anyone who did have a bet on him won a lot of money, didn't they?"

"Yes," replied Thomas, "a lot of money."

Despite the inspector's instructions he walked slowly up the stairs, and she did not try to stop him. But after he had disappeared round the bend at the half-landing she, too, slowly ascended.

Caught!

THE car which had arrived in the drive was the one Kane had obtained from headquarters, and it contained Don Gregg, Barbara, Eddie Fry, and Latigo Wells—to say nothing of several plain-clothes men.

On Piper's instructions the four were marched into the hall, Kane bringing up the rear, and there Eddie Fry looked at Don and said:

"Gregg, I think we ought to tell him everything."

"I do, too," declared Barbara.

"Well, somebody'd better tell me something!" snarled Piper. "What is it?"

Eddie held out a very small piece of paper.

"It's a page that Don tore out of Violet's diary," he said. "She hated old man Gregg. She says on it that she'd like to kill him."

Piper snatched at the paper, read what was written on it, and held it behind his back.

"But somebody killed her first, eh?" he said caustically. "Maybe it was the same person that had a quarrel with your father this morning, Gregg!"

"I don't see—" Don began angrily.

"Oh, you don't see, eh?" roared Piper. "Where were you this afternoon before I saw you at the stables?"

"I spent the afternoon with these people," Don indicated Eddie and Barbara, and Eddie nodded confirmation.

"You were pretty sore at your father, weren't you?" said Piper. "Were you sore enough to kill him?"

"Kill him?" gasped Don.

"We found your father upstairs, dead!"

By the time Miss Withers had reached the hallway of the first floor Thomas had disappeared. She was looking about her when a shuffling sound on the upper stairs caused her to turn about, and she saw the cripple limping downwards.

She met him at the bottom of the flight, and he started slightly as she faced him.

"Where have you been, Joey?" she inquired.

"Upstairs, ma'am," he replied.

"What were you doing up there?"

"That's where I live—me and my father."

She raised her brows a trifle, but forbore to ask any more questions.

"All right, Joey," she said, and watched him as he limped away to the landing and went down the lower stairs.

In the hall Piper was blazing at Don Gregg when the cripple endeavoured to slip past him.

"Hi, you!" bellowed the detective.

"Where're you going?"

"To the stables, sir," was the reply.

"Well, forget about the stables! Stick around here!"

Joey's rather wild eyes were rebellious, but he leaned against the wall, not daring to disobey the police.

Miss Withers heard the harsh command, then crept up the second flight of stairs. Beyond the room in which Patrick Gregg was sprawled dead across his desk there were five more stairs, and at the top of them a door. She opened the door and slipped into a bedroom obviously under the roof of the turret.

The ceiling sloped down on either side of it, as she discovered after she had switched on a light, and it was very meagrely furnished. Near the window there was a double bed, and near the door there was a dressing-table of stained deal. In the wall which had no slope there was a cupboard, and she opened its door.

On the floor inside lay a long and narrow bag from which sand had leaked, and in a corner an air rifle was propped against the wall.

She backed out from the cupboard and went to the dressing-table, and she did not notice that the door of the room, which she had closed, was now open a couple of inches.

On the dressing-table, beside a candlestick, there was a cardboard box. She opened the box and from it poured some BB shots into the palm of her gloved hand and studied them.

She was putting the shots back into the box when the door swung wide, and she turned to see the butler standing there with a most malignant expression on his thin face.

"Thomas!" she gasped.

"Did you call, ma'am?"

She was far too scared to answer, and she shrank against the wall as he closed the door and leaned menacingly over the side of the dressing-table.

"You know, don't you?" he said, the light of madness in his staring eyes.

"You know everything?"

With one claw-like hand outstretched, he moved round the dressing-table, and from behind it and the wall snatched up an object that made her shudder—a garden hoe with a horseshoe wired to its blade. She was in deadly fear of her own life, but she found her voice.

"So that's how you

"Well, did he tell you he was the one that got me out of gaol?" he stormed.

"Oh," drawled Piper, "so it was Thomas?"

He scratched first his chin and then the back of his neck.

"Well, now, that's funny," he mused.

There was nothing funny to Miss Withers about Thomas' revelations, up in the room under the roof of the turret. She listened because she had to listen, but her heart was pounding against her ribs.

"My son was crippled," the butler stated fiercely, "by one of that old man's horses. I saved and saved for years and years so that he could be cured, and then I gave nine hundred dollars to old man Gregg to bet on Wallaby because that would have made it enough. But he stole it. He gave it to Violet Feverel for Don's alimony!"

His voice rose to a shriek.

"I went to her, after he had told me, but she laughed at me. I got 'em both—Violet Feverel in the park, and old man Gregg in his bed!"

Maniacal laughter filled the room.

"I carried him up to his study so that he could see the horses for ever and ever and ever!"

Raising the hoe above his head by its handle, he struck suddenly, but Miss Withers ducked in time to evade the blow and flew out past him on to the landing.

"Oscar!" she screamed at the top of her voice. "Oscar!"

Thomas rushed out at her, aiming another blow at her head, but again she evaded the horrible weapon, and she stumbled down the stairs with the madman after her. On the floor below he reached over the banisters to hurl the thing at her, but the banisters gave way and he pitched headlong downwards, screeching horribly, and fell in a crumpled heap almost at Piper's feet.

On the following afternoon Miss Withers leaned forward in a chair at the end of the inspector's desk in his office at headquarters. Eddie Fry and Barbara had got married that morning, and were on their way to Canada for their honeymoon, but there was still something on the spinster's mind.

"There's one remaining point I'd like cleared up," she said.

"What?" asked Piper.

She took a briar pipe from her handbag and pushed it across the desk to him.

"The owner of that pipe has false teeth, but Thomas' teeth were his own

—such as they were—discoloured and decayed for anyone to see. Yet I found that pipe in the park near the body!"

"So you think the murderer must be still at large, after all?" suggested Piper with playful sarcasm.

"Oscar," she chided, "I'm not all that funny!"

Dr. Charles Bloom walked into the room, and Piper held up the pipe.

"Hallo, doc," he said. "Ever see that before?"

The medical examiner took the pipe, and one glance at it was enough.

"Why, yes," he exclaimed, "it's mine! I've been looking for it ever since yesterday morning. Thanks!"

"Wait a minute, doc," chuckled Piper. "You've got some questions to answer. Miss Withers suspects that you don't eat apples. You'd better have a good answer!"

The doctor turned with quite an annoyed expression on his face to the finder of the pipe.

"The answer, Miss Withers," he said stiffly, "is apple-sauce!"

He went straight out, his head in the air, and Piper roared with laughter.

"Trying to pin a murder on the medical examiner!" he gurgled.

Miss Withers promptly whisked a cigar from a box on the desk and jabbed it into his open mouth.

"The formula is at a bank—it is quite safe," gasped Helen.

"Well, why did you take Recard to the Blue Mill?" Bob demanded.

"Because I wanted to kill him," answered the girl. "Because he killed my brother, Jack."

"So you're Helen Lynch!" burred Bob. "I knew there was something about your face that was familiar—it was the eyes. Mighty good thing, young lady, I showed up, and Recard got the better of you. You can't go handing out justice that way, though that skunk deserved all that came to him."

After Vilma and Mullins had been handed over to the police and Bob had had a talk with Professor Sanderson on the right person to see in regard to the formula there seemed nothing more to do but go and watch the Blue Mill blazing merrily.

"Helen!" Bob had his arm through hers. "You're alone in the world now, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"Are you in a job?"

"I was, but I resigned after Jack died."

"Well, I've got a month's vacation that's starting right now," Bob cried. "I'm going to write my report to-night and post it in the morning, and I'm going to assure head office that for a month I'm going to be missing. I'm going on my honeymoon."

"Who with?" Helen tried to free her arm.

"With you, stupid," Bob grinned. "And I'm marrying you directly after breakfast before you have a chance to change your mind."

"THE PHANTOM RIDER"

these Indians—had merely sapped such qualities as their race had formerly possessed, and added new vices to their old ones so that they were ripe for any mischief—and typical of the harm thus wrought amongst a once-proud people was the young brave who commanded this particular party.

He was Red Eagle, a lean, swarthy native with shifty eyes and a face that was ravaged by the effects of whisky. Indeed, his breath stank of the raw spirit as he drew rein before Dirk and lifted a hand in salute.

"I come with my friends here in answer to message," he said. "We slip away from Indian village, and take care that my father, the old chief, does not see us. Him no' like make trouble. Old people all the same—they no' like trouble."

"But you don't mind trouble so long as the pay is good, huh?" Dirk commented with a leer. "Okay, Red Eagle, you'll get plenty of dough if you do as I tell you. Now listen."

He began to make the situation clear to the wayward son of the old Indian chief, and, when the renegades had learned the part that they were to play, they and their allies took the trail that led to Sandstone Bluff.

They rode at a brisk pace, and before the sun had gone down beyond the western peaks of the Guadalupe mountains, they were in sight of their destination—a sweep of prairie sloping away from the bluff, and dotted with steers which were peacefully grazing.

Three cowboys were guarding the scattered herd, and Dirk and his cronies did not anticipate much trouble from these. A single volley and the punchers would probably ride for their lives. So the outlaws imagined, at any rate.

"Come on, men," Dirk rapped out, and with a jab of his spurs he sent his horse bounding from a strip of forest through which the rustlers had made their way.

The scoundrelly whites whom he commanded were quick to follow his example, and, meanwhile, in accordance with the pre-arranged plan, the pack of renegade Indians moved northward to the edge of the wood under Red Eagle's leadership—there to take up a position and beat off any of the Grayson hands who might come from the direction of the ranch.

Before the renegades had reached the northern fringe of the timber, shots were ringing out across the expanse of prairie on which the Hidden Valley heaves were feeding. They threw the herd into confusion. But, contrary to expectations, they did not put to flight the three punchers who were in charge of the steers, for these promptly drew their forty-fives and answered the challenge of the gangsters' fusillade.

It was at this very moment that a man and a girl hove into view on the brow of a low ridge to the north-west, and with the blasts of the revolvers resounding in their ears the two of them pulled up abruptly.

The man and the girl were Buck Grant and Mary Grayson, homeward bound from their gallop across the range, and as they beheld Dirk and his associates bearing down on the stampeding drove of cattle they looked at each other quickly.

"Rustlers!" Buck ejaculated. "And operating in broad daylight! They've got their nerve!"

"I'll say they have," Mary cried. "The ranch is only just beyond Sandstone Bluff there, and my cowboys are bound to hear the shooting."

Buck gripped her by the arm. "Maybe not," he said. "You head for the outfit and send 'em out here. This is no place for you, anyway."

"What are you going to do?" the girl demanded.

"Give those three herdsmen of yours a little support," was the reply. "I reckon they'll need it. Go on now, you get going."

Mary was loath to leave him, believing that he and the three punchers down on the prairie were likely to meet their death at the hands of the outlaws. But he prevailed upon her to ride for the ranch and give the alarm, and as she began to spur in the direction of her home he galloped to the aid of the men who were facing the onset of the charging outlaws.

Before Buck had covered a hundred yards of ground, however, he looked back to see if Mary were still making for the ranch that lay beyond the bluff, and, as he turned his head, he at once became aware that she was in danger.

Two renegade Indians were careering in pursuit of her—ruffians who seemed to spring from nowhere; or so it appeared to Buck, who knew nothing of the party which was lurking in the wood.

They had been ordered by Red Eagle to seize Mary, and they were gaining on her rapidly. Consequently, Buck wheeled around and abandoned his former intention of going to the assistance of the three cowboys in charge of the herd, riding to the rescue of the girl instead.

Never before had he taxed his bronc, Silver, as he did now, and, leaning forward in the saddle, uttering words of encouragement in the pony's ears, he urged the gallant creature over the mesquite at breakneck speed to take up the chase of the renegades who sought to secure Mary Grayson.

He had not gone far when he realised that he himself had been marked down for pursuit—by two more renegade Indians who suddenly debouched from that wood where, if Buck had only known it, the band of braves under Red Eagle's command were lying in concealment.

Menaced as he was by these unexpected foes, the big Ranger concentrated his attention on the pair of rogues who were striving to overtake Mary, and, though they were making up on her, their horses were no match for Silver. Therefore, Buck was soon abreast of the hindmost of the girl's pursuers, and with a powerful back-handed blow he knocked the fellow clean off his mustang's back.

With a hoarse cry the Redskin plunged to the dust, and the shout that broke from his lips as he fell caused his accomplice to look round sharply. In another instant the latter was tugging out a six-gun, and, still riding at top pace, he tried to drill Buck through the body at point-blank range.

Luckily the white man was within reach of him ere it was possible for him to draw trigger, and, catching him by the wrist with one hand and gripping him by the throat with the other, he succeeded in unhorsing him—though at the cost of parting company with his own bronc.

Both men crashed to earth, and the gun flew from the renegade's hand. Then, rolling asunder, they picked themselves up and launched a simultaneous attack, the Redskin leaping at his antagonist pantherishly, but meeting an Anglo-Saxon uppercut that grassed him in the twinkling of an eye.

But, in the meantime, the second pair of Indians who had dashed from the cover of the wood were coming up fast, and with savage yells they sprang from their ponies and closed with Buck, to be joined within a few seconds by the brave whom the Ranger had first assailed.

Some distance away, Mary Grayson brought her horse to a standstill and looked back to see her protector battling furiously with his enemies—saw the dust rising from their feet in clouds as they staggered from side to side in their life-and-death struggle. Then, all at once, Buck seemed to wrench himself free with a tremendous effort, and, swinging his fists, he scattered the three renegades who had been grappling with him.

At that same instant, however, Mary detected a movement on the part of the Indian who had gone down from Buck's uppercut a minute before, and a thrill of horror coursed through her as she saw him scramble to his feet and pluck out a wicked-looking knife whose blade glinted sinisterly in the rays of the setting sun.

"Buck!" Mary screamed, and then covered her face with her hands as the murderous Redskin pounced on the white man from behind.

A DRAMA OF TRAIN WRECKERS

A detective finds a murdered man in his room at his hotel, but when he summons the officials the body has vanished. They suggest hallucinations, but next day he is involved in a train wreck and he sees the dead man in the flames. A gripping thriller, starring Edmund Lowe and Constance Cummings

The Body that Disappeared
JOHN HARWOOD staggered up the stairs of his hotel. He was a little sick of Nice and its everlasting gaieties. That night there had been a big Carnival Ball, and trying to get the festive spirit, he had mingled with the crowds in the guise of Mephistopheles. The American knew no one in Nice, and as a result had drowned his sorrows in more wine than was good for him. He wished the dickens that Felton would turn up so they could leave Nice and be on their way to England and eventually Scotland.

Harwood was the European agent of a big American detective agency, and he had gone to Nice for a holiday. Whilst there he had received instructions that his services were required for the unravelling of a jewel theft in Scotland, and that he was to wait there for Felton, the representative of an insurance company. The necklace lost by Lady Morland, who was an American, was of great value, and the insurance company insisted upon sending a representative. As a result Harwood had to hang around Nice.

On reaching his room he had some difficulty in fitting the key into the lock, but managed it at last. He staggered inside and then pulled up in surprise at sight of a weird thing sprawled across a table.

Harwood laughed. He remembered quite clearly where he had seen this person before. It was the man who occupied the next room. Harwood had got his devil's tail jammed in his own door, and had left the doorkey in his suit. The man next door, wearing the guise of a monk with a monstrosity of a cardboard head mask, had opened the door with his own key. Harwood chuckled again because they had had several drinks together until the surging crowds had parted them. Apparently, the monk had come to Harwood's room for a drink, and had fallen into a tipsy sleep.

October 3rd, 1936.

"I'll mix you a corpse reviver," cried Harwood.

There came no answer from the unexpected guest. "Must make it pretty strong," Harwood muttered. "Seems to be out." After a certain amount of trouble he mixed a very strong drink and swayed across the room. "Drink this, old boy." He slapped the man on the shoulder. "Do you a power of good."

There came no response, so Harwood slapped the man a trifle harder, and to his surprise the sleeping man rolled off his chair on to the floor. The grotesque head came off and he found himself staring at a bearded, elderly man, whose cheeks were the colour of chalk. The detective went down on his knees, and the alcoholic fumes were dispelled in a flash when he found the man dead—strangled!

Down to the reception bureau hastened Harwood.

"Look here, my name's Harwood and—"

That was as far as Harwood got, because a hand was laid on his shoulder and he found himself staring at a remarkably attractive girl, who was in travelling clothes with a rug over one arm. She smiled at him.

"I've been looking for you—I'm Felton."

"Good heavens, I thought Felton was a man." Then he saw the manager coming out of his office and remembered. "M'sieur, a word with you," he called. The fat manager bowed, beamed and hastened forward. "There's a dead man in my room. I think he's been murdered!"

The pretty girl gasped and the manager muttered "Mon Dieu!" whilst a reception-clerk, who thought the American gentleman was joking, tittered.

At any rate, Harwood finally convinced everyone that there was a strangled man in his room, and a rush was made upstairs. The detective clutched at a chair when he found his room empty—the body had gone!

Naturally, everyone thought John Harwood was suffering from delusions or strong drink. The manager was quite cross, and Harwood was not pleased with the mocking laughter of Miss Caryl Fenton.

"I tell you I saw a man sprawled in that chair," he told her when the irate manager and his staff had departed. "and that when I slapped him he fell on the floor—dead—strangled. I know I've had quite enough to drink, but I don't care if I live to be a hundred I shall always swear I saw a dead body lying just there." He pointed dramatically.

"May I remind you that you had orders to leave Nice immediately I arrived," said the girl. "And that tonight we've got to be on our way across Europe towards England. Have you forgotten all about Lady Morland's necklace?"

"No, I have not."

"We must leave by the midnight Continental Express," Miss Fenton addressed him as if he were a child. "Kindly come out of your trance and start packing, because the train leaves in exactly half an hour. You can sleep this off in the train."

It was a reluctant and bewildered John Harwood that boarded the Continental Express. He was now in that state when he was almost sure he had seen a body, but just the slightest bit doubtful that it might have been the result of too many drinks.

The Train Smash

HARWOOD had been ready to leave at a moment's notice and had bought tickets. Naturally, he had got a double sleeper, thinking Fenton was a man, and as a result of the train being full had to repose on luggage in a corridor, whilst his companion slumbered in the luxurious sleeper. Harwood decided that life was very hard, especially as the train rattled and bumped in a manner that made sleep almost impossible.

At last Harwood managed to doze off, and it seemed that he had scarce closed his eyes when he had a rude awakening. First his head hit a wall, then his body seemed to come off the floor to crash against the roof, then he was twisted like a ball and hurled violently to the floor. Vaguely Harwood wondered whether this was some dread nightmare. The sound of splintering wood, breaking glass, terrific crashings and agonised screaming made him realise at last the train was off the lines.

Next sensation was sinking and having a vague conception of the whole coach crumbling up, then his head hit something and everything went black.

When Harwood opened his eyes he was in a place that was not heaven. Everything was red and leaping. His vision cleared and he realised these were flames. The express had crashed at sixty miles an hour and the coach was a blazing wreck. He did not know that his face was blackened, his forehead streaming blood from flying glass, and that his clothes were in tatters, but he did know he was alive, and if he wished to survive he must get out quick. It was as he moved towards a broken window that he saw the body.

Half protruding from a wrecked seat was the body of a bearded man. It was the dead man that he had seen in his room. Suddenly leaping flames began to roar and crackle close to the body. Fascinated, Harwood crawled forward. The man had been dead some time. The shrewd eyes of the detective were quick to note the dangling sleeve and stiff, blood-stained shirt cuff. There was writing on the cuff—an address. Harwood ripped off the cuff, and as the flames blazed up darted for the window.

Harwood got clear in the nick of time. The coach became a blazing mass. He rolled down a slight slope and was helped to his feet by someone. Vaguely he heard that the express had been deliberately derailed and that it was feared many had perished. He could find out nothing about Miss Fenton, though a rescue worker informed him that a number of the passengers had been conducted to a near-by convent. He was so badly battered and bruised that it was an effort to limp the quarter of a mile to the convent.

A nun admitted him and led him to the cloisters. Here temporary beds had been fitted up for the wounded and hurt. Nowhere was there any sign of the girl, until a Sister in white robes told him in broken English that an American young lady was in the library.

It was Fenton and he was intensely relieved. The girl gave a cry of joy at sight of him. She had feared he had been killed or burnt. She had not been hurt, but had been knocked silly, and had woken up in this convent. Harwood shook her hand warmly, and did not notice the clean-shaven, elderly man seated at a table.

Harwood suddenly remembered about his discovery.

"Listen, Miss Fenton," he cried.

"You know what I told you about seeing a body in my room and how you thought I was crazy because I couldn't produce the corpse. Well, I saw the same man on the express."

"What!" The girl was shocked. "And believe me, this is no hallucination," Harwood grinned triumphantly. "It was the same man, and he had been dead some while. The body vanished from my room and was dumped on the express, and, in my humble opinion, the train was derailed because someone wanted to cover the murder. The express was wrecked so the world should think this man was killed in the smash. If only I could get in touch with the police I'd—"

The girl shook his arm and pointed. Startled, Hopwood glanced round and saw the man at the table. The latter smiled and bowed.

"Permit me to introduce myself, m'sieur," he said. "I'm Paul Turbe, Assistant Prefect of the Paris Police. By the irony of fate I was holiday-making in the district, and naturally I have taken charge. I could not fail to hear some of your remarks about a dead body. Perhaps shock, concussion, or—"

"Nothing," Harwood interrupted with a quick sweep of his hand. "I had that same sort of gag tried on me at Nice and I nearly swallowed it. M'sieu Turbe, I am certain the express was wrecked to hide a murder."

With a slightly mocking smile the Assistant Prefect listened to Harwood's tale, and it was obvious to the detective that the great man thought him demented or suffering from the accident.

"You think I'm crackers," shouted the exasperated Harwood. "Well, I'm so crazy I'm willing to wager a grand—that's a thousand dollars—that the man was murdered and that I'll find the murderer. Will you take the bet? But first let me tell you who I am. I'm Harwood of Pinkerton's."

The detective went down on his knees and he knew in a flash that the man was dead—strangled!

"Why look a gift horse in the mouth?" laughed Turbe, with a smile of sympathy for the girl. "Certainly I take your bet."

"Okay!" snapped Harwood. "Now I believe in a straight fight and no trickery. Always start square with your opponent. I'm going to show you clue number one." He fished out the blood-stained cuff. "That I tore from the sleeve of the body before the flames got busy."

The Limping Man

CARYL FENTON began to believe there was something in Harwood's story, and she consented to go with him to Paris to the address that had been on the cuff, but she made the detective promise that if they found nothing there they were to continue their journey at once.

"We'll both get fired if we don't get to Scotland and settle this necklace case of Lady Morland," the girl complained. "Send her a wire," suggested Harwood. "Delayed by train smash—fog in Channel—trouble with passports—anything. I reckon I'm on to something. I've found out the dead man's name was Karl Wagner—his badly burnt body was found and identified. Also, I'm all out to show Mister Paul Turbe that we're not the fools he appears to think. When we get to Paris we go straight to that address on the cuff. I imagine Wagner wrote the address, because he has a bad memory. Axel Hoyt may be the next stepping-stone."

They found that the address in Paris was in a fashionable quarter though quiet. A sleek manservant admitted them, and stated with a bow that Axel Hoyt resided there and asked the nature of their business. Harwood answered vaguely that it concerned a personal friend of his master. They were admitted to a large room. At a piano sat a rather curious little man. He was playing and sweeping back his hair in the manner of a genius. He did not cease playing, but with a nod indicated chairs.

The opera selection finished, Axel Hoyt rose to his feet. He was garbed in a black frock coat and his face seemed unnaturally white—keen, dark eyes stared at the visitors. When he walked towards them he limped.

"I have just arrived in Paris," stated Harwood. "And I thought it best to come and see you as I have some bad news about a friend of yours." Hoyt raised his eyebrows. "We were train acquaintances, but there was an unfortunate railway accident and your friend was killed. His name was Karl Wagner."

Harwood thought Hoyt gave a slight start.

"So Karl is dead." Hoyt spoke softly. "I am very sorry to hear that. How did you get my address, m'sieu?"

"It was written on a piece of paper," lied Harwood. "It was found when they searched the body. I happened to be coming to Paris with my wife." He dare not look at Caryl. "And I thought the only thing I could do was to let you know."

"I thank you." Hoyt gave a little bow. "Very kind. I did know Wagner, but it was only a business acquaintanceship. I am sorry to hear about this train smash. Thank you for coming to see me. I knew Wagner not very well, so I feel you have come on rather a fruitless errand, but, all the same, I appreciate the kindness."

Harwood had been glancing round the room. He saw a number of photographs of a racecourse, and as they rose to leave Harwood managed to get a closer view.

"I see you know Buenos Aires racecourse," he remarked. "Nice place."

"I have never been there," Hoyt spoke shortly. "I rent these apartments, and I have not moved the pictures. Good-day, m'sieu! Good-day, madame!"

"I'll wager those pictures of Buenos Aires were his own," whispered Harwood, as they went down the stairs. "He did not want to admit he had been there. Moreover, he was unmoved by the death of Wagner, and said he was sorry to hear about the train smash. I spotted several newspapers that had been flung into a waste-paper basket, and as their front pages talk of nothing else but the disaster, he was bound to have seen about it. Why did he act as if it were news to him?"

"Will you explain why it was necessary to refer to me as your wife?" Caryl demanded.

"I thought you wouldn't mind," Harwood grinned. "I didn't want Hoyt to get suspicious. Caryl, I'm going to break into this place to-night and have a look round."

"You can leave me out," firmly stated the girl. "I've no desire to spend the rest of my life behind bars."

Yet so persuasive was Harwood's tongue that Caryl accompanied him that night when they entered the house by picking the lock of the front door. Harwood explained that he had taken lessons from a crook, whose life he had saved. The house was composed of several flats and Hoyt was on the top floor. They went up the stairs, and with a finger against his lips, the detective signalled for extreme caution. After experimenting with a number of keys and some wire instrument, Harwood managed to open the front door of the flat and they tiptoed inside.

By means of a torch they found their way to the big lounge. The flat seemed extremely quiet and seemed to possess a musty smell. Harwood listened against several doors and could hear no sound. It was two in the morning—awkward if Hoyt were out and returned to find someone busy ransacking the flat. But the beam of light from the torch showed them that Hoyt was not likely to return—the lounge was bare. Harwood flashed the light round—not a stick of furniture.

"They've gone!" came Caryl's hoarse whisper.

"I must have scared the rats," Harwood muttered. "I'll switch on the lights."

The man and girl stared round at the bare, untidy room; dust, bits of shavings, some sacking and a broken plate were all they saw. But a few hours before this room had been crammed with furniture and a grand piano. They had certainly got busy after receiving that visit from Harwood. "Hallo, there's something they couldn't take." Harwood pointed to a clock let into the wall. "I might as well take a look at it."

They were standing there admiring the clock when Harwood decided to open the glass door that encased it—something floated to the floor. The door latch was broken and this piece of paper had been used as a wedge.

"Hallo, look at this." The detective unfolded it and held it out so the girl could see. "An invitation to a Guildhall banquet. Our friend Hoyt must have been a big noise to have been invited."

"Look at the date." Caryl pointed. "It's seven years ago."

Harwood put the invitation into a waistcoat pocket. "Hoyt has been here a good many years, the condition of this piece of paper proves that, and yet he runs because I talk about his friend Wagner—that's how the story reads to me."

Harwood walked to the window and flung up the bottom half. Caryl came to his side to lean on the ledge and stare over Paris.

"Somewhere in this city Hoyt is hiding and—"

The detective ducked because something whined past his ear to smash into the wall behind with a dull thud. Before Caryl could ask what was happening, she was seized by strong fingers and flung to the floor.

"Someone shooting at us," hissed Harwood. "Thank heaven whoever it was scored a miss."

Crack! Crack! The hidden gunner got busy when Harwood tried to peep over the window ledge.

"Don't be a fool," screamed Caryl. "Let's get out of here!"

"Humiliating as it may seem, but I see no other way but to crawl." The detective laughed. "That window-sill is pretty low, so keep as flat as you can. Let's crawl!"

They reached the door, and then came the task of reaching up a hand to the door-handle. Caryl was nearest the door, and she managed to reach up to the handle. Scarce had she opened the door than two bullets splintered the woodwork. She did not cry out, and Harwood gave the girl an approving glance. Very slowly they opened the door and wriggled through. With a sigh of relief they got to their feet.

"I think we will leave here before our friends decide to pay us a personal visit." Harwood took her arm. "We will depart at dawn from this unfriendly city and be on our way to England."

"And from there on to Scotland?" asked Caryl.

"No, my dear, not yet. We are going to see the Guildhall," chuckled Harwood. "The fog in the Channel is going to prevent us from having the pleasure of dear Lady Morland's company for another day or two."

The Trail Broadens

THEY crossed the Channel in brilliant sunshine, and Harwood hoped fervently that Lady Morland did not read the weather reports. They had slept on the train and on the boat, so that they did not feel too exhausted when they reached London. Besides, Harwood on a trail was a mass of energy, and it had an inspiring effect on Caryl Fenton. Not till the afternoon did they manage to get into the Guildhall.

A guide showed them round, and in a droning voice rattled off a long monologue upon the history of the Guildhall and of the many events that had happened beneath its marvellous roof. There were forty or fifty people, mostly Americans, being shown round, and Caryl marvelled at the absurd questions asked by some people. A nudge in the ribs made her glance at the detective.

"According to this guide book we shall shortly be shown into the banquet hall, and round the walls are huge photographs of the dinners that have taken place here. I want a good look at those pictures." Harwood indicated the crowd. "Just memorise some of those daft questions that are being asked, because I may want you to delay the guide as long as possible by those pictures. How many people sat down to dine? Did they have roast turkey on the menu—what did the Lord Mayor wear? Who sat on his right, and why? You should do this fine."

"Thanks for the compliment," Caryl said a trifle crisply.

"And don't shoot your questions till I tip you off," he added. "It's that 1929 picture I want to see most."

Harwood succeeded, through the clever work of Caryl, in getting a good look at the picture of the 1929 Lord Mayor's banquet through a magnifying glass, and his eyes opened wide when he located Hoyt almost at once. Unfortunately the light near the picture was not very good. When the party were shown into a library, Caryl went all hot and cold because Harwood was not with them. What was that crazy idiot up to now?

The guide was now getting to the end of his tale, and come to the part that made him speak with fervour. He might not get a pension, and would be very grateful for any trifling reward the visitors might care to make him—a doctor had warned him that so much talking was straining his vocal cords.

A hoarse cough caused many to fumble in their pockets. And the callous Caryl would ask questions at a moment like this. She smiled contentedly when Harwood appeared from nowhere, but she did not fail to observe the bulge in his coat. They had booked rooms in a large hotel, and in the privacy of his room they had leisure to study the picture of the 1929 banquet which Harwood had stolen from the Guildhall by cutting it out of its frame.

"See, there is Hoyt!" Harwood was peering through the glass. "No mistaking him. See that bearded man quite close to him—that, my sweet, is Wagner. Now it seems to me that there are three others in whom we must take an interest. One is the woman between Hoyt and Wagner, and the other two are the men opposite."

"Why?"

"They look like a group," was his explanation. "I get the impression they were not aware the picture was going to be taken and were discussing some matter. The five seem to be interested in the one of their party doing the talking—that being the guy of whom we can only see the back of his head. The only outstanding feature there is the hand with the cigar."

"The hand is by the ear, and I should say he appreciates a cigar. It is a sort of attitude adopted by a man who wishes to swank about being able to afford expensive cigars. A characteristic gesture, but not very helpful to us. On his left is a woman, who has edged her chair away and is turning to people farther up the table, and so I rule her out of the party. On his right is a man, and as he has turned his head we get a part of the face. I'm going to have special enlargements made."

"What do you propose to do after that?" asked Caryl. "We've got to go to Scotland some time."

Harwood scratched his head with a pencil.

"I have an idea." Caryl pointed to the woman between Hoyt and Wagner. "I know a woman who dresses Society for Court functions, and she is quite discreet. The gown worn by the woman is very distinctive and cost a lot of money. My friend might be able to tell me who designed it, and that might lead us to the establishment which sold the dress."

Caryl's idea proved fruitful. Her friend had a marvellous memory for fashionable designs. She had herself brought out a model like this, and had been incensed because another firm had dared to copy the design.

The firm was still in existence. Off went the sleuths and interviewed a madame, who surrendered to that charming Harwood smile and informed them that the lady was still a client of hers, and that her name was Miss Elizabeth Wentworth and the address: Wentworth Hall, Buckley, Hampshire.

Harwood and Caryl caught the six o'clock train from Waterloo, and their destination was Buckley. They went to the local inn, as Harwood said that innkeepers always knew everything about the locals. They ordered a drink, and Caryl was about to ask Harwood when he proposed to start asking questions, when he took her by the arm and led her to a dart board.

The first two darts stuck in the board, but the third he cast in another direction. It pierced a poster, and Caryl gave a little gasp. The poster proclaimed that that evening, at the mission hall, a whist drive was being held to raise funds for the "Pilgrims of Peace." The vicar would preside. Miss Elizabeth Wentworth, the secretary of the organisation, had her name at the bottom of the poster, and it was through her name that Harwood had flung the dart.

The Whist Drive

HARWOOD drained his glass of beer and announced that he proposed to compete in the whist drive.

Caryl drained her half-pint and spluttered that she was the worst card-player in the world.

"Impossible!" cried Harwood. "At any rate, we'll go to the slaughter together."

"But you'll find the losing lady goes down and the losing man moves up," laughed Caryl. "And what do you propose to do at the whist drive?"

"Take a look at Lizzy and see what I think of her," chuckled the detective. "I shall connive some way to get to the same table, whereupon I intend to whisper something about Hoyt and see what effect it has on her."

They arrived at the mission hall, and the whist drive was preceded by a short service. Harwood nudged Caryl. "See the platform," he said in a stage whisper. "See the woman with the smart clothes and the fox fur—that's Miss Lizzy Wentworth. Also take a good look at the man on the right of the vicar." He glanced across at a poster on the wall. "That, I imagine, is Sir Charles Webber, the President of the 'Pilgrims of Peace'; and when he turns his head you will notice the likeness to the man opposite Hoyt at the banquet."

"You're right," came her excited whisper.

"Of course we may be on a blind trail, and they may be quite innocent; but I have a hunch they're all mixed up in this game. At any rate, I may be able to tell you more after I have played whist with Miss Wentworth." He gave a quiet chuckle. "I bet old Turbe gets a surprise this evening. He should have got by air mail my clue number two, which is the picture of the Guildhall banquet, and, just to help the poor fellow, I put a tick against Hoyt, Wagner, and Miss Wentworth. I could make good use of that thousand dollars."

"In what way?"

"I might get married," blandly answered Harwood.

"You'd want more than a thousand bucks to persuade any girl to marry you!" scoffed Caryl. "Hallo, what's that bell for?"

"A few words from the dear vicar," whispered Harwood. "And a nod or so from the patrons on the platform."

As far as the two sleuths could gather, the purpose of the "Pilgrims of Peace" was to prevent war at all cost, and funds were required to send a missionary ship that would go round the world trying to persuade belligerent nations to vote at the next League of Nations' conference for world peace. The cause seemed good but quite hopeless to Harwood's idea, but everyone present seemed most enthusiastic. Sir Charles Webber strutted to the front of the platform and said, with chest well stuck out, that he was delighted to see these good people here. Miss Elizabeth Wentworth, in a tired, drawl—ing voice, spoke of the cause, and mentioned a number of distinguished names—people interested in the cause. She smiled and added that any contribution would be welcome. The vicar announced that his curate would be pleased to receive any cheques or contributions at the platform. From the background a thin-faced man with a very pious expression shuffled forward and said a few words in a rather high-pitched voice.

Harwood looked at Caryl.

"Ever seen him before?"

"He does seem familiar somehow," Caryl wrinkled her delightful nose. "He looks very religious."

"Crooks often do," muttered the detective. "You try and think of someone who walks with a limp. Hallo, there goes the bell. Seconds out of the ring. Here's to the first round."

Caryl found the whist drive a most trying affair. She was soon separated from Harwood, who seemed to lose every hand. Actually, the vicar was an expert card manipulator, and twice in his eagerness to get moved in the direction of Miss Wentworth, he dealt one of his opponents a hand that contained thirteen hearts—they were trumps. Of course, it was his luck that Miss Wentworth should start at Table 18 and Harwood at 6. It was not till almost the end of the evening that he saw his prey move to Table 15—they were opponents at the same table.

There was still a lot of skirmishing going on at other tables, so the four at No. 15 waited till the clamour died down. Harwood was busy with the cards. He smiled at Miss Wentworth.

"You don't remember me, Miss Wentworth?"

She gave him a puzzled glance.

"I'm sorry, but—"

"It was at the Guildhall banquet seven years ago." His eyes watched her closely. "I was at the next table."

The beautiful Miss Wentworth gave him a very close scrutiny.

"I feel sure you've made a mistake." She spoke in slightly bored tones. "I did attend a banquet, but I don't remember when it was."

"One nine two nine," promptly replied Harwood. "I remember it so well because you were sitting next to a man I knew quite well. Nice man, Axel Hoyt." Now the woman could not check her unmistakable start, but Harwood went on as if he had seen nothing. "I've been abroad for years, but the other day I happened to be in Paris. What a surprise I got to see Hoyt again. I didn't speak to him, but—"

"You are quite mistaken," Miss Wentworth spoke coldly. "Axel Hoyt died three years ago. Would you stop shuffling the cards—you're holding up the game."

Harwood dealt and talked. "I would have sworn it was Hoyt."

"Hoyt is buried in Buckley," the woman said in a cold, rebuking tone of voice. "You can see his grave there if you don't believe me."

Harwood apologised humbly for his mistake and gave so little attention to the game that he trumped his partner's act. What the elderly spinster called the detective is nobody's business—even the vicar was shocked.

When the whist drive was over Miss Wentworth went over to speak with Sir Charles Webber, and they had not been chatting many moments when the curate limped over to them. Harwood, who was sampling a most appalling cup of cocoa, happened to glance across, and it did not surprise him to find three pairs of eyes studying him closely.

"Sweetheart, the plot thickens." He spoke out of the corner of his mouth. "I'm not your sweetheart," snapped Caryl. "What's the next move, Bonehead?"

"We stay the night at the village inn, before breakfast we visit the churchyard to see if a certain lady is telling the truth, and after that a visit to the registry of births and deaths, where I expect to do a lot of expert lying to obtain the information I require."

"And I suppose I have to assist, big boy?" She laughed mockingly. "One more day's delay. If we don't both get sacked it will be a miracle."

Harwood's parcel had reached Paul Turbe in Paris. The Assistant Prefect studied the photograph and smiled at the detective's note that this was Clue No. 2, and that as the mystery was almost solved, it would be a good idea if he saw that there were sufficient funds to pay out a cheque for a thousand dollars. Turbe looked at the cardboard cylinder in which the picture had been sent, and it was plain to see that it had been posted at Buckley.

A Second Death

SURE enough they found Hoyt's grave, and Harwood told Caryl that the Buckley Registry office might supply the next link. The girl gazed at the American with incredulous eyes as he talked to the kindly little registrar. They had been married a year and they wanted to call their first child after his wife's uncle, Axel Hoyt. They were faced with a difficulty, as they wanted to use Hoyt's middle name, which was Aloysius, and they were not sure of the spelling. There was much argument in his wife's family over the matter, and as far as Harwood could see, the death certificate was the only means of deciding the matter. How he got the tale over Caryl can never understand, but he succeeded and discovered that Dr. Evans, who lived locally, had attended the supposed death.

It was a bad blow on arrival at Evans' house to learn from his housekeeper that the doctor had received an urgent summons by telegram to a patient in a neighbouring town. The good woman mentioned that he had caught the 9.45, and politely closed the door.

"The train has just left," remarked Harwood, looking at his wrist watch. "But if we hop across the road to that garage we may succeed in hiring a car that will get us there almost as soon. If we can make the station before Evans we'll be in luck."

"Why?"

"My dear Caryl, you ask too many awkward questions," Harwood grinned. "What I shall say to Evans when I locate him I shall try to figure out during the car trip. First let us obtain a car. Come on!"

They succeeded in hiring a powerful open two-seater of a somewhat ancient type. It rattled and shook, and when doing sixty threatened to break up. They had secured a map from the garage, which Caryl spread out on her knees.

"According to this map," the girl said, after they had gone a considerable distance. "We are now within four miles of Ramley, and very shortly we cross the railway line. Then there seems to be a mile beside the railway, and then, for some comic reason, the road again crosses the track."

They reached a level-crossing as the man in charge was about to shut the gates, but their violent honking kept them open. As they flashed past the man shouted something about deserving to get killed. A minute or so later, hearing a train, they glanced back.

"That's the 9.45," cried Harwood.

"Our man's on that train."

"It's a straight stretch and the train's catching up," shouted Caryl. "We can't beat it to the next crossing."

"We can try!" Grimly Harwood bent over the wheel.

It was a hard race, in which Harwood had to admit himself beaten. The train had gained the lead.

"Look!" shouted Caryl, as they came into a straight stretch. "Look at that lorry!"

Even as they watched, a lorry crashed through the gates and stopped right across the line. They saw a man get out and run for dear life. Appalled, they glanced back. A screeching of brakes denoted that the engine driver was applying his brakes, but the speed was too great.

The engine hit the lorry with a crash. The level-crossing was at an embankment and the engine left the line, swiped off part of a signal-box and crashed down an embankment, carrying the three coaches and guard's van with it. There came the sounds of terrific smashings as the coaches were telescoped.

An hour later, Caryl and Harwood were at the Three Feathers Inn, which was situated a quarter of a mile from the scene of the disaster and about a mile from Ramley. The local train had not been carrying many passengers, but the engine-driver and four passengers were dead, with five passengers gravely injured. Harwood was sunk in gloom because Dr. Evans had been in the first coach and was one of the dead.

The Squire of Ramley, who was the Chief Constable of the district, a sergeant, and two policemen had arrived at the inn, and Harwood had made a frank statement of what he had seen.

"It was a deliberate train wreck!" he cried. "That lorry was timed to crash through those gates in order to derail the train. I am a detective, and there was a Dr. Evans on that train with whom I wanted to talk; someone wrecked the train to prevent me speaking to him."

"Rather a sweeping statement!" cried the Chief Constable. "These sort of things don't happen in England."

"Well, it happened to-day!" rasped Harwood. "Do you remember the Continental Express from Nice to Paris that was derailed a few days ago? I see you read about it. As part of the rail had been removed, it is known the train was wrecked for some sinister purpose. Well, I think the same man or gang engineered this disaster."

"I think you're quite right," said a voice that made Harwood and the girl turn round eagerly.

It was Paul Turbe, the Assistant Prefect of Paris.

"What are you doing here?"

"So far, I have been one move behind you, Harwood." Turbe gave a grim smile. "And, frankly, I think that now I have drawn level. I confess I thought your tale about the Continental being deliberately wrecked a lot of nonsense, but I soon found out you were right. I started investigations on my own account, and I must say your picture of the Guildhall banquet was of great value. I was at Burley late last night, but I went to Ramley Station to meet Evans—the wrecker was one move ahead of me."

Harwood introduced the Chief Constable to the Assistant Prefect and the sergeant. The Chief Constable was astounded to hear that it was a case of train wrecking.

"A fiendish murder!" the Constable cried. "Scotland Yard must know of this!"

Paul Turbe beckoned to Harwood to come to one side.

"I have gone over the ground with a fine toothcomb, and frankly I think it is only a matter of hours before I get my man," Turbe smiled. "And your thousand dollars. Now you have played fair by me in giving me two very valuable clues, so I think it right that I should give you a helping hand. On that cuff that you took from the body of Wagner there was not only that address in Paris, but part of a cuff-link." From his pocket he produced the link. "You will observe the rather peculiar palm-leaf design." He fumbled again. "There was nothing on the body of Dr. Evans that was of any assistance, but his cuff-link might interest you. Please note that it is identically the same as that found on Wagner. I made a lot out of these cuff-links—they should help you."

When Turbe had gone Harwood thought for a few minutes, then he hastened to have a few words with the landlord. He returned to Caryl.

"I've just asked the landlord to get through to Buenos Aires Police Department for me. I'm going to have a talk to my friend Mulligan." He laughed. "The whole village is agog because I happen to be phoning someone thousands of miles from here."

"Have you solved the cuff-link clue?" asked Caryl.

"No," he admitted, and frowned. "But these palm-leaves are strangely familiar. I know I've seen them recently, and—" Suddenly he dived his hand into his pocket and pulled out a crumpled handbill. "By gosh, I've got it! Look, Caryl!"

It was the handbill of the whist drive promoted by the Pilgrims of Peace. Their emblem was identically the same—a crossed palm-branch.

By some miracle the landlord got the telephone call to Buenos Aires through under an hour, and from Mulligan the detective got information that seemed to explain almost everything.

"Mulligan knew all about Hoyt, whom he is sure is not dead," Harwood told Caryl. "Hoyt made South America pretty warm for him by his gun-running and smuggling. There is a small war going on there at the moment, and they have been tipped off that a bunch of international crooks—of whom Hoyt is one—are thought to be scheming to get arms into the country. This missionary campaign is just a fake to cover their latest gun-running activity. One old dame, with whom I played cards with at the drive, told me of the wonderful work done by the mission, and she told me that they had headquarters in London, where they exhibited in a museum all the terrible weapons of war that the Pilgrims were fighting against. Sweetheart, the old car is taking us to London."

"And what shall I tell Lady Morland?" she inquired sweetly.

"I think you'd better have suspected appendicitis," decided Harwood. "That should stall her."

The Pilgrims of Peace

THEY journeyed to London without incident, and soon discovered the headquarters and museum of the Pilgrims of Peace. Harwood gave Caryl a significant glance when they observed the awning outside the building and the plush carpet. From posters outside the detective learnt that the mission ship, John Murdoch, was at Bordeaux, and would be sailing on the Crusade within the next few days.

"I suppose all this business here is to pull wool over the eyes of the police and to fleece the public for more funds," Harwood said with a sneer. "Let's take a look at their museum."

The place was crowded with people, and everywhere the two went they heard people talking in praise of the noble work that was being done by the Pilgrims. There were a great number of exhibits in glass cases: Bombs, rifle-grenades, aerial torpedoes, trench-mortar shells, smoke shells, gas shells, a howitzer, a field-gun, many types of machine-guns, rifles from all over the world, revolvers, swords and daggers. There were pictures of mine-craters in the No Man's Land of the Great War, and a great number of gruesome war scenes. Besides the war, they showed scenes of the carnage in Abyssinia and Spain.

"Sort of Chamber of Horrors," hissed Harwood. "And don't some of these goody-goody folk wallow in it. Ah, refreshment!" A big man with a scarred face and tray of glasses approached and tendered them a cocktail. "I bet this is pretty poisonous." He glanced after the man. "That fellow seemed to be very interested in us."

"Well, you would walk into this hornet's nest. How peaceful Scotland must be."

"Nonsense!" scoffed the detective. "You're revelling in the excitement. There's a platform over there—let's go and hear what rubbish they're talking."

They mingled with the crowd, and Harwood grinned when he observed on the platform Miss Elizabeth Wentworth, Sir Charles Webber, and Hoyt. The last-named was wearing the garb of a priest. Sir Charles announced that it was wonderful to have this send-off from so many well-wishers.

It would be the work of the mission to bear the palm branch of peace to every country. Loud cheering. With a wave of his hand he indicated the people on the platform. Within a very few minutes they would be leaving here to catch a boat train at Victoria, and it might be many months before they would be fortunate enough to see England again.

Their mission would not be an easy one, and he trusted that the adherents at home would work to keep the cause going and to help with funds. If an appeal for money should be necessary. More cheering. This was followed by a prayer and a psalm; whereupon Sir Charles indicated that it was time for all good people to go home, as they had their train to catch.

People began to leave, but Harwood hung around because he did not want to miss anything. A queer kind of fellow came up to the detective and began to recite some poem about the John Murdoch, and, when he tried to push the fellow to one side, another apparently half-witted youth appeared and began to talk a lot of nonsense.

"Will you kindly stand to one side?" growled Harwood, and blinked to find three large men that were between him and the exit. Moreover, Caryl had been separated from him, and he could not see her anywhere. The waiter who had served the cocktails appeared with two more men dressed as servants. They crowded round Harwood, and all talked loudly. The detective knew that they were trying to keep him a prisoner; he was in a nasty jam.

Behind him was a table, and on it a few cocktails that had not been finished.

"I'll take a drink before I go!" Harwood cried, and made for the table. Still jabbering, the men surged after him.

The reciter was in the lead, and Harwood stared at the fellow's pointed chin speculatively. Pongk! His left lifted the surprised fellow clean off his feet. That stopped the jabbering. With angry shouts the men rushed at Harwood, who, floored a couple before leaping over the table.

From behind a case appeared Caryl Fenton. She had realised that an attempt was being made to separate them. She had gone with the crowd, and then doubled back when no one was watching. How could she help John to fight all those horrible men?

Harwood was strong, and he swung up a big chair as if it were a stick. The toughs covered down, not desiring to get hit. Crouching, they began to edge nearer their victim. It was then that the wildly despairing gaze of the girl saw the glass case containing a number of Mills' bombs and the notice that these bombs were alive. Crash! With her handbag she had smashed the glass.

"I'll blow you all to bits if you move an inch!" she screamed.

Harwood hurled the chair at the men and bounded to her side to take the bomb from her hand.

"Folk, I have now removed the pin!" he shouted. "I believe three seconds is the time that this pretty toy takes before it explodes." All the while his fingers were pushing the pin back. Now he swung back his arm. "One—two—catch!" He flung it.

Those toughs had not waited. In a mob they scuttled like scared rabbits towards the back of the hall.

"Come on, sweetheart!" Harwood caught the girl's hand. "We've got a train to catch."

They arrived at Victoria with three minutes to spare. Harwood pushed everyone away from the booking-office and secured his tickets. A wild rush towards the train, for the guard had blown his whistle. A first-class carriage door swung open, and as the train began to move Harwood bundled the girl inside. They sank panting into seats.

There was one other passenger, who October 3rd, 1936.

seemed engrossed in his paper. A rustle and the paper was lowered.

"I thought you were going to miss the train!" laughed Paul Turbe.

The Tunnel

PAUL TURBE laughed at their surprise.

"I told you, Harwood, I was gaining on you." He laughed heartily. "I might almost say I was a move ahead. Smart work to solve that link clue. I presume you've found out the real work of the Pilgrims of Peace?"

"I have." Harwood mopped his brow. "They did their best to detain us at their museum, but we managed to escape."

"I thought you might have trouble, but I felt certain you would make this train." The Assistant Prefect pulled back the sliding door. "If you put your head outside, you will observe two men at either end of the corridor." Harwood followed the suggestion and saw the men. "Those are detectives from Scotland Yard."

"What are you planning?" Harwood asked as he sank back into his seat.

"To rope in the whole gang," Turbe puffed at his cigar. "This train is a special for the Pilgrims of Peace, so that the whole of the gun-runners are with us. Only this coach is empty—I had it put on for the benefit of Scotland Yard, Mr. Harwood of Pinkertons, and for myself. Mr. Harwood, I am willing to wave aside the bet that we made, because I think we should work together. There is a big reward for the arrest of these people, and we can share that reward."

"As we seem about all square, at the moment, I'm game," answered Harwood. "Though I think I have a lot of information about which you know very little, but as you no doubt have warrants for the arrest of these Pilgrims, I think it would be best for me to accept your offer."

Paul Turbe listened with a thoughtful air to Harwood's story, and added bits of information that he himself thought helped to link up the whole mystery. He commended Caryl on her bravery.

"Sir Charles, Miss Wentworth, and Hoyt are now in the dining-car." Turbe looked thoughtfully at his cigar. "Why not arrest them on the train? Supposing I go to my table that is near them, and you go and confront them. I can hear everything, and the Scotland Yard men will be handy should trouble arise. When you think the moment has come for the arrest, light a cigarette and I'll leave the car to give the detectives their orders."

The scheme was discussed and approved. Paul Turbe lit a fresh cigar and went along to the dining-car. A few minutes later Caryl and Harwood followed. At a table sat the three conspirators and what a shock they had when Harwood smiled at them. Calmly he pulled up a chair for Caryl and then took the vacant chair next to Miss Wentworth.

"A very pleasant evening," Harwood beamed at them. "I trust you Pilgrims are all in the best of health?"

"What the dickens do you mean by this intrusion?" rasped Sir Charles Webber. The woman and the priest eyed the detective covertly.

"The game is up," answered Harwood. "The Pilgrims of Peace are finished. You're gun-runners." He saw their startled glances. "Now, don't get nasty and try any of that rough stuff you tried to hand out at your headquarters, because this time I have protection."

"You must be out of your mind!" stuttered Sir Charles.

"Wagner was in with you all at one time, but either he knew too much or was diffident, and so you bumped him off," Harwood told them. "Unfortunately you killed him in my room at an hotel in Nice. The body then vanished, and the Nice-Paris express was wrecked—the body appeared in the wreckage."

"In fact, the train had been wrecked to hide the murder. Being a detective I was annoyed, and decided to find out what it was all about, and the trail led me to Paris to the house of M'sieu Axel Hoyt. There I heard a lot of lies, and when I made my next call I found Hoyt had flown."

"Someone then tried to shoot this lady here and myself, but we disappointed this somewhat poor gunman. To cut the story short, my trail led me to Miss Wentworth and you, Sir Charles. Miss Wentworth informed me Hoyt was dead, and there he was standing on the platform."

Playtime Over

IN the offices of Thomas & Thomas, solicitors, on the thirty-sixth floor of the Empire Building in New York City, Lawrence Thomas, senior, was awaiting the arrival of Lawrence Thomas, junior. It was already ten o'clock, and a fine summer's morning—but Thomas senior was in a fine winter's temper. He rang his desk bell impatiently for the third time since his arrival.

"My son here yet?" he demanded of the tall lady who answered the summons.

"Just coming in, sir," she told him. "He won't be a minute."

"What's he doing?"
"Washing his hands, sir. He drove here, and, while putting away his car in the garage—"

"All right, all right! No more excuses! Send him to me at once, washed or unwashed!"

Three minutes later "Larry" Thomas appeared. He was tall, good-looking, and a trifle pale. He hadn't been to bed all night, and had quickly slipped out of evening dress whilst the lady secretary had been keeping his irate father in conversation. He came along breezily to the old man's desk.

"Morning, dad! Lovely morning, what?"

"Haven't had time to notice," growled Thomas, senior, glancing up from his letters. At once he perceived that Larry, despite the lounge suit, was still wearing a white dress tie and wing collar. "Going to a funeral?"

"No, dad."

Old Thomas thumped his desk. "Yes, you are! You're attending your own! From this moment the firm of Thomas & Thomas comes to an end. It reverts to its original style of Lawrence Thomas—me! You're fired!"

"But, dad, you can't do that—"
"I've done it! I've stood your slack ways quite long enough. You don't realise what work is. But you're going to. I've fixed you up at Harrison's, as Deputy District Attorney."

"Gee, dad, I'm not suited for sleuthing!"

"You'll have to show your mettle, Larry. No more bottle parties and girl-hunting. Take this letter; put on another tie and collar and your hat, and go straight along to Harrison. He's expecting you."

Larry saw that the old lad meant it. "Okay, dad. And if I make good—"

"Learn discipline, responsibility and punctuality, and—you'll come back here. Good-morning!"

Larry was interviewing Lawyer Thomas Harrison, District Attorney, half an hour later. A fine, upstanding old gentleman with a fierce grey moustache and beetling eyebrows. He stood up when Larry entered, fluttering Thomas senior's letter in his large, capable hand.

"Don't sit, Larry—I'm busy, and you're going to be busy. Assistant District Attorney means you'll do most of the work. Now then, we're in a jam. Can't bring anything off. Every time we make a raid on some suspected place everything's clear."

"Leakage, sir."
"And maybe the leakage is in this office." Harrison's moustache bristled with indignation. "But where? Who? All my staff seem above suspicion." He pressed the bell-button on his desk. "I'm putting you in charge of the investigation department." An office-boy appeared at the door. "Ask Mr. Hill to come here."

A shortish, well-groomed, sleek man entered a few moments later. Full-faced, small moustache, light blue eyes.

"Oh, Arthur, this is Lawrence Thomas, junior! Larry—meet Mr. Arthur Hill." Harrison presented the two young men.

He put down old Thomas' letter. "Arthur, I'm giving you full charge of this office. Larry will relieve you of investigation—"

Hill broke in: "But I've got that all properly wired!"

"You can show Larry the scheme you have in mind. Something has got to be done—we're the laughing stock of all the newspapers."

Hill's face was a study. "I was counting on—" He broke off. "Of course, it's up to you, Mr. Harrison."

"I want you here, Arthur," his chief told him. "You're the experienced man. The Parole Board have had another request for the release of Fred Cole. The application was meant to fail, I think. But it shows activity in the wrong quarters. Take Thomas along to your room and get busy, both of you."

The rest of the day was spent in Hill's sanctum, where Larry was shown the routine work and given lists of places and persons under suspicion of the police. Hill showed him a Press-cutting album of prosecutions.

"We don't seem to have scored many convictions," Larry offered.

"These crime guys have cute lawyers to defend them," Hill answered. "They don't mind what they pay a smart counsel. Arnold Crane's one of their pets—he can talk a jury into believing black's white."

"I'd like to know him," Larry grinned. "Useful sort of fellow."

At the Dover Club

THAT night Larry called in at the news-room of New York's brightest evening paper. A girl with fair, curly hair and demure eyes was tapping a typewriter at the end desk.

"Hallo!" she greeted. "Can't stop to chatter!"

"Hallo yourself." Larry took off his hat, to lounge against a filing-cabinet. "How's Kitten?"

"She's Kit—in office hours."

"Kit, will you go places with me to-night? To the Dover Club?"

"I went places with you last night, Larry. And I don't like the Dover. It's a notorious place."

"I'm going to be notorious," grinned Larry. "Listen. I'm Assistant District Attorney to old Tom Harrison."

"Gosh!" Kit stopped typing. "Did your dad do this to you?"

"He did. But it's not news, as yet." He asked again: "One last fling, Kit? Come to the Dover with me?"

"Call for me at eleven," she agreed. "But we won't stay late."

Eleven-thirty that evening found them in evening dress handing in hats and coats to Annette, the "check" girl at the bureau of the Dover Club.

"It's Mr. Lawrence Thomas, isn't it?" she asked.

Larry laughed.

"Seen my picture in the College Magazine, eh?"

Annette smiled gently.

"Maybe."

Kit didn't like this.

"Let's go, Larry," she whispered.

But a half-tipsy fellow in a light coat and a felt hat had followed them up. He buttonholed Larry as he turned.

"Hallo, hallo! What brings hishter Larry here?"

"Mister Larry's feet," came the quick answer.

"Introduce me, Kit," gurgled the fellow.

"This is Al Wilson, radio announcer." Kit stated, not too cheerfully. "He does the Society gossip column for us."

Wilson ambled off. A pleasant-looking aristocratic man of about fifty came along to the hat-and-coat counter, smiling at Annette. His hand brushed against Larry's shoulder as he took off his hat.

"Sorry!" he cried, at once turning to the young man.

"That's all right," Larry answered.

"It was quite my fault," persisted the pleasant gentleman.

Kit pulled at Larry's arm.

"Come on!"

When they had seated themselves in a darkish corner of the brightly-lit and noisy little club, Kit told Larry:

"That was Arnold Crane, the crook lawyer. I believe he runs this place."

"Crane, eh?" Larry glanced about the dance floor and tables, but the pleasant gentleman had vanished. "I'm told it's Joe Ross who bosses this show."

"Crane puts up the money." Kit shrugged pretty shoulders. "I don't like it here. Let's go somewhere else."

Larry pressed her fingers under cover of the table.

"Don't worry, sister, big brother will take care of you."

He gave orders to the bowing waiter.

Arnold Crane had gone to his private room, where he seated himself at his desk. He read some notes left on his pad, nodding to himself. Then he took up the 'phone and dialed to the office, listened awhile, and put the instrument back. Joe Ross was engaged, for the moment.

Joe was trying to calm down a handsome and very angry young woman. She was glaring at Joe.

"You'll get Fred out of gaol, Joe Ross, or I spill the beans! Get that into your thick skull. I'll show up this joint and its faked roulette outfit! Fred's my man and he's not going to serve seven years for something one of you fellows did. Maybe you!"

October 3rd, 1930.

"See here, Mollie," Ross tried to coax her. "I've been personally to the Parole Board. They won't listen."

"Get Crane to go. He's got to go, see? I'm nigh crazy—I'm desperate!" She suddenly flourished a pistol at him.

As Ross shrank back, she flung the gun noisily on his desk.

"You're not worth powder and shot! I won't waste a minute more with you fellows here. I'll go to the D. A."

She flounced out of the room, slamming the door violently behind her, then hurried across the dance floor, glancing at Larry and Kit, as she passed by their table, with unseeing eyes. She flung herself down on the seat by the telephone call-box.

Ross went round by a back way to Crane's room, to answer Crane's call in person.

Ross told Crane about Mollie, his ugly face full of gloom.

"She swears she'll squeal."

"I'll handle her," Crane answered easily. He lit up a cigar. "I've a spot of news for you, Joe. Arthur has been taken off his job."

"You mean we can't count on Hill any more?"

"I never did count on him," said Crane, puffing rings of blue smoke upwards. "I don't count on anybody, not even you, Joe." He laughed softly and pleasantly.

"Playboy Larry Thomas has got Hill's job. We don't need to worry." He held up a warning hand. "Shut down a moment, someone's at the 'phone." He picked up the instrument on the table, listening-in to the caller in the box outside.

Kit went to the call-box after the dance. She had remembered a mistake in her article for the morning's issue of her paper.

"I'll get the night editor to correct it," she told Larry.

"You only think of your old newspaper, Kit."

He came lazily sauntering after her. He saw her pluck open the door of the box.

Her quick cry brought him at a rush to her side. The huddled body of Mollie Cole had fallen softly outwards at Kit's feet. A crowd gathered round about them. Joe Ross came running out of the private room with Crane at his heels.

"What's the matter?" called Ross, thrusting a way through the horrified crowd. One of the dancers was kneeling by the crumpled-up body. He slowly straightened it, then rose up.

"I'm a doctor—this woman has been shot through the heart. She died on the instant. Does anyone know her?"

"She was in the telephone box."

gaped Kit; her face ashy. "She fell out when I opened the door. There was no shooting."

"You heard no report," the young doctor argued, "because of the noise of the band. And there are such things as silencers. Best call the police, Mr. Ross."

Larry asserted himself.

"I'm Deputy D. A. Lawrence Thomas—no one must leave the hall," he ordered. "See that all exits are covered."

Arnold Crane took Ross by the arm.

"He's right. Suicide, poor thing. I wonder who she is? Put screens round her, Joe. I'm sure we all deeply sympathise with you in this terribly sad affair."

His quiet, unuffled manner had its effect. The dancers went back to their tables; screens were placed around the body; the police came in and carried it away on a covered stretcher. No one had identified Mollie Cole.

Who is She?

NEXT morning, when Larry went into the D. A.'s office, he found old Harrison in a discontented mood.

"Can't congratulate you on the start you've made, Thomas," came his greeting. "What on earth took you to the Dover last night? It is certainly not the place for anyone working in this office."

"Sorry, sir. I didn't think—"

"You've got to think, if you're going to make a success here," Harrison caught him up. "A night club—a notorious night club, and the new Assistant District Attorney dancing there after midnight. Who was the girl with you?"

He flourished the morning paper at Larry, with its flaring headlines.

"New D. A. involved in the Dover mystery."

"Involved," grumbled Harrison, not waiting for any reply from Larry.

"Involved! See what you've done for yourself?"

"I was there with Miss Kit Cathcart. She's on the papers—but I'll swear she didn't put in that stuff."

"How d'you know she didn't? But put all that aside—you've got to clear yourself. Here's a mystery woman shot in a call-box, and nothing to show how, or by whom."

Said Larry:

"It seemed to be just suicide."

"Shot through the heart under the left shoulder-blade. No one could hold a gun that way." Harrison tossed aside the paper. "I'll give you a chance, Thomas, to clear up this case and bring the culprit to justice. If you succeed—well and good. If not, I've no use for you."

Larry went along to Hill's room. There was plenty of sympathy in Hill.

"Rough luck, Thomas!" Hill laid a friendly hand on Larry's arm. "I know what the old man thinks, he's been letting off steam on me. Of course, you oughtn't to be seen at such places as the Dover—but how were you to know?"

A new note of determination showed in Larry's usually careless voice.

"Having got myself in this mess, I'll get myself out."

"What can you do?" Hill asked, shrugging his shoulders.

"Get a search warrant. Comb through that place with a fine comb," Larry answered. "You can give me the necessary order. I'll ring up the police while you get it ready."

"Okay," Hill agreed. "There's a second line in your room."

Larry left Hill busy at his desk writing out an "order for search." He went straight along to his room, but found the 'phone blocked when he tried to ring. Presently he got through.

Half an hour later, Larry and six plain-clothes police were at the Dover. The place looked tawdry enough in the cold daylight. Ross was in his room, studying the morning's paper. He glanced up as Larry entered with the search warrant.

"Wanting me?" he asked.

"I'm from the District Attorney's office," said Larry. "I'm going to look over these premises."

"What for?"

"There was a woman murdered here last night."

Ross took up a cigar, twiddling it between his fat fingers as he studied Larry.

"I remember you now—it's Mr. Thomas." A soapy smile creased the large face as Ross gestured towards the open newspaper. "That kind of thing's most annoying. Look all you like—it's just too bad that girl should pick on us to kill herself." "She was shot in the back," said Larry.

Ross shook his head. "Suicide."

"Did you find a gun?"

"Yes." Ross went to the safe behind him, opened it and took out something wrapped about with a not too clean handkerchief. "One of our charwomen found this when brushing out the call-box. It had slipped under a loose board. The poor girl dropped it, of course."

The police sergeant with Larry took the "exhibit," carefully unwrapping the handkerchief. He sprinkled some chemical powder over the butt of the little gun, and finger-prints showed up. "We'll check these down at the mortuary," said Larry. "Coming with us, Ross?"

"I'll wait here for you."

When they left the shady little club an hour later, Larry went along to the mortuary, where photographs of the dead woman were being taken. She had not been recognised, nor did her finger-prints help to clear up the mystery of her identity, beyond showing the same as those on the gun.

Caught Out

TWO weeks went by. Larry's every attempt to solve the riddle met with failure. The coroner's verdict was an open one.

"If we could only find out who she was," Larry told Hill gloomily. "That's the puzzle—that's where we've got to begin. It's so queer that no one should know her. That gun was no help—one of a thousand others exactly like it. The number on it shows that it was bought at Chicago. And—that's all."

Hill wasn't very cheerful this morning; nor helpful.

"I've got toothache," he growled. "Caught cold or something. And the news don't make you laugh. There's a tough guy broke prison yesterday. Convict named Cole."

"I saw it," Larry told him. "Know anything of him?"

"He's on the files," Hill answered. "Excuse me, Thomas, I got to have something for my tooth."

Larry was poring over the files when Kit came rushing into his room, unannounced.

"Oh, Larry!" she cried. "Just look!"

She dropped a gaily covered cinema magazine on top of his papers. In three-colour process a blonde girl's face smiled at them. Larry stared at the fixed smile; the heavily-shaded eyes; the plucked eyebrows; the marcelled hair; the too marvellous teeth.

"Yes?" he queried, at a loss to understand his little friend's excitement.

"Don't you see? Don't you get it?" Kit grabbed up his pencil and began to shade in the peroxide hair with thick, quick strokes. Deftly she added a line here and there, while Larry watched her with ever-growing interest. Suddenly, the likeness flashed at him.

"Gosh, Kit, it's the girl!"

"Of course it is! I saw this old magazine at a dime store and spotted her at once. It's years and years old, but there's your girl—Mollie Lestrangle. I read up about her in the office 'Who's Who on the Films.' She married a man named Cole. Fred Cole, rather a bad egg—"

"Cole? Why, Kit, that's the convict who got away from Sing-Sing last night!" Larry was as excited now as Kit. "And see here." He lifted the magazine off the office files. "Cole was sent up for seven years for attempted murder. Joe Ross was chief witness against him."

Larry stood up to grab Kit in his arms.

"If you aren't the world's sweetheart, Kit!"

She wriggled free. "The world's too big for little me!"

"I'm going straight to the Dover. Cole will sure make a bee line for Ross," Larry decided.

"Larry, be careful," Kit warned him. "That's a bad place."

"I'll be all right," he answered in his light-hearted way. "I've found out something, Kit—all the honours mustn't go to you. That pistol Ross so conveniently found in the 'phone call-box doesn't fit the bullet the doctor's dug out of poor Mollie."

"I knew it was murder," Kit declared. "But how?"

Larry had got his hat.

"That's the puzzle. But I've an idea—and if I get a chance this morning of a quiet look round at the Dover—" He checked himself, teasing her. "Well, I'll give you a ring."

Kit told him, cheekily: "I wouldn't say 'No' to a ring from you, big boy!"

Larry went down town to the little club. He found the Dover in the hands of the cleaners.

"No one's here," the chief charlady volunteered. "Will you leave a message?"

"I'll wait."

Larry walked across to the call-box, opened the swing door and went inside. While pretending to put through a call, a nickel piece in his hand, his eyes were taking in every detail of the box. A framed notice on the wall stated:

"Local calls five cents."

It was all quite usual, and there was a loose board in the flooring. He stepped out quietly, someone was moving in the room behind the box. Ross had evidently come back—or had he been there all the time?

Larry thrust open the door marked "Private," and strode into the room.

Hill was pacing the floor, his back turned, his shoulders humped. He called as he turned:

"Gosh, Joe, where have you been?"

He saw Larry, and all speech died on his suddenly dry lips. A sickly grin writhed then.

Larry's face grew hard as flint.

"No wonder I couldn't get anywhere!"

"I don't understand—" Hill began, shrinking back. "I—I only looked in here to ask Ross—"

"To tell Ross, you dirty double-crosser!" Larry jumped at him. "Tell him all that's going on at the office. I'll shake the truth out of you!"

He caught Hill by the collar, but the fellow, cornered, struck out with his left at Larry's chin. The blow sent him staggering backward, but he was at Hill in a flash. A regular dog fight followed; Hill, thick-set and desperate, aimed at laying Larry out by any means, fair or foul. They clinched, upsetting the table with a crash; then, on the floor, they hammered away ruthlessly at each other. A heavy paper-weight, which had fallen from the table, was grabbed up by Hill and raised to give Larry a smashing blow on the temple, but the youngster gripped the murderous wrist with fingers like a vice.

For a tense minute they held each other; Hill seeking to batter the life out of Larry—Larry slowly gaining on that upraised arm. With a sudden twist, Larry reversed the position, and, as the paper-weight dropped from nerveless fingers, he had Hill by both wrists.

Larry unthinkingly picked up the revolver as the door was thrust open by Wilson.

The struggle continued but a few moments more. Jerked to his feet, Hill was forced backward over the steel arm of the desk chair and held powerless.

"Let—go!" he gasped brokenly.

Sweat was pouring down his face, his breath was coming and going in gusty sighs. His eyes were half-closed, his cheeks were a pasty, yellowish white.

Larry pulled him into the chair and stuck him there like some grotesque doll. Hill looked as if he was going under.

"It's—it's my heart," wheezed Hill.

"Let—me—be—"

Larry crossed to the filter by the window and drew a glass of water, watching Hill warily.

There was no need—the man was done. He couldn't hold the glass to his blue lips when Larry brought it to him.

"Listen, you cur, you'll give me evidence against the crew who run this place—definite, positive evidence, or I'll hand you over to the police," Larry told him fiercely.

"I—understand, Thomas."

Hill slumped forward as he spoke, falling on his knees. Larry jerked him back into the chair.

"I'll give you twenty-four hours to tell all you know."

Hill didn't even hear the threat—his heart was thumping too noisily in his breast.

Silence reigned in the usually noisy little club. The women, white-faced, cleared up their mops and pails and sidled out.

Hill, painfully recovering his wind, managed to get up and pull the chair to the desk. He gazed hopelessly at the disordered room as he sank into the chair.

Crane and Ross let themselves into the Club, and at once scented something to be wrong. They crossed sharply to Ross' room, but all seemed in order there. They came back to the dance floor, then a moan from Hill took them, at a run, to the room behind the telephone call-box.

Hill was laboriously trying to straighten the place. He staggered into Crane's arm with the ink-splashed table which had been overturned. Crane called to Ross to take the table, then half-carried Hill to the desk chair.

"Tell us all about it," Crane ordered.

"Thomas—he's been here. Caught me."

Ross lifted heavy-lidded eyes to Crane's.

"I knew it."

"Caught you—and you squealed?" the lawyer demanded.

Hill shook his tousled head. His hands fingered his torn collar and tie.

"Didn't say a word. He hit me. He knows I'm in it."

Ross muttered:

"Best cut and run."

Crane's generally smiling mouth was set in a snarl.

Both men regarded Hill as though he was some crawling thing to be disposed of quickly. Presently Crane spoke, his smile reappearing.

"Where's Thomas now?"

"Gone back to Harrison. But he'll wait. He said he'd give me a day to come clean and bring him evidence," Hill told them shakily.

Crane's smile deepened.

"And you'll give him evidence, Arthur. You'll meet him to-night at the Wonder Hotel down town. You're October 3rd, 1939.

staying there, see? Hiding from us. You'll book a room and you'll lie low all day. Thomas'll be fool enough to keep things up his sleeve, so's to make a big splash at the end. Phone him now. I'll tell you what to say."

Hill gazed up at the smooth face with half-glazed eyes. He guessed that Ross was fingering a gun in the pocket of his loose lounge suit. Crane took up a sheet of notepaper, writing hastily on it. Ross came close to the wretched go-between, grunting:

"Do as he tells you."

Hill lifted the receiver on the desk off its base, then dialed with a nervous forefinger. He got the D.A.'s office.

"Put me through to Mr. Thomas, please," he steadied himself to say.

"It's Arthur Hill this end."

The three waited for Larry's voice to sound crisply in the instrument. Hill took up the notes Crane had scribbled for him.

"That you, Thomas? Hill speaking. I'm all alone here—you know where—and I've got evidence enough to fix the whole bunch. I'll have to hide away till to-night. Meet me at the Wonder Hotel in Forty-Second Street, West, ten o'clock. Ask for Room 214. Two hundred and fourteen, fifth floor."

Larry's voice crackled:

"I'll be there!"

"You might keep quiet, Thomas, till you've seen me." Hill was being prompted now by Crane's faint whisperings. "I got drawn into this—got into debt. Thanks, much—I'll have to ring off. There's someone coming in." The receiver was clamped down on its stand.

"What's he say?" Crane asked.

"He'll hold up till I meet him," Hill quavered.

"That's fine! And we'll be there, too. And, likely, there will be a little accident." Crane was quite himself again, pleasantly easy. "Things happen so unexpectedly, Arthur. Pull yourself together; Joe will get you a new collar and let you out the back way. Get yourself lunch and a drink, and toddle off to the Wonder. It's a nice little show—they don't ask a lot of tom-fool questions."

A Frame-up

LARRY, after a busy afternoon on the lines of inquiry which had now opened out to him, called at the Wonder Hotel a little before ten o'clock. Just as he was entering the lounge a hand was laid on his arm. He turned sharply—to see Al Wilson grinning in his inane way.

"Just going to have one?" Wilson hiccupped. "Don't mind if I join you?"

"I've an appointment. Sorry."

Larry didn't wait for further argument, but went straight in, letting the swing doors almost nip off Wilson's sharp nose. The Society reporter waited a moment or two.

"Guess I'll see what he's up to."

He thrust open the doors and pushed in. With a nod to the house-porter, he slithered up the stairs in Larry's wake. Larry's long legs took him up the shallow stairs three at a time. He reached the fifth floor and the bedrooms, beginning at two hundred. He strode along to No. 214.

Ho rapped sharply on the panel. There was no reply, so he rapped again, then opened the door.

The room was in darkness, save for the light filtering in, under half-drawn blinds from the street below. Larry felt for and found the switch, and snapped it down. He saw Hill lying out full length in front of the fireplace.

He was facing the gas fire, very still and silent.

"Tooth bad?" Larry called to him, as he closed the door.

No answer. Larry came closer—a sudden doubt assailed him. He knelt by the prostrate man, and, putting a hand on his shoulder, slowly turned him over. Hill, his eyes half-closed, his face cold and set, was dead.

There was a pistol lying by his side. Larry, unthinkingly, picked it up and had it in his hand as the door was thrust open by Wilson. The two exchanged lengthy stares. Then Wilson, fingers on the door handle, spoke.

"Shot him, hey? I heard you were fighting this morning."

"I didn't shoot him," Larry sharply answered. "I've just found him."

"You didn't give him a chance!" Wilson stuttered. "I'll be going before you have a smack at me!"

He hopped out of the door, and Larry heard him turn the key with a click that brought his danger home to him. He had been framed—the murder of Hill would be fastened on him. And, he had just put his finger-prints on the pistol.

He dropped it as though it were red hot. He had to act quickly. He rose from his knees and went to the window. Not a hope; five floors up and in front of the house. He ran to the door, and was jerking at it when it gave to him, Wilson, with two uniformed police, entered the room, Larry falling back before them.

"I charge this man, Lawrence Thomas, with murder," cried Wilson, pointing a crooked finger. "That's Arthur Hill of the D.A.'s office. They were enemies from the outset—had a fight this morning at the Dover Club."

"Wait a minute, mister," spoke the leader of the two policemen. "Let's get this down." He produced notebook and pencil. "What's your name and address?"

"I'm Al Wilson, radio announcer and journalist. Everybody knows me!" Wilson swelled out his chest, enjoying himself immensely. "You'll hear me to-night telling the world—"

Larry's fist crashed between his eyes, knocking the boaster flat. The police jumped at him, but he had them un-awares. He tripped one with a suddenly thrust out foot and threw the other over Wilson's prostrate body. Then he made a dash for the passage, raced along it and vaulted the stairs in leaps of a flight, one hand on the banisters. He had reached the second floor before the policemen's whistles shrilled out ear-piercing warnings.

Larry ran to a window at the end of the corridor, flung it up, and saw that it gave on the outside emergency stairs. He slithered down these and reached the dark yard at the rear of the hotel. He ran along this and climbed the side gate, then, dropping into the street, walked casually to where he had left his car, got in, slammed the door, and started up. With the whistles dimming his ears, he drove off, making at once for the main thoroughfare.

As he guessed, the police were already calling all cars. He had to work quickly and surely. A hold-up at the Wonder Hotel would have smashed his plans for netting the man who had murdered Mollie Cole and their tool, Arthur Hill.

He threaded his way through the traffic, hoping that the police would not yet know his car or its number. At a public call-box in a side street not far from the newspaper office where Kit was waiting for him, he drew into the kerb and risked a call.

"Meet me outside the Dover—get a taxi. Hurry!"

Her answer came crisply.

The Deadly Feud

IN a rough old shack in a remote region of the Rocky Mountains Judd Tolliver sat puffing gloomily at his pipe. Melissa, his wife, as she busied herself at the wash-tub, a sad-faced, elderly woman with tragedy lying behind her eyes, was talking—bitterness, infinite hopeless bitterness in her tired voice.

"And so it goes on, Judd—always has gone on, ever since we was married—always will go on, too, because that's all you live for. Killin' them Falins! You've raised Dave to it—you've raised June to it. And you'll raise Buddy to it, and nothin' I can say will ever alter it. Where's the good of it—where's the sense of it? What's June done to inherit this business of killin'? What's Buddy done to be raised for nothin' in life 'cept to kill Falins? Oh, I'm sick and tired of it all."

With a gesture of utter weariness she turned away, and her husband shifted his pipe a little uneasily in his mouth. A frown had come to his rugged face. "Tain't none of my makin', Melissa," he said slowly.

She swung round on him almost fiercely.

"Haven't all the Tollivers said the same for years and more years?" she demanded. "Yet which of you has ever tried to put an end to it all? Never a one of you! Ask Buck Falin, ask any of his boys, and they'll all tell you that it ain't none of their makin', either! But it don't stop any of you goin' on with it."

She flung out an arm to a far corner of the room where a young man lay on a bed, his dark eyes fixed steadily and almost relentlessly on her as she talked.

"Dave this time," she went on with rising bitterness in her voice, "and no fault of anyone's that he ain't lyn' dead before our eyes. And all that's in his mind, and in your mind, too, Judd Tolliver, is for him to get on his feet again so that he can lie up on the hills and kill one of them Falins. And then they'll never rest until they've had both you and Dave, and so it will go on until there ain't none of us left."

"They shot at Dave," answered the old man slowly and stubbornly, "and they'll answer to me for it."

"We shall all answer to you for it," she retorted. "You'll none of you ever be content till they've wiped out the whole lot of us. I'm sick and tired of all this killin', killin', killin'!"

For over a hundred years the deadly feud had raged between the Tollivers and Falins, dying down occasionally for a year or two, blazing up again suddenly like a fire newly roused into life by a stray puff of wind. For a feud once begun and carried on is never likely to end. Those rough, stubborn, prejudiced old mountaineers held it to be unworthy of their heritage to put out the sudden hand of friendship and forgiveness to the enemies of their ancestors. Blind, unreasoning loyalty to their kith and kin demanded blood, and only blood to wipe out the stain of blood; a life called for another life. That new generations arising had no personal grievances of their own against the opposing side mattered not at all. They were taught from their earliest youth the legacy of hate that had come down to them willy-nilly. And it was required of them that they should follow it blindly and ruthlessly, bequeathing it in turn to their children when they passed on.

At the moment there were five Tollivers. There was old Judd Tolliver and his wife Melissa, Dave, their adopted son, but hating the Falins as fiercely and as ruthlessly as if he had been born a Tolliver; June, a slender, pretty, untamed, wild thing of eighteen, engaged to be married to Dave in accordance with her father's expressed wishes, and perfectly content to be so, since outside the Falins, she had practically never met another young man in her life; and Buddy, her little brother aged four, whom she worshipped with all the love of her simple, wild young nature.

Of the Falins there were only four—but they held it to be a fine advantage over the Tollivers that whereas the latter could only number two grown men among them, they, the Falins, had four.

And Buck Falin and his three stalwart sons were as ruthless as any four men could be.

June came running into the Tolliver shack on the following day wiping the water from her face and hair, and with her wet clothes clinging around her.

"Fallen into the lake," she explained hurriedly in answer to her mother's and father's surprised look. "There's a stranger on his way up here, dad. He's askin' for you—says it's business."

She disappeared into her own little room, eager to change her clothes. For the stranger was young and good-looking, and had laughed at her when he had seen her tumble into the lake. And though the laugh had not been really unkind—he had tried to help her out, but she had indignantly refused—she was anxious, girl-like, to show to better advantage when he called.

Judd Tolliver looked up, frowning when the stranger came into the shack. He saw a tall, good-looking young man in the late twenties, a man easily dressed and easily mannered, with a quiet voice, steady grey eyes, and the jaw of a fighting man. Though there was nothing aggressive about him when he addressed the old man. He seemed to be anxious to be conciliatory.

Judd Tolliver, however, was suspicious. He was suspicious of everyone strange who came into the shack. They might possibly be on the side of the Falins, and until he had made quite sure that they weren't, he was taking no chances with them.

"My name's Jack Hale," said the stranger briefly.

"Well, what do you want?" demanded the old man.

Hale, ignoring the abrupt rudeness of the question, proceeded to explain. He was an engineer, representing a syndicate who were running a railway through the country for the development of coal mines. They had got the necessary permission from the Government, and all that, he, Hale, wanted was to negotiate with Judd Tolliver for the right to cut through his land with the railway. He added that he was prepared to pay in cash for the right, and the amount would be five thousand dollars and a percentage on the coal that might be extracted from the ground.

But here June, who had come in quietly to overhear the last part, excitedly broke in.

"Five thousand dollars! Why, dad, that's a fortune!" she exclaimed.

But old Judd Tolliver waved her aside impatiently. It was a fortune to him, but in his slow, suspicious way he had no intention of jumping at it. "Well, I reckon I'll consider it," he replied slowly. "But I'll have to talk it over with my boy, and at the moment he ain't in no condition to talk anythin' over with anyone."

Hale followed his eyes to where Dave Tolliver lay on his bed, and a frown came to his face. It struck him very forcibly that from the appearance of the sick man it was going to be a long time before he would be in a condition to talk business of any sort.

"What's the trouble?" he demanded. "Got shot in the arm—and it ain't healin' proper-like."

Hale strode across to the bed. He had originally trained for a medical career and had good knowledge on the subject.

"Let me have a look at it," he said sharply. And then, as he saw resentment smouldering in the other's dark eyes, he added quietly but authoritatively "Do as I tell you, please. You needn't be afraid. I was trained to be a doctor before I took up engineering work."

But he gave a quick exclamation of dismay and anger as he glanced at the young man's arm.

"Have you had a doctor to this?"

"We haven't," replied old Tolliver almost as if he resented the absurdity of the question. "There ain't no doctors in these parts."

"But good heavens, man, this arm is gangrenous! This lad of yours will die unless something's done immediately."

A quick, frightened exclamation from Mrs. Tolliver and a gasp of dismay from June were smothered by Judd's voice as he cut in stolidly:

October 3rd, 1936.

"We're doin' all that can be done and I reckon that's all there is to it," he began when Hale cut him short.

"Then I'll have to operate myself," he exclaimed sharply. "Here"—he swung round on June—"heat me some water, quick, and see that it's boiling. And get me some strips of clean linen, and—"

"You shan't touch him!" old Tolliver broke in fiercely. "We've never had a doctor and we ain't goin' to start it now. The old remedies have cured us up to now and I guess they'll do it again. We didn't ask you to come buttin' in and we don't want you. Now get out!"

Silence, desperate, tense silence for the moment. The old man's eyes were blazing; Mrs. Tolliver's were tragic, pleading. June was gazing, obedient from long years of submission. Dave Tolliver seemed utterly indifferent to the issue.

Hale's jaw, however, had tightened. He was handling a difficult situation and he knew it; knew, too, that a false move on his part at that moment, pregnant with danger, would result in irrevocable failure.

He laid his hand on the old man's shoulder, and when he spoke there was that in his voice which charged the little shack with authority.

"Mr. Tolliver," he said quietly, "I reckon this lad's life is pretty dear to you, and I can save it if you'll let me. You can trust me; I know what I'm doing. He's a young man, same as I am, and he's got to live! Let me carry on and he shall live!"

Silence once more. Old Tolliver's face was working. His wife was crying quietly. Then the old man looked up.

"You mean he'll die if you don't—do things?"

"He will—but I can save him if you'll let me."

"Carry on then," said the old man laconically.

It was a strange scene and for many years it lived with Jack Hale. He had no anaesthetics to deaden the terrible pain that he knew he was going to inflict by the use of the knife; but it heartened him when Dave Tolliver told him laconically that he'd "stick it whatever it was."

With old Tolliver and his wife standing by the head of the bed, with June standing nearby, something like rebellious tumult in her face, and with an old woman in the corner nursing a baby, he began the delicate task of cutting away the poisoned flesh.

He straightened himself up at length. He had cut away all that he had dared to cut, he had bathed and cleaned the terrible wound, dressed it as best he could, and bound it up. That he had hurt his patient terribly in the doing of it he knew only too well; but his patient had borne it bravely, incredibly bravely, and his eyes were showing faint gratitude.

"With any luck he'll do now," said Hale as he wiped the perspiration from his forehead.

In less than a week Hale's prediction stood fully justified. Dave Tolliver was on the road to recovery, his father, as had the Falins also, had signed the contract giving the railway the necessary permission, and Hale and his men were hard at work.

Drawn Into the Feud

THE railway went ahead fast from that moment; but other things less visible were going ahead also. For June, who had been attracted by Jack Hale from the start, was getting more and more attracted by him every day. And as her little brother Buddy had formed a very strong liking for Hale—which the latter was not slow to reciprocate—June seldom allowed a day to pass without bringing the child down to the railway. Actually, Hale was not a little worried about these visits. He in his turn had been attracted by the girl, but he had soon learned that she was Dave's girl, and there, he told himself, the matter ended.

He handled the situation as only such quiet, reserved men do, and one morning, when June walked into his little office where he was hard at work, he greeted her with a frown as he turned back to his desk.

"Good-morning," said the girl with the smile of one who is sure she is welcome.

"Good-morning," replied Hale curtly without turning round.

"You don't seem very pleased to see me."

"Well, I'm very busy."

"You always are—when I come down here."

There was a pause, during which Hale wrote furiously. He had noticed the teasing, coquettish note in the girl's voice and he was rebelling against it. He longed to throw aside his work and talk to her, but he knew only too well that if he yielded once he would go on yielding again and again. So his answer came brusquely enough.

"At the moment I'm very busy."

"That means I'm not wanted?"

He merely shrugged his shoulders. He knew he couldn't look her in the eyes and tell her so.

Her anger rose then, swift, primitive. "I think you're very rude," she said.

He swung round at that, firing up in a flash.

"And I think you're very foolish," he retorted.

"Why?" she asked.

He hesitated a moment. It was impossible to tell her what he wanted to tell her, that because she was promised to another man it was unwise for her to be coming continually to his office. So instead he hedged, hardly caring what he said.

"Well, because there's hundreds of better ways of spendin' your time. If you're goin' to marry Dave you ought to be learnin' things."

Her eyebrows went up.

"What things?" she asked simply. "There was no escape now and he knew it and made up his mind to go through with it."

"Hundreds of things. You're making money now and your life's going to change. You'll want to know things when you're married, June, and you ought to be spending your time learnin' them, the same as other girls do, instead of loafing around."

"What don't I know that other girls do, and why shouldn't I loaf around, as you call it, if I choose to?" she asked rebelliously.

Once again he fell back on generalities.

"Well, if I were you I should want to learn things and get educated. Other girls do. You told me yourself you couldn't read or write, and that's a mighty poor thing for any girl to say, specially if she's goin' to get married."

"Will you teach me?"

"Of course not," he retorted sharply. "I haven't the time—you ought to be able to see that—and besides, I've got my work to do. And I've got to get on with it now, what's more, otherwise I'll be all behind."

Turning his back on her, he sat down once more at his desk, closing the discussion, and she went out and walked slowly back to the shack in a flaming temper. For she knew only too well the truth of all that he had said, and the truth hurt. But other things hurt, too, and she began on them the moment she entered the shack.

Her father and mother listened in silence while she told them that it was high time that she had some sort of education. But she failed to tell them from where the idea had come to her. Rather did her conversation suggest that it was Dave who had started it.

But old Judd Tolliver came down flat-footed when she had finished. He declared harshly that it was all nonsense. The Tollivers had been content all these generations without education; what did she want to start now for? And on June retorting that she didn't know and didn't care, but she was going whether he liked it or not, he got up grimly from his chair with a laconic "Oh, is that so, my girl?" and reached for the broad leather strap that had hitherto been used to settle all the arguments of his children in their recalcitrant moments.

But here his wife flung herself in between them, while June stood white-faced but still stubborn.

"Judd, you can't do it—you can't do it!" she panted.

"Can't I? You watch me. If a child of mine disobeys me—"

"I don't want to disobey you, dad," said June. "I've never disobeyed you in my life, and you know it. But I'm a woman now, just an ignorant woman what knows nothin'. And it ain't fair to keep me ignorant all my life. Look at mother here, what chance has she ever had since she married you? Slavin' from mornin' till night, seein' nothin', knowin' nothin'. And it ain't fair that I should have the same now we've got money."

"It's true, Judd, and you know it," said Mrs. Tolliver gently and sorrowfully. "Not that I'm grumblin' 'eas you've been a good man to me. But we've got money now, Judd, and surely it be only right to give the kids better chances than we've had ourselves?"

Old Tolliver relented then—he had to. And that afternoon June left for Cap-town. But it was not the mail coach that took her, but Hale, whom she artfully waylaid. For she knew that he was driving into Gaptown that afternoon, and she stopped him—somewhat to his dismay—and asked him for a lift. And he, because he couldn't very well refuse, gave her the required lift. And that was how the trouble really began and Hale got drawn into the Tolliver-Falin feud all unwittingly.

It was the following day, and Dave Tolliver, who had been away in the mountains, came back and asked for June.

"Why, she gone off to Gaptown to get eddicated, Dave," replied the old man, looking slightly puzzled. "I reckoned you knew all about it from what she said."

For a moment or two the young man stared blankly at him. But swift anger, blind anger was surging up in his heart, for already rumours had been reaching him of June's constant visits to the railway—though he had been trying his best to dismiss them as idle talk.

"I've never said nothin' to her about it," he answered slowly. "I don't want June no different from what she is."

There was a long and dreadful silence. But the thoughts of both men had gone in the same direction. For old Tolliver, too, had heard whispered rumours.

"I wonder who can have advised her to this?" he said presently and with a troubled face.

"If you don't know I can tell you," rejoined his son angrily. "It's Hale and no one else. I've been hearin' for quite a while that June's been spendin' a mighty lot of time down at the construction camp. And now I'm beginnin' to see why."

The old man's look of anxiety deepened.

"It don't seem to me to sort of fit in somehow," he began, but his son cut him short as he reached for his gun.

"We'll soon find out if it does," he answered grimly.

He went down to the construction camp with black murder in his heart and his loaded gun in his hand. When Thurber, the manager of the works, told him that Hale was not there he threatened him with his gun—he was in the mood to shoot anyone on sight—but the panic-stricken assurance of the badly scared Thurber that Hale was indeed not there but had gone into Gaptown the previous day soon convinced him that he was speaking the truth. But his anger was boiling more than ever as he left the camp and started to make his way in the direction of Gaptown. For now all he could see was a deliberately planned elopement between June and Hale.

But as he strode along through the pine trees rude interruption came in the shape of a bullet that came whizzing past his head, making him drop swiftly in his tracks. For that bullet told him that long before he ever found Jack Hale he had another enemy with whom to settle. It told him that the Falins were out once more on the blood-feud and if he failed to get this particular Falin, then the latter would undoubtedly get him.

It was no unusual scene that those age-old mountains saw that afternoon. It was a scene that they had witnessed many and many a time before—two desperate men stalking each other with swift death staring each of them in the face. It was a scene of two men, with murder in their hearts, slipping from tree to tree, from boulder to boulder with the swiftness and silence of panthers, firing every now and then and dropping as quickly from sight—yet ever narrowing the circle as they drew nearer and nearer, each waiting like panthers for the last desperate spring of all with death for one or both of them at the end of it.

Suddenly in the silence two shots rang out in quick succession, close to each other, echoing and re-echoing over the hills, and then with scarcely a second's interval two figures seemed to spring out of the rocks from nowhere, two figures that launched themselves simultaneously at each other.

Over and over they rolled on the rough ground, each striving for the mastery, tearing at each other like wild cats, while the air was heavy with the sound of blows and curses. And nearer, ever nearer, they drew to the edge of the mountain on which they had been fighting.

And then, suddenly, with a tremendous effort Dave Tolliver wrenched himself free and was on his feet. But Falin had gained his feet, too, and with a snarl hurled himself at his opponent. But even as he did so the younger man swerved, and his fist, with all its owner's weight behind it, crashed in on Falin's jaw. As he staggered back he stumbled as he did so, slipped, lost his footing, and grabbing desperately at the ground, disappeared over the edge.

Dave Tolliver stood still, panting furiously.

"That's one of 'em settled," he ejaculated as he turned and walked away.

The moment that Hale came face to face with him in Gaptown on the following day, he knew from Dave Tolliver's face that there was big trouble ahead, and cursed himself for allowing himself to get mixed up in it. But he faced him steadily enough.

"What have you done with June?" was the younger man's first question.

That told Hale all there was to know. He read hate and murder in Dave's eyes, and a sense of utter weariness at the futility of it all surged over him. But he knew it had to be met and was determined to do his best.

"Look here, Dave," he exclaimed, "I know exactly what's in your mind, but you're wrong—dead wrong."

The other's voice was ice-cold when he answered:

"You've tricked June into runnin' away with you!"

"Oh, you're a mile out! If only you're listen to me—"

"I wouldn't believe a single word you said."

"Righto, then have it this way."

And in a flash Hale lashed out, catching the other on the jaw, and the fight was on. But as they fought there was this difference between the two men. Dave was fighting to kill, but Hale was not. Even in his anger he held himself in check. For June's sake he was determined to do little more than defend himself.

And then all of a sudden dramatic interruption stepped in. For Hale had hit out at Dave and had sent him staggering back against the empty shack by the side of which they were fighting, and was waiting for a new onslaught which never came. For all in a flash came a hatchet, hurled with terrific force, which only missed Dave Tolliver by inches, and buried itself deep in the woodwork. And as Hale swung round with an oath he saw three men running towards them and knew in a flash that it was the Falins!

But he laughed from sheer joy. For now he saw the solution of the problem. For he noticed in a second that the three rapidly advancing men were gunless. And in a second he was by Dave's side.

"This is where we join forces, Dave," he said. "Come on, lad, we'll beat 'em to it."

He fought differently now, fought with the venom he had lacked when he had been fighting Dave. But he could very soon see which way the fight was likely to go, and managed here and there to pant out instructions to Dave—little short breathless sentences, but each charged with meaning and truth.

"You've got to get away—from this. They mean to kill you—but they won't kill me. Slip out—and get—June! She'll explain—up in the town—I'll hold 'em."

Perhaps then it filtered into Dave Tolliver's bemused brain that he had October 3rd, 1936.

been wrong, had done Hale an injustice. Perhaps June was the magnet. Under no other circumstances would he have left Hale alone.

But Hale managed his part well, and it was not until Dave had completely disappeared that the Falins discovered the trick that Hale had managed to play on them.

Hale leaned against the shack struggling for breath, and Buck Falin addressed him.

"I reckon you'll be sorry for this, Hale," he said with deadly meaning in his voice. "You've butted into our private quarrel and we're not forgettin' it."

The Falins Keep Their Word

THE months had rolled by. June was still away, having gone under Hale's advice to his sister in Louisville, from where she was writing to her family, telling them of her progress. But there was no more enmity between Hale and Dave. And Hale knew full well that both Judd Tolliver and his adopted son were his sworn friends, even though they never said so. He had ranged himself on their side against their enemies, and they would never forget it.

But he had lost a lot of heart in his work now. June to him was irrevocably gone. In the fullness of time she would come back and marry Dave. Though he told himself that it would be better so. He, Hale, had only butted in by accident. Dave had always been her man, and she was irrevocably Dave's girl. Probably by now she had forgotten him altogether.

But he had other troubles even more serious than this. For not only was the feud between the Tollivers and the Falins even more bitter than before, but he was very seriously mixed up in it, too. Mysterious outrages were constantly happening at the railway construction camp. One day a big fire occurred which destroyed any amount of material. No one could say exactly who had done it; but Hale knew that it was the Falins, though he gritted his teeth and swore by all his gods that a whole army of Falins shouldn't stop him from completing the work he had set out to do.

Old Judd Tolliver had come down to Hale's little office one day, and the two were talking together when the telephone-bell rang. And to Hale's amazement he heard June's voice at the other end. Though there was hardly a tremor in his own voice when he answered:

"Hallo, June, is that you? How are you? Here, hang on a second. Here's your father and he'd like to speak to you."

He swung round on old Tolliver. "Here's June on the 'phone. Come and talk to her."

He stood watching the scene with amusement in his eyes. Judd Tolliver was holding the receiver as if it had been some species of deadly snake, though excitement and amazement were in his eyes. For it was the first time in his life that he had ever used a telephone.

And then all of a sudden from outside, not half a mile away, came a terrific explosion, rattling the windows of the office and dying away into dreadful silence.

In a flash Hale was out of the office, and old Tolliver, who had dropped the receiver with a clatter, was rushing after him. And as they ran a scared, white-faced man came running towards them.

"They've blown up the bridge! I saw your buddy on it, Mr. Tolliver, only a few minutes ago!"

Two hundred miles away, June, through the telephone, heard the terrific roar of the explosion, and her heart missed a beat at the sudden silence which succeeded it.

"Dad, dad," she screamed, "what is it—what is it?"

For minutes that seemed like hours she waited, scarcely daring to breathe, in an agony of apprehension. She got through to the exchange, but all they could tell her was that the line was still connected, that possibly they had been called away and would come back. So she told them that she would hold on—and more agonised minutes drifted slowly away.

And then all of a sudden she heard the murmur of voices, and once more her heart began to pound anew.

The sight of what was taking place was mercifully hidden from her. She could not see that dread procession that filed into the little office where the telephone receiver still swung on its hook, unnoticed, unheeded by all. She could not see Jack Hale as he strode in, his face stern and set—could not see him lay Buddy's little mangled body down, cover it gently up, lay his hand on old Tolliver's bowed shoulders, mute sympathy in his eyes and in the gesture.

But she could hear her father's voice as it floated out to her, clear and distinct, with such awful horror in it as she had never heard—the voice of a man in a dream.

"Dead? My Buddy dead? Killed by them Falins—"

And for the first time in her life she slid to the floor in a dead faint.

The End of It All

IT was a week later; the worst days Hale had ever known in his life. Little Buddy had been laid to rest, but all the life seemed to have gone out of the Tolliver household. Mrs. Tolliver only sobbed and wept, raved and stormed in turns. In turns she blamed her husband, blamed her adopted son. And they listened in silence, realising the uselessness of words.

And then, one day, when Hale had come down to see them, June suddenly walked in, and it begun all over again. For June had accused them all of lethargy—had declared that they were doing nothing. And had at the finish flung fiercely round on Dave.

"Dave," she exclaimed, "why don't you act as a Tolliver should act? Why are you sittin' here doin' nothin'?"

He shrugged his shoulders helplessly. But here Mrs. Tolliver broke in.

"You don't know what you're sayin', June. Where's all these killin' leadin' us to? What's the use of goin' on with 'em? Someone's got to stop it."

But the girl flamed up furiously.

"Then it can be up to the Falins and not us!" she flung back. "They've killed my Buddy, and all you do is to go up to the sheriff and ask him"—the bitterness in her voice was beyond all words—"ask him to interfere! Why ain't we interferin'? Why ain't you takin' a hand, Dave Tolliver? You've asked me to marry you—right, and so I will if you'll act like a Tolliver!"

In a second he was up from his chair, reaching for his gun, but even as he did so Hale sprang up and caught at his arm.

"You leave me alone," flashed out the younger man ominously, "or it will be the worse for you."

But Hale still held him tightly, and

"THE SUICIDE CLUB"

A Pig in a Poke!

THIS April morning, Colonel Geraldine, equerry to the Crown Prince of Karovia, was searching the royal palace for his young master. The king was in full council—the ambassador of the neighbouring kingdom of Irania was present with important proposals.

Geraldine at last found Prince Florizel in the kitchens, in the midst of a loudly applauding crowd who were watching him trying to walk a slack wire fastened from one end of the room to the other.

"Good gracious, your Highness!" cried Geraldine, shocked beyond measure. "What are you doing?"

"Bringing the carnival in—since I'm not allowed to go out to it," Florizel answered. "Don't worry me, or I'll fall!"

He appeared a handsome young man as he balanced himself precariously. He was tall, dark, faintly moustached—and he wore his dark grey flannels and white shirt with royal distinction. All the same, he fell off the wire into Geraldine's promptly outstretched arms.

"Enough of this!" cried the irate colonel, rushing the wriggling young man upstairs to his bed-room. "Get dressed at once!" he dared to command. "The king is tired of waiting for you. You've got to marry the Princess Brenda."

"That little wretch?" gasped Florizel. "I say, Geraldine, that's a bit thick!"

"You tell his Majesty so." Geraldine forced the young man into his regimentals and hurried him away. Florizel entered the council somewhat short of breath, but looking every inch a prince. He saluted his father, bowed to the Iranian Ambassador and the councillors present, took his seat and sat very erect. "Proceed, Excellency," ordered the king.

The Iranian Ambassador, standing in his place, coughed a little.

"You must understand, sir, that our Court is quite willing that her Royal Highness should accept your Majesty's gracious proposal. It will cement old friendships and ensure the safety of both kingdoms. But"—here the old fellow coughed again—"but the Princess Brenda is somewhat difficult. She hasn't seen his Royal Highness the Prince for many years, and—and to give you her own words, sir—she says she won't buy a pig in a poke."

"I quite agree," said Florizel. "Silence!" cried his father. "I will settle this affair. The princess shall be afforded an opportunity of seeing you—and you will behave as unlike a pig as possible. Gentlemen, the council is at an end. Good-morning to you all."

Left alone with his son, the king told him:

"Florizel, my son, revolution is in the air. We have very little money in our coffers. A lovely young partner, with millions to bring into our impoverished country, means that trade will recover and our people be happy once more."

"But Brenda!" sighed Florizel. "A girl with plaits and eyes like beads."

"Some beads are beautiful," said the king. "Call Geraldine in."

When the colonel had duly saluted, the king gave his final orders.

"You will go to England, Florizel, to learn manners. Geraldine will go with you. When you return, you will marry Brenda."

"Your Majesty," said Geraldine quickly, "I shall be delighted. I have long desired to bring your Majesty one of England's famous Christmas puddings."

"They're even worse than Brenda," said Florizel.

"Attention, both of you!" the king commanded. "Five years ago a revolution nearly succeeded. A thorough-paced rascal—a doctor of philosophy named Noel—stirred our people to madness. We managed to crush the revolt, but Noel escaped. He may be alive and still plotting against us, Geraldine, we must have this marriage—and I shall hold you responsible for it."

That same evening Florizel and his equerry were aboard a packet-boat hound from Antwerp to the port of Dover.

They travelled under the assumed names of Theophilus Godall and Major Hammersmith. The journey was very dull—until they were almost at the end of it. Then a steward came along the decks of the steamship to Florizel.

"Mr. Godall, a lady has asked me to give you this letter."

"Don't take it," whispered Geraldine. "It's a trap of some sort."

But Florizel had opened the letter. He read it through.

"I will come immediately."

He rose from his chair, tossed the note to Geraldine, and proceeded to state cabin number 3. Here he found a raven-haired and agitated young woman standing by the door.

"You are Mr. Godall?" she asked swiftly. As he bowed, she went on in a shaking voice. "I am in great peril, sir. I am bearing a most important document. There are those abroad who have tracked me and who will endeavour to steal this."

She held out a long, heavily sealed letter. "Will you take it and keep it until I leave the ship? If you will do me this great kindness—and I know you will, because you are a gentleman—you can hand it back to me as I come down the gangway. Once on English shores, I shall be safe."

"I will do it for you, madam, with pleasure." Florizel had taken in the pale beauty of the girl's face. She was very handsome—and vaguely familiar. He believed he had seen her somewhere in Karovia.

Almost as he spoke, a dark, heavily built man burst into the cabin. He stepped past the prince and confronted the girl.

"Give me that letter!" he demanded. "Stand away, you!"

He thrust out an arm to keep Florizel at bay. But the latter caught the fellow by the collar and flung him aside.

"Your quarrel is now with me," the prince cried fiercely. "I will guard this letter with my life!"

The dark man glared at him. "I warn you, Mr. Godall!" he croaked. "You observe I know your name. I solemnly warn you!"

He strode from the cabin just as Geraldine came excitedly running in to rescue his royal charge.

The Young Man with the Cream Tarts

THE next evening "Mr. Godall" and "Major Hammersmith" were dining at a little restaurant in Soho. They were discussing the mysterious lady.

Said Geraldine with conviction: "She is a spy sent to kill you or get you into some dire trouble. She didn't come off the ship—you still have the letter—and I suggest that you destroy it at once."

"My dear fellow, I can't do that." The prince took the sealed envelope out of his pocket. "It is a sacred commission."

"Fiddlesticks!" Geraldine snatched up the letter and tore it open. A perfectly blank sheet of folded foolscap was revealed.

"It's lucky I'm here to look after you," said Geraldine.

Florizel was vexedly studying the blank paper when a great noise and much laughter from the tables by the door caused both of them to stare in that direction.

A young man, followed by two commissionaires, had entered the restaurant. Each commissionaire carried a large silver dish of cream tarts. The young man begged the company at each table, as he came to it, to taste these tarts, protesting that they were the most delicious in the whole world. Sometimes his offer was accepted; sometimes harshly refused. In these latter cases the young man ate the rejected tart himself.

Presently he came to Florizel. "Sir," said he, "will you honour me?" He offered the prince a tart. "I can vouch for the quality of these confections, having eaten two dozen and three of them already."

"Don't touch it!" cried Geraldine. "I will eat one," said Florizel, "on condition that you sit down and join us at supper."

The young man hesitated. "I must either eat or give away the rest of these tarts." He suddenly laughed. "There are but seven left. I will liquidate the last five if your friend and you will eat one a-piece."

Geraldine was beginning a protest when Florizel took a tart and devoured it in a couple of bites. The young man started on the five he had promised to eat: Geraldine, with many misgivings, ate the last one. The young man dismissed the commissionaires, tossing them his purse.

"There," he cried, "all is finished! I am penniless, and I have ended a most foolish career by a crowning act of folly. I will sit to your table, gentlemen, and will take wine with you. I confess to being somewhat surfeited with food."

He dropped into the chair next to Florizel, who filled his glass with champagne.

"Here's your health, sir," said the prince. "My name is Theophilus Godall; my friend is Major Alfred Hammersmith. We are, like yourself, men of broken fortunes, making a night of it on the last few pounds we have managed to save from the wreck of our estates."

"How?" the young fellow exclaimed. "Are you ruined, like me? Are you"—he lowered his voice and glanced around—"are you going to avoid the consequences of your folly by the one easy path?"

Geraldine, taking his cue from Florizel, answered boldly:

"Yes, sir—we are."
"You are determined to end life to-night? Good!" The young man swigged off his champagne. "Then we are well met, we three. Come with me, Mr. Godall, and you, Major Hammersmith—to the Suicide Club!"

The three companions went together in a four-wheeled cab through the dark streets of Soho, almost deserted at this time of night. Another cab followed them secretly.

They came to the entrance of a narrow court, where the young man stopped the cab. The second cab passed by quickly, stopped farther on, when two people alighted to watch the prince.

"You must please pay the fare," the young man stated. "I have not one farthing of money."

Colonel Geraldine paid the jarvey and they alighted. The young man led the way up the court until they came to a narrow doorway.

"Wait for me here," he whispered. "I must arrange things with the president before you enter. My name, by the way, is George Barnley. Make a note of it—you will read about me in to-morrow's issue of 'The Times.'"

When they were alone, Geraldine spoke earnestly to the prince.

"Of all your follies, your Highness, this is the wildest and most dangerous."

"Are you afraid?" Florizel whispered back.

The colonel drew himself erect. "A Geraldine is never afraid. But Major Hammersmith remembers that he is responsible for you."

"I absolve you from that responsibility," Florizel told him.

Mr. Barnley had returned. He beckoned to them.

"The president will see you. Be frank in your replies to his questions."

They went along a gas-lit corridor to a small room. Mr. Barnley, with a ghastly grin, went out of this room by a door on the far side. A murmur of voices reached them when the door was opened—the sounds of melancholy music. Again Geraldine begged the prince to come away.

"I have set my heart on solving this puzzle," Florizel told him.

The inner door opened, and again they heard the wailing music. A tall, thin man entered, sallow-cheeked, sunken-eyed, and dressed in old-fashioned evening clothes, with a double tie of white satin about his linen collar. His shirt was frilled down the front, and his bald dome of a head was fringed with long, greying hairs which dangled over his shoulders. He bowed slightly to them.

"You wish to speak with me?" he asked.

"We desire to join your Suicide Club," said Geraldine.

"What is that?" came the smiling answer. "Some little joke of yours, gentlemen? This is a private dwelling-house in which I reside."

"Sir," spoke Florizel in his impetuous way, "we are here upon the invitation of Mr. George Barnley. You are either going to admit us, or you will bitterly repent having allowed us to come so far as this room."

The president laughed. "That is the way to talk," he approved. "This is, to you, a frolic for April Fool's Day, but I like you, and I will admit you." He took a small Bible from his pocket and placed it in Florizel's hands. "Repeat after me, if you please."

The oath was a very binding one. It was a sacred pledge never to reveal or even hint at the mysteries of the club. Geraldine liked the adventure less than ever, but took the oath after Florizel had done so. They followed the president into the club lounge.

It was an ordinary club-room with easy-chairs and a comfortable fire burning in the grate. Two waiters moved about among the members, bringing them refreshment. The company was chiefly that of oldish men, but there were others like young Mr. Barnley also present.

A sad-faced youth was at the piano; two of the men were playing chess in a corner; Barnley was standing by the fire. The president whispered to Florizel:

"The entrance fee and first year's subscription is one hundred pounds each, if you please."

Florizel nodded to Geraldine.

"Please write a cheque for two hundred pounds, Hammersmith, payable to bearer. I will settle afterwards with you."

The money was paid over. They signed their names. The president smiled as he looked over their shoulders. "All bear assumed names here," he sighed. "It is odd that so few have courage to end their lives in the full glare. Why are you wishing to die, Mr. Godall?" he asked.

"I have no more money."

"That is reason enough," said the president. "Now, sir,"—he addressed Geraldine—"what is your reason? You evidently have money."

Florizel answered while the colonel was hesitating:

"My poor friend was cashiered last week for cheating at cards."

"Excellent," approved the president, while Geraldine went scarlet with vexation. "Take your seats, gentlemen. Order champagne—it is usual; and the hour is at hand when we commence our play."

They seated themselves near to an old fellow on a couch who had been glancing at them.

"You are newcomers?" he asked. "Friends of young Barnley—a mad fellow! I am Dr. Malthus. I have been a member for two years."

"Two years?" said Geraldine, much relieved. "But I thought—"

"Quite so," Malthus checked him. "But I have been extraordinarily unlucky. Everybody gets the ace of spades but me. But I love the thrill—and I shall get it one night. You may not know the procedure—allow me to explain. No one really likes committing suicide. It is sometimes—er—painful; sometimes incomplete. Well, here, the president arranges it all. Another, quite nicely, does the killing for you.”

“But that is murder!” gasped Geraldine.

At this moment the president's voice was heard:

“Gentlemen, the deal! Please follow me into the eard-room.”

They walked, in twos and threes, past folding doors which had been thrown open, into a long, narrow room, the centre of which was occupied by a green-clothed table. The company settled down in chairs around it. The president took a pack of cards from a side table.

There was a vacant chair opposite Florizel's, and, just as the president was about to deal the cards, a girl in black entered. She took the vacant chair, her dark eyes fixed and unseeing.

It was the mysterious lady of the sealed envelope.

“Attention, please!” came the president's cold voice. He began to deal out the cards, walking behind each chair to lay a card in front of the player. “The ace of clubs represents the officer for the night—the ace of spades stands for the lucky one who is to leave this vale of tears.”

Florizel was dealt the nine of clubs; Geraldine received the three of spades. The fatal cards did not appear until the second round. Then the girl turned over her card to show everyone that the ace of clubs had fallen to her.

A tense minute later Mr. Barnley received the ace of spades.

“Please to return to the lounge,” said the president. “All except Miss Vandeleur and Mr. Barnley.”

Florizel tried to speak to her, but she only regarded him with a stony stare. Dr. Malthus caught at his arm.

“Help me back to my chair,” he breathed thickly. “I feel absolutely shattered. I must really give up playing.”

The next morning, while breakfasting at their hotel, Geraldine read out from “The Times” to the horrified Florizel: “We much regret to announce that Mr. George Barnley, well known in London sporting society, met with a fatal accident last night whilst returning from the theatre to his rooms in Savile Row. A large coping stone fell on his head from the roof of a house near by as he was passing beneath, and instantly killed him.”

Miss Vandeleur is Again Lucky

DESPITE Colonel Geraldine's arguments, Florizel persisted in returning to the Suicide Club the following night.

The president told them:

“I expected you.”

The deal, this time, was soon over. Florizel received the ace of spades in the first round and Miss Vandeleur the ace of clubs.

“Strange fortune,” smiled the president. “Our new lady member, twice running, has had the luck to officiate.”

When the others had withdrawn, he told Florizel:

“You will please accompany Miss Vandeleur in the closed carriage which waits at the end of the passage. She will arrange your death most charmingly.”

There was no chance of a word with Geraldine. Florizel, always polite, entered the carriage with the mysterious lady. She made no reply to any of his questions as they drove out of Soho towards Regent's Park.

She told the driver to halt and wait

when they approached the Zoo. She then addressed Florizel:

“Get out, please. We are going to see the lions. You will enter the last cage, and—and, afterwards, I shall go home.”

But when they were in the lions' house her nerves failed her. She had begun to open the door of one of the cages with a key taken from her bag, when suddenly she burst into tears.

“My dear lady,” cried the prince, “what is the matter? Are you ill?”

“Noel shouldn't have expected it of me,” she sobbed. “I can't do it! Let us go.”

“You killed Barnley,” the prince wondered. “Why not me?”

“I didn't kill him. I talked to him like a sister and—sent him to his people in Scotland. I paid his fare. Anyone can put a death notice in a newspaper.”

The prince considered this for a few moments, then he spoke very seriously: “You mentioned the name of Noel just now. I have heard of a Dr. Noel.”

“He is the president of the club.” Miss Vandeleur dried her tears. “Where is our cabman?”

They were at the gates of the Zoo. There was no sign of the carriage.

“Why did you join the Suicide Club, Miss Vandeleur?” Florizel asked.

“Because I am being forced into a hateful marriage. I ran away—after telling my people I would not buy a pig in a poke!”

“Dear me!” said the prince. “You must be little Brenda grown up.”

“I followed you,” she confessed. “I wanted to know what kind of a man you had become—if you were a man of courage. You were a most odious little boy.”

A shot rang out and a bullet whistled past them through the night air. The prince caught at his companion's hand and raced her into the roadway. They ran along the Albert Road, stopping at the entrance to a small inn. The prince hammered at the door and they were admitted in rather breathless condition.

Noel flung up his arms as he overbalanced. . . .

Safe in the little hostelry, Brenda said:

"That was Noel. He hates you. It was to save your life that I went into the club. I bribed him to deal me the ace of clubs. I knew he'd give you the ace of spades."

Further knockings at the door brought them to silence.

Florizel rose.

"Put out the lamp," he told her, "and stand clear! This must be someone come to finish where you have failed."

A man, be-cloaked and in a great hurry, rushed in when Florizel opened the door. At once Florizel closed with him and threw him heavily.

"Leggo!" gasped a well-known voice. "It's only me!"

It was Geraldine. The prince raised him up.

"My dear fellow, a thousand pardons."

The colonel grunted:

"There's another madman outside, firing off a pistol at everything he sees!"

Trapped!

THE three breakfasted together next morning at the little inn.

Geraldine was being very polite to the princess when the waiter knocked over his coffee cup. Brenda jumped up hastily from the table.

"You clumsy idiot!" shouted the colonel.

"I'm terribly sorry," the waiter apologised. "My nerves, sir—all to pieces. Egg and bacon, sir?"

"No!" thundered Geraldine.

"It's my little dog, sir," went on the old man in tears. "He killed a parrot, sir, that flew in from the Zoo. And he's to be tried for murder."

Florizel put down his newspaper.

"Try a dog for murder?"

"Yes, sir. It's one of the new laws, sir. I'm—I'm heartbroken, gentlemen." He raised terrified eyes towards Brenda, standing by the window. "I love my little dog. He's all I have in the world."

"I will go with you to this strange court," said Florizel. "I will save your dog."

"Thank you indeed, sir. Will you come now? It's a lot to ask you—"

Florizel was already at the door.

"I will put on my coat at once."

The old man went to a side table and took up a small round parcel. He brought it to Geraldine.

"Your Christmas pudding, sir. The cook had one left over. I managed to get it for you—ten and sixpence, sir."

Brenda went quickly to Florizel, when he came back with hat and coat:

"Don't go!" she murmured. "I am afraid for you."

"We are in England," Florizel reminded her. "Come, Hammersmith."

The colonel snatched up his round parcel.

"Excuse us, princess," he bowed.

"We will return in a few minutes."

They went to a tall house up a side street. The old waiter knocked at the door and they were admitted by a man in livery.

He escorted them to folding-doors on the left of the passage. These were thrown open and Florizel and Geraldine stepped into a large bare room.

Before them was a long table at which several people were sitting, all facing the door. The judge rose to his feet as the folding doors were sharply clapped together by two men. He spoke very pleasantly:

"Good-morning, Mr. Godall. Good-morning, Major Hammersmith. Most kind of you to come."

It was the president of the Suicide Club!

"What do you want of us, sir?" Florizel inquired, sternly regarding that venerable face with its burningly dark eyes.

"My dear prince, I am Dr. Noel," came the ready answer. "Your father threw me into prison, with the order that I was to be hanged on the following morning. Hanged—because I had dared to offend him and his autocratic rule! Kings are superfluous in these days. The people must rule. It is strangely fortunate for me to catch both you and the colonel at one cast of the line. News of your arrival was brought me by one of our spies—but I knew we must employ cunning to properly get you. Hence the cream tarts and Mr. Barnley. Hence the Suicide Club and its amusing ritual. It has brought us two hundred pounds, you will recollect." He chuckled a little. "The jury will give you a hearing—and hang you immediately afterwards. Behold the gallows!" He dangled a slip-knotted rope hanging from a ceiling hook behind him.

Geraldine glanced towards the men by the door.

"Stand away!" he cried, raising the small round parcel which contained his Christmas pudding. "I suspected some plot. I will throw this bomb—and you shall all perish with us!"

He backed against the inner wall. Florizel, walking-stick tightly gripped, moved close to him. The pudding was upraised—the president and the jury sprang towards the windows, their faces ashen with terror. But one of the men at the door began to creep in on Geraldine.

Florizel, without turning his head, had seen the fellow. He waited until he was almost at Geraldine's back: then Florizel's gloved fist shot out, catching him at a blow. Geraldine, with a yell of rage, threw the pudding at the president. It struck him between the eyes.

Pandemonium followed. Florizel fought with cool desperation, overthrowing first one and then another of the mob. Geraldine performed prodigies of valour.

The president wiped away the sticky contents of the burst parcel from his livid face.

Florizel reached the folding doors and jerked them open.

"Come, Geraldine!" he called, as he dashed along the corridor. He pulled open the front door and rushed into the street.

A policeman was standing by the railings of a house near by. The policeman was talking to the cook in the area below and came away with reluctance. Meantime the front door had slammed to.

"My friend is in there," Florizel told the officer in a breath. "He is surrounded by anarchists! I call upon you to help me save him!"

The policeman blew his whistle. He then approached the door and knocked upon it. It opened at his touch—the passage was empty. Florizel ran in with the policeman—the folding doors were wide. There was no sign of anyone. Everything had gone, table, chairs and the slip-knotted rope!

Florizel, after a vain search of the empty house, returned to the inn. A note was waiting for him. It was from Brenda, telling him that she had been compelled to return with her escort to Irania.

While he stood in the porch considering her note, a furtive youth came up to him.

"Are you Mister Godall?" he asked. Florizel nodded. "I'm sent to tell you Major Hammersmith is in great danger, sir. If you would save his life, you must come to this address at ten o'clock this evening."

He thrust a card into Florizel's hand. "You're to come in by the garden gate. And you're to come alone."

Retribution

IN face of his oath, Florizel could not call in the police. A better plan came to his mind; he would ask for help from a few trusty officers and gentlemen attached to the Karovian Embassy in St. James's Square. He began collecting them at dusk, calling for them in a hansom cab which he drove himself in order to secure secrecy.

He brought them in pairs to a furnished house in St. John's Wood which he had hired for the occasion, and entertained them with lavish hospitality. He explained the position.

"I must go alone to meet this fellow Noel," he told them. "It is another trap, of course; but as the garden of this place backs on to the garden of the house where I am supposed to be rescuing Geraldine, it will be only necessary for you gentlemen to climb a wall and come to us, with your pistols and my rapiers, at ten minutes after ten. I shall ask you to see that Dr. Noel has fair play."

At ten o'clock precisely Florizel presented himself at the garden gate of the other house. The furtive youth opened the door when he rang the bell.

"This way, sir." He directed the prince under the dark trees towards the back of the mansion. Three men suddenly sprang out from the shadows. One held a lantern, which he flashed on Florizel; the others covered him with their revolvers.

"You will not need your walking-stick," spoke the leader, snatching it away from Florizel. "Follow us and do not attempt to call for help. If you do"—he grimly flourished his gun—"you will be shot down like a dog!"

They entered the house from the back. Noel and his myrmidons were gathered into the large stone-floored kitchen. Geraldine, his hands tied behind his back, was being held by two of the fellows.

"You shouldn't have come!" he called heartbrokenly. "My life is worth nothing!"

"It is very dear to me," Florizel answered. He saw Noel advancing towards him, smiling in his hateful way. "You will release my friend!" he commanded.

"We will release you both, Prince Florizel," said Noel. "By means of the rope you have once avoided. We shall hang you together—it will be a fitting end to a couple of tyrants who have too long opposed the people. A deep grave has been dug outside—it will hold you both most comfortably."

At this moment the rescue party, headed by Major O'Rook and Captain Rich of the Embassy, burst into the room. O'Rook shouted:

"Hands up, all of you! The game is finished!"

The surprise was complete. The murderous gang put up their hands. Geraldine was released, and, with clenched fists, faced Dr. Noel.

EPISODE 9—

“Human Targets”

READ THIS FIRST

Buck Grant, a settler in the Pecos Valley, is in reality a Ranger investigating stories of terrorism by a gang of outlaws whose leader's identity he hopes to discover.

Judge Holmes, of Maverick, is the only man who knows Buck is a Ranger. He is likewise the only man who knows that Buck is the Phantom Rider, a cloaked horseman who is defeating the activities of the outlaws at every turn.

One morning, however, masked gangsters butcher Shorty, another Ranger who is on his way to the Valley. Dying, Shorty tells Buck to go to the Hidden Valley Ranch; and later Buck learns this is the property of a man named Grayson.

He meets Grayson's beautiful daughter, Mary, who has returned from the East and brought with her a friend, Helen Moore.

Meanwhile, a Ranger known as Spooky has entered Maverick, and Buck instructs him to obtain work at the Hidden Valley outfit. That same night Buck casually drops in at that ranch himself, and is introduced to Harvey Delaney, a neighbouring cattleman who is on friendly terms with the Graysons.

Old Grayson is murdered the next day, and leaves Mary a wallet containing the map of a secret gold mine. Later, a railway agent offers a high price for the Grayson land, but is wounded by a gangster's bullet before the deal can go through. Then, operating in league with renegade Indians, the outlaws raid Mary's cattle.

They are seen by Buck and Mary, who ride for help but are set upon by Redskins. In the scuffle one of the renegades tries to knife the white man.

The Herd Lost

MARY'S scream had warned Buck, and he turned in the nick of time to meet the onslaught of the Indian who had sneaked up on him from the rear.

The renegade's dagger was upraised for a death-stab, but ere the blow could fall Buck drove his fist into the assassin's jaw with an impact that hurled the fellow to the dust. Then he yelled a command to Mary, bidding her ride onward for the Hidden Valley Ranch and bring help without delay.

Farther down the trail the girl uncovered her face as she heard the big nester's stentorian tones and saw with relief that he had balked the attempt on his life. And next instant, even as Buck was sailing into the other Redskins, whom he had scattered a few seconds previously, Mary Grayson pulled her horse round and spurred in the direction of home.

About a minute later she was passing Sandstone Bluff, and once she had skirted the bold promontory she came in sight of her ranch, towards which she galloped at the top of her pony's speed.

Some of the boys emerged from the bunkhouse as she drew rein abreast of that building's doorway, and her foreman Steve was among them. It was he who called out in alarm as he saw the expression on Mary's countenance.

“Anything wrong, Miss Grayson?” he queried sharply.

“Plenty!” Mary answered. “Outlaws are running off that herd of cattle beyond the Bluff. They've got some renegade Indians working with them, too, and Buck Grant has tangled with four of them. Quick, there's not a moment to lose!”

Her foreman soon had the rest of the hands assembled, and once they had saddled their brones the cowboys lost no time in swinging themselves astride their mounts and pounding along the trail, with Mary Grayson in their midst and Steve sharing the lead with the thick-set figure of Spooky. Indeed, it was not long before Spooky was at the head of the party, urging his mustang across the verdant range like a man possessed.

His anxiety to reach the scene of the raid might well have set the others wondering, but they could never have guessed that he and Buck Grant were close friends—any more than they could have guessed that they were both members of that gallant organisation known as the Texas Rangers.

Rounding Sandstone Bluff, the rescuers suddenly beheld Buck and his antagonists a couple of hundred yards away from them. The white man was still laying about him with his bunched knuckles, but the Indians were game enough, and were doing their utmost to close with him when they became aware of the band of riders who were sweeping into view.

One glimpse of the newcomers was enough for the Redskins, and on a common impulse the four of them took to their heels, leaving Buck Grant where he stood and throwing themselves on to the backs of their horses. Then they made straight for the wood where the main body of the renegades was ensconced, and they were fleeing wildly in that direction when Buck was joined by Mary Grayson and the boys from the Hidden Valley outfit.

“Are you hurt, Buck?” Mary gasped. “Just my feelings, that's all,” the big fellow answered cheerfully enough. “But come on! That herd of yours on the other side of the wood needs lookin' after.”

His bronc Silver was near by, and a running jump carried him into the faithful creature's saddle. Another moment and he was leading a stampede towards the strip of forest, which the fugitive Indians had now reached.

The wood lay directly between Buck and the herd, for by this time Dirk and his pack of outlaw accomplices had run the cattle southwards from their pasture. It was the big Ranger's purpose, therefore, to cut clean through the forest with Mary Grayson's employees in an effort to intercept the rustlers. But he did not bargain for the volley of rifle and revolver-fire that burst all at once from the edge of the tall timber.

It was a murderous challenge that caused Buck and his companions to pull up sharply and dive for such cover as was available, and Buck made it his business to take care of Mary and hustle her behind a cluster of rocks. Then he opened fire on the wood, and the guns of the Hidden Valley boys were echoing the blasts of his forty-five when the Grayson foreman crawled across to him.

"Them Redskins must have had some pals lyn' doggo in the timber," Steve said to Buck and Mary. "I'll guarantee they're Red Eagle's bunch of cronies, though it's gonna be hard to prove it unless we can round 'em up."

"Who's Red Eagle?" Buck demanded. "Son of an old chief up in the reservation," was the laconic reply. "The old feller's all right, but the son and some of the younger bloods are a hot-headed lot. They're bad medicine, take it from me, and it's strong liquor that makes 'em so."

Buck ground his teeth together. "I get it," he said. "Those rustlers who jumped the cattle are usin' the renegades to cover their escape. If we're gonna save the herd we'll have to shoot our way through that wood."

"Yeah?" Steve grunted. "Well, I'm figurin' it will be a tough job. Them renegades are in a strong position, and judgin' by the flashes of their guns they ain't weak in numbers."

The foreman's pessimistic words were confirmed. The sun was going down behind the western hills as he spoke them, and the moon and the stars were out before Red Eagle and his band finally retired, in face of a gradual advance on the part of the white men.

The Indians had maintained a resistance as effective as it was stubborn, and, with their work well done, they were galloping off through the wood when Buck and his companions gained the fringe of the trees at last.

For Mary Grayson's party it was an empty victory indeed, but as they heard the receding hoof-beats of their unseen enemies' mustangs they hurriedly secured their own mounts and charged in pursuit. Yet on penetrating the forest and pushing out on to the plain beyond, they saw that the renegades were far ahead of them—a dim cloud of horsemen vanishing into the fastnesses of the mountain country.

Then something else caught the attention of the baffled white men. It was the spectacle of two cowboys bending over a stricken comrade on the otherwise empty pasture where Mary's cattle had been grazing prior to the raid.

They were the punchers who had been in charge of the herd, and, riding over to them with Buck and the rest of the men, Mary spoke in an urgent tone.

"Who is it that's hurt?" she asked anxiously.

"It's Lefty, Miss Mary," one of the herdsmen told her. "He's in a pretty bad way. Tim here has got a slug in the shoulder, too. We did our best, but them rustlers was too many for us, I guess. I wish you could've shown up sooner. The cattle would have been saved, then."

October 3rd, 1936.

"We were held up by a bunch of renegades," Buck put in. "Which direction did those rustlers take?"

"They drove the cattle south," came the answer. "Looked as if they were heading for Dead Man's Pass. They'll be there by now."

Mary exchanged a despairing glance with her foreman.

"Dead Man's Pass," she said heavily. "That's the last of my herd."

"You're right, Miss Mary," Steve muttered. "Your father allus said that a cow through Dead Man's Pass was a gone critter. Once a rustler gets a drove beyond that point there's no chance of finding your stock any more."

"We can try, can't we?" It was Buck's voice again. "Come on. Let's give it a whirl, anyway. A couple of you take Tim and Lefty into town and have the doctor look them over. The rest of us will make for the pass."

The encouraging strain in which he spoke was infectious, yet in their hearts those who accompanied him southward to Dead Man's Pass felt that their quest was a vain one. Nor were their convictions ill-founded, for, although they searched the hills until they were saddle-weary, they discovered no trace of the missing cattle.

There was a hint of dawn in the sky when the party at length returned to Hidden Valley, and, as he prepared to bid Mary good-bye in front of the ranch-house porch, Buck could not help noticing how drawn and pale her features were.

"You're all in, Mary," he said to her. "Better get to bed and get some sleep."

"I'm not tired, Buck," she murmured. "Just depressed. I was going to sell those cattle to-morrow and realise some money on them. Now I'm flat broke—no money for supplies, no money to pay the men their wages."

"Aren't you forgetting the offer the railroad company made you for your land?" Buck told her reassuringly.

"But that deal will take time," she pointed out, "especially with Blake, the railroad representative, lying up there in one of my guest rooms and hovering between life and death. No, it's ready cash I need. I only wish I knew where that gold mine of dad's was located. A few nuggets out of it and I could pay my way."

Buck eyed her whimsically.

"Why don't you get the chart of the mine from the Phantom?" he suggested. "You say he's taking care of it for you."

"Well, I surmise he is," Mary answered. "But, not knowing who he is or where to locate him, how can I possibly get word to him that I need that map?"

Buck managed to check the smile that came to his lips.

"Maybe he'll find out for himself," he said. "He seems to be the kind of hombre who has ways and means of picking up information."

And shortly after making this cryptic and unenlightening observation, Buck Grant took his leave and set out for his homestead on Dry Creek.

The Phantom's Message

THE following evening Harvey Delaney dropped in at the Hidden Valley outfit to see Mary Grayson, and he had not been there long before the girl was telling him of the predicament that she was in.

Delaney listened to her story sympathetically, and when she had finished talking he leaned towards her and addressed her in an earnest tone.

"You're sure in a spot, Mary," he said to her, "but I'd like you to know that you can count on me for anything you need. Of course, I can't offer you the price for your ranch that the railroad company has mentioned. Nevertheless, if you're willing to take ready cash—"

"Oh, no, Harvey," the girl interrupted. "It's very kind of you, but it would hardly be fair to go back on the deal that I was arranging with Mr. Blake when he was shot down. I practically gave him my word that I'd do business with his company."

Delaney looked at her shrewdly. "Then maybe I could make you a loan," he volunteered. "I'll let you have what money you need, and you can pay me back when you sell your property to the railroad."

"No thanks, Harvey," Mary rejoined. "I couldn't think of imposing on you to that extent. I'm afraid you misunderstood me when I started to speak about my troubles. I wasn't hinting that you should help me out."

"I know that, Mary," the neighbouring cattleman said gently, "and I'm not surprised that your scruples won't permit you to borrow off me. But it would be a salve to your conscience if we made a business arrangement of the whole thing, wouldn't it?"

"How do you mean?"

"Well, call it a mortgage if you like," Delaney explained. "I'll lend you a sum of money at an agreed rate of interest repayable within thirty days—your ranch to stand as security in the event of default. Of course, I don't need any security so far as you're concerned, Mary. We've been friends too long for that. But if we draw up an agreement and conduct this matter as a business proposition, then you won't have to look upon it as an act of charity—which is your only objection to my offer, I take it."

Both Delaney and Mary were unaware of the fact, but an attentive ear was pressed close to the keyhole on the other side of the door behind which they were talking. It was the ear of Lizzie, Mary Grayson's housekeeper, an honest enough young woman, but a born eavesdropper and an inveterate gossip.

Lizzie had heard all, and she continued to listen-in to their discussion until Mary and Delaney moved away from the door, and their voices became an indistinct murmur. Then she went out on to the ranch-house veranda, and, catching sight of a cowboy who was loitering near the porch, she hastened to transmit her news.

The cowboy in question was none other than Spooky, and Lizzie beamed at him smugly.

"Everything's going to be all right now," she declared, in the knowing accents of one who enjoyed imparting information.

Spooky stared at her in a puzzled fashion.

"Everything's going to be all right now?" he reiterated. "What do you mean?"

"I just heard Miss Mary and Harvey Delaney talkin' in the lounge," the housekeeper replied. "Poor thing, Miss Mary was all het-up on account of havin' no ready cash, an' that nice Mr. Delaney allowed as he'd lend her as much money as she wanted—on the security of her ranch."

Spooky gave a slight start, but, recovering himself, affected to be as pleased as Lizzie evidently was. At the first opportunity he slipped away, however, and a minute after he had left the housekeeper he was riding in the direction of Dry Creek, determined to acquaint Buck with the tidings that he had received.

Buck was not alone in his cabin. He had received a visitor in the person of Judge Holmes, and the pair of them were deep in conversation when Spooky broke in upon them.

"Hey, Buck," the little fellow exclaimed without preamble, "there's something you oughta know. Delaney's at Hidden Valley offerin' Mary Grayson a loan on the security of her ranch. I ain't got nothin' against Delaney, but I don't like the sound of a proposition that has a mortgage mixed up in it."

Buck stood up, and so did Judge Holmes. But whereas the expression on the younger man's countenance was tense and grim, that on the features of the judge was mildly impassive.

"Why now, Spooky, you're not being very fair to Delaney," Holmes protested.

"He's been a friend to the Graysons all along, and I call this a real neighbourly gesture. Buck's just been telling me what the loss of that herd meant to Mary, and naturally Harvey Delaney would want to help her out. He's got plenty of money to do it, too."

"Yep, and plenty of mortgages on other ranches as well, according to all accounts," Buck cut in.

"Why, surely you don't suspect him of having any ulterior motive?" the judge queried.

"I suspect anybody who's trying to get a foothold in this country," was Buck's retort, "especially with the railroad aiming to lay a line clean through it. The man who holds territory here can stick out for a fortune when the railroad company wants to buy. And just because Delaney has been friendly with the Graysons all along, that won't make his mortgage any the less binding. He wouldn't be the first hombre to forget friendship when there was a stack of dough in sight."

Judge Holmes pursed his lips. "That's true," he reflected, "and a mortgage would certainly give him power over Mary. Yet it might be kind of difficult for you or me to tell her that, Buck. She thinks a good deal of Delaney."

The stalwart Ranger gave him a sidelong, thoughtful glance.

"There's someone else whose opinion she values pretty highly, judge," he commented. "I mean the Phantom Rider. She doesn't know he's Buck Grant, but from the way she's talked it's clear she has a lot of faith in him."

"I get it, Buck," Spooky interposed. "You're gonna ride as the Phantom again, an' give her a piece of advice."

"Spooky, you're almost too intelligent to live," Buck said with a grin.

"But, by the way, have you got that chart I asked you to take care of? I want it, for to-morrow I'm ridin' north to locate the secret mine. If I can lay my hands on any gold, that may be there, Mary Grayson's immediate troubles will be over."

The map of the mine was produced, and Buck thrust it into his pocket. Then he rigged himself out in the garb that he wore as the Phantom, and, Spooky having saddled Silver in the meantime, the big fellow was soon galloping along the trail that led to the Hidden Valley outfit.

He prayed that he would not be too late to prevent Mary from coming to any definite arrangement with Harvey Delaney, and when he at length reached the vicinity of the Grayson ranch-house he lost no time in dismounting from his horse and advancing towards the building on foot, leaving Silver tethered in a cobbie that was within a stone's throw of the veranda.

Everything seemed in his favour. No one was about, and the only light in the ground floor of the ranch-house came from a room which he knew to be the lounge; and as he reached the open window of that lounge he peered cautiously over the sill and saw Delaney and Mary seated at a table there.

Delaney was reading the contents of a document which he had apparently drawn up, and Buck heard his voice clearly.

"Thirty days from the above date," the man was quoting, "I, Mary Grayson, promise to repay Harvey Delaney the sum of ten thousand dollars, and hereby pledge the Hidden Valley ranch as security for payment of same."

He paused, and then: "Well, Mary," he continued, "that's the agreement, and I'm glad I've finally persuaded you to shelve your scruples in regard to borrowing money from me. For I don't think I need mention that you haven't a better friend in Benson County."

"I'm very grateful to you, Harvey," the girl said, "for I really am up against it."

"All right, then," Delaney announced. "Put your signature to this, Mary, and I'll let you have my cheque for the ten thousand."

Mary picked up a pen, and the neighbouring rancher thrust the document towards her. Another moment and the transaction would have been carried out, but even as the girl was on the point of attaching her name to that deed she heard something fall with a light thud behind her chair.

She started, looked round quickly, and caught sight of a crumpled fragment of paper lying on the floor. It was wrapped around a stone, and in the very instant that she snatched it up it dawned on her that it must have been thrown through the window.

"What is it, Mary?"

Delaney spoke the words, but without answering him the girl stumbled across to the window, and as she looked out into the night she discerned a familiar figure running in the direction of a cobbie—the figure of a man in a white cloak—the figure of the mystery rider whom she knew as the Phantom.

With a sharp intake of the breath, Mary drew back from the window, and, unfolding the missive that she had picked up, she scanned it rapidly, and read as follows:

"Don't accept a loan from anyone, not even Harvey Delaney.—THE PHANTOM RIDER."

"Mary, what is it? What's that note you picked up? Let me see it."

Delaney's voice aroused her. She found him standing by her side, but it was obvious he had not desecrated the Phantom. His eyes were riveted on the scrap of paper which she was holding, and which she now made haste to conceal.

"I can't show it to you, Harvey," she gasped.

"But why?"

She did not explain—scarcely knew what to say. She only knew that she was prepared to follow the Phantom's counsel, blindly. Delaney was her friend, but the Phantom had proved himself an even greater friend, and even though his identity was unknown to her she felt that it was impossible to question his judgment. Indeed, the very mystery that surrounded him seemed to lend force to this message from him.

At last she found her tongue.

"Harvey," she stammered out, "I—I can't accept that loan."

"What do you mean, Mary?"

"It's something I can't discuss, Harvey—"

And then she stopped, for at that moment Lizzie burst into the room, her eyes goggling, her face drained of every vestige of colour.

"You've heard of the Phantom Rider, ain't you?" the white man queried.

"Miss Mary!" the housekeeper screeched in alarm. "Miss Mary, I just saw that ghost man from the window of my room! Him they calls the Phantom! I saw him—plain as daylight—ridin' away into the brush!"

Mary stole a furtive and uncertain glance at Harvey Delaney. His countenance seemed to have grown suddenly rock-like in its hardness, and there was a glitter of resentment in his eyes; and, seeing the look on his features, Mary experienced a feeling of awkwardness, for she knew that it must appear as if she did not trust him.

Yet, much as she hated the idea of him taking offence, she could not bring herself to reconsider her impulsive decision and go against the Phantom's advice.

The Northern Trail

IT was early morning, and Dirk and his fellow-rustlers were assembled in the remote cabin that was their hide-out.

With them was their leader, courting, as usual, the deepest shadows of a room whose windows were thickly curtained, and in the semi-darkness he and his hirelings were holding a conference upon their ambition to acquire Hidden Valley and the rest of the territory through which the railroad company was to lay its line.

"Well, anyway, boss," Dirk was saying, "you've got to give us credit for a clean job the other night. We lifted that Grayson herd, and we've already turned the cattle over to Lopez, the buyer from Mexico."

"Which means them steers are safely over the border," put in Keeler, another of the gang.

"Yes," agreed the dim-seen leader of the band, "and the loss of her herd leaves Mary Grayson with no resources except the gold diggings her father discovered."

He paused, and then drummed his fingers on the surface of a scored table at which he and his men were seated.

"The Phantom has the only means of locating that mine," he went on truculently. "If we only knew where to look for it, we might trap him there—yeah, and net a fortune into the bargain."

"We know that mine is somewhere north of Music Mountain, boss," stated Dirk. "I'm goin' up that way myself this mornin' to meet Red Eagle and his renegades, and pay 'em the dough you promised 'em for helpin' us. I fixed up to see them near Navajo Canyon. Wonder if there's any chance o' me runnin' across the Phantom while I'm around there."

It was a possibility that seemed to impress the gang-leader, for he leaned forward quickly in his chair.

"You never know, Dirk," he said. "Listen, take Gabe and Keeler and Roscoe with you. If you do happen to spot the Phantom, stick to his trail. He may lead you to the mine. And if he does, let him have it in the back as soon as you're certain you've reached the diggings."

Ten minutes later Dirk was riding from the hide-out with the three men who had been detailed to accompany him, and it was at a smart trot that they pushed through the hills, their objective being Navajo Canyon, away to the north.

If the gangsters had but known it, they were not the only ones who had business in that locality on this particular morning, for about the time that they set forth on their journey, Mary Grayson was preparing to leave Hidden Valley ranch and make tracks in the same direction.

In fact, at the very moment when Dirk and his comrades departed from their headquarters, Mary was bidding good-bye to her friend Helen Moore in front of the ranch-house porch.

"But who is this man Hudson that you want to see?" Helen asked, as the other girl climbed astride a pony that had been saddled for her.

"A man who was a close friend of my father's," Mary replied. "He owns a ranch to the north of a place called Navajo Canyon. I was looking through some correspondence in dad's desk last night, and it seems to me that Hudson may have been in his confidence—and perhaps know something about that hidden mine."

Having explained the reason for her decision to travel north, Mary left her friend and took the trail that led towards Music Mountain, and some two or three hours later she might have been seen skirting the slopes of that barren elevation. Then she pressed onward into a sombre gorge—the ravine known as Navajo Canyon—and it was as she emerged from this, after covering the length of it, that something slithered through the dust immediately ahead of her bronc.

It was a rattlesnake that had dragged itself from some rocks near by, and it speedily vanished into a mass of chaparral thickets on the other side of the trail. But its momentary appearance startled Mary's horse, and, cavorting in its alarm, the pony threw its rider heavily to the ground.

The shock of the fall drove the breath from Mary's body, but, recovering herself, she glanced quickly and fearfully in the direction of the thickets. There was no sign of the rattlesnake, however, and she realised with a feeling of thankfulness that the serpent had probably been as scared by the encounter as her horse.

She then became conscious that her right ankle was paining her. Her foot must have been twisted in the stirrup when she had fallen, and as she made an effort to rise it gave way beneath her the instant she laid her weight on it. With an exclamation she sank down again, and was nursing the injury tenderly when she heard a shout and looked round to see a horseman approaching her from the canyon.

"Buck!" she ejaculated. "What are you doing here?"

"I've been scouting around to see if I could find any trace of that mine for you," he answered in a tone of concern. "But what happened, Mary? Are you hurt?"

She told him how she had been thrown, and, dismounting from his bronc, he examined her ankle and noticed that it was swollen. Then he indicated a dilapidated cabin which stood about three hundred yards beyond the mouth of Navajo Canyon.

"I'd better get you over to that shack and do a little doctoring," he said. "Looks to me like you've got a bad sprain there."

He secured her horse and lifted her into the saddle, then swung himself on to Silver's back and led the other pony to the cabin he had espied; and on reaching this he carried her inside and placed her on a chair.

The chair was thick with dust. So was every other article of furniture in the dwelling, which had obviously been untenanted for a considerable time.

"Nice lay-out," Buck commented ironically. "Say, you get your riding-boot and stocking off, while I see if I can find some water."

He went out of the cabin, and was just in time to see Silver cantering off with Mary's horse through a tract of brushwood not far from the shack, whereupon he promptly sprinted after the two broncs and caught up with them as they were slaking their thirst at a stream on the other side of the thickets.

He allowed the animals to drink their fill, and then tethered them to the limb of a tree close by. Next he dipped his sombrero into the stream, and, leaving the ponies where they were, carried the hat back to the cabin.

Mary had removed her boot and her stocking, and, using his sombrero as a basin, he bathed her injured ankle and afterwards bound it tightly with a handkerchief.

A confusion of sounds caused Buck to rush to one of the grimy windows. Three horsemen were galloping towards the dwelling.

They were renegade Indians, their long hair flying in the breeze, their voices raised in a chorus of shrill whoops that were accompanied by the blasts of fire-arms which they were flourishing in their hands.

"Redskins!" Buck jerked. "And heading straight for this shack!"

"Who are they firing at?" Mary gasped.

"Nobody," the big Ranger answered. "They're just getting rid of some high spirits, I guess. If you ask me, they're tanked up."

"Tanked up?" Mary echoed.

"Yeah—drunk," Buck said to her. "By thunder, I'd like to know where they get their liquor from! These Indians are supposed to be civilised. They wear white men's clothes, they ape white men's ways, and they're taught some sort of schooling. But when it comes to taking whisky they revert to type, and there's no telling what mischief they're liable to get up to. It might be wise to keep out of their way. Look, that pantry over there."

He motioned to a cupboard at the far side of the room. A poster had been nailed to the door of it, a faded reward notice bearing the picture of some forgotten bandit and offering a reward for the latter's capture, dead or alive. But Buck paid little heed to that bill as he assisted Mary across to the pantry and entered it with her.

She had snatched up her stocking and her riding-boot, and she donned them in the gloom of the cupboard as she and Buck stood there behind the door, which they had pulled shut. Meanwhile they could hear the renegades approaching rapidly, and soon they realised that the Indians were drawing rein outside the cabin and dismounting.

"Lucky I left our horses out of sight," Buck whispered to Mary in the darkness of the pantry. "Unless those drink-crazed fools blunder off through the thickets in search of water, they'll never guess that anybody else is around."

The three Redskins lurched into the dwelling, talking loudly in their native tongue and brandishing their guns. They had ceased their display of random shooting, however, and in their hiding-place Buck and Mary heard the clatter of the weapons as they were laid heavily on a table—two revolvers and a magazine rifle.

Buck had some slight knowledge of the dialect in which they were conversing, and from their slovenly speech he gathered that they were expecting someone to meet them at the shack.

He also learned that one of the renegades was known as Red Eagle, a fact which convinced him that these were three of the party who had covered the escape of the rustlers when Mary's herd had been "lifted."

Each of the Redskins had produced a flask of rye whisky, and they were imbibing the strong spirit freely. Indeed, they had drained them dry when the pounding of hoofs at length caught their attention, signalling the arrival of another group of horsemen.

Then they heard a white man's voice, a voice which was familiar to Buck, and one which he immediately recognised as the voice of the ruffian known to him as Dirk.

"Hallo, there, Red Eagle!"

Dirk spoke the greeting as he came into the shack with Gabe, Keeler and Roscoe at his heels, and the Indians rose unsteadily, whereupon the four rustlers were quick to divine from their bleared eyes that they had been drinking.

Dirk frowned slightly and looked at Red Eagle, a tall, lean Indian with a face that was both crafty and insolent.

"Fire-water, huh?" the white man said.

"Sure," the Indian rejoined. "Fire-water—plenty good."

"Yeah?" growled Dirk. "Well, better go easy on it—you an' your friends. I know the boss supplies you with it, but he don't expect you to soak yourselves in it."

Red Eagle eyed him mockingly, and then, after a brief silence, Dirk addressed him again.

"Listen," he said, "we're here to slip you some dough for what you did the other night. But afore we pay you off I want to mention another job that we'd like you to tackle."

"So?" Red Eagle grunted. "What you want me do, huh?"

Behind the closed door of the pantry, Buck and Mary were listening with bated breath, and Dirk's next words caused them to stiffen involuntarily.

"You've heard of the Phantom Rider, ain't you?" the white man queried. "And you know the sort of rig-out he wears, don't you?"

"Sure," was the Indian's laconic reply.

"All right," Dirk went on. "We've got a hunch he may be somewhere in the hills north of here, lookin' for a lost gold-mine, and it's occurred to me that you might get your band together and spread out in the hope of spottin' him."

Red Eagle's sloe-black eyes seemed to narrow.

"So?" he remarked again. "And if we do spot him?"

"Trail him till he finds the mine," Dirk answered. "Then feed him lead. But get this, Red Eagle—you'll have to sober up, for right now you couldn't hit a barn door with a load o' buckshot."

It was an observation that kindled an expression of resentment on the Indian's features.

"You dare say that to me, Dirk?" he mouthed thickly,

"SEVEN SINNERS"

He beamed at the priest. "Those clothes suit you, but if you're thinking of trying any more disguises, you cure your limp—it betrayed you. I found out that a Dr. Evans had signed the death certificate, and when I went to see the doctor he had been lured away. He was killed at Ramley in that train smash. The man who derailed the Nice express this time shoved a lorry across the permanent way. That's two crimes you people are responsible for."

The three conspirators glanced at each other in fear.

"A ring on Evans' hand made me suspicious about the Pilgrims of Peace." He looked at the priest. "I got a call through to Buenos Aires, and though you told me, Hoyt, you had never been there, the police of South America knew you. They're expecting you—all of you—on the John Murdoch."

He took out a slip of paper. "I happen to have an agent on that ship, and this cable states that your destination is South America, and that the John Murdoch is stuffed full of guns, bombs, and machine-guns. You'd get a pretty stiff sentence for gun-running, but for murder—"

"We've never murdered anyone," Sir Charles whimpered. Harwood could see the man shaking. "This is the first I've heard about Evans. He was my best friend, and—"

"Keep your mouth shut, you fool!" snarled Hoyt.

"You'd better talk soon or you'll be for the high jump," mocked the detective, and leaned forward. "Maybe I can help you. You see, I don't think you had a hand in these murders. I don't think any of you have the nerve to send a train crashing off the lines and needlessly killing people, but your ringleader would. Tell me his name, and—"

He took out a cigarette and lit it. "And I might do my best for you."

"He's bluffing!" cried Hoyt. "Hold your tongues!"

"I assure you that I—" Harwood happened to look up and noticed that in a mirror he could see the rest of the dining-car. His voice died away because he could see a man's back—a man that held a cigar quite close to his ear—the man who had sat next to Sir Charles Webber at the Guildhall banquet. Even as he watched, the man got leisurely to his feet and strolled out of the compartment.

Harwood glanced at Caryl.

"I now know who is the ringleader of this bunch. A very ruthless man, who would not hesitate to double-cross any person that stood in his path." He studied three frightened faces. "Are you going to talk or are you too scared of him? Nothing can happen to you in an express travelling at eighty miles an hour, and—"

"But, John"—Caryl touched his arm—"we're not travelling all that fast. The train is stopping."

"So we are—curious." Harwood was puzzled. "Sounds as if we were coasting along." He rushed to a window and tried to peer forth into the darkness. "We're not doing more than twenty miles an hour."

Harwood suddenly thought of the man whom he knew to be the train-wrecker. Might the man not attempt a third crime? In this train were the only people who could betray the murderer's secret. The sound in the train changed to a dull rumbling.

"We're in a tunnel!" he shouted.

They saw him race up the saloon car and fling open a door. Next moment Harwood was back in the saloon, and they saw by his face that something was radically wrong.

"The coach has been uncoupled," he cried. "It looks as if we're going to stop in a tunnel."

"He's tricked us!" screamed Sir Charles Webber. "I warned you not to trust him."

"Come on!" Harwood beckoned to Caryl. "We've got to get out of here."

The detective and Caryl, followed by the others, dashed down the saloon. The coach groaned to a stop with a shudder. On flinging open the door, at first they saw only blackness.

"That white patch," Hoyt pointed. "That's the mouth of the tunnel. It's gone black. What's that I can hear?" "Good heavens," gasped Harwood, "it's a train!"

In that moment Harwood saw everything. He realised now why the ring that had been found on Dr. Evans had been given to him. It was to lure him to this coach, which the wrecker had uncoupled knowing it would come to a stop in this tunnel.

The roar of the train grew louder. With screams of fear Elizabeth Wentworth dashed back into the saloon, followed by Webber and Hoyt. Harwood could see the flames from the smoke-stack of the oncoming engine.

"We've got one chance," Harwood yelled, and gripped the girl's arm. "A refuge in the tunnel for line repairers." They leaped down on to the track.

Paul Turbe sauntered into a Gaumont-British news theatre and selected a comfortable stall. They were showing pictures of the terrible smash that had occurred in a tunnel when a coach had been uncoupled. Everyone had been killed, according to the report.

The Assistant Prefect smiled as he watched the gruesome scenes. He decided he would like a cigar. He bit off the end and placed the Corona in his mouth. He fumbled for a match.

"Excuse me," said a hoarse voice behind him, and a lighter flickered into flame.

"Thanks," murmured Paul Turbe, and, turning round, stared into the face of John Harwood.

Paul Turbe drew a gun and tried to make a get-away, but there were too many men watching that news theatre and inside that news theatre; men who were after Turbe—real Scotland Yard men. Only one man died in the gun fight, and that man was Paul Turbe.

The Buckley registrar was astounded when Harwood and Caryl walked into his office. He beamed at them.

"You've come to register your child?"

"No, sir," chuckled Harwood. "You see, we've just had a telegram from a Lady Morland in Scotland. You wouldn't know her, but she's found her necklace, got caught in some dress or other. Of course, that doesn't mean anything to you, but it means a lot to us, because now we won't get fired, and as we've just collected quite a nice reward for assisting in killing a most unpleasant scoundrel, we thought we'd celebrate by getting married."

"THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE"

when he spoke his voice was steel-like. "This is my show, Dave," he replied. "not yours! There's been enough killing in this family and there's going to be no more. I loved little Buddy as a brother just as you did, Dave; but I brought all this trouble on you, and it was I who was responsible for Buddy's death."

He looked round sternly as he picked up his gun from the table.

"Let no one attempt to stop me," he said. "I'm goin' over to the Falins, and if they don't wipe me out I'm wiping them out."

But even as the door closed on him June was rushing after him, though her mother caught her and held her.

"Let me go—let me go!" panted the girl. "He'll be killed—he'll be killed!"

In a flash she had thrown herself into her father's arms and was pouring out her words in an incoherent stream.

"Oh, let me go—go after him—stop him! They'll kill him, and—and I love him! Oh, I can't help it, but I've always loved him, and if they kill him I'll die."

Just for a moment there was a deathly silence. Over his daughter's head old Tolliver's eyes met Dave's. The latter had gone a little white, but his jaw had come out. Without another word he walked across to the door. But there was no gun in his hand as he went out.

Hale, striding along in the direction of the Falins, swung round as he heard footsteps behind him.

"This is my job, Dave," he said curtly. "I don't want you here."

Dave's answer was to slam out his fist with all the force behind it he could muster, catching Hale on the point of the jaw and sending him sagging limply to the ground.

Just for a second he stood looking down on the inert body, strangely sorrowfully. Then he picked up his gun, tossed it among the bushes and with his hands in his pockets set out at a smart pace for the Falin's shack.

Buck Falin and his sons sat in their shack, the old man with his head resting in his hands. And once more he gave vent to his feelings as he had done many times before during the last few days.

"We've always fought against men, we Falins. And now we've killed a kid—a pretty little innocent kid. And they'll label me in these parts as the man who kills kids."

Wade Falin spoke suddenly, as he lounged against the window.

"Holy smoke! Here's Dave Tolliver without his gun!"

In a flash he had snatched up his gun, but his father leaped at him and whirled it out of his hand.

"Stop that!" he commanded and held up his hand for silence.

They all looked on, wondering—heard the footsteps getting nearer, heard a knock on the door.

"Who's there?" demanded the old man.

"Dave Tolliver."

"What d'you want?"

"To talk with you—and I've got no gun."

It was a strange scene. Dave stood erect, his hands at his sides. Buck

Falin faced him, his sons behind him. And then Dave spoke.

"I came to tell you, Mr. Falin, that we're through. You've licked us and we know it. Can't we stop all this killin' now for ever?"

The old man gazed incredulously at him for a space.

"Are you—speakin' truth?" he demanded at length.

"I mean every word I've said. We want to finish with the feud."

The old man's eyes bored him intently. But they went down the next minute.

"I just don't know what to say," he answered. "There ain't no words of mine, worse luck, that can bring your poor little Buddy back, but I'll be sorry for it all the days of my life, Dave Tolliver, and I'd like you to know it. I've never killed a kid yet—and I want you to believe that I never meant to."

"Thank you, Mr. Falin."

"Will you—will you shake hands, Dave Tolliver?"

He put out a hand, and the next moment the younger man had gripped it tightly.

The old man stood silent while the door closed. Wade Falin broke the silence and there was a laugh in his voice. For he had picked up his gun and was watching Dave as he strode away.

"Gosh, dad, that was real cunnin'. Why, I thought you meant to let him get away first of all. As it is—"

His gun went to his shoulder, there was a quick report, he saw Dave stagger and fall. But the next minute another shot rang out, and Wade Falin sagged to the floor and lay very still. And his father, with the smoking gun in his hand and his eyes blazing with wild fury spoke:

"The rat—the dirty rat!" he exclaimed furiously. "Fetch Dave Tolliver in, all of you. If he dies, I'll kill the rest of 'you!"

It was old Falin himself who carried Dave into the Tolliver shack and laid him down. It was old Falin himself who faced Judd Tolliver as a brave prisoner faces the firing party.

"I've got to tell you, Judd Tolliver," he began, but in a moment his voice faded away. For Dave's eyes had opened and he was signing them all to listen, as to their amazement his hand went out and gripped Buck Falin's.

"Let me—do—the tellin'," he murmured faintly. "The feud's—over. We've shaken hands—you've got to, too, dad. Comin' away I fell on my gun."

Buck Falin's head went down, and Dave's faint voice murmured on as he smiled at June in the shelter of Hale's encircling arm.

"It's all right now. You two'll—be able—to get married—and—"

As Buck Falin put out his hand and Judd Tolliver gripped it Dave's smile deepened.

"Swell," he murmured. "Now I don't care—what—"

His voice trailed away, his head drooped to the pillow. But the two old men both stood gripping hands tightly. Death had taken yet one more victim; but both knew that it was the last that the feud would ever claim. The feud between the Tollivers and the Falins was at an end.

"THE DRAGNET"

"Okay. I'll be there. It's a trick box all right."

Larry slained down the receiver. He ran his car a little way down the street, then left it parked outside a house. He must trust to his legs now.

Meanwhile, at the Dover Club, things were happening. Ross, returned from his pilgrimage to the Wonder Hotel, had moved about the club in his usual manner, feeling rather sick inwardly, but, outwardly, all oily courtesy to his patrons.

As Ross had passed by a solitary diner in correct evening clothes, this gentleman had risen softly and had come behind him, right hand in the pocket of a brand new dress jacket. Something like a short stick stuck out the pocket.

"Keep walking, Joe. Keep smiling. I've got you covered, and I'll hole you through and through if you won't! It's Fred, all right, don't worry. Keep walking—straight to your office, Joe."

Ross, with the gentleman in correct clothes close behind him, had "walked," more or less naturally, across the floor back to his office.

"Which of you killed Mollie?"

"I didn't, Fred. I swear it!"

"Didn't you, Joe? Just too bad!"

Fred Cole, hatchet-faced, pale and deadly with determination, was caressing the trigger of his pistol.

"It—it was Crane," Ross muttered thickly. "Shot her—before—before—I could stop him."

"You're a liar, Joe."

"It's the straight truth."

Cole played with the pistol lovingly.

"Get him here, Joe. Telephone for him," came the quiet order.

Ross took up the instrument and dialed a number, his fat hand shaking.

Crane said he would be over in ten minutes.

Only the tick-tock of the clock on the mantel behind the perspiring Ross disturbed the silence until somewhere about ten-thirty, when the office door gently opened to admit a sergeant of police and two policemen. The sergeant, levelling a pistol at Cole, spoke sharply:

"Game's up, Fred! Drop that gun!" As Cole sulkily obeyed, Ross put up his hands.

"Glad you've come, officer. He'd got me in a jam."

Cole, white as chalk, muttered:

"He killed my wife. Shot her dead in the 'phone call-box outside."

The sergeant signed to the two policemen who closed in on Cole, and, without any fuss, put handcuffs on his wrists.

"Stop Him!"

ANNETTE, the check girl, was off duty for a few minutes and somebody else was on the door when Larry and Kit walked in.

"Cards, please," came the challenge. "This is a members' only night."

Larry stepped up to the man, poking a gun under his ribs. Kit closed the outer door and dropped the bolt.

"Keep quiet," said Larry in level tones. "The police are in possession. Tell me about that call-box and save your dirty skin."

"There's a box drawer that pulls out, gov'nor—so's the gov'nor can see who's telephoning," whined the man.

"And the gov'nor is?"

"Crane, sir, He's the real guy here."

Larry and Kit entered Ross' room just as the police were marching out with the gaol-breaker Cole.

The telephone tinkled on the desk where Ross was lighting a cigarette. The sergeant snatched up the instrument, the rest all suddenly silent.

"Mr. Lawrence Thomas?" The sergeant put down the 'phone as he turned to Larry.

"Yes."

"You're wanted on a charge of murder at the Wonder Hotel."

"That's the man who helped to kill Arthur Hill." Larry jumped at Ross, clutching him round the throat. They glared at each other. "Spit it out, Ross!" Larry ordered.

Ross made no attempt to struggle. His beady eyes met Larry's in sullen defiance as he snarled:

"I know you killed him, and I'll give evidence to that effect. I saw you go in."

"So you were there?" Larry released the fellow. "Note that, officer!"

Kit, clinging to Larry's arm, drew him away. The policemen escorting Cole paused, waiting for orders.

A trampling of hasty feet heralded the arrival of a flying squad of police sent in search of Larry. They were in charge of an inspector, who at once took over. He addressed Larry:

"Take it quietly, Thomas. You've put yourself wrong by resisting the police in execution of their duty. Anything you say will be taken down."

"I ask nothing better," Larry told him. "I've found papers hidden in Hill's desk which told me what I wanted to know. He was on the payroll here—there's proof beyond all question. He knew too much, and so they killed him, trying to plant it on to me. I had to get back here. I knew Cole was coming for revenge and I didn't want him to forestal justice."

Cole, manacled and seething with passion, spoke out:

"I'd have had 'em both if you fellers hadn't pushed in. I'll get 'em yet."

"Silence, you!" shouted the inspector.

"Go on, Thomas, I'm taking notes."

At this moment Crane walked in, clean and spry and cool as always.

"What's this, inspector? People in the hall are beginning to fear a raid."

The inspector tapped his notebook with his pencil.

"Go on, Thomas."

Larry handed him the pistol from his pocket.

"Found in Hill's desk. You'll find it fits the bullet that killed Mollie Cole. It hasn't been fired since. Hill was to get rid of it, but didn't get a chance. It's Crane's gun—you'll be able to check up on that." He shot Mollie Cole through the wall here."

"Through the wall?" the inspector asked.

Crane merely smiled.

"Yes," Larry advanced to the wall between the phone box outside and the room itself. Here was a small knob in the beading of the panels. Larry took hold of the knob and drew out a hidden drawer. At once a gap in the wall appeared, and the interior of the call-box was visible to all. On the back of the drawer was lettered:

"Local calls 5 cents."

"Fits into the frame," Larry explained. "You'd never guess it from the box. Crane put the bullet into Mollie's back while Ross rang off the phone from this desk."

"A pretty story," sneered Crane. "I'm glad you're writing it down. What interest could I have in killing the woman?"

"You killed her all right!" Cole hissed. "Same as you had me put away. We knew too much. And now you've done in that fool Hill. I'll tell you everything, inspector—how the wheel's faked—how the dice are loaded—how Crane has lined his pockets, the tyre. How we've all been his dupes, first to last. Even Joe Ross—"

The inspector suddenly dived at Crane, who had his hand to his mouth. "Stop him!"

A brief, violent struggle followed, then Crane was handcuffed between two of the police. He was still smiling.

Larry and Kit were allowed to go. As they climbed into Kit's car, she gave the wheel seat to him.

"I'm going back to dad to-morrow," Larry told her. "Partners once more. What about you coming in, too; in the firm of Thomas & Thomas?"

Kit rested her head on his shoulder. "Suits me," she whispered.

"THE SUICIDE CLUB"

"You will answer to me, you scoundrel!" he cried.

O'Rook had handed Florizel a pair of rapiers. The prince offered the hilts of them to Noel.

"Choose, if you please. I challenge you to a duel to the death. These gentlemen will keep the ring for us."

"I ask nothing better," answered Noel. "My quarrel, after all, is with you, Prince Florizel, as the representative of a tyrannical monarchy."

A ring was formed and they fought with ferocity, Noel showing himself a swordsman of no mean ability. Twice he was nearly disarmed by Florizel, and twice saved himself, to press the prince with new and surprising vigour.

At last Florizel forced him into the garden. The crowd—Noel's men and O'Rook's—followed to keep silent watch. Noel pressed the attack, and, for a few tense minutes, held Florizel at bay. Then, step by step, the prince forced his opponent backward until he was standing, all unaware, on the brink of the pit he had dug for his victims. Here Noel fenced with great desperation and actually succeeded in wounding Florizel in the left arm.

The prince suddenly broke through Noel's guard and struck his rapier sharply out of his hand. Noel flung up his arms as he overbalanced and fell backwards with a crash into the open grave!

When his men came hurrying to lift him out, they found that he had broken a leg in the fall.

Florizel handed his rapier to O'Rook. "Honour is satisfied," he stated. "See that he is taken to a hospital at once."

He turned to go. From somewhere out of the crowd came Brenda, hatless and frantic in her haste. She flung her arms about Florizel.

"My prince!" she cried in rapture. "I adore you!"

"Darling girl," whispered Florizel. "Calm yourself. We are not alone."

Six weeks later, the Princess Brenda was married with great pomp and ceremony in the lovely old cathedral of Irania to his Highness, the Crown Prince of Karovia!

"THE PHANTOM RIDER"

swaying a little on his feet. "Me, best shot in all this country? Huh, I outshoot you, anyhow!"

The white man's upper lip curled in a sneer.

"Don't make me laugh," he scoffed. "I'll bet you five bucks against your mustang that you can't outshoot me."

Quick to accept the challenge, Red Eagle snatched his forty-five from the table and rammed it into his holster with an uncertain gesture. Then he commanded Dirk to select a target, and, looking about him in a somewhat amused fashion, the rustler suddenly pointed across the room.

"There you are," he said. "We'll aim for that guy's nose. That's the target. We draw and shoot, and the first bullet that hits the mark is the winner. Keeler here can give the word to fire."

Within their hiding-place, Buck and Mary wondered what Dirk meant by "that guy's nose." They did not know that his extended hand was indicating the photograph on the bill which was pinned to the door of the small pantry where they had concealed themselves!

"Good!" they heard Red Eagle say. "Me think you lose five dollar, Dirk."

There was a pause, during which the two marksmen looked towards Keeler for the signal; Dirk steady and confident to the point of contempt, Red Eagle no less confident, but far from steady.

"Go!" Keeler ejaculated all at once, grinning as he pronounced the word, and on the instant Dirk and the Indian plucked their irons from their holsters and pumped lead at the door of the cupboard, the bellow of the guns resounding deafeningly through the shack!

HARD ROCK HARRIGAN

Men of Muscle

UP on the Colorado River, where it runs through the mountains of the barren Gila country and divides California from Arizona, the age-old pinnacles and crags that tower into the vault of the sky seemed to listen stolidly to the voices of progress which had been raised in their midst.

The voice of progress was made up of a conglomeration of sounds—the clatter of machinery, the remote grinding of powerful drills, the deep rumblings of dynamite-charges detonated by the thrust of a plunger, the rattle of tip-cars that came shunting along a narrow-gauge track and hurled load after load of dirt and rubble down a sharp embankment—and, like an undertone, the shouts of men who banded instructions while the din went on around them.

Coming upon the scene unexpectedly, you might have pondered over the reason for this activity in a locale which was without a doubt one of the remotest and most desert regions in the United States of America. But if you had seen two grimy workmen who emerged from a yawning cavern in the face of one of the hills, and if you had listened to their conversation, you would have been speedily enlightened as to the nature of the project that was afoot.

The two workmen in question were members of a drilling crew, one of them answering to the name of McClintock, the other being known simply as Oscar.

"But I don't see the choke," said Oscar, who was Dane by nationality and dumb by nature.

McClintock stopped and looked at him with the air of a patient and long-suffering man. He was six feet and a couple of inches of bony American, with a whimsical face that might have been stamped out of a piece of old leather, so weather-worn had it become.

"Yuh don't see the joke?" he murmured. "Well, I'll explain it to yuh again. This stupid guy that don't know nothin' about hard rock miners, he says he don't see the sense in us fellers buildin' a tunnel 'way out here. So I says this tunnel ain't no short cut, but a diversion tunnel."

"Den vot dis stoopid guy say?" inquired Oscar, who had been listening with careful attention.

McClintock grinned.

"Diversion?" he says. So I say 'Yeah, a diversion tunnel—for takin' the waters o' the Colorado. Otherwise where d'yuh think the river would go while we was buildin' the dam?'"

"Go on," Oscar coaxed.

"Well," announced McClintock, "all of a sudden this guy up an' says, 'Oh, I understand now. To divert the water, eh? When you mentioned diversion I thought you meant you were just buildin' the tunnel for fun.'"

Mac capped the anecdote with a gust of raucous laughter that went echoing along the cavern from which he and Oscar had just emerged. But the Dane's features remained immobile, for he still didn't see the "choke," and so his elongated comrade's voice registered mirth unaccompanied.

If Mac's bellowing merriment filled the mouth of the tunnel, however, the sound did not travel far into the interior of that cavern ere it was drowned by the other noises that prevailed there.

These noises were caused by machine-drills that were biting into the rock, implements which could break up the toughest stratum that the world's crust could boast, and which had already helped to bore out this very tunnel to a distance of a quarter of a mile in the course of a month or two.

They were handled by men of might and muscle, as strong a breed as any you could wish to find, and these men were in charge of an overseer who held his job by reason of the fact that he was worth any two of them in a scrap.

Yet the overseer, Casey, was not by any means the dominant personality there. For the famous Black Jack Riley was present—Black Jack Riley, the hardest of hard cases—no mere foreman of a drilling crew, but boss of all the crews—in other words, the man responsible for seeing that the task of building the tunnel went ahead per schedule.

He topped the six-foot mark, did Black Jack Riley, though his bullock shoulders and his barrel chest made him look an inch or two shorter than he actually was. Two hundred and ten pounds of flesh and bone and muscle, built on the lines of a buffalo, with a mane of red hair and a face as craggy as the rock-chunks which were carried out of the tunnel by the train-load every day. That was Black Jack Riley.

He was now looking on at the men who were operating the drills, and there was an expression of sourness upon his rugged countenance, an expression that reached its height as he turned to Casey, foreman of the drilling crew.

"This ain't a life-job," he said in a voice that rasped like a file. "Try an' get it into your head that we're workin' against time. Your crew ain't diggin' enough tunnel—that's the long an' short of it."

"But I tell you, Black Jack, I'm doin' all I can," Casey protested, "and October 24th, 1936.

my men are puttin' all they've got into it. You can see that for yourself."

Riley's big mouth twisted into a contemptuous sneer, and he was about to make some harsh and ironic retort when a man came across to him from a 'phone that was fixed to the cavern's wall.

"Super wants to see yuh, Black Jack," the man informed him.

Even Riley was answerable for his actions to someone higher up, and that someone was the superintendent who was in full control of this gigantic project to dam the waters of the Colorado. Without a word, therefore, the tunnel boss strode towards an escapeway or shaft that was connected with the plateau-summit of the hill.

An elevator carried him up through the core of the promontory to the clean, pure air and the welcome light of day, and leaving the pit-head, he walked in the direction of a group of buildings situated not far from that particular outlet.

These buildings formed a kind of settlement, with quarters for the men, a clinic for the treatment of casualties, offices for draughtsmen and clerks and the like, and a canteen big enough to seat a small army.

The superintendent's sanctum was located in the structure occupied by the "collar-and-tie-brigade"—as the miners facetiously called those who worked with the pen and not the drill—and two or three minutes later Black Jack was in conference with his chief.

"Riley," the superintendent declared, "this job is not going through as it should. We're under contract to complete that tunnel so that work on the actual dam can begin before the Fall. But it looks as if we won't do it."

Black Jack squared his mighty shoulders, and an aggressive expression appeared on his craggy face. In contrast to the dapper, quiet-spoken and cultured man seated at the desk he was like some ugly but magnificent barbarian.

"Now, listen, super," he growled, "I've just been talkin' to Casey about that, and although I'd be the last to admit it to any of the men I can't drive 'em any harder. They're goin' top speed right now, and if you want to finish ahead of schedule we've got to have another drill crew."

The superintendent smiled.

"Well, that's why I sent for you," he remarked. "You've been shouting your head off for more men all along, so we're bringing in an extra crew this afternoon. An efficient gang of men they are, too, I can assure you. Real tunnel stiffs, Riley, with a good boss in charge of them. I can guarantee that."

"Yeah? Who is the boss of this new crew, anyway? Maybe I've heard of him. I've been around enough."

For answer the superintendent produced a sheet of paper, and glancing at it, Black Jack saw that it contained the names of the men belonging to the additional crew which had been hired.

The list was headed by one name that stood out before Riley's eyes as if it had been typed in letters of red; a name that caused him to stiffen; a name that set the muscles of his jaw twitching spasmodically in a way that spelled antagonism.

"Hard Rock Harrigan!" he said through his clenched teeth.

"Yes, Hard Rock Harrigan," the superintendent observed. "You'll agree he's a good drill boss."

Black Jack's brows were beetling. Harrigan of all men! They had to pick on that gang. Only too well did he know Harrigan. They'd worked together before—on many a job that had been hailed as one of the wonders of engineering—but they'd never worked hand-in-glove as foreman and under-foreman should.

If there was one man in the world who was poison to Black Jack Riley, that man was Hard Rock Harrigan.

"Yeah," growled Black Jack in answer to the super's comment. "Yeah, sure—he knows his job all right."

The superintendent eyed the big tunnel boss keenly. He was well aware that Riley and Hard Rock Harrigan had never hit it off on previous occasions.

"Now, listen, Black Jack," he warned. "I don't want any trouble between you and Harrigan."

Riley thrust out his jaw.

"I ain't gonna start anything," he said with a particular emphasis.

"That's fine. I don't want you two taking out any time for private scraps on this job, for if you and Harrigan co-operate we'll finish ahead of schedule, and everyone will benefit by the bonus which has been promised as a reward for work well done."

"Well, you don't need to worry about any trouble comin' from my end," Black Jack grunted. "I want my share of that bonus as much as anybody. Besides, that Irishman can make more tunnel than any drill boss I know—"

He paused and rubbed his fingers over the knuckles of his right hand thoughtfully, as if he were dwelling upon the damage those knuckles might do to Harrigan in the event of a rough-house.

"Yeah," he repeated slowly, "I want my share o' that bonus, and I've gotta admit that Hard Rock Harrigan can handle a drill crew. So I'd hate anything to happen to him."

With that he departed from the office, and walking back towards the shaft by which he had ascended from the tunnel, his firm and heavy steps took him near the canteen.

It was as he was passing this building that he saw a number of plates standing on a window-sill. Each of these contained an appetising confection made by the hands of the kitchen-staff, and framed in the window was an attractive, dark-haired girl who was busily squeezing cream on to the pastries through an icing-cone.

She was Ann Anderson, commonly known as Andy, in charge of the canteen arrangements, and a prime favourite with the men.

"M'hm!" said Black Jack, stopping to cast eyes on the contents of the plates and the girl who was bent over them. "Vanilla pie!"

The girl raised her head and smiled at him. She knew Black Jack's liking for this special dish. She was also aware that he considered himself a great lady's man—which was certainly laughable, for he was about as good-looking and gallant as a gorilla.

"M'hm!" Black Jack repeated. "Vanilla pie's my weakness. Guess I'll take a slab now, Andy."

He reached out a vast paw, but Andy checked him and slapped him across the fingers with a hand that was half the size of his.

"You will not," she said. "You'll wait like the rest of the men."

"Yeah? Suppose I don't wanna wait, Andy?"

The girl fixed him with a glance that was meant to be stern.

"You listen to me, Black Jack Riley," she told him. "When you're around that tunnel you can give all the orders you want to, but I'm boss of this mess-hall, and what I say goes."

"Well, maybe you won't have enough pie to go round," Black Jack grumbled. "I gotta new drill crew comin' in this afternoon. They're liable to eat everything in sight—and you know what kind of an appetite that guy Harrigan has."

"Harrigan?"

Andy uttered the name in a breathless tone, and Black Jack was none too pleased as he saw the expression of intense excitement that dawned on her pretty face.

"You don't mean Tim?" she gasped.

"Sure! Didn't they tell you about it?"

There was a warm flush on Andy's cheeks.

"Well, they told me there would be an extra crew," she said joyously. "But they didn't—I didn't know—"

She did not finish the sentence, but suddenly she began to smother one of the vanilla pies with cream, heaping the delicacy until it looked as if a miniature snow-capped mountain-peak were rising from it. And it came to Black Jack's mind all at once that Hard Rock Harrigan had always shown a partiality for vanilla pie, with loads of icing.

His brow darkened. He had a pretty shrewd idea that the pastry on which Andy was now working so eagerly was going to be reserved for Harrigan.

The Coming of Harrigan

BY arrangement with the railroad authorities, the long-distance train from Los Angeles to Santa Fé halted that afternoon on a section of line which was within easy reach of the Colorado River diversion scheme.

Down from that train stepped a bunch of stalwarts who were led by the renowned Hard Rock Harrigan.

He was seventy-two inches and fourteen-odd stone of Irish-American, and as handsome a "devil" as had ever sailed from Dublin Bay. He had the torso and the arms of a weight-lifter and the legs of an athlete, and set on his powerful shoulders was a head that was crowned by a well-brushed thatch of light-brown hair.

His eyes were the twinkling eyes of the true Hibernian, and his bronzed face seemed to radiate good humour. His manner was one that guaranteed him popularity among the majority of his fellow-men, just as his physique commanded respect.

Already in the course of the journey Tim Harrigan had broken up a fight that had started between two or three of the husky miners who were in his charge, but before turning his back on the train the big Irish-American was destined to play the part of intermediary in another dispute.

This second altercation did not concern his comrades, however. It arose between a conductor who had chanced to descend to the track and a slightly built young man whom the official had seen under one of the coaches.

The slightly built young man was of good appearance, but it was obvious he possessed no railroad ticket. He was one of those unfortunates who had been hit by the wave of financial depression that had swept the United States, and it was clear he must have stolen a ride on the train at Los Angeles for the purpose of trying his luck elsewhere.

In short, he had been "bucking the axles"—a common enough practice among hoboes, but one with which brakemen and train conductors had little patience.

"Hey, what are you doin' there?"

the angry official demanded, summoning him forth.

The young man crawled out abjectly, and watching him, Tim Harrigan and his men could not help feeling sorry for him. Though his clothes were frayed the fellow looked a decent sort of lad, and in spite of the fact that he had done wrong by obtaining a free ride on the train, there was something about him that would have roused the compassion of anyone but a stony-hearted railroad conductor.

"I wasn't doing anything," the youngster faltered. "I was just—"

"Just enjoyin' the scenery. I suppose," the conductor broke in with harsh sarcasm. "Yeah, and it's a nice view, ain't it? Huh, cheatin' the company, eh?"

His victim made a gesture of appeal. "I didn't do it from choice," he groaned. "I'm—I'm broke. I'm—flat."

"Is that so? Well, I'm gonna knock you a lot flatter!"

There was an ugly expression on the conductor's face, and, a bully by nature, he suddenly lashed out at the younger man, hurling him to the ground.

Five seconds later the youth was on his feet again. He knew he was in the wrong, but he did not see why he should be treated like a dog, and he attempted to protest hotly, whereupon the train official dealt him another blow.

This time the youth was goaded into defending himself, and as he launched himself at the conductor Hard Rock Harrigan and his comrades gathered round to encourage him and show where their sympathy lay.

But encouragement alone could not sustain the youngster. He had not eaten in twenty-four hours, and was no match for the older man. In half a minute he was biting the dust once more, and then, as he was gamely rising to take still further punishment, the brutal train official whipped out a truncheon and struck him across the skull with it.

That was too much for Tim Harrigan. Legally the conductor had been entitled to give the young fellow a dressing-down, but there had been no necessity to adopt such vicious and cowardly tactics, and with an indignant cry Hard Rock caught hold of the man by the shoulder and swung him round.

"Why, you dirty rat!" he ground out. "I—"

"Oh, you want some, too, do you?" the official snarled, and brought down the truncheon savagely on the Irish-American's outstretched arm.

The impact drew a hoarse grunt of pain from Hard Rock's lips, and momentarily he recoiled. Then with that same arm which had been hit by the truncheon he loosed a sledge-hammer punch that cracked home on the conductor's jaw.

The railroad employee came to earth four paces away, and lay spread-eagled with a blank expression on his face. When he recovered consciousness it was to find Hard Rock standing before him with bunched knuckles.

The young fellow whose part Tim had taken was close by. He had struggled up and was swaying a little on his feet, and, after satisfying himself that the conductor had no wish to resume hostilities, the stalwart Irish-American took charge of the youth and escorted him from the scene.

Followed by his drilling crew, Hard Rock led the youngster to the settlement from which the construction of the Colorado tunnel was being directed, and some time later he was reporting to the superintendent.

He had learned by then that the young man who had "bucked the axles" was known as Michael McGinnis, and he took the opportunity of introducing him and recommending him for a job.

"It would have done your heart good to see the way he stood up to that conductor, superintendent," he declared, after reciting the incident that had occurred down at the railroad track. "Yeah, and the guy was a foot taller than him, too. So I'd like to take him on with me—if it's okay with you, chief."

The super eyed McGinnis shrewdly. "Have you ever done any tunnel work, son?" he asked.

"Well, no," came the reply. "But I've got a college diploma here that says I'm an engineer, though I haven't had much chance to prove it yet."

Young McGinnis produced a document which he handed to the superintendent, and, having glanced at it, the latter nodded approvingly. Then all at once a gruff voice took up the discussion.

It was the voice of Black Jack Riley, who was present at the interview, and who had been looking at Tim Harrigan cynically.

"D'yuh know how to read blue-prints?" Black Jack demanded of Michael McGinnis.

The youth answered in the affirmative, and Riley turned to the super.

"I can use this kid," he stated. "He's just the man I want. How'd yuh like to work for me, McGinnis?"

The college graduate fidgeted uncomfortably.

"Mr. Harrigan asked me to work with him," he began, but was interrupted before he could utter another word.

"Mister Harrigan is outa luck, I'm afraid," Black Jack said grimly.

"Come on with me, kid, and I'll wise yuh up to your job."

With a nod to the super he took Michael McGinnis by the arm and strode towards the door. Then on the threshold he paused and looked back at Hard Rock Harrigan in an ironical fashion.

"I hope I haven't put you out, Mister Harrigan," he remarked.

Tim's blue eyes beamed at him. "Oh, no, no," he rejoined with studied politeness. "I realise that you have to have some brains on your end of the job."

"You said it," Black Jake rumbled, and then, checking as the significance of Tim's comment reached his somewhat sluggish mind, he pulled down his brows in an ugly scowl.

A moment afterwards he and McGinnis had departed, and as the door closed behind them the superintendent spoke to Hard Rock sternly.

"Harrigan, you and Riley can't be together for a minute without looking like a pair of fire-crackers that are ready to explode," he said. "But I'm warning you, I don't want any nonsense on this job."

"What nonsense?" Hard Rock asked, with an air of injured innocence.

"You know what I mean," the super retorted. "There's a crazy tradition among you miners that if a fellow can lick his boss he takes over his job. That tradition has cost me a lot of good men, and we can't afford to have any more of it. Understand this, Harrigan—there's a nice, fat bonus waiting for us if we finish ahead of schedule, and you're in on it, too, provided you don't have any scraps with Riley."

Hard Rock smiled angelically. "Why, the idea never entered my mind, super," he said. "I came here to push this tunnel through, and I'll be as meek as a lamb."

"That's fine," his chief announced. "Oh, by the way, Hard Rock, you'll find a lot of your old friends here. There's McClintock, Oscar, Clancy—and oh, yes, Andy's here, too, in charge of the mess-hall."

Two minutes later Tim Harrigan was forcing his way through a crowd of men who were gathered around the canteen entrance and who were receiving vanilla pies from the fair hands of Ann Anderson, and as the girl set eyes on him her pretty face took on that delightful colour which Black Jack had jealously noted earlier on in the day.

"Hallo, Andy!" Tim greeted her gaily. "Gee, you're a sight for sore eyes—and those pies aren't so hard to look at, either. But on the level, you're the first person I asked for when I got here. Says I to the super, 'Now, tell me—is Andy here?' And if he'd said 'No,' I'd have walked out on the job. 'Tis the gospel truth."

"Just as full of the old blarney as ever, aren't you?" she laughed. "But don't worry; I've saved you a piece of pie."

She went on serving the other men while Tim kept up a running conversation with her, and then at last she gave him the special hunk of cream-smothered pastry that she had held in reserve for him. Delectable it was, too, and when Hard Rock eventually moved off his teeth were working overtime.

Ten yards from the canteen he encountered Black Jack Riley—Black Jack, who was on his way to the mess-hall, and who had stopped suspiciously at sight of the miners who were streaming from it.

Now he looked at Hard Rock Harrigan; then he shot a glance in the direction of Andy, and he saw from the expression that appeared on the girl's features that she had forgotten to spare him even a morsel of pie.

Black Jack slid his mortified gaze upon Hard Rock again, and he clenched his fists as he observed how the latter's smiling lips were plastered with cream. "Vanilla!" Hard Rock murmured dreamily to Black Jack, running the tip of his tongue round the outside of his mouth as he spoke the word.

On the Spree

PRECISELY one week later, while Hard Rock Harrigan's crew was taking a shift in the tunnel, the burly figure of Black Jack Riley came plodding along the narrow-gauge track which had been laid for the transit of the tip-wagons.

Reaching the blind end of the cavern, where Tim and his men were engaged in the task of boring onward through the strata, Black Jack raised his voice above the grinding of the drills and the clatter of a big grab that was scooping up the rubble.

"Good-day to you, Mr. Harrigan," he said.

He spoke with an elegant courtesy that was obviously forced, and Hard Rock answered him in the same tone. Mindful of the superintendent's words and the promised bonus, both of them were doing their best to smother their animosity for each other.

"And good-day to you, Mr. Riley," Tim greeted.

"You're making good headway, I see," remarked Riley.

Hard Rock smiled. "'Tis a good crew I have workin' for me, Mr. Riley," he pointed out.

"Yeah," agreed Black Jack. "But it takes a good man to pick a good crew, Mr. Harrigan."

Again Hard Rock smiled.

"Thank you, Mr. Riley. I appreciate that, coming from you."

"You're welcome, Mr. Harrigan," said Black Jack, and turning, retraced his steps towards the mouth of the tunnel.

Hard Rock's comrades were gazing at one another. Said McClintock to Oscar the Dane, both of whom had been transferred to the handsome Irishman's crew:

"How long has this being goin' on? Great snakes, when they've been workin' on the same lay-out before, Harrigan has allus been waitin' for the chance to fight Riley for his job. Somethin' has allus prevented it, but—"

"Harrigan would fight Riley for der sheer fun of it, ehob or no ehob," Oscar interrupted. "Mark my vords, Mac, dis is joost der calm before der storm. De bigger der calm, de bigger der storm."

Oscar was right, and it was patent to everyone that the politeness that reigned between Black Jack and Hard Rock could not last. Outside of working hours, there occurred too many small incidents that were calculated to make trouble between them.

Andy Anderson figured in some of these. It was noticeable during meal-times that Hard Rock's plate was always heaped high, whereas Black Jack's contained a sufficient but not magnificently abundant quantity which put him on a level with the other men. There was one occasion, too, when rice pudding was served up as a sweet—a dish that had never been to Riley's liking—and it went against his grain when Hard Rock was handed a slab of pie which had been baked by Andy's own hands.

Why Harrigan should have special consideration was something that passed Black Jack's understanding and tried his patience. What did Andy see in the fellow, anyway—to favour him like this?

"Lemon," Tim remarked, tasting the pie and glancing at Black Jack, who sat at the same table along with the superintendent, the draughtsmen and the hospital staff.

Black Jack ground his teeth and glared at the rice pudding which he was expected to eat. Before he could make any comment, however, a man came into the mess-hall carrying a suitcase and looking somewhat the worse for wear.

He was one Murphy, who had been boss of a drill crew that worked on the night shift, and with a face as forelorn as it was bruised he had entered the canteen to say "good-bye."

"What's wrong with Murphy?" asked Michael McGinnis, who was sitting next to Hard Rock. "Why is he quitting?"

"Callahan whipped him," Hard Rock answered, "so he steps into Murphy's job."

McGinnis frowned. "I may be dumb," he murmured, "but I still don't see why he has to quit."

"It's a tradition among the miners, Micky," Tim Harrigan explained. "Once a guy takes a licking from a man under him, his authority is gone. And once he's whipped he'd better move on so he won't get talked about."

"That doesn't seem right to me,"

"The super don't think so, either," Hard Rock said, "but there's nothing he can do about it. It's life, kid, you know—the best man always gets on top."

Perhaps it was without intention, but he happened to look at Black Jack as he made that statement, and, meeting Riley's eyes, he read a challenge in them. Then the defeated Murphy approached the table, and words of genuine commiseration were extended to the man by his erstwhile colleagues.

Murphy took his leave shortly afterwards, passing out of the canteen and out of the life of the camp; and later, when the meal was over, there was a general exodus from the mess-hall.

The men who were off-duty had arranged to pay a visit to the nearest town, and enjoy the delights of civilisation for a few hours. Now it happened that Black Jack Riley was one of those who had been looking forward to this particular "spree," and he had already announced that he and some of his special cronies intended to make the journey in a car which belonged to an individual named Johnson, one of the engineers.

On inquiry, however, Black Jack learned to his chagrin that Johnson had been approached by Hard Rock Harrigan, and had agreed to drive Tim and his whole drill crew to Salton, where the miners were to disport themselves.

Riley and his party were therefore compelled to take one of the ramshackle buses that plied between the construction camp and the town, and the tunnel boss was in no pleasant mood when he arrived at Columbo's Bar and Restaurant, the centre of such night-life as Salton boasted.

Tim and his friends were present, and Black Jack cast dark glances in his direction.

"Tho ham!" he growled. "He knew I was gonna fix things with Johnson, so he steps in first and grabs a lift. An' I have to ride in that broken-down bone-shaker!"

He fed his wrath with two or three quick whiskies, and was still muttering hostile comments regarding Hard Rock Harrigan when he heard a good deal of noise and disturbance coming from another part of the room.

The disturbance consisted of shouting and laughter, and Black Jack traced it to a table at which Micky McGinnis was seated with one of the miners. These two had apparently been drinking more than was good for them, and, though they were merely acting in a high-spirited fashion, their uproarious behaviour was causing the proprietor of Columbo's Restaurant a good deal of concern.

Signor Columbo was a small, fat Italian who employed three former prize-fighters for the special purpose of keeping unruly customers in check, and he made haste to summon these "bouncers" to his side.

"I told you to watcha da tunnel men," he snapped. "Dey are toughs when dey get drunk, and liable to break up everyt'ing."

One of the prize-fighters nodded comprehensively, and with a glitter in his baleful eye he strolled across to the table at which Micky and his fellow-reveller were sitting.

He ignored the college graduate, and confronted the latter's companion, who was standing up and beating time to an orchestra that was playing dance-music. "Havin' lots o' fun, buddy?" the prize-fighter inquired ominously.

Micky's companion blinked at him in a foolish manner.

"Havin' the b—best time in m—my life," he said with a smirk.

"Yeah?" the bouncer rejoined, and then slammed him fairly and squarely in the jaw.

The "drunk" from the construction camp went down like a pole-axed bullock, and his fall excited attention, bringing a crowd to the spot. It was a crowd that included both Hard Rock Harrigan and Black Jack Riley, and, looking at the man on the floor, who lay face-forward, Black Jack addressed Tim sardonically.

"Is that the way you let 'em treat your crew?" he queried. "If that bruiser did anything like that to one o' my men, I'd mop up the place with him."

Hard Rock glanced at him, and then, showing his way to the forefront of the crowd, he stooped and turned over the victim of the prize-fighter's punch. In another moment he was returning to Black Jack's side.

"You'd better start moppin', Riley," he drawled. "That's one of your men."

He was right. The individual on the floor was one Clark, who was closely associated with Black Jack in the work on the tunnel, and, on realising this, the chest of Riley seemed to swell by three or four inches.

In silence he made for the bouncer who had laid Clark low, and, with a seeming admiration that was not borne out by the expression on his craggy face, he prodded the bulging muscle of the pug's thick arm.

"You must have a powerful wallop, brother," Black Jack mused. "You knocked that guy flatter than a pancake."

The prize-fighter grinned smugly.

"Yeah," he said. "When I slaps 'em down, mister, they stay there."

Black Jack raised his heavy brows slightly. Under his own shirtsleeves his own enormous biceps were flexing spasmodically.

"The guy you socked was a nice feller, too," he mentioned. "What was he doin'?"

"Ah, I just didn't like his pan," quoth the pug, "and I thought I'd change it for him."

"Yeah? Well, I don't like your pan, neither, so I'm gonna change it, too."

The words came from Black Jack's throat like a rising mutter of thunder, and with them came a right-hand buffet that was like a bolt from the blue. In one instant the startled pug was attempting to ward it off—in the next it had landed on the point of his chin and he was more well-and-truly "out" than ever Clark had been.

But the flooring of the prize-fighter was a signal for Signor Columbo's other bouncers to take a hand, and next second these were charging to the attack, eager to avenge their comrade by beating up the tunnel boss.

Riley stood firm, and met the foremost with a battering-ram blow that stopped him in his tracks. The other, dodging in, managed to catch Black Jack with a punch that shook him, but speedily came in for a storm of retaliation.

The first man now gathered himself together and sailed into the battle, and, tough as he was, Riley might have found the two hefty prize-fighters a formidable handful. Yet he was not left to tackle them alone, for all at once Hard Rock Harrigan was in the thick of the affair—Hard Rock, who had always been at loggerheads with Black Jack, but who could not stand by and see a construction man in difficulties.

And maybe, in spite of their many differences, Hard Rock Harrigan and Black Jack Riley held a secret admiration for each other, though neither of them would ever have admitted it openly.

At any rate, Hard Rock took one of those bouncers in his stride, and while Riley was hammering the wits out of his particular opponent, Harrigan was likewise using his fists to some purpose.

In the space of one minute two senseless pugs were huddled across the prostrate body of the prize-fighter who had struck Clark, and it was only then, with the applause of the onlookers ringing in his ears, that Black Jack realised it was Hard Rock who had aided him.

"Oh, it's you, is it, Harrigan?" he growled. "You have to butt into everything, don't you?"

"The pleasure is mine, Riley," Hard Rock began, and then suddenly he

Fists raised, they prepared themselves for the slaughter, and in another moment the fight would have been on.

checked as he saw Black Jack clap a hand to his ribs and wince from a stab of pain.

With a look of concern on his handsome face, Tim Harrigan caught hold of the tunnel boss.

"What's the matter, Black Jack?" he exclaimed.

Riley braced himself with an effort and shook free.

"Nothing," he grunted. "Nothing. Just a little indigestion, I guess."

There was a silence, broken all at once by McClintock, who came lunging through the crowd with Signor Columbo in his grasp.

"Here's the guy that set them bouncers to work!" he proclaimed. "Let's hang him to one of his own chandeliers!"

A wail of distress rose from the fat little Italian.

"Please!" he cried. "Meesta Riley—Meesta Riley—everybody—come on, you have-a da drink on da house to show there's no ill-feeling!"

"A drink on the house!" someone yelled. "You mean drinks on the house!"

There was a stampede towards the bar, but Hard Rock Harrigan did not join in it. Nor did he allow Micky McGinnis to do so.

"Hey, kid," he said, catching the youngster by the arm. "Nix on that stuff for you. These tunnel stiff's can take it, but it's no good to a feller that needs the clear eye for blueprints."

Micky McGinnis hesitated a moment, and then he nodded slowly.

"Maybe you're right, Hard Rock," he agreed. "I'll stick to soda-and-milk."

Ready to Explode

It was Sunday, and, contrary to his usual custom of getting away from the camp on the day of rest, Hard Rock Harrigan had turned down the offer of a trip in Johnson's automobile, and had elected to spend a lazy morning and afternoon.

Soon after lunch he chanced to be walking in the neighbourhood of a bungalow which had been built as a home for Andy Anderson, and it was as he was drawing near to it that he saw a vision of loveliness on the porch.

The vision was Andy, but she was dressed in her newest frock, and for a moment Tim Harrigan was dumb-founded. Then, wondering why he had never realised just how beautiful she was, he marched across to her and gazed at her with frank admiration.

"Andy," he blurted, "you look wonderful! Gee, are you really the same girl that serves up the chow to us? On the level, 'tis a regular lady you've made of yerself."

"Just because I've put on a new dress?" she asked quizzically.

He fidgeted uncomfortably.

"No, but you sure look different, Andy."

"Do I? Well, I'm actually no different than I was yesterday. You haven't been around on a Sunday before, that's all. But you'll have to excuse me, Tim. I've got one or two things to attend to in the house."

She turned away, but with a quick gesture Hard Rock ripped a button off his jacket.

"Oh, say, wait a minute, Andy!" he exclaimed. "Would you mind sewin' this on for me? It came off this morning."

She looked round and glanced at the button in his hand.

"It won't take you more'n a few seconds," Tim coaxed. "I'll sit in the parlour while you're doin' it."

A quarter of an hour later Hard Rock was still in the parlour. The button was on his coat again. He was wrapped up in an earnest conversation with Andy, feasting his delighted eyes on her the while, and at the same time feeding his mouth with fudge comfits from a silver dish near at hand.

Hard Rock was glad he had not gone on that car-drive with Johnson. He felt he could stay in this parlour the whole day, talking to Andy as he was now.

The tête-à-tête was not destined to last long without interruption, however, for all at once there was a knock on the front door and a familiar voice called Andy's name inquiringly.

It was the voice of Black Jack Riley, who had also remained in the camp, and who had apparently thought he might as well drop in on the pretty canteen girl for the want of anything better to do.

Andy went to the door, and, though it opened right on to the parlour, Black Jack did not see Tim. He saw only the same vision of loveliness which had dazzled the eyes of Hard Rock Tim Harrigan some fifteen minutes previously.

"Andy!" the tunnel boss ejaculated with mouth agape. "Hey, what's this? Let me get a look at you. Hully gee, why ain't you never dressed like this before? You're a knock-out!"

"Don't show your ignorance," drawled Tim from the background. "She's no different than she was yesterday."

Black Jack started, and then his face clouded. Coming into the room he glowered darkly at Hard Rock, who was reclining at his ease on a couch and chewing a fudge sweetmeat.

"What're you doin' here?" Riley breathed.

"What's the matter?" Hard Rock asked. "Disappointed at finding me here?"

"I'd be disappointed at findin' you any place," Black Jack ground out.

He scowled at the handsome driller for a moment—then, remembering Andy, he turned to her and began to ape a lady's man.

"Boy, you look swell, though!" he enthused.

"Just because she put on a new dress?" Tim queried, remembering the words that Andy had addressed to him earlier on.

"Who's talkin' to you?" Black Jack snarled over his shoulder.

Hard Rock went on eating fudge, and, giving his attention to Andy again, Black Jack assumed a look of admiration.

"Gee, I like that dress, baby!" he said. "But why ain't I seen you like this before?"

"Because you haven't been around on a Sunday before," Tim interposed from the couch.

Black Jack gritted his teeth to stem a flood of oaths, and, having succeeded in quelling his anger, he concentrated on Andy, and favoured her with a leer that was meant to be an irresistible smile.

"Say, you've been holdin' out on me, honey," he declared. "If I'd known you was as good lookin' as this, I'd have gone for you in a big way. Yeah, and I'm gonna make up for lost time right now."

With considerable fondness he attempted to put an arm round the girl's waist, but she drew back.

"Don't do that, Black Jack. I don't like it."

"How'd you know you don't?" the tunnel boss chuckled, persisting.

She tried to push him away, but he would have none of her rebuffs, and was still bent on giving her a bear-like hug when he suddenly found Hard Rock Harrigan beside him.

"Let her alone," Hard Rock said quietly.

October 24th, 1936.

"What's eatin' you?" Black Jack retorted. "Do you think you can do any better? Ah, come on, Andy. Gimme a little kiss. What's the use of dollin' up if you don't want to be petted?"

"Let her alone, I said!" jerked Hard Rock, swinging him round.

The eyes of the tunnel boss seemed to glint, but no more than the eyes of Hard Rock Harrigan. It looked as if the long-anticipated explosion were about to take place.

"Since when have you been head man around here?" Riley granted.

"Stop it!" cried Andy, slipping between them. "Stop it, you two!"

"Who does he think he is, pullin' that stuff on me?" Black Jack shouted. "I'll bust him wide open!"

"You couldn't bust a paper bag," Hard Rock said scornfully.

Black Jack brought up his fists, and so did Hard Rock, but once again the shrill voice of Andy rose between them.

"Stop it! Stop it!"

"Don't interfere, Andy," Tim commanded, his big muscles twitching with eagerness for the fray. "I'd give a month's pay to take a crack at this gorilla."

The girl's voice rose to a still higher pitch.

"No! No! If either of you had any sense you'd realise what you're doing to me! Yes, to me! Don't you see that? If the super finds out you've been fighting about me, I might as well pack my trunk and get out of here."

"Now listen, Andy," Hard Rock protested, "this thing started long before we ever knew you."

"Yes, but I'll thank you not to finish it in my house," she rejoined, still doing her utmost to keep Tim and Black Jack apart. "If anything happens, I'll get the blame—and I'll lose my job just as sure as fate!"

She was not so much concerned about her job as the damage they might do to each other. But the argument she had put up was a sound one, and she felt a wave of relief pass through her as she saw that it had produced some effect on the two men.

"Listen," she went on swiftly, "I want you to promise that you'll drop this thing—right now. Black Jack, do you understand? I want your word of honour."

Riley glared at Hard Rock, then shuffled his feet in an awkward manner.

"All right, Andy," he muttered. "I don't want to get you into no trouble."

He lumbered past Hard Rock, and, once again his cool and customary self, Tim selected a fresh comfit from the dish into which he had already been dipping.

"Fudge" he remarked to Black Jack solemnly, as the tunnel boss was marching towards the door.

Riley scowled at him and slammed out of the bungalow. Then Hard Rock turned to Andy.

"I'm sorry we had to have any unpleasantness here," he said.

"You're not sorry at all!" the girl challenged bitterly. "You've just been looking for an excuse to start something!"

"Well, I couldn't sit here and watch him maul you without doin' anything about it, could I?"

Andy tossed her head impatiently.

"Oh, Black Jack didn't mean any harm!" she answered. "Besides, I've been around these camps long enough to know how to take care of myself without you starting a row. Which reminds me—I don't want you to pick up this fight again when you get outside."

Hard Rock was silent for a moment, but suddenly he grinned his Irish grin.

"No, of course I won't," he told her. "And just to prove it, I'll spend the rest of the day with you."

"Oh, no, you won't!" she declared.

"You're leaving right now."

Hard Rock looked dismayed.

"Now, listen, Andy—"

"You heard what I said," she interrupted with emphasis.

The handsome Irishman shrugged his shoulders. It seemed that he was unpopular, he reflected.

"All right, Andy," he murmured, "if that's the way you feel about it."

He drifted out of the little house, not before helping himself to another piece of fudge, and he slouched off in the direction of his own quarters, somewhat gloomily. But if he had happened to turn his head, he would have seen Andy gazing after him through one of the bungalow windows—and he would have seen, too, that there was an affectionate and tender smile on her lips.

For the girl did not breathe who could have been angry with Tim Harrigan for long.

The Fight Scheduled

MONDAY had dawned, and, working on the afternoon shift, Hard Rock Harrigan and his crew were drilling as if their very lives depended upon extending the tunnel.

A ceaseless clamour filled the great, sombre gallery, the clamour of the drills and of the giant mucker that clutched dirt and stones by the hundred-weight and loaded the waiting tip-wagons. Yet, vigorously as they toiled, the men in Tim's charge were in cheerful mood, and in lusty accents they sang a ditty that had become a kind of slogan with their foreman.

"H-A-double-R - I - G - A - N spells Harrigan.

Proud of all the Irish blood that's in me,

Divil a man can say a word agin me. H-A-double-R-I-G-A-N, you see.

It's a name that no shame Ever has been connected with, Harrigan, that's me."

The voices mingled with the tumult of machinery, but from some farther point there came at intervals a deeper and more ominous sound. It was the muffled thunder of exploding dynamite charges, which were being set by another party of workmen detailed to open up a new escapeway.

When that escapeway was completed, a fresh link would exist between the tunnel and the plateau high above—and, lest a cave-in should take place at any section farther back, these shafts were a necessary safeguard for the drillers, providing them with outlets which could be used in an emergency. Otherwise, in the event of such a collapse occurring, they might find themselves trapped in an airless vault.

However, the operations of the blasting gang up on the plateau were not appreciated by Hard Rock's crew at the moment. For each time a charge exploded it reverberated through the whole core of the hill, and had the effect of bringing down showers of dust upon the drillers. Worse still, the shocks were dislodging some of the timbers that had been built up temporarily to support the walls and roof of the tunnel just where Tim and his comrades were at work.

"Hey, Hard Rock," called M'Clintock all at once, "whenever them guys blast up there it knocks the shoring down. We're liable to have a fall right over our heads. Can't they lay off for a while?"

Hard Rock pursed his lips.

"Yeah, I was just thinkin' the same thing," he said. "Knot-head, telephone Escapeway Three and tell 'em to stop blasting."

The fellow known as Knot-head went back along the gallery to a 'phone. Incidentally, the new shaft was intended to link up with the tunnel about seventy yards beyond this point.

"Give me Number Three," said Knot-head, lifting the 'phone receiver from its hook.

He was connected with the man who was superintending operations on the plateau far above, and gave him Hard Rock's message. Then he returned to the spot where the handsome Irish-American and his crew were engaged in drilling.

Once again the group of miners had taken up the chorus of their song, and for a while they rendered it without the disquieting accompaniment of the dynamite explosions. Then, quite suddenly, and as if in defiance of Hard Rock's request, another blast rumbled in their ears.

Almost simultaneously two men came marching along the tunnel. One of them was Black Jack Riley, and his face looked ominous. The other was Micky McGinnis, who seemed uneasy.

"Harrigan," barked Riley, "I've just seen Bellamy, up at Escapeway Number Three. What's the idea of givin' him orders to stop blasting?"

Hard Rock eyed him whimsically. "Maybe the noise bothered us," he murmured.

"Cut the wisecracks, Harrigan," the tunnel boss snapped. "And understand this. I'm runnin' this job, so any time you want anything you can come to me, and I'll give the orders."

"Well, go ahead and give them," Hard Rock suggested.

"I did give them," Black Jack grated. "Bellamy and his gang are to keep on blastin'. They was ordered to sink that shaft to the specified level, and then cross-cut through the stratum into the wall of the tunnel. And, by criminy, Harrigan, they're gonna do it without you tellin' them to lay off!"

Hard Rock stared at him for a moment, and then jerked a thumb upward to indicate the roof.

"Do you want to see this shorin' come down on us?" he demanded.

"It's up to you to fix it so it won't come down," Black Jack retorted harshly, "and I don't want no arguments, neither. The trouble with you is you're gettin' too big for your job, Harrigan."

"Would you like to give me yours?" Hard Rock spoke the words grimly.

He was in a burning rage over Black Jack's savage reprimand, just as Black Jack was in a flaming temper over the foreman-driller's interference with the blasting gang.

"Would you like to give me yours, Riley?" Hard Rock repeated.

The eyes of the tunnel boss narrowed, and a battle gleam was kindled in them.

"Any time you think you can take it from me," he said.

"Then maybe you can guess what I'm thinkin' right now, Riley."

The bystanders were gathering round, agog with interest and excitement. The long-awaited outbreak of hostilities between Hard Rock and Black Jack had come at last, and a fight that promised to be the greatest clash of all time was about to commence. A fight between the two hardest cases in the whole of the industry—a fight that had often been visualised, though no man had ever felt able to forecast how it might go.

"Listen, Harrigan," Riley snarled. "Bonus or no bonus, I'm gonna pin your ears back right now!"

"Now you're talking my language!" Tim whooped. "Come on, let's go!"

He peeled off his shirt, and the singlet underneath it left his magnificent arms exposed. Black Jack likewise proceeded to remove the shirt he was wearing, but in his eagerness for the fray to begin he did not complete the operation, and next second he and Hard Rock were squaring up to each other.

Fists raised, they prepared themselves for the slaughter, and in another moment the fight would have been on. But suddenly a man came running along the tunnel with news that checked the combatants—a man who belonged to Bellamy's crew of dynamiters.

"Hey, Riley," he cried, "you'll have to come an' take a look at the new shaft! Bellamy wants your advice."

Black Jack compressed his thick-lipped mouth, and then, with obvious reluctance, he thrust the tail of his shirt into his trousers again.

"We'll postpone this until to-night, Harrigan," he said.

"Okay," Hard Rock answered. "I understand. Business before pleasure—Mister Riley."

"Yeah," Black Jack rasped. "I'll be lookin' for yuh about eight o'clock—back of the bunkhouse."

He paused and glanced at the damaged shoring of the tunnel; seemed to hesitate for a brief interval, and finally addressed Hard Rock's men collectively.

"Maybe you fellers had better get back outa the tunnel for a spell," he growled. "Kinda looks as if it might be dangerous down here, after all."

"Why not stop blasting until everything's set, then?" Micky McGinnis proposed, but Riley gave him an angry glance.

"Just to suit Harrigan, eh?" he bit out. "No, that shaft is gonna be finished pronto."

He stamped off, and Hard Rock's men trailed after him. But Hard Rock himself did not follow immediately, and, with Micky McGinnis by his side, watched Riley and the miners scramble aboard the train of tip-wagons which were just pulling out with a full load of rubble.

Slowly the train moved off down the tunnel, and Hard Rock and McGinnis let it go. Calmly and without haste Hard Rock and the tunnel boss were the first to be dragged from the shaft.

the former was drawing on his shirt again.

"Gosh, Tim," McGinnis said all at once, "it's a pity you and Riley have to fight! Both of you are such square guys. Yes, Riley's got his good points, too, and you'd realise it if you'd only try to like him."

Hard Rock gave him a sidelong look. "There's nothing you can tell me about Riley that I don't know already," he stated. "Sure, he's got his good points, kid. He's the straightest man I ever knew—"

"Then why do you want to fight him?"

"Aw, don't you worry about me and Riley, kid!" Tim rejoined. "This had to happen sooner or later. We just never hit it off, that's all. We—"

And then he stopped, for at that moment there was an ugly rumbling that struck ominously upon his ears—not the report of a dynamite blast, but a long-drawn growl that swelled louder until the tunnel was filled with the echoes of it.

The dim lights in the gallery went out, and in the black darkness that fell upon them Hard Rock and McGinnis stood silent until the reverberations of that unnerving tumult subsided gradually into a deathly quiet.

An awful suspicion dawned on Micky McGinnis, and if he could have seen the look on Hard Rock's face, suspicion would have become certainty. For the ace driller knew what that sound had meant—knew that the continual blasting must have worked upon some weak point in the gallery's shoring away far back—knew that a collapse had suddenly taken place.

Without a word he took a flash-lamp from his pocket, and, the finger of its beam pointing the way for him, he began to walk deliberately along the tunnel.

McGinnis followed him, and a minute or two later they found themselves standing before an immense fall of earth and rock that choked the gallery from ceiling to floor, a mighty landslide that blocked out all light and all air, and which was to them impenetrable.

"Huh, didn't expect the danger to come from this section!" Hard Rock mused.

There was scarcely a trace of unsteadiness in his voice, and McGinnis marvelled at his coolness. He himself was shaking like a leaf.

"I guess we're shut in tighter than a drum, kid," Hard Rock went on. "No tellin' how far back it's caved in, either. I wonder if Riley and the boys got clear before it happened."

"Tim," McGinnis faltered, "isn't— isn't there any escapeway we can use?"

Hard Rock shrugged his shoulders.

"Number One and Two shafts are on the other side of this cave-in," he muttered, "so they might as well be in China. Number Three is the one Bellamy has been workin' on, and if he can get it finished it should come through—let's see—about thirty paces back the way we've come. But I wouldn't be surprised if that's crumbled, too. H'm, maybe we could find out—if the 'phone's still operating."

The 'phone was out of action, however. The line was dead—had been broken off short on the section where the collapse had occurred.

"What chance have we got?" McGinnis asked huskily as they stood beside the useless instrument that was fixed to the wall.

"We can live as long as the oxygen lasts," Hard Rock answered simply. "The rest is up to Black Jack, assumin' he's still alive. I mean—if he can't get us out nobody can."

October 24th, 1936.

"Tim, can't we—can't we do any- thing ourselves?"

Hard Rock smiled a grim smile. "We could play casino if we had a deck of cards," he observed.

There was a silence, and then all at once the stalwart Irish-American began to chuckle.

"This is a swell time to laugh," Micky McGinnis said in a querulous tone.

"I was just thinkin' about Riley and what a tough break this is for him," Hard Rock explained. "He was goin' to try and pin my ears back to-night, and now it don't look as if he'll get the chance. Will he be disappointed?"

Once more he laughed, but checked abruptly as another thought occurred to him.

"Say, it's a tough break for me, too," he grunted. "Funny thing how luck runs. Three times while I've been hard rock minin' I've been on the point of fightin' Riley, and each time something has happened to cheat me—like this cave-in, for instance. Can you beat it?"

Micky McGinnis was not interested. He was wondering whether he would ever see the light of day again, and, before long, he was pretty sure that he never would. The atmosphere seemed to be growing fetid and hot, a sure sign that the oxygen was being steadily used up.

Hard Rock was plainly aware of this circumstance, too. For the second time that afternoon he stripped off his shirt, and McGinnis imitated him mechanically.

"That slide has shut out the air all right," Hard Rock mentioned. "No mistake about that."

"I wish I could stop the ringin' in my ears," said the younger man.

The Irish-American nodded. "You'd be used to that if you'd been in a jam like this before, kid. Say, the best thing for us to do is just to sit down and relax—take the strain off the old heart."

He squatted on the floor of the tunnel, the flash-lamp still in his hand. Micky McGinnis slumped down beside him and stared into space, his lips moving slightly as if in utterance of a silent prayer.

The heat was becoming even more stifling as the air was running out. Trapped, the two men sat there mutely for a long time, knowing that each breath they took was draining away the oxygen in the atmosphere and bringing them nearer to their doom. And at last they were feeling for their throats, experiencing difficulty in respiration.

McGinnis was seized by a fit of coughing, and, before the bout had passed, Hard Rock had started to cough as well.

"How're you doin', kid?" he asked as soon as he had partially recovered.

The college graduate answered him in a choked and suffocated voice.

"On the level, Hard Rock. What— are the chances—for us?"

Tim Harrigan ignored the question. Very deliberately he drew out a diary, tore a couple of leaves from it, and handed one to his youthful companion. "What's this for?" McGinnis queried tremulously.

"Oh, I just thought that you might like to write something to someone, kid! You know—just—in case—"

He commenced to scribble on the leaf that he had retained, but after a few seconds he looked up.

"How do you spell Andy's name, kid? Is it Ander-son or Ander-son?"

"Oh, what difference does it make, Hard Rock?" Micky McGinnis groaned.

Against Time.

THE camp was in an uproar. An emergency siren was wailing mournfully, an ambulance was storming from the direction of the clinic and men were running in droves towards the tunnel-mouth.

Ann Anderson came out of the canteen and clutched a miner who was hurrying past.

"What's the matter?" she asked anxiously. "What's happened?"

"Cave-in," was the laconic reply. "Riley and some of the boys just escaped, but Harrigan and McGinnis are missing!"

Five seconds later Andy was racing from the camp, her heart pounding like a trip-hammer, her face white as death. Breathless, and with a stabbing pain in her side, she reached the entrance of the tunnel and passed into it with the gangs of workmen who were also headed for the scene of the disaster.

In the depths of that tunnel, where the fall had occurred, miners were slaving like madmen to dig their way through the debris, and a giant mucking machine was aiding them in the colossal task. Meanwhile, Black Jack Riley was striding from group to group and shouting stentorian commands—exhorting the toilers as he had never exhorted men before, though in his heart he felt that their efforts were well-nigh hopeless.

It was as Andy appeared on the scene that Black Jack turned to a colleague and spoke his thoughts.

"Not a chance," she heard the tunnel boss say. "From the look of things, the cave-in goes a long way back. Even if Harrigan and McGinnis are still alive—shut up at the far end o' the tunnel—it might take a month to reach 'em. Yeah, and usin' dynamite, at that. There's only one thing to do, Casey. Try to reach 'em from No. 3 escapeway."

"But it ain't completed."

"It's within fifteen feet of the tunnel," Black Jack retorted.

"Even so, Bellamy told you that the shaft was fallin' in."

Black Jack clenched his teeth. "Never mind what Bellamy told me. I'm goin' up there. You take charge here—and keep the men workin'. Try an' drive a pipe-line through. If you can do that, you can at least force air through to McGinnis and Harrigan."

"Yeah—if they've still got any use for air by the time it gets to 'em."

Riley turned away, and several bystanders moved after him, Andy amongst them. Using the elevator of escapeway No. 2, which was close by, they ascended to the plateau and hastened to the shaft which Bellamy had been sinking when the cave-in had interrupted proceedings.

"I'm goin' down, Bellamy," Black Jack said to the man who was in charge of the gang there.

"But it's no use," the other protested. "The bottom of the shaft is all choked up, and everything you touch just crumbles away on you. You can't get through."

"You can't, eh?" Black Jack's face was resolute. "Well, I'll get through."

"But the hole's liable to cave in on you. It's madness to go down there, Riley."

The tunnel boss squared his shoulders.

"I'll take the chance," he answered. "We've gotta do something for those two fellers, ain't we? And besides, I've got a date with that guy Harrigan at eight o'clock to-night, and I'm goin' to see that he keeps it!"

A few minutes afterwards Black Jack was being lowered into the shaft by a rope, his barrel body swinging to and fro amidst streams of dust that fell constantly about him from the walls.

He reached the base of the pit, which was on a level with the tunnel but separated from it by fifteen feet of solid rock. Then, standing knee-deep in debris and broken shoring that had tumbled from the upper part of the escapeway, he shouted to the men above to lower a case or two of dynamite and the necessary blasting equipment.

His instructions were obeyed, and soon Black Jack was engaged in the task of fixing the charge, while dust and an occasional clunk of stone fell around him. But at last he shouted to his comrades to hoist him up, and he was carefully hauled to the summit of the shaft, where he promptly gave orders to scatter.

The crowd which was gathered around the guard-rails at the top of the escapeway at once retreated to a safe distance, and by means of a plunger the dynamite in the pit was exploded, the muffled roar of the blast being followed by a cloud of fumes that ascended slowly into view.

Riley went to the edge of the shaft again, and, though the walls down there seemed intact, he knew that the danger of them caving in had been increased a hundredfold. Yet without hesitation he commanded Bellamy and his men to lower him away once more.

This time he did not descend alone, for Oscar the Dane insisted on accompanying him, and it was with bated breath and with terror in their hearts that Andy and the other onlookers watched those two heroic figures sinking towards the bottom of the escapeway.

Black Jack and Oscar gained the base of this pit that had been rendered so unsafe by the tunnel collapse, which seemed, indeed, to have undermined a considerable portion of the hill. As they stood there a timber prop fell from somewhere aloft and crashed between them, but they paid no heed to it, for they were staring through a dark breach that had been caused by the dynamite—a horizontal breach in the fifteen-foot wall of rock that had separated the shaft from the tunnel.

Riley and the Dane stumbled through, and in another thirty seconds they located Harrigan and Micky McGinnis, both of them huddled near the useless telephone beside which they had sat down to die.

"They weren't caught under the cave-in, then," grunted Riley. "No, and they had the sense to keep clear of the spot where we were liable to blast our way through to 'em."

"Arc dey—arc dey alive?" whispered Oscar, peering at the inert forms of the ace driller and the young draughtsman.

Black Jack betrayed no emotion, yet his voice was not quite steady when he spoke.

"They're awful still," he said. "But I don't know. Come on, let's get 'em outa here."

He lifted Hard Rock, leaving Oscar to deal with McGinnis, and a little while later the two rescuers and their human burdens were in escapeway No. 3, where strong hands pulled them up by ropes.

Hard Rock and the tunnel boss were the first to be dragged from the shaft, and McGinnis and Oscar were helped out immediately afterwards. Then without delay the victims of the cave-in were rushed to the camp hospital, and here an anxious mob waited till dusk for word of them.

At dusk an attendant appeared with the news that Harrigan and McGinnis had been treated by the doctor and were fully recovered from their experience, and these welcome tidings produced a murmur of relief, which perhaps came more fervently from Andy Anderson than from anyone else in the crowd. Then, as the throng began to break up, Black Jack Riley caught the hospital orderly by the arm.

"Say," he declared, "now that Doc Wagner has finished with Harrigan an' McGinnis, maybe he can take a look at me. I've felt twinges o' that indigestion again, an' I'd like him to give me somethin' for it."

Black Jack was conducted into a surgery, and presently he was being given a thorough examination by Dr. Wagner, a capable-looking man of about fifty years of age. It was an examination which was accompanied by a good many questions on the part of the physician, and when he had completed his diagnosis he went out of the room and summoned an assistant.

"Fix Black Jack up with a dose of digitalis," he said in a low voice.

The assistant raised his eyebrows.

"Heart, eh?" he murmured, glancing into the surgery, where the tunnel boss was buttoning up his shirt.

"Yes," Dr. Wagner rejoined. "I suspected it when he came to me three months ago, and now I'm sure. It sounds like a valve lesion. He'll be all right so long as he takes things easy."

"Are you going to put him wise?"

The doctor shook his head.

"Not if I can help it. But what I'm worried about is this fight that's on for to-night. Has Harrigan left the hospital yet?"

"Yes, I heard him talking to some of the boys outside a minute ago. He wants to thank Riley for getting him out of that tunnel—and to remind him that they've got an appointment for eight o'clock."

Dr. Wagner pursed his lips, and a cloud seemed to gather upon his brow. "As soon as you've fixed up Black

"The date's off, Riley," Hard Rock said with an effort, "and so is the fight."

Jack with that dose of digitalis, send Harrigan to me," he said.

Black Jack Riley was allowed to depart from the hospital a short time afterwards, and, not long after he had gone off in jubilant mood to prepare himself for battle, Tim Harrigan was shown into Wagner's consulting-room.

"I hear you want to see me, doc," the Irish-American remarked genially, showing no traces of the ordeal through which he had passed. "What's on your mind, anyway? Spill it and make it snappy, for I've got a very important engagement."

Doctor Wagner looked at him earnestly.

"That's what I want to talk to you about, Tim," he said. "Why do you want to fight Riley? Why do you hate him? He saved your life, you know."

"Aw, Doc, you don't understand." Hard Rock's eyes were twinkling. "I don't hate Black Jack—and I don't think he really hates me. We just rub each other up the wrong way, and this fight had to come. I know he saved my life, and nobody could appreciate it more than I do, but it's got nothin' to do with our scrap."

"Black Jack don't have to be told," he added, "but I'd have done the same for him this afternoon if he'd been in my shoes. Besides, Doc, he'd be the most disappointed man on earth if I called off this fight."

"Nevertheless, Tim," Doctor Wagner said, "that's just what I want you to do."

Hard Rock stared at him for a moment, and then an expression of comprehension dawned on his handsome features.

"I get it," he declared. "The superintendent put you up to this. Well, I'm sorry to disappoint you, but it's too late now to call off."

"Listen, Tim, if anything should happen to either you or Riley it would hold up the work on the tunnel, and this cave-in will cause enough delay in itself. Now I feel there must be some way of patching up this affair between you and Black Jack."

"But I don't want it patched up," Hard Rock interrupted impatiently, "and Riley hasn't said anything about calling it off. Look here, Doc, this fight has been coming on for a long time, and nothing you or anybody else can say will stop it. You know the traditions of the mining camps as well as I do."

Wagner drew in a long breath. "I didn't want to take anybody but my assistant into my confidence, Tim," he said in a deliberate tone, "but I can see I'll have to be frank with you. Tim, Black Jack is a sick man."

There was a silence during which Hard Rock's gaze remained fixed on the doctor incredulously. Then all at once he laughed.

"Black Jack—sick?" he echoed. "Say, Riley's never been sick in his life. He could push this building over right now. Ah, don't try to kid me, Doc."

"I was never more serious in my life," Wagner answered slowly. "Any over-exertion, and Riley may go out like the flame of a candle. It's his heart, Tim."

Hard Rock's face was a study in concern now.

"Poor Black Jack," he muttered. October 24th, 1936.

"Why didn't you tell me this before? You know I wouldn't fight a sick man, Doc."

"I figured you'd feel that way about it, Tim."

"Sure. Come on, let's go to Black Jack and explain it."

Doctor Wagner took hold of the younger man by the shoulders and regarded him solemnly.

"Listen, Tim," he observed, "when you tell a man like Riley that he has heart trouble, one of two things is bound to happen. Either he doesn't believe you and won't take advice—or, he gets heart conscious and becomes a chronic invalid because he's afraid he'll go off any minute."

A queer look had dawned in Hard Rock's eyes, a look of blank dismay. He realized now what Wagner was driving at.

"You—you mean," he stammered, "you mean you want me to walk out on this fight without telling Black Jack why? Great Scott, you don't know what you're askin'. You don't know the tough spot you're puttin' me in. Tough spot! Why, I'd be laughed out of the camp, and the thing would follow me wherever I went. I'd never be able to live it down—I'd be through, Doc!"

He swallowed, and then went on speaking in a choked voice.

"Say, what did you put this up to me for?" he cried. "Why didn't you put it up to Black Jack and make him quit?"

"You know Black Jack, Tim. He'd be afraid the boys might think he was backing out. He'd fight you if he knew he was going to drop dead the next minute—and very likely that's just what would happen."

"But what about me, Doc? What will the boys think o' me for backin' out? If I can't tell Black Jack the reason, I can't risk tellin' them. Besides, Black Jack's got to find-out sometime, hasn't he?"

Doctor Wagner frowned. "Riley thinks he has indigestion," he murmured. "If he keeps thinking that, I can get him to ease up and I'll pull him through. Yes, with care his heart can be restored to normal in the course of time."

He paused, and glanced at Hard Rock keenly.

"But in his present condition," he resumed, "I wouldn't even like to take the risk of being candid with him. I put it to you, Tim, and I mean it—the very shock of learning the truth might kill him. Now that's the whole truth, and I haven't exaggerated. If you want to chance it, we'll call Riley up here and tell him, but, I'm warning you, it may be his death-warrant."

Again there was a silence. Hard Rock had sunk into a chair, and was staring straight ahead of him with an anguished expression on his face. The struggle that was going on within him, was clearly depicted in every movement of his strong features.

"I didn't want to be so frankly alarming," Doctor Wagner said presently, "but you forced me to make the position absolutely clear, Tim. And now the decision rests with you."

"Yeah," Hard Rock groaned, biting at his nails. "Yeah."

"I know I'm asking a lot from you," the doctor proceeded. "I know it calls for no ordinary amount of moral courage on your part, Tim."

Yet I'd like to remind you again of one thing. When you were walled up in that tunnel this afternoon, it was Black Jack Riley who went down for you."

"But I tell you I'd have done as much for him!"

Wagner looked him straight in the eyes.

"That's just what I'm asking you to do," he rejoined significantly. "If he hadn't reached you just when he did, you wouldn't be standing here, and I'm asking you to save his life in return."

Fallen Idol

THE time was five minutes past eight, and behind their quarters a big crowd of miners were forming a deep circle around the burly figure of Black Jack Riley.

Black Jack was in high spirits. After that dose of medicine which had been given to him at the hospital he had felt no trace of the ugly, stabbing pain that had been troubling him lately, and he was pacing back and forth with an air of intense anticipation.

NEXT WEEK'S BIG PROGRAMME!

PAT O'BRIEN and JAMES CAGNEY

—IN—

"CEILING ZERO"

Trouble follows when Dizzy Davis, an experienced but irresponsible airman, joins Federal Air Lines as a pilot, and as a result of one of his selfish actions a flying chum crashes to death in a fog. After he has learned that his licence will not be renewed, however, Dizzy makes amends—in his own fashion. A grand drama of the air.

"CRASH DONOVAN"

A daring champion of the speedway and ace attraction of the circus is lured into the police force as a motor-cycle cop. He becomes involved in many adventures. A thrilling drama, starring Jack Holt.

Also

The opening chapters of a mighty new serial of a king of wild horses and an outcast wonder dog:

"THE ADVENTURES OF REX AND RINTY"

Starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty.

AND

THE GRAND FREE GIFT!

Three directors of a bank trick their President, who is sent to a desolate prison to serve a long sentence. Years later the banker and a scientist escape, and when the latter dies a strange secret is revealed. It enables the wrongfully imprisoned banker to return to Paris and exact a terrible revenge. ### The Escape

KEEP still, my friend." The two men were up to their waists in water. Ferns, plants, and overhanging branches brushed their faces. Bent double, their eyes seemed to be wide and staring—that was fear and desperation.

From the distance came the sound of baying dogs.

Both the men were elderly. One was thin, haggard and gaunt, but the other was bigger and broader, and his arms kept the smaller man from being swept off his feet by the current of the stream.

"Oh, Lavond, my friend, will—we will make it?"

"Yes!" rasped the bigger man. "The dogs lost our scent when we crossed that river. They think we're still on the island."

"Two miles from here lies an old disused boat," the frail man spoke eagerly. "Word was passed to me in the prison that it had been secreted near an old ruined farmhouse, but it means going across country full of treacherous morasses and bogs."

"We've got so far and we'll not be beaten," Lavond answered. "We've got away from the guards, thrown off those cursed dogs, and if we can get to that boat before dawn we shall escape."

"Food has been put in the boat. Two hours' paddling up-stream should bring us to a large waterfall, and there Malita waits me."

"Malita is your wife?" Lavond's bushy eyebrows met in a perplexed frown. "A desolate swamp seems a strange place, Marcel, for a wife to have spent so many years waiting for a husband."

"Malita has had work to do." Marcel smiled strangely. "And I've got work to do once we get there. In all my five years in prison I've dreamt only of my work."

"My work is no dream." The big man gave a mirthless laugh. "I've been awake for seventeen years."

"But you have only hatred in your heart. My work will help the world to live!"

"My work will help three men die!" Lavond spoke with bitter hatred.

Lavond had every reason for his hatred. Seventeen years ago he had been the head of a famous bank. He had been betrayed and tricked by his three partners, convicted, and sent to prison for twenty years for forgeries and swindles his partners had perpetrated. Now he had escaped after serving over three-quarters of his sentence.

Marcel had been imprisoned for cruelty to wild beasts and for badly wounding the gendarmes who had come to arrest him. His sentence was ten years, and he had served half.

The two men had shared the same cell for those five years, and it had puzzled Lavond why this strange, kindly little man had been convicted for cruelty to animals. The banker had talked a great deal of his own grievances, but Marcel had said little about himself, except that the charge of cruelty to animals was false. He had resisted arrest because these fools were stopping his life's work. After a while he told Lavond of his plans for escape, and the two men set to work to tunnel a way out of their cell.

They had levered up a huge stone, but before daybreak the stone had to be replaced and the earth they had dug up secreted under their beds. When they went out on working parties, they managed to remove some of the earth stowed away in cloth bags under their rough calico suits and to dump it when warders were not looking in their direction.

A slow and desperate task. So little earth could be removed that it was two years before they completed a small tunnel under a wooden stockade. Within an hour of their escape the bloodhounds were on their trail, but so far they had eluded the pursuit.

It would have been a stupendous task at any time to cross the morass to the river, but with one man sick and ailing it was a miracle that they succeeded. But Lavond was a dogged fighter, and though Marcel repeatedly begged him to go on and leave him, the banker just shook his head. Once they floundered into a bog that would have sucked them down if Lavond had not clutched at an overhanging branch of a tree and managed to scramble back to firm ground.

For the last half-mile to the river the smaller man had to be carried, and when they did reach the bank they could not find any sign of a boat. They were despairing, when they came to a small backwater near the ruined farmhouse, and there under a tree they found the boat and food.

Lavond lifted his companion into the boat and soon was paddling up-stream. He wanted to be well into the interior before dawn. At the first streaks of grey the banker went close into the bank, and they lay hidden under great overhanging trees. They rested, ate, and regained their strength.

They saw no sign of prison guards or human beings, and Marcel was all for pushing on.

"What is one day when one has been in prison for years and years?" Lavond shook his head. "Why take a fool risk just for the sake of a few hours? I do not think they will ever trace us to this river, but if a report came back to the prison that two scarecrows had been seen paddling on this waterway they would be suspicious at once. Have patience, my friend."

It was dusk when Lavond pushed the boat from the bank and began to paddle steadily up-stream, with Marcel steering and trying to peer into the darkness. Often they ran into sunken trees and overhanging boughs. Once they ran aground, and it took half an hour to find the correct channel.

The river had grown narrower. Marcel explained that the lock gates were all broken, and that only in flood times did springs and rains keep the river to a reasonable level. At last they came to the waterfall and a ruined shack.

Marcel was not unduly surprised. He confided to Lavond that he had expected trouble from the authorities, and had made elaborate plans with Malita in the eventuality of escape. It had taken Malita, the woman, much scheming and bribery to get a message to her husband in prison. The guard had thought it but a loving message, but it was in code and told the prisoner a great deal.

"Somewhere in this shack we shall find a secret panel," Marcel assured Lavond.

Actually they found a message under a floorboard saying that there had been a report of some company opening a lumber camp near the waterfall so she had gone away. She had left a map of her new hiding-place. This time Malita had gone to a shack away in the forests, and marks on the map showed it to be marsh land.

"Your wife has chosen a desolate sort of place," Lavond muttered. "It is even worse than here."

"It is because of our secret work," Marcel answered. "None must ever know of our work until it is time for us to reveal our secret."

They tried to leave that night, but Marcel collapsed, and the banker carried the scientist back to the shack. It was a fortnight before they could start, and then it was not possible to cover many miles at a time. Eventually the great forest was reached, and by the narrow river they found the flat-bottomed punt that Malita had promised in the letter she had left with the map.

A queer woman with a white streak in her black hair was bending over a bubbling vessel of liquid that gave forth acrid fumes. The whites of the woman's eyes seemed to be wide and staring—one pupil green and the other brown. A long thin nose; and when she moved she had to use crutches because one leg was paralysed.

A queer creature was Malita. The fierce barking of many dogs made her look round. A huge St. Bernard appeared at the doorway of the laboratory and stared at her solemnly.

"What is it, Prince?" she cried. "What are you trying to tell me?" The barking continued, and then the dog turned in the direction of the sound.

Malita hobbled out on to a porch. "Lachna! Lachna!" she called October 24th, 1936.

shrilly. "What is wrong with the dogs?"

A tall, slovenly girl, who was not bad looking and yet whose face seemed blank, shuffled from a kitchen and wagged her head vacantly.

Malita saw that the dogs were all down by the water's edge, and then her eyes seemed to grow to twice their size as the light from the open door revealed a boat.

"Malita!"

Surely she knew that voice.

Then she glimpsed a man standing in the boat and holding an oar. He was a stranger to her.

"Malita!"

Seated in the stern of the boat was another figure, whom she instantly recognised.

"It's Marcel! My husband!" Malita cried to the maid. "Call off the dogs, Lachna. Call off the dogs quickly!"

When Lavond stepped on to the bank he carried Marcel in his arms. The little man was quite exhausted, but strength came back to him now and he managed to stand upright. The banker stared in perplexity at the strange woman who clasped Marcel in her arms and wept over him.

"Oh, you've come—you've come!" cried Malita. "Did they pardon you?"

"We escaped."

"But the police—they'll follow you."

"No, no, they lost our trail weeks ago," Marcel answered, and then smiled round at Lavond. "Come, my friend, let us go inside."

With Lavond's help they got the sick man inside and put him in a large arm-chair near the fire. The woman knelt by his side and the sick scientist laid his hands on her head.

"You've been working. I knew it by the howling of the dogs." A queer, pathetic smile showed on his face for a second. "But you've failed—you've failed again. I can see it in your face."

"Yes, I have failed." The woman's voice was filled with such despair that Lavond stared at her in amazement. What in heaven's name did all this mystery mean?

A Modern Miracle

MARCEL lay back, but recovered when Lachna brought a basin of hot broth. Colour returned to the wasted cheeks.

"Malita, I have discovered the secret. It came to me one night in that cesspool of stupid brains."

"Marcel! Marcel!"

"No more failures, Malita. The next one will have a perfect brain."

"Marcel!" Malita touched her husband's arm as she looked anxiously at Lavond. "But we're not alone!"

"Oh, Paul!" Marcel smiled. "In my excitement I forget everything. Malita, this is my friend, Paul Lavond. We escaped together. He saved my life more than once."

"I am grateful, monsieur."

"Madame"—Paul Lavond gave a little bow. "Your husband gave me the courage to go on. A very brave man, madame."

"Malita, we need have no secrets from him." The sick man sat up and his eyes burned feverishly. "Now, Malita, where are they?"

"They're in the next room," Malita said, after a moment's hesitation.

"Malita! Lavond! Help me!" Marcel cried, and held out his hands.

They got Marcel to his feet and, leaning on their shoulders, he managed to cross the room to a door. This Malita opened, and Lavond blinked his eyes at the laboratory, with its bottles, trays, retorts, switchboards, and even machinery.

New life seemed to run in the scientist's body, and he freed himself. He pointed to a switchboard. "Malita, shut off the plant," he ordered, and the faint humming died away when the woman moved a lever. Then the woman opened a steel door of what Lavond took to be some sort of oven and brought forth a tray, which she placed on a table that seemed to be made of glass.

The tray was covered with toy dogs, and Lavond marvelled as the scientist picked up one and stroked it caressingly.

"Oh, careful—careful, Marcel, you might hurt them!"

"No, I will not hurt them." Marcel nodded his head. "Just as I thought—they're all alike. They might as well not have any brain at all."

Lavond could keep quiet no longer. He spoke with impatience. "What is this? Is this the great work you've been dreaming of for so long? Toy dogs?"

"Toy!" Marcel laughed. "Forgive me, Lavond. Have you been locked away so long from life you don't recognise a prisoner of life itself." He handed Lavond a tiny dog.

The banker stroked it, and then gasped out:

"Why it feels warm—almost flesh and bone like the real animal."

"It is. Eight hours ago it was a full-grown St. Bernard." Marcel smiled at the other's look of amazement. "You think I'm mad. The world would think so, too, if it knew what I'm going to do. Lavond, my friend, millions of years ago the creatures that roamed this world were gigantic.

"As they multiplied the earth could no longer produce enough food. What happened then one does not know. Perhaps it was a survival of the fittest or a divine miracle that solved the situation, and all we shall ever know is that the great crisis was overcome. Lavond, the world is facing the same problem to-day. Too many people, creatures, animals, flowers, and all forms of life, and I can solve it."

Lavond wondered if the little man had gone mad.

Marcel pointed to the dog that Lavond still held.

"Every living creature reduced to one-sixth its size—one-sixth its physical need. Food for six times all of us. Lavond, you know that all matter is composed of atoms, and all atoms are made of electrons?"

"Yes, I know."

"Well, I've found a way to reduce all atoms in a body simultaneously to any desired degree and still maintain life—as in that little dog."

Lavond stared at the dog. "Well then, the dog should be alive."

"It is," Marcel took the dog from Lavond. "Only in reducing the brain, all records are wiped out, no memory left, no will of its own—a creature capable of responding only to the force of another will. Watch, and I will show you this dog is alive. Malita, the power. Quick! Quick!"

Lavond looked round from beneath his beetling brows. He felt as if he were in a sorcerer's den. What Malita did he had no idea. An engine woke to life and he guessed it must be a dynamo generating electricity, but the strange coloured liquids that ran along glass tubes and in and out of retorts were beyond him. Finally the woman handed Marcel some dark liquid and he touched the dogs with a few drops. Then the long bench was lit up by electric lights, and a thermometer showed that electric heaters were warming up the glass surface.

But Lavond's eyes opened very wide when one of the toy dogs moved and opened its mouth. Then all the dogs got to their feet and moved about in a dazed sort of fashion.

"Malita, a piece of bread."

Marcel crumbled the bread and the dogs at once nibbled at the crumbs. Lavond noticed how the little scientist's whole attention seemed to be with the animals as they fed.

"Do not tire yourself," begged the woman.

Marcel nodded and at once the dogs sank down. "I stopped concentrating," he explained almost apologetically. "I broke the beam of thought."

"But no man can do this," Lavond was staring at the dogs.

"But I did," Marcel laughed. "You saw me do it. But to-morrow I'll show you a complete success. A little dog with an active brain. A dog one can still control, but it will think for itself. For instance if you tell the dog to swim a stream and fetch something from the other side it will do it swiftly and cleverly. The dog's brain will think out the best way of answering its master's wishes." He turned to his wife. "Malita, it shall be the big dog."

The excitement proved too much for Marcel and he collapsed, and Lavond had to carry him out to the kitchen. Malita shouted for brandy, and the vacant-eyed Lachna appeared.

Marcel recovered and Lavond noted his interest in the servant. When the girl had gone Marcel nudged his wife.

"Where did you get her?"

"In a Berlin slum. She's an ill-bred peasant half-wit—I wanted no prying wits about me."

"Did anyone know she came with you?"

"No one—no one knows." Malita's eyes opened wide, and she nodded her head.

Lavond was strangely perturbed when Madame conducted him to his room; in spite of her assurance that he was a welcome guest, and that she hoped he would stay for a long time.

"You can stay and help us with the work."

Lavond shook his head. "Thank you very much, madame, but I'm afraid that would be impossible. I have work to attend to myself. You see, when a man saves an ambition in a dirty dungeon for seventeen years it becomes almost an insano obsession. Well, with Marcel it was science, with me it was hate. I may not look it, madame, but I was once a very successful banker. Three men, my partners, lied and tricked me into prison. Well, three lives are going to pay for it. Now you know why I can't accept your hospitality. As soon as I have rested and I know your husband is recovering his strength I intend to set out for Paris."

When the door closed Lavond rubbed his chin. Even though his mind was obsessed with hate and vengeance he could not banish the expression he had seen in Marcel's and Malita's eyes when they had talked about the maid-servant.

The next day Lavond saw a dog that obeyed Marcel's commands in a most amazing manner. He saw them studying Lachna in a speculative manner that alarmed the banker. It was on the fourth night that something wakened him and prompted him to open his door. There were lights in the house and he could hear voices. Curiosity urged him to dress and tiptoe down the stairs.

The laboratory door was open and he could see Malita and Marcel standing by that glass table.

"You've corrected her brain, Marcel," he heard the woman's voice. "She's no longer the stupid half-wit. Oh, she's going to be beautiful."

Lavond found himself drawn as if by a spell, and then his eyes dilated as he saw a minute human form lying on the glass—it was Lachna!

"Why it's—this is wrong," stammered Lavond, scarcely aware in his stupefaction that he spoke.

"Why—she'll be perfect," Marcel said, when he saw his friend's startled look.

"Perfection isn't wrong. Think of it, Lavond. A human being 60 minute and yet with a perfect brain."

At a signal from Marcel the woman began moving switches, and the laboratory seemed to awake. Lavond saw them pack the form of Lachna in cotton wool, then white mist was spurted out of a tube and seemed to settle round the white bundle like a cloud. The test tubes and retorts bubbled and boiled, and liquids of all colours ran through glass pipes. All apparently had some connection with bringing life to this diminutive form. Some of the fumes from the liquid were mingled with the mist.

"In just a few seconds, Lavond, just a few seconds, she'll awaken," Marcel muttered excitedly about an hour later. The cotton wool was removed and then extra heat was applied to the glass table. Lavond's eyes nearly came out of his head when Lachna stirred, yawned and sat up. It was the most beautiful thing that the banker had ever seen. They had made Lachna lovely of face and form, and Lavond found himself thinking of the evil eye when the tiny creature stood up and stretched her arms above her head.

It was a cry from Malita that broke the spell for Lavond. He turned to see Marcel clutching at his side, and leaning against the glass table, his face twisted with pain.

They carried him to his chair, but he never recovered consciousness.

The weakened heart had collapsed under intense excitement and strain—Marcel was dead.

"Poor tortured brain," Lavond stared down sadly. "Perhaps, it's all for the best, Malita."

The woman was down on her knees by the side of the still figure. She was moaning like some creature of the wild robbed of a mate. Suddenly she got to her feet and though her face was like a sheet the eyes were gleaming.

The light from the open door revealed a boat and two men.

"But our work, our work—we must carry on."

Lavond glanced towards the laboratory. "But that is murder."

"No—no—no, she's not dead yet. You must help me." The woman clutched at his arm. "Marcel would want you to. You must stay here. Quick, there is still time. Quick, help me."

Against his will Lavond was drawn back into the laboratory. Lachna lay prone on the glass table and she seemed to be dead. The woman began encasing the tiny figure in cotton wool and as she worked mumbling to herself. What she said the dazed Lavond had no notion. He could not take his eyes from the pile of cotton wool.

The woman touched his arm. "Now you must concentrate," she stated. "I know by your eyes that you have a far stronger will than mine, or even Marcel's." She parted the cotton wool to reveal the still form. "Concentrate—bring her back to life. She will respond to your will!"

Lavond did as he was requested, and Lachna stirred, opened her eyes and smiled at him.

"This is like some horrible nightmare," he murmured.

"We can make the whole world small as Marcel wanted to do," the woman whispered close to his ear. "We can go to Paris. There are many people there. There is where we begin our work."

Paris! Paris! Paris! A startled gleam appeared in his eyes. There were many people in Paris, but there were three in particular with whom Lavond desired to have dealings. For seventeen years he had planned just what he would do to these men if he escaped, or when he was freed, and now all those schemes were banished by the fact that he possessed a power that might give him a fiendish revenge. A nudge from Malita woke him to the fact that Lachna was sagging back against the bed of cotton wool, and now his eyes gleamed baleful as he concentrated all his power on giving Lachna new life.

The Three Bankers

IN a luxurious room were three bankers. The very fat man was Coulvet, the ferrety man with the flickering eyes was Radin, whilst the tall, supercilious man with the mocking smile and hard expression was Matin. It was the latter's office.

"I am very busy," hinted Matin. "Well, this is more important than anything else," mouthed the fat man. "This is terrible."

"Well, what's wrong now?" Matin gave a resigned sigh. "Indigestion? If you continue to crucify your stomach, my dear Coulvet, you'll—"

"Listen to this." It was Radin who interrupted. He held up a newspaper: "In a sensational statement by the Prefect of Police to-day, it was admitted that Paul Lavond, former bank president, convicted of looting his own bank and killing a watchman, escaped from prison four months ago. He had served seventeen years of a life sentence. Police censorship has withheld the news until—"

Matin always complimented himself on his control and calm. His sneering laugh checked the speaker.

"Well, what about it?" "It was a pretty plot, Charles," cried Radin. "But I knew we'd never get away with it."

The fat man glanced round anxiously. "Victor—not so loud!" he cried. "Don't shout it all over the bank."

"I quite agree," Matin laughed. "After all, embezzlement and murder are things we should keep to ourselves."

October 24th, 1936.

"But you didn't have to kill that man, Emile," Radin accused.

"Stop it!" screamed Coulvet at Radin. "Keep your mouth shut, fool!"

But Radin was a picture of fright. "He'll come back to Paris—he'll talk!"

"You cringe and scream like a woman, Victor," sneered Matin, and shook his head. "My friends, our former president may be honest, but he'll never be so stupid as to set foot again in France."

"I'd sleep better if I knew Lavond was back in prison," muttered Coulvet.

"A fifty thousand francs reward would insure that," urged Radin.

"There's a certain amusing irony in offering a man's own money for his capture!" Matin's laugh was mirthless. "Fifty thousand francs, why not?" He looked at Radin. "Get me the Prefect of Police."

A month had passed. France, Europe, and the world had been scoured for Paul Lavond. The police decided that the two escaped prisoners had perished in the swamps, but the three bankers were not so sure.

Coulvet rang up the Prefect of Police. "My partners and I will increase the reward to one hundred thousand francs," he stated.

And Paul Lavond, when he saw the increased reward, laughed. He was going to exact full revenge, but that revenge would be long and lingering.

The Doll Shop

AN old lady was staring up at the poster on the wall. Age had bent her back, though the step seemed firm enough, and the eyes behind the powerful spectacles were full of life. She laughed quietly, and then looked round to see if she were observed. The poster was only loosely fixed, and strong, powerful fingers tore it from the wall. The slightly torn poster was swiftly folded and stowed away in a basket, then drawing a thick shawl closer about her spare frame the strange old lady walked slowly away.

After a while she came to a shop window, which was proving of great interest to a number of children, and no wonder, because the shop was full of dolls, toys, and animals. The dolls were beautifully made and extremely life-like. The old lady watched the children for a few moments, and then opened the shop door.

The counters and shelves were full of toys. They were of all colours and patterns, so the neat interior looked very gay.

"Malita!" the woman called out in a high-pitched voice.

"I'm coming, madame," came the answer.

Down the stairs Malita hobbled with the help of a crutch. The old lady beamed at her, and after a slight motion of the head hobbled towards a curtained doorway.

In the comfortable back parlour, after Malita had closed and locked the door, the dear old lady took off her powerful spectacles and removed her bonnet. She peered into a mirror and smiled as if pleased with the reflection, then the white hair was removed—it was a wig. The old lady was none other than Paul Lavond.

"Look in that basket, Malita!" Lavond cried. "You will find a poster, offering a hundred thousand francs for my capture. Who do you think is offering all this money for me? The same three swine who sent me to prison before. They're frightened to death, Malita. They know that my freedom means their finish. But what they don't know is that the Paul Lavond they're looking for is Madame Mandilip, a poor, tottering old woman. How is the horse?"

"It looks wonderful!" Malita's eyes seemed to look searchingly at Lavond. "Soon we start Marcel's great work?"

Lavond's eyes were hard, though his mouth was laughing. He nodded.

"Maybe, Malita, we will start tomorrow. I have an appointment with Monsieur Radin."

The next morning Madame Mandilip was shown into Radin's office. The ferrety-faced banker stroked his minute moustache, and said in crisp tones that he understood madame had some venture that she wished to discuss with the bank. He hinted he was busy.

The eyes behind the spectacles were smiling as Madame Mandilip took out a toy horse from her basket and placed it on his desk. She assured him that none made such beautiful life-like toys as herself, and she thought that the bank would be interested in the manufacture of such toys. Perhaps if the bank did not back ventures like that, then monsieur might be interested.

"There are many novelties like this on the market," he stated, grudgingly admitting to himself that it was the most realistic model of a horse he had ever seen.

"But a toy like this has never been made before. It is not mechanical, and yet, if you speak to it, it will obey."

The banker stared at the old lady without any trace of recognition.

"Obey?"

"Yes—ask it to do something."

Radin wondered if the old lady were mad. Perhaps he had better humour her. He looked at the horse.

"Get up on your feet!" he cried. To his amazement the horse stood up. The old lady laughed when Radin stared at her, and her smile seemed to encourage him, so that he turned again to his desk. "Walk around." The horse proceeded to walk gracefully round and round the blotting-pad. "Faster!" He leaned forward and the horse broke into a canter.

Some while later, Madame Mandilip put the horse carefully back in her basket and covered it with cotton wool. Radin was grinning at her foolishly. His crafty face was a study in amazement.

"I have never seen such a toy before. How is it worked, madame?"

Madame smiled.

"That is my little secret, monsieur."

Radin nodded.

"What capital would you require?"

"To start with, just a few thousand francs, but I wish to start manufacturing at once." The old lady's voice seemed to have a gentle purr. "The Christmas holidays are so close. Naturally, monsieur would like to make a few investigations before advancing any money. If monsieur will but come to my little shop he can go into every detail." The eyes behind the glasses were almost hypnotic. "When will monsieur come?"

Now Radin knew that these toys were worth a fortune. He was not too well off at the moment, and here was the chance to invest a few thousand francs and get a colossal interest on his money. He would say nothing to anybody about these toys.

"How, about to-night—about eight o'clock?"

The old lady rubbed her hands together and smiled. Her voice was very gentle.

"Splendid. My little shop is in Montmartre, and it's rather difficult to find. I'll meet you by the Moulin Rouge at eight o'clock. Good-day, monsieur."

At a few minutes past eight Malita opened the shop door to admit madame and Monsieur Radin, who stared round speculatively at the many dolls and toys.

Madame watched him with gleaming eyes.

"Well, I can hardly believe it. I feel like pinching myself to see if I'm awake or dreaming. To think that I really have you here."

"Huh?" Radin stared at her sharply.

Instantly madame became all smiles.

"I mean—that you're going to be my partner—and help me."

"That depends," Radin answered.

"But remember, madame, that if I do, it will only be financially. My name must not appear."

"Oh, I wouldn't dream of using your name—you'll just be my silent partner."

Madame laughed for some reason that Radin could not understand.

She walked slowly across to some stairs.

"My workshop is downstairs—follow me. Be careful—it's very steep."

He followed her down the narrow stairs into a small room that smelt of paint and chemicals.

He saw many toys in various stages of construction.

"This is the room where we keep all our little secrets."

Madame pointed to a comfortable chair. "Make yourself at home, monsieur. Malita!"

Malita hobbled down the stairs.

"This is M'sieur Radin, the banker I spoke to you about. This is Madame Malita, my assistant."

Radin bowed stiffly, and when offered cognac refused stiffly the hospitality.

Madame smiled and showed him a little dog—once it had been a massive St. Bernard.

Radin became very interested. Madame took a chair quite close to him, and her smile was mocking.

"This dog feels quite warm," Radin murmured.

"Well, if you think that life-like, you wait till you see Lachna." Madame smiled at the standing Malita. "Bring me the Apache Doll, please. Oh, and don't forget the little stiletto."

Radin was astounded at the doll.

"All our accessories are carried out, down to the most minute details."

Madame held up the stiletto. "This is made of finest steel."

"May I see it?" Radin answered.

"You can feel it," madame answered, and suddenly she dug the stiletto deep into the banker's leg.

A shrill cry of pain came from his lips, and then he seemed to stiffen.

The whole body was rigid in a matter of seconds, the mouth gaping open, the hands clenched as if in agony—in fact, one might have said Radin was dead, but for the eyes that moved.

"Don't be too alarmed, Radin."

Lavond removed the wig. "You're not dying. I can see that you recognise me. You recognise my voice. That's one of the few things you and Coulyet and Matin didn't steal from me.

Another is my hatred. Look at me, and see what seventeen years in the grave has done to me. Do you know why I've lured you here? Because you're going to help me recover what I can from life. That's why you're not going to die. I wouldn't let you die, Radin, but you'll wish a thousand times that I had before I'm finished with you."

An hour later Lavond again donned the wig and put on the quaint bonnet.

Malita looked anxious.

"Where are you going? To your mother's again? Where the police are always watching?"

"No. I'm going to see my daughter," was the answer. "It's the one thrill life has left me. I love to look at her—listen to her talk. It drives me almost crazy not to be able to tell her who I am."

"Why don't you bring the dear girl here?"

A snake of the head.

"I couldn't tell her who I am—why she's grown to hate her father's memory—I'll not be long, Malita."

Madame Mandilip left her shop and beamed at a gendarme that chanced to be passing, then, slightly bent, went slowly along the street to the laundry where Lorraine Lavond worked.

Hatred

A PRETTY but tired girl worked busily at the wash-tub. Her dark hair was dank from the steam and from the fact that she had been busy without a break for the last four hours. In a short while the day would finish and she would meet her beloved Toto.

A bell tinkled as the door opened and Madame Mandilip shuffled up to the counter. The laundry woman beamed at this so regular customer, and nudged Lorraine.

The girl left her work.

"Good-evening, madame."

Lavond stared at his daughter, then remembering the part he had to play became the beaming old lady.

"Good-evening, my dear, you look very tired."

Lorraine laughed.

"Oh, no, I was just rushing to finish my tub in time." She took the small parcel the customer had brought.

"How soon do you want this?"

"The end of the week will be plenty of time."

The door-bell again, and this time a young fellow in a leather coat entered.

Lorraine smiled a greeting at him.

"Toto has a new taxi," she whispered to Madame Mandilip.

"Mademoiselle Lavond, I believe?"

The young man bowed. "I've come for the honour of driving you home in the Fortuna Taxi Company's third vehicle, of which I have just paid the first instalment. I trust you are very well, Madame Mandilip."

"Is this the great work you've been dreaming of for so long?" sneered Lavond. "Toy dogs!"

"My rheumatism troubles me a little, but otherwise I am very well." Madame glanced at the two young people. "Ah, it is wonderful to be young." A smile at Lorraine. "My dear, I hear your grandmother is not very well. I should so like to pay a call on her."

"She is always so much better after you go to see her," Lorraine replied. "She will be delighted."

A beaming smile for these two lovers, and Madame Mandilip had hobbled out of the little laundry office.

Toto drove Lorraine along the Bois, and eventually took her to the top of the Eiffel Tower. It was a favourite spot with these two young people. They loved to look down on Paris. Once again Toto begged that Lorraine would marry him as soon as he had paid for the taxi, and once again Lorraine shook her head. She was the daughter of a criminal, and she would never drag him down to the same level.

The detective watching the house of Madame Lavond smiled when the bowed figure of Madame Mandilip rang the bell and was admitted. Lavond's make-up and acting were so perfect that everyone was deceived.

Upstairs in a small room was a frail old lady, who smiled tremulously at the visitor, who grinned back and then proceeded to lock the door.

"Paul! Much as I love you, you mustn't come here any more. Ever since that first night I've been terrified that someone would suspect."

"But there's no reason why Madame Mandilip shouldn't come and visit you," Lavond kissed his mother.

"There is no need to worry." "You shouldn't come so late," came the chiding rebuke. "Lorraine will be home any minute."

"That's just why I'm here," rasped Lavond. "As a matter of fact she knows I'm coming. I saw her to-day in that filthy laundry where she works."

"You didn't let her know who you were?"

"No, but I'm going to to-night. I can't stand it any longer."

Madame Lavond gave a dubious shake of the head. "But she's so bitter, so resentful. She blames you for everything. Her mother's death of a broken heart she lays at your doorstep. Any effort I have made has been of no avail. Paul, if you must tell her, let me talk to her first slowly, gradually. It's so dangerous, Paul, and—"

Someone tried the door, and then an anxious voice cried. "Grandmother! Grandmother!"

Lavond smoothed his wig into place and hurriedly opened the door.

"I'm so sorry, my dear," silkily purred Madame Mandilip. "I'm so used to locking the door of my little shop. Your grandmother seems stronger."

Lorraine kissed her grandmother and insisted upon making a pot of tea. It was when the girl came back that Lavond decided to find out how much she hated her father. On the wall was the painting of a beautiful woman, and he asked his daughter who it was.

"That was my mother."

Madame Lavond stared anxiously at her son.

From a tray on a dressing-table Madame Mandilip picked up a rosary, and with a beaming smile announced that it was very pretty.

"That's mine," Lorraine's young face had become hard.

"I gave my little girl one just like that," Madame shook her head. "That was many years ago. She was very proud of it."

"They tell me I was, too, when I got it. That rosary was given to me by October 24th, 1936.

someone whose name we never mention here."

"You mean your father?"

"I have no father," the girl answered. "Madame Mandilip, I'm sure you know who we are and all about us. You know my father was sent to prison, and that was why my mother killed herself. And that's why his mother spends her old age this way, with barely enough food, and firewood once a week a luxury."

"It is very sad," Lavond watched his daughter anxiously.

Lorraine was worked up to a pitch of fury. Her feelings had been suppressed for so long.

"And do you know how we get all these luxuries?" she demanded. "Not from the laundry, that wouldn't keep us alive. No, all our great wealth comes from the Café Poule down the street, where I have the honour to work at night, where I have the joy of letting a crowd of sewer rats smirk at me, so they can buy more wine—a centime a drink, I get."

"Lorraine," begged her grandmother. "That's what my father's done and I loathe him for it," stormed the girl.

Lavond was wondering what to do when there came a brisk rat-tat-tat on the door. Lorraine opened the door and two men walked in.

"I'm from the Prefect of Police, madame," the detective said to Madame Lavond. "We are still looking for your son. Have you heard from him?"

"I've not heard from him, even by letter."

"If you do, madame, the Prefect will expect you to notify him at once," the detective stated. "In the meantime I'll check with you each day. You understand, of course, harbouring a criminal even though it be your son, is a most serious offence."

"You don't need to remind us of our duty or of the law," Lorraine held open the door. "Good-night, monsieur."

"I know how you feel, my dear," murmured Madame Mandilip, when the police had gone. "But don't be too harsh on the police. It's only natural for them to expect him to come here. He hasn't seen you for so long. You must be prepared though. He may come."

"I hope he doesn't," blazed the girl. "Because if he does I'm going to turn him over to the police. Grandmother says he's innocent. I've heard that all my life, but I don't believe a word of it."

Madame Mandilip adjusted her bonnet. "Well, I think I must be going. I've got a lot of old crates in my yard—lumbering the place up. Make good firewood—I shall send them to you, Madame Lavond." A nod to Lorraine. "Good-night, my dear."

At the bottom of the stairs Lavond glanced back. "So my daughter hates me? The swine shall pay dearly for this."

Lachna Strikes

C OULVET paced his study, whilst Matin stared at the big quivering body with contempt.

"You'd better get out of town," advised Matin. "Take a trip somewhere."

"You know I can't with the holidays." "Then keep your head, or we'll both be taking a trip at the expense of the Government."

Coulvet's face was haggard. "I'll admit I can't sleep. I keep wondering which one of us he's going to look up next."

"He wouldn't dare." Matin stood up. "Radin had many enemies and he owed a lot of money. We know from his books—he may have chosen an easy way out. Don't you worry, Coulvet."

When Matin had gone the fat banker decided to go and talk to his wife. She would dispel his gloom. Out in the hall he brushed into a quaint old lady.

"What do you want here?"

"Your butler is showing madame one of my dolls, monsieur," said Madame Mandilip.

"Madame will see you." A butler had appeared.

Coulvet followed the quaint old lady into his wife's boudoir, and was furious because his wife wanted to buy a ridiculous doll for their daughter Marguerite. Two hundred and fifty francs—it was absurd. But Madame Coulvet had a persuasive way with her husband, and reluctantly the fat banker handed to the quaint old lady the money.

Madame Mandilip took the money and just for a moment the eyes behind the spectacles stared up at Coulvet. A little bob of the head and a smile and then Madame Mandilip had shuffled towards the door. Coulvet glanced round after the old lady, and when the door had closed began to lecture his wife on economy.

Thus did Madame Coulvet purchase with her husband's money a doll that was Lachna. That night Marguerite went to bed with her new dolly clasped close in her arms.

In the small hours of the morning a figure shuffled through the bushes of Coulvet's extensive mansion and paused beneath the veranda of the child's bedroom. Madame Mandilip's eyes gleamed strangely as she stared upwards.

Lachna stirred in Marguerite's arms. An adroit wriggle and she was free. By means of the ciderdown she climbed down the bed to the floor. The bedroom door was slightly ajar, and she squeezed through and made her way to the bed-room of Monsieur and Madame Coulvet. No sound did Lachna make as she pulled herself up a chair leg to the seat, and from thence on to madame's dressing-table. With strong hands Lachna opened the jewel-box.

A little while later Lachna appeared on the balcony of the child's bedroom. Very neatly Madame Mandilip caught a beautiful pearl necklace. Lachna vanished and returned with a necklace of green sea emeralds. Within an hour Lavond had possession of all the jewels of any value that Madame Coulvet possessed, and then his mind, through the eyes, gave Lachna her final orders.

Lachna climbed on to Monsieur Coulvet's bed, and from her waist drew out the tiny stiletto that had been used to paralyse Radin. The fat man stirred uneasily and Lachna covered down on the silk ciderdown. An arm was flung out close to the doll, and then the dagger was plunged into the flesh.

Coulvet groaned. Lachna slid off the bed as Madame Coulvet awoke.

Madame Coulvet switched on the light, but she did not see the doll that slid round the slightly open door. All that madame saw was the distorted face of her husband.

Outside the window waited Lavond, and he clucked as madame's screams came to his ears. Revengo was sweet. He held out his voluminous skirts and Lachna dropped lightly down.

The next day the papers had startling news. A banker had been robbed and mysteriously paralysed. The police were baffled by what they considered a look of constant terror in Monsieur Coulvet's expression. Was this the work of Paul Lavond, who was still at large and thought to be in Paris?

Confession Through Fear

TWO days later Madame Mandilip had a visit from a police sergeant. Madame Coulvet, in talking about everything that had happened on the day previous to the robbery, had mentioned the visit of the old toy seller. Curiously enough, the doll that had been purchased was missing.

Now Lavond had been quite prepared for a visit from the police. The necklace had been broken up, stones taken from the rings, bracelets melted down and all the gems safely hidden away. If the police did search the shop of Madame Mandilip they would find nothing.

By adopting a tone of injury and demanding to be taken to the police-station Lavond succeeded in dispelling all suspicion from the sergeant's mind. He assured madame that he had not come there to arrest her, but to ask a few simple questions. These madame was able to answer satisfactorily, and it ended by the sergeant accepting a present of a little clown for his son.

Madame conducted the sergeant to the door.

"I'm sorry I haven't been able to help you any more, but if you want me at any time my shop is here, and you always know where to find me."

Some time later with a basket under her arm Madame Mandilip left her shop and made her way to the flower markets. The next destination was a popular restaurant, where Matin came most days to take drinks and often lunch.

Matin was accompanied by a doctor—they had just been to the hospital to gaze with horror at the awful expression on Coulvet's face.

"Doctor, what do you think frightened poor Emile so much?" asked Matin. "What could he have seen?" "He'll never be able to tell us." The doctor shrugged his shoulders in a hopeless gesture. "He'll be paralysed for the rest of his life—a brilliant mind imprisoned in a useless body."

It was permitted for flower-sellers and newsboys to enter cafés and restaurants. It was Madame Mandilip who stood close to the table occupied by the two men. She shuffled forward. "Holly, messieurs, mistletoe—fresh from the markets." The voice was wheezy and nasal.

"No—no! Go away!" rasped Matin, and began to discuss the possibilities of electric treatment to cure his partner. The doctor said nothing could effect a cure, and Matin was about to send for the bill when he saw a note addressed to himself. He opened it, frowned, and then stuffed it hurriedly into a pocket.

"What's the matter, Charles?" asked the doctor.

"Oh, nothing—nothing," murmured Matin, and making excuses about work hastened to the bank.

After locking the door of his room he took out the crumpled note and then from a glass bookcase found a large Bible. He glanced again at the message.

"READ YOUR BIBLE.

EXODUS	12-3	15th word
EXODUS	12-30	7th
JOHN	1-39	26-27th
DEUT.	15-17	30-31-33rd
JUDGES	18-9	35th
JOB	3-5	4-5-6-7th
LEVITICUS	5-5	18th
ACTS	16-31	10-13-14th."

It took Matin some while to decipher this message, and then with scared eyes he looked down at what Lavond had written:

This night tenth hour
thou shalt likewise enter the shadow of death.
Confess and be saved.

For a long while Matin looked at the warning and then a gleam of hope appeared in his eyes. He took a pair of scissors and neatly cut off the part about "Confess and be saved."

He went to the telephone. "Operator," he cried, "get me the Prefect of Police."

The message enabled Matin to secure police protection, and though the prefect packed his house with detectives and gendarmes the banker was in a pitiful state of fright.

Up till nine o'clock Matin managed by alcoholic stimulants to keep fairly cheerful, but as it drew nearer to ten fear began to get him in its grip. He jumped if a door slammed and cursed at the detectives because they would lounge about in chairs and not stand guard by the doors. They told him he could go to bed, but he was not in the mood for retiring.

Lavond had always given a party for children of employees of the bank at Christmas, and Matin, considering it a good way of keeping on the right side of his staff, had kept up the practice. It only wanted a few days to Christmas and the big lounge of the banker's house was festooned with coloured papers, holly and a large tree. The latter was hung with dolls, presents, tapers and candles. The dolls had been supplied by Madame Mandilip, and one was a queer little Apache.

Matin might have had a queer shock if he had looked closely at that Apache, because he would instantly have recognised Radin.

At nine-forty-five Lavond, disguised as Madame Mandilip, paused by the railings outside Matin's mansion. Radin at once awoke and struggled to free himself from the ribbon binding him to a branch. He dropped to the floor, but in so doing an ornament fell from the tree.

"What was that?" Matin demanded. The perspiration was pouring down his cheeks.

"See what that was?" a detective said to one of his men.

The gendarme looked in the lounge and saw nothing unusual. If he had glanced under one of the chairs he would have seen a crouching figure. He did not, and returned to report that everything was all right.

One of the detectives began to whistle softly.

"Stop it!" yelled Matin.

"You mustn't let your nerves get the better of you, M'sieur Matin," advised the chief detective.

None saw the door move ever so slightly and the minute figure that crept cautiously into the room. Radin darted underneath a chair and from his belt took out a small stiletto.

"I wouldn't get too upset about that note, M'sieur Matin," added the detective. "Probably not for you at all. Just some religious fanatic. The city's full of 'em around Christmas."

"That's very consoling," sneered Matin. "That's why the prefect sent all you men to guard the house."

Matin sat down on a settee, and Radin on hands and knees crept over the carpet. Matin stood up and then went to sit in a chair. Radin had to dodge round the room.

"There's something in this house!" Matin jumped up again and stared wildly at the clock, which was now at ten minutes to ten.

"Nothing can get by our men." The chief detective looked contemptuously at this coward of a man. "Why don't you sit down, m'sieur?"

An ominous silence fell on the room. The clock hands moved to nine-fifty-five, and now Radin was underneath Matin's chair. The stiletto was drawn back so it could be stuck into the ankle that was so close.

"What shall I do? What shall I do?" muttered Matin, his eyes on the clock.

It was 9.59 and Matin was shaking as if he had the ague—the stiletto was now within a few inches of his ankle. At ten Radin would strike.

As the clock began to strike ten Matin jumped to his feet.

"Monsieur Lavond," he screamed hoarsely. "Wherever you are—in heaven's name listen and have mercy." The detectives stared in amazement. "I'll confess—you're innocent—we were the guilty ones." He dropped to the floor and began to sob.

Radin waited till the detectives were bending over the wretched man before darting for the door.

A Mad Woman

IT was two o'clock in the morning, and already there were newspapers on the streets of Paris. One was brought to the shop of Madame Mandilip.

CHARLES MATIN CONFESSES.
PAUL LAVOND INNOCENT.
October 24th, 1936.

It was splashed right across the front page.

"I've waited a long time to read this, Malita," chuckled Lavond. "So Paul Lavond is vindicated? Think of it—after seventeen years of shadows, I'm innocent. Thanks to you, Malita. And thanks to you, Madame Mandilip."

Lavond threw his wig into the fire and rubbed his hands.

"This is wonderful, Lavond," Malita was grinning strangely. "Now that you are free we can go on with our work without being bothered by the police."

Lavond shook his head. "No, Malita, my work is over but I am not free. Why, if they ever found out who I was the police would want a lot of questions answered. What happened to Radin? Who paralysed Couvet? No, Malita, when I proved my innocence, I condemned myself for ever. We must get out of here. But before we go, we must destroy everything in our workshop."

"No, no!" Malita's voice was a scream. "The ghost of Marcel will curse you for ever if you do. We've got to go on, Lavond. We've got to carry out his plan."

"Now listen to me, Malita, and try to understand," Lavond said as if humouring a child. "I never had any plans beyond the vindication of my name and I only wanted that because of my family. Through Marcel's wild schemes I was able to do it, but we can't go on. Why, our work is hideous; we're cruel and it's got to come to an end to-night."

"No, Lavond! You can't do this. I won't let you betray Marcel. If you go away I will carry out his work alone. Do you understand that—alone?"

"You fool!" Lavond cried harshly.

"Do you want to go to prison? As Madame Mandilip, I mailed a full confession to the police. There's nothing left for me to do. The name of Lavond is cleared. My mother and daughter will have nothing to be ashamed of."

He smiled at the woman appeasingly. "I'm sorry, Malita, I didn't mean to speak harshly to you. I have plans for you. You will be well taken care of. Now please hurry, for every minute counts. Put Lachna there in the basket with Radin. Their lives are ruined but we can't destroy them. We'll send them to the Prefect of Police."

The woman made no answer, but she went over to the basket. Lavond had gone into his room to take off his old woman's attire.

"We've served his purpose, Radin," Malita looked at the Apache. "Now he'll serve ours. Reduced to your size. I'll control him as easily as I control you."

Malita took out a bottle of deadly poison, dipped the stiletto into it, and placed it in Radin's hand. Then she awoke the Apache and set the basket on the floor. Radin darted across the room to Lavond's bed-room.

Paul Lavond stood before the mirror and decided that it was fine to be able to don once more a frock coat and pin-stripe trousers. They were of the same pattern he had worn when he had been president of the bank. The smile vanished from his face when he noticed that his bed-room door was open. Curious, he had shut it, so who could have opened it? He was puzzling over this when the door began to open wider, and he saw reflected in the mirror the face of Malita. The expression on her face was terrible and in a flash Lavond sensed danger. He jumped away from the mirror, as if sensing the direction of the attack.

Two feet from where he had been standing was Radin with the stiletto in his hand.

Lavond guessed at once the woman's purport.

"Why, you poor, insane wretch," he cried. "I should destroy you with all the rest of this horror. Get out of here!"

Radin deprived of the influence dropped limply to the floor. Lavond gave him one glance before striding to the door, and pushing Malita fiercely to one side.

"What are you going to do?" Malita screamed.

"Do what you won't do—destroy everything," he shouted back at her.

Lavond strode into the laboratory and had just smashed a whole lot of apparatus when a queer, snarling sound made him turn. It was Malita, and in her hands was a bottle of liquid.

If that bottle were to burst the place would be blown to atoms.

"Put that down, Malita, you'll blow yourself to pieces."

"And you, too, Lavond," Malita shouted. "You've had your vengeance. Now Marcel will have his."

"Malita, listen to me," Lavond tried to soothe the mad woman. "Death doesn't frighten me. Why, it's been part of my plan. But not yet, Malita. I still have something to do for my child. When that's done I'll die gladly."

As Lavond spoke he edged towards Malita, who faced him with the bottle held above her head.

"You must die now."

"Malita, you must calm yourself." He had edged nearer. "You don't want to die, Malita. Think of your work—think of Marcel. Give that bottle to me."

Malita screamed horribly, and then tried to fling the bottle at him. In the nick of time he jumped back. The bottle crashed to the ground and there was a terrific explosion. Lavond was hurled flat on his back, and as he struggled up he knew that any second other bottles would be exploding. As he dragged himself up the stairs there was another violent explosion and fumes of choking gas surged round him.

He gained the street. A minute later the whole of the front of the shop was blown out by a tremendous explosion. Then the walls sagged in, and angry red flames appeared.

People came dashing out into the street. Someone gave the alarm. The police and the fire-engines arrived on the scene about the same time. No one took any notice of Lavond, who watched the gutting of the toy shop of Madame Mandilip, and knew that perhaps it was as well this had happened.

The chemicals kept on exploding, and it was a good hour before the water got control of the flames.

Detectives explored the ruins and found nothing.

"Guess she planned to blow this place up before she mailed her confession," Lavond had crept into the crowd and overheard one of the detectives speaking to a sergeant. "Just the sort of thing a crazy woman would do."

Lavond slid quietly away, and planned out, by the banks of the Seine, what he should do next.

The early morning special editions had much to say about Madame Mandilip. A mad woman, who had at one time been robbed or cheated by the bankers, and who had chosen the time when there was a scare about Lavond being in Paris to carry out a crazy revenge. In his confession Lavond had not stated how he had committed his crimes, and so they were very vague about how the mad woman had got at her enemies. What pleased Lavond most was the fact that the confession of Matin had been

EPISODE 12—

“The Last Chance”

A Lucky Encounter

WITH the branch of the tree snapping under his weight, Buck plunged headlong into the path of the oncoming horsemen, and for an instant it looked as if the Ranger was to end his career under the iron-shod hoofs of his enemies' broncs.

Yet the fall of that bough had the effect of throwing the troop of riders into the wildest disorder, for the leading ponies reared up on their hind legs as the branch dropped in front of them, and next second they were cavorting in a fashion that defied control.

Three of the animals actually came tumbling to the ground and lay kicking madly in the throes of their panic. The others, though managing to keep their feet, continued to prance like creatures demented, and the terror that actuated them was transmitted to the hindmost broncs as these reached the spot.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the fallen tree-bough, Buck Grant was huddled upon the trail in a dazed and shaken condition. But presently he roused himself with an effort, and as he struggled up through the mass of twigs and leafage that enveloped him his bewildered eyes focused themselves upon a scene of indescribable confusion.

Men were sprawled in the dust beside their ponies and doing their best to shield themselves from lashing hoofs. Other men were perched in their saddles and striving might and main to pacify mounts which had become crazed with fear and which were behaving like unbroken mustangs at a rodeo. Never had a body of individuals who were skilled riders found themselves in so abject a plight.

It certainly seemed as if the disaster that had occurred to Buck had turned out well, after all, and, bemused as he was, the Ranger was nevertheless quick to realise his good fortune and to take full advantage of it.

Only one horse had leaped the broken log that had come hurtling to the woodland track from above, and this horse had pitched its master clean off its back in the process. It was now standing a few paces from Buck, trembling visibly, yet in far better shape than its fellows who were mixed up so inextricably beyond the fallen bough which it had cleared.

Seeing it, Buck stumbled towards the bronc and pulled himself into the saddle, and at the touch of a firm hand the animal seemed to recover itself completely. A moment later it was carrying the Ranger down the trail at a fine, swinging gallop, and with its long legs moving like pistons underneath him, Buck felt that he surely had the pick of the outlaws' ponies.

He was right, for the bronc in question belonged to Dirk—Dirk, who was at present endeavouring to escape from the tangle of horseflesh amidst which he had been flung—Dirk, who bellowed with fury as he suddenly saw Buck making off at top pace astride his mount.

“The dirty crook!” the gangster roared. “He’s grabbed my hoss! Hey, he’s gettin’ away on my hoss!”

No one paid the slightest heed to Dirk, every man being too concerned with his own welfare, and with a final angry yell, the lieutenant of the outlaw band wrenched out a six-gun and tried to take a shot at Buck Grant’s disappearing figure.

The shot was never fired, for a glancing kick from an upflung hoof paralysed Dirk’s arm from wrist to shoulder, and with a yelp of pain he staggered aside—to trip over a confederate who was grovelling in the dust.

Panic continued to reign amongst men and beasts, and by the time that the crooks had recovered themselves and quietened their steeds, the forest had swallowed Buck utterly. Then, his face livid with chagrin, Dirk again raised his voice.

“That doggoned nester has got clear away,” he snarled. “Yeah, and on my bronc, too.”

“On your bronc, Dirk?” exclaimed Keeler. “Then we don’t stand a chance of catchin’ up with him. Your pony could give any of ours five yards in every hundred.”

“We’d better try an’ run him to earth, all the same,” struck in Roscoe. “The chief said we was to knock Grant off.”

Dirk made an impatient gesture. “No, we can’t afford to go after him,” he retorted. “We’ve something more important to do. The chief wanted us to get Grant all right, but he’s keener still to lay his hands on that pay-ore at the Hudson ranch. Come on, the gold comes first. Gabe, I’ll ride with you.”

He climbed up behind the man whom he had named, and ere long the party of outlaws were turning to gallop back in the direction of the Hudson outfit, confident that they had plenty of time to raid the ranch and make off with their spoil before ever Buck Grant showed up with help.

But little did they know how luck was destined to run against them, for, spurring southward through the forest, Buck Grant cleared the belt of timber about fifteen minutes later, to espy a group of horsemen cantering across a strip of plain; and an exclamation escaped him as he recognised the familiar figure of Judge Holmes at the head of those riders.

Pounding over the moonlit patch of open prairie, Buck drew rein in front of the oncoming band and addressed his friend in terse accents.

“Hallo, there, judge!” he greeted. “What are you doin’ up this way?”

“Just being neighbourly, Buck. I guess,” Holmes answered. “I happened to drop in the Hidden Valley ranch to-day, and the housekeeper there told me that Mary had left for the north."

The younger man nodded.

"That's right, judge," he said. "And right now she's up at old man Hudson's place. Delaney and two of his men are with her, and so are the Hidden Valley boys and her elum Helen Moore."

"Aw, then that's okay," declared Holmes. "I kind of got the idea she might be alone, and I rounded up my own hands in order to come and look for her. I figured it was pretty dangerous for her to be gallivanting around with so many outlaws and renegade Indians on the rampage, and seeing she's the daughter of a man who was one of my greatest friends—"

Buck interrupted him grimly.

"Judge," he stated, "it's a good thing you took the trail. Mary Grayson's far from being alone, but nevertheless, she's in danger. You see, we located her father's mine and took a shipment of gold out of it—under the eyes of a bunch of rustlers who'll stop at nothing to get their clutches on it!"

As briefly as possible he related all that had occurred, and when he had heard the Ranger's story, the expression on Holmes' face was stern.

"And you think the outlaws will have enough nerve to attack Hudson's place?" he asked.

"Yes," Buck rejoined, "because there's one or two fellers in Mary's crowd that I'm not altogether sure about. But if it comes to a fight, judge, you and your men can swing the odds in our favour."

Holmes gave a hitch to the gun-belt that he was wearing under his jacket.

"You can depend on us, Buck," he said. "Come on, men, let's go!"

The Missing Gold

ALL was quiet at the Hudson ranch, and the men detailed to act as sentinels and give warning of any attack were, for the most part, beginning to imagine that there was little likelihood of the enemy risking an engagement.

Two of the cowboys who had been posted as look-outs held a very different view, however. They were Tex and Mulford, the 'punchers' in Harvey Delaney's employ, and as they squatted in the shadow of a mesquite clump on the north side of the outfit, they talked of their arrangement with Dirk's gang in low and guarded tones.

"I wonder when they'll show up," breathed Mulford.

"Pretty soon now," Tex opined. "They musta settled with Grant by this time, and they was to come back here directly afterwards. When they do, our job is to sit tight and let 'em past."

Mulford uttered a grunt.

"Even then they're liable to run into a good deal o' trouble," he said. "Hudson's three cow-hands and them Hidden Valley hombres will put up a good fight, you can depend on that, Tex."

"Maybe they will," the other rejoined. "But if Dirk and the gang play their cards right and make the most of the element o' surprise, they oughta wipe out all opposition."

There was a silence, and then Mulford spoke again.

"Y'know, Tex," he mentioned, "I've been thinkin' things over, and I've got a hunch that might turn out to be some helpful to Dirk. Supposin' we was to slip back and stampede all the horses outa the corral behind the ranch-house? That would give everybody here something to take their minds off a night-attack, and while they was tryin' to round up the animals Dirk and the boys could bear down on 'em."

Tex was listening to him interestedly, and it was clear that he was impressed by the scheme.

"Mulford," he declared, "that's a smart idea, and it's worth tryin'." We'll put it up to Dirk and the gang when they arrive."

Huddled in the shadow of the mesquite clump, they spent the next ten or fifteen minutes in scanning the ground in front of them, and presently they fancied they detected movements in a thicket some little distance away. A few seconds later they knew that they had not been mistaken, for all at once they saw a file of men sneak from the brushwood and crawl into an arroyo that led towards the ranch.

Those men were the outlaws whom Tex and Mulford were expecting, and without a word the treacherous cowboys crept across to the dry, ragged hollow in order to intercept them.

They came face to face with Dirk and the rustlers, and Tex spoke in a whisper.

"Did you get Grant?" he demanded.

"No," growled Dirk. "He gave us the slip, and we couldn't afford to lose time chasin' him. So we back-tracked and then made a wide circle to approach the Hudson outfit from the north, accordin' to plan. Is everythin' set?"

Tex laid a hand on his arm.

"Just a minute, pardner," he said. "Mulford here has got a hunch, and I think it's a good one. Listen while I tell yuh."

He outlined the other cowboy's scheme, and Dirk nodded appreciatively when it had been explained to him.

"Sounds okay," he murmured. "Does the chief know about it?"

"No. But I reckon he'll thank Mulford when he hears of it. Now, you fellers stay here until we've turned them horses loose. Then come a-runnin', see?"

Dirk and his associates answered in chorus, and Delaney's two employees then shunk out of the arroyo and made for a fenced-in enclosure at the rear of the Hudson ranch-house. Here the ponies of the old cattleman's visitors had been corralled, and, on reaching the pen, Mulford and Tex made haste to unfasten the gate of it.

In less than half a minute the treacherous cow-hands were driving the broncs out into the open, and as the herd began to scatter to right and left the two men set up a loud outcry, running round to the front of the ranch-house while they did so.

It was an outcry that brought men hurrying from all directions—some from a bunk house near by, others from various points where they had been on the watch for any sign of a raid—and as these men appeared, Tex and Mulford shouted to them in accents of feigned dismay.

"The horses have bust outa the corral!"

Hudson's employees and the Hidden Valley boys swarmed past Mulford and Tex in a body, and soon they were heard yelling to their ponies by name in the hope that the broncs would turn back. As for the two rogues who had been responsible for releasing the animals, they lingered close to the veranda of the ranch-house, and were exchanging sly grins when the voice of Delaney reached their ears.

They turned to see him framed in the doorway of the house, and they also noted that the Hudsons were with him, together with Spooky, Mary Grayson and Helen Moore.

"What's wrong?" Harvey Delaney was inquiring. "What's all the trouble about?"

And then, even as he uttered the words, there came a sudden blatter of gun-play from the north side of the outfit—a sharp volley which rang out startlingly through the night, and which was followed immediately afterwards by a dead silence.

The occupants of the ranch-house looked at one another blankly, as if dumbfounded by the outburst of revolver-fire. An instant later they were crowding to the windows at the back of the dwelling, and as they peered out they beheld a spectacle that caused them to become tense.

The ponies from the coral were fleeing over the range, but it was not upon those fugitive broncs that the watchers riveted their attention. Their gaze was concentrated on the men who had endeavoured to check the stampede, and who had thereby laid themselves open to a surprise onset by Dirk and his cronies.

The desperados were now scrambling out of the arroyo and closing in on the defenders of the Hudson ranch, and these had no opportunity of showing their mettle as fighters. Already four of them were lying on the ground, cut down by the fusillade that had been directed at them from the hollow, and the outlaws had the drop on the others. One move on the part of any of the cowboys would have meant instant death at the hands of the approaching rustlers.

From the windows of the house, Mary Grayson and her companions saw Dirk and his gang surround the 'punchers and proceed to disarm them. Then old man Hudson gave vent to a smothered oath.

"Those rats can't get away with this!" he blazed. "Spooky, turn out that lamp on the table there. We'll open fire from the windows and give our men a chance to come to grips—"

"You'll stay where you are if you know what's good for you."

The voice cut in on Hudson's words incisively, and the group at the window-panes swung round to find themselves covered by the six-shooters of Tex and Mulford.

There was a silence, tense and electric, and it was only broken when Harvey Delaney addressed his two employees. His tone was harsh, though Spooky, for one, could not help wondering if the anger in it were genuine.

"What's the meaning of this?" the wealthy cattle-baron demanded.

"You'll find out," Mulford told him complacently. "Meantime, you'd better take things easy, and that goes for all of you—the womenfolk included."

He launched an ominous glance at Mary, Helen and Mrs. Hudson, and then turned his attention on Harvey Delaney again as the latter took a step forward.

"Get back!" Mulford jerked.

The warning was echoed by Tex, and Delaney appeared to quiver with indignation.

"See here!" he cried. "You can't get away with this!"

"Can't we?" Mulford retorted with a leer. "What odds will you give me that we can't?"

Before Delaney could offer any response to this sally there were heavy footfalls on the doorstep of the ranch-house, and immediately afterwards Dirk came into the living-room with Gabo and Roscoe at his heels.

"Nice work, boys," Dirk said to Tex and Mulford. "We've got the rest of 'em, and we're lockin' them up in the barn."

"I'll have the law on you coyotes for this!" old man Hudson blurted all at once.

"Shut up!" snapped Dirk. "Hey, Mulford, do you know where that gold is?"

Mulford answered him promptly.

"Sure," he said. "It's in the store-room—in an out-house back of the barn. Tex and me helped to dump it there."

"Then you an' Tex can help me take it outa there," Dirk rejoined. "Gabo—Roscoe—you look after these folks here, and if any of 'em try to get fresh, let 'em have it."

Followed by Delaney's treacherous 'punchers, he marched out of the dwelling again, and the three of them made their way in the direction of the barn, into which Mary Grayson's cowboys and Hudson's men were being herded.

Dirk, Tex and Mulford passed the barn and halted before the out-house that was their objective. It was padlocked, but a bullet from a six-gun made short work of the fastening, and, kicking the door open, the three crooks stepped inside.

But even as they advanced over the threshold there was a commotion in the neighbourhood of the barn, and as the three of them stumbled to the out-house door they saw their cronies running towards them in an obvious state of panic.

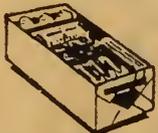

"What's up?" Dirk ejaculated, hurrying forth to plant himself in the path of his men.

It was the ruffian known as Keeler who answered him.

"A crowd o' horsemen comin' over the ridge to the south!" he gasped. "They outnumber us by two to one. We'd better pull out, Dirk—and plenty pronto. Grant must have brung back that posse!"

Dirk realised that flight was the only course. Gold or no gold, they would be in danger of capture and conviction if they remained here another minute, and, therefore, he and his confederates were soon sprinting for the thickets where they had left their horses.

Tex and Mulford ran with the rest of them, for it was impossible for them to stay on in the vicinity of the Hudson ranch now that they had shown themselves in their true colours. But there were two members of the gang who did not figure in that precipitate retreat—Gabe and Roscoe—who had been detailed to stand guard over the people in the house.

It was not until they heard the drumming of hoofs that these rogues became aware of their danger, and by that time it was too late. Even as they made a rush for the porch they saw a band of riders drawing rein outside, and next second the stalwart figure of Buck Grant had leaped from the saddle to close with them.

Bounding through the doorway, the big Ranger knocked Roscoe's six-gun from his fist and gripped him by the throat, and almost simultaneously Spooky came up behind Gabe and disarmed that lank scoundrel after a brief tussle.

Buck and his comrade forced the gangsters back against the wall, and were pinning them there when Holmes and his men swarmed into the house. Then, three or four of the judge's cowboys having taken charge of the discomfited outlaws, Buck turned to Mary Grayson.

"Looks like we didn't arrive any too soon," he commented.

Mary clutched him by the arm.

"Tex and Mulford were in with the gang," she panted. "My own men and Mr. Hudson's were rounded up and taken to the barn—"

"Tex and Mulford, eh?" Buck interrupted, shooting a glance at Harvey Delaney.

Delaney was mopping his somewhat swarthy face. He was, to all appearances, considerably upset.

"I wouldn't have believed it of those men," he said thickly. "They never gave me any reason to suspect that they were in cahoots with this blackguard Dirk and his scum. Listen, Grant, that gang can't have got far. Let's get after them."

"And take a chance on them giving us the slip?" Buck countered. "Yep, giving us the slip and circling back to make another raid on the ranch. No, siree, right now that gold from the Grayson Mine is our chief concern. We've got to get it to Maverick for safety, and if we start to-night we can be in town when the bank opens its doors to-morrow."

No one had any argument to offer against that proposal, and a little while later, when the men imprisoned in the barn had been released, a cavalcade of riders might have been seen wending its way southwards through the moonlight.

The pay-ore from the Grayson Mine travelled with that cavalcade. So did the four cowboys who had been wounded when Dirk's gang had borne down on the Hudson ranch. And so did the luckless Gabe and Roscoe, a sorry pair of bandits who sat their saddles with hands tied securely behind their backs.

End of the Trail

TWO days later Buck Grant and Spooky were riding at a canter along the trail that led from the town of Maverick to Mary Grayson's ranch in Hidden Valley, and as they rode they talked of a visit which they had paid to the sheriff's office that morning.

"It's no use, Spooky," Buck said. "Gabe and Roscoe are faced with the October 24th, 1936.

prospect of a neck-tie party, but they won't squeal. Sheriff Mark and his deputies have tried their hardest to make 'em come clean, yet neither one of 'em will tell where the gang's hide-out is or what the name of their real leader is."

Spooky nodded sourly. "Honour among thieves, huh?" he grunted.

A silence fell between them, and several minutes elapsed before it was broken. By that time their broncs were carrying them towards the summit of a ridge that overlooked the plain known as Dry Creek.

"Gettin' close to that homestead where you hang out, Buck," Spooky said then. "When will I see you again?"

"We're not separating yet, pardner," he informed the little fellow. "I understand Mary was goin' riding this mornin', and I've got a sort of a half-arrangement to meet her somewhere between Dry Creek and Hidden Valley."

Spooky shot a quick glance at him and smirked broadly.

"Kinda sweet on Mary Grayson, ain't you?" he said. "Well, she's a mighty fine girl. Reckon I might be tempted to cut you out with her if I wasn't such a pal."

Buck laughed heartily, but his mirth was of short duration, for even as he and Spooky reached the crown of the ridge that they were ascending they saw something that caused them to draw rein.

There below them lay Dry Creek, and on the level plain three figures were visible, one of them that of a girl who was riding at top speed, the others being two men who were obviously in pursuit of her.

They were a considerable distance from the ridge and were galloping away from it, and an instant after Buck and Spooky had caught sight of them the fugitive's horse stumbled and threw her over its head. A few seconds later the two pursuers were abreast of her, and one of them dismounting, the girl was picked up and lifted on to his saddle.

Meanwhile Buck had gripped Spooky by the arm, and as he flashed a question at him his voice seemed to rasp in his throat.

"Spooky, that's Mary, isn't it?"

The other Ranger's face had hardened. "I can't tell from this distance, Buck," he jerked. "But the horse that threw her looks mighty like the pinto she allus rides. Anyway, whether it's Miss Mary or not, them hombres ain't up to no good."

"There they go!" he added abruptly. "They're ridin' off with her—and ridin' fast. Do you suppose they've seen us?"

"No," Buck answered. "They never looked in this direction. Spooky, it must be two of those outlaws that have got hold of her, and I'm goin' after them. I may not be able to catch up with 'em, but I reckon I can trail 'em."

Spooky eyed him grimly.

"What do you mean—you're goin' after 'em?" he demanded. "We're goin' after 'em."

"No, pardner. Those fellows are going to lead me to the gang's hide-away, and I'll need more than one man beside me when things begin to break. You've got to get back to Maverick and bring on the sheriff and a posse. Wherever I happen to finish up, I'll send my bronc Silver to meet you with a message statin' the location of the outlaws. Understand?"

"I get you, Buck," said Spooky. "Go to it, but watch out for yourself. When I reach Dry Creek with the posse I'll hold up at your shack and wait for Silver."

They parted, Spooky wheeling to make tracks for Maverick, Buck riding down the ridge in a smother of dust and setting out in the direction which the outlaws had taken with their captive.

Half-way across the plain Buck came up with the pony that had thrown the girl. It had been left to its own devices and was limping towards a belt of forest into which the gangsters and their prisoner had already disappeared, and at close quarters Buck recognised it beyond all doubt as Mary Grayson's favourite horse.

Teeth clenched, the Ranger galloped onward into the woods, picking up a track that had swallowed the outlaws and the girl. It was a track covered with leaf-mould which showed distinctly the imprints of two sets of hoofs, and he had no difficulty in following these until he pushed clear of the timber and descried his quarry away ahead of him.

They were still setting a hot pace, but Buck managed to keep them in sight even when they penetrated the rolling hill-country to the south-west. Then at last they vanished into a canyon that was choked with chaparral thickets, and, pushing through these in pursuit of them, the shadower suddenly found himself on the edge of a big clearing in which a lonely cabin stood.

The crooks had halted outside this, and were in the act of dismounting. From the shelter of the thickets Buck saw them tether their horses to a hitch-rail at which a number of other broncs were standing. Then they lifted Mary down and carried her into the dwelling, the girl apparently being in an unconscious condition.

Slowly Buck swung himself out of the saddle and lowered himself to the ground, and presently he had torn a leaf from a diary and was scribbling a message that described the situation of the remote cabin whither Mary's captors had led him.

Having written this note, he fastened it to his pony's saddle, and was about to send the horse on its way when he paused as if on an afterthought. Then from under that same saddle he produced the rig that he had worn in his rôle of Phantom Rider, and when he had donned the white cloak and tied the silken kerchief about his features, he slapped Silver smartly across the flank.

"Home, boy!" he ordered. "Go on, get outa here! Home, boy—home!"

The bronc trotted a few yards and came to a pause, seemingly reluctant to leave its master, but an imperative wave of the hand and a repeated command sent it on its way, and when it had disappeared from view Buck again turned his attention to the cabin in the clearing.

He knew that his wisest and safest plan was to wait until Spooky showed up with the posse. Yet his concern for Mary urged him to draw nearer to that shack and learn the reason for her capture. He wanted to make certain that she came to no harm, and, if it became necessary, he was prepared to walk into that lion's den and protect her, hoping that the outlaws' fear of the mysterious Phantom Rider would prove a strong point in his favour.

From his covert amid the thickets he could see that there were no windows in the east wall of the cabin, and it was from this quarter that he approached the dwelling, moving stealthily towards it with a six-gun in each hand and drawing nearer and nearer to it without incident until he was only two or three paces from it.

And then, even as he was stepping into the very shadow of its wall, he heard a curt voice behind him.

"Don't turn around, Phantom, till you've dropped that hardware!"

Buck stiffened, and his first impulse was to wheel face to face with the owner of that voice. But a further harsh warning restrained him, and, as the order to drop his forty-five was repeated, he had no option but to obey.

"All right, Phantom," the voice informed him then. "You can look around now."

Buck turned slowly to find himself confronted by Keeler. In one hand the crook was gripping a revolver that was trained steadily on the Ranger's body—in the other he was carrying a bucket which was brimful of water, and which he had apparently fetched from some nearby spring.

"Too bad, Phantom," said Keeler, "that I happened to be on the outside of the shack. Too bad for you, I mean. Come on—start walkin'. Round to the front door, and keep your hands up."

Without a word Buck made his way to the porch, and, setting down the bucket, the gangster followed at his heels.

"All right, step inside," Keeler snapped as his prisoner paused in front of the door.

Buck thrust the door open, and, though it was broad daylight, he found himself looking into a semi-darkened room whose windows were closely shuttered. It was a room in which a group of men were standing, and, recognising them as the outlaws against whom he had been operating so long, he noticed at the same time that Dirk and Mulford were holding Mary Grayson.

She had recovered her senses, and was staring at a tall, well-built individual who was seated at his ease in a chair. There was an expression of mingled horror and amazement on her lovely features, and Buck soon realised why. For the man in that chair—the leader of the gang of scoundrels which had launched its campaign of terror in Benson County—was none other than Harvey Delaney.

At the moment Delaney's attitude was tense, for he had transferred his gaze from Mary Grayson to the cloaked form which had appeared in the doorway, and there was a look in his eyes that was reflected in those of the men about him, who had also become aware of the Phantom's presence.

Then Keeler followed Buck into the room and spoke in a triumphant voice.

"Look what I found, chief," he said to Delaney. "I caught him sneakin' up on the shack when I came back from the spring."

Delaney rose from his chair, and his lip seemed to curl evilly.

"The Phantom, eh?" he breathed. "The hombre that's spoiled our play at every turn. Blackie, take off his mask!"

One of the gang crossed towards the prisoner and with an ugly gesture pulled down the kerchief that hid his identity, and, as those well-known features were revealed, a cry escaped Mary Grayson.

"Buck!"

"Yeah, Buck Grant," put in Delaney. "I always figured he and the Phantom were linked up in some way—and that guy Spooky, too."

"Just as I always figured you were in tow with this gang of cut-throats, Delaney," Buck rejoined steadily. "You were too anxious to offer mortgages on other folks' property for my likin'."

There was an exclamation from Blackie just then. He had been searching Buck, and had suddenly discovered a tell-tale badge and identification card that proved the captive was a Ranger.

"A representative of the law, huh?" said Delaney, as these articles were handed to him. "Well, Grant, I'm afraid you're outside of the law right now."

"You can do your worst so far as I'm concerned," Buck grated. "But if Mary Grayson—"

"Mary Grayson has nothing to fear so long as she shows good sense," Harvey Delaney interrupted craftily. "In fact, I deeply regret that she received so severe a shaking when she fell from her horse."

Buck eyed him grimly.

"You knew that she was going riding this morning," he said. "You apparently detailed two of your men to intercept her and bring her here. Why?"

"So that I could persuade her to sign a deed," Delaney answered in a cool tone. "A deed, Grant, which will make over her property and her share in the gold-mine to me. After she has done that, and after I have made a quick deal with the railroad and slipped across the border, she'll be set free again. A simple enough arrangement, isn't it?"

He turned all at once to Mary.

"And perhaps," he added, "perhaps the presence of Buck Grant might help you to make up your mind. It accepted, and had been proved to be correct. The theory was expressed that Paul Lavond had died in the swamps.

As all the apparatus, Laehna, Radin and the animals had all perished in the flames Lavond knew they would never get at the truth. It was well that they thought him dead—it would make the rest of his task all the simpler.

Lavond thought of Marin and Coulvét. As long as those two lived they would know that Paul Lavond had not died out in the swamps.

The Eiffel Tower

IT was late afternoon of the same day when an elderly gentleman hailed Toto's taxi.

The young man drove into the kerb, jumped out and opened the door. Toto was feeling pleased. Not only was business good, but the news that Lorraine's father was innocent would put a stop to all this nonsense about her not being able to marry him because she was the daughter of a criminal. Her father's name was cleared.

"Where to, monsieur?"

"Drive anywhere you like."

"That's a very dangerous order to give a taxi-driver, monsieur."

"Yes, but you're not an ordinary taxi-driver, are you—Toto?"

Toto was staggered, and looked round at the smiling, kindly-looking, elderly gentleman. "We were better off once, monsieur, but I am only a taxi-driver now. But one day soon I hope to have my own business. How did you know my name was Toto?"

"Because my name is Paul Lavond," came the startling reply. "Be careful, Toto, don't drive into that lamp-stand. Drive somewhere where we can be alone."

Toto soon recovered his wits. "I've promised to meet Lorraine this evening."

"How is she? Have you seen her since the papers—"

"No, monsieur, I didn't like to talk to her at the laundry in front of all the others. You don't know what your innocence means to me, M'sieur Lavond."

"Yes I do, Toto," Lavond gave a quiet chuckle. "That's why I've got to talk to you, but alone."

"When I want to be alone, monsieur, I always go to the Tower," replied the young man. "It's so far above everything and everybody."

"The Eiffel Tower, then, Toto," directed Lavond.

Some while later the father and future husband of Lorraine leaned on the rail and stared down at Paris. Lavond gave the young man a brief account of his escape from prison, his meeting with Marcel, and his return to Paris.

"Now that I have my so-called freedom—my exile must commence over again. You see that, don't you?"

"I'm trying to."

"Well, at least you can understand why I can't rejoin my family."

Toto nodded.

"Yes, yes, I can see that, but it seems so unjust and unfair—all you've done, you've done for them. I'm so sorry."

"I wouldn't be," Lavond laid his hand on the youngster's shoulder. "I'm rather happy about it. You can marry Lorraine—my fortune will be restored to her. And you can live contentedly together ever after. That's a proper ending to a story, isn't it?"

Suddenly the young man clutched at Lavond's arm. "Lorraine! I forgot that this is where she is going to meet me at sundown. I didn't mean to trick you, monsieur. I merely thought it would please her—I still do—whatever may happen afterwards."

"Toto, it was kind of you, but it can't be. Why, even when I was innocent her hatred of me hurt a good deal, and now that I'm guilty, her belief in me would hurt even more. And if the police should ever—" He moved away. "No, no, I must be going."

"But where?" Toto was in despair. "At least you can tell me that, I could send you your money, and—"

The elevator door opened and out stepped Lorraine. Paul Lavond moved hurriedly away, but over his shoulder he watched them.

"Toto, have you seen the papers?" was the girl's first question.

"Yes, dear."

"Then you've heard about father."

"Yes."

"Aren't you ashamed of me?"

"Of course not."

"Well, I am terribly." The girl gave a choked sob. "I'll never forgive myself—never."

The girl sank on to the rail seating and bowed her head on her hands. Toto looked across at Paul Lavond, who gave an understanding gesture with his hand.

Lorraine was startled on feeling a touch on her shoulder to look up and see an elderly man smiling down at her. "Are you Lorraine Lavond?—the daughter of Paul Lavond?"

"Yes. He's my father."

"May I speak freely?"

"Yes, of course, monsieur." Lorraine saw the boy move away. "Where are you going, Toto?"

"I'll be over here," was his answer.

"I have been waiting for you, mademoiselle."

Lavond pointed to Toto. "Because our friend here was good enough to tell me he was going to meet you."

"Why?" She eyed him curiously.

"Whilst searching for you to-day I was fortunate enough to be directed to him. You see, I'm a friend of your father's."

"Is he in Paris?" she demanded eagerly.

Lavond avoided the question. "I serviced many years with him in prison."

"Where is he now?"

"Matter of fact, we escaped together."

Lavond avoided those bright young eyes.

"Oh, please tell me where he is," Lorraine cried. "I'll search for him—anywhere. You see, I've hated my father all my life, and now I've got to find him and beg his forgiveness. Ask him to come home with me."

"I don't think he ever really thought you hated him."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, but he can never come home to you." Lavond paused, and his voice became a whisper. "My dear child, your father is dead."

Lorraine swayed back against the railings, and closed her eyes.

Paul Lavond longed to take his daughter in his arms and comfort her, but he knew he must control such emotions.

"Yes, he's passed away." His voice was very gentle. "He died out there in the swamp during our escape from prison. The last thing he did was to write a letter to his mother which I will give to Toto. He sent me with a message to you. He told me that if I ever saw you to take your hand, and tell you that he loved you very dearly—that all these years in prison he had known you were growing into a charming young woman. He sent you a kiss."

Lorraine leaned forward and Lavond kissed his daughter.

"Then he said—this is the most important thing of all—he told me to tell you"—Lavond paused—"to forget him. To find happiness and to keep it. He hopes you will marry."

"It's very kind of you to bring me this message." Lorraine found her voice at last.

Lavond gave a funny little laugh. "Yes, a little bit foolish, for the police are still after me. Good-bye."

"And good luck!" cried Lorraine.

Paul Lavond went across to Toto. "My boy," he whispered. "Take great care of her and my mother." He handed over a letter. "Give this to my mother. I go contented in the knowledge that you will be a good husband for my girl." In a paternal gesture he laid both hands on the lad's shoulders. "May every happiness be yours."

The elevator doors opened and Paul Lavond without a backward glance entered, and the doors swung shut.

"Toto, I have the strangest feeling I've seen him somewhere before," Lorraine murmured with a bewildered frown, after Toto had come to sit beside her.

"You have."

"Where?"

"He was in the laundry looking for you." Toto prided himself on his answer. "There were so many people around—he got afraid—on account of the police, I mean. That's how he came to find me."

"Perhaps that's it. I don't remember."

"Remember me?" mocked Toto, and next moment the girl was in his arms.

The elevator descended swiftly. The attendant noticed that his only passenger was smiling and chuckling quietly to himself.

"It's a nice evening, monsieur."

Paul Lavond looked up and nodded. "Yes, probably the nicest evening of my life."

"HARD ROCK HARRIGAN"

"Make the ring as small as yuh like, fellers," he called out. "I don't wanna chaso that guy Harrigan."

This sally was greeted by loud applause from his partisans, while an undertone of scorn rose from Hard Rock's supporters. Then all at once McClintock showed up.

"Hey, where's that foreman o' yours?" Riley demanded. "Ho's keepin' me wain'."

"I'm told he stepped in at the hospital to see Doc Wagner again," Mac replied. "Yeah?" said Black Jack. "Well, he could've saved hisself the trip, because I'm gonna knock him back there in a coupla minutes."

He started to swing his mighty fists as if he were shadow boxing, and had been indulging in this pantomimic display for some little while when a man joined the mob of onlookers and forced his way through to the ring that had been made.

The man was Bellamy, and he was the bearer of startling news.

"Hey, Black Jack!" he panted. "Harrigan's run out on yuh! I just seen him goin' into Anderson's."

Riley seemed thunderstruck for the moment, but speedily hit upon a possible explanation of Hard Rock's behaviour.

"That guy wouldn't run out on any fight," he announced. "I know him too well. Ho's just stallin' to try an' shake my nerve."

"Shake your nerve, Black Jack?" scoffed one of his admirers. "Can yuh imagine that?"

"Yeah, that's a good one, that is," someone else laughed. "Come on, let's go down to Andy's bungalow and drag him out!"

The suggestion met with approval, and soon the miners were moving through the camp like a swarm of eager hornets, with Black Jack Riley well to the fore. Nearer and nearer they came to Ann Anderson's bungalow, and then, halting before the lighted windows of it, they raised a hubbub that advertised their presence.

The uproar was audible to two people who were standing in the neat parlour of the one-story dwelling. They were Andy and Hard Rock Harrigan, and, as the babel grew louder, the girl looked up at her companion in a bewildered fashion.

"Tim, I can't understand what's come over you," she said. "That's all."

"What is there to understand?" Hard Rock countered dully. "You never liked the idea of me fightin' Riley, did you?"

Andy gazed at him searchingly.

"Is that the only reason why you're backing out of this scrap?" she asked.

"Sure it is," he told her. "What else could there be?"

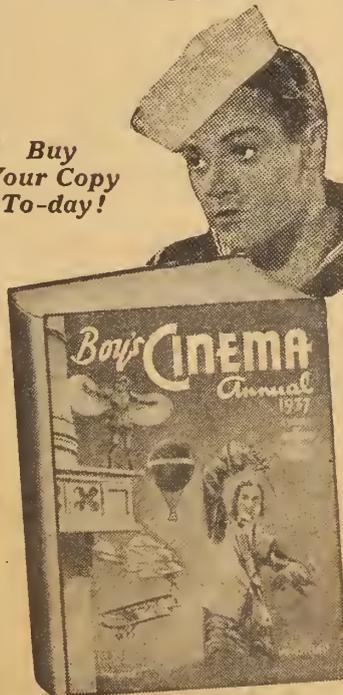

He was longing to reveal the truth to her, knowing that he could at least depend on her commiserating with him. But he did not dare to divulge the secret that had been given to him in confidence by Wagner, for it was just possible that Andy would lose her head when the men began to hound him, and would blurt out the whole story to shield him from their taunts.

Therefore Hard Rock Harrigan held his peace, and he was standing there with clenched hands when Riley came up to the front door and hammered on it—a Riley whose patience was now exhausted.

It was Andy who answered the summons, and Black Jack addressed her thickly.

"Where's Harrigan?" he wanted to know.

"Why?" the girl queried. "Can I give him any message?"

Black Jack's massive head was shifting from side to side as he tried to peer into the sitting-room.

"Yeah," he said, "tell him to come out here an' take his lickin'."

He had scarcely spoken the words when Tim appeared, moving past Andy into full view of the assembled miners.

"Hey, what's the idea?" Black Jack rumbled at sight of him. "I thought you an' me had a date for to-night."

Hard Rock eyed him steadfastly.

"The date's off, Riley," he said with an effort, "and so is the fight."

Black Jack's beetling brows lowered in a frown that was half-puzzled, half-angry. Then he shot a quick glance at the girl behind Tim.

"Oh!" he declared. "So Andy's got you buffaloeed, eh? Well, you're goin' through with the fight, anyway!"

He stepped back and put up his fists, but Hard Rock made never a movement, and for a spell there was a silence—a silence broken at length by McClintock.

"Don't listen to Andy, Hard Rock. Pile into him."

"Come on, Harrigan. We're bettin' on yuh!"

"Give him the old one-two, Harrigan."

The cries rose from all sides, and Oscar and some of the boys struck up the chorus of the "Harrigan" song. But still Tim remained motionless, and when he spoke it was in a voice that shook slightly.

"I said—the fight is off!" he repeated.

Once more a silence descended upon the crowd, and this time it was Black Jack Riley who terminated it.

"Listen, Harrigan," he ground out, "I told you I was gonna pin back your ears, and I'm a man of my word."

He struck Hard Rock across the face with the back of his hand, and the colour that surged into the ace-driller's features was not caused directly by the blow, but by a grim desire to retaliate. Yet he took the insult without attempting to hit in return, and even Andy was shocked and astonished by his attitude—to the extent of forgetting the distaste that she had for bloodshed.

"Fight him, Tim!" she cried indignantly.

Hard Rock betrayed no sign of having heard her, and now Riley and the assembled miners could only come to one conclusion, a conclusion that it was impossible to doubt when the tunnel boss again struck his rival across the cheek without obtaining any answer in kind.

"So you are yellow!" Black Jack breathed, his eyes narrowing. "Gosh, I never would have believed it!"

Then, turning, he shouted to the throng of spectators in a tone of savage mockery.

"Look at him, boys! Hard Rock Harrigan! Huh, the only thing that's tough about him is his name!"

A storm of jeers was let loose, and the very miners who belonged to Tim's crew added their voices to that derisive tumult as soon as they had recovered from their amazement.

"You'd better pack your lingerie and beat it, Harrigan!"

"There's a 'bus leavin' in twenty minutes!"

The howling continued resounding in Tim's ears till he felt he could bear it no more. Then two of his tormentors made the mistake of trying to welt him across the face as Riley had done.

There was nothing wrong with the pulse-beats of these two men, and so Hard Rock let them have it. A right and a left, and the fellows were stretched senseless in the dust—and Black Jack, who had been in the very act of walking contemptuously away, was brought up short in his tracks.

"Well, can yuh beat that?" he said, gaping. "He wouldn't fight me, but he slaps down two of my best—"

And then Black Jack stopped, giving vent to a sharp cry as a stab of pain went through him. There had been no scrap, so far as he was concerned, but the excitement and anticipation of the whole affair, had been sufficient in themselves to affect his shaky heart, and suddenly he was pitching to the ground in a dead faint.

Weeks had passed. The tunnel had been pushed through steadily, and Black Jack had also progressed—though at a slower pace. The time had come, however, when it had been possible to break the news of his illness to him without fear of the shock-bringing on a fatal relapse, and he had learned then the reason for Hard Rock's apparent cowardice on the night which had been scheduled for the fight.

The rest of the camp was made aware of the circumstances as well, and one night, at the mess-hall, a slap-up dinner was given in honour of two men who were no longer sworn foes.

Riley had been prevailed upon to speak. It was his farewell speech as tunnel boss, too, for he had resigned in favour of Hard Rock Harrigan and had taken over a post that was less exacting. "Well, boys," he said in the course of his oration, "I've never been noted for keepin' my mouth shut, but this time I find it kinda hard to express myself."

"Yeah? That's somethin' new for you, Black Jack," someone called boisterously.

Riley fixed a sombre eye on the interrupter, and then ran his glance over the assembled audience.

"What I do want to say, however," he went on, "is that you mugs have got a new tunnel boss who's the finest guy that ever walked on two feet. And after what Doc Wagner has told me, I want to go on record as statin' that there's one Harrigan who's better than a Riley!"

There was a roar of cheering as Black Jack sat down, and it was succeeded by demands for a speech from Tim, who was sitting at the far side of the room with Andy by his side.

Hard Rock Harrigan stood up awkwardly, and gave an embarrassed cough. "Well, fellers," he began, "I—er—I—well, I don't know just what to say— Except—"

He paused, and slipped an arm around Andy's shoulders.

"Except I'd like to introduce you," he went on, "to the little lady who's consented to be Mrs. Harrigan."

The statement was greeted with shouts of approval and congratulation, and these changed to a yell of mirth as Tim rounded off his address with the following words.

"And I'd like it to go on record," he announced, glancing across at Black Jack, "that I've promised from now on to do all my fightin' at home with the missus."

seemed to me that you've shown a special interest in him ever since the two of you met, and I don't think you'd like anything to happen to him, would you?"

Buck saw the girl turn deathly pale, and he promptly called out to her to take no notice of the man's threat. Yet it was clear that she was powerfully affected by it, and there was a distracted look in her eyes when Delaney informed her that he would give her half an hour in which to make up her mind.

Long before the time was up, Mary Grayson was ready to surrender her title to every square foot of land that she owned. Indeed, she had made that decision the moment Delaney had inferred that Buck's life would be forfeit in the event of her proving stubborn, and it was a decision from which she had not wavered.

But before Mary Grayson could sign the deed which Harvey Delaney produced there was a sudden thunder of hoofs in the canyon, and, rushing to the door with his men, the chief of the outlaws saw a formidable posse of horsemen bursting out of the chaparral.

It was unfortunate for the gang-leader that he chose to go for his gun, for in the instant that he plucked it from its holster a volley was discharged by the oncoming riders, and as the echoes of that fusillade were dying away Harvey Delaney sank lifeless to the ground.

Three of his accomplices fell with him. The others threw up their hands, and a minute or two later, as they were being taken into custody, Spooky bent down to examine the body of the scoundrel who had commanded them.

"So Buck and me was right, eh?" he said. "Delaney was our man. Well, it's a pity he didn't live—to swing."

Some weeks later, when Delaney's surviving confederates had been tried and sentenced, Buck Grant dropped in at the Hidden Valley ranch to see Mary Grayson.

"Mary," he told her, "I'm returning to my headquarters at Laredo to-morrow."

"Then you haven't thought over my proposition?" she asked in a tone of regret. "Oh, Buck, I need a manager to look after my investments now that I've sold my land and my interest in the mine. I never was much of a business woman."

Buck drew nearer to her, and his arm encircled her waist.

"Mary," he said, "I've got a counter-proposition to make. How would you like to be the wife of a State Ranger?"

Her answer was spoken in a whisper, but it was the answer that Buck had hoped to hear, and when he left for Laredo the following day his bride-to-be went with him.

THE END.

"O'MALLEY OF THE MOUNTED"

A constable in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is assigned the task of capturing a dangerous gang of smugglers. He assumes the rôle of a criminal and is thrown into prison with a youngster who is known to be in league with the gang. They make a gaol break, which leads to many exciting adventures. Starring George O'Brien

Recalled to Duty

CONSTABLE O'MALLEY was in high spirits as he donned his cleanest and smartest uniform. All the other men in this lonely detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police gazed curiously at him.

"You guys have got no reason to be sore," he shouted at them as he brushed his hair. "Two years ago I had a fortnight's leave, and what happened? I got as far as Montreal, went to bed, as I was worn out with travelling, and was woken next morning with a message that I was to return at once. I went straight off on a man-hunt that took me up into the frozen wastes, and when I got back three months later, hoping to get my leave, I found a lot of you mugs had gone sick and I couldn't be spared."

"You don't have such a bad time, O'Malley," laughed a friend.

The big, happy man grinned. "Maybe I do make the best of life, but there comes a time when you get kinda tired of seeing so much of nature, when you want to busy yourself in the gaiety of a city, so you can come back and say 'How beautiful! Why did I ever want to go on leave?' Well, that's how I am at the moment."

"If your theory's correct you won't want all your leave. A week of the city and you'll be yelling to get back to the great open spaces."

O'Malley grinned at the speaker.

"No, it'll take me a good month to get to that condition." He winked. "In fact, I wouldn't say 'No' to two months so as to make the crew complete. I hope you boys have nice weather and a lot to do while I'm away—maybe I'll send you a wire telling you how I'm hating the city."

January 9th, 1937.

O'Malley straightened his belt, pushed the lanyard to his revolver to a correct line, patted his tunic, and tilted his Stetson to an angle.

"How do I look?"

"Beautiful," simpered one of the men. "You big cissy."

"Don't lose your heart to any of the girls!" cried another constable.

"Heart whole." O'Malley touched his chest. "Nothing like that about me."

O'Malley saluted his companions and laughed boisterously. "So-long, pals!" he cried.

Outside the lonely post was the buggy that was taking him and his kit to the nearest railhead. He noticed another buggy with a constable standing by the horses' heads.

"The Commissioner's here." A sergeant noticed O'Malley's glance. "The old boy seemed pretty gruff. Take my tip, O'Malley, and go while the going's good."

"What d'you mean by that, sergeant?"

"If the Commissioner drives out at this time of the morning a matter of twenty miles, you can bet it ain't only for a joy-ride," was the sergeant's sarcastic answer. "I bet it's trouble with a capital T, and you get going before all leave is cancelled."

"Thanks, sergeant, for the tip." O'Malley leaped into the buggy seat. "So-long, boys!"

The young constable had picked up the reins and was about to crack the whip when an orderly pushed through the small group.

"O'Malley!" he shouted. "The captain wants to speak to you."

"I said good-bye to him last night," was the answer.

"He wants to see you," the orderly answered. "I was told to stop you."

"What did I say?" said the sergeant, as O'Malley jumped down from the buggy.

"For two years I haven't had a leave, and the last leave wasn't a leave at all, in fact. It's three years since I had a vacation," O'Malley snapped. "I'm not being done out of this trip, believe me!"

O'Malley strode along to Captain Herbert's office, knocked, and was summoned to enter. As he saluted he noted the rather drawn expression on his captain's face and the hard lines on that of the Commissioner's. Captain Herbert had been going through it.

"Stand at ease, O'Malley," said the Commissioner. "I understand from Captain Herbert you were about to go on leave?"

"I had nearly gone, sir."

"Sorry as I am to say it, O'Malley, I'm afraid it must be postponed."

"But I haven't had leave for two years, sir," cried the constable in alarm. "And last time I got as far as Montreal and was recalled. It's three years since—"

"O'Malley, I understand," the Commissioner snapped. "And only exceptional circumstances cause Captain Herbert and myself to take this step."

"I've done my best, O'Malley," interposed Captain Herbert, "as you deserve leave more than any man under my command."

"O'Malley, Captain Herbert reckons you're one of the smartest men that has served the force, and it's because of that reputation that I'm asking you to forgo your leave," the Commissioner stated, and coughed as if that disposed of the question. "I understand, O'Malley, that you have been away on a case in the Blue Mountains, and that you solved the matter thoroughly. That has kept you away for nearly three months, and in that time your commanding officer has been endeavouring to round up a gang of smugglers. So far, he has been unsuccessful.

"I've got Marshall on the case, and I'm expecting results any moment."

Captain Herbert had flushed. For nearly an hour the Commissioner had been making life unbearable by demanding why this gang had not been rounded up. Now came the reason.

"Something has got to be done, and sharp," the Commissioner announced. "Not only are the papers commenting on the inability of the Mounted to capture this gang, but the Government have been kicking up trouble. Unless something is done, Captain Herbert, I can see the Mounted being in disgrace and a number of sweeping changes."

O'Malley felt sorry for his captain. He drew himself stilly to attention. "What is it that you require, sir?"

"That's the spirit." The Commissioner permitted himself a slight smile. "Duty first—pleasure afterwards. This gang are concerned in a number of enterprises; they work in America and then escape across the border into Canada. You can now realise why there is so much fuss at Government headquarters. This gang lie low on this side of the border, so that they cannot come under the law without definite proof. We know that they have a hide-out, and that it must be within fifty miles of the border. That hide-out must be found."

"The American police must be pretty slow to let them slip through their fingers every time," said Captain Herbert.

"They never know when they're going to cross the line. This gang has plenty of well-paid spies. That is why the case needs very clever handling."

"I do see the papers occasionally, and read them." O'Malley turned to the Commissioner. "I think I know the mob you mean. They sweep down on the lonely houses, isolated villages, railway stations, roads, etcetera, carry out a daring raid, and then ride hard for the border."

"Those are the people, O'Malley," the Commissioner nodded. "I want you to link up with Constable Marshall and see what you can do." He strode towards the door. "And I want results!"

"Very good, sir."

"I understand that you have been recommended for promotion," were the big man's parting remarks. "Round up this gang, and I'll promise you your sergeant's stripes. Good-day!"

The door closed, and Captain Herbert gave a sigh of relief.

"You can imagine, O'Malley, that I have not been having a very nice time from the Commissioner," said Captain Herbert, who always treated his men as friends. "Frankly, this is one of the most difficult cases with which I have had to deal. In the three months that you have been away I have followed endless trails without result. This gang are a slick, dangerous lot of outlaws. They are wanted for robbery and for a number of killings, but so far they have been wise in sticking to the law on this side of the border. My last communication from Marshall seems to indicate that he is on to something at last, and I suggest that you leave to-day for Silver Creek, which is about a day's ride from here."

"Very good, sir."

"And I can definitely assure you that if you succeed I will see that the Commissioner sticks to his promise." Captain Herbert shrugged. "If you fail, I see sweeping changes that may not affect you, O'Malley, but will cause the resignation of the person recommending your promotion. I don't think I need say any more."

"I should be at Silver Creek by morning."

O'Malley clicked his heels and saluted.

"I will write you a note for Sergeant Wilson," stated Captain Herbert. "He will put you in touch with Marshall." He held out his hand. "Good luck, O'Malley. Remember the Mounties always get their man."

"It looks like men in this case, sir," grinned O'Malley. "And I trust that if I succeed I get that leave to Montreal."

"Succeed and nothing shall stop you taking leave at once," Captain Herbert assured him. "I will write instructions at once. Be ready to leave in half an hour."

"Very good, sir," O'Malley answered.

Marshall Murdered

O'MALLEY had to put up with a good lot of chaff from his comrades over the cancelled leave, but he took it all very well. He had got over his disappointment; it was rather nice to know that the Commissioner and one's own captain thought so much of one's services. Well, he must get this gang, and then, heigho for a spot of leave! What a sensation he would be as a sergeant.

He camped out that night under the pines close to a large lake. At dawn he rose and cut down a branch from a young pine, and swiftly turned it into a fishing-rod of a somewhat amateur pattern. He always carried some line, traces, and flies. The fish were rising, and within a few minutes he had secured two beauties, which he grilled over his fire.

The sun was just coming over the hills as O'Malley cantered towards the desolate hill post of Silver Creek. He came to big lumber mills, and then the village; on the northern outskirts was the station of the Mounted.

After hitching his horse to the rail O'Malley went inside to find Sergeant Wilson.

"Hallo, what brings you up here?" said a constable, who had worked with O'Malley in his early days.

"The Commissioner is a bit riled over a bunch that seemed to be causing a lot of trouble over the border and then coming back here to roost."

"Then you'd best see Sergeant Wilson," answered the constable. "He made an arrest yesterday."

Sergeant Wilson gave O'Malley a sharp glance as the constable swung into his room.

"Got a code message you were on the way up," he remarked. "Sit down, O'Malley." He took the letter Captain Herbert had written and perused it. "Well, I think you've had a fruitless journey. Sorry."

"Doesn't worry me," chuckled O'Malley. "Maybe I can get back to that leave I should have had. Have you got the gang?"

"Dirty redcoats!" growled the captive. "I'd like to bash your heads in!"

"No, not exactly," answered Sergeant Wilson. "But we've made an arrest, and I think it should lead us to the whereabouts of the gang. The prisoner won't talk, but with the rope dangling near his nose I guess he'll spill it."

"How about telling me the whole yarn?"

The sergeant frowned. "It's brief and not too pleasant," was the answer. "You know Marshall was sent up here to make certain investigations. Marshall had a hunch that several of the gang frequented the Eldorado, Silver Creek's saloon. We got a call there last night, and found there had been a shooting affray upstairs in one of the private rooms. We found Marshall there. He'd been shot, and—"

"Is Marshall alive?" O'Malley snapped out.

The sergeant shook his head.

O'Malley's face set in grim lines.

"A grand fellow was Marshall," he muttered. "We were pretty good friends." He jerked up his head.

"Well, sergeant, what else happened?" "Lying unconscious on the floor was another man, and in his hand was a revolver. Two shells were spent, and the lead we found in Marshall's body. Before Marshall died he tried to say something, pointed at the other figure, and fell back. We arrested Bud Hyland on a charge of murder."

"Has he pleaded guilty?"

"Seems sorta dazed. He was pretty drunk. We figure it out that some of the gang were up in that room and that Marshall horned in and was shot by Hyland. The proprietor of the dump heard the sound of high words. I might add Marshall had been acting the part of a drunken lumberman."

"What do you know of Bud Hyland?"

"Came here about six months ago, and tried to start some sort of ranch with a few head of cattle." The sergeant turned up a dossier and tossed it across his desk. "That's as much as we know."

"Twenty-one," O'Malley exclaimed. "Doesn't seem much against him bar this shooting. He says he's innocent?"

"Pretends he was very drunk and doesn't know a thing about it till we broke in and found him stretched out beside Marshall. If he don't talk it will be just too bad."

"Without seeing him, I've a hunch he won't squeal. If he's tried and a verdict is brought in against him it means that gang is still at large."

"Maybe you can make him talk?" suggested the sergeant.

"Maybe I can," O'Malley retorted. "Just think out a real bad man's name for me and a real desperate crime, and I'll do the rest."

"What are you aiming to do, O'Malley?"

"Have myself arrested and chucked into the same cell," was the answer. "Twice I've tried the scheme, and it's worked both times. Here's what I want you to do."

Some while later the prisoner in cell No. 8 heard a sound of struggling and cursing. He saw a door swing open and a big man, dressed as a trapper, come staggering in with two Mounties on either side. He saw the prisoner break free and fell one constable, saw them fight and finally overpower him. The prisoner shouted taunts and threats in harsh tones.

Cell No. 10 was opened, and roughly the prisoner was pushed inside and the cell door slammed.

"Dirty redcoats!" growled the big man. "I'd like to bash your heads in! Pah, you make me sick!"

"Cool your heels, Dan Rawlings!" mocked one of the Mounties. "It's taken us two years to get you, and you'll be growing a beard before you're a free man again."

"Don't be so sure." Dan Rawlings otherwise Trooper O'Malley, gripped the bars of the cell. "You seem can't scare me!"

The Mounties left and locked the outer door. Dan Rawlings sank on to the hard bunk, while Bud Hyland stared at his cell-mate curiously.

Gaol-break

AFTER a moment or two the newcomer became aware of the young man's gaze, and grinned.

"Well, so I got company," he chuckled. "Usually I get solitary confinement. Gee, this is a break!"

The white-faced, hollow-eyed youngster stared at him.

"What are you in for, mister?"

"Oh, everything!" O'Malley beat his broad chest and clenched his fists so that the rippling muscles in his arms stood out boldly. "Dan Rawlings a sucker. For two years those flat feet Mounties have been after me, and I've laughed at 'em, then this happens. Fell down some cursed trap set by some Injuns. Some Mounties chanced that way and saw me lying there. Next thing I know the handcuffs were on my wrists—one of the mugs had recognised me. Gee, it makes me mad!"

"What's the charge against you?" the young fellow asked.

"Well—most everything," O'Malley answered with a hoarse laugh. "You should see the things they've tried to pin on me, even a couple of killings."

"You've killed someone?"

"Son, if you've lived up in these wilds all the years I've been here with every man's hand agin you maybe you'd have had a few killings agin you," the big man answered. "But don't get me wrong—they was fair show-downs. Gee, how I remember that double-crossing, two-timing saloon-keeper! He chiselled me out of my gold-dust like he did all the rest, but he went too far when he had my buddy shot in the back and robbed. I got proof, and I offered him the chance of shooting it out or letting the law take its course. He fancied himself with a gun. The guns were placed on a table, and at the count of six we was to grab 'em and shoot. Of course, the skunk jumped for his gun at five." He pulled open his shirt. "See that scar mark—the hullet grazed me, but though spilling blood I got my gun and he got what he deserved. And these cursed Mounties would try to run me for ridding the world of that pesky crook." He grinned at the younger man.

"Say, son, what have these coyotes pinned on you?"

"They accuse me of killing a man," Bud said in hollow tones.

"You don't say!" O'Malley's eyes gleamed admiringly. "Gee, that's grand. I thought maybe you was just some sneak thief."

"But I didn't do it!" cried Bud.

"Yeah, we all say that!" O'Malley shrugged his shoulders. "But it don't get you far. Once behind these bars on a killing charge and you ain't got much hope. Who did you kill, son?"

"I didn't kill him, I say."

"Okay, son, it's your story. Who was the guy?"

"Marshall—he was a trooper in disguise."

"A Mountie!" O'Malley gasped out. "Gosh, that's tough! A life for a life—you've heard that said. Well, if a Mountie croaks they gotta have someone for it, even if it ain't the guy what done it."

"My lawyer'll get me out of this."

"None of those birds are any good, except to take your dough. How did it happen?"

"I got drinking one night, and when I recovered my senses I was under arrest." Bud looked away. "Marshall was found dead near me in one of the private rooms. They said I shot him. I reckon I must have staggered upstairs to sleep it off and collapsed."

"Where did this happen?"

"At the Eldorado."

"Gee, I know that dump. Been in some pretty hot joints in my time and got out of 'em, but never had no liking for the Eldorado." He gazed speculatively at the bowed head. "How you come to get mixed up in that place?"

Bud gave his companion a somewhat suspicious glance.

"That's my business," he muttered.

"Okay, pal!" O'Malley stretched himself on his bunk. "It ain't no concern of mine, but if you don't wanna swing just let me know."

"What can you do?"

O'Malley, who had shut his eyes, opened one and grinned.

"I ain't aiming to stay in this place over long."

It was obvious to the trooper that he would not get anything more out of the prisoner for the moment, and as he pretended to sleep he was trying to think of some way to break down the barriers. He was helped by the arrival of Bud's sister. O'Malley opened one eye as the gaoler led the boy out to talk with the girl, and, lying on his back, was able to watch the two talking. The news that the girl, who was young and quite pretty, brought seemed to disturb the boy immensely.

When the cell door clanged O'Malley opened his eyes and yawned. Seeing the despondent figure, he sat up.

"More bad news, son?"

"My lawyer's chucked up the case. Says everything is dead against me and I haven't a chance. My sister just told me."

"What did I say?" shouted O'Malley in his hearty manner. "Them birds ain't no good. Son, things look pretty bad. When is the trial?"

"Two days' time. Guess I'm a goner."

"You don't wanna talk that way. What's yer monnieker?"

"Bud Hyland."

"Well, Bud, I reckon I can help you."

O'Malley had lowered his voice. "When is your sister coming to see you again?"

"To-morrow. She's going to see McPherson again. Why do you ask?"

"Because your sister can play her part in saving your neck if she does as I say. Come closer," O'Malley said hoarsely. "Look!"

From his leather top-boots he produced a file, and then glanced towards the cell bars in a significant manner.

"You mean an escape?" gasped Bud.

"No prison was ever made that could hold me for long," derided O'Malley.

"The mugs only frisked me for a gun. If we start filing to-night we can do a lot on those bars, and when your sister comes to-morrow we can get everything fixed for a getaway about midnight."

"How?"

"Get your sister to meet us some place with a couple of good horses. Near that bear-trap I saw three long pines on high ground, and I should say their position

"I know those pines, and so does my sister!" excitedly exclaimed Bud.

"Good! Get her to be there at midnight and to bring three days' supplies. We gotta trek north." O'Malley rubbed his chin. "There's only one thing that worries me."

"What's that?"

"These Mounties will be hot on our trail, and I wish I knew a good hide-out, where we could rest up till these red-coats kinda lose heart or think we're across the border."

Bud walked right into the trap.

"I know the very place. I vowed I would hold my tongue. I'm not a squealer. These buddies of mine hired McPherson, but now he's turned down the case they'll not know what to do. If we can link up with them we're safe."

"Are they on the level?" O'Malley asked. "There'll be a reward for our capture, and I don't trust many folk in these parts."

"I swear they're on the level," Bud replied eagerly.

O'Malley wisely asked no more questions, and that night they set to work on the bars. By morning two more were almost filed through. In the afternoon Edith Hyland came to see her brother. She reported that she had failed with McPherson. O'Malley, lying in his bunk, could see the two arguing in whispers—the Mounties most obligingly keeping well out of earshot—and grinned when the girl got up to leave. The brother had persuaded his sister.

Edie's going to get the horses and be at the three pines at midnight with supplies," hoarsely whispered Bud. "She was all against a gaol-break, and wanted me to stand trial, but I told her I hadn't a chance."

"You sure haven't. Best get some rest, Bud."

After dark they set to work again on the bars, and at last the way to freedom lay open. After waiting to see there were no Mounties on the watch, O'Malley crawled through and dropped to the ground. In a whisper he hissed back that Bud Hyland could make the jump. The two men sped silently away from the prison and ran for about half a mile before O'Malley called a halt. He placed his ear to the ground.

"We're not being followed," he chuckled. "Those Mounties won't find we've flown till daybreak. The poor saps."

Half an hour later, after various detours, they reached the three lone pines. Sure enough, there was the girl with three good horses.

O'Malley watched the happy reunion of the two young people, and it confirmed his opinion that Bud Hyland had nothing to do with the murder of Marshall. The girl was even prettier than O'Malley expected, and he liked the fearless way she stared at him. Obvious that she was not very certain of him.

"Edie, the Mounties will soon be after us, and we've got to lie low for a while," Bud told her. "You get back to the ranch and I'll get word to you."

"I've got old Hodges and his wife to carry on," the girl stated. "I'm coming with you."

"But you can't do that," argued the boy.

"I can ride as well as any man, and I'm not trusting you out of my sight."

"You'll be up against every sort of hardship," O'Malley told her. "We'll have to ride for hour after hour, mile after mile, and over a bad trail."

"I have made up my mind." The blue eyes flashed, and the small chin was full of determination. "I am going with my brother, no matter how bad the trail." She turned to her brother.

"You are going to the headquarters of 'Red' Jagger, aren't you?"

"Yes, he's my friend."

"And all he could do for you was to get a sneaking lawyer like McPherson to take up your case. That man is a bad influence, and directly the hue-and-cry abates you're leaving that bunch and we're getting over the border back to civilisation." Edith Hyland gave her orders: "Don't waste time arguing, Bud."

"Your sister's right, Bud," O'Malley interposed. "Every moment is valuable. We gotta be many miles away from here before the Mounties find we're gone."

Without further discussion, Bud Hyland headed to the north-west, Edith followed close behind, whilst O'Malley brought up the rear.

Red Jagger

EXCEPT for brief halts they rode all that night and part of the morning.

Bud Hyland explained that he had travelled out of their course because he wished to throw off any chances of pursuit.

O'Malley admired the way the girl kept up and showed no sign of flagging, though it was his strong hands that helped her from the saddle when they made late breakfast beside a lake.

"There is a good bit of open country before us," Bud stated, as they drank steaming hot coffee. "It would be best if we rest in some thicket, and start about an hour before sunset."

"Why can't we make for the border?" the girl wanted to know.

"Lady, that would be asking for trouble," grinned O'Malley. "They will be watching the border for miles and miles. You can bet every station, every small town and all settlements will be warned, and they'll have an accurate description of us. North of us lies country that seldom sees a white man. It would be very unwise, Miss Hyland, to travel south. We could lie hidden here for months until the winter breaks, but we ain't got any need to worry with Red Jagger's hide-out close at hand. Bud, who is this Red Jagger?"

"Horse and cattle dealer—high shot."

"He's been a bad influence on my brother!" flamed the girl.

"Red's a swell guy!" protested Bud.

"How you come to link up with him?"

O'Malley asked casually.

"Oh, I chanced on him one day!" the boy answered. "I was doing swell till this happened."

"Buying horses and cattle?"

"I hadn't been with Red long. I helped herd the cattle and handle the horses, act as a watch-out, and—"

"Watch-out!" O'Malley rubbed his hands. "Sounds mighty like Red is a cattle rustler. Guess I might do worse than link up with Red."

"My brother is not linking up with a band of crooks if I can help it!" the girl cried, giving O'Malley an indignant glance. "Why can't we stay in the forests?"

Everyone backed away from a faro table as Dan menaced them with his forty-five.

"You cowardly cur!" hissed the girl. "And I thought you were his friend."

"And starve to death?" O'Malley asked quietly. "I helped save your brother's neck, but I ain't got any desire to wander about these pesky forests. We gotta have some dough, and if we throw in our lot with Red we can make it."

"And become outlaws. Up till now the Hylands have always kept on the right side of the law."

"Why argue, Edie?" said her brother. "All that's changed, and we've gotta live. Maybe Red does rustle a few cattle. I could do with some easy money."

"Maybe you're used to making your money by dishonest means, but we're not," Edith told O'Malley. "And I'll thank you not to try to persuade my brother into your villainous ways."

"Keep quiet, Edie!" Bud cried angrily. "You ought to be thanking Dan, not carrying on this way."

"Don't you mind me!" O'Malley chuckled. "I get a kick out of tweaking the nose of the law. If you two wanna hit the trail to the border you can count on me to help you, but for the moment it ain't worth arguing about. Safety lies with Red Jagger till the Mounties have cased up on us. I may link up with Red, but I'll help you get across the border." He rose. "Guess we've argued long enough. We should be making tracks for the forest, and, believe me, I'm going to sleep with one eye open. Danger lurks where you least expect it."

Some hours later they once more hit the trail and soon came to open country. O'Malley, riding as usual in the rear, secretly examined a map, and made his bearings. Soon they should come to a river.

They reached the river, and found the water not very deep. It was dark when they reached a wide valley, and Bud advised staying there the night as the undergrowth was dense.

January 9th, 1937.

"It ain't wise to go prowling about Red's hide-out at night," the boy gave a shaky laugh. "He has men posted, and we might get shot."

It was O'Malley who fixed up a rude shelter for the girl. Often he knew the girl was watching him as if she could not understand him.

At dawn the journey was continued, and they had not proceeded far when from some dense foliage a man sprang out and covered them with a rifle.

"What you want here?"

"I'm seeking Red Jagger," answered Bud. "I'm Bud Hyland."

The man came closer.

"Bud Hyland's in gaol."

"I broke out with the help of Dan Rawlings. My sister had horses waiting for us."

"If you're lying the worse it'll be for you," muttered the man. "Raise yer hands above yer heads, and if you try any finny stuff I'll shoot. Take the trail ahead and don't forget I'm close behind."

The trail became wider, and they had gone half a mile or so when it opened out on to a small plateau. Here and there were trees, a number of shacks and a considerable amount of cattle. Bud whispered that at one time the place had been a ranch. Outside the biggest shack they were ordered to dismount. A yell brought out an ugly, unshaven rascal, who seemed amazed at the sight of three visitors. They were ordered to enter the shack.

Round a table sat a number of men drinking and playing cards. O'Malley took particular note of the huge man with the coarse features, small, beady eyes and immense hands. He was sure that this was Red Jagger, and that this was the gang that had committed the outrages across the border.

"Well, if it ain't Bud Hyland," cried the big man, lurching to his feet and nearly upsetting the rough table. "Who sprung you outa that gaol?"

"My friend here—Dan Rawlings," announced Bud.

"Dan Rawlings." Red Jagger fingered his chin and drooped his heavy eyelids. "Can't say I mind that name." The eyes opened wide and studied O'Malley closely. "What's yer game, mister?"

With hands on hips, and an insolent smile on his lips, O'Malley stared boldly at the big ruffian. He shrugged his shoulders.

"All depends on what sorta game there is to play. I met up with Bud here in Silver Creek gaol, and he looked like taking the rap for the killing of a Mountie." O'Malley again shrugged his shoulders. "Not that I have any time for them coyotes, but it seemed kinda tough that Bud should be handing in his cheeks for a killing that he don't seem to know much about. I've been in gaols before, and they don't hold me long."

"So you broke out?" Red nodded his head. "What was you in for?"

"For striking a Mountie and resisting arrest," O'Malley chuckled. "That don't sound much, but it was plenty. I was recognised. Kinda queer that tucked away in the wilds they should have pictures of guys what wanted—guys not heard of for a couple of years. That's me—I fooled 'em all that while."

"They could have pinned something else on you?" questioned Red.

"They were having a danged good try," O'Malley smiled round at the group. "Swell hide-out you got round here."

"Why did you come here?" Red turned on Bud almost threateningly.

"I knew the Mounties would soon learn of our escape and that we would have little chance," frankly answered Bud. "My sister had got horses, but we would have to rest them, whilst the troopers could get changes of mounts, and we wanted a place where we could lie low till they got tired of looking for us. Where else should we come but here?"

"Yeah, where else would you come?" Red grunted. "Sure you weren't trailed?"

"I ain't been in these wilds for twenty years or so without knowing something," sneered O'Malley.

"We're kinda suspicious of new faces," Red stuck out his jaw. "You've kinda spoilt our plans. Word came to us that —" He glanced round at Bud. "The lawyer guy had gone back on us, and we had it all fixed to raid that gaol tonight."

"You'd have had to ride pretty hard to make it." O'Malley calmly sat down in a chair. "Well, we seem to have saved you and your boys a lot of trouble. What's the next move?"

"Have you any suggestions, mister?"

"Yeah!" O'Malley yawned. "I reckon I've had about six hours' sleep in the last three days, and I know Edie and Bud are almost ready to drop. Have you a spare shack where we could doss?"

"Sure I have." Red held out his hand. "Maybe in the morning, Rawlings, we can have a talk." Red grinned, and then raised his voice. "Gabby!" he yelled.

From the back regions shuffled a hang-dog fellow. Long, dank iron-grey hair, unshaven for days, bloodshot eyes and with a filthy apron over his dirty clothes.

"What d'you want, Red?"

"Take these people to that empty shack—give 'em blankets," the leader ordered. "Take 'em over some food."

"Uh!" Gabby shuffled forward and peered. "Bud Hyland! Why, how the heck did you get here? I sure thought we'd seen the last—" He saw the red gleams in his chief's eyes.

"Cut out the talk and get busy."

Gabby half-turned, and then his eyes peered at O'Malley.

"What's he doing here?"

"Will you get going?" thundered Red.

"I've seen him some place!" shrilled Gabby defiantly.

"I can't say the same for you!" laughed O'Malley. "Though I've been in and out of a few prisons in my life."

"Yeah, maybe it was in one o' them I saw you," Gabby shuffled back to the door. "I'll go hot up the stew."

"Gabby is a grand cook—he's stewed like everything he handles!" shouted Red, in his hearty manner. He beamed at the girl. "Very pleased to have you here with us, Miss Hyland. You'll find us a bit rough and ready, but appearances are sometimes kinda deceptive."

Edith Hyland hoped so in her heart, because never had she seen such a bunch of desperadoes. It was a relief to be out of the evil-smelling room and following the cook across dewy grass towards a distant shack.

From a window Red Jagger and some of his men watched them.

"How d'you figure this out?"

"Well, Butch, it ain't so easy!" Red leered at the bearded rogue who was his lieutenant.

"What was the idea o' sayin' we was going to attack the gaol?" asked a man, with a heavily lined face.

"Lefty, you're okay with a gun, but brains ain't your strong point." Red touched his forehead. "D'you think I was gonna tell the kid we had framed him and we never thought he'd escape hanging. I never thought this rube would horn in and spoil our game."

"What d'you aim to do with 'em, Red?" asked Butch.

"Dan Rawlings ain't dumb like the kid." The big fellow went back to the table.

"Why not fix him to-night and the other two?" cried Lefty.

"Bud's here, and he'll do as we tell him," said Red Jagger. "And his kid sister is a swell looker. I'm kinda tired of Gabby's cooking, so we don't wanna be too hasty. If this Rawlings guy is all he says he is, then he's one of us." He glanced round. "That guy has nerve, and I'm getting tired of guys with yeller streaks."

The six men stared at their leader and moistened dry lips. They knew what Red was getting at, and squirmed. In a recent raid they had turned tail and fled when a number of deputies had appeared.

Dangerous Days

THE shack that had been allotted to them was in a filthy condition, but the girl with the aid of a broom worked wonders. There was one bedroom, a kitchen and one main room. Naturally the girl had the bedroom, and the men slept on the floor of the main room.

During the night, which was stormy, O'Malley awoke to hear Bud muttering in his sleep. From a few odd remarks he gathered that the boy had foolishly become linked up with the gang through losing money at cards. A chance of paying his debts had been offered by Red Jagger if he helped them to smuggle goods over the border. That was an offence, but Bud had not known that the goods were not always smuggled, and in most cases were stolen with violence. Once involved with the gang there was no escape. Marshall had found out about the gang's activities and had been murdered, and Jagger, not wanting his men to be suspected, had framed Bud Hyland. The leader, realising by now that the boy was far too straight to be of much use—in fact, might be forced into talking—Marshall's death was one way of shutting his mouth. O'Malley clenched his fists at the thought of Jagger's treachery. He had promised to help Bud in return for a still tongue, hoping that Bud would realise too late that there was no escaping the dread penalty of death. Poor Bud had swallowed the story about attacking the prison cells at Silver Creek. Edie was much more far-seeing than her brother.

The storm was so bad that night that the bed-room windows collapsed and rain poured into the room. Edie brought her blankets into the main room and lay down close to the fire. Somehow the presence of O'Malley gave her a feeling of security.

In the early hours the storm lifted, and soon after dawn there was scarce a cloud in the sky.

O'Malley had a talk with Red Jagger, and, having an inventive brain, was able to concoct a fine tale of his adventurous life. Red Jagger felt sure that Dan Rawlings was just the sort of new recruit required for their rides across the border, but the rest of the bunch, who had been listening to the mumbling statements of Gabby, were not so sure, and protested strongly when later that day Red stated that Dan was chucking in his lot with them.

"You mugs make me sick," Red told them, when he had listened to their protests. "If Dan ain't all he seems we'll know soon enough."

"How?" they asked.

"It ain't kinda wise to cross the border, so we're going to ride into Silver Creek," Red told them. "They gamble for pretty heavy stakes at the Eldorado, and—"

"You ain't planning to stick up the Eldorado!" cried Butch. "We've kept clear of Silver Creek, and—"

"You bunch of scared coyotes!" jeered their leader.

"The Mounties will know we're in the district," persisted Butch.

"We're riding into Silver Creek, but we won't stick up the Eldorado," Red Jagger told them, and roared to see their looks of surprise. "You guys ain't got any more sense than a mule. Dan Rawlings is going to stick up the Eldorado and we'll watch. That'll show whether he's got nerve. Brody." This to a gaunt man with a scared face. "Go fetch Rawlings."

O'Malley listened to Red Jagger's scheme and was quite aware that the men were watching him closely. One false move and he'd be full of lead. If he refused to carry out this hold-up anything might happen to him, and he would not be able to help Bud and his sister, but if he did carry it through he would be made one of the gang.

"Holding up a gambling joint ain't much in my line," drawled O'Malley. "And—"

"You're scared!" leered Butch.

"I'll take any one of you mugs outside and knock the hide off 'em!" rasped O'Malley, his eyes gleaming. He bunched those mighty muscles. "Any of you sour-faced cissies care to take me on?"

"That's the talk, Dan," approved Red, and glanced round. "I'll stake ten bucks on Dan."

The men muttered, but did not take up the challenge.

"Having settled that matter we will now return to the hold up," O'Malley leaned forward. "When I said hold-ups of gambling joints were not in my line I meant it, not because I was yeller, but because they're small thunder. But as you mugs ain't keen to fight, maybe you'd like to wager me I won't stick up the Eldorado single-handed."

Again there was no response. Red Jagger grinned his approval, but his heavy face hardened when O'Malley said:

"I'm sorry I misjudged you," Edith whispered.

"I do this on one condition."

"Condition?"

"Red, you reckon I'm on the level, but your bunch of cutthroats think I'm some sort of a double-crossing rat," said O'Malley. "If it weren't for you, Red, I wouldn't dream of working with such a bunch. I gotta do this hold-up just to show these monkeys I got nerve. Okay, I'll do it, but the condition is what I collect I keep."

"We share everything!" shouted Butch.

"When it's a joint affair you may do," retorted O'Malley. "But I'm doing all the dirty work, and it ain't any of my choice. You wished this on me—okay, then I take the swag. In that dirty little cheap saloon they may play for stakes that you boys call high, but I doubt if I collected every coin and note it would be much more than five hundred smackers. I'll do this hold-up just to show you how it should be done, and after that I stand in with the gang. What d'you say, Red?"

"I guess you're right," said Red, who was impressed by O'Malley's colossal impudence in dictating terms. "What ye take ye keeps." He held out his hand. "It's a deal."

"I guessed you'd come round to my way of thinking," grinned O'Malley. "The conditions indicate a storm to-night, but I reckon Saturday should be a grand night. The poor rubes at the saloon will have more money at the end of the week. If we start from here at midday we should be on the outskirts of Silver Creek shortly before dusk."

When Edith Hyland heard from her brother that Red Jagger, Dan Rawlings and a number of the men were planning a hold-up she was bitterly disappointed. Though she knew Dan was a bad man she had foolishly imagined that he was going to lead a new life at her wish. She had begged him to do this and to help her brother to keep straight. He must have been laughing at her, and she decided that she hated Dan Rawlings.

Red Jagger left instructions with three of his men to keep watch on the Hylands and that on no account were they to leave their shack. Red had tried to make friends with the girl, and knew that she despised and disliked him. That had enraged the man, and his evil brain knew that the girl would try to escape with her brother if a chance arose.

From her shack window Edith saw nine horsemen galloping towards an opening in the pines. How marvellously Dan rode. Tears smartened her eyes—how could a man with such a kindly smile be so wicked? She hoped he would be caught, and that made her heart miss a beat. Surely she was not falling in love with an outlaw.

On the outskirts of Silver Creek Red Jagger halted his men and they split up into three parties, so they would not excite suspicion. They were ordered to converge on the Eldorado, but to take no part in the affair unless the order came from Red. It was to be Dan Rawlings' show.

And Dan did the job in a manner that made Red Jagger blink. Dan walked into the crowded saloon, where men were drinking, singing and losing their money at the tables. Red Jagger and Butch were lolling at the bar when Dan made his appearance.

Everyone backed away from a faro table as Dan flashed out his gun. There was the roar of his gun, as he shot out the lamps hanging from the roof in a manner so swift that it was like lightning. Someone fired at Dan, and in the gun flash Red Jagger saw a bag full of notes grabbed by his new man.

A moment later came the clutter of hoofs.

"Well, I must say that was the swiftest January 9th, 1937.

hold-up I've ever seen," whispered Red. "Come on, Butch, we'd better get outa here."

O'Malley rode hard and got clear away from the posse sent in pursuit, and, making a detour, rode under cover of the woods till he was close to the Mountie outpost. The troopers had been aroused, and the station was almost deserted when O'Malley walked in. The sergeant grabbed for his gun, mistaking him for an outlaw, and then laughed as he recognised the daring Irishman.

"I'll wager all I've got that you know something about this hold-up at the Eldorado."

"You're right." O'Malley tossed the bag of money on to the table. "I lifted that to-night."

"You stole it—whatever for?"

"So that Red Jagger and his gang of ruffians will think I'm a real bad lad," chuckled O'Malley. "Listen, sergeant, whilst I spill my story and don't ask too many questions as I've gotta get to the hide-out before Red Jagger gets back."

Swiftly O'Malley told his story and all that had happened.

"I'm pretty sure that Red Jagger and his men shot Marshall, but I don't know which one," he concluded. "So I got to carry on with my rôle of Dan Rawlings. If a message is brought to you bearing that name I want you to act on it. I'm going to try to urge Red to do something this side of the border." He grinned. "I'm aiming at the bank at Silver Creek, and if Red could be lured into trying it, then we can pinch him on this side of the border. Guess I'll have to be moving."

"How about this money?"

"Sergeant, you're awful good at telling stories," grinned O'Malley from the doorway. "You were out riding and saw a man going like the wind, and not liking the looks of him you gave chase. He dropped the bag of gold and got right away. Ain't that a swell story?"

"It'll do, O'Malley, but don't let those thugs get wise to you," warned the sergeant.

On leaving the outpost O'Malley went at a fast gallop and at last came in sight of the hide-out in the hills. As he dismounted outside his shack he heard the distant clatter of hoofs, and knew he had got back before Red Jagger.

O'Malley was comfortably ensconced in a chair in the mess-room at the main shack when Jagger and his men entered.

"Hallo, Dan, thought we mighta seen you outside Silver Creek!" cried Red Jagger.

"Too risky," drawled the trooper. "Not good for that posse to get wise that it was anything else but a lone-man show."

"Guess you're right," nodded Red. "It was smart work, Dan."

"How much did you collect?" demanded Butch, his ugly face avid with greed.

"Not so bad."

Butch looked at the others.

"We reckon you should cache in," he cried. "We want our share."

"I carried out this hold-up on the understanding that what I got was mine," came the answer. "I might have known you mongoses would want your cut."

"It's always been the rule, Dan," stated Red.

"Did I carry out this job on those conditions, or didn't I?" The bogus Dan Rawlings stuck out his lower lip. "I said what I collected was mine, and no one else's property. Next job we all cut in, but nix on the Eldorado. If you had been in my place, Red, would you hand over the dough you risked your life to get to this bunch of hornets?"

"No!" shouted Red. "But next time we all get our share."

"Okay by me," O'Malley answered truculently. "And I suppose we sit around this dump for weeks before we do a thing."

"It ain't safe across the border."

"Why go across the border, when there are fat pickings close at hand."

"What do you mean?" asked Red.

"Ain't Silver Creek got a bank, and I always did hear it was stuff full of money. What I took to-night was chicken feed, and if divided wouldn't amount to much, but that bank would give us enough to be rich for life—and dead easy."

Simply, the trooper explained how the bank at Silver Creek could be held up and robbed of its wealth. Red Jagger and his men listened in silence.

"Sounds easy enough," Red had to admit. "But Canada is a refuge, and that's why we've never done any hold-up this side of the border."

"Then you might as well take a good rest," came the sneering retort of the schemer. "You brought in a bunch of papers, and they're still howling about your daring raids, and by all accounts the other side of the border lies a reception party waiting to fill you mugs with lead. No one expects you to carry out a raid in Canada. We carry out the raid and make for the hide-out, where we lie low for a spell, then go West and slip over the border or into British Columbia. But maybe it's too tough a job for you guys to tackle."

"Nothing's too big for us," Red thrust his big head forward. "In two days' time the bank gets a big consignment of gold. Joe at the Eldorado told me, and he ain't ever wrong. On that night we stick up Silver Creek Bank."

O'Malley had hard work to hide a triumphant grin.

What Edith Overheard

O'MALLEY wanted to slip out that night and ride down to warn the sergeant, but he found there was a guard on the horses. Apparently, Butch and one or two of the others were not too sure of Dan Rawlings. Then to make matters worse Red suggested—it was the same as an order—that he come and sleep in the main shack. It was partly old Gabby's fault, because the cook was always scowling at O'Malley and trying to remember where he had seen the big fellow before. Besides, Red thought it a good idea so they could complete their plans.

Edith informed O'Malley that she was pleased he was going as she had no time for people who held up saloons at the point of a gun.

After a somewhat unpleasant night listening to Red snoring, the trooper got up early and came out of the shack in time to see Bud and his sister mounting their horses. It would spoil everything if these two left now before Bud's innocence was proved.

Edith gave O'Malley a frigid stare as he came rushing up to them.

"Where you two going?"

"We're quitting," mumbled Bud. "Edie reckons you've kinda gone back on us."

"If only you two young idiots would —" He turned to see Red Jagger appear. "Come down off those broncs!" he shouted. "You ain't walking out on us!"

Red heard, and came lumbering across. The girl tried to spur her horse, but O'Malley was too quick and grabbed the bride. Forcibly he pulled the girl out of the saddle, and down climbed Bud.

"You leave my sister alone!" he

It was a very strange case that was forced upon Perry Mason on his wedding night by a woman with a loaded automatic—and Perry Mason himself was to be accused of murder before its many complications were at an end. A baffling mystery, starring Warren William, with Claire Dodd and Winifred Shaw

The CASE OF THE VELVET CLAWS

“For Better or For Worse”

THE judge on the bench of the night court was a woman, and quite a good-looking woman, too, in spite of a certain middle-aged plumpness. Her name was Mary Florence O'Daugherty, and she sat in judgment upon all manner of minor cases with quite as much efficiency as any male.

“So you got hot-headed and struck the man with the crowbar, eh?” she said severely to an offender who had been brought before her. “Well, young man, maybe you can cool off in about ninety days. Next case!”

The door at the back of the court swung wide, and in at it streamed quite a small crowd of people, headed by Perry Mason, attorney-at-law, a tall man and a handsome one, quiet of manner in the ordinary way, but fierce enough when occasion demanded.

A wisp of a moustache adorned his upper lip; his brown hair was brushed well back from a particularly high brow, and a pair of very quick blue eyes could express everything, or nothing, as their owner willed.

Close behind him was Della Street, who had been his private secretary for quite a number of years, but who was young, beautiful, and, at the moment, flushed with excitement. Her green eyes were very bright, and she was carrying in her left hand a bouquet of white roses.

Beside Della towered Wilbur Strong, the city coroner—a long-nosed, clean-shaven and elderly man, who was so hardened to his gruesome duties that he was prone to indulge a grim sense of humour—and close behind were other men, some of them friends, some newspaper reporters and Press photographers.

Perry Mason strode straight towards the bench, the hand with which he had removed his soft felt hat upraised.

“If the court please!” he cried. “Life or death matter, judge!”

The bench was reached and he said confidentially over the top of it:

“Listen, Mary F., you’ve got to marry me!”

“Perry,” returned the judge with all the gravity in the world, but with a distinct twinkle in her brown eyes behind a pair of gold-rimmed pince-nez. “I’ve known you since you were peddling papers in this town twenty years ago, but I’ve no desire to become your wife.”

Perry laughed as heartily as Della Street and the rest of the invaders.

“Of course not, you old heart-breaker,” he said, and turned to pull Della forward. “This is the lucky lady. Judge, meet Miss Della Street, my ex-secretary. For sentimental reasons I’d like you to tie the knot.”

Judge Mary Florence O'Daugherty smiled and nodded. She was quite as good at marrying people as at sending them to gaol, and in the United States of America all judges possess both prerogatives.

“Court’s adjourned for a ten-minute recess,” she announced, and left the bench to open a door in the wall at the back of it. “Right this way, Perry. Come along, you poor child!”

Into the judge’s room passed Perry and his bride and his friends and the newspaper representatives; but the wedding ceremony had only just begun when the bailiff of the court, who looked exactly like a policeman because he was dressed as one, put his head in at the door.

The person who happened to be nearest was a broad-shouldered fellow of about thirty-five, full of face and weak of mouth, but with a pair of particularly bright brown eyes.

“Say, are you with Mr. Mason’s party?” inquired the bailiff.

“Am I with his party?” The brown eyes expressed indignation. “My dear boy, I am Mr. Mason’s chief legal adviser. Drake’s the name—‘Spudsy’ Drake.”

“That don’t impress me, son,” returned the bailiff. “You’re wanted on the ‘phone.”

Spudsy, whose real front name was Paul, slipped out into the comparatively empty court-room and was handed a telephone from the bench by the bailiff.

“Hallo!” he said into it. “Who’s that? Mrs. Stewart? No, no, Mrs. Stewart, Mr. Mason can’t deal with any new cases. He’s gone to Pinelurst Lodge.”

Down went the instrument, and Spudsy returned to the room at the back of the court just in time to hear the judge say:

“I now pronounce you man and wife. Kiss her, Perry. Go on—it’s legal now.”

“Thank you, judge,” said Perry, amid laughter, and he took the blushing Della in his arms and kissed her with every appearance of ecstasy.

Tiny Brewster, of the “Examiner,” who was not tiny at all, sang out on behalf of his tribe:

“Can we have a picture of Mrs. Mason?”

Perry perched Della on the desk beside which Mary Florence O'Daugherty had functioned and stood by her. Flash-lamps blazed, the shutters of several cameras clicked, and then Wilbur Strong pounced.

“As best man it’s my privilege to kiss the bride,” he proclaimed, and proceeded to do so. "Help yourselves, boys! Perry's buying!"

Della submitted to more kisses than she could count, and while she was laughingly enduring the ordeal, Wilbur Strong said to Perry Mason:

"What are you gonna do, Perry, if a case comes up while you're away?"

"My son," returned the attorney, who was many years the coroner's junior, "if it's a criminal case I don't want it. I have retired from the practice of criminal law."

"Sez you!" scoffed Tiny Brewster.

"I mean it," Perry declared. "I've promised Della to become a sober filer of briefs. No more excitement or danger."

"Can't you just see him with his spectacles and brief-case?" laughed Della.

Spudsy, deeming it time the party broke up, announced loudly that the car was ready; whereupon Perry shook hands with Miss O'Daugherty.

"So-long, judge," he said. "You're a great guy! I'll never forget your kindness, Mary F."

Mary F. laughed and shook hands with the bride.

"D'you know, my dear," said she, "I still owe your husband for the last newspaper he delivered when he was just so high?"

"Don't worry," chuckled Perry. "I haven't forgotten that nickel you owe me, and I'm going to collect some day!"

Out from the room and out from the court streamed the whole party. In the street, by the kerb, stood a streamlined and black saloon capable of exceeding all the speed limits of the State of California, and Spudsy opened one of its doors.

Della was helped into the back seat by Perry, who climbed in beside her; Spudsy took the wheel.

"Well, Perry," boomed Tiny Webster from the pavement, "even if we don't approve, good luck!"

Perry leaned forward.

"All right, Spudsy," he said in a voice unnecessarily loud, "Pinchurst Lodge."

"Send me a post card!" shouted Wilbur Strong, over and above cries of "Good luck!"—and Della leaned out of the window as the car began to move.

"The bride's bouquet!" she said. "You know—whichever catches it!"

The bouquet was thrown, and the coroner caught it.

"Take your shoes off and throw 'em!" he vociferated.

The car gathered speed and the crowd on the pavement was left behind. But several members of it had ideas, notably Detective-Sergeant Hoffman, who was fifty-one, grey-haired, and quite old enough to know better.

"I'll tell you what we do for the bride and groom and their honeymoon at Pinchurst," he gurgled.

"We telephone Pinchurst," said Tiny Webster.

"And we send the fire department at midnight," said Hoffman.

"And the village constable at two in the morning!" added Wilbur Strong.

"You betcha, coroner," approved the sergeant of detectives. "And at four I swear it's a phoney marriage!"

But Perry Mason had not established a reputation for himself without brains, and just beyond some traffic lights he called out to his self-styled "chief legal adviser":

"Spudsy, make a left turn at the next corner. We're going back to the apartment."

Della was quite dismayed.
January 9th, 1937.

"But what about Pinchurst?" she exclaimed.

"Yeah, what about Pinchurst?" echoed Spudsy, over his shoulder.

"Unfortunately," Perry replied to both of them, "they have telephones at Pinchurst, and we have friends in San Francisco."

"Oh, you mean those guys back there?" said Spudsy. "What could they do?"

"Plenty!" Perry gave a little chuckle and squeezed the waist of his bride. "I pity the poor residents of Pinchurst this night!"

A Case for Perry Mason

PERRY rented a luxurious flat on the second floor of an imposing apartment-house in Jefferson Square. The three emerged from a lift into a carpeted corridor, Spudsy encumbered with suitcases, and a slant-eyed Chinese servant named Ping opened the front door of the flat without exhibiting the slightest surprise, although he had believed his master to be on the way to the picturesquely situated village of Pinchurst.

Spudsy entered first and dumped the suitcases on the floor of a little square hallway. Della was about to follow when she found herself whisked up into her brand-new husband's very strong arms.

"Oh!" she gasped.

"As my secretary you walked into my parlour," said Perry, "but as my bride I carry you! Remember what the judge said—'It's legal now!'"

He carried her into an elegant sitting-room and deposited her on a chesterfield with a kiss, then took off his hat and overcoat.

"Say, don't I get a drink on my wedding night?" she inquired.

"Right away, darling," he promised, and sailed off to the dining-room to mix cocktails.

Spudsy conveyed the suitcases into a spacious bed-room, and was turning to depart when a girl stepped from behind the open door, causing him to start violently. Except for a hard expression about her eyes and mouth, she was quite beautiful. Her hair was raven black, and a little black hat was perched on her head. She was dressed in a black costume, with a white blouse. But Spudsy had never seen her before in his life, and the automatic in her right hand caused his jaw to drop.

"Are you Perry Mason?" she asked in a voice almost as steely as the gun.

"Well, no—no—ma'am!" stammered Spudsy.

Della walked into the room, gave one glance at the intruder, and exclaimed:

"Well, the other woman!"

"Stay right where you are!" snapped the girl with the gun.

"Haven't you heard?" said Della, quite calmly. "Mr. Mason isn't taking criminal cases any longer."

Without another word the girl went out across the hallway into the sitting-room. Della followed, quite indignantly, and Spudsy followed Della, still wearing his hat and a particularly noisy-patterned overcoat.

The door into the dining-room was half open and the girl was standing behind it when Perry walked in with two little glasses on a tray.

"Bitters for the bride?" he inquired.

"No bitters, thank you," said Della.

The girl with the gun stepped forward.

"Which is the one without the bitters, Mr. Mason?" she asked.

Perry swung round and his brows went up.

"Oh, hallo!" he said. "This one on the right."

She took the little glass with her left hand, drained it, and returned it to the tray.

"I'm sorry, Della," said Perry.

Della promptly drank the cocktail which contained bitters, and Perry, admiring her spirit, put down the tray and took her in his arms. He was about to kiss her when the barrel of the automatic was jabbed against his spine, and the girl who held it said imperiously:

"My name is Mrs. Eva Stewart. I've tried to reach you all day. I need legal advice."

"Well," said Perry, with a laugh that was by no means mirthful, "this is hardly the time for legal matters, Mrs. Stewart. However, I should rather like to suggest a disarmament conference."

Mrs. Eva Stewart, as she called herself, opened a handbag and took from it several notes.

"Here are five thousand dollars, Mr. Mason," she said. "You'll get more. Now you're coming with me!"

"Well, if it's a criminal case," said Perry, "you see, I—er—"

"We'll discuss that later!" she interrupted sharply. "Now you're coming with me!"

Perry Mason took a fountain-pen from a waistcoat pocket with admirable sang-froid, considering the circumstances.

"Della," he said, "do you mind writing out a receipt for Mrs. Stewart?"

"Well, there's nothing like the peace and happiness of married life," said Della dryly, and she took the pen from Perry's hand and a white handkerchief from his breast pocket, and at a little table she wrote out a receipt on the starched linen.

"Sign on the dotted line, Mr. Mason."

Perry signed his name and Della offered the handkerchief to the armed client.

"Well, now that you have an attorney bought and paid for," said Perry mildly, "would you consider putting away the—er—the artillery?"

"Not until I get you in a cab!" was the immediate retort. "Get your hat!"

Perry picked up his hat and overcoat.

"Good-bye," said Della plaintively.

"Don't mind me. I'm only the bride!"

"Oh, angel!" Perry embraced her.

"I'll be back in an hour. Good-bye."

"Give my love to all the folk down Mrs. Stewart's way!" she called after him as he went out from the room with the girl with the gun.

She flung the notes on the floor as the front door slammed, and she knelt on the chesterfield and peered down into the street between the slats of a venetian blind till she had seen Perry and the stranger get into a taxicab which Perry hailed.

The address given to the driver of the cab informed him of his immediate destination. He leaned back against the cushions and crossed his long legs.

"We're on the way to 'Spicy Bits'?" he said. "Then the reason is a case of blackmail?"

"Yes," replied the girl. "Last night a candidate for the Legislature was seen at the Beechwood Inn with a certain woman—"

"There was a raid," interjected Perry. "I read about it."

"There was. The candidate's name is Peter Milnor. 'Spicy Bits' is the only paper that knows he was there—and they go to press day after to-morrow."

"Peter Milnor?" Perry repeated the name. "And you want to keep his name out of print, is that it?"

"I'm looking out for myself," she stated.

"Then you were the 'certain woman' who was with him?"

"The paper must never know that!" she cried. "Understand? Never!"

"Who are you, anyway?"

"I've told you who I am—Mrs. Eva Stewart."

"Well," he said sceptically, "that name will do for the present."

Della remained at the window, on the chesterfield, long after the taxicab had disappeared from sight. Spudsy, partly for something to do and partly because the night had turned chilly, set light to the fire already laid in the grate.

"I was happy as a secretary," said Della dismally, "and now I'm deserted as a wife!"

"Don't you worry, Della," urged the fire-lighter. "You just trust old Spudsy. I'll take care of you!"

She turned to smile at him rather wanly, and saw that absent-mindedly he was tossing the notes into the fire.

"Look!" she cried, bouncing off the chesterfield. "The money! You're burning his fee!"

"Ooooh!"

Frantically Spudsy grabbed at a poker and tried to retrieve the notes, but though he got them out on to the hearth they were in flames.

Della took a cigarette from a box on the little table, went down on her knees beside him, picked up one of the flaring notes—and nearly burned her fingers.

"Oh, well, Spudsy," she said, "I've always wanted to light a cigarette with a thousand-dollar bill."

In less than twenty minutes the telephone bell rang. Della answered the call, and the voice of Perry sounded in her left ear.

"Hallo, darling!" it said. "I ditched the lunatic, and I'll be home in five minutes. The five thousand goes back as soon as she calls again."

"You think it does?" Della laughed hysterically. "Listen, angel, you've got to take the case—Spudsy's burned up the money! Every teeny-weeny bit of it!"

"What?" howled the voice of Perry. "Wait till I— Oh, well, never mind, precious! I'll take the case and wash it up in an hour. See you later."

She heard the sound of a kiss, and then the line was dead.

On the Trail

PERRY went out from a telephone-box in Market Street, walked fifty yards or so along that busy thoroughfare, and entered a tall office building. On the fourth floor he stepped into the general office of "Spicy Bits," a scurrilous publication issued weekly.

Beyond a brass rail, with a little gate in it, there were several desks at which men were busy, and a switchboard at which a girl was seated. Beyond the desks was a door with a frosted panel, upon which was painted, "Frank Locke, Editor."

Perry opened the little gate and went striding towards the door, but an unpleasant-looking fellow sprang up from one of the desks and barred his way.

"It says 'Private' on that gate!" he rasped. "Can't you read?"

"If I couldn't," retorted Perry, "I'd be working on 'Spicy Bits.' I want to see Frank Locke. I'm—er—"

"I know who you are, rat!" snarled the fellow, whose own name was Crandal. "Wait here!"

Perry waited, quite close to the switchboard, and he smiled at the girl who was dealing with calls, while Crandal went into the editor's room.

Locke was at his desk, a long-faced man whose brown hair was becoming thin on top, giving him a more intellectual appearance than he merited, and whose brown eyes were anything but honest.

With him was a blonde girl, by no means lacking in looks, who sprang up from a chair as Crandal entered.

"Perry Mason's outside," said Crandal. "He wants to see you."

"Perry Mason, eh?" Locke rubbed his, very pronounced chin. "Send him in."

"Shall I go, Frank?" inquired the girl.

"I think you'd better, dear."

She went out with Crandal, and a few moments later Perry Mason stood looking down at Frank Locke, who seemed to be studying the point of a pencil he was holding.

"I'm Perry Mason," said Perry briskly. "I've only got five minutes to talk turkey, Mr. Locke."

"I know who you are," was the curt rejoinder. "What is it?"

"You go to press day after tomorrow. You're going to feature a certain story. I want to keep that story out of print. How much'll it cost me?"

Frank Locke smiled at the pencil rather than at his visitor.

"'Spicy Bits' is not a blackmailing sheet," he said. "However, we do sell space to advertisers. What's on your mind?"

"Peter Milnor," replied Perry.

"Oh! Just a minute!"

Locke rose from his desk, departed into the general office, and closed the door behind him.

"He's gonna talk," he said to Crandal. "Get it down!"

But Perry Mason had not lost any time. He felt quite sure that there was a microphone hidden somewhere in Locke's room, and he was looking for it almost before the door was closed. His quick eyes detected a plug in the floor near the base of a long-stemmed "smoker's companion." He picked up the ash-tray in the top of the contrivance, and there was the microphone.

It took him less than a second to snare the wires attached to the microphone and to restore the ash-tray to its place, and he was helping himself to a red rose from a tall vase on the desk when Locke returned.

"Are you representing Peter Milnor, or the woman who was with him?" Locke inquired, reseating himself in his chair.

"What woman?" countered Perry.

"If you know her name, Mason, and are willing to talk, 'Spicy Bits' will go on the paying end."

Perry waved the red rose.

"Tell me," he said, "who's the real owner of this—er—blackmailing rag, and maybe we can make a trade."

"Do you smoke, or take it in the arm? I'm the owner."

Perry ignored the suggestion that he was under the influence of dope.

"Listen, Locke," he said crisply, "you fellows have been running a blackmailing sheet long enough, and I just want you to know that I'm after you right now."

"Very well," said Locke, and pointed to the door. "In the meantime, would you mind going?"

"Not at all," Perry walked out with the rose, but paused beside the switchboard to present it to the girl.

"A rose," he said with a gesture. "Not as lovely as you are, my dear, but still a rose."

"For me?" The girl looked amused. "Oh, excuse me, please!"

Frank Locke was on the line, asking for a number. She obtained it for him, then looked up at Perry.

"What was it you said about roses?" she inquired.

"Just skip it," said Perry, and he put down the rose and walked out.

The head office of the National Telephone Company was not very far away. He made straight for it, and in the name of O'Flaherty he interviewed a venerable official named O'Toole, adopting an Irish accent for the occasion.

"You're sure you're from the District Attorney's office, Mr. O'Flaherty?" asked the real Irishman.

"If you doubt me, Mr. O'Toole," returned Perry, with a grin, "you've surely got a 'phone."

That was quite convincing, and Mr. O'Toole conducted him into a room that was full of filing-cabinets and led the way to one of them.

"Well, here are all the Freyburg numbers, Mr. O'Flaherty," he said.

"All right, Mr. O'Toole," said Perry. "Check up on number six-two-nine-eight."

The specified number was found on its appropriate card in its appropriate drawer.

"Mr. George C. Belter," O'Toole read out, "five-fifty-six, Elmwood Drive. Say, Mr. O'Flaherty, ain't he the millionaire stockbroker?"

"Yes," confirmed Perry, "but it seems he has other interests. Good-bye, Mr. O'Toole."

Elmwood Drive, to which a taxicab conveyed him, proved to be a residential thoroughfare of superior class. Most of the houses in it were large and surrounded by well-kept grounds, and No. 556 was no exception to the general rule, but possessed the added advantage of being situated on a rise and screened from the road by a belt of trees.

Its front porch was wide and broad, and it provided plenty of room for Perry's body after he had been flung out from the hall by a particularly pugnacious-looking butler.

"Mr. Belter is occupied, sir," said the butler. "Did I make myself clear, sir?"

Perry lifted up his head.

"Quite clear, thank you," he replied. The front door was slammed, and Perry picked up his fallen hat and restored it to his head, rose to his feet, and descended the steps from the porch, fastening his coat as he went.

In the drive he looked up at the house; and then swiftly he made his way round to the back of it. A door there was on the latch, and quite boldly he walked into a well-appointed kitchen where two women were washing and wiping plates and dishes.

One of them was middle-aged and plain; the other was young, golden-haired, and rather pretty. The elder woman gaped at the intruder, the younger one emitted a gasp and nearly dropped a cup.

"Who are you, and what are you doing here?" demanded Perry, who was a firm believer in the axiom that attack is the best form of defence.

"Why, I—I—I'm Mrs. Veite, Mr. Belter's housekeeper!" stammered the middle-aged woman.

"Who's she?"

Perry flung out a hand at the girl.

"That's my daughter Norma," was the reply.

"Good," said Perry; and with that he walked straight out from the kitchen into a passage, and from the passage into the hall.

On the left of the hall a door was half-open, and he pushed it wider and stepped into a drawing-room comfortably furnished, but not in the best of style.

A red-headed young man was in there, helping himself to a drink at a tantalus on a table—a young man taller than himself and probably a little heavier.

"Hallo!" said Perry blandly. "My name's Perry Mason. What's yours?"

"Carl Griffin," replied the young man, and evidently assumed that the questioner had been admitted by the butler. "I have a drink?"

"Thanks," Perry accepted a whisky-and-soda. "You're not George Belter, then?"

"No," Carl Griffin laughed. "Belter's my uncle. He's upstairs in his study. I have a gun?"

"No," said Perry, and drank. "Why?"

"Well, most people who call on my uncle brandish weapons."

"He must be delightful!" Perry contemplated the hat upon the red head.

"Going out?"

"Yes," was the reply. "Know your way upstairs?"

"No."

"Up the front stairs and the first door on your left."

"Thanks," said Perry, and he put
January 9th, 1937.

down the glass and went out into the hall.

A curved staircase led up from it to the floor above, but before he could reach the foot of the stairs he heard a scuffling sound upon them and ducked hurriedly between a table and a cupboard.

The pugnacious butler was seemingly at work again, for an angry voice rang out:

"You don't have to hold my arm! I can find the way out!"

"Sorry, Mr. Garwood," returned the voice of the man who had ejected Perry, "but Mr. Belter gave me his orders."

Perry heard heavy footsteps, and then the broad back of the butler came into view, holding the arm of a man whom he propelled towards the front door.

"You may tell Mr. Belter," raged the prisoner, "that he will regret this treatment of me this evening!"

"Very well, Mr. Garwood," said the butler, and with his free hand proceeded to open the door.

Perry immediately streaked up the stairs, with no more noise than a cat would make, and reached the first door on the left.

The Sound of a Shot

THE room beyond the door was a large one; the furniture in it was of a massive type. The walls were half-panelled, and the principal feature of the room consisted of an elaborately carved desk, behind which a full-faced man of considerable bulk was standing as Perry burst into the room and closed the door.

"Good-evening, Mr. Belter!" he said. "Who are you?" snapped the man behind the desk, his grey eyes coldly malignant.

"I'm an attorney," replied Perry, "representing Peter Milnor."

George C. Belter repeated the name as though astounded.

"Yes," said Perry, "and, in case you don't know it, your weekly, 'Spicy Bits,' is trying to blackmail him."

"You're either drunk or crazy, or both!" roared Belter. "Now get out!"

"I'll get out when I've said what I have to say," retorted Perry quite quietly. "No, one in this town knows you own 'Spicy Bits.' You're respected as a millionaire stockbroker. Well, if your paper publishes anything about my client, I'll rip off your mask and expose you."

The door was opened and the butler stepped into the room.

"Digley," said Belter, who had pressed a bell-button on the desk, "isn't this the man who you threw out not ten minutes ago?"

"Yes, sir," replied the man, blinking a pair of beady eyes.

"Well, throw him out again!"

The butler advanced towards Perry, but before he could reach him the girl of the automatic ran in from the stairs, bareheaded, but still wearing her black costume and white blouse. She stared at Perry, but did not appear to recognise him.

"Oh, I didn't know you were busy, George!" she exclaimed. "I'm sorry!"

"Don't mind this person!" snarled Belter. "He's just a shyster lawyer who's leaving in a hurry!"

"Listen, Mr. Belter—" began Perry.

"This way, sir!"

The butler caught at his arm, but was instantly smitten on the point of the jaw by a well-directed fist and went floundering backwards against the wall.

"That's for catching me off balance the last time," said Perry.

The butler sank to the floor and sat there dazed.

"Now listen, Belter," said Perry. "I had decided to give you a break, but I've changed my mind. You print one word about my client in your sheet, and you'll go to gaol for twenty years!"

"The trouble with you, Mason," retorted Belter heatedly, "is that you keep on singing the same song. Now, for the last time, get out!"

"All right, I've said all I've got to say." Perry moved towards the door.

"Good-night, Mr. Belter." He bowed ironically to the butler, who had risen from the floor. "Good-night, Digley!"

"Good-night!" murmured the alleged Eva Stewart.

"Good-night, Mrs. Belter!" he returned pleasantly, and went out to the stairs.

The butler followed him, none too steadily, and Eva Belter turned as though to follow him, too. But her husband called to her, and she closed the door and faced him inquiringly across the desk.

"Where's the five thousand that was in the safe?" he demanded harshly.

"The five thousand?" she echoed wonderingly.

"I suppose you're going to tell me that a little bird took it?"

"What on earth are you talking about?"

"The five thousand dollars that you stole!" he rapped at her. "Also this curious receipt on Perry Mason's handkerchief!"

She looked down at the handkerchief he took from a drawer and flung before her, and she bit her lip.

"Yes, I went through your bag!" he blared. "You've messed things beautifully. You went to Perry Mason and gave him a fictitious name and a false lead. He came out here pretending to represent Peter Milnor, but he didn't know I had Milnor here this evening. As a matter of fact they must have passed each other on the stairs!"

"You had Peter Milnor here?" gasped his wife.

"He came in the name of Garwood. I had him here trying to prove what I suspected—that you were with him last evening at the Beechwood Inn. He wouldn't tell me, but you've answered the question yourself!"

There was a telephone on the desk. Belter dialed a number.

"'Spicy Bits'?" he asked. "Mr. Locke—Mr. B. calling. Oh, is that you, Frank? Mason was just here. Tracked me down in jig time, didn't he? Sure, she was with Milnor all right. Go ahead—all over the front page of Thursday's issue. 'Candidate for Legislature a Home-wrecker.' Sure, use her name! She'll get used to the publicity when I get her in the divorce courts."

"Tell him not to print a word of that!" shrielled Eva Belter, and in her gloved hand was the automatic with which she had threatened Perry Mason. But George C. Belter did not turn a hair.

"Go ahead and shoot," he said, putting down the telephone. "It won't do you any good. I changed my will to-day."

"You think you're clever, don't you?" she cried fiercely. "You've got away with murder for years. But you're not the only one who can get away with it!"

The sound of a shot reached the ears of Mrs. Veite and her daughter, in the kitchen downstairs, and Mrs. Veite started to her feet.

"Norma, what was that?" she exclaimed.

She ran out through the rear passage into the hall, but Eva Belter was down the stairs and out at the front door

The barrel of the automatic was jabbed against Perry's spine, and the girl who held it said imperiously: "I need legal advice!"

before she had turned the corner from the passage.

Perry returned to his flat in Jefferson Square with a bottle of champagne in each hand and one in his coat-pocket. Flourishing the bottles in his hands, he kissed his bride—and sneezed.

"Good health!" said Della.

"Thanks!" said he. "Spudsy, some glasses. The honeymoon has officially begun!"

Spudsy fetched glasses from the dining-room; Perry seated himself beside Della on the chesterfield.

"You're home early, darling," said she with sarcasm. "Did you have a hard day at the office?"

"Yes, dear," sighed Perry, and then the telephone-bell rang.

Spudsy went over to the instrument.

"Mr. Mason is at Pinchurst Lodge with his bride," prompted Della; and that is what Spudsy stated. But it did not satisfy the caller, for almost immediately he said:

"Who? Mrs. Belter?"

"That's the young woman of the five thousand dollars," remarked Perry, and held out his hand for the telephone.

"I thought you said her name was Stewart!" said Della.

"Hallo, Mrs. Belter!" said Perry into the telephone. "What's the matter? Do you want to donate another five thousand?"

"Perry Mason," accused Della, "you're lying!"

Perry chuckled.

"Mrs. Belter," he said, "what was the name you gave when you called on me earlier this evening?"

He held the receiver to Della's ear, and Della heard, distinctly enough:

"Eva Stewart."

The receiver was transferred to Perry's ear.

"What's that, again?" he asked.

"I must see you at once!" was the sharp reply.

"You can't," said he. "I'm at Pinchurst Lodge with my bride." He sat suddenly upright. "What's that?"

"I said I think someone shot my husband. Yes, shot him!"

"Oh, very well—I'll be right there. Where are you calling from? All right!"

He rose and put the telephone back in its place.

"Spudsy," he said, "my boots and saddle. Darling, I'm terribly sorry. I'll be back in an hour—I swear I will!"

"It's all right, my sweet," returned Della wryly. "I haven't touched my mending, and Junior's socks must be darned before school opens. Yes, and you can be darned, too, you big clump!"

"Aw, Della!" he protested; and then Spudsy reappeared with the hat and the overcoat.

A Shock for Perry

EVVA BELTER had rung up from a public telephone-box in Jefferson Square, and she was standing in the doorway of the apartment-house when Perry reached it. Without a word for her, he went round to the garages at the side of the building and backed out from one of them in his own streamlined saloon.

She got into it beside him, and in an agitated voice she said:

"Perry, please turn out that light!"

Instead of obeying, he grinned at her.

"I went to see if you lie, my dear. Talk, and talk fast."

"Well, just after you left our house to-night, I went back to my room. Suddenly I heard voices—angry voices. Coming from my husband's study. I crept along the upper hall to listen. There was a shot, and the sound of a falling body!"

"What time was that?" asked Perry, his keen blue eyes boring into her brown ones.

"A little before nine," she replied, after a moment's thought. "Then I heard a man running down the stairs. Oh, Perry, I'm so frightened!"

She clung to him, and he switched off the light in haste.

"Come, come, Mrs. Belter!" he reproved. "You forget I'm a married man!"

He set off for Elmwood Drive, and the house was reached without further incident. Eva Belter opened the front door with a key of her own, but it was with marked reluctance that she followed him up the stairs, and when he opened the door of the study she shrank back.

"Come on in!" he said. "You didn't like him, did you?"

She shook her head, and but for the artificial colour on her lips he felt sure they would have been nearly white.

"All right, you'd better stay outside and watch the stairs," he decided. "Let me know if anybody comes up."

He went into the room, carrying his overcoat. The body of George C. Belter was lying on the carpet at one end of the desk, and for a while he stooped over it. Then he took a scribbling-pad from the desk, a pencil from his pocket, and, almost sitting on one heel, proceeded to make notes as he gazed about the floor.

An automatic lay near, and not far from it an empty cartridge-case engaged his attention. A few minutes later, he was on his feet and ringing up his own flat on the telephone.

Spudsy answered the call, suspending weight-lifting exercises in a room fitted up as a gymnasium to do so. Della had retired to her husband's bed-room, if not to bed.

"Oh, Spudsy," said Perry, "got a pencil?"

Spudsy swept over to a discarded coat and returned to the instrument armed with pencil and paper.

"Get this down," directed Perry. "Thirty-two calibre Colt automatic, January 9th, 1937."

number A. Two-five-four-two-three-four. Search the police records right away. There's a chance it might be listed."

"Say, boss," protested Spudsy, "d'you know it's ten o'clock at night, and I've only lifted the hundred twenty-five times?"

"You lift yourself down to police headquarters right away," commanded Perry. "I'll call you in an hour. Yes, and tell Mrs. Mason I'll be there before long."

He put down the telephone, and then he knelt on the floor again. He found a second empty cartridge which had rolled under the desk, and with his pencil he raked it out till it was lying beside the one he had already discovered.

The two used cartridges matched in every detail, and having satisfied himself as to this he put one of them in his coat-pocket, left the other near the gun, and went to the door.

"Oh—er—Mrs. Belter," he called in a guarded voice, "come in a minute, will you?"

She entered the room without demur, this time, and he motioned to her to close the door.

"You heard but one shot?" he questioned.

"That's right," she replied, looking anywhere but in the direction of the body. "Do you think it could possibly be suicide?"

"Sure," said he dryly.

There were casement windows at the end of the room, and one of them was wide open. He walked across to it and leaned out over its sill.

"Have you any idea who was here arguing with your husband?" he turned to ask.

"Well, the other man spoke quite clearly," she said.

"Have you ever heard the other man's voice before?"

"I think so."

"Do you know who it was?"

"Yes."

He strode towards her.

"Well, don't be so mysterious—I'm your lawyer. Who was it?"

She looked at him strangely, and she said:

"You know who it was."

"How should I know who it was?"

"Because it was you, Perry."

He stared at her for a full second, compressing his lips; but she did not flinch.

"So that's the kind of a playmate you are?" he said.

"I won't tell anyone—ever."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"All right," he gritted, "how did I kill him, and why?"

"I don't want to be cruel, Perry," she said, spreading out her hands, "but after you had the argument with my husband you returned up the back stairs. You killed him, Perry. That's why I went all the way over to your end of the town to telephone. I wanted to give you time to get home, so you would have an alibi."

His lips, beneath his wisp of a moustache, curled scornfully.

"You're a liar, Mrs. Belter!" he said. "Now I'll tell you what to do. First of all, you're going to forget permanently that pipe-dream of yours about having heard me in this room—"

"But what are we going to do?" she broke in feverishly. "If Locke prints that Beechwood Inn story, suspicion may even shift to me!"

"Will you let me handle Frank Locke?"

She nodded emphatically.

"Oh, I do trust you, Perry," she declared.

"Well, that's fine!" said he. "Now listen; I want forty-five minutes for in-January 9th, 1937.

investigation. You go to your room and keep quiet. Don't say a word to a soul, and don't call the police until you hear from me. I'll be back as soon as I can."

He went out from the room to the stairs, saw from the top of them that the hall below was deserted, and descended swiftly to the front door.

In his car he travelled straight to the home of Peter Milnor, candidate for the Legislature, who lived on Telegraph Hill. A black-haired Japanese servant opened the door, clad in pyjamas and a dressing-gown, and he assured Perry that his master had gone away. But Perry swept him aside and strode into the hall because he had caught sight of the politician on the stairs.

"Good-evening, Mr. Milnor!" he said loudly at the foot of them. "Have you heard? You're in quite a jam!"

Milnor descended in anger. He was a man of about forty, with a strong, clean-shaven face, and he was carrying a suitcase.

"I don't care who you are," he snapped, "and you'll have to excuse me. I'm just leaving."

"Where's your 'phone?" asked Perry. A pair of dark blue eyes blazed at him.

"Would you mind telling me who you are?"

"I'm Perry Mason, and I'm your attorney in the trial for your life for the murder of George C. Belter," was the amazing reply, and with that Perry dived through an open doorway into a well-appointed sitting-room, found a telephone on a desk in there, and proceeded to ring up his flat.

Peter Milnor followed him; the Japanese servant stood gaping in the doorway, holding his master's hat and overcoat.

Spudsy, by this time, had returned from police headquarters, and he answered the call.

"Oh, hallo, Mr. Mason!" he said. "Yeah, they had a record of that automatic. It belongs to some guy named Peter Mitchell."

"Peter Milnor, eh?" said Perry, his eyes on his unintentional host. "Well, he did have a motive for killing Belter. Good work, Spudsy. Tell Mrs. Mason I'll be home in an hour."

He sat down at the desk, and he looked up at the startled politician.

"Well, Mr. Milnor," he said, "about two hours ago George C. Belter was murdered with a thirty-two Colt automatic. A man's voice was heard in his study, and your gun was used."

"My gun?" howled Milnor. "Not my gun!"

"You're a liar!" returned Perry calmly. "It's registered in your name!"

"That gun's registered under the name of Peter Mitchell!" blurted the horrified politician, and Perry laughed.

"Who's Peter Mitchell?" he challenged.

"Well—well, Peter Mitchell doesn't exist. B—but they can't trace that gun to me!"

"That's where you're mistaken, Mr. Milnor," said Perry. "I saw you at the Belters' house early in the evening, and I heard you talking to the butler." He fished out his fountain-pen and offered it. "Now the first thing I want is a campaign contribution."

Milnor, who seemed to have gone to pieces, stammered that all he had in the way of money consisted of two thousand dollars' worth of travellers' cheques.

"I can cash them," said Perry cheerfully, and reached out a hand to the telephone while the cheques were being endorsed in his name. He dialed a number, and presently was speaking to a doctor with whom he had had many professional dealings.

"Is that the Fairview Sanatorium?" he inquired. "Oh, hallo, doc—I didn't recognise your voice. Listen, send an ambulance right away to two-four-five Telegraph Hill. Yes, just around the corner, that's right. Algernon P. Fortescue is the patient. Nothing serious. Nervous breakdown. Want you to take care of him for me."

Down went the telephone, and he received the travellers' cheques and pocketed them.

"Now—er—why did you kill him?" he asked.

Milnor, who had sent the Japanese servant away, was certainly exhibiting several signs of a nervous breakdown.

"Oh, I didn't!" he almost screamed. "I swear I didn't! I was there earlier—you're right about that. He tried to pump me about his wife, just because she'd been with me to a dinner and dance at the Beechwood Inn, but I didn't go back."

"If Frank Locke prints that Beechwood Inn story," said Perry, "the police will get you pronto. There's the motive—fight over Belter's wife! Digley, the butler, saw you there!"

"I was there in the name of Garwood," stammered Milnor. "That was Belter's idea."

"Well, if they get you on the carpet," retorted Perry, "you'll be Milnor, not Garwood!"

"You've got to keep that story out of print!"

"Are you telling me? How well do you know Frank Locke? We've got to get something on that bird!"

Milnor dropped on to a chesterfield and mopped his face with a handkerchief.

"Belter had something on him," he said. "Mrs. Belter told me about it. He was in some trouble down south—Georgia. There was a woman mixed up in it."

"Hm!" mused Perry. "Well, that's fine. Georgia is only a few thousand miles away as the crow flies—but I'm no crow."

The Japanese servant appeared wonderingly with two white-robed internes from the Fairview Sanatorium, and Milnor started up in dismay as the internes deposited a stretcher on the floor.

"Mr. Algernon P. Fortescue," said Perry, taking the wretched man's arm, "may I assist you? Your litter awaits! Come, come, my dear fellow, you're a sick man!"

Milnor was led to the stretcher and made to lie down upon it.

"Oh, but listen!" he began. "I—er—I—"

"Take it quietly till all your troubles blow over," urged Perry, and he draped the politician's overcoat upon the prostrate body and dumped the politician's soft-felt hat on top of the coat, then pointed to the door beside which the Japanese servant was scratching his head in bewilderment. "Out, my men!"

Milnor was borne away on the stretcher, and Perry used the telephone again.

"Police headquarters?" he said. "Homicide squad, please." He looked at the staring Jap and told him he could go to bed; but the Jap seemed to have become incapable of movement.

"Hallo! Homicide squad? Perry Mason speaking. I want to report a murder at five-fifty-six, Elmwood Drive, George C. Belter."

"Oh, the Belter murder, Mr. Mason?" said the voice of a desk sergeant at the other end of the line.

"That was reported not thirty minutes ago by Mrs. Belter herself."

"Oh!" Perry drew a long breath. "Thank you very much."

He put down the telephone, and he turned to the yellow-faced servant.

"Well, it looks like protecting Mrs. Belter is going to prove difficult," he remarked. "On second thoughts, my lad, I'll have that drink of Scotch you offered."

"Heh?" The Jap seemed to become suddenly alive. "Scotch?"

"Scotch," repeated Perry firmly. "Oh, yes!" nodded the Jap. "Me, too, sir!"

Carl Griffin Talks

IT had been Perry Mason's intention to go home to his bride after visiting Peter Milnor, but the words of the desk sergeant at police headquarters caused him to change his plans, and from Milnor's house he drove back to the house in Elmwood Drive.

Detective-Sergeant William Hoffman was already there, and so was the coroner, and the place was swarming with plain-clothes men and uniformed officers. Long before Perry arrived the automatic and the empty cartridge had been sent off to headquarters, and the body had been examined by Wilbur Strong, after an official photographer had taken pictures in the study.

A detective who had been on the telephone reported to Hoffman that there were no finger-prints on the gun, and that the ballistic expert was of the opinion that the gun had been fired twice.

"Aw, he's crazy!" scoffed Hoffman.

Perry entered the hall just as the body was being carried out on a stretcher by two police officers.

"Good-morning, Riley," he said. "Good-morning, Officer Blair. And Mr. Belter, as I live and die!"

He passed on up the stairs and into the study, where several pairs of eyes regarded him with blank astonishment.

"I thought you were at Pinehurst!" exclaimed Hoffman.

"Haven't you heard?" returned Perry blandly. "I'm representing Mrs. Belter—Mrs. George C. Belter."

Hoffman stalked over to him.

"Now, look here, Perry, what have you been up to?" he demanded.

"Up to Pinehurst." Perry sneezed violently. "Excuse me, I seem to have caught a cold. But it's lovely up there, boys. The verdant vales, running brooks, and whip-poor-wills—Wilbur, you'd love the whip-poor-wills!"

A sudden crash down in the hall sent them all out to the stairs. Carl Griffin had fallen flat on his face just inside the front door, and had knocked over a fern-pot and the stand upon which it had stood.

He raised his red head as they went down to him, and he said tipsily:

"Darned slippery floors!"

"You'll find," said Perry, "that this is Carl Griffin, nephew of the late Mr. Belter."

Griffin was lifted to his feet by a couple of policemen and half-carried into the drawing-room where Perry had made his acquaintance. There he was deposited in an easy-chair, and Hoffman jerked at the lapels of his coat.

"Hi, Griffin, come on, snap out of it!" he roared. "Griffin, your uncle's been murdered! Hi, Griffin!"

Bleary blue eyes blinked at him, and their owner said thickly:

"You're drunk!"

"No, Griffin," snapped Hoffman, "you're the one that's drunk!"

"Murdered," muttered the young man, "Did you shay murdered?"

"Yes, murdered!"

"Oh, then mushta been that woman who did it—his wife."

Perry, who was leaning over the side of the chair, said stonily:

"That was a very thoughtless remark, Mr. Griffin."

"Shut up, Perry, and beat it!" barked Hoffman.

Perry moved towards the door.

"I'll just look around a bit," he said with a flip of his hand. "You may proceed with your usual questioning."

Hoffman shook the intoxicated young man again.

"Griffin, come on, wake up!" he commanded harshly. "What makes you think Mrs. Belter killed her husband?"

"I don't think any such thing," was the numbed rejoinder.

"That's what you said!"

"I didn't say any such thing! I repeat, you're drunk!"

In the hall, Perry encountered a particularly trim and attractive nurse, who evidently had been summoned to look after Eva Belter by somebody, and who evidently took him to be one of the men from headquarters.

"It's time for Mrs. Belter's hot milk," she informed him.

"Right away," he assured her.

"Yes, ma'am, delighted."

She reascended the stairs; he went on to the kitchen. Mrs. Veite and her daughter were seated at the table in the kitchen, the housekeeper fully dressed, the girl in a wrap, and an ugly detective was standing by the table—with one foot on a chair—asking them questions. In the background a policeman was devouring a banana.

Perry went straight to an ice-box and took a bottle of milk from one of its shelves. He then went to the stove and poured some of the milk into a saucepan. Nobody seemed to have noticed him, and before he put the saucepan back on the stove he took a little packet from his waistcoat pocket and emptied nearly all its contents into the milk. They were sleeping tablets which his doctor had given him for his own use.

"You stop badgering my daughter!" Mrs. Veite cried fiercely.

"You heard the shot, you know you did!" the ugly detective rapped at the girl Norma. "You're lying!"

"No, sir," she declared. "The first thing I knew when I woke up, there was a man standing by the bed looking down at me—a detective!"

"Aw, come on, sister!" growled the ugly questioner. "You must have some idea about the murder!"

"She hasn't any ideas that would bear repeating," snapped Mrs. Veite.

"I'll get to you in a minute, sour puss!" the detective blazed.

"Well, it won't do you any good," was the instant retort. "I'm a servant, and I see nothing and I hear nothing."

"Atta, girl!" approved Perry loudly. "Hold 'em, Yale!"

The detective swung round and saw him with the glass of milk in his hand.

"Say, who are you?" he exploded.

"I'm the sand-man," Perry replied with calm, and he walked off to the butler's pantry to get a silver tray on which to stand the glass.

The butler was in the pantry and was being bullied by two plain-clothes men. He looked the worse for wear.

"No, the only other caller was a Mr. Garwood," Perry heard him declare, "who left in quite a huff. Of course, I told you about Mr. Mason."

"Are you sure you didn't hear a shot?"

"No, sir. I retired just after Mr. Mason left—a few minutes before nine."

Perry had selected a suitable tray, and was about to retreat with the glass

Almost sitting on one heel, Perry proceeded to make notes. An automatic lay near, and not far from it an empty cartridge-case engaged his attention.

upon it, when one of the detectives caught sight of him.

"Say, who are you?" he bellowed.

Perry winked at the staring butler. "Just working my way through college," he said pleasantly, and he went out to the stairs, met the nurse in the upper hall, and handed her the tray.

A few minutes later he re-entered the drawing-room. Carl Griffin had been transferred to a chesterfield, and Wilbur Strong was sitting beside him. It seemed to Perry more than likely that the coroner had given the young man something to counteract the effects of the drink he had consumed, for his voice was clearer and his eyes were brighter.

"Yes," he was saying, "Uncle George liked me, and he didn't like his wife."

"Now, look here, Griffin," said Hoffman gruffly, "this is a murder case, and you seem to be playing 'button, button who's got the button.' How about that comment you made to the effect that Mrs. Belter—"

"I don't remember that comment, sergeant," Carl Griffin interrupted. "and I certainly didn't mean it."

"Well, maybe you didn't mean it, my alcoholic friend," said Perry, stepping forward, "but you certainly managed to drive home a thought."

Hoffman was furious.

"That'll do for you, Perry!" he said in a most unfriendly fashion. "You can keep quiet, or get out!"

"Okay, sergeant," returned Perry meekly, "but remember you can't convict a woman until she's proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt."

"You can get out!" fumed Hoffman. "In going, sergeant," said Perry with a sneeze. "You forget this is my wedding night. I'll be at Pinehurst if you want to reach me."

Wanted for Questioning:

PERRY had not long driven away from the house when newspaper reporters and Press photographers invaded it. Eva Belter was summoned from her room and descended with the nurse clad in a very elaborate negligée, and in the drawing-room she was conducted to a comfortable chair in which she reclined languidly.

"Are you sure you feel all right, Mrs. Belter?" inquired Hoffman as the reporters and photographers gathered round the chair.

"Quite all right, thank you," she replied in a dracny voice.

Flash-lamps blazed, and then Hoffman waved the photographers aside while the reporters took out notebooks and pencils.

"Now about that voice you heard," said the sergeant.

"I told you I thought I recognised another man's voice when my husband was having the argument," returned Eva Belter slowly and in a fashion that suggested she was finding it difficult to marshal her thoughts. "Just before the shot."

"Yes, yes, of course," said Hoffman. "Well, perhaps I—shouldn't, but—but it was Perry Mason's—"

"Perry Mason's?" Hoffman repeated in astonishment.

She nodded, and her head drooped.

"You see, I— Oh, I—I feel so sleepy, I—"

Her eyes closed and she slumped in the chair. The drugged milk had done its work.

Hoffman tried to rouse her, but in vain, and he turned to one of his assistants.

"Jones" he said tersely, "go and get Perry Mason!"

January 9th, 1937.

"You bet!" The detective addressed beckoned to an undersized but powerfully built colleague. "Come on, Shorty!"

"You know, I don't think Perry went to Pinehurst at all," intervened Wilbur Strong. "Better try his flat first."

The two detectives went out.

"What do you suppose happened to her?" Hoffman said blankly to the coroner. "Nurse, what's wrong with her?"

"I don't know," the nurse replied. "She was all right when I gave her the hot milk."

Perry reached Jefferson Square in almost record time, the streets of San Francisco being deserted at that early hour in the morning. He put the saloon away in its garage and climbed the stairs to his flat.

The flat was in darkness, and Della was in bed. He crept into the room, switched on a shaded light, and sat down on the edge of the bed; whereupon she sat bolt upright in it and eyed him almost as though he were a stranger.

"I know, I know, my darling—my wonderful darling," he said, putting an arm round her and sealing her pouting lips with a kiss. "But I'm here now, and I'm not going to leave you again."

There arose a noisy banging at the front door, and a voice that demanded it should be opened. Ping, apparently, was dead asleep, but Spudsy was in the act of retiring and had not yet removed his underclothes. He went to the front door in them, and he yelled at the key-hole:

"Say, who do you think you are?"

"Herbert B. Jones of the homicide squad," was the shouted reply. "We want Perry Mason!"

Perry kissed his disconsolate bride and made for a window, which he opened.

"So the brilliant attorney retired from the practice of criminal law!" said she with bitterness as he climbed out on to a fire-escape.

The voice of Jones was heard, threatening to break down the front door.

"Wait till I get my trousers on, will you?" bellowed Spudsy.

Perry put his head in at the bed-room window, and Della slipped out from the bed and ran over to him.

"Darling," he said, "I'll be at the Ripley Hotel, registered under the name of Fred P. Crosby of Detroit."

"I like Detroit, don't you, Fred?" she mocked.

"Yes, Mrs. Crosby," he laughed—and began to descend the iron ladderway.

A few noisy minutes elapsed, and then Jones, who had brought a number of policemen with him as well as Shorty, lost all patience and burst open the front door with the aid of his companions. Spudsy tried to bar the way, but was sent sprawling.

"Mike, take a look round," directed Jones. "Joe, stay with the door. The rest of you men come with me."

Della scrambled back into bed and pulled the sheets and blankets up to her chin a moment before the detective entered the room with Shorty and three policemen.

"Where's Perry Mason?" he demanded harshly. "Answer my question! Where's Perry Mason?"

Della pretended to weep.

"Oh—oh, I—I wish you hadn't asked me about my husband, officer," she whimpered. "When first we were married he was so thoughtful—so kind—so attentive—so devoted. But—but—now he leaves me for long periods at a time. He's tired of me, officer!"

Herbert B. Jones became tired of her, too, and after he had made sure that Perry Mason was nowhere in the flat, departed with his horde.

The rest of the night passed, and in all the morning papers it was stated that the police were searching for Perry Mason, crime specialist, who was wanted for questioning in connection with the murder of George C. Belter.

The Ripley Hotel was a middle-class establishment in Stanford Street, and Perry had slept none too well in one of its numerous rooms because he was in the throes of a fierce cold as well as wanted by the police.

At ten o'clock in the morning he rang up his flat, and Della answered.

"Where's Spudsy?" he sneezed. "Tell him I want two dozen handkerchiefs."

"What a cold you have, Mr. Crosby," said Della. "No, I don't know where you'll find Mr. Mason. Frank Locke is anxious to see him, too."

"Frank Locke?" Perry sneezed twice. "Well, that's news! Get in touch with Frank Locke. Tell him to meet me in fifteen minutes at—er—" He glanced out through the panes of a window near which he was standing and perceived a quaintly fronted bookshop across the street. "At the Shakespeare Shoppe, in Stanford Street. Got it? Okay. I love you!"

About twenty minutes later Frank Locke walked into the Shakespeare Shoppe and found Perry apparently absorbed in a volume he had taken from a shelf.

"Oh, so there you are, slyster!" he snapped.

Perry returned "Two Thousand Years in Sing-Sing" to the shelf on which it belonged.

"I'd advise you to lower your voice," he said with a jerk of his thumb in the direction of the bookseller, who was hovering behind a counter. "Well, have you decided to kill that Belter-Milnor story?"

"Yeah, chiseller," snarled Locke, "I've built up a whole new front page. That's only a sub-feature now. I'm devoting my leading story to you. Mrs. Belter talked, see?"

"This—er—story you mention," drawled Perry. "Will it be—er—an interview, or what I think of the New Deal?"

"'Spicy Bits,' " retorted Locke, "is going to accuse you of the murder of George C. Belter—and, what's more, we're gonna make it stick!"

"Fortunately," said Perry, "this State has libel laws, my friend."

"You found out that Belter owned this paper," jeered Locke. "Sue him—he won't mind! And then you'd better hire yourself a smart lawyer—you'll need one!"

He went off, highly pleased with himself, and Perry drifted over to the counter.

"Have you a 'phone I could use?" he asked.

The bookseller immediately invited him to use his own instrument, and escorted him into a book-littered room behind the shop.

At a desk in the room Perry put through a long-distance call to Atlanta, the capital of Georgia.

The "Framing" of Frank Locke

BACK in his room at the Ripley Hotel, Perry had to wait a long while for the two dozen handkerchiefs for which he had asked, but when Spudsy brought them to him he brought also a telegram and a photograph.

The photograph was undoubtedly of Frank Locke, although it was labelled

"Cecil Dawson," and had been dug up from the files of the "Examiner" by Tiny Brewster. The telegram ran:

"Cecil Dawson, alias Frank Locke, tried for murder here, nineteen thirty-four. Not hanged due changed testimony Esther Liuton.—HALE DETECTIVE AGENCY."

Having studied the photograph and this telegram, Perry recalled the blonde girl who had emerged from Locke's room after he had invaded the office of "Spicy Bits" the night before. He described her to Spudsy, and he said:

"Put a tail on her, Spud—give her a smooth shadowing, you understand? If you watch Locke he'll lead you to her. Follow her wherever she goes. I want to know where she lives and everything about her."

Spudsy, who was a really excellent detective as well as an ex-champion in the ring, set off upon his task; and as the blonde girl lunched with Frank Locke that day it did not prove a very difficult one.

At three o'clock in the afternoon he called on Perry, quite effectively disguised as a woman of considerable proportions.

"I got her, boss!" he said excitedly. "Esther Liuton, three-fifty, Wheelwright Apartments, in Chester Street. The bellboy says she gets regular sugar from 'Spicy Bits'—changes the cheques with the secretary of the place. And with that accent, is she from Georgia?"

"Has Frank Locke been out with her recently?" asked Perry.

"She was out with him from about eight o'clock till eleven-thirty last night," stated Spudsy.

"Eleven-thirty?" Perry seemed disappointed. "Well, he didn't kill Belter, then!"

"Why, boss, you never thought he did, did you?"

"Of course not, you chump! But if I could make it look that way, I could control 'Spicy Bits'—and that's what I want to do right now!"

A taxicab conveyed Spudsy and himself to the Wheelwright Apartments, and they climbed the stairs together instead of using the lift, Perry with his handkerchief to his face—a handkerchief which was justified by his frequent sneezings.

Spudsy lurked in a wide corridor while Perry rapped at a door numbered 350.

"Who is it?" asked a feminine voice with a decided accent.

"Telegram," Perry replied, after the manner of a messenger.

The door was opened, and he strode past the blonde girl into a sitting-room.

"W-w-what's the idea?" she asked blankly, staring at him.

He slammed the door.

"I'm sorry," he said, tossing his hat into the air and catching it, "but you're in a jam."

"What are you?" she gasped. "A detective?"

"No, a lawyer." He seated himself calmly on a sofa and crossed his long legs. "I want to talk to you about Frank Locke."

"Frank Locke?" Her face became expressionless. "I never heard of him."

"Now don't tell me you've forgotten good old Cecil Dawson," said Perry with a little laugh. "Surely you remember the Georgia business? The time you saved his neck by changing your testimony?"

She bit her lip, frowning at him.

"Oh, all right!" she said. "What do you want?"

"That's better," he nodded. "Come and sit down."

She sat beside him, obviously upset. "You were with him till eleven-thirty last night," he said; and then, as she inclined her golden head: "Well, unless you want to be sent back to Georgia for compounding a felony, I'm telling you what you did last night."

Three-quarters of an hour later Frank Locke once more joined Perry in the Shakespeare Shoppe, and was promptly marched out on to the pavement.

"I know where you'd like to send me," said Perry pleasantly, "but unless you want to be on the same ferry-boat, you'd better come with me!"

"I'll give you fifteen minutes," snapped Locke, "and this time you'd better talk turkey!"

"I'll talk turkey," promised Perry, and led the way round several corners to a gun-shop. "We're going in here."

"Hi, what sort of a racket is this?" howled Locke.

"Who's getting suspicious now?" laughed Perry. "Come on!"

They entered the shop, in which all manner of lethal weapons were displayed in glass-fronted cases, and Perry greeted its Greek proprietor, a full-bodied man named Kickopolos, who said almost in one breath:

"Hallo, Mist' Mason. Dat's der man!"

"Now, just a minute, Kieky," said Perry, "we've got to be sure about this."

"You put me on der witness stand,"

Perry pointed to the door beside which the Japanese servant was scratching his head in bewilderment. "Out, my men!"

proclaimed the Greek volubly, "you bring me one thousand lawyers, I still tell you der same t'ing. Dat's der man!"

Frank Locke, with a pointing finger nearly in his face, stepped back in a fury.

"Say, what's the idea?" he raged. "What sorta flim-flam is this?"

"Just a part of my case," returned Perry quietly. "It checks up, that's all. You're the man who bought the gun!"

"Are you crazy?" cried Locke. "I never bought a gun in my life!"

Perry asked the Greek for his gun register, which was instantly produced. Locke was not to know that the two were old friends.

"Now beat it, Kicky," said Perry. "I want to talk."

The gun-vender vanished; the register was opened on a glass-topped counter, and Perry pointed to an entry.

"I suppose you'll deny that you wrote that?" he purred.

"Certainly I deny it!" raged Locke. "I never was in this joint before, and that's not my signature."

"The police don't know it yet," said Perry, "but that gun entered there killed George Belter last night."

"I'm through with you!" Locke snorted. "I'm not gonna say another word! I'm going back to my office, and I—"

"Just a minute, Locke. I've not only got this gun on you, I've got your motive. You've been embezzling funds, and George Belter knew too much about that Georgia affair!"

"Georgia affair?" Locke changed his mind about striding forth into the street, and began to look alarmed.

"I know what I'm talking about," said Perry. "You went out there about nine o'clock and killed him!"

"I—I can prove where I was at nine o'clock last night," stammered his victim, and went on desperately: "I've got an ironclad alibi, and just to show you where you stand, I'm gonna spring it now! Come on!"

Perry permitted himself to be swept off to the Wheelwright Apartments, and Locke opened the door of Esther Linton's flat with a key he took from his pocket. There was no one in the sitting-room, but there was a box of chocolates on a table, and Perry helped himself to one of them.

"Sit down," said Locke gruffly. "I'll call her. Esther!"

The blonde girl appeared from an inner room, but Perry had not sat down: he was eating a second chocolate.

"Yes, honey?" she said, and stared at Perry as though she had never seen him before. "Say, what is this?"

"I can't explain everything now," said Locke, "but I want you to tell this fellow where I was about nine o'clock last night."

"Why, of course, Frank. We went out to dinner, and after that we came here."

Perry sneezed.

"What time was that?" he asked. "About eight-thirty, I guess."

"Well, go on," said Locke. "What happened then? What time did I leave here? Didn't I sit in this room reading, and didn't I wake you up to kiss you good-bye about eleven-thirty?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, Frank," lied Esther Linton. "I woke up this morning with an awful headache, and all I know is you were here when I went to sleep, but I don't know what time you went."

"That's not true, and you know it!" Locke shouted.

January 9th, 1937.

"I'm in a hurry," said Perry, and he went over to a wall telephone, near the door, and dialed a number at random.

"Hallo!" he said. "Police headquarters?"

"No police," responded a voice. "This Canton Laundry."

Locke, who had been glaring at the girl, stepped forward.

"Put up that 'phone, Mason," he said hoarsely. "You win, and you know it."

Perry put the telephone back on its prongs, but raised it again to dial another number, sneezing as he did so.

"Hallo, 'Spicy Bits'?" he asked. "Let me talk to Crandal."

He handed the instrument to Locke, who presently said into it:

"That you, Crandal? Locke. Kill that Beechwood Inn story and the Mason feature. Yes, kill it!"

"And don't dig it up again," said Perry, "or back you go to Georgia!" He opened the door, but turned to bow to Esther Linton. "Thank you, peaches!"

The Lie Detector

A FEW minutes before five that afternoon a squad car drew up by the kerb in Jefferson Square, nearly opposite the apartment-house in which Perry's flat was situated, and Eva Belter got out from it, with Detective-Sergeant Hoffman and Herbert B. Jones.

"Phoned you to meet him at his own flat?" said Hoffman dubiously. "Last place I should have thought he—Oh, well, we can try!"

"Wait here until I wave a handkerchief," urged Eva Belter. "I don't want him to know I brought you."

"Okay!" said Hoffman, and she crossed the road and entered the building. But she stared in consternation at the man who opened the front door of the flat to her after she had rung the bell for it was Wilbur Strong.

"Welcome, Mrs. Belter," he said genially. "Won't you come in?"

"Why," she stammered, "I—I thought this was Mr. Mason's suite—Mr. Perry Mason. Who are you? I—saw you last night."

"I'm the coroner," Wilbur Strong replied. "We're expecting Perry Mason's death momentarily. Come in, and I'll see if he can see you."

He conducted her into the sitting-room, left her on the chesterfield, and went off to Perry's bed-room.

"She's here, Perry," he said, "but listen. Take the advice of an old friend. You're sick; this case has got you licked, and you'd better get out of town."

Perry was on the bed, under an eider-down quilt. He rose up in his pyjamas and dressing-gown, and he put on some slippers.

"This is certainly a swell honey-moon!" he complained with a sneeze. "Murder! Influenza! Disbarment looming!" He marched Wilbur out to the door.

"Well, good-bye, pal. You've been fine, and I appreciate it."

"That's all right, Perry; what's a friend for?" The coroner opened the door. "See you at the morgue!"

Perry closed the door and went into the sitting-room, where he stood shivering by the fire, and Eva Belter sprang up and put a hand on his shoulder.

"Why, Perry, you're ill!" she exclaimed. "You poor boy!"

Della was in the room which Perry and Spudsy used jointly as a gymnasium, and Spudsy was exercising.

"You poor boy!" said Della savagely, listening at the door to what was going on in the sitting-room.

Perry had poured himself a stiff whisky-and-soda.

"I never felt so rotten about anything in my life," Eva Belter declared almost tearfully, "but they shrieked questions at me, and I—I—"

"What questions?" thundered Perry. "What have you done? Where have you been?"

"Down at the police station," she confessed. "I told them I heard your voice. Oh, Perry, forgive me!"

"It's curtains for you, baby, unless you stop double-crossing me for at least five minutes!"

"I don't know what you're talking about," she faltered.

"You do!" he retorted. "Identifying my voice to distract attention from yourself was a good idea, but it wasn't good enough."

"But, my dear, I—"

"Don't 'my dear' me!" he rapped, and produced two envelopes from a pocket of his dressing-gown. "These will send you to the gallows unless you talk, and talk fast!"

"What do you want me to say?" she gasped.

"The truth—that you killed your husband."

"But I didn't! That's not true!"

"Oh, yes it is—and I can prove it! You might as well confess, if you want to save your neck. In this envelope is Mrs. Veite's sworn statement that she saw you running out of the room two seconds after the shot was fired, and in this one is the statement of her daughter Norma. She was in the upper hall when you fired the shot, and she saw you shoot him. Now, if you want me to save your life you'd better spill it all!"

"But I didn't kill him!" she sobbed. "I swear I didn't! I didn't!"

He flipped the two envelopes against his left hand and went to the door.

"Spudsy!" he shouted. "Bring me that lie detector!"

Spudsy appeared, in jersey and trousers, carrying a heavy box-like contrivance from which two handles projected in front and two dials projected above.

"Bring it here and put it on the table," directed Perry.

There was a small table near the chesterfield. Spudsy put the lie detector on it, and Perry pushed Eva Belter down on to the chesterfield and caught hold of her arms.

"Now we'll see whether or not you're lying!" he said grimly. "Take hold of those handles and squeeze! Squeeze! Squeeze!"

Tremblingly, protestingly, Eva Belter obeyed, and Spudsy watched the pointers on the dials.

"Look, boss!" he cried. "She's squeezed thirty-five!"

What that implied Eva did not know, but her nerves gave way.

"All right, I did it!" she shrieked. "I did it! Take it away! I killed him!"

"Will you sign a statement to that effect?" asked Perry.

"Anything, Perry!" she sobbed. "Anything you say!" And she let go of the handles as he released her arms, and she flung her arms round his neck.

"Don't mind me," said Della, entering the room with a typewritten sheet of paper and a pen. "I just work here!"

The lie detector was removed, the sheet of paper took its place on the table, and Della held out the pen.

"Sign right on the dotted line, Mrs. Belter," she said, "and no extra charge for lugs or kisses!"

Perry turned away to the window to sneeze, and he took a handkerchief from a neatly folded pile on the window-sill and shook it out.

"Get away from that window!" cried Eva Belter wildly.

"What's the matter now?" asked Perry.

"Now I won't sign. I won't sign!"

"You'll sign that confession, or I'll start all over again!"

"How do I know you won't use it against me?"

"Because I'm your attorney, Mrs. Belter, and I have—er—a code of honour, to say nothing of a code in the head!"

The confession was signed, and its signatory sank back on the chesterfield.

"Della, darling," said Perry, taking his neglected bride in his arms, "I'm so sorry about our honeymoon."

"Oh, I think it's lovely up here at Pinchurst," returned Della derisively. "Such air! And I've never been given so much of it!"

She sneezed, and Perry became very much afraid that she had caught his cold. But before he could utter a word of commiseration Detective-Sergeant Hoffman burst into the room with Jones, and Hoffman said in a loud and official voice:

"Perry Mason, you're under arrest!"

Perry laughed, let go of Della, and picked up the confession.

"Here's a break for you, sergeant," he said. "You're going to make a real arrest. Here's Mrs. Belter's confession to the murder of her husband, signed, sealed, and delivered!"

The sergeant took the sheet of paper and scanned the typewritten words on it.

"It's a lucky break for you, big boy," he boomed, "inasmuch as I've got a murder warrant in my pocket all made out in your name. Come on, Mrs. Belter!"

Eva was jerked to her feet, but she turned a blazing face upon Perry.

"You double-crossing back-stabber, you!" she screamed.

Hoffman tugged her towards the door.

"Tell the District Attorney I'll be down and straighten up matters in the morning," said

Perry.

Herbert B. Jones folded the confession and pocketed it, and he and the sergeant disappeared with their prisoner. Perry tossed the two envelopes on to the fire, but they fell off the coals into the grate.

"Oh, what are you doing?" cried Della, and the envelopes were retrieved. "Alind if I read the incriminating evidence, Perry?"

"Not at all," he replied.

She opened the envelopes in turn, but all they contained was blank paper.

"Photographs of the bride and groom at Pinchurst," she said whimsically. "My, but it's awfully good of you, Perry!"

Perry laughed, sneezed, and informed Spudsy that there was work for him to do.

"This case is hardly begun," he said. "Get out and get going on Norma Veite and her mother. I want to know everything about them, from the year one till the present day.

Spudsy went out, and Perry explained to Della that Eva Belter had not killed her husband, although she thought she had.

"Well, what about her signed confession you made me get ready?" asked Della.

"Just throwing a bone to the District Attorney," Perry poured himself another drink. "Well, I've got to get busy."

"And I've got to get a lawyer," said Della. "I'm through—understand? I never should have married you in the first place. All I've got is a cold in the head!"

She sneezed violently and made for the door.

"Della," said Perry sternly, "if you leave this flat you'll never see me again." He sneezed and held his hand to his heart. "Oh, the pain's here again! Good-bye, darling! Remember that I loved you!"

Della flounced away to the bed-room, and a few minutes later Spudsy rushed into the sitting-room waving an evening paper.

"Look, boss!" he cried. "They're gettin' married! Carl Griffin and Norma Veite!"

Perry took the paper, and there on the front page was a headline: "Murdered Man's Nephew to Wed House-keeper's Daughter," and under the headline were pictures of the red-headed young man and the golden-haired servant.

Perry shook hands with Spudsy.

"Too late to interest me, old boy," he said mournfully. "Good-bye. You've been faithful!"

Spudsy went out in a state of bewilderment, and in the room fitted up as a gymnasium he found Della, who had not even put on a hat.

"H-has he gone, Spudsy?" she asked apprehensively.

"Yeah, daffy," said Spudsy, "in the other room!"

She ran into the sitting-room, but Perry was not there. She ran into the bed-room, calling his name, but he was not there. The window, however, was open. She leaned out over its sill—and there was Perry on the fire-escape, apparently about to fling himself from it into the darkness.

"Perry Mason," she hissed, "you come back in this room this minute!"

Perry stretched out his arms to the night, declaiming:

"And all our yesterdays have lighted fools the way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle!"

"Perry! Perry, you fool!" she cried. He sneezed three times in rapid succession and scrambled back into the room.

"Sweetheart!" he said, and clasped her in his arms.

In Chinatown

PERRY and Della were sitting by the fire in the other room when a commotion arose in the hallway, and Spudsy rushed in to them.

"Say, boss, the cops are here!" he blurted. "Sergeant Hoffman, Jones—hundreds of them!"

"Tell 'em to go away," said Perry.

"I did, but they won't!"

Hoffman strode into the room, and there followed several plain-clothes men and some reporters. Perry rose and sneezed at them.

"Haven't I solved a murder case for you idiots?" he demanded. "Why don't you go away and leave me alone? This is my home, my castle!"

"The District Attorney wants to see you, Perry," said Hoffman. "He thinks that Belter confession has a slight odour of fish!"

"What are you driving at, my low-browed friend?" retorted Perry. "Do I understand that on the word of that incredible woman I'm being accused of murder?"

"You've got it right the very first guess!"

"Now we'll see whether or not you're lying," said Perry grimly. "Take hold of those handles and squeeze! Squeeze! Squeeze!"

"The idea fascinates me, sergeant. Never, in my entire career, have I been suspected of murder. But—er—do you think the District Attorney will receive me in my robes de nuit? Don't you think something a little more formal in the way of dress?"

"All right," said Hoffman, "change your clothes. But hurry it up!"

Perry crooked a finger at Spudsy.

"Give me a hand, will you?"

Spudsy went out with him to the bedroom. Della urged the assembled detectives and reporters to be seated, and Jones dumped himself on the chesterfield beside her.

"I'll tell you a little story, boys," she said. "Once upon a time there was an attorney who was under the delusion that he loved his secretary. Now the secretary knew—"

"I think we can do without that," Hoffman interrupted.

"But that's just the point," said Della plaintively. "The attorney said he couldn't do without the secretary."

Herbert B. Jones sneezed.

"Aha!" mocked Della.

"Lot o' flu around here," growled Jones. "Say, chief, you don't suppose he's—"

"Come on, boys!" said Hoffman.

The bedroom was invaded, but Perry was not in it. Other rooms were searched, but Ping was out and only Spudsy was discovered—exercising in the room fitted up as a gymnasium.

"Where's Mason?" Hoffman blared at him.

"I dunno," replied the weight-lifter innocently. "Twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty—"

"Come on, boys!" snapped the sergeant.

Della ran out from the sitting-room as the front door was opened.

"Would you like to hear the rest of the story?" she inquired.

"B-r-r-r!" snorted Hoffman, and he and the rest departed and the door was slammed.

Della went into the room where Spudsy was busy with the weight-lifting machine. She had caught Perry's cold, and her eyes were watering.

"Herman Strongbone," Spudsy informed her, "got his leopard skin after only sixteen lessons. Why, what are you cryin' for? He'll be back!"

"I'm not crying, and I don't want him back!" she said with a pronounced catch in her voice. "I hate him!"

"Sounds like crying to me," said Spudsy.

"No, it isn't!" she declared. "I—I'm laughing at the—at the thought of you in a leopard skin."

Perry had got away once more by means of the fire-escape, but this time he was in pyjamas, dressing-gown, and slippers. At the top of Jefferson Square he hailed a taxicab, the driver of which was too experienced to be surprised at anything, and in it he was conveyed to the establishment of Kickopopolos.

The Greek, who had proved a friend in need on many occasions, took him into his own living-room and provided him with a bowl of hot soup. Two hours passed, and then Spudsy hammered on the side door, which was in an alley-way, and was admitted.

Perry, by this time, was dozing comfortably on a sofa, but Spudsy had news that justified the rousing of his employer. Spudsy had been extremely energetic in the course of the two hours.

"Hi, boss, a break!" he cried triumphantly. "A regular crime conference. Yeah—in a room down in Chinatown. A whole den of conspirators. Boy, am I good at solving crime cases?"

Perry became all attention, for Spudsy was an excellent sleuth.

January 9th, 1937.

"How do we get in to gain an earful?" he inquired.

"What'd you think I've been developing my strength for?" Spudsy countered reproachfully. "I've jimmied the lock on the door."

Perry looked down at his pyjamas and his slipped feet, whereupon Kickopopolos rubbed his hands and beamed.

"If it's a suit you want," he said, "I have der very t'ing. A genuine first-class number, and just your size, too! Yeah, and, what's more, der hat dat goes wit' it also!"

"Bring it out, Kicky," said Perry.

The suit which was produced consisted of a moth-eaten morning coat and waist-coat and striped trousers. The coat was tight for Perry and very short in the sleeves, the trousers were far too ample round the waist and reached only to Perry's ankles. The hat was a silk one which had seen many better days.

Perry donned these garments over a shirt that belonged to the Greek, and though he detested butterfly-bows he had to wear one with a wing-collar intended for a larger neck. He then proceeded with Spudsy to Chinatown, a remarkable district of narrow ways and queer little shops, which was reached by way of Kearny Street.

To Kearny Street they travelled by taxicab, but they completed the journey on foot. In a dark alleyway Spudsy pushed open the door he had forced nearly an hour earlier, and he and Perry crept up uncarpeted stairs and a ladder into a sort of loft.

There Spudsy opened a double trapdoor which he found with the aid of an electric torch, and Perry moved over to him with one of Kickopopolos' heaviest six-shooters in his hand. Through the opening they both looked down into a typical Chinese room, lit by lanterns and furnished mainly with wickerwork chairs and bamboo tables.

But it was the people in the room and the nature of their conversation that interested Perry.

Carl Griffin was down there, with Mrs. Veite and her daughter Norma, and beside Carl Griffin stood a sharp-featured and grey-haired man whom Perry immediately recognised as a crooked attorney named Atwood.

"What's one murder more or less?" Carl Griffin asked with acrimony.

"If you persist in your demands," the attorney supplemented, addressing Veite, "there's apt to be another. You must be mad to consider such a thing at a time like this. As Mr. Griffin's attorney I demand that you give us a temporary delay."

Norma Veite was leaning back against a wall as though merely amused at what was going on; but her mother looked furious.

"I don't care what any of you say," declared Carl Griffin. "I won't do it, and that's final!"

"Yes?" Mrs. Veite glared at him. "Well, I'm running this show, Mr. Griffin," she said menacingly.

"Eva Belter killed her husband!" snapped Griffin. "Why not let it go at that?"

Perry had heard quite enough. Without troubling to lower the trapdoor he motioned to Spudsy, and they descended from the loft. The gun was in his pocket when he pushed open a door and stepped into the room with Spudsy close behind him.

"Ah, rice-cakes!" he said, pointing to an adjacent table. "Have one?"

Four startled people swung round and stared at the intruders, and Atwood bounded forward as Perry helped himself to a cake.

"What are you doing here, Mason?" he rasped.

"Come, come, Atwood!" returned Perry reprovingly. "You shouldn't use harsh tones to a fellow attorney. Mrs. Veite, it looks like you're going to take a trip across the bay. I trust you're prepared for a long absence."

"Are you crazy, young man?" flamed the housekeeper.

"Stupid is the adjective, Mrs. Veite," said Perry, munching the rice cake. "Stupid for not solving this case in five minutes."

Through an open doorway from an adjoining room the Belters' butler appeared with clenched fists and struck out at Perry. But the blows were parried, and the butler went down with a crash.

"Well, that's two falls for you, Digley," said Perry.

From a handbag on her arm Mrs. Veite produced a formidable six-gun which she held with a perfectly steady hand.

"That's right, Mrs. Veite," said Atwood. "You keep these two covered while we talk this over."

"I don't see there's anything to talk over," said Perry. "I know the murderer and the motive, and as soon as I get to a telephone—"

"What ever makes you think you'll get to a telephone?" demanded Mrs. Veite, taking a step nearer.

"So that's the way it is?" said Perry.

"That's just the way it is!" she returned grimly; and he knew that she was quite capable of shooting him then and there.

"Well, get it over," he drawled. "Suspense bores me."

He had heard the shouting of Chinese in the street, and so had the others, but he had been able to interpret the shouting, whereas they had no idea that it was the Cantonese equivalent for "Cops!"

Two doors flew wide, and in at one of them strode Hoffman, Jones, and Riley, while in at the other streamed policemen with guns in their hands. Mrs. Veite's six-shooter was hastily and covertly restored to her handbag.

"Grab him, boys!" cried Hoffman, and a policeman caught hold of Perry from behind, while Jones advanced upon him with a pair of handcuffs and a Colt forty-five.

"Spudsy," said Perry, "get the District Attorney on the 'phone at once. Good-evening, sergeant, I was just solving a little murder case."

"Oh, yeah, wise guy?" jeered Jones, clicking the handcuffs round his wrists.

"I thought," said Hoffman triumphantly, "if we let this gang start gathering it would attract the eminent Mr. Mason. They've all been tailed all the time. Perry, you're under arrest for murder—and try to get away this time!"

"This arrest is because of Mrs. Belter's testimony?" asked Perry.

"Yeah," was the reply, "and the fact that you were thrown out once, but broke your way back in!"

The butler had got dizzily to his feet. Spudsy looked round from a telephone at the far end of the room.

"The D.A.'s on the 'phone, Mr. Mason," he announced.

Perry, with manacled hands, went over and took the telephone from him.

"I'm going to have the D.A. defend me," he said. "Hallo, Burns! Listen, if you want to settle the Belter case, have Mrs. Belter at her house in fifteen minutes. What? Oh, I'll have Sergeant Hoffman with me! No, I won't let him get away!" He sneezed twice. "And put on your hat so you won't catch a cold," he added.

EPISODE 11—

"New Gods
For Old"

The Adventures OF REX AND RINTY

READ THIS FIRST

Rex, a black Arabian stallion, is worshipped by a strange race of people on the remote tropical island of Sujan.

To Sujan come three white men who are agents of a Californian rancher named Crawford. They steal Rex, realising the fortune he can make for their employer, but one of them is captured by the Sujanese. This man, Wheeler, only earns his life and liberty by promising to recover the god horse, and travels to America in company with a native known as Pasha.

Meanwhile, Rex is delivered to Crawford, but breaks free and takes to the hills. Later that day the rancher plays in a polo game at the Bruce Riding Academy, but his team loses to a side led by Frank Bradley, a popular young sportsman, and after the game Crawford vents some of his spite on a stray police dog that has roamed into the district.

It is this dog, Rinty, which later comes across Rex and which brings the god horse into contact with Frank Bradley and Dorothy Bruce, daughter of the owner of the academy.

Frank and Dorothy take charge of Rex, and then make the acquaintance of Pasha, who has fallen out with Wheeler. Meanwhile, Crawford has shot one of his own men during a quarrel, and takes to the hills to avoid justice, but later three of his agents capture Pasha and the stallion.

Pasha and the god horse are rescued by Frank and are escorted to San Francisco, where a ship is leaving for Sujan. But Crawford and his men arrive at the docks as Pasha is bidding good-bye to those who have befriended him, and on a savage impulse Crawford draws a gun and takes aim at Frank.

A Dying Man's Plea

IN the very instant that the smash of the shot punctuated the blare of the steamer's siren Pasha lunged forward to thrust Frank aside, and in doing so placed himself in the line of fire.

The bullet from Crawford's gun pierced the native's body, and with a sob of pain he slumped down at the foot of the gangway. At the same moment a hoarse outcry arose from those who had been gathered around him to wish him "bon voyage"—an outcry which held a note of mingled alarm and bewilderment.

None but Pasha knew whence the shot had come; none but he had seen the band of crooks assembled at the corner of the warehouse some distance away; and it was only when the fallen islander lifted a trembling hand and pointed towards the building that his sympathisers discerned the figures of Crawford, Wheeler, and the other members of the unscrupulous rancher's gang.

Next second the rogues were turning tail, but they had scarcely vanished when a rush was made for the warehouse by Dorothy's father and those of his employees who had escorted Pasha and Rex to San Francisco.

Dorothy did not join in that pursuit, and neither did Frank. Instead, they dropped to their knees beside Pasha, and as they examined him and saw the blood that was staining his shirt just above the sash that he wore they exchanged a glance that was fraught with anxiety.

They were joined presently by an officer of the s.s. Oriental, who had been superintending the loading of the ship. Immediately afterwards a couple of dock policemen appeared on the scene, and these at once stooped over the crumpled form of Pasha.

"How did this happen?" one of them demanded tersely.

Frank and Dorothy had straightened up at the approach of the representatives of the law, and now the girl was clinging nervously to her admirer, almost distracted by the tragedy that had occurred. As for Frank, his countenance was working with emotion, and when he spoke it was in a voice that was grim and strained.

"A rat by the name of Crawford is responsible for this!" he jerked. "He and his gang showed up just as we were saying good-bye to our friend here."

The two police-officers looked at each other in a significant fashion.

"Crawford!" one of them rapped out. "We've had instructions to look out for a guy of that name—a rancher from up-State—wanted in connection with the disappearance of a man called Mitchell."

"That's right," Dorothy cut in. "Crawford shot Mitchell—"

"Yeah? Well, which way did he go?"

The question was fired at the girl abruptly, but it was Pasha who answered it, rousing himself with an effort and stretching out his hand once again to indicate the direction that the rancher, and his men had taken.

"Down that street which leads off the

January 9th, 1937.

pier," he moaned. "Don't let him get away!"

The two dock policemen turned their heads to follow the gesture he had made, and at the same time Frank told them of the hue and cry which had been raised by Dorothy's father and his employees, who were now out of sight. Then, as the men in blue set off across the pier, the wealthy young sportsman knelt down beside Pasha once more.

"You saved my life," he told the native huskily. "If you hadn't shoved me to one side, that bullet would have plugged me. But why did you do it? Why did you shield me at such risk to yourself?"

Pasha laid his fingers on the American's sleeve, and though his face was distorted with agony and a deathly pallor had sapped the swarthy complexion from his cheeks, he managed to conjure up a brave smile.

"You are my friend," he whispered feebly. "Besides, did you not risk your life for me—only yesterday?"

There was a brief silence, and then Frank looked up at the third officer of the s.s. Oriental, behind whom a number of the ship's crew had by this time assembled.

"We've got to get a doctor for Pasha," the young polo player said. "Do you know where there's one to be found?"

"No, no," Pasha interrupted in faltering accents. "I—I am beyond the aid of doctors. For me—this is the end."

Gazing at his drawn features and at the patch of blood that marked the spot where the bullet had entered his body, Frank could not help feeling that the Sujanese was right. Yet he insisted upon a doctor being fetched, and at a sign from him the Oriental's third officer sent a deck-hand in quest of one.

The sailor returned shortly afterwards with a medical man at his heels, and it did not take the physician long to ascertain that there was nothing he could do for Pasha. Nor did he hide his verdict from the bystanders, for although he spoke no word, his expression told them clearly that the native was doomed.

It was as the onlookers were reading the fatal diagnosis from his glance that a commotion diverted their attention to the street leading from the pier, and as they swung round they saw Dorothy's father and his men approaching in company with the two dock policemen.

They were quick to perceive that the oncoming group of men were hustling several prisoners along with them, and on these being marched to the gangway, Frank ran his eyes over them sternly.

He recognised every one of the captives, scanning the face of each sullen rogue in turn. Foster, Anderson, McDouald, Watt Mason, Jones, Martin—all these were present. But Crawford and Wheeler were not among them, and Frank was conscious of a sense of disappointment as he noted that they were missing.

"You didn't get them all, then," he said to Dorothy's father.

"No, Crawford got away—with another of the gang. They gave us the slip among the back streets, and though we hunted high and low for them, we couldn't find a trace of them."

"Don't worry about Crawford," one of the policemen interposed. "He'll be picked up all right. Meantime we'll see that these birds are put safely under lock and key at headquarters."

The crooks were led from the pier, and Bruce's men lent the two police-officers a hand with them. The owner of the riding academy remained at the Oriental's gangway, however, and moved close to his daughter's side as she and Frank bent over the figure of Pasha.

It was all too clear that the native was sinking fast, but as he looked up at the faces of his friends he spoke to them bravely.

"I am a stranger in a strange land," he murmured, "but it is good to know that there is someone here whom I can trust—someone to whom I can appeal for aid."

His glazing eyes moved from one to another of the three people who were kneeling beside him, and finally came to rest on Frank.

"I am grateful to all of you," Pasha went on, "but it is to you especially that I turn now. To you, Frank Bradley."

"If there's anything I can do to help you," Frank answered in a fervent tone, "you have only to make the request."

With a struggle Pasha raised himself on his elbow, and the young white man slipped a supporting arm about him.

"I shall never see Sujan again," the native said brokenly. "But the god horse Rex, he must return, and I beg of you—I beg of you—to go with him—to take him safely to Tanaga, the high priest of my people—to deliver him to Tanaga, as I would do if my life were not running out."

"You mean—you want me to take your place aboard the Oriental and travel to Sujan?" Frank breathed.

"I—I know it is asking a great deal," Pasha whispered, "but I should die happy—if you promised to carry out this mission in my stead."

Frank gripped him by the hand impulsively, an expression of resolution on his handsome Anglo-Saxon features.

"You have the right to ask this of me, Pasha," he said. "And how can I refuse you—the man who has saved me from a murderer's bullet?"

"You will be well rewarded," Pasha told him. "The high priest Tanaga will load you with precious gifts—"

"Gifts? Rewards? I want none of them, Pasha. I'm ready to accomplish this mission as a tribute to you, and as a sign of my friendship for you. For I know what the safe return of the god horse means to you."

Dorothy turned towards Frank.

"I'd like to go with you," she said earnestly.

"No, dear—"

"But I insist," the girl broke in, "Frank, you'll be away for weeks, and I'd miss you cruelly if I were left behind. After all, we're engaged, and I have the right to ask you to take me with you."

Frank hesitated, glanced at her father dubiously, and then gave vent to a sudden exclamation.

"Supposing the three of us go!" he suggested.

"Impossible!" the owner of the riding academy began, but the younger man interrupted him swiftly.

"You need a vacation, Mr. Bruce," he said, "and you told Jensen that you wouldn't mind undertaking a trip to Sujan."

"Why, I was only fooling—"

"I know, but why not think it over seriously?" Frank retorted. "Jensen's capable enough to be left in charge of the academy while you're away."

He succeeded in persuading Dorothy's father to agree to his proposal, and then once again he stooped to address Pasha.

"We'll see that the god horse reaches his destination," he assured the native. "There are three of us to make certain of that, and we won't fail you. Depend on it, Pasha, we won't fail you."

Upon the lips of the dying Sujanese there appeared a smile that was almost placid in its character.

"There is gratitude in my heart," he said faintly. "You will go into the jungle, then, as soon as you touch the island. Among papers in my possession you will find a chart on which the trails leading to the main settlement are plainly marked. There you will seek out Tanaga, and tell him all—"

He paused, as if it were becoming increasingly difficult for him to speak.

"Do not take Rex with you when you make your way to the settlement," he went on in an urgent tone. "for the god horse has enemies even in Sujan. See Tanaga first, and he will provide a strong escort for him—"

Again his voice died away, and this time he could not muster the strength to proceed. One last effort he made to utter a few more words—perhaps of farewell—but no sound escaped him beyond a hollow groan, and with an almost imperceptible shudder he fell back lifelessly against Frank's arm.

Outward Bound!

IT was broad daylight, but a lamp was burning in one of the upper rooms of a certain lodging-house on the waterfront.

A dwelling of mean and shabby appearance, that lodging-house was situated in the locality known as the Barbary Coast, and from its grimy windows it was possible to command a view of San Francisco Bay, across which a trim vessel could be seen heading for the open sea.

The vessel was the Oriental, and three men were watching her from the lamp-lit room in the lodging-house aforementioned, three men who were peering cautiously from behind a ragged blind which had been drawn over the filthy panes.

They were Crawford, Wheeler, and a drink-sodden individual who answered to the name of Captain Sanderson, master and owner of a craft known as the Vulcan.

"There she goes," rumbled Sanderson in a thick, deep-toned voice. "Outward bound for far Sujan with this god horse that you've been tellin' me about."

"And, according to you," said Crawford, "with Frank Bradley, Dorothy Bruce and her father aboard."

"That's right," Sanderson rejoined. "I heard that from one of the Oriental's crew myself. They delayed sailin' until Bradley and his friends had made all arrangements for the journey."

Crawford bit his lip.

"And we can't sail till to-night," he muttered. "They'll have a fifteen-hour start on us."

"Don't worry," the captain of the Vulcan answered. "The Oriental will be callin' at a good many ports on her way to Sujan, and I guarantee we'll touch the island a day or two ahead of her."

He moved back from the window and crossed to a rickety table on which a half-empty whisky bottle and three glasses were standing. Then, having poured himself a stiff measure, he turned to Crawford and Wheeler again.

"Here's to a profitable journey," he declared, taking the drain at one gulp.

"You won't lose by it, anyway," Crawford observed ironically. "You've got a thousand dollars of mine on account. That's in your pocket, whatever happens. Not bad pay for takin' along a couple of passengers with you on your travels."

"But not an exorbitant price, my friend, when you consider that you and Wheeler might be in gaol now with the rest of your gang—if it hadn't been for me."

Wheeler nodded emphatically.

"That's right, skipper," he said. "It was lucky for us that I knew where to find you, for if you hadn't smuggled us into this dump we'd probably have been picked up by the cops in no time."

"Oh, I'm not grumbling," Crawford made haste to announce. "I appreciate what you've done, Captain Sanderson. But tell me, how were the rest of my party caught?"

"They tried to beat it in the car and trailer that you'd left back of the waterfront," was the reply, "and it seems that this man Bruce and his bunch caught up with 'em before they could drive away. That's what I heard, anyhow—and I reckon you owe a vote of thanks to Wheeler for pullin' you down a side-street and leadin' you straight to the dive where I usually hang out."

Crawford had to agree that he was indebted to Wheeler, but at the same time reflected that the man had been acting in his own interests. Crawford had money—money with which to buy passages out to Sujan. That was why Wheeler had not abandoned him to the fate which had overtaken the remainder of the gang.

"And talkin' of that thousand dollars on account," Sanderson continued, "don't forget that I collect another two thousand bucks when I set you down where you eventually decide to land—after you leave Sujan, I mean."

"That depends on the way things break for us, captain," said Crawford. "When we reach Sujan, we've still got to grab that god horse, and it's possible that we'll fail."

Wheeler tapped him familiarly on the shoulder.

"Not if we play our cards right," he drawled. "Let me tell you something, Crawford—something I found out while I was a prisoner in the hands of the natives there. You know, some of them Sujanese wasn't so mad at the black Arabian havin' been stolen."

"What do you mean?" Crawford demanded.

"I mean that there's a faction on the island that's up against Tanaga, the high priest," Wheeler replied. "This faction is led by two guys called Debor and Kinso. They've got a certain following, and they seemed to think that with the god horse out of the way, Tanaga would lose favour."

Wheeler leaned towards the bigger man and eyed him cunningly.

"Now, if we got in touch with Debor and Kinso as soon as we landed," he went on, "and if we told 'em Rex was comin' back, they might do all they could to help us to stop the god horse from ever reachin' Tanaga's sacred stables."

Crawford was silent for a moment, and then he drew in a long breath and squared his powerful shoulders.

"That's worth knowing, Wheeler," he said. "If we can win over these men that you've named, I reckon our chances will be improved a hundred per cent."

"Meantime your chief difficulty lies in getting aboard the Vulcan without the cops seein' you," Sanderson interposed. "But I'll fix that all right. I'll pick you up here after dark, and smuggle you to your cabins. So long as you stay where you are until I show up, you've got nothin' to fear."

Three weeks had elapsed, and in a remote, moonlit clearing of the jungle that clothed the tropical isle of Sujan a number of men had assembled.

With two exceptions they were natives of the warrior breed. The two exceptions were Crawford and Wheeler, who had arrived in Sujan forty-eight hours before, and who had succeeded in making contact with Kinso and Debor, leaders of the rebellions faction which was opposed to the high priest Tanaga.

Debor was not present, but Kinso was there, a tall, lean personage of domineering character, with a pair of cruel, malevolent eyes and a trident mouth.

"According to your calculations," he was saying, in stilted but otherwise faultless English, "the ship bearing the god horse ought to be here by now. Therefore we may expect to hear from Debor soon."

He had addressed himself to Crawford and Wheeler, and these had listened to him earnestly, as if hanging on his every word. Then Crawford spoke.

"Suppose Bradley takes the god horse straight to the high priest Tanaga," he muttered.

"If the stallion leaves the ship, Debor will see that a message reaches us."

"How?" Crawford demanded.

"By signal-drum—what you people call 'jungle telegraph.' We shall know then that we must ride and intercept this man Bradley."

There was a pause, and then Kinso went on talking in a low and sinister voice.

"Whatever happens, Tanaga will never see the god horse again. The faction led by Debor and me is a small one as yet. But if we can remove the stallion for ever, a blow will be struck at Tanaga's prestige. The very keystone of his rule will be swept aside, and we can strike swiftly and seize the reins of power—substituting gods of our own choosing for this animal worship which has sufficed in the past."

An expression of uneasiness had dawned on the faces of Crawford and Wheeler, an expression which had been inspired by one particular phrase that the native had used.

"Say," Crawford muttered, "let me get this straight. You talk of 'removing the stallion for ever.' Just what do you mean by that?"

Before Kinso could volunteer any explanation the drumming of hoofs interrupted the conversation, and a few seconds later three horsemen galloped into the clearing. They were Debor and two other conspirators belonging to the party which was scheming for Tanaga's downfall, and, drawing rein abruptly, they saluted Kinso and the remainder of the band with upraised hands.

"What news, Debor?" Kinso asked in terse accents.

Debor swung himself from the saddle of his pony. He was a small, shifty individual of yellowish complexion, clean-shaven except for a thin moustache that grew on his upper lip.

"Wheeler and his friend here were right," he said. "The ship known as the Oriental cast anchor at the mouth of the Palang River. Three people came ashore—a young man, an older man and a girl. They had a dog with them."

"The wolfhound," put in Wheeler. "That would be Bradley and the Bruces all right."

"They set out for the interior," Debor continued, "and they reached the Sacred Temple, where they had an audience of Tanaga."

Kinso laid a hand on his sleeve.

"But the god horse," he said urgently. "The god horse—what of him?"

"The god horse was not with them," came the reply. "Or I would have summoned you by the signal-drum and you would have known that you must intercept them. As it was, I followed the two men and the girl, and when they presented themselves at the temple I overheard part of their interview with Tanaga."

"And what did you learn?" Kinso demanded. "What are the high priest's plans?"

Debor smiled complacently.

"He has sent a party of ten warriors to the coast," he answered. "They bear a signed order from the young man who is called Bradley, authorising the captain of the Oriental to surrender the god horse to them. A party of ten warriors, Kinso—that is the escort which has been provided for the stallion—and we are double that number."

"Yes," his accomplice breathed, "we are double that number, and we must act decisively. The escort will never reach the temple, Debor. We shall ambush them as they return from the coast. We shall lie in wait for them at the point where the main trail breaks into three forks."

The other frowned at that, and fingered his chin doubtfully.

"The spot which you name is perilously close to the settlement," he observed.

"But not so close as to be within ear-shot," Kinso retorted, "and you cannot name me one which is better suited to an ambushade. Come, let us ride, so that we may be well prepared for action when the escort returns from the ship."

There was a troop of horses in the background, and two of these animals having been placed at the disposal of Crawford and Wheeler, the whole party soon mounted. Then, at a sign from Kinso, the plotters spurred from the clearing, picking up a narrow track that led in an easterly direction.

Half an hour later they gained their destination, and here, at the junction of the three routes that Kinso had mentioned, the armed band took up a position amid the dense thickets which grew in profusion amongst the tree-stems of the jungle.

There now ensued a period of inactivity that seemed never-ending to Crawford and Wheeler, and as they waited in the underbrush with their native allies the brooding silence of the night served to accentuate the tension which both of them experienced.

It was a silence broken only by the occasional piping of a bird nearby, and once by a distant snarling roar that caused the swarthy islanders of the party to turn their heads.

"What's that?" jerked Crawford.

"A tiger," Debor informed him. "The jungle abounds in them. Brutes—they even raid the outlying huts of the settlement when they are driven desperate with hunger. From time to time we set traps for them all over the island. Only this morning one was dug—on that fork-trail over there which leads off to the north-west. The imprints of several of the beasts had been seen in the loam of that trail."

Crawford fidgeted uncomfortably, and pursed his lips as that far-off, savage roar echoed through the tropical forest once more. Then all was quiet again, and not another sound was audible until at last the pounding of horses' hoofs reached the ears of the waiting men.

"The escort," Kinso said in a terse voice, "returning from the coast with the god horse Rex!"

Debor nodded, and glanced round at the warriors upon whom he and his confederate were depending.

"Draw your swords," he commanded, "and when the word is given to attack, see that you strike hard and true. Remember, every man of the escort is a trusted partisan of Tanaga, and therefore a sworn enemy of our cause!"

January 9th, 1937.

There was a rasping of steel as the supporters of Debor and Kinso whipped their gleaming blades from their scabbards, and less than a minute afterwards the escort of temple guards hove into sight, clearly revealed to the waiting assassins by the moonlight that flooded the main trail.

In the midst of the escort was a riderless stallion of magnificent bearing. It was the god horse Rex, and on perceiving it the eyes of Crawford and Wheeler kindled with greed—greed that became expectation as a sharp, imperious cry was suddenly raised.

The Americans were never quite certain whether it was Debor or Kinso who uttered that shout, but on the instant it was taken up by a score of voices as their adherents dashed from cover to assail Tanaga's men, and all at once the night was made hideous by the din of battle.

It was a fight in which Crawford and Wheeler played no part, and neither did Kinso and Debor. These four kept out of harm's way, and contented themselves with watching the action from the shelter of the thickets, looking on with satisfaction and approval while the one-sided and bloodthirsty combat ran its course.

Taken utterly by surprise, the temple guards had been thrown into disorder by the ambushade, and those who were nearest to Rex were cut down before they could raise a hand to defend themselves. Indeed, the first few seconds of the onslaught were marked by the fall of three of Tanaga's devotees and the capture of the god horse, who was quickly led to one side.

The remainder of the guards contrived to put up a resistance, but they were outnumbered, and went down in swift succession under the murderous strokes rained upon them by their foes, agonising death-cries mingling with the ugly clangour of steel.

Only one member of the ill-fated escort escaped the pitiless slaughter, a man of gigantic proportions who hacked his way through his foes and galloped onward down the trail that led to the settlement, with the blood streaming from a dozen wounds that he had sustained.

And now, their purpose fulfilled, the followers of Debor and Kinso turned towards the spot whence those two arch-schemers and their American allies had watched the massacre.

Accompanied by Wheeler and Crawford, Debor and Kinso moved out of the thickets to join the victorious warriors, and in another moment Kinso was grasping the end of a rope bridle that was attached to Rex's head.

"So!" he declared in a ringing tone. "The god horse is ours. It is well, and now he shall be taken to the altar of sacrifice deep in the heart of the jungle!"

He had spoken in English, and as they heard his words Crawford and Wheeler looked at each other in blank dismay. Then the rancher attempted to utter an exclamation of protest, but ere he could give vent to his angry thoughts Debor clapped a hand upon his wrist and flashed him a glance that warned him to be silent.

Crawford held his peace, but there was an ugly expression on his features when Kinso proceeded to lead Rex along the track by which the party had galloped to the forks.

The warriors who had slain the temple guards rode after Debor's accomplice-in-chief. Debor himself remained at the scene of the massacre, however, together with Crawford and Wheeler, and as the rest of the band vanished down the side-track he turned to address the Americans in an undertone.

"The time has come for strategy," he said. "Kinso must take the god horse to the altar of sacrifice, but have no fear. He and I have no intention of breaking our promise to you."

Crawford lowered his hand to his hip-pocket.

"Debor," he ground out, "if you do break that promise—"

"No, no, I tell you we shall keep faith with you," the Sujanese interrupted. "But listen, if our men had known that we were to let you take the god horse they would never have obeyed our commands. It is necessary that we should convince them that the god horse will be destroyed—yes, and it is necessary to our cause that the news of his death should be accepted by all the people of Sujun."

He paused, and leaned closer to the two Americans.

"For that reason," he added, "the stallion will actually be placed on the altar of sacrifice, and his funeral pyre actually lit. But I have arranged with Kinso to create a diversion which will leave you free to release the god horse, and it will then be your task to convey him secretly to the coast—and to the anchorage where your ship awaits you."

Pursuit

THROUGH the fastnesses of the jungle a lone rider galloped, his horse covering the ground at speed which was inspired by its own terror rather than by the touch of its master's heels.

Indeed, the man in the saddle was scarcely capable of exercising any influence over the animal, for it was as much as he could do to keep his seat, weakened as he was by loss of blood.

He was the sole survivor of the escort that had been ambushed by the followers of Kinso and Debor, and he was in a pitiable condition when at length his pony carried him in sight of the village where the main bulk of Sujun's population was concentrated. But as the horse proceeded to make for its stable the wounded guard managed to rouse himself with an effort and turn its head towards a building which stood on the western edge of the settlement.

The building in question was the temple dedicated to the strange religion practised by the Sujanese, and, reaching the entrance of it, the guard slid from his pony's back and tottered across the threshold into the presence of three men and a girl.

The group was composed of Tanaga, Frank Bradley, Dorothy Bruce and her father, and with that courtesy which was so characteristic of him, the high priest had been assuring his visitors that comfortable quarters would be found for them in the settlement if they cared to stay in Sujun for any length of time. But at the sudden appearance of the wounded guard all conversation between them was brought to an end, and with an expression of anxiety on his face Tanaga started forward to meet the newcomer.

"Sibu, what has happened?" he ejaculated in the native tongue. "Speak, man! What has happened?"

In faltering accents the survivor of the ambush told his story, and, when he had learned all, Tanaga swung round upon his guests and translated the dramatic news to them. Then he hastened to a great gong that hung in the temple, and with loud, resounding blows he gave an alarm that was calculated to summon all men who were faithful to his rule.

Before the reverberations of the gong had died away, however, Frank Bradley had turned to Dorothy Bruce and her father.

"I'm going to find out what's happened to Rex," he announced. "You two wait here."

His friends attempted to restrain him, but he shook free and dashed from the temple, and as he saw the horse that belonged to the guard known as Sibn he vaulted into the saddle. Next instant he was spurring in the direction of the jungle, and he had travelled some fifty or sixty yards when he heard a dog barking behind him.

He looked round to descry the figure of Rinty, who had been wandering aimlessly in the vicinity of the temple when Frank had emerged from the building so precipitately, and now the wolfhound was racing in pursuit of him. Nor did the sleek, grey creature pause in his stride when the young American attempted to order him back.

Frank hesitated only for a second, and then he galloped onward into the jungle with Rinty a little way in the rear, and, though the dog could not overtake the pony, it nevertheless managed to keep track of horse and rider as they swept along the forest trail which led to the scene of the ambushade.

Frank did not know it, but three of the men who had been responsible for that ambushade without taking an active part in it were still lingering at the spot. They were Debor, Crawford, and Wheeler, and, on the advice of the first-named, the two Americans had agreed to wait awhile before setting out for the altar of sacrifice.

When at last Debor considered that they had delayed long enough, the three of them turned towards the track by which Kinso and the rest of the band had departed—and it was as they were on the point of cantering across to it that they heard the thudding of hoofs on the village trail.

Immediately afterwards they saw Frank Bradley sweep into view round a bend, and Crawford gave vent to a hoarse exclamation.

"Bradley!" he jerked. "And there may be a whole crowd of Tanaga's followers behind him!"

"Yes," Debor rapped out, "and we must not lead them to the altar of sacrifice! Quick, we'll strike off down that track to the north-west!"

"But you said a tiger-pit had been dug there!" Wheeler gasped.

Debor was already urging his horse on to the north-west trail.

"We'll turn aside before we reach the pit," he called fiercely. "We can force our way through the thickets and pick up the other track. Come, there's no time to lose!"

The three of them galloped along the route Debor had indicated, but had not gone far when the Sujaneses sworved into the underbrush, whereupon Wheeler and Crawford promptly imitated his example, and there was no sign of them when Frank gained the forks where the massacro of the temple guards had been carried out.

The youngster had seen the rogues turn on to the north-west trail, and had recognised Crawford and Wheeler with a shock of amazement that had rapidly given place to a feeling of mingled determination and anger. And now he charged down the side-track, drawing a revolver as he did so.

With Rinty following him he rode along that forest trail at breakneck speed, and in thirty seconds he was abreast of the point where Debor, Crawford, and Wheeler had veered off into the thickets. But under the impression that the fugitives were still in front of him he dashed straight ahead with clouds of earth flying from his horse's feet, and he was fully a hundred yards past the spot where his enemies had left the track when suddenly the ground seemed to give way beneath his mount.

Down came man and beast, hurtling through a screen of twigs and foliage, plunging into the gloomy depths of a pit, and, catapulted out of the saddle, Frank landed on the bed of that dark and musty cavity with an impact that knocked him senseless.

When he recovered consciousness it was to discover himself lying beside the unfortunate animal that he had been riding, and as he realised that the creature had broken its neck he stretched out a hand towards it in a gesture of pity. Then he struggled up and raised his eyes to the tangled matting of brushwood through which he and the pony had fallen.

The greater part of that treacherous screen was still intact, but a shaft of moonlight slanted into the pit through the rent that had been caused when horse and rider had fouled it, and up on the edge of the trap Frank saw the head of the wolfhound Rinty.

The dog was barking loudly, and had no doubt been raising the echoes of the jungle ever since it had reached the brink of the pitfall into which it had seen Frank tumble; and its excited tones continued to resound far and wide as it watched the young American stagger to the wall of the trap and attempt to clamber back to the trail.

It was a vain effort on Frank's part. The wall of the pit was sheer, and the rim of it high above his head. Unaided, it was impossible for him to escape from the murky depths into which he had been flung. He soon saw clearly that he must accept the situation, and hope that the baying of Rinty would attract the attention of friends from the village—for he felt sure that Tanaga would dispatch a force of warriors to hunt down the man who had butchered Rex's escort.

Even as that comforting reflection was passing through Frank's mind he heard a sound that froze the blood in his veins, a snarling roar from somewhere close at hand. It was the roar of a tiger that had been drawn to the neighbourhood of the pit by Rinty's barking, and, if the scope of his view had not been restricted by the walls of his deep prison, the young American would have seen the brute padding round a bend in the trail above.

Rinty drew back, his hair bristling. The denizen of the jungle came on, scenting the dog as prey for its cruel fangs. Between the two animals was the pitfall, only partially disclosed by the gap in the network of twigs and foliage.

Roaring again, the tiger bounded forward, intending to pounce on the wolfhound when it was close enough to make the leap—and confident, no doubt, of clearing that gap which it could see between itself and the dog.

But in another instant the great, striped brute had set foot on that portion of the matting which was still undisturbed, and suddenly the monster was plunging through the river foliage, plunging into the trap where Frank Bradley was already a captive!

shouted. "If we want to leave we'll leave, and—"

"You won't!" snarled Red Jagger, and crashed his fist into Bud's face.

Bud reeled back, then recklessly rushed at the big man. Crash! A brutal punch caught the youngster in the jaw, and he went prone on his back.

O'Malley had to stand by and watch. He itched to leap at Red, especially as he knew what the girl must be thinking.

Butch, Lefty, Brody, and Andy—the four worst of the gang—heard the noise and hurried to the scene.

"It's all over, boys," chuckled Red. "Thanks to Dan and myself, it's all settled. Brody, you and Andy keep guard over this shack and see Bud and his sister don't leave."

O'Malley knelt over the prone figure of the boy.

"You cowardly cur!" hissed the girl. "And I thought you were his friend." He looked up.

"It's a pity you don't trust me more," he whispered. "Best help me get Bud into the shack."

It was O'Malley who bathed the bruised forehead and fixed the bandages. Nothing was said by Edie because she found this man so much of a bewildering puzzle, and, besides, Brody and Andy were within hearing.

Red Jagger appeared and grunted when he saw the youngster was conscious.

"That'll teach you who's boss around here," he drawled, and his beady eyes turned towards the girl. "Guess you can make yourself useful. Get over to the shack and lend Gabby a hand, and see if you can't fix something else than stew."

It was on the afternoon before the contemplated raid that O'Malley at last saw a way of getting a message to the sergeant. Red Jagger and most of his men had gone off to round up some of their cattle and water the horses. The trooper had gone over to talk with Gabby on the chance that that individual might give him a line on Marshall's murder.

Old Gabby was busy trying to make flapjacks, and was in a talkative mood. Having decided that he must have made a mistake over the new man, he was inclined to be friendly.

"When I made that stick-up I had to pass near the Mountie post at Silver Creek," O'Malley said casually. "Red would have had a tough task getting Bud outa that place. It looked like a small fortress."

"They never did aim to get him out," Gabby muttered, and turned to reveal a blackened eye. "That double-crossing skunk would have let the kid swing."

"You don't seem too fond of Red this morning."

"I've cooked and sweated for him for months, and I got soaked because there was a hornet in his tea," snarled Gabby.

O'Malley glanced round quickly at a slight sound and saw Edith enter the shack carrying some clothes she had washed. Her back was towards him, and with his foot he kicked the door so that it almost closed. Gabby, bending over a steaming pot, was too engrossed in the stew and in his own troubles to notice.

"Then Bud Hyland didn't kill that Mountie?" he asked sharply.

"No, Red or Butch plugged him," scoffed Gabby. "That Mountie was always hanging round the Eldorado, and one night Joe musta told Red who he was, so they shot him, filled the kid full of doped liquor, and framed him. Gosh, didn't Red get a shock when you and the kid walked in. Reckon he must have thought it were a ghost."

"Wonder what Red aims to do about young Bud?"

"Why wonder?" Gabby gave a raucous laugh. "It ain't hard to guess what happens to mugs what stand in Red's path. But I ain't scared of the big palooka. I mind the time when there weren't a man quicker to the draw than Gabby Jones, and if my fingers weren't crippled with rheumatics I wouldn't be doing any pesky cooking."

"Red is leaving some of the boys here to-night," O'Malley spoke loudly.

"Are you going on this raid, Gabby?"

"Not likely," scoffed the cook. "But if I don't get my share of the dough, then I'll stir up trouble for Red. I'm gettin' just about sick of this life."

"Reckon you'd still be pretty useful in a bank hold-up," remarked the trooper. "You may have rheumatics, Gabby, but you got a lotta nerve. And it wants nerve to stick up the Silver Creek bank."

"And I could do it," Gabby glared round. "If any Mounties show up them yell skunks will be scared stiff." He narrowed his eyes. "Guess I'm talking too much."

"I ain't telling Red or Butch," was the answer. "I'll see you get your rake-off, Gabby, and maybe I'll be leaving this bunch, and if you wanna come along we can ride together. Guess I'd better turn in for a spell; a tired man ain't no good on a stick-up, and we ride at four. Guess most of the folk in Silver Creek will be asleep when we loot their old bank at midnight. Bet those fool Mounties will be all sleeping like hogs. They'd never think anyone would have the nerve to try anything in Silver Creek."

A slight sound made O'Malley edge to the door, and he peered through the slight crack in time to see Edith slipping out of the shack. He knew she had overheard everything.

"Guess I'd like to ride with you, Dan," Gabby muttered. "I'm kinda sorry I caused a bit of trouble for you, but I sure did think I'd seen your face some place."

"Maybe you'll remember one of these days," chuckled O'Malley. "See you later, pal."

At four Red Jagger assembled his men and gave out his instructions. There was a slight delay outside the Hylands' shack, where Red had the two prisoners brought out and threatened Bud with dire vengeance if he dared to try to escape.

"And you get a swell meal ready for January 9th, 1937.

us," Red shouted at the girl. "If it's stew, I'll make you marry old Gabby!"

The outlaws laughed uproariously as they rode away. O'Malley glanced back and saw the girl standing there, with small fists clenched to her side and her eyes gleaming. He felt that he was going to win on his gamble.

The Tables Turned

IT wanted a half-hour to midnight when the band arrived on the outskirts of Silver Creek. Red Jagger divided his men into three parties. Butch, Dan, and himself each to take two men and work their way towards the bank. Then they would break into the bank whilst some remained on guard outside; it would be Dan's job to dynamite the safe.

"Best not ride your horses down the main street," O'Malley suggested. "Hitch 'em to some place that's close and handy. We wanna get into that bank before the night watchman can raise a hue and cry."

"Good notion," agreed Red. "Got the dynamite, Dan?"

"Sure—enough to blow up the whole town."

At a church some two hundred yards from the bank O'Malley cautioned his two men to move quietly. By some railings he gave the signal to dismount, and the men hitched their horses to the railings. O'Malley clenched his fists and waited.

"What's the next move, Dan?" one asked.

"This!" retorted O'Malley, and lashed out with a right that sent the man reeling back into his companion's arms.

The other, realising they had been tricked, tried to whip out a gun, but a huge body came hurtling through the air to smash him to the ground. The gun was wrenched away and tossed over the railings. The other rasal staggered to his feet, and steel-like fingers gripped him by the throat. O'Malley freed one hand and rammed home a hard punch. A moment later he grinned down at two still figures.

O'Malley decided that they would not cause him any further trouble, and that they were out for a lengthy count. Drawing his gun he hastened towards the main street. What a relief when he heard gun-fire. He had feared he might have to tackle Red Jagger and his band on his own, but the firing seemed to indicate that there were others on the scene.

It was a rude shock for Red Jagger when from behind shacks and buildings a number of troopers appeared. Butch opened fire and dropped a moment later with a groan of pain. Some of the gang tried to get to cover, but the Mounties seemed everywhere.

Trapped! Red Jagger turned and darted off into the darkness. That cursed Bud Hyland had got away and betrayed them. A bullet whined over his head, and, turning, Red fired, and saw a Mountie drop. Panting and blowing, he reached his horse, flung himself into the saddle, and galloped recklessly down the street.

Red Jagger was the only one to escape. O'Malley easily arrested Brody and Andy, who threw up their arms when he covered them with a gun. Out of the bank poured the sheriff and a number of armed townsfolk. The moon came out of the clouds and threw its light on the scene. How those bandits scowled when they saw Dan Rawlings and heard the Mounties congratulating him.

"What's yer name?" Brody asked.

"Trooper O'Malley of the Mounted," laughed the bogus Dan Rawlings. His face, hardened. "I swore to get you crooks when you murdered Trooper Marshall."

"We didn't shoot Marshall!" whined Brody. "It was Red and Butch."

"Yeah, I know," O'Malley glanced round. "Where are those two?"

"I think we've got Butch," stated the sergeant, as several of the armed townsfolk appeared carrying a limp form.

"Yeah, that's Butch, and he seems hit pretty bad," O'Malley glanced round. "But where's Red?"

"He got away," said a voice, and the wounded trooper reeled forward. "He plugged me, and the last I heard of him he was heading north."

"Sergeant, I got to go after him," shouted O'Malley. "Near the church you'll find two more of the bunch. Let two of the boys come with me."

"Where do you reckon Jagger's heading for?" the sergeant asked as one of the troopers brought forward a fresh horse.

"His hide-out," O'Malley leaped into the saddle. "Did Edith Hyland warn you about this bank hold-up?"

The sergeant nodded.

"And then she rode away before you could stop her."

"Right again."

"Well, she's gone back to her brother," rasped O'Malley. "And I reckon Red will reckon that one of these two betrayed him, so I gotta ride fast."

O'Malley was off like the wind. Two troopers galloped hard at his heels, but before they had gone far O'Malley drew away.

A Fighting Demon

RED JAGGER flung himself from his horse and dashed into the main shack. Gabby blinked his eyes at the breathless figure.

"What's wrong, Red?" he quavered.

"Everything. We were tricked!" snarled Red. "Get everything packed up that two horses can carry—we gotta be away from here in an hour. Why ain't that girl here?"

"I ain't seen her all the evening. Guess they're both over in their shack. Where are all the boys?"

"The Mounties got 'em!" shouted Red. "And now I'm going to get the rat that squealed. Get busy!"

The big man flung himself out of the shack and raced over the grass to the other shack. There was a light burning. Out of the shadows jumped two men—it was the guards.

"Why, Red—" one cried.

"Have you two been on guard all the while?" Red snarled at them.

"Sure we have," they answered.

"Neither of them have been outa this shack?"

"The girl did because you told her to help Gabby."

"Well, she squealed on us!" Red said through clenched teeth. "You two get down and help Gabby whilst I settle this dame and her snivelling brother."

Edith Hyland was bandaging her brother's forehead when the door was kicked open. She gave a cry of alarm and the bandage slid from her hand. Red Jagger kicked the door shut.

"You two can well look scared!" he shouted hoarsely. "Which of you two told the Mounties?"

They remained silent, eyeing him fearfully.

"I'll make you talk if I have to twist the necks off your bodies!" There was murder in those blazing eyes. "Bud Hyland, you got your white-faced sister to take a message to the Mounties, and you fooled my men by kidding 'em that she was helping Gabby. That's the truth, ain't it?"

"Not quite," Edith answered fearlessly. "My brother didn't want me to go. I found out about the hold-up on the bank at Silver Creek by you and Dan Rawlings. I went out pretending to help Gabby and rode down to Silver Creek. So you got a warm reception."

"Nothing to what you're to get!" Red Jagger screamed. "I'm going to break every bone in both your measly bodies, and—"

"Before that you deal with me," drawled a voice from the door.

Red spun round, and saw it was Dan Rawlings.

"I told the girl what you were planning," O'Malley went on. "Or, rather, what I had planned to trap you, Red."

"Who are you?"

"Trooper O'Malley," was the answer. "And I vowed that I'd get the skunk that killed Marshall."

"If you hadn't that gun I'd kill you!" taunted Red.

"Take out your gun and toss it on the floor!" the trooper rapped out. "Jump, to it!" Red obeyed, whereupon O'Malley chucked away his own gun. "Well, now's your chance."

Red Jagger hurled himself forward. He had been a boxer in his time, and often boasted that he had no match among outlaws and renegades. He met his match at the hands of O'Malley, who used the big man as a punching-bag.

That fight was short but very sweet. Every time O'Malley landed a punch Edith clapped her hands. Bud grinned as he watched his sister's flushed face. Never had he seen his quiet, matter-of-fact, practical sister so excited.

Red Jagger made one last rush, and was almost lifted off his feet with an uppercut. He just went flat on his back and lay there, completely knocked out.

The Hylands had backed away to give the fighters plenty of room; now they came forward. Edith looked shyly over the prone figure of Red Jagger at O'Malley.

"I'm sorry I misjudged you," she whispered, lowering her gaze.

"I'm sorry I couldn't let you into the secret," was his answer. "I had to play the part to find out Jagger's hide-out. At any rate, everything is okay now, and as it was either Butch or Red that killed Marshall you haven't got a thing to worry about." He spun round. "Before we start cheering I guess I'll go get the rest of the bunch."

But O'Malley was spared the trouble. The two troopers appeared on the scene, and the three outlaws surrendered without a fight.

On the promise of a very light sentence Gabby told the whole tale, and Red Jagger and his bunch of smuggling outlaws got lengthy sentences. Butch and Jagger got life sentences, because it was not quite certain which of them had killed Marshall.

The day after the trial a buggy was drawn up outside an outpost station of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. A very pretty, blushing girl sat holding the reins, whilst a number of grinning troopers smiled at her.

Through the group burst a figure resplendent in clean uniform. It was Sergeant O'Malley. He leaped into the buggy.

"The Commissioner's on his way here, and we're going like the wind before he has the chance to stop us." O'Malley waved his hand. "Don't you wish you were going with me on a honeymoon in Montreal?"

A crack of the whip and the buggy was cantering down the road that led to happiness.

"THE CASE OF THE VELVET CLAWS"

Spudsy took the telephone from him, and he grinned at Hoffman.

"Sergeant," he said, "my flat is on the way, more or less. Mind if we stop there while I change into more appropriate garments?"

"You'll have to change 'em in my presence!" snarled the sergeant.

"Oh, sure! Mind you bring all these people, too—you'll need 'em! And, Spudsy, go to Mrs. Mason. Tell her to pack her bags—we're leaving for Pinehurst in an hour."

Spudsy's mouth opened wide, in company with his brown eyes, but he went off quite obediently. Mrs. Veite sneezed, and, in spite of the handcuffs, Perry contrived to offer her a handkerchief.

The Second Cartridge

THE District Attorney was waiting, with Eva Belter and two police officers, in the drawing-room of the house in Elmwood Drive when Perry—no longer handcuffed—arrived with Hoffman, Jones, and all the rest of the people who had visited his flat on the way from Chinatown. Perry was once more arrayed in his own clothes.

At his request everybody ascended to the study on the floor above. Most of them were sneezing and coughing as they sat, or stood, in the big room.

"Mrs. Belter," said Perry, "let me remind you that even though I surrendered you to the police, I'm still your attorney, and I intend to see you freed from a charge of murder within fifteen minutes. Your confession is true, in that when I left this room just before nine o'clock last night you had an argument with your husband. He threatened you and the reputation of another party."

Norma Veite sneezed, and Herbert B. Jones coughed.

"Another party," Perry went on, "who is now residing in a sanatorium, suffering the tortures of a nervous breakdown—" He grinned reminiscently and turned to Riley. "Oh, would you mind telephoning the Fairview Sanatorium?" he asked. "Tell Dr. Lane that he may now release Algernon P. Fortescue. He's well now."

Riley repeated the name, which meant nothing to anybody present except Eva Belter, who guessed that it covered the identity of Peter Milnor.

"Yes," said Perry, and turned again to his very troublesome client. "You admit that you drew a pistol and pointed it at your husband, don't you, Mrs. Belter? You shot him, threw the gun on the floor, and ran out of the house. Then you ran all across town and telephoned me."

The District Attorney became impatient.

"We read your phoney confession, Mason," he said sharply.

"Yes," said Perry smilingly, "but do you know that two shots were fired at George Belter? That one of them went out through the open window right behind your head there?"

The District Attorney whirled round to gape at the open window; several of the plain-clothes men ran over to it, and a buzz of excited voices ensued. But the buzz was interrupted by the abrupt appearance of Spudsy, who rushed into the room without a hat.

"I think I've caught a cold!" he exclaimed as he stopped to sneeze.

"Beat it!" commanded Perry.

"Oh, but that ain't all, boss," said Spudsy. "It's Della! She—she's on her way to the night court! She said she was gonna get the judge to annul the marriage!"

Perry looked at the District Attorney. "Mr. Burns," he said in dismay, "you'll have to wait—"

"No, Mason," the District Attorney broke in sternly. "You can't get away with any more tricks! You've got to wind this up now, or never!"

"All right," surrendered Perry. "Well, Mrs. Veite just couldn't wait till the publicity had died down before forcing Carl Griffin to marry her daughter—and that gave the whole show away."

"You're out of your head!" shouted the housekeeper.

"No, it's just a cold," said Perry. "You see, I saw Carl Griffin at this house last night. He was going out, it appeared, but he went no farther than the drive when he heard a shot. That was after I'd gone."

Carl Griffin's blue eyes widened, but he did not say anything.

"He went back into the house," Perry continued, "mounted the stairs, and entered this room. He found George C. Belter, his uncle, laughing to himself, and he asked what had happened. Belter informed him that his wife thought she had killed him, pointed to the spot on which she had stood when she had pulled the trigger, and stated that the bullet had gone out of the window instead of through his heart."

Eva Belter started up from the chair in which she had seated herself, but Perry waved her to silence.

"Carl Griffin," he went on, "was interested. 'Eva tried to kill you?' he exclaimed, and his uncle replied that she had, and that he had let her think that she had hit him. 'But why should she want to kill you?' asked Griffin; and Belter, as I imagine it, replied: 'Principally because I changed my will to-day in your favour. She couldn't stand the thought of seeing you get all my money.'

"Carl Griffin had seen Eva Belter running away from the house, and now he saw what he thought was a wonderful opportunity. He picked up the automatic, which she had flung on the carpet, and he asked his uncle where he had been standing.

"Belter, quite unsuspectingly, went over to the spot where he had been when his wife had fired—and thereupon Carl Griffin fired! But this time the bullet did not go out of the window!

"Out from this room, in which he had committed cold-blooded murder, Griffin went to the stairs. But Mrs. Veite was standing at the top of them, and Mrs. Veite is a clever, calculating woman. At the price of marrying her daughter she agreed to cover up his crime, even suggested that he should go out and get very drunk to establish an alibi, and then went down to her duties as though nothing had happened, while Griffin acted upon her sug—"

Carl Griffin had made a rush for the door, and Spudsy had caught hold of him, yelling:

"Don't try to move! I got you in a vice-like grip!"

But Spudsy was sent sprawling, and it was Jones and a couple of policemen who overpowered the murderer and handcuffed him.

Mrs. Veite sank into a chair, almost in a state of collapse, while her golden-haired daughter went off into hysterics and was led away.

"You see, Hoffman," said Perry, when quiet had been restored, "if Mrs. Veite hadn't tried to blackmail Griffin quite so soon they might have got away with it."

"But what about the proof?" challenged Hoffman. "There's still the—"

"The matter of an empty cartridge," Perry completed for him, and thrust a hand into a pocket and held out the missing cartridge. "Here it is. I took the liberty of appropriating it last night. Your ballistic expert will identify it."

"Thank you, Perry!" cried Eva Belter tremulously.

"Much obliged, Perry," said Hoffman; and then Perry dashed from the room with Spudsy at his heels.

In the night court where Perry and Della had been made man and wife the night before, Della was standing before the bench, a pitiful figure, listening to what Mary Florence O'Daugherty had to say concerning the matrimonial troubles which had been described to her.

"Young lady," said the judge, "you're still Mrs. Mason, and there's not a thing I can do about it!"

The door at the back of the court swung wide, and in rushed Perry, with Spudsy.

"If the court please—" he began.

"And what kind of a performance do you call this, Perry Mason?" rapped the judge.

"Your honour!" Perry reached the bench, and over the top of it he said: "Oh, gee, Mary F., you remember you said you owed me a nickel for a paper I delivered twenty years ago? Well, I'll forget all about it if you'll be a pal."

Mary F. smiled and nodded.

"Court's adjourned for a ten-minute recess," she announced, and left the bench to open the door in the wall at the back of it. "Come with me, you two children!"

Perry walked beside Della into the room, and the door was closed just as Spudsy reached it.

"Say, are you with Mr. Mason's party?" inquired the bailiff who had put that self-same question the evening before.

"Am I with Mr. Mason's party?" cried Spudsy indignantly. "Ain't you ever seen my picture in the paper? I'm the guy that solves all his cases!"

"Then," said the bailiff, holding out a telephone, "see if you can solve what this dame's talkin' about!"

Spudsy took the telephone. A woman was on the other end of the line, and she stuttered; but it became evident that she desired to engage the services of Perry Mason.

"Not a chance!" Spudsy out her short. "Mr. Mason's been sent up for life—er—out of town. Pinchurst Lodge!"

In the room behind the bench, Mary Florence O'Daugherty experienced no difficulty whatever in effecting a reconciliation, since Della had gone to the court only to teach her errant husband a lesson; and half an hour afterwards Perry and Della were seated side by side in the streamlined saloon, and Spudsy was at the wheel.

"Oh, darling, you'll love it up there!" declared Perry. "And please believe me, I'll never take another criminal case."

"Promise?" pouted Della.

Perry not only promised, but sealed the promise with a kiss.

He had no idea that a woman who stuttered, and a man who had a gun in his pocket were following the saloon in a taxicab, the driver of which had been instructed to take them to Pinchurst Lodge!

DON'T FORGET "UNDERSEA KINGDOM"

The amazing new serial starting soon!

THE SMELL OF FEAR

The art of training a wildcat to eat meat out of your hand without eating the hand as well is simplicity itself.

Reunio Renfro, a real-life Tarzan by trade, says that it is all in how you eye the animal. An unflinching stare, combined with a set of knockless knees, and teeth that don't chatter except in conversation, are all that is required.

"You really control an animal with your eyes," says Renfro, potentate of what is probably Hollywood's most peculiar profession. "That establishes your dominance."

Renfro makes a big business of supplying trained domestic and wild animals to Hollywood studios. His California ranch teems with assorted beasts, all properly pacified for use in pictures.

Renfro had just completed the most difficult assignment of his career for "A Day at the Races," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture starring the mad Marx Brothers. Oddly enough, it consisted not of taming a wild animal, but of training two otherwise peaceful English bulldogs to declare war on Chico Marx at sight.

One of the scenes in the Marx movie requires that Chico be chased by two ferocious canines. Wearing Chico's familiar costume, Renfro spent two weeks teaching the two dogs to pursue him madly the moment he appeared in Chico's clothes.

He succeeded too well. Chico himself happened to wander by while the dogs were out being aired. He had to get himself a new pair of trousers.

"It's a lot easier to train a wild animal to act tame than to train a tame animal to act wild," commented Renfro.

"The main thing about taming wild animals is never to be scared. When you are frightened, your body gives off a certain odour that only a wild animal can recognise. From then on it's got you licked.

"If I am training a lion, for instance, and he jumps towards me, I jump towards him. He'll always stop short."

The first animal Renfro ever trained was an African lion. He put the lion through its paces for six months, then sold it.

"He killed the next two fellows he worked with," Renfro adds casually.

Renfro makes a hobby as well as a business of taking a wild animal and turning it into a pet. Currently, his favourite is a wildcat that rides around with him in his car and eats meat out of his hand.

Training dogs to do tricks isn't too difficult a task, Renfro advises. Patience, kindness and understanding are the basic requirements.

To Blazes with Everybody

YOU dirty liar! I'll kill you for that!"

A gun roared in the darkness. The killer's exultation was wiped out as the lights flashed up and before him stood the man he thought he had shot. Before he could fire again strong arms gripped him—two police officers had pinioned him.

"If this cigar"—the man who had escaped unscathed held up his cigar—"had been in my mouth, as you thought it was, you would have got me about here." He pointed to his forehead, and then took out a long holder. "The cigar was in this and held quite a long way from my body."

"It's a lie," screamed the prisoner. "First he accused me of murdering my wife, then he suddenly turned off all the lights."

"And you fell right into my trap," was the answer. "Tried to drill me with the very gun you used to kill your wife. Check it, boys, and you'll find I'm right. I—!" He clutched suddenly at his side as a beautiful girl rushed into the room. "Guess I did stop a ricochet after all."

The girl screamed as he collapsed in a heap, and flung herself down beside him, to pillow his head on her breast.

"Darling! Darling, you can't die! I won't let you! I love you!"

The wounded man suddenly held the girl close. "That's all I wanted to know," he shouted, and kissed her.

"Hold that clinch!" yelled a stenographer voice. "We're trucking in for the close-up."

March 27th, 1937.

The man and the girl cling to each other.

"Okay! Cut!" came the shout.

The man and girl separated with alacrity.

"Great work." A big man appeared from behind the camera. He was Kelyin, the famous Metro director. "It's dynamite. Best thing you ever done, Phil. Sure box office. That cigar gag of mine was swell."

"Yeah," cried Philip Trent, the film star. "My grandmother used to love it." He got up from the floor. "Thank heaven that's over."

A big, clumsy, grinning fellow pounced out from behind one of the many arc-lamps and seized the star by the arm.

"Wait a minute," cried Mert Morgan, the publicity man. "I gotta get some stills. Sit down there. I want her arms around you—a nice little love-scene."

"What again?" complained Trent, allowing himself to be pushed back to the floor. With a sigh of resignation he allowed the girl to put her arms round his neck.

"All right—all right—now smile—show your teeth more, Mary. Look as if you're going to bite him—hold it steady." He gave a signal, and the still cameraman took the picture.

Mert Morgan would have kept Philip Trent on the set all the day for still pictures, but Phil, being a star, allowed Trent to take two more and then shouted:

"To blazes with everybody."

In Kelvin's office he waited impatiently for the appearance of the director. That individual was full of the joy of life—he breezed into the room.

"Grand stuff, Phil. Say, I got a great book for the next Selby James story." He held it out to the star. "It's just out."

The tired, handsome and cynical man of forty took the book and read from the cover:

"Who strangled the bishop's wife? Who buried her body in the mud bath? Who solved the mystery of the Purple Turtle? How did Selby James, the debonaire super-sleuth—"

Philip slapped the book shut with a bang of disgust.

Kelvin was quite oblivious to the danger signals.

"We're going to make an ace production of this. I'm bringing Peter Dean himself out from New York to do the screen version."

Then the irrefragable publicity hound came in, and hearing what Kelvin had said, had to include his piece:

"And I've got a great hook-up with the chain grocery stores. They're going to throw in a bust of you, Phil, as Selby James, with every packet of puffed corn. Here's the contract!"

"Puffed corn!" Philip Trent shot up as if he were a rocket that has just been ignited. "Puffed corn! That finishes it." He pushed the contract aside. "I've reached my limit. I've nothing else to live for. Gather round, folks, I wish to speak to you."

Kelvin exchanged an agitated glance with Morgan—this was an unusual mood for their star. They came nearer.

"Listen to Mrs. Trent's little blue-eyed boy, Philip," stated the star in terse, angry tones, and then pointed to a mirror in which he was reflected. "See that stuffed shirt in there? That's Selby James, the super-sleuth. I've played that super-sap in six of the world's worst and most successful murder mysteries. Excuse me." With his arms he swept the two men to one side. "Take a good look at him, because that's the last time you're going to see him."

They goggled at him—thinking he had gone mad. When he pulled out a revolver they jumped back in terror. Trent raised the gun and smashed the mirror to pieces. Then the star grinned at the two men and chucked the gun on the floor.

"There's a story for you, Mert. Philip Trent murders Selby James."

"You can't mean it?" gasped Kelvin, at last realising what his star was planning to do.

"I do mean it—I'm through."

"But I've got forty thousand tied up in the next Selby James story," wailed Kelvin. "I can't risk another star in the part."

"And besides, the public knows your mug as Selby James," muttered Mert Morgan.

"Then they'll have to get used to another mug," Philip answered, and grinned mockingly at the director. "Have you ever tripped over a corpse?"

"No, but—"

"Well, I have, thirty-seven of 'em. Have you ever seen a man pierced by a poisoned dart, or a death-ray, or suspended by a madman over a crocodile pit? Of course you haven't. Those things don't happen in real life. But I've seen nothing else for the last three years. I've picked up a bale of incriminating blonde hairs, a ton of false teeth, a pack of stolen diamonds. I've got so jittery that a man can't come into my room without my reaching for a gun. That's what Selby James has done to me. I'm sorry, B. K., but I've tripped over my last corpse."

"But you can't walk out on your contract!"

"I'm going on my vacation. I'm going where nobody knows me." He expanded his chest as if scuttling freedom. "No movie star—no Selby James—just me, Philip—the kid himself." He stepped smartly to the door and beamed at them. "Three months at least I shall be gone. Three months of perfect peace. Gentlemen, I thank you and bid you a very good riddance!"

A Girl in Distress

BUT if the star thought it was going to be simple to escape from either Selby James or Philip Trent he was mistaken. He had an idea he could slip on board a pleasure liner and that nobody would know him. All film stars arrived in huge cars with fanfares of trumpets and plenty of excitement, and an ordinary sort of man in a thick overcoat and cloth cap wouldn't be noticed. Well, Philip could not have been an ordinary sort of man, because he had no sooner started to walk up the gangway when somebody pointed and cried:

"That's Philip Trent, who plays the part of Selby James."

And after that it was chaos. Philip found himself besieged on all sides by women and children clamouring for autographs, and he had no guards to save him. The police and officials finally rescued him and got him to a cabin. Some hours later, Philip, wearing a dinner jacket, went into the bar for a drink, and a weary, rather mournful creature who introduced herself as Mrs. Kinney asked him if he would autograph her copy of "Murder in the Mud Bath." With a resigned shrug he signed the book and retired into a corner with his drink. Noticing the bar beginning to fill and that he was getting considerable attention, he decided to go to his cabin and stay there for the rest of the voyage. B. K. now the liner was well out to sea and there was no going back.

Philip entered his cabin and switched on the lights, then he sniffed the air. Perfume. Perhaps it was his imagination. Slowly he filled his pipe and lit up. Ah, that was better. It was then that he saw some white gloves on a settee. He was staring at them when a sound made him turn.

From the bed-room of his suite had appeared a girl with ash-blonde hair. It accentuated the deathly paleness of her face. She wore a simple but attractive white evening gown. She was pretty, but Philip was too angry to notice.

"Young lady, this is a bit too much," he rasped out. "I'm not signing any more autographs or anything."

"Wait!" The girl had a deep, husky, attractive voice. She darted past him and drew the blinds over the window. "Someone on the promenade deck might see me."

"Now, it's no use trying that sort of gag on me—they're old," Philip cried. "I'll be obliged if you'll get out, madame, and leave me in peace."

"They're watching." The girl peered round the curtain. "Have you a gun?"

"No, I haven't a gun. I don't want a gun! I came here to get away from guns!"

"I'm frightened." The girl gazed at him appealingly. "They are desperate men. If you helped me they might get you, too, and I wouldn't want that. Guess it's no good fighting, I must face—" The girl swayed, put her hand to her forehead and crashed in a heap to the floor.

"Oh, lady, have a heart," moaned Philip, lifting the still figure to a couch. "Why did you do this to me? I'm on a vacation." He shook her and became convinced that it was a real faint. He hastened into his bed-room for a flask of brandy.

"That finishes it!" cried Philip Trent and pushed the contract aside. "I've reached my limit!"

March 27th, 1937.

Directly Philip had gone the beautiful blonde returned to life, and after looking round to see if she were observed, smiled mischievously. Noiselessly she slipped from the couch, and from a small desk picked up a steel paper-cutter that was not unlike a dagger. Several papers she scattered on the floor.

When Philip came back into the room the girl had gone.

"Darn the girl," he muttered, and not knowing what to do with the brandy, decided it would cheer him up to drink it. It was then that he noticed the papers by his desk. He went across. No, nothing seemed to be missing. He tried to visualise the desk before he had placed some of his papers there—how about the paper-knife that the studio staff had given him at Christmas? Gone!

Exasperated, Philip rubbed his chin in perplexity. He supposed the woman was some souvenir-hunter. He glanced up and saw a shadow on his curtains. It was a woman's shadow, and she seemed to be holding a knife in her hand. He jumped for the cabin door and dragged it open.

Sure enough there was the girl, darting along the deck. The moon was shining and he saw her clearly. Most of the passengers were dining, so there was no one promenading. Philip went after her and saw her open a state-room door. He was wondering what he ought to do when there came from within the cabin a hoarse scream, and a moment later the door was flung open. The girl appeared, and in her hand was the knife; she ran to the rail and threw it overboard. He watched her run along the deck and vanish from sight.

What should he do? He decided that he would look into State-room 41. He entered and stumbled over some object. His groping hand found a switch and snapped on the light.

On the floor was stretched the body of an ugly, wizened little man. His coat was open and the white shirt had an ugly red patch in the region of the heart.

Philip backed away from that still figure. He locked the state-room door and hastened to find the captain. An officer informed him that the captain was probably at dinner. Philip hastened to the dining-saloon.

Murder

IN the cocktail bar three men were enjoying a drink. The tall, upright man with the weather-tanned face and pleasant smile was Captain Bromley, the gaunt, lined man with the hard, cynical mouth was Van Mier, the financier and the big, heavy-jowled, coarse specimen in the ill-fitting dinner suit was Sergeant Donovan, detective and bodyguard.

"I'm trying to tell him, captain, that it would be a whole lot better off in the ship's safe," argued Donovan, "than in his pocket."

"Oh, you American detectives." Van Mier's lips curled in the usual sneer. "They're sent to make you feel easy; instead they make you feel nervous."

"But I was hired to guard you, wasn't I?" The detective was quite nasty in his tone. "You should take my advice." "All right—all right," testily answered the millionaire, "I shall do whatever you think best."

"I think Donovan's right," spoke the captain. "I shouldn't care to carry anything worth a fortune in my pocket. I'll call the purser for you."

"Oh, captain, may I speak to you a moment?" Philip met the officer as he was leaving the bar.

March 27th, 1937.

Donovan, leaning against the bar rail, pointed out Philip to Van Mier and explained that it was a famous film star.

The captain listened with amazement to Trent's story, then he turned and beckoned.

"Sergeant, come here a moment, please."

Donovan turned to Van Mier. "Looks like some trouble. You stay right here. Don't go away—they're queer folk on most ships. I want to find you here when I get back."

Sergeant Donovan went across and heard Trent's story, then the three men hastened away.

Van Mier, who was consumed with curiosity, might have followed them if a short, thickset man had not appeared and touched his arm.

"The sergeant asked you to stay here, sir," he murmured in servile tones.

Van Mier glared angrily at his manservant.

"All right, Williams. Listen, the man that went out with the captain is Philip Trent. My little granddaughter would love to have his autograph for her album. Try and get it."

"Very good, sir, certainly, sir, I'll go at once, sir," Williams backed politely. As he hurried away he bumped into Mrs. Kinney and her insignificant husband. He upset her drink:

"Pardon, madam—purely an accident—the ship lurched."

"Don't try to make excuses," sniffed Mrs. Kinney, who had been supporting the bar too long. "You're soused."

The dapper little valet glared, seemed on the point of retorting, remembered his position, and hastened away.

On reaching the door of State-room 41 Philip turned to the captain.

"I locked the door so that no one would slip in and destroy the evidence," he said, and unlocked the door.

The floor of the state-room was normal; in other words the corpse had vanished. Captain Bromley listened with grave displeasure to Philip's frenzied statement that he had seen a bloodstained body on the floor.

"A ship's no place to pull Hollywood jokes," he cried after a quick inspection of the room. "Mr. Trent, take my advice. Go to bed quietly and sleep this off." The officer glanced at the detective. "I'll get the purser—you go back to Van Mier."

When the captain had left Donovan would have followed.

"Wait, sergeant, I haven't been drinking. I know I saw a body."

"Yeah, you're telling me!" sneered Donovan. "Just what you do in all your pictures. Selby James, amateur detective, always kidding the force—making saps out of the police. Why, he's nothing but a swelled-head jackass. And you're a bigger jackass to play him."

"You're completely right," Philip smiled. "But you've got the wrong man. You want Peter Dean."

"Who's he?"

"The nit-wit that writes that junk I've been playing. The blighter that blighted my life. A person I'd like to choke with his own whiskers."

"Sorry to disappoint you," interrupted a cool voice. "But I haven't any whiskers."

Philip gazed round-eyed at the beautiful young woman who entered the state-room. He recognised her at once. Now her hair was brown—she had worn a blonde wig.

"Who are you?" Philip managed to stammer out.

"Peter Dean," was her answer, and the girl laughed merrily.

"Yeah, and how did you like the first chapter in 'Murder in the Mud Bath'?"

came a jeering, triumphant voice, and the voice belonged to Mert Morgan.

Philip went very red.

"I get it," he rapped out. "You two figured you could chisel me into liking it."

"Yeah, listen to this front-page stuff!" shouted Mert. "'Trent true to form—screen star and author solve steamship mystery.'"

Donovan thrust himself forward.

"What is this?" he demanded fiercely. "A publicity stunt?" He saw Mert's grin, and he turned on Trent. "So you're up to your old tricks again, eh? Trying to make fools of the police. Why, I'd like—"

Donovan gaped as a little man appeared from the bathroom.

"Are you through with me, miss?" he asked.

"Pardon me!" laughed Peter Dean. "While I pay off the corpse."

"The captain ought to have all of you chucked off this ship!" Donovan shouted. "And I'd like to carry out the job. Pah!"

"Take Cokey Joe for a drink," hinted Peter Dean to Mert. "We'll see you later."

Philip Trent eyed the beautiful girl with ill-concealed anger. He was just thinking of all the things he could have said if she had been a man.

"Don't look so mad!" She shook with laughter. "You know you're not really mad. You're glad to find I'm a woman, but you just won't admit it."

"You win, Pete." He held out his hand. "And I like you much better with your own hair. Also I like the way your eyes are put in, and that gown you wear. How about taking a drink?"

They strolled along the deck.

"The great mystery to me"—Philip had her arm tucked through his—"is how anyone so delectable could write such tripe?"

"Tripe?"

"Tripe! I've been waiting for three years for this moment to look you in the eye and to tell you that your books are idiotic—your characters so asinine."

"They've made me a lot of money, sir."

"That's just it. You ought to be ashamed to take money for anything so contrived—so grotesque and incredible. You know—" A cabin door had opened, and a little woman darted out, causing them both to start. "Here, I say, what's the matter?"

The little woman, whom they could see was an Oriental and wearing some sort of heavy silken garment, brushed past them. A second later another woman darted out, and caught her near the rail. She was attired in the dress of a servant.

"Let me go—let me go!" they heard the woman say.

Then followed the servant's voice in some tongue they did not understand. The woman capitulated, and the two hastened back into the cabin, the door slammed.

"Well, how's that for mystery?" chuckled the girl. "The woman from the East."

"Stop it, or I'll throw you overboard," warned Philip, as they resumed their walk. "A drink is what we need, and then perhaps we might dine together."

So they wine and dined, and strolled in the moonlight talking of themselves mostly. It grew late.

"I left my bag in your room," Peter said at last.

"Let's go and get it." Arm-in-arm they made their way leisurely towards his state-room. "That's funny," Philip said a few moments later.

"What's funny?"

"I thought I left my lights on. Perhaps I didn't." He took out his key. "Hallo, the door's open."

Philip stepped inside and stumbled over something. He felt for a light. On the floor was stretched a body.

"Listen, public enemy." Philip turned on the girl. "Aren't you getting a bit repetitious?"

The girl stared down at the gaunt man stretched on the floor. She pushed past Trent and knelt. Gingerly she felt the hand, and then started to her feet.

"Philip, he's dead!"
"Madam, your second chapter is getting worse than the first." Philip was indignant. "Here, give him his thirty dollars and tell him to clear out."

"No, no, no!" The girl clutched at his coat. "Can't you see this is no joke? Look at his face—that's blood—real blood—on his shirt-front."

"You mean—this—" Philip gasped, and then knelt beside the still figure. It was then that he saw a terrible wound. He was white and shaken when he got to his feet. "Come on, let's get out of here." He took her arm.

"Who do you suppose it is?"
"Don't know," he answered. "I'll call the captain. Listen, I'm taking no chance with this corpse disappearing, so would you mind waiting here—I'll be right back."

Peter Dean closed her eyes to shut out the sight of that still, dreadful figure.

The Mystery Thickens

PHILIP raced down a companionway and through the glass walls of the cocktail bar saw the bulky figure of the detective.

"Sergeant, come quickly, there's a dead man in my state-room!"

"You don't try that gag, sonny, twice."

"Listen, this is on the level, and it's not the same man!" gasped Trent. "He's got a bald head, gaunt, wispy moustache—the man I saw you talking to with the captain."

"Van Mier? You're crazy. Why, I told him—" Donovan spun round. "He should have stayed here, but—" He broke off to grip Philip's arm. "All right, let's go, but if this is a jape you'll spend the rest of this trip in irons."

Donovan fetched the captain, who protested against being disturbed from a quiet rest. They hastened to the state-room.

The detective knelt by the body. "It's Van Mier," he shouted. "He's dead! He's been stabbed!"

Philip was just in time to put an arm round Peter Dean, who looked like collapsing.

Donovan was fumbling in the dead man's pockets.

"The Dragon!" he yelled out. "It's gone!"

Peter Dean and Philip Trent then heard that Van Mier had been carrying in his pocket a diamond emblem known as the White Dragon, and that it was worth a fortune.

The captain summoned one of his officers. The passengers and crew must be searched at once.

The search for the missing diamond was still going on when Philip suggested that Peter Dean stroll on the deck for some air, as she was still looking pale.

"I've never seen a dead body before," she confessed.

"I wonder why she was in such a hurry, and what he said to her?" was Philip's curious answer.

"Who are you talking about?"
"That Chinese woman we saw." He squared his shoulders. "Here, let's forget it. They've got a dick on board,

"No, no, no!"
cried the girl.
"Can't you see this is no joke? Look at his face—that's blood—on his shirt-front!"

so let him run down clues; besides, I'm on a holiday."

"It's cold—let's go down," Peter murmured after a while.

"We'll have a nightcap," he suggested. "Do us good."

Scarcely had they ordered their drinks when an almond-eyed woman came into the room, and with little steps moved quietly up to the bar. She was dressed in the clothes of a Chinese servant, but the richness of the material denoted the master or mistress to be someone of importance.

"Glass sherry. Hurry, please," she whispered. "Honourable lady feel faint. Ning take it to her." She took the glass. "Charge, please, suite 'R.'"

"That's the servant woman we saw," hissed Philip to his beautiful companion. "Let's follow her."

As a result of what Philip had to report, an investigation was held the next day in the captain's state-room. Those present included Peter Dean, Philip Trent, Donovan, the captain, his first officer, Mert Morgan and the two Chinese women. Li Tai was the name of the mistress, and Ning was her servant.

Donovan was doing the questioning. "So you say, madam, that you've never met Van Mier, eh?" The detective held out a white card. "Then how did this happen to be found in your luggage? I'll read it. 'Mynheer Henrich van Mier invites you to a private showing of the famous diamond, the White Dragon, at Carillon's, Jewellers, 19, Reeves Street, San Francisco, on the 13th of September.' Explain that."

"There is nothing strange about that." The woman faced the questioner fearlessly. Her English was perfect. "My husband had made an offer to Mynheer van Mier for the diamond. He desired to give it to me for a birthday present."

"But Van Mier told me it wasn't for sale," interposed Captain Bromley.

"That I know nothing about."

"What's your husband's business?" demanded Donovan.

"My husband is Mr. Li Yat."

"Li Yat, the actor?" questioned Philip. "The Oriental star that's playing in San Francisco?"

The woman bowed and watched Philip through half-closed eyes.

"What were you doing at night on the deck when we saw you?" the film star asked. "Why were you so distressed?"

"My bracelet. I had just discovered it was lost."

"But you found it again?"
"By great good fortune a strange gentleman found it for me."

"Would you know him again if you saw him?" shouted the blustering Donovan.

"Could you describe him?" prompted Philip.

"Hey, you stay outa this!" Donovan cried. "What are you doing—playing the cop in one of her trashy novels?"

"That remark is quite uncalled for," blazed Peter Dean.

"Third-degree methods," scoffed Philip.

"Shut up!" raged Donovan. "And quit butting in."

"You're right, sergeant." Philip straightened his back. "It's none of my business. Thanks for calling my attention to it. Good-morning!"

As Philip opened the door a short, squat figure stumbled forward—Philip wondered for the moment if the valet of the dead man had been listening.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Williams.

"Don't mention it." Philip stood to one side. "Come right in—the more the merrier!"

The servant woman jumped to her feet and pointed a lean finger.

"That man! He man found my lady's bracelet!"

"You're Van Mier's valet?" Donovan glowered at Williams. "Why didn't you tell me you'd found the bracelet?"

"Excuse me, sir"—Williams shrank back—"I'm—I'm very nervous, sir. This murder has unnerved me. Would you please not—not bellow?"

Donovan was opening his mouth to start yelling when there came an urgent rapping on the door. The captain opened it to find Mrs. Kinney in a great state of distress.

"Oh, captain, captain," she wailed, ringing her hands together, "I saw it with my own eyes!"

"What did you see?" The captain was furious at the interruption.

"I passed Mr. Trent's cabin, and the door was open." Mrs. Kinney gave a sickly smile. "I took a little peep. There were two men there, in the bathroom, but I only glimpsed their shadows. I saw a large black hand, and heard a voice say: 'The bloodstained hand!' Then I ran, captain."

"Come on, everybody!" yelled Philip, and led the way.

Donovan and Philip were first into the cabin. The detective had a gun.

"Come outa there!" he thundered.

The bath-room door opened and there was Mert and his cameraman, Hymie.

"Master mind unmask murderer," cried Mert, and looked at the gun.

"Here, put that away."

"What are you raving about?"

"I figured the guy what did the shooting must have hid in here." Mert pointed to the bath-room. "We found his hand-print on the wall. So I got Hymie to take some pictures. Look at it—there's no charge."

"Onta my way!" roared Donovan.

There, on the wall, was a hand-print.

"By gosh, the man who made this had a scar across his palm!" cried Philip.

"Yes, and the man I paid to play dead had a scarred hand just like that," Peter Dean exclaimed.

"Who is he?" Donovan wanted to know.

"I got him for Miss Dean," explained Mert. "He's a small-part player from the studio; his name's Larkin. They use him for dopes and corpses."

"Larkin is one of his many names," sneered Donovan. "That's 'Cokey' Joe Ferris. His racket is playing in a picture until he gets a line on the star's jewellery. All you folk clear outa here. Captain, send Cokey Joe to me, and I'll handle him."

Donovan's methods of getting Cokey Joe to talk were brutal. He slammed a big hand to the little man's face and then shook him till his teeth rattled.

"Now spill it!" he ordered. "Where is the White Dragon diamond?"

"I don't know anything about the diamond," Cokey Joe cowered in a chair. "I took the job playing corpse because it gave me a chance at Trent's belongings."

"Do you expect me to believe that, you rat?"

"It's the truth. I was going through his bags, somebody knocked, so I hid in the bath-room. Then the Dutch guy came in and went across the room and knocked on the bed-room door. Then I heard a sort of groan and then an awful thud like somebody falling. I heard somebody and then there was silence. I couldn't get the bath-room door open, and I cut my hand doing it. I did it in the end. There was the body stretched on the floor. I hopped it."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"And get pinched for doing the man in—not likely."

"Anything else?"

"Yeah, I nearly forgot," Ferris cried. "I hid on the deck to hear what would happen. Not long afterwards Trent and that Dean dame came along and found the body."

March 27th, 1937.

"They might have searched the body and found the diamond," Donovan pondered the point. "All right, Cokey, you can go; but take my tip and stick around where I can find you."

Donovan was taking a survey of the state-room when he heard excited voices outside. He dragged open the door. Outside was Morgan, Trent, and Peter Dean.

"Donovan, I've got it all figured out. Pete and Trent committed the murder."

"The blithering idiot has gone crazy!" shouted Philip.

"Come in here," ordered Donovan. "We don't want the whole ship listening. Now spill it."

"You know Pete brought Cokey on board. Trent enticed Van Mier to this room. They framed that bloodstain to pin it on Cokey. They found the body, and by the time you got there the diamond was gone." Mert grinned.

"How does that read?"

"Why make me a crook?" complained Philip.

"Grand—grand!" Mert darted to the door. "Hymie, come in and fix your camera."

"Is this another publicity gag?" belted Donovan, the veins in his thick neck standing out like whipcords.

"Nothing else but," chuckled the publicity man. "You get headlines when you get arrested, and you'll get more headlines when you can prove you're innocent." He rubbed his hands.

"Donovan, you got some handcuffs? Now I want Hymie to take a picture as you're slipping 'em on the suspected pair."

Donovan strode up to little Hymie and took him by the scruff of the neck. He hurled Hymie and camera out of the room.

"Shut up!" he roared at Mert, as the latter would have spoken. "I've had enough of you people messing things up with your fool publicity stunts. All three of you are in this, and I'm fixing it so you keep quiet for a spell, while I straighten this killing out." He took out the handcuffs. "Stick out your left hand, Trent, and you the right, Dean."

"What are you going to do?"

shouted Philip. "You can't—"

"Can't I?" mocked Donovan, and he proceeded to handcuff the left hand of the film star to the right hand of the famous authoress. "That's settled you two. Now"—he leered at Morgan—"I'm going to fix you so you can't try any tricks." He proceeded to lock the publicity man in the bath-room.

"I could have you fired off the force for this!" Philip protested when Donovan prepared to leave.

"It'll be worth it to have a few hours when you weren't in my hair," chuckled Donovan.

"You haven't got any hair!" retorted Philip, gazing at the detective's large bald head.

"One day I'll leave you overboard!" Donovan cried, and went out, locking the door behind him.

The Masked Man

"I'M going to ring for the captain and get out of here," Peter said in a whisper.

"What's the hurry?" chuckled Philip. "So far, this seems the best moment of this mad holiday of mine. I've become attached to you in more ways than one. Don't you feel a strong link between us?"

"Perhaps I shouldn't confess it, but I find it hard to tear myself away," laughed Peter Dean. "You know, Philip, this would make a swell story, but it wants a new twist—more menace or something."

"Stay quiet!" came a harsh voice.

They jumped round. Covering them with a nasty-looking gun was a man whose features were concealed by a black hood, with slits for the eyes in it. They gleamed balefully at the two dumbfounded prisoners.

"How did you get in here?"

"Through the bed-room," came the answer. "How I got there doesn't concern you. Come across with that diamond!"

"We haven't got any diamond," answered Philip.

"Don't pull that on me." The masked man came closer. "You came in here just after I bumped him off, didn't you?"

"So you murdered him?" coolly stated Philip.

"Sure, and you got the diamond. Ain't nobody else coulda took it, and you're gonna hand it over to me if I have to kill you!"

"You can kill both of us, but you won't find your diamond." Philip tried to get a good look at those gleaming eyes. "Why didn't you take the diamond when you bumped off Van Mier?"

"No time."

"I see." The star considered this for a moment. "You seem to know more of this crime than anyone else—Why did Van Mier come to see me?"

"Maybe he wanted your picture or autograph or a lock of your hair," sneered the masked gunman. "Now stop asking fool questions and hand over that diamond."

"But I haven't got it."

"I'm going to count three and then I shoot!" The gun shook in a gloved hand. "Hand over the Dragon!"

"You can count a hundred, but I haven't got the diamond." Philip took out a cigar with his free hand from a box. It was Peter Dean who struck a match with her free hand and helped light the cigar. All the while she was watching Philip and trying to read his thoughts.

"One—"

"One moment," interrupted Philip. "I mean I haven't the diamond, but I see no sense in being shot because you think I'm a liar." He stood up, and Peter did the same. "We will raise our arms and you can search for yourself. After which we will take you on a Cook's tour of this apartment, and we will open any boxes or bags for your inspection."

"Okay, but don't try any funny business," the masked man answered. "Seems you've got the diamond hidden in this room. Best show me where."

"Very well, I'll show you." Philip gave the girl a slight wink and managed to move so that he shielded her from view. She managed to pick up a heavy paper-weight. The star then moved towards his desk. Peter saw him look at the light switch.

Philip bent over the desk and tugged at a drawer.

"Sorry, can't get it open with one hand." He stood back. "It's in that drawer."

"Outa my light!" cried the masked man.

It was then that Philip managed to get his hands to the lights and switch them off. The masked man turned with a snarl of rage and, seeing the gleaming cigar, fired. Then Peter threw the paper-weight.

When Donovan, Captain Bromley and some of his officers burst into the room and switched on the lights they found Peter Dean kneeling beside an unconscious Philip Trent.

"I hit the wrong man," she sobbed. Furious banging on the bath-room door effected the release of Mert Morgan.

"A joke's a joke," raged the publicity man, and stabbed a finger at Donovan. "But that fat slab stuck me in there, so that some other mug could pot at me. A shot missed my ear by inches." "What a pity," retorted Donovan.

Captain Bromley stated, on hearing the story of Philip Trent and Peter Dean, that it all sounded very much like publicity to him, and if he could prove it he would have them sent to prison for years.

After Donovan had taken off the handcuffs and the doctor had patched up the stunned Philip, very little happened for the rest of that day, though Philip much mystified the wireless operator by dispatching a long radiogram.

Some time before midnight, Captain Bromley sent for Donovan and informed him that it would be impossible for anyone to smuggle the diamond ashore, as the San Francisco police had an X-ray machine at the dock, which meant that no one left the ship without a fluoroscope examination.

The White Dragon

IN the morning it was Williams who brought Philip, whose head still ached, a cup of tea.

"I was wondering, sir, if I might be of assistance," murmured the valet. "Unfortunate circumstances have deprived me of a master, and as you seem, sir, to have had rather a harrowing time, I wondered if I might, sir, be of assistance to you?"

"You're hired for the rest of the trip," sleepily murmured Philip.

"Thank you, sir," Williams bowed his thanks. "There's a radiogram for you, sir."

Philip woke up at once, and as a result of the contents of the radiogram, dressed and sought out Madame Li Tai.

"Yes, the Dragon did belong to my family," she admitted on questioning. "It was stolen during the Boxer Rebellion. Years later it turned up, and Mynheer van Mier bought it before we knew it was found."

"And he asked you more money than you could pay? So you tried to get it another way?"

"No! No!" the Chinese woman cried fiercely. "By what right do you question me? It is none of your business. You are not of the police. You are just a picture actor."

Peter Dean had invited Philip and Mert to have breakfast in her state-room, and over the repast Philip told her of his rebuke by Li Tai.

"You got a lot out of that," laughed Peter, and was still chuckling when Donovan appeared.

"I hear you've been at it again—questioning Madame Li Tai," cried the detective. "Why don't you keep quiet?"

"Have a scrambled egg, old boy?" Philip was not upset. "You look a bit thoughtful this morning. Anything on your mind?"

"Maybe," Donovan fingered his thick chin. "It may interest you folk to know that I got a confession out of Cokey Joe last night. He told me where he hid the diamond."

"What!" gasped his audience. "Yeah! I thought he had it, and here it is." Donovan took a small case from his pocket and clicked it open.

They left their breakfast to gape at the White Dragon—it glittered with diamonds, large and small.

"I'd murder a man myself for that," cried Peter.

"I believe you would," said Philip.

"How would you like to get credit for finding it?" Donovan asked the star pointedly.

Philip was suspicious.

"What's the catch?"

"Mr. Trent, as soon as we arrive, the San Francisco police will take this case over. The best I can get is a little publicity. I'd rather have two thousand dollars for my family."

"Sorry, no sale."

"Why not?" argued Peter. "There's no harm in it. The police'll get the diamond just the same."

"Phil, it's a million dollars' worth of publicity for two grand," excitedly exclaimed Mert Morgan. "Selby James recovers the White Diamond—unravel's baffling mystery of the seas—risks life to—"

"Shut up!" snapped Philip. "I'm not interested."

As Philip walked over to a sideboard to replenish his plate, Peter Dean had a daring idea. Like Mert, she was a great believer in publicity.

"Bring me that diamond before we go ashore and I'll give you two thousand," she whispered. "You leave this to Mert and myself to handle. Now get out before he gets suspicious."

"You're the first writer I've ever met that had brains," hissed Mert, who had overheard the plot. "I'll bust this in every paper before the boat lands. He'll have to go through with it."

When the boat docked, the first person aboard was Chief Gibbs, of the Department of Investigation.

One of the first persons to greet him was Mert Morgan.

"How are you, chief?"

"Hallo!" Gibbs eyed the publicity man—he had met him before.

"I hear you plan to X-ray everybody," Mert said with a great grin. "Don't waste a lot of time, chief. Trent has got the diamond. I'll take you to the captain's cabin—they're all there."

Naturally Gibbs was accompanied by several other officers and quite a crowd of reporters. Some of them managed to get into the captain's cabin, and Philip was astounded when one of them came up to him.

"Give us an exclusive story, Mr. Trent. Where did you find the diamond?"

"Have you got any line on the murderer?" Another reporter got in a question.

Philip opened the case and took out—a piece of coal!

"Say, where did you fellows get all this drivin' from?" Philip frowned. "I never found any diamond or solved any murder."

"That's just his modesty," spoke Peter Dean, very close to Philip's side and one hand in his jacket pocket. "He doesn't want to take credit for it."

"He hates publicity worse than he hates poison," Mert Morgan was all grins.

"I'll brain you—if that's possible!" angrily cried the star. "I wish you'd all leave me alone."

"Fine work, fine work!" boomed the voice of Chief Gibbs, who had managed at last to get across the room. "I've told the captain to dismiss the passengers as there'll be no X-ray examination. Smart work, Trent."

"What is all this?" Philip demanded, and a startled look came into his eyes as Mert pushed forward Hymie and his camera. "Now what's the gag?"

"I want a picture of you handing over the diamond to the chief," answered Mert. "Take it out of your pocket, Phil, and give it to the chief."

The triumph in the publicity man's eyes made Philip even more suspicious. He put his hands in his pockets and then he felt the diamond. Slowly he took it out, and there was loud handclapping. He would have liked to have murdered Mert there and then—another cursed publicity frame-up. Philip realised that he could not do or say anything; afterwards he promised himself the pleasure of socking Mert Morgan.

Chief Gibbs had no objection to having his picture taken, and some time was wasted before Mert was satisfied with the pictures he had secured.

"One last picture, Phil, of you taking the diamond out of the case," he begged.

Philip opened the case and took out not the White Dragon, but a piece of coal.

What an uproar! Everybody talking and shouting at once. Finally Chief Gibbs obtained order and heard from Peter Dean how she had paid Donovan two thousand dollars only a few minutes before the ship docked, and that she had done it to help Philip Trent. She had put the case in his pocket.

"You've got to find Donovan—he's got the diamond!" she cried.

An officer pushed through the crowd. "Sir, a message from the Los Angeles police—urgent!"

Chief Gibbs read it out:

"Body of Sergeant Donovan found floating in San Pedro Harbour. Believe his murderer impersonating him on board s.s. Brunel.—NOLAN, Chief of Los Angeles Police Department."

He folded the message.

"He murdered Vai Mier."

"I don't think so," said Peter. "But he did get the diamond."

Cokey Joe Talks

PHILIP TRENT sat at a table in the sitting-room of his suite at the Hotel Splendid. He was busy playing patience. Standing behind him was Kelvin, who had flown from Hollywood. Sitting in a chair and looking far from happy was Peter Dean. Leaning against a mantelpiece and scowling was Mert Morgan.

There had been a spot of bother. Kelvin was hoarse from shouting at them. "Trent Fooled by Fake Sleuth!" "Trent Victim of Hoax!" "Movie Star Flops in Real Life Mystery!" How could he start another Selby James pic—ture when the papers had headlines like these? All the while he shouted and raved Philip played patience.

"Why can't you say something?" Kelvin bellowed.
