"I will!" Philip placed a Jack on a Queen, and then looked up at his audience. "You, Kelvin, almost wept when I went on vacation, and, I presume, conspired with Miss Dean and Mert to get me back in your toils. A fake crime of the 'Murder in the Mud Bath' was staged for my benefit, and act one went mostly according to plan. Then a real stiff came into act two, and that upset all your plans. It wouldn't have been so bad if Mert hadn't tried to get a publicity angle on the affair, but he not only tried, but concocted situations to bring me more in the public eye. He succeeded with a vengeance, and then Peter Dean has to try some of this chief publicity racket. I know she is sorry, and I've told her there's nothing to forgive. I'm glad"—Philip jumped up—"and I'll tell you why. This has killed this Selby James business for ever. That it has probably finished me makes no great difference, because I can always go round with a circus on show as the prize mug. You, Kelvin, have told me I'm through, you've insulted Miss Dean, and you've no more business here!" He pointed to the door. "We'll call off our contract and you can get out!"

"That's okay with me!" Kelvin cried.

"Now that everything is settled, go before my patience works out and I leave this patience to sock you! Imshi!" He pointed authoritatively. "That is an Eastern expression meaning to go and quickly."

Ben Kelvin opened the door and fell over a body.

"There's a man here!" cried Kelvin. "He looks dead—he's been struck on the head!"

"It's Cokey Joe!" gasped Philip. "The murderer must have found he was going to spill something, and followed him."

Ben Kelvin, who had no real intention of severing his connection with Trent, pushed the star, Peter and Mert back into the room. He closed the door.

"I'm going to 'phone the police," said Philip.

"No!" Kelvin gripped his arm. "You can't afford to have another body discovered in your room. We've got to get rid of it."

"Are you proposing that we destroy or hide this body?" demanded Philip. "Just so it won't upset my value with the public, so you can go on turning out your cheap thrillers and other slush? Well, there's nothing doing. The police are going to hear about this. If I can't 'phone them, then I'll fetch them."

Philip jerked open the door and reeled back—the body of Cokey Joe had vanished.

The three men went huddling down some stairs to see if there was any sign of the corpse. Peter was about to follow, then there came a tinkle on the 'phone.

"Hallo! Yes?"

"Linen-room—down hall—come quick—nobody else—just you!" croaked a voice—the voice of Cokey Joe.

"No sign of him," panted Philip, when the three men got back. "Did I hear the 'phone?"

"Just a C.O.D. package," answered the girl. "I'll be right back."

In the linen-room she found Cokey Joe. The little crook was white and shaken and had a terrible bruise on his forehead.

"Didn't see who it was," Joe stammered out in weak tones. "Just crept up behind and hit me on the head."

"Why did you disappear?" "Heard Trent saying he was going to call the cops."

"I'm calling a doctor." "No, stay here." Weakly he put out a hand to detain her. "Stay here—must tell you—Donovan sent for me—afraid to go out—offered to split if I'd help him sell Dragon."

"To Madame Li Tai?" questioned the girl.

"Yes," Cokey Joe answered. "Fraid of Donovan—had egg. So came to you."

"Where is Donovan?" "Hiding in Chinatown. Wanted me to have Madame Li Tai 'phone him seven o'clock to-night."

"Give me his 'phone number." Peter Dean tore off a strip of sheet and bound up his head. "And I'll see that there's no trouble for you with the police. There's a reward out for the capture of Donovan and the recovery of the Dragon—I'll see you get your share."

Philip got rid of Kelvin and Morgan and finished his game of patience. Against his will he had been persuaded not to 'phone the police. Why wasn't Peter here for him to ask her advice? She had a suite in the hotel, and he decided to go along and see why she had not come back.

Her door was slightly ajar and he was about to knock when he heard her voice, but speaking in broken English.

"Yes, yes; this is Madame Li Tai speaking. Is this Mr. Donovan? Good. I received your message and am most happy of the news."

Philip opened the door a little wider. "Is it true you are willing to sell me the Dragon?"

Brazenly Philip entered the room and Peter Dean gave him a startled glance. He nodded his approval.

"You will sell. Very good." She held the receiver away so that Philip could also hear Donovan's gruff tones.

"Sure, I'm ready to sell. A hundred thousand. You got the money, I know, because that's what your husband offered Van Mier."

"I am most willing to pay the money," lisped Peter Dean. "You will have the man—Mr. Cokey Joe—bring the diamond to me, yes?"

"I don't trust that dope—I'll have to take a chance myself."

"Where is safe place I may meet you?" answered Peter.

"I'll meet you outside the Union Terminal at eleven to-night."

Philip took the 'phone from Peter.

"Hallo! This is Li Yat speaking," he said in silky tones. "The husband of Madame Li Tai. My wife, she has told me everything. Naturally we are anxious to avoid the police, but what you suggest is not safe. Excuse, please. I speak to my wife."

Philip kept his hand over the mouth-piece.

"Terminal's too open—easy for him to make a getaway. We've got to get this diamond back, and no more mistakes."

"Don't keep him waiting too long," she warned.

"Very sorry, Mister Donovan, we keep you waiting," purred Philip.

"Cut out the gab, I'm in a hurry," came back the snarling tones of the crook. "What about the Chinese Theatre? You're playing there to-night, aren't you?"

"Very good, Mr. Donovan. Chinese Theatre, prop. room, ten o'clock. That is most convenient for me."

"Okay for me. Don't forget the dough."

"No, no, me not forget. Good health, Mr. Donovan," Philip cried, and rang off.

"Now we'll get him," enthused Peter. "Come here!" Philip grabbed her. "What do you mean by trying to put this Madame Li Tai stuff over on Donovan? Wanting to play a lone hand?"

"I thought you weren't interested." "I'm interested in two things at the present moment," Philip drew her on to his knee. "One thing is to get back that diamond, and—"

"The other is?"

"To get a most annoying but alluring young woman to marry me. She'd be safer married to me."

"Get me the diamond—prove that you can be a great detective—and I'll consider the question of marriage."

Another Killing

ON the stage of the Chinese theatre a weird dragon was gambolling about and a number of Chinese women and children were backing away in terror. The dragon spurted fire from a large mouth and looked like an ungainly centipede. In the scene carried a number of soldiers wearing a curious assortment of armour and all armed with swords. They tried to kill the dragon, but his fiery breath drove them back. Finally, a tall Chinaman, in armour that gleamed, leapt into the scene, and with a few passes of his very long sword slew the dragon.

Li Yat, having executed a number of motions with the sword, bowed to an enthusiastic audience and retired to his dressing-room to prepare for the next act.

The time was exactly ten o'clock.

Out of the shadows slunk the figure of Donovan. He glanced round to see if he were observed and came to some dirty stone steps that led down to the prop room that ran underneath the stage of the Chinese theatre.

A few minutes later a taxi pulled up in this side street and it unloaded quite a crowd. Peter Dean, Philip, Williams, Mert and Hymie.

"Here we are," Philip marshalled his small army. "If we can't settle this business we are going to look rather foolish, so there must be no mistakes. Williams!"

"Yes, sir?" The valet did not seem to relish his surroundings.

"Go down those steps and find out where the property-room is."

"Oh, no, sir, if you don't mind, sir." Williams looked as if he might bolt. "I'd rather not, sir. The property-room, sir, is below the stairs. A fortune-teller prophesied that I might die underground, sir."

"I can't stand cowards, Williams," snapped Philip. "So if you want to stay with me go and find that room. Mert, pay off the taxi."

Williams went to the top of the stairs, hesitated, and then vanished from sight.

"What's the next move?" questioned Peter Dean.

"Williams should be back any moment," Philip answered. "I told him on the way that he had to find the property-room and report back to me. I thought at the time he looked a bit scared. We'll give him no more than three minutes."

Three minutes passed and then the conspirators crept down the steps and found a wooden door, which opened to Philip's touch. They saw a passage lit with an old lantern. They tiptoed along and there was no sound down here, though one could hear feet shuffling on the boards upstairs.

"Don't you think we should get some cops around here in case there's something phoney?" Mert said in a hoarse whisper.

"No, they'd only gun things up," retorted Philip.

"And if there's gumming up to be done he wants to do it himself," mocked Peter Dean.

"Help—help!" came a faint cry, very close at hand.

When Li Yat entered his dressing-room his wife was waiting for him. She held out a note.

"Hurry, hurry," she cried in Chinese.

"Here is a paper—see what it says."

"Quiet, please," Li Yat spoke sharply as he took the note. "English is better—too many long ears."

The Chinaman opened the note, and after a slight pause read it out aloud:

"Meet you in prop-room at ten o'clock as agreed. If you want the diamond bring the money and keep your mouth shut.—Donovan." He folded the note slowly. "Who brought you the note?"

"It was handed to Ning."

"There may be much trouble in this," Li Yat stated, as he divested himself of his armour.

"But I must get the Dragon back!" cried his wife.

"You have wished for the Dragon and Van Mier is dead. It is not good."

"I did not want the man to kill him—only to get the diamonds." Li Yat donned a gorgeous silk kimono, and from a drawer took a curious mask that made his face look like that of a dead man. He looked at his wife in his expressionless way before donning the mask. "From now on you will leave this to me," he stated.

The four in the corridor pulled up at the sound of those faint cries. Seeing a door, Philip did not hesitate to push it open. It was the prop-room. There were weird headdresses, suits of armour, many swords and spears, and a great deal of old scenery.

"Keep cool," Philip advised those behind him. "It sounded like Williams' voice."

"Help—help!" came the call.

They found Williams sitting on the floor of a small cellar. He was nursing his head.

"What's the matter? Are you hurt?"

"He was here," Williams staggered to his feet. "I heard footsteps, and as I turned he struck me. I fell down—he ran—I couldn't see his face."

"What are you talking about?"

"The murderer, sir. I'm sure it was. He had a black handkerchief, sir." Williams pointed to a door out of the cellar. "He went that way, sir." Suddenly he put his hands to his forehead. "Oh, my head—my head."

Philip shot out an arm, because the man looked like falling.

Mert suddenly grabbed at Philip and pointed to another door.

"What's that?"

"What's what?"

There sprawled on the floor was the body of Donovan.

"On the floor!"
"If I were writing this," said the cool voice of Peter Dean, "I'd say it was blood."

"It is blood," Philip flashed a torch on the ground. Then he gripped the handle of the door and jerked it open. He flashed his torch into the darkness. "Good heavens—look!"

There sprawled on the floor was the body of Donovan.

"Is he dead?" whispered Peter.

"Quite!" Philip said, after kneeling beside the body. "And the murderer has got the diamond."

"Let's get out of this place," came the moan of little Hymie.

"We've got to get through with this," Philip stated decidedly. "Williams, you look badly shaken, so you had better go upstairs and mount guard."

"Yes, sir," Williams answered with alacrity.

"Mert—you better go get the police."

"Get the police?" cried Mert. "I reckon it is about time we got the police."

"Pete, you go back to the hotel and wait for me."

"What! And leave you here!" Peter's eyes were indignant. "I'm staying."

"This is no picnic, darling," Philip argued. "The murderer is likely to be back here any minute. The murderer killed Donovan and got the diamond—he'll try to collect from Madame Li Tai."

"Let's save time by pretending you've given me all your arguments and I've said I'm staying here."

Philip smiled at her fondly.

"I admire your nerve. All right, Mert, make tracks."

Mert and Hymie needed no second instructions. They hastened out into the corridor, and were half-way up the steps into the street, when they pulled up with a jerk.

"Help—help—help!"

Mert and Tymic looked back and hesitated.

"Help—help—help!"

"We gotta look into this," Mert said in quaking tones. "You go first, Hymie—I'll see no harm comes to you."

Down the steps they went again, and now they observed an open door they had not seen before. They pushed it open and Mert's torch revealed that it was a coal cellar.

Suddenly the door behind them closed with a crash, and they heard the sound of a key turning in the lock. A mocking, horrible laugh made them shiver with fear, and they sighed their relief as they heard the footsteps fading away.

"We gotta get outa here, and get the cops," whispered Mert, and flashed the torch. "Look, there's a shoot cover. If I stand on your shoulders I can get out that way."

Five minutes later two coal-begrimed figures managed to lever up the cover and drag themselves into the deserted street.

Trapped at Last

PHILIP closed the cellar door and hid the gruesome spectacle. He found a switch and, to his relief, it worked. Three dusty, weak lights appeared on the walls. The prop-room was full of grotesque shadows.

Philip pulled out a gun.

"This murderer may not come back, but if he does he'll have to settle with this!" He held up the gun. "Better keep very quiet, Pete, so we can hear everything."

Very quietly Philip went round the prop-room until he came to another door. He came back to the girl
March 27th, 1937.

"I want to see where that door leads to."

"Don't leave me. I hate to admit it, but—I'm scared."

Philip gave her the gun.

"All right, take this—you'll be all right." The door closed with a slight thud behind him.

The film star flashed his torch round the room, and saw that it was another section of the property-room. Then his light rested on a figure in a gorgeous kimono that wore a death's head mask. He was just thinking how amazingly life-like was the figure, when, to his horror, the figure moved. It was Li Yat.

Peter Dean stared at the closed door with frightened eyes. She longed to call Philip back.

She half-turned her head as if she heard a sound. She clutched the revolver and wondered what would happen if she had the nerve to pull the trigger. Then her heart came into her mouth as the door from the corridor opened slowly.

A squat figure, with the face concealed by a black handkerchief, stood on the threshold.

"Gimme that gun," the masked man snarled, threatening her with the revolver in his hand. "And get away from that door."

Peter Dean let the masked man take the gun from her and she backed slowly away. Suddenly the man reached up and pulled down the black handkerchief. "Williams?" she gasped out.

"If you mugs had had the brains of fleas you'd have spotted my phoney English accent," sneered Williams. "You ought to make me the hero of your next book. I took the job with Van Mier to swipe that chunk of ice for Madame Li Tai."

"You killed Van Mier?"

"Yeah. I popped him. When you butted in I had to beat it, and Donovan got the diamond."

Neither of them noticed that the door had moved slightly.

"I thought Cokey Joe was going to spill something," Williams went on with a fiendish chuckle. "So I shut him up. Then I got Donovan."

"Why are you telling me this?" Peter managed to whisper.

"Because these Chinks have plenty of ways of getting rid of folk what know too much," leered Williams. "This gat's got a silencer. Watch me get Trent when he comes through that door."

"He's not here," cried Peter, desperate fear clutching at her heart.

"I was watching—I saw him go through that door," sneered the killer. "If you should think of shouting I just wouldn't try, or it'll be too bad for you."

The door swung open and into the property-room moved the gorgeous figure in the silken kimono, with the dreadful mask over the features.

"Regret exceedingly to interrupt honourable sir," came the purring voice. "I have come to talk business." The mask turned towards the girl. "Sorry, Miss Lady, but Mr. Trent detained by unavoidable accident."

"Oh!" The girl gave a cry of anguish.

"You will keep mouth closed until I complete business with this gentleman. You come from Donovan?"

"Sure. Got the money?"

"As you say in your most charming idiom—sure." Hands came out of the silken kimono, and one held a great wad of notes, which Williams reached out to seize. "No. First please, the Dragon."

Williams dived into his pocket and brought out a handkerchief, from which he extracted the diamond. The glittering gem he passed over, but all the while he kept his gun pointing at the Oriental.

The money was handed to him. Williams flipped the thick wad of notes.

"Looks okay to me." He pointed his gun at Peter. "This dame, she knows too much. We should fix her so she won't talk."

"Very simple matter," purred the soft voice. "Give me your gun—I fix her."

Without hesitation Williams passed over his gun, and Peter was about to scream in terror as the Chinaman pointed it at her. But when Williams' greedy eyes were fixed on the notes the gun suddenly changed its direction.

"Give me back that money!"

Williams looked up and saw the gun covering him.

"Why, you dirty rat, I'll—"

"Give back the money!" The voice behind the death mask had changed. "Make it snappy, or I'll kill you like you did Van Mier and Donovan."

Thoroughly covered, Williams handed back the money, and then a strong, lean hand went up to the death mask and removed it.

For years cattle-rustlers had swept through the territory until a Texas Ranger, in the guise of a cowboy, appeared on the scene. He realised what sort of a fight lay ahead of him when he discovered the identity of the hidden leader. A thrilling Western drama, starring Dick Foran

GUNS of the PECOS

"Let Nothing Stand in Your Way!"

THERE was little hope of prosperity in Texas until President Ulysses Grant met again with General Farrell, who had so distinguished himself in the Civil War of 1870. It was on a fine spring afternoon in Washington, when Grant had been lamenting the lack of remounts for the army, that one of his ministers mentioned Farrell and brought him into Grant's private room.

"You want horses, sir?" Farrell asked. "I know the man who'll raise thousands for you."

"Who is this magician?" Grant questioned.

"Major Burton. I've got him inside," came Farrell's prompt reply. "And I have a plan for dealing with all rogues, rustlers and vagabonds."

"Tell me," Grant commanded.

"The Texas Rangers, sir. My State is forming up a fine body of young men. And Major Burton—"

"Bring him in," Grant interrupted. "Let me see him."

Whilst Grant was signing some papers of State, Farrell re-entered with his friend. Burton was an upstanding, clean-faced man of about forty-eight, thickest, downright and a soldier to the last inch of him, despite his civilian clothes. He approached Grant's chair at the table and stood stiffly to attention.

The President glanced up. Out came a large, welcoming hand.

"It's you, is it? Burton—I thought I remembered the name. How are you?"

"Fine, sir! I can help you. I'm going to start a horse farm at Lone Star, in the Pecos County. Farrell says you need 5,000 army remounts. You can have them by August."

Grant loosened his great grip.

"The contract's yours, Burton. I remember you for a man of your word. But Texas—" His eyes glinted. "Bit of a busy State, what?"

"With your permission, sir, I shall have the new police—the Texas Rangers."

"The only law in Pecos County," said Grant, "so far as I can make out, is the six-shooter! You'll have a lively time, Burton—so will the new police. But good luck to you!"

Burton and his foreman were sitting their horses on a ridge overlooking the valley.

"Sometimes, Jordan, I thought this day would never come," said Burton musingly. "Look below—a couple of thousand of the finest horses in the States."

Jordan, thin and wiry, nodded.

"Finest in the world!"

Burton laughed a little.

"Well—maybe! But I'm sure of one thing—without you and the Rangers, this experiment would have failed."

"I ain't never minded any of the work, major," Jordan replied modestly. "And that goes for the rest of the boys."

Burton tightened the reins of his mount.

"Well, let's get started back. There's plenty else to do this morning besides looking at our horses and bucking ourselves on being mighty clever!"

Down in the Golden Apple Inn, in

Pecos County, a typical Western town, customers were drinking and talking big and doing deals between themselves. A motley gathering of all sorts; good, bad and indifferent. A young man was at the piano, crooning to himself. He seemed unconcerned with anything but his music.

A loud-voiced fellow at the bar, after glancing over and again at the card players and dice throwers at the tables, expressed his thoughts.

"Yes, sir—it's God's own country and the devil's own people!"

Behind the bar, in shirt-sleeves and apron, was a hard-faced, forceful-looking man in his late forties. He was serving beer when the stranger's remark caused him to stop short to listen.

Went on that bragging voice:

"I represent a crowd from the East. They want to invest a lot of mosey out here. I'm going to tell 'em that anybody who'd do that is plumb crazy!"

His friend murmured:

"I wouldn't, buddy. Leastways, not too loud."

"There's a feller up at Lone Star I've talked to—Major Burton—got fifty thousand dollars in hosses out there. I told him he shoulda clucked his mouney down a sewer."

The man behind the bar moved along to where two rough fellows were drinking. He whispered to the nearer one, a whiskered cut-throat:

"Who's that tenderfoot talking thru' his hat?"

"That's Wellman, judge. He wants to invest some dough."

"I guess we can accommodate him," said the judge as he went back to his place. He finished serving customers, then picked up a wooden mallet lying on the counter. He banged it down noisily. All talking stopped dead; the card players put down their hands, the young man at the piano lifted his fingers from the keys.

"This court will please come to order!" came the shout. "Deputies, bring the accused before the bar of justice!"

The judge gestured towards the talkative stranger, whereupon his two bullies sidled up to Wellman and seized him by the arms. They dragged him along the bar to where their master stood, mallet in hand.

"Stranger, I'm Judge Blake, lawfully appointed to this section. This is my court. You're accused of allowing as how there's no law in this territory except that of a six-shooter."

"Why, judge," stammered Wellman, "I—I didn't say no such thing."

"By implication you done it," Blake rapped out. "I heard you. Guilty or not guilty?"

"Why, not guilty. I—I mean guilty." There was a murderous threat in Blake's eyes. The mallet was put down.

"As lawfully chosen representative of the people, I, Judge Blake, resent this slur on a law-abiding community. But I will temper justice with mercy." He winked at the bullies, who released Wellman only to promptly unstrap the money-belt about his waist. They flung it on the counter.

Blake shook out the dollars and notes in the belt, counted them up at a glance. He pushed the loose silver towards the trembling Wellman. "You're fined five hundred dollars, stranger!"

"But I've only got five hundred and a bit—"

"Order in court!" Blake hellowed. "You're discharged! Throw him out, Luke. This session of the court is hereby adjourned."

The unfortunate Wellman was hustled to the door and flung into the street gutter. Luke and his comrade shot at him with their guns when he got up, aiming high to scare him—then, when he was in terrified flight, they returned to their places at the bar. Blake came to them presently.

"When are you heading for Burton's ranch?" he whispered.

"Everything's set," answered Luke. "We'll clear him out this time. Not a hoss left for him to ride to church on."

"How much stock has he got?" Blake wanted to know.

"Fifteen hundred head, maybe," spoke Luke.

The other man, a greasy-looking dago, gesticulated.

"More than that, judge! I guess he's got a towssand!"

Blake glanced at him with good-humoured contempt.

"Glad you aren't my bookkeeper, Carlos! You sure can't reckon up your own dirty fingers!" He moved along the bar. "Don't let anything stand in your way, boys."

The young man at the piano softly closed the lid over the keys. He rose up, stretching himself. A tall, well-built youngster, dressed in close-fitting riding kit. He picked up his big felt hat and strolled out of the saloon into the freshness of the little main street of Pecos.

A New Hand

AT the hitching-rail below the porch-way of a biggish frame house situated in a flowery garden, two horses were tethered. Burton and his foreman, Jordan, had just dismounted. March 27th, 1937.

They stopped a moment or so on the porch, turning about to stare towards the rows of stables on the left.

"We'll see developments here, Jordan. Right now in London the Texas Cattle Company is being formed. They're ready to invest on a big scale."

"It sure would be great to get some good people in with us," Jordan agreed. "But what with the shootin' and rustlin' we've had lately, folks'll think law ain't of much account hereabouts."

"We've not lost many," Burton argued.

"Over a hundred head. I'll be glad when we've got the next bunch delivered."

They turned to enter the house, Burton jingling the dollars in his trousers-pocket. He spoke, half to himself:

"I'll be glad, too. I haven't too big a balance at the bank."

A dark-haired, pretty girl was at the well-laid supper-table, putting the finishing touches to it. An older lady was lighting a kerosene-lamp at the side-board. The girl smiled at the men.

"Oh, good! We've been waiting for you, dad," she said. "Everything's ready."

"Lay another place, Alice—I've asked Jordan to eat with us. Hallo, Carrie—how's tricks?"

The older woman brought the lamp to the table.

"I don't know how you can live here, John," she complained. "Such a savage country!"

"You'll like it when you're used to it," Burton told his sister, chuckling. "And it's not so savage. Just a gun goes off now and then. But no one's hurt."

Alice had laid knife and fork and glass for the foreman. "Sit down, please. You going to start early to-morrow?"

"Yes, miss—at daybreak. The hosses are in fine shape. We oughta make railroad without losing a single one."

Supper was nigh finished when a sharp clatter of horses' hoofs was heard on the drive. Burton's hand went to the gun at his hip; Jordan rose quickly from the table to step towards the door. Aunt Carrie checked a little cry of fear as Alice spoke low:

"Somebody calling you, dad."

Jordan jerked open the door. An almost breathless boy ran in.

"Rustlers!" he gasped. "They're running off the herd! They've shot Jake off his hoss. They nearly got me!"

Burton shouted to Jordan.

"Come on! Let's go!"

"Don't leave us, John!" cried Aunt Carrie desperately. But her niece ran to her to put a hand over her mouth. The three men dashed out of the house to their broncs at the hitching-rail and leapt into their saddles. They went tearing down the drive at full tilt, the loose gravel flying under the thunder of their horses' feet.

Down in the darkening valley Burton's broncs were being stampeded out of their corral by half a dozen wild fellows led by Luke and Carlos. The men fired their guns into the air, shouted and waved their arms, terrifying the horses. Gradually the herd began to stream off in the direction in which the rustlers were trying to head them—the flight became more and more headlong.

As Burton, with Jordan and the boy, came on the scene, the rustlers had got the whole pack of whinnying animals into a drive outwards towards open country.

Burton, with a furious shout, came charging after the thieves. The rustlers made off in the rear of the stampeding horses, driving them farther into the wilderness. But, ever and again, they turned in their saddles to shoot back at their three pursuers. In an open fight they could easily have beaten off Jordan and his master, but the rascals didn't wish to be identified and were hoping to get the horses safely away, under cover of the night, into the distant valley, where the rest of the gang were waiting with branding-irons all ready to change Burton's brand on the hides of his animals into those of their "boss."

By to-morrow they planned to have all the animals re-marked and sold out, beyond all hope of Burton's being able to claim them as his.

The boy cowhand was suddenly thrown. His mount had put a foot in a rabbit hole. Burton and Jordan charged onward. A shrewd shot from the major brought a squeal from the dago Carlos. His horse reared up, forelegs fighting in the air; then, with a sickening crash, horse and rider came to the ground.

Luke checked his mount. Carlos was struggling free.

"Jump up behind me," Luke called to him, "if you ain't dead. No time to lose foolin' about."

Major Burton had ridden in close to them. He aimed at Luke and missed by an inch. Luke snapped back at him and got the major just above the heart. With a gasping groan Burton tumbled sideways from the saddle. His mount, startled by the gun firing, sheered off at a gallop.

"Serves you right." Luke jumped down to kick his enemy brutally in the ribs. Burton's wallet was showing in his hip-pocket, and the desperado snatched at it. He sprang back into saddle.

"Get up behind me, I tell yer!" he yelled at Carlos.

There was no sign of Jordan, who had gone after the herd. He was firing wildly and had no hope of overtaking them. Luke and Carlos dashed away into the thickening night and were lost to sight.

A bare ten minutes later, Alice, who had chased after her father astride her grey mare, came upon Burton lying on his side—his eyes closed, his face lined with the agony of his passing—a dark, still oozing patch of blood staining the breast of his shirt from deep below it.

Before dawn the rustled horses had been rebranded with a new mark, altering the small circle and bar, which Burton had adopted, into a circle and cross. The animals were unidentifiable.

"Mighty good of the major to choose an easy brand like he did," chuckled the man with the branding-iron as he kicked out the embers of the fire he had used to heat his irons. "There ain't a Circle Bar left in Lone Star Valley!"

Carlos came along to Luke. "We take it easy now, si?"

"There ain't nothin' to worry about," Luke grunted. "Nothin' at all."

"You think heem hurt bad?" Carlos inquired.

"Burton won't talk no more," Luke answered. "There's no one to say a word."

Later on they made camp under the trees. The horses were safely corralled. Some of the men went to sleep, others of the gang played cards to keep awake. The moon got up and the dark valley was lit with a silver brightness. Luke sat smoking a foul pipe and talking with Palmer, the judge's right-hand man at the Golden Apple.

The quiet night was broken into melodiously by the sound of someone singing from afar off.

Suspicion shone in Palmer's long, smooth face. The song grew louder and nearer, the singer came alongside under the trees, mounted on a smoke-coloured horse. He drew rein as Palmer got to his feet to ask in a not-too-friendly voice:

"Where are you heading to, mister?"

"North, generally speaking," came the smiling answer. "Jest moseying along looking for a job. Saw your fire and came over."

Luke joined them.

"We're short-handed. How are you with a shootin' iron?"

"Fair." The youth called to one of the card players: "Toss up one of your cards."

The fellow flipped the ace of spades into the air. Quick as a flash the young man fired, cutting the card edgewise.

Luke nodded his shaggy head.

"You're on. Had any chow?"

"I can last till morning." The smiling eyes studied them both. "Quite a lot of stock you got outside. Who owns 'em?"

"You're hired to ride herd," spoke Palmer. "Not to ask questions. What's your name?"

"Steve Ainslee."

"Get along to supper and tell the cook you're an extra. And, listen—no singing or talking. We're quiet folk, taking a herd to Dodge City."

Next morning, in the little Western town, Ainslee was wandering around, killing time. He had breakfasted and stabled his horse back of a store on which the sign read "Davis Brothers, Cattle Buyers, etc."

It was a post office also, and a prosperous, respectable-looking business. Luke was inside the office—and Ainslee, peering through the window, saw him receive a draft cheque for the eatle. Luke folded the draft and put it in his wallet; then, with a grunted word of thanks to the clerk, came out of the store. He pulled up at sight of Ainslee.

"Hallo, you! Wait-in' for me?"

"Guessed I'd draw my pay for helping along with the hosses."

Luke thrust a dirty hand into his trousers pocket and drew out a two-dollar bill.

"You're leaving us, eh? I ain't so sorry."

"No more am I." Ainslee pocketed the bill with a shrug of his loose shoulders.

Luke eyed him.

"Tough, eh?"

"Tough enough for you."

It was a word and a blow. Luke struck out straight at Ainslee's still-smiling face. Ainslee dodged, then landed the mistler a terrific punch on his stubby chin. Luke went backwards over the sidewalk flat on to his back. Ainslee stepped up to him and, leaning over the almost unconscious rascal, whipped out of his breast pocket the wallet with the incriminating draft inside. He wasted no more time but skipped round to the stables.

When Luke had regained his senses and his feet, Ainslee was well away down Dodge City main street on his smoke-coloured mount.

"Hi, stop him!" yelled Luke to the passers-by. "Stop thief! He's got my wallet!"

At once there was a big commotion in the street. Shots were fired at random as people ran out of their houses and shops. Everybody was talking at once, yelling orders—some even tried to stop Ainslee lower down the street, but he rode straight at them. A thickset youth leaped to a horse and went pounding after him.

Meantime Luke was spitting out oaths and shouting for Palmer and Carlos, who were in a saloon drinking with the rest of the gang. They came running out—unable to understand what could have happened so suddenly. Luke was so furious that he could scarcely speak.

"It's that extra hand! He sloshed me unawares and got away with the cheque!"

Palmer cut in.

"Don't worry—it can't be cashed without Blake's signature. Get the clerk to stop payment."

The thickset young man in pursuit of Ainslee was chasing him grandly, firing at him every minute. The pair disappeared in a cloud of dust at the bend of the street.

"He'll get him all right," said Palmer to the still swearing Luke. "Don't fret yourself—come and have a drink."

At Headquarters

UP in the hills a strongly fortified series of huts was labelled with a sign painted on a roadside board in neat letters:

"Texas Rangers, Fourth District H.Q."

Two dusty young men came riding up to the sentry at the gates of the stockade. They swung down off their steaming horses and saluted the officer who stood at the gate with a pair of field-glasses in his hand. He answered the salute, saying:

"I was beginning to worry about you boys. Give me a full account of yourselves."

The thickset young man beside Ainslee grinned all over his round, likeable face.

"That's kind of a tall order, Captain Norris."

"I reckon it is, Carter." The officer gestured with his field-glasses. "Come on inside and let's hear all about it."

The three strode along to the main hut and entered the orderly-room. Norris seated himself at his desk.

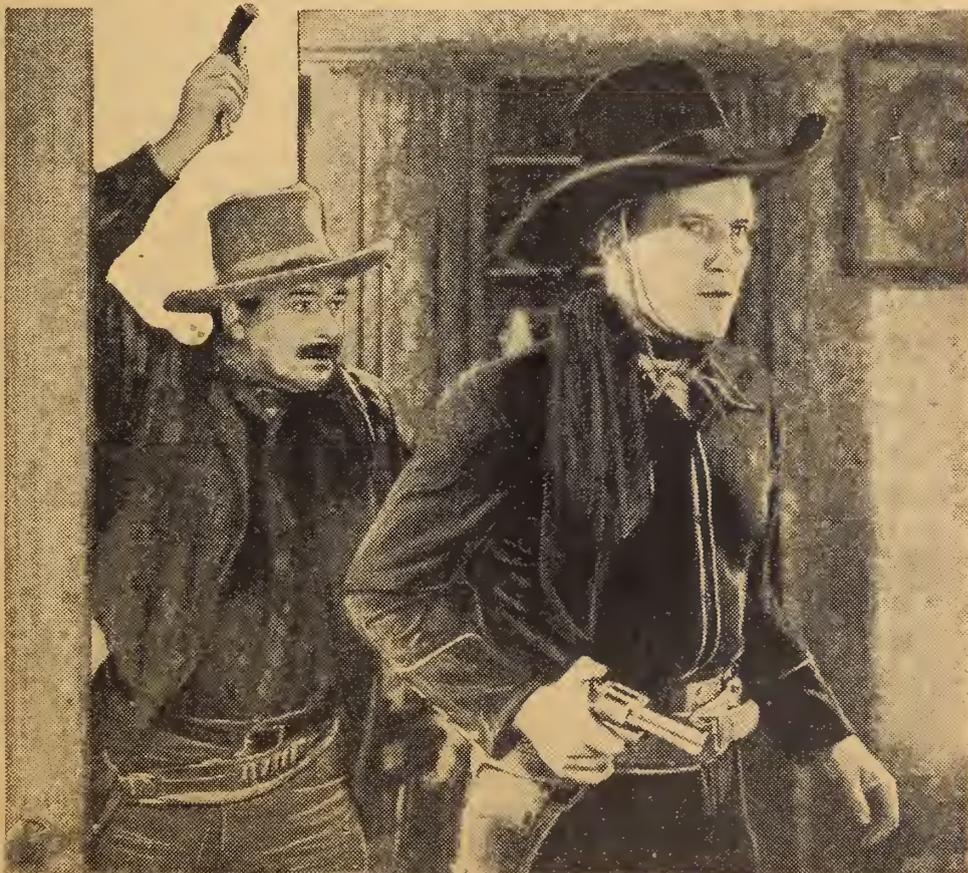

"Well?"

"Major Burton's been killed. I'm afraid," Ainslee told him. "Shot at close quarters in a horse rustle."

Norris drew in his breath.

"Gee, that's bad news! Are you sure?"

"We couldn't wait to check up. Jeff went on ahead and I hooked up with a big drive of cattle on the way to Dodge City. I'm dead sure they were Burton's."

"How do you figure out that?"

"Burton's brand is a circle and bar. These horses were newly marked with a circle and cross. Easy enough to change a bar into a cross."

Norris asked:

"Who owns circle cross?"

"It was registered two weeks ago under the name of Judge Blake of Pecos City."

"Judge Blake?" Norris stared. "But he's an appointed judge. A hard sort of fellow, but there's nothing on him here—except that he runs his court at the Golden Apple."

The thickset youth stated:

"Steve's got something else."

Ainslee pulled out Luke's wallet from his pocket and took out the draft.

"A cheque for twenty thousand dollars, captain. Payment for the herd Burton was trying to save. By a little sleight-of-hand I got it from Luke Brady, the fellow in charge of the drive. Then Jeff joined in the hunt—and—and we got away."

"I was waiting for Steve up the street," Jeff grinned. "Shooting kind of frantic at him as he passed. I shot at him all the time—with blank cartridges! It was beautiful to hear them cheering me as I went pounding after him, yelling 'Stop thief—stop thief!'"

Norris nodded approval.

"You're two good boys. But this is a bad business. Blake's in absolute control of the country round Pecos. It would take four times as many men as we've got here to go and get him."

Ainslee put in:

"I've planned out an idea. I'll go in to Pecos and give the judge this draft. I'll think up a story—tell him Brady was out to double-cross him. Then, when Blake goes to cash the draft, I'll accuse him of compounding a felony and throw him on a horse and get him out of Pecos before anything can get started."

"Seems a mighty long chance, Ainslee. What's your opinion, Carter?"

Jeff Carter glanced towards Ainslee, grinned in his sheepish way and shrugged.

"I let Steve do all the thinking," he said.

Captain Norris still had misgivings.

"Suppose this Brady turns up?"

"He won't," Ainslee declared. "He'll be afraid—after losing the cheque."

"I'll go with you, Steve," Carter offered. "You're aiming at being principal guest at a necktie party!"

Alice Runs a Risk

A BUCKBOARD carriage, drawn by a couple of ranch horses and driven by the Burton foreman, pulled up before the sign of the Golden Apple.

"This here's the place, Miss Alice," said Jordan to the nearer of the two ladies with him. "Court-house can't be far away."

A stranger passing by stopped and doffed his hat.

"Can I help you, ladies? This is the court-house—the court-room's right inside the bar."

"Thank you, sir," said Alice. "Put up the horses, Don."

Jordan helped her to alight while the stranger helped down Aunt Carrie. Again thanking him, Alice led the way into the Golden Apple.

"Come on, auntie—nobody'll bite us!" she said.

Inside the noisy bar the women glanced askance at the crowd of drinkers and gamblers, drawing their full skirts about them all ready to run out. But Blake spotted them at once and came forward.

"I'm Judge Blake," he stated. "Can I do anything for you?"

"We're looking for the court-house," Alice began. Blake smiled in a fatherly way.

"This is the court, miss. Come into the hotel, where we can talk quietly."

They followed him through the long bar, aware of the many inquisitive eyes watching them. Blake took them to his own room and put chairs for them in a very polite way.

"I came to see about probate of my father's will. He—he was killed about a week ago. I've brought the title deeds of the ranch—Major Burton, perhaps you've heard of him, sir?"

"Oh—yes. Of course," Blake's expressive face showed a deep concern. "You poor child—I knew your father quite well! Who didn't? A fine fellow." He shook his head sadly. "A tragedy—but we'll catch the scoundrels yet."

Ho paused a moment.

"I'm glad you've come to me. You'll stay here a few days as my guests—while I get things settled for you."

"Thank you indeed," Alice gestured towards her aunt. "This is Miss Caroline Burton, my father's sister."

Blake shook hands warmly with the older lady.

"Glad to meet you, Miss Caroline. We'll try to make you happy at the Golden Apple."

Steve and Jeff had been refreshing themselves in the bar. They hadn't failed to notice Alice and her aunt.

"Burton's sister," spoke Jeff. "I've heard of her. And that must be the daughter."

When the judge had returned to the bar, Jeff and Steve moved out. They went to the hotel entrance, where Steve asked to see Miss Burton.

Presently Alice came down to the quiet lounge with Aunt Carrie at her heels, still very alarmed and anxious.

Steve doffed his hat.

"Could I have a word with you, Miss Burton?" he asked.

"Certainly, sir," Alice answered, blushing at his admiring eyes.

"My name is Steven Ainslee. And this is Jeff Carter, my friend."

"You evidently know me," Alice smiled as Jeff grinned widely at her.

"This is my aunt, Miss Caroline Burton."

"I was thinking," said Jeff, "that maybe Miss Caroline would like to see the sights of Pecos City whilst Mister Ainslee and Miss Burton are discussin' things?"

Aunt Carrie simpered.

"I'd sure be charmed, Mr. Carter." Left alone, Steve spoke in a low voice:

"Miss Burton, will you keep what I tell you in strict confidence, please?" They regarded each other steadily.

Alice held out her hand at last. "I will."

"Miss Burton, I'm a Texas Ranger. I'm here investigating a bad business. It's connected with your father's death—I have good reason to believe that Judge Blake is involved in it."

Alice stared all the more, her pretty face registering doubt and a little fear. "I—I can't believe it!"

"It's only too true," Steve told her. "I have evidence in my pocket. Your horses were rustled, rebranded—then sold in Dodge City by a man acting for Blake. Captain Norris, of the Fourth District, has allowed me to take charge. You know him? Here's his letter of authority—and here's my badge of office."

He handed her a note taken from his pocket; then turned up the collar of his black coat to show a small silver star stitched underneath.

Alice read the note.

"I know Captain Norris. He was a friend of my father's." She hesitated a little. "It's hard to believe that the judge— But I suppose I must believe it if you're a policeman."

Steve answered her.

"A Texas Ranger, please. A soldier, Miss Burton. I'll have to go—it won't do to raise suspicions in this place. Go very carefully with Blake."

Down below, Luke Brady was closeted with the judge in his private office. Luke wasn't feeling too good—he had just told Blake that he had lost the cheque.

"I couldn't help it, judge," he mumbled, his frightened little eyes watching Blake. "Two guys jumped me as I was coming out of the clerk's office and knocked me flat."

"Where were the rest of the men? Carlos and Palmer?"

"In a saloon. I went alone to keep things looking natural, see? But you can get another cheque—no one would dare forge your name around here."

Blake relaxed a little.

"Maybe that's so. But I still think you're dumb." He glared at his henchman. "What I pay you for, I dunno. But here's a last chance—get this through your thick skull. Burton's daughter is here. Come to me for legal aid and advice. She don't know a thing—and she needn't—unless you showed yourself when Burton was shot?"

"She wasn't there," said Luke positively. "There was no one to see who—who did the accident."

Blake chuckled.

"Accident, that's good! We'll fix it that way with the coroner. Now, listen, the girl's got the ranch deeds with her. In case she lost 'em, that ranch could be declared open to homesteading. Get the idea?"

"I do, judge." Luke's crafty eyes sparkled.

"And you might apply for the place. You or Carlos—well, it's worth going after. But you'll have to act on your own."

Thieves in the Night

THAT night, whilst Steve and Jeff were getting to bed in their room along the balcony of the Golden Apple, Steve heard stealthy footsteps below the window. He was on the balcony before Jeff could guess what his chum was after.

Along the balcony stole a dark figure. Steve, crouching in the shadows, saw the man pause at Alice's window to peer in. He turned with a gasp as Steve's hand was clapped on his shoulder. A straight punch between the eyes sent him reeling over the balcony rail on to the patio below. There he lay quiet for a moment—but Steve spotted that he was trying to draw a gun on him.

Steve leaped the rail straight down on to the fellow and gripped his wrist. Winded, the man collapsed with a grunt, to lie still.

Wasting no more time on him, Steve ran up the steps of the balcony to Alice's apartments. The french window was open and a burglary of some sort had been evidently in progress. Very quietly Steve entered—there might be a pair of the rascals.

Advancing, gun in hand, into the darkness of the room, Steve gave the stealthily shadow behind him an easy mark for a coward's blow with the butt end of a heavy six-shooter. With a gasp of surprise the Ranger went down—only to turn on the instant on his assailant, who proved slippery as an eel. He wriggled free of Steve's half-numbered grip and slithered out of the room just as a cry from Alice caused Steve to start to his feet.

She came out from an inner room in her dressing-gown; Aunt Carrie, similarly clad, close behind her, clutching at a lighted candle.

"It's all right, ladies," spoke Steve. "There was a fellow in this room up to mischief. I've an idea who it was."

From outside came a murmur of voices. Steve stepped back to the balcony to find Judge Blake, with some of the guests and hotel servants, gathering there. Lanterns and candles gave faint, flickering illumination to the scene.

"What's all this?" Blake demanded, at once covering Ainslee with a revolver.

"Someone broke into Miss Burton's room," Steve answered.

Blake's cold eyes flashed towards Alice. He saw that in her alarm she had clutched up her papers—her father's will and the ranch title deeds.

"You hear this man, Miss Burton," he said. "Is it true?"

"Yes, judge," she answered flutteringly.

Blake turned again to Steve.

"And who are you, anyway?"

"Steve Ainslee—just one of your guests, judge. The bureau clerk let my friend Carter and myself share a room. I'm a representative of Davis Brothers, of Dodge City—I have a draft for you for those horses you sent us. Your man lost it."

Blake was eyeing him intently, his gun directed at Steve's middle. "Got it on you?"

"Sure I have. I was going to give it you in the morning."

He drew out of his pocket the wallet he had taken from Luke Brady. All eyes were upon them as Blake took it. Alice suddenly gave a little scream.

"That's my father's wallet! Look at the crossed swords marked on the outside! My father put those there." She pointed a trembling finger at the leather cover of the wallet. "You took it from him!" she accused Steve shrilly. "It was you—you who killed him!"

"Why, Miss Burton—" But Blake's gun muzzle, thrust sharply into Steve's stomach, checked his denials. Blake spoke grimly.

"Davis Brothers, huh? You're under arrest, my friend! In the name of the law, I charge you with the theft of that wallet, horse stealing, and the murder of Major Burton! Boys"—he called to the servants—"Take him to gaol!"

Steve had to submit. There was no way out—he couldn't see his course. Better wait—Jeff would be sure to help him. But Jeff seemed to have vanished altogether.

When quiet had been restored, Blake turned to Alice, who was weeping on Aunt Carrie's ample shoulder.

"I'm terribly sorry you had to be dragged through all this, Miss Burton. But I promise you that man will get all the punishment he so thoroughly deserves."

Alice gulped.

"And I trusted him. He—he said he was a Texas Ranger."

Blake's cold eyes lit up.

"Oh, he did, eh? Now that's very interesting."

Alice pulled herself together.

"Forgive me, judge, but when I think of my dear father—" She held out the deeds and the will to him. "I'd like to leave these papers with you. You'll know what's to be done."

"I'll look after you as if you were my own daughter," said Blake.

Aunt Carrie put in:

"And now we'll go, sir. We're too upset to stay here."

"Go, in the middle of the night?" Blake took the deeds. "I'll put these with the wallet in my safe. You'd best stay till the morning."

"I'd like to leave now," Alice declared. "As soon as we're dressed."

Blake shrugged his heavy shoulders. "All right. I'll find your man and get the team brought round."

Downstairs in the bar customers were still drinking and gambling. Blake signalled to Luke Brady to stand by. He rapped on the counter with the mallet for silence.

"Boys, I'm not calling court. I just want to say a few words for law and order." All eyes were turned to him.

"I want you to know I've arrested the feller who killed Major Burton. This outrage is doubly pitiful—because the killing of a gallant gentleman has made an orphan of a little girl who's helpless to fight the world."

Murmurs broke out from all present.

"Now, boys, I know how you feel. I know your ideas as to what is a fitting end for boss thieves, rustlers and killers. The feller is named Steve Ainslee, and he's lying snug in the prison-house waiting trial. I want to warn you, boys, if any of you should feel inclined to deal summarily with him—well, I'd be mighty upset!"

Alice bound up the broken right hand while Jeff fired at the sniper outside who had ventured to show himself. March 27th, 1937.

He winked as he finished his speech. The murmurs grew loud and louder. Carlos flourished his gun; Luke moved towards the door of the bar—the crowd followed him to a man. Luke called out:

"Listen now, Carlos—didn't you hear what the judge said? We don't want no lynchings in Pecos City."

"Aw, shut your mouth, Brady," came a shout. In less than a minute the bar was empty.

Blake smiled evilly to himself as he went upstairs to his own rooms.

Two guards were on duty at the prison, outside the cell where Steve had been lodged. They were smoking cigarettes and talking.

"He's pretty quiet," said one. "Take a look at him, Bill."

The second gaoler drew back the little grille to peer in. Jeff Carter came creeping into the corridor. He had broken in by a low window. He had a brace of guns, one in either hand. He came quietly upon the guards, jabbing a gun in the back of each.

"Put 'em up!" he said softly.

The guards felt the muzzles of the forty-fives under their ribs. Their hands went up over their heads. Jeff whispered again.

"You're sure good boys. Get over against the wall."

The men obeyed. Jeff, still covering them, came near. He thrust one gun into his belt; then, with his free hand, he frisked the guards' guns from their belts, tossing them aside.

"Which of you's got the key?" asked Jeff. "Drop it on the ground. I'm not foolin'!"

For a moment the first gaoler hesitated. Then seeing the look in Jeff's eyes, he put one hand in his pocket and took out the key. Jeff grabbed it quickly, and, backing a little, thrust the key into the door lock and turned it. Steve stepped out of the cell.

"Now, boys, you nip inside," Jeff ordered. "And—pronto!"

He locked the cell door on them, then Steve and he slid quietly to the corridor window. Next thing they were outside the gaol in the darkness.

"I've got our brones," said Jeff. "They're hitched along here." He took Steve's arm. "Take this gun. Let's go."

"I can't leave Miss Burton," said Steve.

"They're planning a necktie party for you, Steve," Jeff warned him.

"Lynching, eh?" Ainslee thought hard. "Well, I'll have to risk it. See here, Jeff, I'll wait for 'em on Smokey and lead 'em away from the hotel. In all the excitement, you go to the hotel—get Miss Burton's papers and clear out with her and her aunt for the ranch. I'll meet you there."

"Why don't you hang yourself right off and save 'em the trouble?" Jeff snapped at him.

"It'll work all right. I know Smokey and he knows me," said Ainslee. "Listen—horo they come. Get busy!"

As the mob came marching up the street, muttering and mouthing between themselves, Steve suddenly charged forward on his grey horse Smokey. Brady saw him first and gave a yell: "He's broke gaol! Get your hosses—quick!"

Steve charged right into the midst of them, scattering them like sheep. He cleft a way straight through the mob, then galloped like lightning for the hills. The men ran back to get horses; then, led by Luke, a stern chase began.

Ainslee led them into the brush and open country.

Meanwhile Jeff had made his way to March 27th, 1937.

the hotel—in time to see Alice and Miss Burton drive off in the buckboard cart. He watched, unseen, where Blake went after seeing them off.

Jeff came to Blake's office door and rapped secretly on the panel, calling:

"Quick, judge—that guy Ainslee has escaped!"

Blake came at once to the door, opening it cautiously. Jeff stuck his gun under Blake's left ribs.

"Turn around, judge!"

Blake, his eyes alive with rage and surprise, did so. Jeff prodded him with the iron.

"Put your hands behind you," he said softly. "I gotta tie you up. No foolin'—hurry!"

Blake had to submit. With a slip cord in his left hand Jeff deftly slid the loop over Blake's wrists and jerked them tightly together.

"You'll wish you'd never been born!" Blake spat out.

"I'll have to gag you," Jeff decided coolly.

A minute later Blake was trussed up and gagged, his eyes burning with rage. Jeff helped himself to the title deeds of the ranch and the will lying on the table, then frisked Blake for Burton's wallet with the draft inside.

"So long, judge! They'll find you in the morning."

As Jeff was leaving the hotel a man came hurrying across the patio. It was Brady. He peered at Jeff suspiciously.

"Say, what are you doing here?"

Jeff's fist shot out in a straight blow between Luke's little eyes.

"Waiting for you!" he answered.

Besieged!

SOON after daybreak Steve came galloping up on Smokey to the Burton ranch. Leaping from the saddle, he hurried to the porch to rap sharply at the closed door. After a few moments the door was opened by Alice, who recoiled at sight of her visitor.

"I won't talk to you. Go!" she cried. Steve gently pushed his way into the parlour.

"You've got to believe me," he said. "I didn't have anything to do with the major's death."

"How can you talk so—when I saw you with my father's wallet?" she broke in.

"I took it from Brady—one of Blake's gang in Dodge City—hoping to prove what I've been wanting to prove for months past. You see, we Texas Rangers have been trying to get something on Blake—"

A clatter of quick hoofs on the drive caused Steve to whip back to the porch. Up the dusty drive came Jeff at full pelt on his brown mare. He swung himself to the ground and advanced, grinning, towards the half-frightened Alice.

"I got 'em, miss," he told her. "The ranch deeds and your father's will. Steve here told me he thought you'd like 'em back—Blake's too good a lawyer to be trusted."

Alice recovered her self-command.

"I guess I've been wrong about you, Mr. Ainslee. Come in, both of you—and help us get breakfast."

"We ain't got a lot of time for cats," said Jeff. "There's a gang been trailing me all night. But I can throw down a cup of coffee and a couple of boiled eggs, maybe."

After a hasty meal in which Aunt Carrie hovered around Jeff like a mother hen over a prize chick, Steve got Alice to call the ranch-hands together.

"Boys, we're Texas Rangers," he told them. "There's liable to be a little trouble here this morning—we've found out who killed your master. It was Blake's gang—when they were stealing your horses the other night. Blake's at the back of all lawlessness in this territory, but we've got the goods on him—and he knows it."

"I want you to do what Mr. Ainslee says," Alice put in. "The trouble may be bad, but he knows how to meet it."

"Thank you, Miss Burton. Well, boys, will you stand with us for justice and decency?"

"If there's any trouble connected with Miss Alice," spoke Jordan. "Well—we're in it, too. And I know what you say is right, mister. I got a packet the other night from one of them rustlers, and I guess I've seen the feller who did it in Blake's saloon."

A sound of many running horses on the drive brought Steve to the porch. A bunch of horsemen drew up by the garden gate. Luke and Carlos dismounted and came marching up to those assembled on the porch. Luke addressed himself to Ainslee.

"We're legal deputies of Judge Blake. We want you and Carter. You'd best come peaceful."

Jordan stepped forward.

"You get on your way, you two—less you're asking for trouble."

Luke studied the grim faces of the ranchmen.

"All right, tinhorns," he shrugged.

"If that's how it is, Carlos, you go back and fetch Judge Blake and some of the others. They won't like to miss seeing these two murderers dance double buck and wing at the end of a rope!"

Luke sneered off and Steve questioned Jordan:

"They can't be back here under two hours?"

"That's right."

"I've got an idea," Steve told them. "Jeff will take over and I'll make a bee line for H.Q. Got Norris and him—we can collect Blake's bunch very nicely up here, away from his stronghold in Pecos City."

Outside, Luke and Carlos and their men were shuffling away, not in the best of tempers. Suddenly they sighted Steve on his grey cantering up the hill back of the ranch.

"Six of you stay here watching the ranch!" Luke snapped. "Don't let anyone out. Carlos, you ride with me after that bozo. The rest get along to the judge for reinforcements. Scatter—quick as you can!"

He turned his mount in pursuit of Ainslee, with Carlos just behind him. The ranger shouted something lost in the breeze as he galloped up the hillside.

Ainslee led his pursuers into wild country. He brought them to where there was a deep gully. He put Smokey to a downward leap of five yards, and cleared it, Smokey's hind feet crumbling the gully's very edge. Luke and Carlos, thundering after him, came to a dead stop on the brink of the chasm.

"Let's go back," Luke swore heartily. "No use breaking our necks!"

Blake rode up to the porch of the Burton Ranch bold as brass. He hammered on the door—Aunt Carrie called from a side window:

"What do you want? Who is it?"

"You know me, ma'am—I'm Judge Blake. You're harbouring two desperate criminals, and I demand their surrender!"

"The SEA SPOILERS"

Murder!

THE radio at the shore base of the United States Coastguard Service spluttered. Message and answer flashed back and forth. "NRNQ calling NOQ" "NOQ answering NRNQ. Go ahead." "Thirteen—thirteen—thirteen—will dock Saturday two-thirty—breakers ahead—that is all."

Joe, the assistant operator, turned to his superior. "What's all that thirteen-thirteen bunk?" he asked.

The man at the instrument smiled. "Oh, that's only Bob Randall's private signal to disregard his message—officially. He means for me to pass the glad word to Connie Dawson up at the Breakers Café that her boy friend will be docking Saturday at half-past two."

And Saturday at half-past two Connie Dawson, entertainer at the Breakers Café, was waiting on the landing-stage, her blonde hair stirring in the breeze, and in her eyes the light of a lover. Bob Randall caught the radiant girl in his arms.

"It's going to be whoopee to-night, darling. But first of all I've got to run up and see the boss. Just radioed for me. Guess you know what that may mean?"

"Oh, Bob! Not that you're going to get the command of the Niobe?"

"That's what I'm hoping, my dear. Then for the bright lights and—"

"I'm afraid not, Bob—not to-night. See that yacht over there?" The girl pointed a slim hand out over the water to where a mile or so off shore lay a white, stream-lined craft riding at anchor. "That's old Winton's boat, the Hermitage. He's throwing a party and little Connie is going aboard to entertain the guests."

"My dear Connie—have a heart!"

"It means fifty dollars, Bob. And don't you forget I'm a poor, working girl. Now run along and see that commander of yours and bring the glad news back to me at the café."

She blew him a kiss and ran off. Bob Randall, whistling gaily, walked along to Commander Mays' office. Half an hour later he was seated glumly in the stern-sheets being rowed back to the Niobe, a sadly disillusioned man.

For Commander Mays happened to have a candidate for the command of the Niobe in his own son, and, blood being thicker than water, Lieutenant Ralph Mays got the job.

But all Bob Randall's pals said that he was a man who could take it. One request he made, and one only, and that was that he could row over to the Hermitage that night to bid good-bye to Miss Dawson before they weighed anchor in the morning.

Millionaire Winton, hail-fellow-well-met with all and sundry, cared very little what visitors he had aboard the Hermitage so long as they were good fellows. So it was only to be expected that his parties were, to say the least, a trifle mixed. He had met Phil Morgan and Nick Austin some weeks before in a waterfront saloon, and since then the two men had been given a free run of the yacht.

Connie Dawson was rather sorry she had come. But the pay was good, and after all there was safety in numbers. So she thought till Phil Morgan forced his way uninvited into the little cabin that Reggie Winton had placed at her disposal. The man's voice was smooth, polite—but his eyes belied his softly spoken words.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Dawson, I didn't know this was your cabin!"

"Mr. Winton said I might use it." The girl made a move towards the door. "I must go back to my work, Mr. Morgan, they'll be looking for me."

"There's no desperate hurry, is there, my dear?"

She drew back, and her grey eyes flashed anger.

"I'm paid by Mr. Morgan to entertain his guests—collectively, not individually."

"But—" Phil Morgan wheeled round as the door was burst open and Reggie Winton rushed in. The millionaire held in his hand a crumpled sealskin. He was livid with anger.

"Who's the rotter who's been parking smuggled goods in my boat?" he asked. "My men found this in the hold—there are hundreds of 'em. Know anything about this, Morgan?"

And then, reading the truth in Phil Morgan's eyes, Winton saw red. He raised his fist as though to strike his guest, and as he did so he caught sight in the mirror the figure of Nick Austin. And Nick's hand held a gun. His voice came in a whisper of deadly menace.

"Shut your trap—sucker!"

"Sucker—yes, I'm a sucker all right," said Winton. "Sucker to allow two thugs like you on board my boat. Parking smuggled goods on me, eh? Seal poachers' haul, eh? I'm sending a radio right away to the police and—"

Nick Austin's gun spat fire. Hell broke loose in that little cabin aboard the Hermitage.

Connie shrank back, a scream of terror on her earmined lips. Nick Austin threw her across the arm of one of the chairs, a heavy hand was held over her mouth. Steps running out in the corridor—a sigh of relief from Phil Morgan as he saw that the man who opened the door was one of his own thugs.

"Devil to pay, boss. Coastguard boat coming alongside. It's Bob Randall of the Niobe."

Morgan leapt into action. He called to Nick Austin.

"Bring her along, Nick. The boat's ready—we've got to scam—"

Nick Austin's trigger finger itched.

"Better let me give her the works, boss. It's safer."

A steely note crept into Phil Morgan's voice.

"I said—bring her along."

Failure

THE story was in the papers the next morning, a story that sent a chill of horror all along the Alaskan coast. The depredations of the seal poachers had brought havoc to the legitimate trade, and Commander Mays' office had been besieged by dealers wanting to know what the Government was going to do about it. But this new story was different. There was more at stake.

Kidnapping. Connie Dawson was known and respected all along the coast. Her engagement to Bob Randall was a love story known from Juneau to Unalaska. And reading of how Bob had boarded the Hermitage to find its owner shot to death and his girl kidnapped sent every man's hand to his gun holster. Commander Mays was in despair. A general broadcast was sent out to all patrol boats ordering them to overtake and search all craft.

And so for weeks the Niobe ploughed the grey waters of the northern seas. Not a boat but was held up and boarded. Not a fishing village that was not searched hut to hut. Not an island that was not visited. But all in vain. Connie and her abductors had vanished as completely as though the sea had swallowed them.

Once only a ray of hope shone for a moment. It was as they were passing a small islet that Lieutenant Mays had seen through his binoculars a man signalling to them. He handed the glasses to Bob Randall.

"See anything, Mr. Randall?"

Randall focused the glasses.

"It's Oil," he said. "Oil's the name we give one of the Eskimo settlers over there. We can't pronounce his real name. Gives us good information sometimes."

"Let's go ashore, Mr. Randall. We'll take the long-boat."

And then began for Lieutenant Mays a purgatory. Seated in the stern-sheets he experienced a fear that was known only to himself and his father—the fear of deep water. He had been a boy of six when the boat in which his mother and himself were travelling to Seattle was wrecked. He had spent seven hours in an icy sea clinging to the keel of an upturned boat. He had seen his mother lose her grip and be carried away to her death. He had been lashed to the keel and was safely landed, but those seven hours of horror had implanted a fear that would never leave him. Brave as a lion in all else, Ralph Mays had fought against his fear, battled with it, had even clenched his teeth when his father had suggested his following his own calling—the sea. But it had been hell.

The surf of the Alaskan Islands makes boat handling, except in an Eskimo kayak, a hazardous matter. Ralph Mays watched the combers rolling mountain high, their angry crests hanging threateningly over his head just as the waves had hung over his head and his mother's twenty years before. And the fear gripped him—

He knew later, as he lay panting on the white sand of the islet, that Bob Randall had saved his life—that Bob Randall had been witness of his craven terror. He tried to thank him, but Bob had brushed away the words of thanks. "Forget it, sir," he had said, and had walked away over to where the Eskimo was waiting for them.

Old Oil had news—but not of Connie Dawson. Seal poachers had been in the March 27th, 1937.

neighbourhood, he told them; some twenty seals lay slaughtered on the beach, mute, pathetic witness of the savage raid upon their sanctuary.

But that was all.

Weeks passed, weeks that to Bob Randall were a nightmare of climbing up and down ladders of scows, of prying into filthy, odorous cabins, of interviewing half-breeds and Eskimos. Of sleepless nights and hopeless dawns. Until at last he could only shrug his shoulders and agree when Lieutenant Mays ordered the Niobe back to her base.

It was when they had been in port only three days that Commander Mays sent for Bob Randall.

"You will take command of the Niobe from to-day, Mr. Randall," he said after the two men had exchanged greetings.

Bob looked at his chief.

"But Lieutenant Mays?" he queried.

"My son is transferring to the air arm of the service. I do not think Ralph was very keen on the sea ever since he was a boy." The commander paused and then went on: "I'd like to tell you a story in confidence, Mr. Randall."

"I think I know it, sir. Your son told me, and I quite understand. The doctors call that sort of thing a 'phobia,' don't they? I think your son is a brave man, commander. It takes a brave man to face the thing he fears."

Commander Mays held out his hand.

"Thank you, Mr. Randall, for saying that. There is nothing on land or in the air that Ralph is scared of. But the sea—well, we don't just understand. Well, Mr. Randall, you will go back to the Niobe and take up your regular patrols."

"Begging your pardon, sir, but I'm wondering whether there isn't some better way to get at these seal thieves. They always know our regular patrols."

"That's true. What would you suggest?"

"These devils must have a hide-out somewhere among the islands, and I'd like to go out and find it. Just me and one other."

"Hogan, eh?"

"We've been shipmates for years, sir. Yes, I'd like to take Hogan."

The commander smiled.

"And maybe there is just a chance of finding a certain young lady, eh, Randall?" he said quietly. "Very well. You and Hogan consider yourselves on independent duty—for thirty days. And, by the way, you might come across Ralph. He's on independent duty up there among the islands as well—only you're on the sea and he's in the air."

The Faked Message

LIEUTENANT RALPH MAYS leant over his instrument board and wondered why he was so rapidly losing altitude. One of his cylinders missing, perhaps; a leak maybe in his petrol pipe. He switched on his radio.

"NVMZZ calling. NVMZZ calling—"

Through the ether the message winged its way. It reached the chart-room of a certain dirty-looking fishing craft. The shabby-looking fisherman raised his head from the instrument and disclosed the cheery face of Hogan. He tapped out the answer.

"NOQ answering NVMZZ—" and then looked up at another fisherman equally grimy who was at the chart-house door. "It's the kid, Bob—Lieutenant Mays," he said. "He's in trouble somewhere around here. Engine trouble. Says he's at southern end of Francis Island. Says there's a small boat below him and he's going down for help."

Bob Randall started, looked at a chart on the wall.

"Francis Island. What's a boat doing there? That's seal country. There's no fishing for miles."

"Plenty of seals, though."

"You're right. I don't like this. Get down to the engine-room and beat hell out of those old boilers. We've got to make Francis Island before dark."

Bob took the wheel. The bows of the old fishing-boat swung round and headed nor'-west. Through the grey seas the craft cut her way. The man at the wheel fixed his eyes on the horizon, there was a frown on his forehead. Bob Randall was thinking—and thinking fast.

And on another fishing-boat some seventy miles away two men watched the descent of the hydroplane. They were smiling evilly.

"Coastguard plane—right in our laps, buddy. What d'you know about that? Phil Morgan will be just tickled to death about this."

"Going to help the swine or let him drown, Louie?"

"Drown nothing. We're going to help him—help him to Phil Morgan. Phil will grill him good and hard, and after he's grilled him what he does to the nutt is nobody's business."

The little settlement on the shore of Francis Island was but a huddle of huts, and neither Hogan nor Bob had ever been close in before. Their patrols had taken them usually some degrees south of the locality. They looked at it now through their glasses with interest. They had seen nothing of Ralph, neither had they come across any wreckage of his plane.

Slowly Bob edged the old boat close in shore. Then, taking to the dinghy, they rowed up to the rickety landing stage. A rather dapper, sinister-looking man hailed them.

"Hallo! What's wrong. Any trouble aboard your old hooker?"

"Nope. We want stores. My name's Smith."

"Glad to meet you, Mr. Smith. Mine's Nick Austin. Come ashore. We'll see about those stores of yours."

Bob kept his eyes skinned. A curious settlement this of Francis Island. Rough log storehouses—for what? Bob wondered. Skins perhaps. As they walked up to the main row of huts Austin was pumping them.

"Your first trip?" he asked.

Hogan was about to reply when Bob nudged him.

"Yes—our first trip," he said.

Slowly they walked on. Men lounging in the doorways of the huts glanced at them as they passed. Strange, foreign-looking men—thugs by the look of them.

At the door of the principal shack they stopped, and Austin knocked. The door was opened by a handsome man of middle age.

"Morning, Phil. These chaps want stores. Just blown in."

Phil Morgan's lips parted in a smile of welcome.

"Sure! Come in!" He held open the door and the three men entered. Morgan produced bottle and glasses. Then, excusing himself for a moment, he left the room. The look of meaning he gave Nick Austin as he left was not lost on Bob Randall. Things, he told himself, were about to happen.

Phil Morgan went along a corridor to an adjacent hut. Here he tapped on a door and entered. A girl who had been seated by the tiny stove looked up. Phil nodded to the half-breed girl who was standing by the window.

"All right, Marie—beat it. I'm talking private with your mistress."

Then, when they were alone, he asked the girl seated by the stove:

"Aren't you glad to see me? I hoped by this time you'd be waiting breathlessly for my return."

Connie Dawson smiled bitterly. "You certainly know a lot about women," she said. "Do you think I could do anything but hate you—kidnapper—thief—"

"I'd have a care, Connie. What I say here goes. Get that, my dear?"

"I understand—that you are despicable!"

"But I didn't come here to quarrel, Connie. I want you to come into my hut and meet a couple of friends of mine."

The girl rose wearily, followed her captor. As she entered Phil Morgan's hut she caught a glimpse of Bob Randall's face in a mirror, and he caught a glimpse of hers. A swift look of warning passed. Connie, as she faced her lover and Hogan, had complete command of herself. Introductions followed.

"This is Mr. Smith—that's the name he's given me. And his buddy is no doubt Mr. Brown. I'd take Mr. Brown for a little walk, Nick, if I were you. Now, Mr. Smith, if you will come with me we'll go into that matter of stores."

Leaving the girl standing by the table, the two men left the hut. Crossing to another across the beach they entered. Phil Morgan played the part of guide.

"Here's the store-room and the vault for the skins. We've got a whole heap of skins up here—couple of million dollars' worth. Perhaps you two chaps might help us with a clean-up."

"Poached, eh?"

"You've said it. Guess you won't be sorry to clean up a thousand bucks or so? Pays better than fishing."

"Sure—we're game for anything."

"Good. Now take a look in here. Here's where we keep our choice stuff—Mr. Bob Randall." As the words were spoken Phil Morgan raised his foot and sent Randall flying down a flight of wooden steps into darkness. The voice went on: "Don't remember holding up a boat off the Straits last month, do you, Mr. Randall? Miss Dawson was aboard, but you missed her. Lucky for us our captain was out there on the landing-stage when you arrived. Couple of million dollars' worth of prime skins—but I guess you won't be helping us any—Mr. Randall—"

Bob Randall struggled painfully to his feet and peered about him in the darkness. And then from that darkness came a low groan as though someone were in pain.

"Who's there?" he called. "Me, Randall—Ralph Mays. Thought it was your voice. How come? They got me when I landed my 'plane. Did you get my radio—suppose so, and that's why you're here. Sorry!"

Bob did not reply, for at that moment the door at the head of the steps was thrown open and something was bundled heavily down the wooden stairs. Again the sound of a groan. And this time Bob recognised it at once—Hogan. He took his petrol lighter from his pocket and switched on the button. Poor Hogan's face was a mask of bruises.

"You ought to take a look at that dial of yours, Hogan," he said. "Nick certainly did a good job on you."

"Yeah? Nick and four others, you mean!" replied Hogan. "In a spot, ain't we, Mr. Randall?"

"Spot's right. That's Lieutenant Mays over there. Get up and salute—"

The night passed in silence and part of the next day. Then, at the head of the steps, Nick Austin with his eternal gun. First Hogan was taken and half an hour later returned with signs of a severe man-handling. Then Ralph Mays was taken and returned in no less a bad shape. Then came Nick's voice:

"Your turn, Mr. Randall. And make it snappy."

At the point of the gun Bob was piloted along to Phil Morgan's room. Phil received him smilingly, offered him a chair.

"Good-morning, Randall," he said. "Hope you slept well. Have a drink—no? Well, let's come to business. There's something I want you to do for me. Both of your pals downstairs were obstinate. I hope for your own sake—and Miss Dawson's—that you will be more amenable."

"You mean that you'll hold the girl's safety over me, eh?"

"Precisely." Phil Morgan pointed to a chart spread out on the table before him. "Look here. This is where we are, south end of Francis Island—and here's our market for the skins. In between is the Coastguard Station. We want you to decoy the guard somewhere off here." The podgy finger indicated a spot on the chart. "Say Cape Pierre."

"How do you figure I can do that?"

"By sending a message that you've located us in great strength in the Bay of Cape Pierre."

"Why don't you send the message yourself?"

"Because we don't know the code signals."

"And how do I know that Connie will be returned safe if I do this?"

"Afraid you'll have to take my word for that."

A pause. Then: "Okay. Where's the wireless?"

"Come with me, I'll show you. Come along, Nick, and better bring that gun of yours in case of monkey tricks. We'll use the radio on the 'plane that your friend Mays came down in. We'll be able then to hear what you say—and the replies you get."

Commander Mays was in the wireless-room when the instrument began to splutter. The operator took up the headphones. Watching him, the commander saw his face grow tense. Then taking off the 'phone he turned a white face to his superior.

Nick Austin threw her across the arm of a chair, a heavy hand over her mouth. . . .

"Can't make it out, sir. That was Bob Randall. He says the seal stealers are in force at Cape Pierre. But I don't believe it, sir."

"Why not?"

"Because—well, I hate to tell you, sir, as it's against regulations to use the radio for private messages. But we do it sometimes, sir. Bob did it sometimes—but he always opened his message with the number thirteen repeated three times. That meant that we were to disregard what he was saying—officially. I guess he was radioing under threat and that his captors were listening-in to our replies."

"What d'you make of it, then?"

"I reckon this way, sir. Bob gives the code number of your son's 'plane in his message. Just slips it in. We know by Lieutenant Mays' message that he was south of Francis Island. You remember that Randall radioed us that he was making for Francis. He couldn't have got to Cape Pierre in the time—not in that old craft of his with her worn-out boilers. If I might suggest, sir, I'd send the Marposa to Cape Pierre to be on the safe side. But I'd send all the other boats at our disposal to Francis Island."

The commander stood for a moment without speaking. Then he turned to the operator.

"Get the airport. I'm flying to Dutch Harbour to take command."

Round-up

BOOTH Mays and Hogan looked up as Bob Randall returned to the prison house. Unlike the others, he walked down the wooden steps on his own feet. For a moment they looked at him and then horror spread over their faces. They read in the look on Randall's face that he had fallen into the trap they had defied. Lieutenant Mays raised himself on his straw bed. Struggled to his feet and faced Bob Randall.

"You've sent that message?" he bit out.

"Yes—I sent the message."

"I see. You're not afraid of the sea, Randall, but you're scared stiff of a beating-up like we got. There's not a mark on you—but I'm going to put one there. You cur—"

Ralph Mays clenched his fist and sent it to the point of Bob's chin, but the blow was ill-timed and weak, and far too great an effort for the aviator's strength. With a strangled gasp he crumpled and fell fainting at the feet of the man he had attacked. Bob Randall lifted him up and laid him gently on the straw. Then he turned to Hogan.

"I'd have explained if I hadn't seen that swine Nick at the head of the stairs listening. Poor old Ralph—do you know, Hogan, I think Ralph Mays is about the bravest man I know."

It was the next morning that Bob, looking through the small barred window of their prison hut, called Hogan to look.

"Looks pretty lively, don't it?" said Hogan with a wide grin. "Looks like they're breaking camp. Look at that lot of skins being taken down to the landing-stage. And take a look at those guys up there on the rocks with rifles. Look at 'em running—they've seen something, Mr. Randall—like throwing a squib into a nest of ants, isn't it?"

For the lookouts had given some damn. The men at the barred window saw them running here and there, shouting—words came to their ears—"Coastguard"—"Double cross"—Bob gave a whoop of triumph.

March 27th, 1937.

"It's worked, Hogan, it's worked—they understood—"

"They understood all right, Mr. Randall."

The voice came from the head of the wooden steps. Turning, the men found themselves facing Morgan and his sinister lieutenant.

"You double-crossing rat—but I came here to tell you how smart you've been, Randall. There's a dozen patrol boats entering the harbour at this moment and they're doomed, every one of 'em. Mines, my dear Randall, are as good for coastguards as they are for hi-jackers. That's what they're there for. Every explosion you hear will be one of your boats being blown to hell."

Then, seeing the horror on Bob Randall's face, he turned to his lieutenant:

"Keep 'em covered, Nick. I'm off to the mine control board to watch the fun."

Nick took his seat on the corner of a bench and covered the men with his gun. It was then that Bob saw over the man's shoulder the door at the head of the steps gently opened, and in the aperture he saw the figure of Connie's Eskimo maid, little Marie—and Marie had a gun in her hand. Nick Austin must have heard a movement, for he turned his head and in that moment Bob and Hogan took a chance. Tackling low they hurled themselves on Nick Austin.

The fight was short and sharp. Spurred on by desperation, Bob and Hogan fought like men possessed. But it was the sound of a shot that heralded the end of the fight. Austin gave a cry and went down—and stayed down. Looking up, Bob saw Marie with the smoking gun in her hand. She was spitting out words of hate at the man on the floor.

"Me keel heem. He leave Marie and go away and he say he marry me. I hear heem tell Morgan that he leave me behind—"

Hogan looked across to Bob Randall.

"Thought there was something like that the way this dame looked at Nick. Now, Marie, you've got to help us."

"How I help?"

Bob Randall took the scared girl by her little shoulders.

"See here, Marie. You know where the mine control is?"

"Yes, I know. In hut next big totem pole."

"Then get Miss Dawson and bring her here. Stay with her. Come on, Hogan. This is where we get going."

They were making for the steps when a weak voice came to them from the straw bed on the floor.

"Gee, Bob, that was a scrap. I envy you. Listen, I guess I can do my bit. There are bombs in my 'plane—egg plants—get 'em, Bob—and good luck."

In a small hut by the landing stage Phil Morgan was speaking with a little grey-haired, spectacled man. On the wall in front of them were ranges of levers and press-buttons.

"Ready with your mines, doc?" asked Morgan.

"Been ready for months," replied doc. "What is it, Phil, hi-jackers?"

"Worse. United States coastguards!"

"Good! I've been ading to see my little pets at work. Shall I connect, boss?"

Phil Morgan adjusted his binoculars.

"Almost on the mark, doc—" He drew back from the window. "What's that?"

Men were running, firing their rifles and sawn-off shotguns as they ran. Watching from the window, Morgan saw that Hogan and Bob Randall were loose, they were running, bending low, dodging in and out, but making all the time for the open space where the captured 'plane had been parked. A corner of the hut hid the men from sight. Phil held the doctor by the arm.

"Not yet, doc. They'll be on the mark in about two minutes. Better not waste juice. Wait, say five minutes, and we'll get the lot."

The little doctor nodded. His fingers were itching to get at his beloved controls. Phil Morgan remained at the window. Already shots from the approaching boats were pattering around the huts. A few minutes more—

He wondered what was happening to Randall and Hogan. No doubt they had been caught or were dead by now—no, there they were racing towards the huts, evidently they had been headed off, for they were running away from the parked machine. Dodging, ducking, they raced towards the hut next the totem pole. Phil Morgan bit his lips in disgust. He'd have to fire his mines and take a chance—better than waiting—

"Let 'em have it, doc."

The little doctor bent over his controls, then staggered back as the wall with the switchboard seemed to sway before his eyes. He heard Morgan's voice raised to a scream—then the four walls of the hut crumpled in upon him, in his ears was a deafening explosion. He had a vision of Phil Morgan with blood running down his face, he saw him stagger forward and fall—

The tide of battle had changed. Coastguards in their neat uniforms were herding bunches of men with upraised arms before them into huts.

They found Hogan and Bob Randall wounded, but happy. For the first time in his life Bob all but fainted with pain. But he had enough left in him to point to the hut where Marie was keeping watch over Connie Dawson and the two wounded men, Ralph Mays and Nick Austin, before he completely passed out.

Three days were taken in what Hogan fondly called "mopping up" the Francis Island Settlement. Never in the whole history of seal poaching had there existed so sinister a nest of thugs. Watching the smoking ruins of the huts from the rail of Commander Mays' patrol boat Connie and Bob Randall were silent. But Bob's hand lay on the tiny gloved one on the rail—and that was enough.

Connie Dawson looked along the deck. She smiled up into Bob's face.

"Poor old Hogan," she murmured.

"Oh, Hogan's all right. He's got about a thousand bucks coming to him for his share in this little clean-up. And there's a good job going for him aboard the old Niobe."

She looked at him, a smile curving her pretty lips.

"And who are you to be giving jobs on United States boats?" she asked. Then as he was about to answer her she placed the tips of her fingers on his mouth. "No, don't tell me. Hogan spilled the beans about your promotion. So there's going to be whoopee to-night, anyway, eh?"

"Rather, my dear—but wait till I get hold of that Hogan. I'll just wait a week or two till he's thrown away those crutches he's tooling about with him and then—well, what I'll do to Hogan is nobody's business."

EPISODE 10—
"Annapolis Destroyed"

UNDERSEA KINGDOM

READ THIS FIRST

Professor Norton, with his son Billy, his friend, Lieutenant Crash Corrigan, and Diana Compton, newspaper girl, are exploring the ocean bed in their submarine, the Rocket. The little vessel is drawn magnetically through an undersea tunnel into what is left of Atlantis, the lost continent. Here they find two great powers at war—Unga Khan with his "Black Robes," and the Priest Sharad with his "White Robes."

Norton is hypnotised by Khan into helping him fit a huge, self-contained metal tower with rockets which will propel it upward to the surface of the sea. Khan, with all his terrific inventions, hopes then to dominate the whole world. After many adventures, Corrigan gets Diana and Billy to Annapolis, Sharad's city. He tries to kidnap Norton and get him out of Khan's clutches, but Norton, drugged by the spell Khan has put upon him, manages to break away when brought to safety.

Hakur Outwitted

CORRIGAN caught at Billy, whispering to him to keep quiet.

They crouched below the brow of the small hill, then turned and ran back towards the ancient temple.

"We can't leave dad," Billy panted protestingly.

"We can't help him," Corrigan answered. "That's the trouble. One thing, they won't hurt him—he's too useful. They can't work the rockets."

They listened, standing very still and dead quiet just by the broken-down creeper-clad walls. Stunted trees and overgrown ivy and dried-up palm trees were all about them, the remains of a pleasant garden that must have been the pride of those dead and gone folk who had once worshipped in the building.

"They're coming," Corrigan muttered. "They're after us—your dad must have told them."

"He doesn't know what he's doing, Crash."

"I'm not blaming the old lad. It's Khan's dirty work." Corrigan took the boy's hand. "We're pals, Billy—all of us. Never doubt it."

Comforted, Billy allowed himself to be led back into the ruins. They climbed one of the broken stairways and got on to the walls of what was left of one of the upper storeys. There they had the ability to see without being seen.

Hakur and his patrol, all in the black chariots of Khan, came pounding up to the edge of the old gardens, reining in their horses with sharp cries. Corrigan saw that Norton was standing rather breathlessly in Hakur's chariot, clutching at the front rail of it, his hat at the back of his head, his face a grey mask of puzzled excitement.

Corrigan saw him pointing a shaking hand—evidently he was telling Hakur where to seek his son and companion. But he was pointing quite wrongly.

Hakur leapt from the chariot. He called to the patrol and all dismounted. Ten Black Robe chariots were left deserted save for the pawing, restless horses harnessed to them, forty great beasts of a strength and stupidity almost equal to Hakur's, who blundered on into the ruins, dispersing his patrol among the many tortuous passage-ways in an unorganised search for Corrigan and Billy. These remained hidden in a niche in the broken walls, high above Hakur's men, watching them unseen and unsuspected.

"Do you think you could make the chariot your dad's in?" Corrigan whispered to the boy. "I'd drop down outside the walls and catch you when you jumped; then, with luck, we might get to him and make another dash for Annapolis."

"I'm game, Crash."

"Okay! Let's wait till these fellows get thoroughly lost in the ruins and separated one from t'other," Corrigan gave instructions. "Hakur is staying behind, as usual, but I can settle him. Lie flat on the wall, so as to give them no chance of spotting us."

They stayed there in their crannied perch, listening and watching Hakur, who was just below them, peering into the ruins under a creeper-covered arched entrance. Hakur was so intent on looking straight to the front into the shadows of the piled-up ground floor of the ruins that he offered Corrigan an easy mark.

"He'll do fine as a cushion to break my fall," Corrigan breathed. "Get ready, Billy; I'll drop right on to his shoulders, feet first. Then I'll fix him with one under the ear."

"He's got a spear, Crash. He's holding it upright."

"Don't worry; I'll miss the spear. And I'll borrow it from him, maybe, until we meet again."

Corrigan snaked towards the outer edge of the crumbling wall and slithered his feet over it, half sitting. They could hear the Black Robes below eagerly hunting for them amid the mazy ruins.

But Corrigan had now lost sight of Hakur.

"Tell me where he is?" Corrigan asked Billy. "Take a peep over; I'll wriggle myself outwards to be exactly above him."

Billy crept forward and cautiously looked down upon the Black Robe who had now ventured almost into the broken archway. A few loose stones and mortar slipped from under the boy and came pattering down on Hakur's shoulders. At once he sprang back and stared upward. He could see nothing beyond the ivy-clad walls.

For a long minute Hakur stood there in tense silence. Then he moved forward again as if to call the patrol. But he was uncertain and did not wish to bring his men back on a fool's errand. So he waited, listening intently. The patrol could be heard calling to each other in the broken passage-ways.

Billy kept stock still. He wondered whether Hakur had spied Corrigan's feet as they projected into the ivy.

Hakur was acting very suspiciously; he kept on retreating from the arch, then going back to it. Atlantean night was beginning, and he could make out nothing but the overgrown creepers, shadowing now into a darkish green mass, when he stared upward.

Billy suddenly whispered: "Now!" Corrigan slid off the wall, with a rending of the creepers and ancient ivy, fairly on top of the Black Robe. They both came to ground together, and Corrigan's strong fingers instantly gripped Hakur's bull neck from the back. There was a short, violent grunting struggle, then Hakur went limp as a rag doll in Corrigan's hands.

Satisfied that the fellow was knocked out, Corrigan stood up, calling sharply to the boy: "Jump!"

Billy crouched and then jumped, light as a feather, into the big arms stretched up to catch him. Corrigan put him to the ground and the pair raced off to where Norton was sitting in a day-dream in the chariot. They leapt into it; Corrigan snatched up the reins and shook the horses into action. He wheeled them about and, next moment, Hakur's own team was scurrying away towards the distant city.

Norton made jerking efforts to drag the reins from Corrigan's hands. Above the clatter and racket of their departure his thin voice cried out inarticulate words, loud enough to give an alarm to those within the ruins. They came hurrying out, at first completely at a loss.

Then they saw their fallen leader and, next, his chariot scouring away under the gloom. They sprang to their chariots with fierce shoutings to begin a helter-skelter pursuit, their spears poised, their horses at a mad gallop.

Corrigan headed for the track, trusting to his sense of location, while Billy tried to quieten and comfort his father, who clung with desperation to the front rim of the chariot, his hat jammed on his head, his eyes staring widely.

"What—what are you doing?" he gasped. "Where—where are you taking me?"

"We're taking you back." Corrigan nodded to Billy to grab the reins. Corrigan's hands rested compellingly on Norton's shoulders. "Don't worry; we'll take care of you."

Norton was trembling in an ague more intense than that caused to them all three by the jolting of the chariot.

"Are you taking me to my submarine? I want my charts."

"We're going there," Corrigan answered above the clatter. "You're safe with us. Billy's driving—Billy, your son."

Norton stiffened. "He can't drive four great horses."

Corrigan chuckled. "Can't he? Watch him!"

"He'll have us over." The chariot rose on two wheels over a rut in the road and bumped heavily on its solid wheels. "Give me the reins, Billy—give them to me!"

Corrigan winked at the boy. "He knows you. He's getting better."

The chariot hurtled onward under Billy's guidance. Behind them, falling farther and farther into the darkening background, the Black Robes, with yells and imprecations, kept up the chase.

Khan had been watching the last part of their flight on his reflectograph.

Norton Escapes Again

TWILIGHT had come to Atlantis, but there was light enough to show Unga Khan and Ditmar the misty figures of the professor and Corrigan being driven by young Billy into Annapolis in the Black Robe chariot. Khan's anger was so great that he could not trust himself to speak.

He stood staring at the screen, his brows as black as thunder, his teeth grinding together. Ditmar feared that his master was going to have a fit and moved a little away, so as to be able to reach the door of the throne-room and escape.

Khan turned from the screen. He asked in sizarer calm:

"Did Norton show you how to work the controls of the submarine?"

"I asked him, but—"

"But he didn't tell you? And you hadn't the wits to make him tell you." Khan glared at his shrinking minion.

"I am truly surrounded by machines. We must have Norton. See if you can pick up that fool Hakur and his patrol."

Ditmar caused the reflectograph to flash here and there about the country, pictures focusing and fading in rapid succession. At last he got a shot of Hakur and his chariots filing along in a dismal procession on the track, as they slowly headed for home.

"I will send him back with my entire army," said Khan grimly. "Every one—every mechanical device that we have—even the Volkites."

"The Juggernaut has not yet been fully repaired, Imperial High and Mighty," Ditmar ventured. "If you would but sit quietly in this room and concentrate your imperial will upon this old pocket maker, he would return to you."

Khan was pleased and flattered, as Ditmar had hoped. He first pretended to doubt, then agreed.

"I will make an attempt," he finally decided. "It will be an interesting experiment in telepathy. But Hakur must return to Annapolis and lay siege to the city. Sharad and his Whites have come to the end of their tether. Leave me—see to it that I am not disturbed."

In Sharad's palace Norton was seated in a corner of the room which had been courteously allotted to him by the high priest. Corrigan knelt before the old man to bring their eyes on a level. Billy stood anxiously by his father's side.

"Don't you know me?" Corrigan was asking, trying to impress himself upon the professor.

"You're Corrigan," Norton replied at once. "An enemy of my master who, even now, is pressing me to return to him."

"I am your friend. This is Billy."

Norton said testily:

"I know—I know! You're Corrigan and he's Billy. Well, what of it?"

"He's your son."

Norton turned his head towards the boy. They regarded each other in silence. Then Norton asked falteringly: "Who are you? Why are we here?"

"The Rocket brought us, dad. We got caught in a magnetic storm or something and the submarine was dragged into a sea tunnel."

"Sea tunnel? Nonsense! I came here because he wanted me—the great and mighty Unga Khan. I am to be his ambassador when we ascend." He blinked a little. "I can't see you properly, everything is in a fog. I want sleep, I'm tired."

He closed his eyes and kept them so, obstinate lines about his mouth and forehead. Corrigan made a sign to Billy and they left him in his chair.

Norton lay very still, then opened his eyes to make sure. Yes, they had gone, these tiresome people whom he seemed to vaguely remember. He waited, listening.

No one about. He got up, to move quietly to the door and listen still more closely. He nodded his head as if in answer to instructions received within his subconsciousness.

"All right," he muttered. "You're all in such a hurry, every one of you. No peace for anybody. What am I to do? I see, I'll manage it. Just go about as if I'm quite at home? Get down to the courtyard where the gates are open and quietly walk out? The chariots are waiting for me on the pass?"

He opened the door and went out into the corridor. Then ambled to the stairs, preoccupied, day-dreaming, not heeding anyone. He came out into the courtyard, where Martos saluted, turning to study the old fellow with kindly curiosity.

Norton gestured with a flabby hand and passed on. Martos saw him wandering amongst the people who were walking and talking together in the orderly manner which so distinguished the White Robes from the insurgent Blacks.

By the gates stood Darius. He saluted the professor who, hatless, moved forward.

"A fine night," said Norton. "I'll walk a little way."

Darius opened the gates, and the old fellow very leisurely went out, turning his head every now and then to make sure that he was unobserved.

Martos called to Darius, who came away from the gate.

On the instant Norton began to run. He moved with surprising agility for one so tired and old. Night was falling now and he was soon lost to sight. Darius, coming back to the gate, thought that the old fellow had re-entered the city.

He closed the heavy doors.

Hakur had halted in the pass. Norton came trotting up to where the Black Robo commander was standing gloomily beside his chariot.

"You're to take me to our master," Norton ordered in peremptory fashion. "He needs me. He tells me he can do nothing without my help. He is quite right; you are all entirely dependent on me. Get that into your thick head and don't ever forget it."

Hakur stood to attention. This was the sort of talk he understood.

He assisted the professor into a chariot and told the driver to go quickly and carefully to the tower. The patrol followed in high spirits; they had got the man their fierce master wanted and all would be well.

Khan barely waited for Hakur to finish speaking into the receiving plate of the reflectograph in the stables.

"Escort Professor Norton to his rooms," he ordered. "Then mobilise all arms and proceed to Annapolis. The city is to be taken. I will direct an intense bombardment from here and you will make a final assault when the barrage ceases."

He snapped off the reflectograph and turned to the patient, block-headed Ditmar.

"Put the projector into operation. Fire low, so as to avoid danger to the dome above us. Destroy the city—level it to the ground."

Ditmar answered with sour satisfaction:

"At last, Imperial High and Mighty! I will go to the turret and every torpedo shall be fired at an exact trajectory. I will send fire bombs at first, to give us light and correct direction."

"Shall I be able to see?" Khan wondered. "It is very dark."

"You will see the fires springing up. They will turn night into day. The flames of the White Robes' torments will bring joy and warmth to you, High and Mighty."

Khan rubbed his hands together as if washing them in the blood of his enemies.

Annapolis Destroyed

HAKUR, anxious to reinstate himself and his army in the good graces of Unga Khan, did not wait for the bombardment of the White Robes' city. He planned to take it by assault with his scaling ladders and his catapults and by force of arms. He attacked under the night, trying to batter in the gates with huge banks of timber roped around and carried by gangs of men on either side advancing in a kind of running charge, so that the head of the baulk should smash in the timbers of the gates.

Corrigan at once had the flame-throwers put into action, and many teams of ram carriers were scorched to death as they charged at the gates. But the great round stones flung by the catapults did enormous damage; while the Black Robes, inspired by their leader's ardour, swarmed on the scaling ladders almost before they had been hooked on to the walls, and clambered up to the ramparts in their hundreds. Fighting was absolutely merciless. It was life or death for the Whites, and they felt it to be so in their hearts.

They held their enemies at bay under Corrigan's ceaseless efforts and bold leadership. Hakur fell back, to prepare another assault on the battered gates. He saw, with gloating eyes, that the flame-throwers were failing; no longer did the round openings under the archway belch forth their fires with the fierceness with which they had begun.

Hakur ordered the long-bowmen to speed short volleys of barbed arrows over the ramparts, then prepared fresh teams of "carriers" and again brought the rams into action. He bade the catapult men to aim their monstrous, weighty missiles at the gates themselves. With thudding crashes the immense round stones came hurtling at the splintered timbers, and at last one of the gates fell inwards, smashed off its hinges. Hakur led his best troops on a charge over the wreck and, by sheer and dull tenacity, won a way into the courtyard.

Those of his army already on the ramparts leapt down to add to the furious charges Hakur made to gain the palace steps.

The White Robes were beaten back, but fought with desperation and great bravery. Martos and a small company hacked at the rear ranks of Hakur's men, while Darius tried to stem the crowd of Black Robes who, spears and swords upraised, were seeking to follow Hakur over the broken gate.

Despite all efforts to stay them, the Black Robes reached the palace and broke in through the doors. Corrigan held the stairway against the madly shrieking horde and kept Hakur's men from ascending. Swords clashed together; spears were recklessly thrown, men fought with their fists or with any weapon they could seize upon.

The tide of battle suddenly ebbed; Darius and others had contrived partly to re-erect the broken gate. Hakur's company was trapped between Martos and his men, and Corrigan with his stalwarts on the stairs of the palace hallway.

But now came the beginning of the end for the White Robes; Ditmar's first torpedo, charged with highly explosive gas, shrieked through the night. It carried away with it the crown of the archway above the shattered gates, it struck the left wing of the palace and buried itself in a lower storey. Then came a sickening explosion, and the whole front was lifted up, to fall outwards in a vast avalanche of bricks and stones and broken glass, which descended on the struggling masses below. Flames leapt through the ruins, and the first of the immense fires which were to consume Annapolis to ashes was lighted.

The Black Robes made a wild dash to get out of the city. They knew what was to follow. A heaped mass of men gathered together under the smashed archway, all frantic to climb over the wreck of the gates. The White Robes charged after them, and were evening the score when the second torpedo hissed forth from the turret of Khan's tower.

This terrible missile curved as it fell to plunge its pointed firing cap into the centre of the courtyard. A deafening explosion shook the city to its foundations; paving-stones were torn up and shot into the air as if they were wisps of straw. Friends and foes alike were blown into shreds, or torn limb from limb.

Panic filled the city. There was no longer any thought of fighting, all were passionately eager to save themselves. The palace left wing was burning fiercely—flames shooting upwards and turning night into day, as Ditmar had foretold.

Sharad ran out from his apartments to Corrigan, who was clearing the stairway of dead and wounded. The high priest called to him in despair:

"Can nothing be done?"

Corrigan shook his head.

"We must fall back on the outskirts of the city. I will tell the people, while you look after Diana and the boy."

"His father is responsible for this."

"We don't know, we can't attempt to alight the blame. Norton may have gone to the inland sea—"

A terrific explosion drowned Corrigan's words. A third torpedo had cut through a bastion of the outer walls and had blown that section into nothingness. Splintered stones and bricks fell everywhere in showers, killing or maiming all those on whom they descended. Screams of agony were mingled with furious shoutings, an incendiary bomb, following almost instantly on the torpedo, struck the barracks on the right of the courtyard, smashed in the front, then poured its flaming gas over the building, causing the death of many hundreds of people who had sought refuge there.

Corrigan shouted above the din:

"We must evacuate the city! I will tell Martos!"

March 27th, 1937

Sharad called back to him:

"I will take your friends to the new temple at the back of the palace grounds."

Corrigan ran down the stairs and out into the inferno of flames and destruction. He yelled to the panic-stricken mob to fly from the city—to collect their families and take to the hills, or whatever cover they could find.

Many of the White Robes, beside themselves with fear, fled out over the smashed-down walls and were mercilessly butchered by Hakur's men, who had now fought their way out.

Darius had been cut down at his post by the gates. The Black Robes prepared to advance behind the barrage of torpedoes and shells directed so unerringly by Ditmar from the tower.

So frightful and intense became the bombardment that Hakur was held up for an hour ere he could push forward over what was left of the walls of the beautiful ages-old city of Annapolis, to commence his fell work of massacre.

The gas fumes rising from the wreck of the city were so intense and persistent that Hakur dared not push in very far. He and his savage horde killed all those who were lying wounded in the courtyard, then tried to release and capture the terrified horses in their stables.

Behind the palace the trading part of the city was burning in a sullen way, dense clouds of smoke rising from the many fires rising where Ditmar's bombs had fallen.

That worthy hoped to content his master by showing him, on the screen of the reflectograph, pictures of the frightful destruction they had brought about.

"It is not enough if Sharad still lives," said Khan venomously.

"Hakur will have entered the city, Imperial High and Mighty," Ditmar ventured to argue. "He has strict orders to finish the White Robes—to kill all, young and old."

"Hakur is not to be relied upon," Khan answered. "Continue the bombardment."

"But if we send torpedoes now our men will be caught also."

"They must look after themselves," snapped Khan. "I am sure Sharad has escaped. Fire the projector until I bid you stop!"

Death of Sharad

KHAN was right. Sharad had sought refuge in the temple beyond the palace, a low-pitched, one-storeyed building of granite of immense strength. With him were Diana and Billy. The high priest had gone to the altar to pray; the other two were watching and whispering together.

"Will Crash know where we are?" Billy wondered. "I don't like being here while he's fighting."

"What else can we do?" Diana asked. "If we go away we shall lose each other. We had better stay."

Corrigan had rallied the remains of Sharad's forces in the palace grounds. The bombardment seemed to have ceased and, although the city burned in many places, the White Robe soldiers could not believe that it was lost beyond all hope. They heard the triumphant Black Robes shouting riotously in the courtyard and itched to sweep away these wretches from the vantage-point they had gained.

Corrigan divided the Whites into two companies, one under his own command, the other under Martos. They were to creep forth from the palace grounds and converge on their enemies on either flank. In the darkness Corrigan hoped to frighten Hakur's men into believing that the forces against them were much greater than they were.

The plan succeeded by the unexpectedness of the White attack. Hakur's army was partly scattered along the front of the burning palace, the soldiers seeking to loot what they could; the rest, under little Zogg, had gone into the trading centre beyond the palace, and were busily smashing in the shop windows and killing all those who dared to oppose them.

Corrigan's counter attack took Hakur by surprise, and for a time the tables were completely turned.

Martos broke in on the left flank and carried his company right through the square. Corrigan's men engaged with the yelling Blacks as they climbed, panic-stricken, over the ruins of the broker walls.

Moloch now appeared. He had been caught in the barracks when the bomb had struck that building and had been imprisoned by the falling debris. He had managed to scrape a way out, then gas fumes had overpowered him. He had imagined all was lost when he saw, by the light of the dancing flames, the Black Robes in possession of the courtyard.

He now ranged himself beside Corrigan and fought with such bravery and intelligence that Corrigan was presently able to leave him in charge of a half-company whilst he took the other half forward in a clearing up of the courtyard with Martos and his men.

The Black Robes were driven out of the wrecked city and their catapult engines were overturned. The Whites then retired in good order to attempt salvage of their burning homes and to settle with the Blacks under little Zogg.

Corrigan joined his command to that of Martos and went in search of Billy and Diana. He knew that they had gone with Sharad to the new temple, and hoped that all three were sheltering within the solid building.

The gardens of the palace were laid out in terraces, gradually descending to the small lake which cut off the temple from the rest of the grounds. The darkness was fitfully lightened by the fires of the palace and by those in the trading quarter, but Corrigan found difficulty in getting to Sharad's refuge. The lake seemed to be always between him and it.

At length he came upon a narrow stone bridge and ran anxiously across it. He was entering the temple from the far side when Ditmar resumed the bombardment.

The torpedoes followed each other in reckless style. They were being fired without system, or any attempt at sighting or judgment of distance. Many sped right over the city to explode in the hills beyond; others fell short, causing Hakur's men such alarm that they retreated in a disorderly rabble.

But the first missile had been fated to find its mark. It had sped its fatal path through the burning palace and, deflected, had struck the cupola of the temple under which Sharad was at prayer. The explosion was almost lost in the crash of falling masonry—a heavy rafter dropped right across the bowed back of the high priest, and Sharad died of a broken spine with a prayer on his lips.

Corrigan entered the temple just as the torpedo struck the cupola. The deafening confusion of noise and dust and debris flying in the dense darkness rendered him helpless to do anything but shout amid the frightful din for Diana and Billy. He called himself

"They're not criminals," shrieked Aunt Carrie. "You're a wicked man. Go away!"

Blake smiled thinly as he answered: "Don't be deceived, Miss Burton—it's no use opposing the law. You're becoming an accessory—you'll have to take most serious consequences if these men are not given up to justice."

Aunt Carrie slammed down the window in his face.

Blake walked back to where his men were gathered.

"Take 'em by storm!" he gritted out.

A fusillade of shots rang out, smashing windows in the front of the ranch. Some of the party ran round to the back of the house to send a second volley in at the windows there. For a long minute there was no reply from the besieged; then a single shot sounded and Blake's hat was whisked off his head.

He caught up his gun and aimed at an upper window where his quick eyes had spied a capped head. The bullet crashed in—then someone hidden below the sill raised the capped head in derision. It was a duster tied round a broom!

No one can stand being made ridiculous—least of all Judge Blake. His men were grinning and he was furious. "Fire the place! Burn 'em out! Shoot 'em down like rats when they run out!"

Luke crept like a snake to cover. He got ready one of the tarred torches which Blake had brought over in his buggy. With this flaming and smoking, Luke shouted for Carlos, and the pair of rascals ran out behind those who were now shooting at the porch door, seeking to smash it in.

The defenders were saving their ammunition. They hadn't too much, nor too many guns. But such as they had were being well handled under Jeff's command. He was crouching low by a smashed window in the parlour, taking shots when he dared from behind a torn curtain. He had quick eyes and ventured to peep out each time before firing. The rustlers were now spreading wide, taking cover where they could; but Jeff picked off a couple of them very neatly with two quick consecutive shots.

Alice, crouching near him, whispered: "I can shoot. If they break in, I'm going to fight."

Jeff answered her gruffly:

"Take care of yourself, miss. I guess Steve's sort of counting on me to look after you."

Alice blushed at this.

"I don't see why," she was saying, when a random bullet crashed in and caught Jeff's hand. The ranger dropped his rifle.

"Gimme that shooter you got. I can fire left-handed."

Alice bound up the broken right hand with a handkerchief. Jeff setting his teeth together as he endured the pain. He fired the six-gun at the sniper outside who had ventured partly to show himself. A yell of rage was Jeff's reward.

"Got him!" he muttered.

Aunt Carrie called to them. "They've got torches. They're going to fire the house! Stop them, Alice—stop them at once!"

Jeff had to grin again.

"Ain't that like a woman? Who's able to stop 'em?"

Aunt Carrie came running into the parlour.

"I'm going to!" She snatched up a gun and dashed away with it.

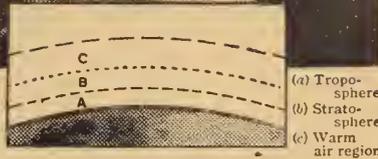

"Crazy!" Jeff muttered.

Jordan and the other ranch-hands were posted about the house beside the shattered windows. They were doing good work—Blake was becoming furious at the opposition put up. He had expected to rush the ranch easily in a few minutes.

Meanwhile, Luke was climbing the tarred roof of a shed which abutted on the main buildings. If this could be got well alight, the south wind would blow the flames on to the dry woodwork of the ranch and soon finish off the defence. Aunt Carrie, at a small upper window, spotted him and the flaming torch. She took a trembling aim with the gun she had snatched up.

She had only the foggiest idea of shooting, but she caught Luke fair and square in the shoulder with her first effort.

He dropped the torch and rolled off the shed roof with screams of agony. The flaming torch had fallen with him and upon him, setting fire to his clothes. Aunt Carrie, squealing, collapsed backwards into the room with the shock of the revolver fire. Jeff dashed upstairs to her.

"Gee, Miss Carrie—have they got you?"

She couldn't speak—she could only point to the window. Jeff took a quick sight and fired at Carlos who had gone to the rescue of Luke. Another wild yell told that the bullet had gone home.

Blake decided on one last desperate gamble. He ordered his men to form up and charge over the porch and smash in the door. He knew that the defenders couldn't have much more ammunition. He led the attack—shouting to his fellows to follow him.

They reached the porch with the loss of one man. They began to beat in the door with the butts of their guns and with kicks from their heavy boots. A splintering crash sounded just as Alice called to Jeff that one of the ranch-hands had been stricken down in the kitchen by a chance shot.

Blake's bull roar could be heard at the falling door.

"Surrender! It ain't no use—"

His shout was cut short. Someone behind him was shrieking:

"Judge—judge—here's the Rangers!"

For the next few minutes all was confusion. The besieged couldn't make head or tail of what was going on; they listened with awe to the crack of rifles, the shouts and yells, the clattering hoofs of horses and quickly snapping reports of six-shooters.

Presently these ended. There was a kind of silence for a moment or two. Then Captain Norris' hearty voice was heard at the broken-in door:

"Anybody at home?"

They came crowding out to where he stood with his Rangers grouped around him. Two of them had Blake between them, neatly roped and looking very dishevelled. Ainslee was there—Alice ran to him, all smiles now.

"I got old Papa Bear himself," Steve told her. "I caught him sneaking off."

Said Jeff, from somewhere in the back-ground:

"Looks more like a hog to me!"

Norris gripped Steve's hand.

"I'm going to hold the whole piggery for the Federal authorities. We've got enough evidence to swing the lot—thanks to you two fellows." He dropped Steve's hand and called to Jeff. "Come out of it, Carter—I see you hidin' there with Miss Carrie. We got to get busy caging these birds."

Aunt Carrie and Jeff came forward. Aunt Carrie was looking very pleased with life as she nursed Jeff's injured hand. He was grinning a little sheepishly.

"Guess we might make a double weddin' of it," he said. "The two Miss Burtons and Steve and me."

Alice caught him up.

"Why, Mr. Carter—how you do talk! Steve hasn't asked me yet."

But Steve's arm was eloquently about her shoulders. Norris winked—the Rangers began to hustle Blake away towards the ring where they had roped their other prisoners.

hoarse and was about to go when he felt a small cold hand touch his.

A little voice croaked:

"That you, Crash?"

"Billy!"

"I'm all right, Crash. I can't see anything—got dust in my eyes. Where's Diana?"

"Isn't she here?" Corrigan asked shakely.

"She was. She went up to Sharad just before the smash came. Just listen to those torpedoes." The boy shivered. "D'you think they'll get us?"

Corrigan answered:

"We've got to risk it. Get outside and wait for me."

"I'll come, too," the boy told him. "I'd sooner be with you, Crash."

They linked hands and felt their way forward. The dust was settling a little, and a faint, gloomy reflection of the fires raging in the city was east down ward from the bronze dome above them through the gasped and gaping roof of the cupola. A horrible smell of burning cloth and resinous wood almost choked them as they dimly perceived the black shadow of a huge splintered beam lying athwart the crushed body of Sharad.

"Is he dead?" whispered Billy, clutching more tightly to Corrigan's hand.

"Killed on the instant." Corrigan moved forward to kneel and touch the body of the high priest. "We will come back for him and try to move the beam. Keep close to me." He called in a sudden lull: "Diana—Diana!"

The scream of the shells flying above them and exploding as they struck was the only answer. Stones slipped and fell scrapingly from the roof; the cracked rafters still standing creaked and groaned as though warning them to escape from under the smashed masonry and timbers whilst there was yet time.

"MAD HOLIDAY"

"Trent!" It was Williams' turn to be amazed.

With a snarl of rage, Williams tried to get at the gun he had concealed under his arm-pit. He was sure that Trent would not have the nerve to shoot him in cold blood. He was right, but that did not prevent Trent stepping forward and with his left socking the killer a fearful punch in the jaw. Williams dropped like a pole-axed ox.

"Clever, these Chinese," chuckled Philip, with a grin at the girl.

"Philip," she cried, and flung herself into his arms.

The door opened again, and there stood the smiling Li Yat.

"A most excellent actor, Mr. Trent." He bowed over folded arms. "My congratulations. Your idea much better than mine."

Philip handed back to Li Yat his money.

"We'll have to give the Dragon back to the police, but as it once belonged to your family I guess they'll fix it so you can buy it. Ah!" He turned his head. "By the sound of the heavy feet I imagine the police have arrived."

Chief Gibbs, a number of officers and two coal-begrimed figures burst into the room.

"If this is some sort of gag you're not going to get away this time," Gibbs shouted, staring suspiciously at Trent's kimono.

"No gag this time, chief," chuckled Philip Trent. "We've got a couple of corpses for you." He pointed to the groaning Williams. "Only this one isn't quite dead." He held out his hand, and in it glittered the White Dragon. "And here's what all the fun's been about."

"The Dragon!" exclaimed Gibbs in an awed voice.

"A simple matter of deduction," blandly retorted Philip. "And now, if no one has any objection, I propose continuing my vacation."

"But I've got to know what happened."

"Mert will tell you all the details," answered Philip. "Williams came back as I prophesied he would—to collect from Mr. Li Yat. Well, all that Williams collected was a sock in the jaw."

"There's a reward, Trent, and—"

"Chief, we want a good half to go to Cokey Joe, a quarter to Mert and Hymie, and the rest to the most suitable police orphanage. Lastly, I would like you to do your best, chief, to see that Mr. Li Yat is able to buy the White Dragon, which originally belonged to his family. And tell the Press that if they print a lot of junk about me being a swell detective I may never act again."

Not very long afterwards Peter and Philip drove home alone in a taxi.

"Well, I reckon you've got a grand plot for a new book," Philip said.

"What do you think of the twist I got in at the end?"

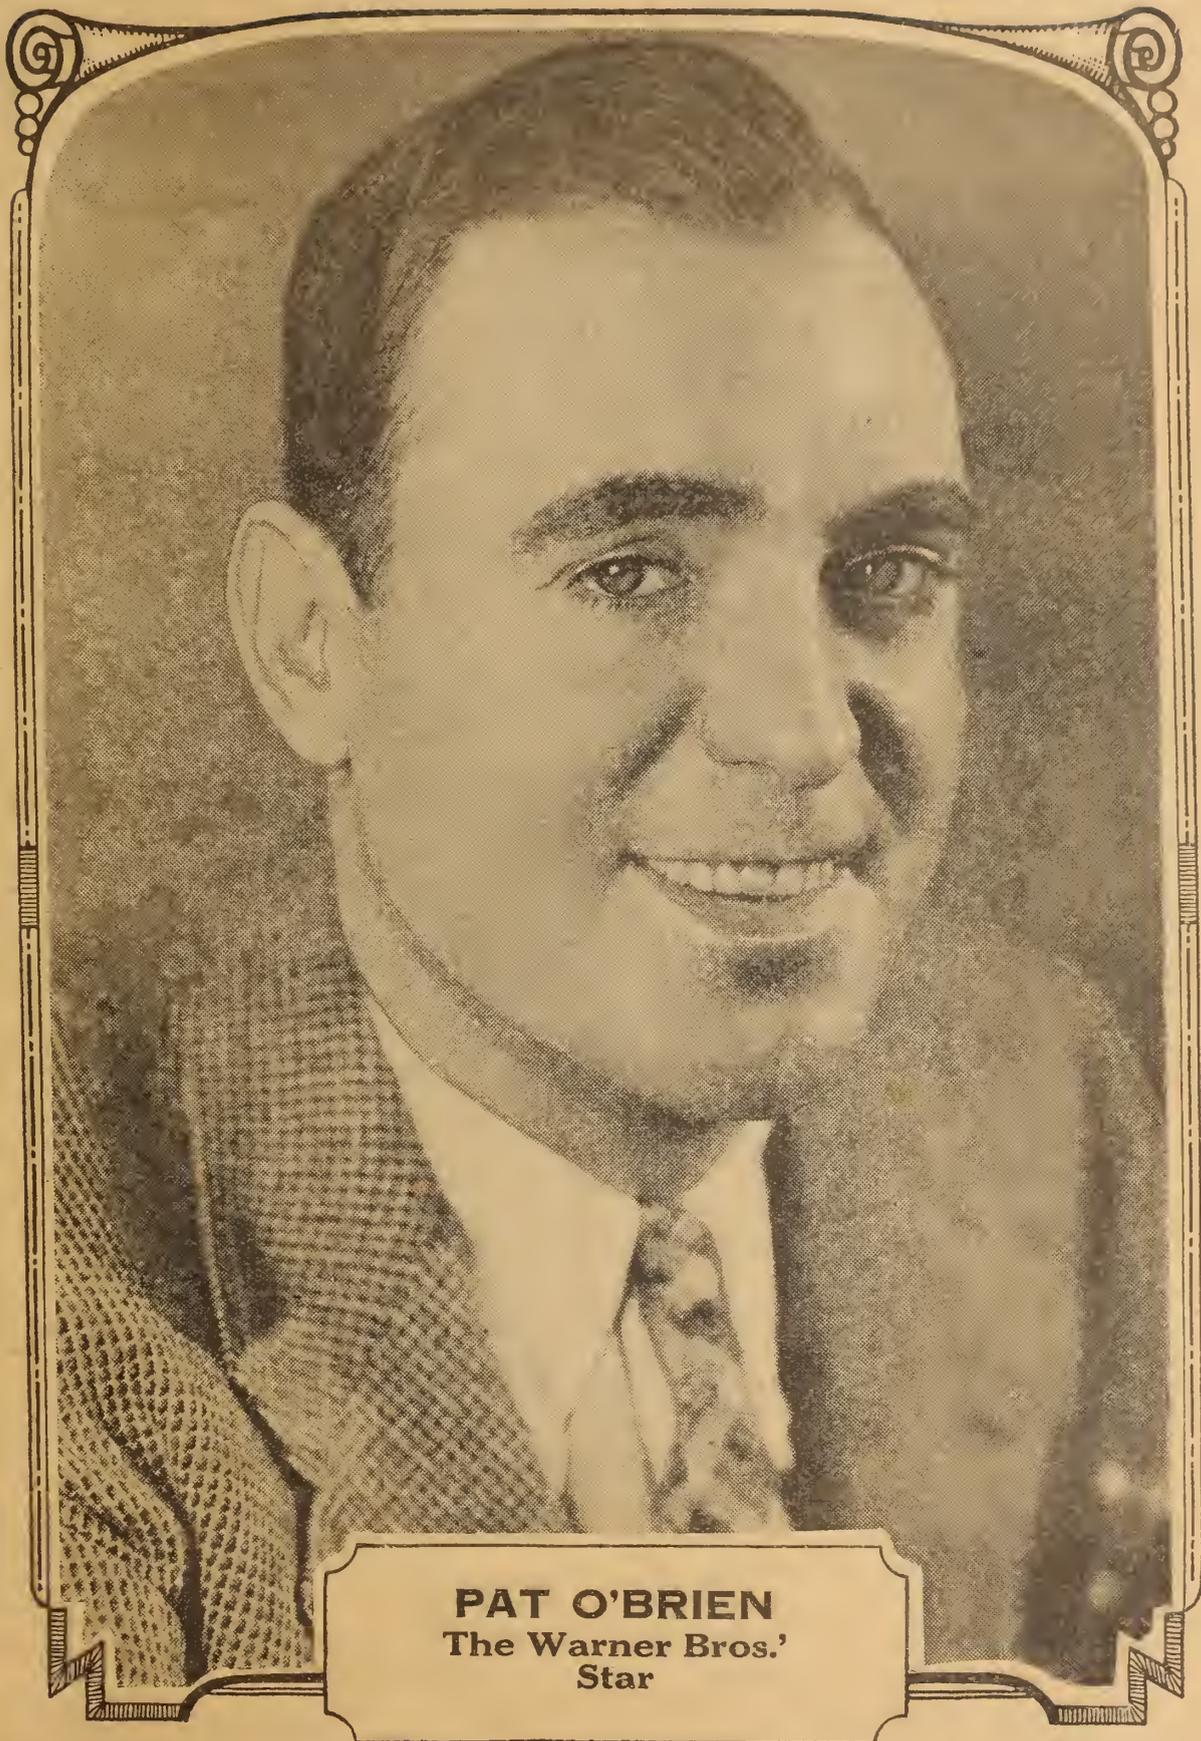

"You're wrong—it isn't the end."

"No?" He looked at her.

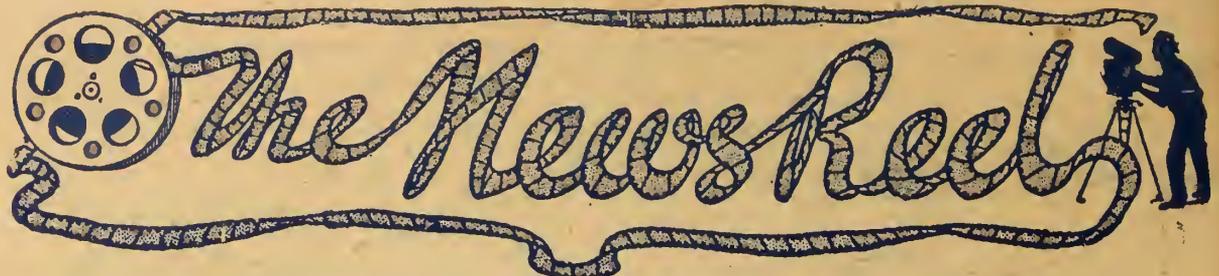

"No. I always end them in a clinch." cried Peter, and her arms crept round his neck.

"You win!" cried Philip Trent, and smiled contentedly.

Studio Thrills for "Hurricane"

Samuel Goldwyn's screen version of "Hurricane," the story by the authors of "Mutiny on the Bonnty," promises to be the most spectacular production of his career.

Most of the filming will be done on various South Sea islands. The United States Government are giving full co-operation, and the technicians and actors will be guests at the naval station on Pago Pago during their two or three months' stay. The naval officers and men are erecting buildings to house the troupe, and are preparing a native village on the island of Tutuila for the filming of some of the most important scenes.

The most thrilling part of the picture, however—the hurricane—will be contrived in the studio. To film these scenes, Goldwyn has signed James Basevi, who was responsible for the earthquake in "San Francisco." Under his instructions the model of the island and village to be destroyed by the hurricane has been constructed. It is a replica of the actual island which the location unit will film in the South Seas. The model is 40 feet in length and 20 feet wide, complete with native houses, church, palm forest, docks, ocean front and boats, all fashioned to scale.

Basevi expects to spend several months of hard work in filming the havoc scenes. So far Basevi has assembled the following equipment: 4 steel dump tanks capable of holding 55,000 gallons of water; two 12-in. centrifugal pumps; 5 Liberty motors; 3 specially constructed wave machines; a van-load of 12-in. and 34-in. steel piping; 4 aeroplane engines and propellers, ready to generate the 110 mile-an-hour gale—and that is only the beginning.

Joel McCrae has been selected for the leading rôle of Terangi, the native Lero Margo, of "Crime with Passion" fame, will play opposite him.

Eleanor Powell to Have First Dance Partner

The question of whether or not Eleanor Powell is able to dance with a partner was answered in Hollywood when it was announced that she is to be teamed with George Murphy.

The dancer will also do several of her solo tap routines for which she has become so famous; but Jack Chummings, producer of "Broadway Melody of 1937," decided to include a ball-room tap number for the star with Murphy.

During her Broadway career, Miss Powell did tap steps on the stage with other dancers, but this will be the first "team dancing" for her.

Miss Powell says she is happy for the opportunity, because so many of her fans have been asking if her style of dancing would allow her to team with other famous dancers.

She is also going to do a novelty dance with Buddy Ebsen, George Tapps and Murphy.

Popular Star Signed for "Jericho"

To complete the star cast of the Capitol picture, "Jericho," Capitol Films announce that they have signed Wallace Ford to join Paul Robeson, Princess Kouka and Henry Wilcoxon in this great picture of desert adventure which is being directed by Thornton Freeland and produced by Walter Futter.

Wallace Ford needs no introduction. His rôles of tough guys, undaunted, hard-driving news reporters, smart getters and all those other "on-your-toes" characters from modern life have made him a firm film favourite.

Born in England, Wallace Ford left home shores for America as a Barnardo boy, and his screen success has come only after hard struggles. His better-known rôles are the American in the British Army in "O.H.M.S.," as Victor MacLaglen's friend in the classic "Infanterie," with Joan Crawford in "Possessed," in "It Happened in Hollywood," "Men in White," "I Hate Women," and a score more films. Wallace was under contract to M.G.M. at one time for seven years. There is hardly a small-town stage that Wallace Ford hasn't walked across. From oil-lamp footlights to automatic coloured spotlights, Wallace has played his part in such stage successes as "Abie's Irish Rose," "Abraham Lincoln," "Broadway" and "Bad Girl."

His rôle in the Capitol picture "Jericho" should fit him perfectly—a much-travelled and "kicked around" doughboy who teams up with Paul Robeson escaping from injustice to sail in a tiny boat to African waters. There is fine, powerful dramatic material here—the loyalty and deep friendship of two men fighting against almost insurmountable difficulties.

Wallace Ford is travelling with all speed to North Africa, where production is already proceeding at efficient speed.

The "Unloaded Gun"

Another "unloaded gun" story with an unusual twist has given Henry Wilcoxon something to think about.

The actor, who was born in the British West Indies, where he spent some time as a pearl and salvage diver, has an important rôle with Gary Cooper and George Raft in Paramount's "Soul at Sea."

Wilcoxon possesses a collection of antique firearms, among which is a duelling pistol said to have belonged to the pirate Blackbeard. Ever since he acquired the weapon seven years ago, Wilcoxon believed it to be unloaded. And thereby hangs a tale.

Recently, as he sat reading in the front room of his San Fernando valley ranch-house, there was a thud and a muffled explosion behind him, and something whizzed past his ear.

The maid, cleaning the room, had lifted the pistol from the mantelpiece to dust it, dropped it accidentally, the fall discharging a quantity of ancient powder. The ball struck the wall in front of Wilcoxon with only slight force and fell to the floor.

But the incident made the Paramount player go over the rest of his old gun collection to make sure nothing else was loaded!

Henry Wilcoxon is next to appear in the Capitol picture "Jericho."

The Missing Speedboat

A speedboat weighing a ton and measuring twenty feet in length vanished recently at 20th Century-Fox Studios during shooting on the thriller, "Midnight Taxi."

It happened this way: the script called for an exciting getaway by gangsters, led by Gilbert Roland, in the speedboat. Frances Drake was carried off with them. All went well, the scene was "in the can," and the company hastily moored the boat and left for lunch.

Although the boat was moored on a lake, and the lake was in the studio guarded by police, when the unit returned, the speedboat was gone.

"We can't finish the picture without the boat," the company wailed.

The bewildered cast and crew searched. Suddenly an assistant director caught a glimpse of something shining vaguely up from the murky depths of the "lake."

"There she is!" he yelled. "Sunk!"

And there she was—sunk! Someone had been in such a hurry to leave the set that he had left the automatic bailer wide open.

A Gripping Mystery Drama of the Lumber Camps

When Gene Barkley fails to return from an assignment to investigate the cause of a strange series of accidents in the logging outpost of St. Johns, his chum and fellow "Mountie," Alan Craig, takes over the case—and posing as a fugitive from justice becomes the apparent tool of a gang of crooks in order to get to the bottom of the mystery. A story packed with action, starring Charles Starrett

The Way of a Friend

SLOWLY and thoughtfully James Barkley, superintendent at Fort Chapelle of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, filled his pipe with tobacco. What his son, Constable Eugene Barkley, had just told him was both pleasing and disturbing.

"Step into my room a moment, Gene," he said. "I want to talk to Ann alone about this."

Gene, a tall and well-knit figure in his uniform and quite a good-looking young man in his dark-featured fashion, crossed the big living-room of his father's cabin into a very much smaller room, fitted as an office, and the elderly superintendent went to the foot of a staircase set against one of the wooden walls and called up to his ward, daughter of the dearest friend he had ever had in his life.

He was back at the mantelpiece, puffing at his pipe and gazing into the heart of a fire of blazing logs, when she came tripping down to him, a slenderly graceful girl in a dark blue frock which recently had arrived at the post from far-away Montreal. Her eyes were blue and perhaps a little troubled; her hair was golden-brown.

"I want to talk to you, my dear," the superintendent said gravely and without looking round at her. "My son tells me that he has proposed to you and that you've agreed to marry him."

"Yes," she confirmed, and added: "that is, if you're willing."

"Willing?" He turned, pipe in hand, to stare at her. "My dear girl, nothing would make me happier! You know that, but—well—"

April 24th, 1937.

"But what?" she inquired.

"Are you sure that you're doing this because you want to, or is it just because—well, because you feel that you owe it to me?"

"I don't think I understand," she murmured.

"Five years ago, when your father died, you came to me here. You've been a real daughter to me, and I—P've tried to make you happy."

"And you think I accepted your son rather than hurt you?" she suggested.

"Is that it?"

"It would be like you, Ann."

Her blue eyes bore the scrutiny of his grey ones well enough.

"I'm marrying Gene because I love him," she declared. "Please believe that."

"I do believe it," he nodded. "But somehow I thought it would be Alan Craig that you would choose."

For a moment only she hesitated, then quite definitely she said:

"I've always thought of Alan more as a big brother."

"I wish it meant no more than that to him," sighed the superintendent.

"Gene!"

Gene appeared with an alacrity which suggested that he had been listening in the other room.

"You've made me very happy, you two," said his father. "But what about Alan? Isn't this likely to be a shock for him?"

The smile on Gene's face faded.

"I'm afraid it is," he admitted. "In fact, we—er—we hoped that you might break the news to him for us."

The superintendent frowned.

"Have you been trained to run away from unpleasant obligations?" he asked sharply.

"No, sir," Gene began lamely, "but I—"

"It isn't ourselves we're thinking of," Ann hastily cut in. "We thought it might be easier for Alan if you told him."

The superintendent rubbed his chin. "Perhaps you're right," he conceded.

"Then you will tell him?" asked Ann.

"We'll see when he gets back to the post."

Not more than a hundred yards from the veranda of the cabin the waters of Lake Clear were sparkling in the spring sunshine. The sound of voices down by the landing-stage drew the superintendent to a window, and he saw several men of the Mounted hailing a colleague in uniform who was propelling a canoe rapidly towards them.

"He seems to have timed his arrival almost to the minute!" remarked the superintendent.

In the front of the canoe which Alan Craig was paddling a ragged and unshaven fellow was huddled, his left arm in an improvised sling. He was Alan's prisoner, and as the landing-stage was reached one of the Mounties helped him out on to his feet.

"Ugly looking blighter, isn't he?" said the Mountie, whose name was Martin.

"Not too handsome," agreed Alan, himself a particularly fine specimen of young manhood, and he stepped ashore and caught hold of the prisoner's sound arm. "Come on, easy now."

"Looks like you had a bit of a go with him," Martin commented.

"Nothing serious," said Alan.

"We didn't expect you back for another two weeks at the best."

"Had a bit of luck, that's all."

Five minutes later the prisoner was in a cell in the guard-room and Alan was facing Sergeant-major Haskins across a desk in the orderly-room of the post.

"Corporal Craig reporting with prisoner Gunner Hardigan," he stated. "Hardigan is now under medical care in the guard-room, sir."

The sergeant-major, a lean-faced and gruff-voiced martinet, looked up with raised brows.

"Under medical care?" he echoed harshly. "Is he wounded?"

"Slightly, sir," replied Alan. "He resisted arrest."

"With arms?"

"Yes, sir," Alan leaned slightly over the desk to exhibit his holster, in the leather of which there was a jagged hole. "Second shot took away part of my holster. Gave me no further choice, sir."

"Pretty close, eh?" The sergeant-major spoke into a telephone on his desk because its bell had rung. "Sergeant-major's office," he said.

Superintendent Barkley was on the other end of the line.

"When you've done with Corporal Craig," he directed, "have him report to me here."

"Very good, sir," Haskins replaced the receiver and looked up at Alan again. "Any further details?"

"None, sir."

"Get those side-arms replaced, get properly dressed, and report to the O.C. right away. Carry on!"

"Very good, sergeant-major."

Alan saluted and went off to his quarters to remove the stains of travel from his uniform and person, visited the armoury, and made his way to the superintendent's cabin.

"Corporal Craig reporting, sir," he said with a salute after he had rapped at the door and entered the big living-room.

"Come right in, corporal, and sit down," said the superintendent genially.

"I beg your pardon, sir."

"I said sit down."

"Yes, sir," Alan crossed the room to a long settee in front of the blazing fire because the superintendent had indicated it.

"Take your hat off."

The wide-brimmed service hat was removed, and the superintendent further astonished his visitor by sitting down beside him.

"This isn't exactly an official interview," he said. "In fact, it's a bit wide of regulations. You consider yourself quite a good friend of my son's, don't you, Craig?"

"None better, I hope, sir," replied Alan.

"And your regard for my ward, Ann, is more or less an open secret, I believe."

"I dare say it is, sir."

"Alan, I think you'd better prepare yourself for something of a shock."

"Sir, nothing's happened to Ann, has it?" asked Alan in high concern.

"Oh, no, nothing like that." The superintendent shook his head. "At least, not in the sense you mean it. But she's just consented to marry my son."

Alan stood up and his face was averted for several seconds. Then slowly he turned to the superintendent, who had also risen.

"I think that's fine," he said in a voice fairly under control. "Don't you, sir?"

"Fine?" The superintendent was amazed to find his task so easy. "You think it's fine?"

"Well, they're my best friends, and their happiness means a good deal to me."

"Oh, yes—yes, of course." The superintendent sighed with relief. "Naturally."

"If that's all, sir," said Alan, moving towards the door and restoring his hat to his head, "may I be excused?"

"No, not quite, Craig."

The stalwart young man turned about and stood stiffly to attention, hoping that the pain in his heart did not show in his clear brown eyes.

"I've been watching your record for a long time, corporal," said the superintendent in a more official tone, "and it's good—very good!"

"Thank you, sir."

"To-morrow Sergeant-major Haskins will assign you to a case of more than ordinary importance. Now, this is not official, of course, but that assignment should bring promotion. That's all, corporal."

"Beg pardon, sir," said Alan, "but could this interview remain unofficial another moment?"

"Yes—what's on your mind?"

"May I be relieved of the assignment in favour of Constable Barkley, sir?"

"In favour of my son?" The superintendent seemed a trifle bewildered. "May I ask why?"

"In the circumstances, sir, promotion might mean more to him than to me."

"Oh, I see. A sort of wedding present, is that it?"

"Yes, sir."

"I had a friend like you once, Alan," said the superintendent with undisguised emotion. "He was Ann's father."

"Thank you, sir."

"Carry on, corporal."

Alan saluted and went out from the cabin, and almost immediately Gene and Ann entered the cabin.

"Sir," blurted Gene, on hearing his father's statement, "I can't let him pass up promotion for me like this."

"Friendship of that sort," returned his father emphatically, "can't be refused, son. You ought to be proud to have earned it."

The Broken Link

ON the following morning Gene Barkley was summoned to the Sergeant-major's presence and stood stiffly in front of that officer's desk like any other Mountie.

"Stand at ease!" barked Haskins, and fished a letter from a wire basket. "There's been trouble at a logging camp in St. Johns. You know that district?"

"Yes, sir," Gene replied. "About six days from here. I've been through there before, sir."

"I've a letter here from the owner, and he states that there have been several loggers killed during the past month. They're supposed to be accidents, but it looks suspicious. Before you reach St. Johns I'd suggest that you change into the rough clothes of a logger. Report to the owner and investigate."

"Very good, sir."

The sergeant-major pointed a finger. "Remember, Barkley," he said in his gruffest manner. "It's no bed of roses. You're on your own. Six days' ride from the post, and there's no one in St. Johns that you can trust. That'll be all. Carry on."

Gene's horse was ready saddled outside the building and Alan and Ann were waiting beside it to see him off. He went straight to Alan and gripped him by the hand.

"I don't know how to thank you, old man," he said, "for giving me this chance of promotion."

Alan leaned slightly over the desk to exhibit his holster, in the leather of which there was a jagged hole.

"Oh, forget it!" said Alan. "You'd do as much for me."

Gene embraced Ann, then mounted his horse and rode away into the pinewoods. His father, at a window in the living-room of the cabin, watched him till he had disappeared under the trees.

St. Johns, the settlement for which he was bound, was situated on one of the banks of the Mackenzie river and was just as accessible by water as by land. But there were rapids in the river, and Geno was not expert enough with a canoe to travel the way Alan would have chosen.

The settlement was not large enough to be called a town, but it boasted a main street and several smaller thoroughfares, an hotel which was merely a frame building of very modest proportions, a variety of stores, a lunch-room and a stone gaol.

In the main street facing a blacksmith's shop were the offices of the McCord & Arnold Lumber Company, and it was Claude Joseph McCord, the senior partner of that firm, who had written to Fort Chapelle.

Four days after Gene had set out on his long journey Timothy Arnold, the junior partner, burst into the outer office from the street, an under-sized and middle-aged man with a fat face and dark deep-set eyes.

"Is Mr. McCord in?" he asked hurriedly of a clerk behind a counter.

"Yes, he's in," was the reply, and Arnold swept round the counter into the room he shared with his partner when he himself was not at the camp in the woods a couple of miles away.

McCord, an elderly man, grey-haired and lined of face, rose up from an old-fashioned desk as though alarmed by the tempestuous entrance of his junior partner.

"What's wrong now?" he asked.

Arnold pushed over the back of his head the black hat of soft felt he was wearing and mopped his streaming brow with the back of his hand.

"C. J.," he blurted, "it looks to me as if we're just about licked! We can't go on working the way things are at the camp."

"There's been another accident?" questioned McCord.

"Yes. A carrier chain broke and got three men."

"Badly?"

Arnold nodded.

"I'm afraid they're done for, poor beggars," he said. "They're on their way to the hospital."

McCord drew a long and quivering breath.

"I wonder if we oughtn't to try to find a buyer and sell out," he said.

"Nobody would pay anything for a hoodoo camp like ours," declared Arnold. "We've got to see it through."

"I'm not a young man, Tim," McCord leaned against the side of his desk. "That's why I took you into the firm. I don't know that I can carry on under this strain much longer."

"It might be best for you to get out, C. J.," conceded Arnold, "but I'm not going to quit. I found out to-day these accidents are planned. Someone's trying to break us. Here!" He took from his coat pocket a heavy link of wrought iron which was broken. "Here's the cause of to-day's crash. This link of a chain cut half-way through with a hacksaw."

McCord took the link and examined it with worried eyes.

"I've half suspected something of the kind for weeks," he said.

"Well, why didn't you tell me?"

"Didn't seem possible. Murdering men that way in cold blood." McCord dropped the broken link on the top of April 24th, 1937.

his desk. "But I did report it to Fort Chapelle," he went on. "The runner got back this morning, and the law is on its way in."

Arnold pursed his lips and stared.

"Why, that's the best news we've had in weeks!" he exclaimed. "I'll go back and tell the men—they're on the verge of a walk-out."

He went out from the room and out from the wooden building, but instead of remounting the horse on which he had ridden in from the camp he crossed the street to the smithy.

Inside its open doorway Mike Barstow, the blacksmith, was plainly visible, hammering at an almost white-hot iron bar on an anvil and creating a shower of sparks.

Barstow was an enormous fellow, but he looked less tall than he was because of his bulk. He was clad only in vest and trousers, apart from hat and boots, and the muscles of his chest rippled beneath the vest as he swung the hammer. He was as strong as two average men put together; but he was an ugly brute, with a massive face, a wide mouth, and wicked eyes.

Arnold jerked his head significantly at the blacksmith looked up, and the iron bar was tossed on to the earth floor and the two retreated to a corner out of sight from passers-by.

"There's a Mountie on his way in," confided Arnold. "McCord wrote Fort Chapelle."

Barstow was holding the hammer, and for a moment he seemed tempted to strike his informant with it.

"I thought you said you was watching all letters?" he rasped.

"He sent it by runner without telling me," quavered Arnold.

"How's he coming, by horse or canoe?"

"I don't know. We'll have to watch both ways into town."

Barstow flung down the hammer.

"Don't worry," he said with an evil grin, "he'll never reach St. Johns alive!"

Alan Goes to St. Johns

AT Fort Chapelle, about a week later, the men of the Mounted who were not away on detail were exercising their horses over hurdles, in the clearing behind their quarters, when Alan caught sight of an Indian leading out from the woods a roan horse who seemed familiar to him and who bore a pack-saddle of the type used by the troops.

He rode over to the quaintly garbed Redskin, and a colleague followed.

"Where's the rider of this horse?" he demanded.

"I not see rider," the Indian replied. "Who sent you here with him?"

"I find horse in woods. Bring him here."

Alan dismounted.

"Where did you find him?" he asked imperiously.

"This side St. Johns," was the impassive answer. "Five days' run."

Alan stooped and raised the horse's right foreleg. On the front of the hoof was branded the number "28," which became plain enough after he had rubbed away caked mud and dust.

"Constable Barkley's horse all right," he said grimly to several Mounties who had ridden over, and he lowered the leg to examine the pack. "There's blood on the saddle!"

Sergeant-major Haskins came striding up from the direction of his office.

"What is it, corporal?" he snapped.

"Sergeant-major," responded Alan most unhappily, "this Indian has just brought in Constable Barkley's horse.

There are blood-stains on the saddle, sir."

Haskins looked at the saddle, and then he looked at the imperturbable Redskin.

"This is serious," he said. "Fisher, take this horse to the stables. Corporal, bring the Indian along for questioning."

With the Indian beside him, Alan followed the sergeant-major to the orderly-room. There the superintendent was informed by telephone of what had happened, and he arrived with Ann before very many questions had been asked.

Ann's face was white and strained, but her elderly guardian strove not to show the misgivings he felt.

"I suppose," he said, "that there's no doubt the horse was my—was Constable Barkley's, is there?"

"None, sir," replied Alan tonelessly. "Who is this Indian? Is his word to be trusted?"

"My name Tillicum John," said the Redskin with quiet dignity. And the sergeant-major intervened.

"If he really is Tillicum John, sir," he said, "he's to be trusted. I know him by reputation, sir."

The superintendent bit his lip.

"Sergeant-major, you will detail a man to St. Johns to investigate this case," he instructed.

"Very good, sir. Any further instructions?"

"None."

"Very good, sir." Haskins addressed Alan peremptorily: "Bout turn—quick march!"

Alan turned, but before he had reached the door Ann was in front of him, barring the way.

"Now I understand why you sent Gene to St. Johns in your place, pretending to be his friend!" she cried. "You hated him for what happened! Sent him to his death to get rid of him!"

Alan, forgetting all discipline, swung round to the superintendent.

"You don't believe I did that, do you, sir?" he asked hoarsely.

"As you were, corporal!" thundered the sergeant-major; but the superintendent raised his hand.

"I think we can dispense with formality for the moment, sergeant-major," he said. "No, I don't believe it, Craig. Ann is overwrought!"

"May I volunteer to go to St. Johns to bring in the men guilty of Constable Barkley's death?" asked Alan.

"Request granted. You hear, sergeant-major?"

"Very good, sir." The officious Haskins went out with Alan and the Indian, and Ann burst into tears.

"There, there, my dear," soothed the superintendent, taking her into his arms. "If I can trust Craig, surely you can? After all, it was my son that was killed."

In less than a quarter of an hour Alan and Tillicum John were in a canoe by the landing-stage of the post, and the sergeant-major was there to see them off.

"Well, good-bye, sergeant-major," said Alan, down on his knees in the canoe with a paddle in his hand.

"Good-bye, corporal," returned the sergeant-major, and unbent sufficiently to add. "Good luck to you!"

Out across the placid waters of Lake Clear the canoe moved swiftly towards a reach of the Mackenzie river, and by sundown good progress had been made. Mountie and Indian camped for the night upon a grassy bank, under tall pines, and with daybreak the long journey was resumed.

Barstow held the punch to the spring lock of the handcuff and raised the hammer. "Look out for my wrist!" gritted Alan.

Tillicum John was a queer, taciturn companion, speaking only when he was asked a direct question; but he was expert enough with a canoe, and it was he who piloted the frail craft through the rapids encountered on the second day.

Alan came to like him during the days that followed, and was almost sorry to part company from him a few miles below the settlement for which he himself was bound. But the Indian had a cabin in the woods and wished to return to it.

On the second day out from Fort Chappelle Alan had discarded his uniform in favour of a woollen plaid coat, coarse trousers, laced boots and a battered hat of soft felt; and his uniform was packed in a kitbag when he ran his canoe up on to a shelving bank so that Tillicum John could disembark.

Deliberately he had gone unshaven for five days, so that a stubbly growth of hair was upon his face and he bore little resemblance to the smart and handsome Mountie to whom the sergeant-major had condescended to wave farewell.

Tillicum John picked up the kitbag. "How far is your cabin from St. Johns?" Alan inquired.

"Half-hour 'this side," was the very brief reply.

"All right. You keep that bag for me until I need it. If you see me in town you don't know me. Understand, John?"

The Indian nodded and deposited the kitbag on the grass to push the canoe back into the water.

"Hi-ow-us!" he shouted, waving a hand.

"Hi-ow-us!" returned Alan, and plied his paddle.

It took more than half an hour, against the current, to reach the pier that jutted out into the river at St.

Johns, and the sun was past its zenith when Alan pulled up to a steep flight of wooden steps beside the pier and tied the canoe to one of the piles there.

Several men were lounging on the pier-head, and they looked down at him with evident amusement as he climbed the steps. He heard their voices, and he turned to hail them.

"Will you take care of my canoe?" he asked. "I'll be back when I'm located. Is the McCord lumber office in town or out at the camp?"

"In town," one of the loungers called back.

"How do I get to it?" "Straight up the street on the right-hand side."

"Thanks." Alan mounted the rest of the steps and found himself in an ill-made roadway. In the distance were the buildings of the main street.

"Hi!" shouted one of the men on the pier, and he turned about. "That's the way you get to it," said the man, with a jerk of his thumb. "This is the way you come back!"

"You do if you're lucky," chimed in another man. "They buried my brother last week, and I quit!"

"Yeah, I heard it's bad," said Alan, "but a job's a job, these days."

Most of the men on the pier were there because they had nothing better to do, having refused to work any longer at the camp; but two of them were in league with Mike Barstow, the blacksmith—the man who had jerked his thumb, and whose name was Yates, and another man named Berg.

Hank Berg, a lantern-jawed ruffian, was there with Yates to see that no Mountie entered the town in secret from the river, and as Alan was about to walk off he shouted:

"Hi! How are things around Fort Chappelle?"

"I don't know," Alan returned over his shoulder. "I came over the range from Caribou Camp."

He walked on along the road.

The Handcuff

THE offices of the McCord and Arnold Lumber Company were easy enough to find. Alan entered the outer office and spoke to the clerk behind the counter.

"You taking on any loggers?" he inquired with seeming anxiety.

"Yes," the clerk replied, "but we have orders to tell them it's a very dangerous camp."

"So I've heard," said Alan.

"Do you still want to sign on?"

"Sure."

A card was taken from a drawer and placed before him; a pen was presented.

"Just fill in that card, will you?" said the clerk.

Alan dipped the pen in an inkpot, and he was writing on the card when McCord emerged from his room, disturbed by a sudden commotion in the street, and Arnold burst in from the boardwalk with a man hardly any taller than himself.

"C. J.," Arnold cried excitedly, "the camp's closed down! The men have walked out! They're threatening violence—and I don't blame 'em!"

"More—more accidents?" faltered McCord.

"If you can call 'em that! Look at this!" Arnold flung on to the counter a broken loop of iron. "A choker lock snapped and dropped a log. It hit two men square and side-swiped two others!"

Alan stood looking on, pen in hand, while McCord picked up the lock and frowned at it.

"Why, it's been welded!" he exploded, and glared at Arnold's companion, a man named Jordan. "You're a foreman—don't you know better than to use a lock like that on a choker?"

Jordan, thin of face and scrubby of chin, scratched the back of his head. His deep-set eyes were shifty, but he answered readily enough.

"Yes, sir, but it wasn't on the rigging when I inspected it."

"We do everything possible to protect the men," began Arnold, "but we—"

A roar of voices in the street caused him to break off abruptly, and he and Jordan went out. McCord dropped the choker lock on the counter and followed, and the clerk followed him. Alan, left alone in the outer office, slipped the broken loop into his coat-pocket before he stepped forth on to the boardwalk.

A crowd of excited men and women had gathered round the diminutive hospital and a wagon which had drawn up outside it. From the wagon four men had been removed on stretchers and were being carried into the hospital—at the open doorway of which a white-haired doctor was trying to prevent distracted relatives from entering.

"You'd better stay outside, Mrs. O'Neil," he said to a weeping but persistent woman.

"It's my Danny, and he's hurt!" she shrieked.

"Yes, yes, I know," said the doctor, "but you'd only be in the way."

McCord, ignoring the boeing of several of the men, squeezed through the crowd and tried to pass the doctor.

"Let me go in," he said urgently.

"No," said the doctor, catching hold of his arm. "The same applies to you, Mr. McCord."

The last of the stretchers disappeared into the building.

"But there must be something I can do to help them," protested McCord.

"You might have thought of that sooner!" Mrs. O'Neil blared hysterically at him. "It's too late now to help them—or any of the others that they've brought in from your suicide camp!"

"Yeah!" shouted a number of voices, and then a thickset man named Haywood appointed himself spokesman on behalf of the other workers.

"Where's the protection you promised us, McCord?" he demanded truculently.

"We've done everything we can to protect you," McCord declared.

"You said the law was coming in!" cried Mrs. O'Neil. "Where is it?"

"I don't know," McCord confessed. "It should have been here ten days ago."

"You should have sent for help two months ago!" retorted Haywood; and the attitude of the men became so threatening that the doctor changed his mind about keeping McCord out of the hospital.

"You'd better get inside, Mac," he said uneasily.

"I've done nothing to make me hide!" was the stubborn rejoinder.

"He ought to have some of his own medicine!" yelled Haywood, clenching his fists, and the men in the roadway surged towards the boardwalk.

But Alan, who had been looking on, forced his way to McCord's side and gripped Haywood by the shoulder.

"Wait a minute, men!" he said loudly and in a tone of authority. "You can't take the law into your own hands!"

"Law?" raged Haywood. "Where's the Mounted Police he said was coming in?"

McCord himself dealt with that question.

April 24th, 1937.

"I'm leaving for Fort Chapelle tomorrow," he said, "to find out."

"Well," snarled Haywood, releasing himself from Alan's hold, "you needn't expect any work out of us until you get back with him!"

"I don't," McCord declared, and addressed the crowd at large. "But your pay goes on just the same. It's the least I can do—and I'm not doing it because of your threats!"

The attitude of the men changed completely at that statement. There were murmurs of appreciation and approval, and many of them began to drift away. Alan saw Arnold and Jordan walk up the street with Barstow, whom he assumed to be the blacksmith, and he saw McCord pass into the hospital with the doctor. He sauntered across the roadway and slipped round an empty buckboard into the smithy.

He made straight for an anvil on a bench, and from his hip-pocket he took out a pair of handcuffs. These he placed across the anvil, and with a hammer and a punch he severed the chain that held the two circlets of steel together.

One of these circlets he restored to his pocket, the other he snapped round his left wrist.

Arnold, Jordan, and Barstow walked together as far as the offices of the lumber company; and Arnold said none too happily on the way:

"Looks as if we can't keep the law from coming in this time."

"Let it come!" retorted Barstow. "I'll take care of it after it gets here!"

"There's been too much of that already," complained Arnold nervously. "You'd better count me out."

The blacksmith scowled at him. "This is my deal, Arnold," he said menacingly. "My money made you McCord's partner because I needed you there. I still need you, and you're gonna stick. Is that clear?"

"I'm going to stick all right," was the hasty reply, "but I think you're taking too many chances."

"I'll do the thinking, and you'll do what you're told!"

The offices were reached. Arnold and Jordan entered, and Barstow walked over to his smithy. Alan was standing by the anvil when he crossed the threshold, and he eyed the unshaven young man suspiciously.

"Why, hallo!" he rasped. "What can I do for you?"

"A lot, I hope," Alan coolly replied, "if you can tell me something about welding."

"That's my speciality."

"Yeah, I know," said Alan. "I saw one of your jobs, the cleverest welding I've ever seen!" He took the choker from his pocket and held it out. "Look, who paid you to repair that so it would break under strain?"

Barstow's wide mouth set in an ugly line.

"I don't think I understand," he said almost in a snarl.

"Listen," said Alan. "I need money to get out of town, so I thought maybe you'd like to buy this back. Come on, come on—think fast! There's enough evidence here to hang you!"

"I still don't know what you're driving at."

"No? Well, maybe McCord will!" Alan moved significantly towards the open doorway.

"Hold on a second!" exclaimed the blacksmith. "Pull that door to. You say you want to leave town? Well, I'm willing to help you on your way."

"Thanks," Alan closed the big door and latched it; but no sooner had he done so than Barstow pounced on him, caught hold of his left arm in a vice-like grip and jerked it backwards and upwards, in a trick of ju-jutsu that caused intense agony.

"Sure I'll help you!" jeered the powerful crook, imprisoning Alan's right arm as well. "But you're going out of here feet first!"

The malevolent expression upon his face changed to one of surprise as his hand came into contact with cold steel, and he swung his victim round to stare at the handcuff on the wrist he held.

"So you're the man who wanted the law to take its course!" he derided. "It looks like I've got some evidence on you now, don't it?"

"You won't turn me in, will you?" pleaded Alan.

"That depends," Barstow let go of him with obvious contempt. "Where's the other half of that thing?"

"I don't know."

"Where is it?"

As though forced against his will to tell the truth Alan replied:

"On a Mountie's wrist, buried back in the woods ten days ago."

"That's better," said Barstow. "Now maybe we can get together. Put that bracelet in here."

He pointed to the narrow end of the anvil.

"What are you going to do?" asked Alan.

"You want money to leave town, don't you? I'm going to give you a job so you can earn it. Go on, put it in there!"

Alan put his wrist against the pointed end of the anvil and managed to force the handcuff over the point to the extent of an inch or so. Barstow picked up a hammer and punch, and he held the punch to the spring lock of the handcuff and raised the hammer.

"Look out for my wrist!" gritted Alan.

The hammer descended upon the head of the punch, the spring was smashed, and the handcuff fell upon a piece of chain that was lying on the bench.

"Here's the Law!"

BARSTOW closed his smithy early that day, and he took Alan home with him to his cabin, situated some little way out of the settlement on the fringe of a wood. Jordan, the foreman, went with them, and the three had a meal together in a big and poorly furnished room.

In one corner of that room stood a roughly constructed double bunk; in another a roll-top desk which was the most elaborate piece of furniture in the whole cabin. There was no cloth on the clumsy deal table, but Barstow cooked quite a passable meal on an iron stove in the room, and he produced some whisky to go with it.

During the meal he chatted pleasantly, but after he and Jordan had cleared away everything save the whisky and three glasses and an oil-lamp, he unfolded his plans concerning his guest.

Those plans suited Alan perfectly, but he was very careful not to betray the fact.

"Let me get this straight," he said thoughtfully. "You're trying to make the lumber company sell out cheap—is that it?"

"Yes," Barstow replied; "and they'll have to do it if they can't get their logs out."

"And they can't get 'em out," supplemented Jordan, "if we keep on having accidents."

"Sounds like a good thing," said Alan. "Who's back of it?"

"What do you care, as long as you get paid?" Barstow rapped at him.

"Oh, a fellow hates to work in the dark, that's all!"

"All you've got to know is how to ride a horse and wear a uniform!"

"But what good will it do you to pass me off as a Mountie?"

"It'll keep McCord from bringing in the real police," Jordan replied.

"The real ones are harder to handle than you'll be," said the blacksmith.

"You did all right with the last one that you——" Jordan began incautiously.

"Shut up!" Barstow roared at him. "Well, what do you say?"

Alan shook his head.

"No, it's too risky," he said. "You'd better deal me out."

"I'm dealing you in, one way or the other!" Barstow took the broken handcuff from his pocket and tossed it into the air and caught it. "You make up your mind!"

"Even if I wanted to," said Alan. "Where could I get a uniform?"

"We've already got one."

"Doesn't look as though I've got much choice, does it?" Alan got up from the chair on which he had been sitting.

"All right, give me the outfit."

From under the lower bunk Barstow pulled out a tin trunk, and from the trunk he removed a scarlet tunic, dark-blue riding-breeches with a broad stripe down their sides, a regulation hat, a leather belt complete with holster, and a pair of riding-boots.

These things he handed to Alan, then pointed to a door.

"Go into that room and shave," he said. "Let's see what sort of a Mountie you make."

With the kit in his arms Alan passed into a room as large as the one he had left, but hardly furnished at all. He closed the door with his elbow, and in the light of a bracket-lamp he examined the tunic.

In a sort of pocket in the lining at its left corner there was a card for which he looked, and that card confirmed his worst fears. On it was written: "Gene Barkley, Fort Chapelle."

He dropped the tunic to pick up the holster, and in the holster there was a six-gun. But the gun was not loaded.

He whipped out his own Service revolver and with it in his hand went towards the door, tempted in that moment of fury to shoot down the two men he held responsible for Gene's death.

At the door, however, he heard Jordan say:

"He's just dumb enough to play the part perfectly."

"Yeah," responded Barstow with a note of doubt in his voice. "I hope so."

Alan mastered his rage. After all, he had no definite proof—as yet—concerning the fate of Gene, and he had his duty to perform. He put away the gun and took off his plaid coat.

There was a cracked mirror on one of the board walls, and a bowl of water stood upon a rickety wash-stand. With his own tackle he proceeded to shave the stubby growth of hair from his face, and then he changed into the uniform.

The tunic was a little tight under the arms and across the shoulders, but otherwise was not too bad a fit. The riding breeches were short in the leg, but the boots concealed that deficiency, and they were his own size. The flat-brimmed hat was only a shade too large.

Completely dressed, he opened the door and walked with soldierly erectness into the presence of the blacksmith and the foreman, and the way they started up from their chairs at sight of him caused him not a little satisfaction.

"Why, you mighta been a Mountie!" exclaimed Jordan.

"You'll do," growled Barstow.

"That gun loaded?"

"No," Alan replied.

"I'll give you some cartridges—in the morning. There's a mattress up in the loft in there. You can sleep here to-night."

In the room where he had shaved and dressed Alan had already noticed a kind of open loft, extending across half the room under the rafters, and a clumsy ladder that led up to it. He slept quite soundly upon the mattress after he had dragged a packing-case across the boards to form a screen between him and the room below.

At ten o'clock on the following morning Jordan entered the offices of the McCord & Arnold Lumber Company and stepped round the counter past the clerk to knock on the door of McCord's room.

McCord was at his desk, and a suitcase was standing on a chair beside it.

"Come in!" he shouted.

The door was opened, and Jordan looked round it.

"Your canoe's ready, Mr. McCord," he said.

"Thanks, Jordan." McCord put on his hat. "Bring my suitcase for me, will you?"

The foreman entered and picked up the suitcase, and he followed his employer across the outer office. At almost the same moment Alan walked out from a yard at the side of the smithy in uniform, and somebody cried exultingly: "Here's the law!"

From all directions men and women came running, and quite a crowd followed Alan across the roadway. Barstow, with a hammer in his hand, watched from the doorway of his smithy. Everything had been timed to the minute, and McCord and his camp foreman stepped down on to the boardwalk just as Alan stepped up on to it.

"Is Mr. McCord in," he asked, "or Mr. Arnold?"

"I'm McCord," said the senior partner of the lumber company with manifest relief at having been saved a long and tedious journey. "This is Mr. Arnold coming along now."

Arnold hurried along the boardwalk with a beaming face.

"I'm Constable McGregor from Fort Chapelle," said Alan.

"No man was ever more welcome," declared McCord fervently, and offered his hand.

Jordan exchanged glances with Arnold and put down the suitcase. The crowd had increased in size till nearly all the men who worked for the firm were present. McCord opened the door his Sullenly the men shrank back, and Alan stood alone on the edge of the boardwalk. "I have no quarrel with you men," he said sternly, "but get this straight! The law has come to St. Johns and it's come to stay!"

April 24th, 1937.

foreman had closed only a few moments before, but turned to address his employees.

"You can spread the word that it's safe to go back to work now!" he boomed. "The law has come to St. John's!"

Haywood stepped forward.

"How long are you gonna be with us?" he shouted.

"Until we can find out who's behind these accidents you're having," Alan replied.

"Are you gonna stay in camp with us?" demanded another man.

"As long as anyone's working I'll be there," Alan assured him. "Everything the law can do to protect you will be done."

"That's good!" The man was obviously delighted. "That's all I want to know."

"That's right!" chorused a number of voices, and somebody raised a cheer.

But Haywood had been studying Alan closely, and he bellowed for silence, which was none too easy to obtain. Barstow, wondering what was wrong, threw down his hammer and hurried over, and Haywood secured a measure of quiet at last.

"This is some sort of a trick!" he blared.

"What d'you mean, Haywood?" asked McCord in astonishment.

"I mean that man's no Mountie, and you know it!" was the furious retort. "He's just a lumber-jack! I saw him at the hospital yesterday!"

Arnold, who knew nothing of Barstow's plot and had failed to interpret the message Jordan's eyes had tried to convey to him, stared at Alan and burst out:

"Haywood's right, C. J. This is the same man."

"I thought your face looked familiar," said McCord, frowning heavily at the man he was afraid was a mere masquerader. "Well, what have you got to say for yourself?"

"He's right," replied Alan with perfect calm.

"You're not a mounted policeman?"

"Of course I am!" Alan raised his voice so that everyone could hear what he had to say. "I came up here on secret patrol, but after what happened yesterday I decided it best to come out into the open. Any further questions, Mr. Haywood, or does that explain things?"

Haywood, thus openly challenged, became convinced that it was a real Mountie who stood there so sure of himself, so full of authority.

"No," he admitted frankly, "that sounds okay."

Barstow mounted the boardwalk beside Alan and flung out a hand.

"Hi, you're wasting time!" he cried. "You men all want to go back to work, don't you?"

There were shouts of assent, and he turned to Alan.

"Why don't you take 'em back to camp and start those logs rolling?" he suggested.

The men approved of that, too. But McCord said:

"Won't you come inside first and hear what little we know about the case?"

"I think I'd better go along with the men," Alan replied. "I found out quite a lot yesterday. But I came here by canoe. How soon do you think you can get me a horse?"

Arnold took it upon himself to answer that question.

"I'll have one ready for you to-night," he said.

"Do all you can for Constable McGregor," enjoined McCord.

April 24th, 1937.

"Thank you," said Alan. "Come on, men—I'll have to do the best I can on foot to-day."

He went off along the street, and Haywood went with him, and the rest of the lumbermen streamed after them. At the corner, by the hotel, they turned in the direction of the camp, whereupon McCord picked up his suitcase and went into his office.

Jordan, Arnold, and Barstow remained on the boardwalk; and Jordan, rubbing his unshaven chin, remarked:

"He sure acted like a Mountie, didn't he?"

"A little too much like one to suit me," growled Arnold. "What's the big idea?"

Barstow explained, but Arnold was by no means satisfied.

"I wonder if he was telling the truth about being on secret patrol?" he said.

"If I thought he was," snarled Barstow; "I'd watch him like a hawk and never let him see a thing!"

Another "Accident"

A PART from the felling of a few trees, very little work was done in the lumber camp that afternoon; but some of the fallen pines were lopped and sawn into logs and there were no accidents.

After a conference with Barstow and Jordan in the smithy that evening Alan took up his quarters at the St. Johns Hotel—for the sake of appearances, as he put it—and before he retired for the night a horse provided for him was in a stall of the stables at the rear of that rather depressing establishment.

He was at the lumber camp as soon as anyone next morning, and by eight o'clock work was in full swing. Tall pines crashed to earth, saws buzzed, "swampers" blazed trails for those who dragged the logs to cranes that lifted them on to trucks, and a noisy locomotive appeared at intervals with a string of empty trucks and disappeared with loaded ones upon a track laid through the woods to a spur of the great Canadian Pacific Railway.

Alan rode everywhere amongst the men, and confidence was inspired in them by his presence. He took the earliest opportunity of having a word with Jordan, to whom he said:

"Just for the look of things, you'd better lay off accidents for a couple of days."

The foreman screwed up his wicked eyes and nodded slowly.

"Maybe you're right," he agreed.

"And when you do start, give me a chance to get out of sight."

That was not to Jordan's liking, and he said angrily:

"You talk like you figure on running things for us!"

"Oh, nothing like that," returned Alan with a grin, "but I'm in a good spot to do it if I want to, ain't I?"

There was no accident that day, nor was there any on the next, but on the day after that Timothy Arnold appeared in the camp. He watched a caterpillar tractor crushing its way under the trees towards the railway line, laden with timber; he watched a truck being loaded with logs by a crane; and then he walked over to Jordan, who was standing by the truck.

"Jordan," he said, leading the foreman away from the men who were wedging the logs so that they could not roll, "I don't want to hear any more excuses. You're wasting time. Get busy!"

Alan rode across the track from under the trees beyond it, and he heard Jordan reply:

"Everything's all set right now."

"It had better be!" barked Arnold, and turned on his heel.

Jordan, ignoring Alan's presence, beckoned to two of the men who were wedging the logs, and they walked up to him.

"You take the first block, Tom," he said, "and you the second, Jake. When I give the word, let 'em go!"

The men nodded and returned to the truck. Jordan looked up at Alan.

"Stay on your horse and get back in the woods," he directed curtly.

"To-day's the day, is it?" asked Alan.

"I didn't say so! I just said get back out of sight!"

"All right." Alan shrugged his broad shoulders. "I don't think I care to watch it, anyway."

He rode off under the pines, but turned about as soon as he was hidden from sight, and what followed he saw all too clearly. Several men were beside the truck, and logs had become piled high upon it, when Tom, at one end of the truck, and Jake at the other, knocked out two bottom wedges with their crowbars.

The lowest log on that side shifted and began to fall; the logs above it, lacking its support, began to roll, and down came the lot like an avalanche.

Most of the men jumped clear in the nick of time, but one was struck by the first log that fell and became crushed and almost buried by the rest of the logs.

The driver of the locomotive jumped down from his cab, and men dropped their tools and ran towards the fallen logs to help extricate the victim. Alan was on the spot and off his horse before the logs had ceased to move.

"Come on, get 'em out of the way, boys!" he shouted. "Get that man out from underneath!"

The great logs, many of them sixteen feet in length, were lifted one at a time till the crushed limbs of the unfortunate man beneath them were freed, and then he was conveyed to a wagon, mercifully unconscious.

The wagon was driven off towards the hospital, and Arnold went with it. The lumberers deserted the camp to troop after it, voicing their opinions on the way, and they crowded round the hospital after the injured logger had been taken inside.

Storekeepers and women and children added to the crowd, asking questions. Barstow strode over from his smithy.

"It don't look as if the law's gonna give us much protection, does it?" shouted one of the bystanders.

"You can't expect one man to clean up things in a minute!" Barstow shouted back.

"It's a hoodoo camp," raged the proprietor of the funch-room adjoining the hospital, "that's all you can make of it!"

"Look!" someone bellowed; and Alan was seen, riding slowly round the corner past the hotel with Tom and Jake, handcuffed together, walking beside him.

"Well," said McCord, who was standing beside his partner on the boardwalk, "it looks like the law has finally come to St. Johns, Tim!"

"Yeah," gritted Arnold, "it certainly looks like it."

A way was made for Alan and his prisoners outside the gaol, and he swung down from the saddle on to the boardwalk outside its iron door.

"Take my horse, will you, please?" he said to the scowling blacksmith in a tone of authority. "All right, boys!"

The two prisoners leaned against the wall beside the door of the gaol. A padlock fastened the door, and a key was in the padlock; but before Alan could open the door Haywood caught at his arm.

"Are these the men that caused the accident?" he demanded.

"That's a matter for the courts to decide, Haywood," Alan replied sternly. There was a muttering amongst the crowd, and Haywood cried out:

"Do we have to wait for the courts to deal with these killers?"

"No!" roared a score of voices, and there was an ugly rush to get at the two men.

Alan flung Haywood aside, and Barstow dealt with several of the others. Then Alan whipped out his gun.

"Stand back!" he cried. Suddenly the men shrank back with clenched fists, and Alan stood alone on the edge of the boardwalk.

"I have no quarrel with you men," he said sternly, "and I'm going to forget your part in this scene, Haywood, but get this straight! The law has come to St. Johns, and it's come to stay! There'll be no more mob violence! Now, clear out, all of you!"

The crowd wavered and broke up, their departure hastened by Barstow, who pushed and shoved several of the less ruly. Alan opened the door of the gaol, bundled his prisoners into it, and locked them in.

He was putting the key of the padlock in his pouch when Barstow rasped, almost in his ear:

"Come right down to my place. I want to have a talk with you."

"All right," returned Alan grimly.

His horse had been led over to the stables at the back of the hotel by a youth to whom the blacksmith had handed its bridle. In a very few minutes he was mounted on it and riding in a leisurely fashion towards the cabin that was Barstow's home.

Barstow returned to his smithy to put on his coat, then set off along the pine-fringed road that led out of the settlement to the south in company with Jordan.

These two were still some little way from the cabin when a canoe, propelled by Tillicum John, the Indian, reached the foot of the steps beside the pier that jutted out into the Mackenzie river and was made fast to one of the piles.

Ann was in the canoe, dressed in riding clothes, and he helped her out on to the steps and ascended them with her. There were only two loungers on the pier-head that afternoon, but they were Barstow's creatures, Hank Berg and Bill Yates, and they watched Ann narrowly from the moment they caught sight of her out in midstream till she had disappeared with her quaint companion up the ill-made roadway.

"Did you ever see that girl before?" asked Berg.

"Not that I know of," Yates replied. "Why?"

"Well, I have, but I don't know where."

"She ain't no Mountie, anyway," growled Yates, "and that's all that concerns us."

"Mountie?" Berg fastened on the word, and his close-set brown eyes widened. "Say, I know where I've seen her now! You stick here—I'm gonna see what she's up to!"

A Coward in Hiding!

ALAN was sitting in a chair by the table in the cabin, facing the front door and apparently reading a week-old newspaper, when Barstow and Jordan entered with drawn guns.

"So you're a real Mountie, are you?" roared the blacksmith. "Well, I'm goin' to break you just like the one that came in ahead of you!"

Alan let the newspaper fall, and a six-gun in his right hand was revealed.

"I thought you might have some notion like that, Barstow," he said. "Now back up!"

The two crooks had stopped short at sight of the gun. Mounties are notoriously quick on the trigger.

"I said back up!" snapped Alan; and slowly they retreated to the door, their own weapons drooping at their sides.

"If you had any sense," he went on scornfully, "you'd know I'm no Mountie."

"You expect me to believe that after you've arrested two of my men?" raged Barstow.

"They're not arrested! We'll break 'em out of gaol in a couple of days!"

"Break gaol? Why did you arrest them in the first place?"

"So the workmen would believe in me." Alan stood up and put his six-gun back in its holster. "I'm no good to you if they don't, am I?"

"Why didn't you let us know what you were doing?"

"Well, I did tell the two men I brought in. I thought you'd have sense enough to see through it."

Barstow passed a hand across his wide mouth.

"If you're telling the truth," he grunted, "you're smarter than I figured."

"If you think I'm lying," returned Alan, "I'll be glad to bow out. I didn't want this job. You had to push me into it."

"Still trying to run out on me, are you?" challenged Barstow.

"No, I'd rather stay under cover. You know why."

"All right, forget it!" Barstow put away his gun and motioned to Jordan to put his away. "We'll be ready for the finish in a few days, and then you can be on your way."

Alan reseated himself and crossed his long legs, but at that moment the latch of the door was raised and Hank Berg stepped into the room.

"What do you want?" asked Barstow, whirling round on him.

"Where's the picture of the girl you found in that Mountie's pocket?" inquired the look-out.

"What d'you want it for?"

"I think she just got in town. I want to make sure."

Barstow went to the roll-top desk, opened it with a key, and groped in several pigeon-holes. Berg closed the door, and Alan eyed him thoughtfully. At last a postcard-sized photograph was found amongst some letters and handed over, and Berg exclaimed:

"That's her, all right! 'With love to Gene from Ann.'"

Alan knew that the photograph must be a portrait of Ann, but he did not make any attempt to look at it, even when Barstow snatched it back and glared at it.

"It's a hundred to one she's from Fort Chapelle, and up here looking for him," decided the blacksmith, tossing the card back into the desk. "Where'd she go?"

"Bought some things at Manton's store and headed back for the canoe with the Indian who brought her in," Berg replied.

"What Indian?"

"That one that calls himself Tillicum John and lives in the old trapper's cabin half an hour through the woods."

"Looks bad," growled Barstow. "If she starts asking questions she's liable to start something we can't stop. We can't take any chances—you and Jordan bring her here."

"Pretty risky," objected Berg, "dragging a woman into this, Barstow."

"We're in it too deep to think of that now!"

"Wait a minute!" interposed Alan, rising to his feet. "It'd be smarter, wouldn't it, to find out why she's up here before you start anything?"

"How can you do that?" challenged Barstow.

"She'd be willing to tell her story to a Mountie, wouldn't she?"

Barstow considered the possibility.

"She might, at that," he decided.

"I could say I'm from another post, sent in to relieve him."

"Uhuh." Barstow liked the idea the more he thought about it. "She may have heard he's dead," he mused.

"I'll say she's mistaken," suggested Alan. "He was only wounded, and he's on his way back to—" He broke off abruptly. "Where did you say he was from?"

"Fort Chapelle," Barstow replied. "It's worth trying. Berg, show him the cabin—it's a million to one she's there."

"Come on!" said Berg; but Alan saw a chance further to allay any suspicions that might be in Barstow's mind and turned to him.

"Oh, you forgot to tell me the name of the fellow I'm supposed to relieve," he said.

"Gene something-or-other." Barstow flung out a hand. "It's printed on a card in the left-hand corner of the coat you're wearing."

Alan lifted up the corner of his scarlet tunic, appeared to be surprised to find the little pocket in the lining, and fished out the card he knew to be there.

"Gene Barkley," he read aloud. "Well, that's a very easy name to remember."

He thrust the card back into its place, and he went out from the cabin with Berg and mounted his horse. Berg ran beside him along the road for a hundred yards, or so, then turned into the woods upon a beaten trail which they followed side by side.

Uphill and downhill they proceeded under the whispering pines, and in one place forded a narrow stream. Daylight was fading when they set off upon the journey, and it was nearly dark by the time they reached a clearing, close to the river bank, in the middle of which stood a small log-cabin.

On the edge of the clearing Berg stopped and pointed.

"Well, there it is," he said.

Alan looked at the lighted windows of the cabin, and then he looked down at his ugly guide.

"You'd better get back quick before she suspects anything," he suggested; and Berg was quite prepared to return by himself at a less vigorous pace.

"All right," he agreed, and the darkness of the wood engulfed him.

April 24th, 1937.

Alan waited till the sound of his footsteps and the rustling of underwood had died away in the distance, then rode slowly across the clearing, dismounted outside the door of the cabin, tethered his horse to a post, and knocked on the door with his knuckles.

The door was opened slowly and cautiously by Ann herself, and the light of an oil lamp shone in his face.

"Alan!" she cried; and there was alarm as well as surprise in her voice.

"Careful, Ann!" he warned in a low voice, distrustful of Berg. "We might be watched!"

"I—I'd rather you wouldn't come in, Alan," she stammered.

"I've got to," he declared. "Your life's in danger!"

He brushed past her into a room the windows of which were draped with Indian shawls and the floor of which was covered with Indian matting. A stove was smoking in the middle of the room, and the furniture was of a very rough description. But Alan was not conscious of the shawls, the matting, or the smoking stove—for Gene Barkley was crouching back against the far wall of the room with the staring eyes of a hunted animal.

"Gene!" Alan cried in amazement; and Ann hurriedly closed and bolted the front door.

Gene was wearing a coarse woollen shirt, open at the neck, and a pair of moleskin trousers. He looked a physical wreck, but Alan was tremendously relieved to see him alive.

"This is too good to be true!" he exclaimed, striding across the room with outstretched hand. "Why, we'd given you up for dead!"

"Yes, I know," mumbled Gene, and it seemed almost as though he tried to avoid the clasp of Alan's hand. "Ann told me about my horse coming back, and all that."

"You don't seem glad to see me!"

"Sorry, old man." Gene backed away to a bunk in a corner of the room and dropped down upon it to hold his face between his hands. "My nerves are a bit ragged, I expect. I've had a bad week or so, that's all."

Alan glanced over his shoulder at Ann, who was standing beside a table on which stood a lighted lamp. He saw her biting her lips, then he frowned at the bowed figure on the edge of the bunk.

"Don't you think you'd better tell me about it?" he asked.

"I'd rather not, if you don't mind." Gene fumbled in his trouser pockets, brought out a cigarette paper and some tobacco, and began to roll a cigarette with trembling fingers. "Fact is, I'm trying to forget it."

He licked the gum on the paper several times with a tongue that was none too moist, then put the cigarette between his lips, found a match, and struck it on the woodwork of the bench. The cigarette was lit and he puffed at it in a nervous fashion.

"Don't stare at me like that!" he shouted. "What right have you to come prying into my affairs like this?"

"Gene, dear, please!" protested Ann.

"Well, why should I tell him the whole miserable story?" Gene flung down the cigarette he had only just begun to smoke and stood up and stamped on it. "So he can go back and report it all to the post?"

"I think you can trust Alan."

"All right, then!" He sank on to a chair by the table, and he roughed his dark hair with his hands. "If you must know," he said, avoiding Alan's eyes, "I've disobeyed orders—disgraced the force—run away from duty! You don't know what it is to be afraid—to have to drive yourself to face dangers that other men laugh at!"

Alan's eyes were compassionate. "It takes plenty of courage for that, Gene," he said gently.

"Oh, don't try to excuse me!" The overwrought and self-confessed coward sprang up again and stalked about the room, beating the air with his fists. "I'm not a fighter, and I knew it when I entered the force. I only did it to please dad."

He swept defiantly up to Alan. "Now go hack and tell him what you've found!" he bellowed. "His son hiding here in this filthy hole like some animal! Afraid even to show his face out of sheer cowardice!"

Tears were in Ann's eyes, but it did not seem to Alan to be a case for tears.

"Oh, your nerves are unstrung, that's all," he said soothingly. "Another month in harness and you'll be as fit as ever."

"D'you think I'll ever wear that uniform again?" howled Gene. "Give me credit for a little decency, at least!"

"But what happened?" asked Alan.

"It can't be as bad as you say."

"Can't it?" Gene smote the table with his fist, and Ann caught at the lamp lest it should overturn. "I was sent here on secret patrol, but I disobeyed orders—thought I knew better than my officers! I was told to come here as a lumber-jack, but I kept on my uniform—and walked straight into a trap!"

"You mean they fired on you?"

"They didn't even show me that much respect! They treated me like a school-boy—stopped me on the trail to borrow some tobacco. The next thing I knew I was being dragged off my horse!"

He held his hands to his eyes as though they burned in their sockets.

"I wish I could forget it all!" he wailed. "One of them was a man of tremendous strength—I was like a child in his hands! He twisted my arm back and up, and he clubbed me to the ground with his fist! I suppose they must have left me for dead—anyway, an Indian found me and brought me here, that night, stripped of my uniform and barely breathing."

Alan, having himself experienced the horrible strength of Barstow, could imagine what had happened.

"Poor old fellow," he said commiseratingly.

"I don't want your sympathy!" Gene yelled at him. "All I want is to be left alone to forget!"

Alan sighed and turned to Ann. "How did you know he was up here?" he asked.

"He sent an Indian to me with a note," she replied. "The Indian who brought in his horse."

"And the superintendent let you come up here alone?"

"I—I let him think I was visiting friends in Caribou."

"Then your father doesn't know you're alive, Gene?"

"No," Gene retorted, "and he never will, if you're the friend you pretend to be! That's why I asked Ann to come up here. We're going away together, way up in the far north, where no one will ever find us."

"Is that true, Ann?" asked Alan.

"Not exactly," she replied, in a very strained voice. "We were discussing it when you came in."

"I don't think you'll even ask it of her, Gene," said Alan. "To spend the rest of her life in hiding, dead to her friends, because of a mistake you made?"

Gene spread his hands in a hopeless gesture.

"I hadn't thought of it quite like that," he confessed, "but what else can we do?"

"You're going back to Fort Chapelle!" Alan's voice was suddenly stern, almost commanding.

"What?" howled Gene. "And be drummed out of the force for cowardice? The shock would kill my father!"

"No, you're going back with a clean record," Alan assured him. "The Indian who brought in your horse and gave Ann your note is minding my uniform for me. This is yours I'm wearing—I'll explain how that came about later on. Where is Tillicum John?"

"He's down at the river," said Ann.

"I'll send him back," said Alan, and took from his pouch the key of the gaol. "Here, take this, Gene! You'll find two prisoners in the town gaol. Start for the post with them to-night. And whatever you do, don't let anyone in St. Johns see Ann with you."

Gene took the key. "But what'll I tell them back at the post?" he asked bleakly. "What'll I tell my father?"

"Tell them the truth, Gene." Alan replied encouragingly. "That you've been ill—and that I sent you back with your prisoners. Your prisoners, mind! Then ask for sick leave. Later on, we'll contrive to make it permanent—permanently disabled in service, eh?"

Without another word for either of them he went out to find the Indian. Gene looked wretchedly at Ann.

"Permanently disabled in service," he said, and sank down on to the chair by the table and buried his face in his hands.

Close Quarters

BARSTOW'S cabin was in darkness when Alan rode up to it, about a couple of hours later. He led his horse away under the trees and hitched it to a trunk there, then stole back to the cabin.

The door was latched, but not locked. He opened it noiselessly, entered the big room, and closed it behind him. Creeping about with cat-like stealth, he pulled down the blinds over all the windows and approached the roll-top desk.

From a pocket of his breeches he took out an electric torch he had acquired at a store in St. Johns, and switched on its light. He found that Barstow had closed the roll-top of the desk, but with the knife that was part of his outfit he prized back the catch of the lock.

The desk was open, and he was going hastily through drawers and trays when his alert ears detected the sound of footsteps on the stoop outside the cabin. Instantly he switched off the light of the torch, closed the top of the desk, and before the latch clicked was in the inner room with his gun ready for any emergency.

The man who entered the cabin closed the door as carefully as he himself had done, then struck a match; and Alan saw that it was Arnold who advanced to the table and lit a lamp that was standing there.

With the lamp in his left hand the junior partner went to the desk, found it locked, and proceeded to force it open with a cold chisel he took from his coat-pocket. Alan had not had time to close the door of the inner room. He slipped behind it and watched through the crack between the hinges.

The lock gave way and the top of the desk was rolled back. Arnold began to search systematically amongst the papers Alan had disturbed; but inadvertently Alan moved an elbow and the door creaked.

Arnold swung round, dropped a sheet of paper that was in his hand, and whipped out a six-shooter. It had seemed to him that the noise had come from the inner room, and he strode towards it, carrying the lamp.

Alan stood tense and motionless behind the door for what seemed an almost intolerable length of time while Arnold, on the other side of it, looked about the room and up into the shadows of the loft. But Arnold did not look behind the door, and after a few minutes went back to the desk.

He had opened one of the lower drawers when he heard the sound of voices outside the cabin, and in a panic he blew out the flame of the lamp, almost dropped the lamp on the top of the desk, and in the darkness sped past Alan's hiding-place.

The front door of the cabin swung back, and a flaring match revealed to Alan the faces of Barstow and Berg. Berg had struck the match, and he went to light the lamp on the top of the desk, but nearly dropped its glass chimney.

"Hi, boss," he cried out, "someone's just been here! This lamp-chimney's still hot!"

Barstow lit another lamp, and the first thing he looked at was the disordered desk.

"You're right!" he exploded with an oath. "He's been going through this desk!"

"Well, he didn't have time to get out," said Berg, "and there's only one place he can hide!"

Arnold heard that, and he made frantic efforts to open a window in the back wall of the inner room. But he fumbled at the catch, and the bottom sash resisted his efforts to raise it. Barstow snatched up the lamp, and he and Berg strode in past the door which concealed Alan.

"Arnold!" roared Barstow.

Arnold had turned from the window the fraction of a second before they saw him, and with rather a sticky smile he said:

"I'm glad to see it's you. I thought I was in for trouble!"

"You are in for trouble!" snarled Barstow. "Come out o' there!"

With an air of self-assurance he was far from feeling the rascally little junior partner walked towards them, and Barstow promptly handed the lamp he was holding to Berg.

"Double-crosser, eh?" he shouted venomously, and seized Arnold by the throat as though intending to choke the life out of him.

"Don't, Barstow!" gasped his victim.

"Let-me-explain."

Alan, behind the door, became convinced that they would hear his breathing; but Barstow hurled Arnold from him into the outer room, so that he went staggering backwards against the table, and followed him in a fury.

"You can't explain anything!" he belated. "I know why you're here! Nobody knows, not even McCord, that I'm his real partner and you're just a figure-head working for me!"

Berg set the lamp upon the table, and Arnold recovered his breath and with it his wits.

"No, but—" he began.

"My only proof was in that desk," Barstow interrupted, "and you came here to get it!"

"No, I didn't!" declared Arnold vehemently. "That desk was open when I got here!"

Barstow stared at him.

"Talk straight—and talk fast!" he commanded.

"Well, I came out here to see you. When I lit the lamp I saw the desk was broken open and the papers scattered around."

"Go on!"

"Well, when I heard you at the door I got panicky. I knew you wouldn't believe what I said, so I tried to get away."

A pair of malevolent eyes bore into a pair of treacherous ones, and Arnold's left arm was suddenly gripped and twisted.

"You're an awful poor liar, Arnold!" said Barstow. "Hand over what you took out of that desk!"

"Don't, Bastow!" pleaded Arnold, who was in agony. "If anything's gone someone else took it!"

It seemed to Alan that it could be only a matter of minutes before the inner room was searched. He had noticed a long black coat hanging from a peg on the wall within easy reach of his hand. He took it down and put it on over his uniform, but as he did so a board creaked beneath his feet, and Berg heard and shouted:

"Wait! There's someone in there!"

There was only one thing for Alan to do, and he did it. Through the crack at the back of the door he took aim with his gun and shot the lamp to pieces.

The voice of Berg rang out in the darkness:

"Careful, you may stop a bullet! Come out of there, whoever you are, or I'll drill you through the door!"

Alan kicked the door shut, rushed across to the window Arnold had tried in vain to open, and took a header clean through the bottom sash, carrying wood-work as well as broken glass with him.

Blazing guns in the other room drowned the noise, and the door became riddled with bullets; but Alan was on his feet and running for his horse before other lamps were lighted and Barstow and Berg ventured into the room he had left behind.

The broken window told its own tale. "Don't let him get away!" yelled Barstow, and Berg knocked out the rest of the window-frame with the butt of his gun and scrambled out over the sill.

Barstow followed, less nimbly, and Arnold followed him. The three ran in all directions, under the trees, but Alan had crossed the road on his horse and was concealed with it in the heart of a thicket.

Berg travelled the farthest, but to no purpose, and when he returned to the cabin he found Barstow and Arnold outside it.

"Which way did he go?" asked the blacksmith.

"I don't know," said Berg. "I lost him."

"I wonder who it could have been?" Barstow looked up and down the road, now faintly illumined by a newly risen moon. "Oh, well, come on!"

They went into the cabin and closed the door; whereupon Alan discarded the black coat and went out from the thicket with his horse, swung himself up into the saddle, and cantered back to the cabin.

"Easy, boy!" he said loudly as he dismounted.

The horse was tethered, and he raised the latch and opened the door quite noisily.

"Hallo, there!" he said. Barstow looked round from the desk, where he was searching in the drawers and pigeon-holes.

"If someone's got that paper," he growled, "he's got plenty of evidence on all of us!"

Alan pointed a finger. "Oh, is Mr. Arnold one of us?" he asked as though in astonishment.

"What do you think?" snapped the blacksmith, and Arnold grinned.

"Well, it's quite a surprise," said Alan, "but as long as I know who's in it, I may as well—"

The front door went back with a crash, and Gene was bundled into the room by Jordan. He was wearing Alan's uniform, but he was handcuffed; and behind Jordan, as that treacherous foreman crossed the threshold, came the two men Alan had arrested—and they were free of their shackles and grinning broadly.

The Capture of Gene

FOR several seconds there was a dead silence in the room, during which Gene looked anywhere but at Alan. Then Barstow gave vent to horrible laughter.

"Well," he cackled, "so you've brought us another uniform for our collection, have you? Look what's wearing your other one!"

"Yeah," said Alan. "Don't fit so good, but I never was a fussy dresser." Barstow turned to Jordan.

"Where'd you pick him up?" he asked.

"We went over to the gaol to get Tom and Jake out," the foreman answered, "and found he'd already got 'em out to take 'em down the river."

The blacksmith's brows came down in a heavy frown. April 24th, 1937.

"It was thoughtful of him to open up the gaol for you, wasn't it?" he said.

"Yeah, it sure was," nodded Jordan. "What'll we do with him now?"

"Take the handcuffs off—I'll attend to him!"

Alan unlocked the handcuffs, but he did not dare to make any sign to his colleague with so many pairs of eyes watching him.

"Arnold," said Barstow, "get a light in the back room."

Arnold went off to light the bracket lamp on the wall of the inner room, and while he was doing it Ann crept up to the front door of the cabin.

She had accompanied Gene as far as the main street of St. Johns and from the yard at the side of the hotel had watched him go to the gaol. It had been arranged that she should join him at the pier after he had marched his prisoners there—Tillicum John was to pick her up in his canoe, and Gene was to use Alan's for himself and the prisoners.

But those plans had gone wrong. To her horror, she had seen Jordan and another man pounce on her lover in the street, and a few minutes afterwards he had passed her hiding-place himself a handcuffed captive.

The two men who had been with Jordan had accompanied him no farther than the end of the settlement, but she had followed the others at a distance, and from behind a tree-trunk she had seen them enter the cabin.

She was listening at the door when Arnold returned from the inner room, and Barstow seized hold of Gene's arm.

"I want to ask you a few questions," he said fiercely.

"There's nothing I can tell you," Gene defied him. "And if there were, I wouldn't!"

"You said that before!" jeered Barstow. "Come along!"

He twisted Gene's left arm backwards and upwards, and Ann heard him cry out in agony:

"No, don't, please! No, I can't go through what I went through before! I can't!"

Ann sped to Alan's horse, unfastened it, flung herself up into the saddle, and went galloping off towards the settlement, while in the cabin Barstow put still more pressure upon Gene's right arm, holding his left in a wrist-lock.

"You can't go through with it, maybe," he grunted fiendishly, "but I think I can!"

"Wait a minute, Barstow!" Alan intervened. "I'd like to get in on this."

"You stay out of it!" the blacksmith roared at him. "I want to talk to this skunk alone!"

"I think I know what you're going to ask him, and I can answer it. You want to know where he got the key of the gaol, don't you?"

"Yes, do you know?"

"Sure. He got it from me." With his right hand Alan seized hold of the blacksmith's shoulder, and round came his left fist with all the swing of his body behind it.

Barstow went floundering backwards, releasing Gene as he fell, and Alan's gun was out before anyone else in the room had time to draw. Berg, across the room, half-turned to snatch a six-shooter from his pocket, but his wrist was shattered by a bullet, and the six-shooter clattered upon the floor.

Gene had sunk to his knees, his face distorted with pain, but Alan tugged him to his feet with his left hand and swept him towards the doorway of the other room.

Barstow, roaring like some infuriated bull, rose up and hurled himself at the man he had tortured, knocking him against the doorpost in open defiance of Alan's gun; but the barrel of the gun snote him on the point of the jaw with such violence that he spun round on his feet before he crashed to the boards.

Alan was over his body in a flash. He sent Gene staggering into the other room, then turned about. Barstow's five accomplices instantly raised their hands, and he backed into the room where Gene was leaning feebly against the wall.

He was slamming the door when Jordan and Berg made a rush at it, and Berg thrust a foot in the way and gripped the edge with his left hand. Alan promptly clubbed his gun and hammered at the exposed knuckles till the hand and foot were withdrawn.

The door was closed and the bolt was shot. An iron bar was standing in a corner, and this Gene propped under one of the cross-pieces of the door.

But Barstow was on his feet again by this time, and he shouted wrathfully: "They'll get out the window! Berg, Jake, go round the back way!"

Alan heard, and knew that it would be useless to try to get Gene away by means of the window. He raced across the room to set the ladder against the edge of the loft, then hoisted the half-fainting young man over his right shoulder.

"You're all right, Gene," he said. "I won't drop you."

Barstow and some of the others were using a wooden bench as a battering-ram against the door, but the bolt and the iron bar held against their attack, though the door threatened to give way on its hinges.

The ladder was mounted, and Gene was deposited on the mattress at the back of the loft.

"How're you feeling?" asked Alan anxiously.

"I'm all right," Gene replied, and managed to get to his feet.

"Keep back out of sight!"

The warning was only just in time. Gene crouched back under the sloping roof an instant before the door collapsed and Jordan dived through the opening, gun in hand.

Alan crept to the edge of the loft on hands and knees, took aim as the foreman exposed himself, and shot him down. For a few minutes there was no further attempt by anyone to enter the room from the one beyond it, but Berg's ugly face appeared at the broken window, and he was climbing in over the sill when Alan's gun barked again.

Berg fell back, wounded in the shoulder, and for a little while there was a silence that seemed almost uncanny.

Gene stole over to Alan, and Alan asked him if he had any cartridges.

"No," was the reply. "they took all mine away with the gun. Why, haven't you got any?"

"Only two."

"Doesn't look so good, does it?" shivered Gene.

"Never know until the last shot's fired," returned Alan.

The Last Cartridge

WHEN Ann reached the main street of St. Johns there were very few people about, and most of the premises were closed for the night.

She drew rein outside the hotel, half-tempted to seek help in its bar-room, and as she did so the lights in the outer office of the McCord & Arnold Lumber Company were extinguished, and she saw two dark figures step forth on to the boardwalk.

She turned the horse and rode over to them.

"UNDER COVER OF NIGHT"

Suspense

MANY eager eyes were turned on the venerable figure of Dr. Reed as he rose to make his address. In most eyes there were tears of regret; in all eyes there were excitement and expectancy, but in one or two there were also anxiety and greed.

The assembly hall at the Oliver J. Trent Memorial University was packed with girl and boy students, all in cap and gown. On the rostrum were the professors, the masters and the mistresses of the great college of learning.

"To-day, my friends, we leave Trent University, you to begin your lives, I to finish mine." The old man's voice was hoarse with emotion. "I have only regrets at leaving you and the department, but I have less regrets when I think of the men and women who remain to carry on further than my furthest aspirations reached. I need hardly name to you Professor Marvin Griswald, who, through his achievements in the realm of astronomy, has brought our college into the forefront in scientific research."

Marvin Griswald was a clean-shaven, handsome man. He gave a little smile of gratification. His eyes were expressionless now, but when Dr. Reed continued they hardened.

"Professor John Lamont, whose theory of mass and the distribution of matter in molecules has caused who can say how many heartaches and headaches, is another who has done wonderful work."

John Lamont was a sleek, well-groomed man. Handsome and a little conscious of his good looks. He grinned as if he knew he deserved this praise. With the students he was a shade more popular than Griswald.

"Next in our galaxy is Professor Susan Nash, the only woman to take a doctorate in physics here at Trent."

Many of the girl students smiled at the pleasant-faced, still young, not bad-looking woman. Everyone liked her, but many whispered that she was unhappy. Her eyes were full of greed, but not for herself.

"Youngest in years, but not achievement, I mention last of all Alan Shaw, who, as you all know, has just returned from a six-months exploration in the Mayan Peninsula."

A weather-tanned, happy-faced young man grinned his appreciation of Dr. Reed's words, and dared to wink slightly at a fair, pretty young student. Deborah Reed, granddaughter of Dr. Reed, screwed up her small nose and brazenly winked back.

"It is indeed an honour to have been the head of so rare a company," went on the retiring Head. "And it is a heavy responsibility that has been placed on me. For among the many and overwhelming favours granted me by the trustees, I have been given the perilous but very precious privilege of selecting my successor."

You could have heard a pin drop. All eyes were tense and expectant, and on the rostrum round Dr. Reed fear, dread and hope were clearly to be seen.

Dr. Reed shook his head.

"No, no, not to-day, but a week from to-day in Full Faculty Meeting, I shall make my announcement," he told them, and a sort of sigh of suppressed emotion ran round the building. Little did the dear but doddering old professor know that by putting off the decision he was indirectly the cause of the deaths of four people and one dog.

After singing the college song the assembly then adjourned to the big banqueting hall and its rooms, where there were tea and refreshments. Here masters, mistresses and students were able to meet and chat with the visitors who had been invited to witness the breaking-up ceremony from the strangers' gallery—most of these visitors had been educated at the college.

Presiding over the special tea-tray for Dr. Reed's own friends and guests was Deborah, and very charming she looked. Maybe Deborah was carefree, but even here the atmosphere of tenseness was apparent. People talked and chattered, but they were on edge.

A tall, plain, pale-faced woman with eyes that seemed much too large came to shake hands with Dr. Reed. Her words were genuine when she said that she was sorry that he was retiring. She was Janet Griswald, and everyone knew that she had spent much time acting as her husband's assistant. A devoted wife and a clever chemist. Everyone at the college liked this quiet, plain little woman.

Alan Shaw had returned the previous day, and one of his prize possessions during his wanderings in the jungle was a photo in a silver frame. One can guess the picture. Alan was very fond of Deborah, and the girl liked Alan, but they were not engaged and though she was a bachelor of arts she liked having a good time. Therefore, when Alan rushed up and gripped her hands, Deborah smiled at him gladly, but when he tried to date her up she shook her head. "She was sorry, but she was dated up with Lamont."

The gleam in Alan's eye was jealousy. Lamont was standing not far away talking to Susan Nash, who had been in love with him for years. He was aware of the fact, and though she was a clever woman, she was unaware that he traded on the fact. He was over forty and had a great passion for Deborah Reed, but when he could not date up the girl then he would fall back on Susan. Susan lived with her invalid, overbearing mother.

"I'd feel a lot better if I knew what old Reed has on his mind," he told her. "Nonsense!" answered Susan, with forced cheerfulness. "You've nothing to worry about."

"Haven't I? I've been sticking to my class-room, remember." Lamont raised his voice slightly. "I haven't been running around getting my picture in the papers amusing myself in the tropics."

Of course, Alan Shaw heard, and he glared at Lamont, whose expression was mocking and contemptuous. In both of the men's eyes was jealousy.

"That wasn't very nice, Johnnie." Susan guided Lamont away. "Alan Shaw isn't your rival—not for the headship, anyway."

A tall man made his way through the crowd. His morning coat and pin-stripe trousers were faultless, his collar and tie the latest shape, shade and pattern, in his buttonhole was a carnation, in his hand he held a thin ivory cigarette-holder. His hair parting was unruined, and his moustache clipped perfectly—a very elegant dandy. And yet this man was Christopher Cross, one of the best known amateur detectives of the day.

"My dear boy"—Dr. Reed held out withered hands in greeting—"so good of you to come."

"Nothing would have prevented me, doctor."

Dr. Reed beckoned Griswald and Lamont and introduced them.

"One of my best pupils, gentlemen," he said with a shake of his head. "He'd have gone far in physics, but he's wasted great talents tracking down criminals."

"Well, someone has to or your sleep might be disturbed even in the best class-rooms," answered Cross, and then opened his eyes wide. "Why, if it isn't Deb, the precocious babe that used to sit on my knee. You'll excuse me, gentlemen." He waved the two eminent professors to one side. "When she was six she promised to marry me. Last time I saw her she was sixteen, and my name was still on the list."

Lamont gritted his teeth. Griswald gave a supercilious smile. Alan Shaw, watching from across the room, gave a sickly grin when the great detective boldly kissed Deborah Reed.

"I still have a chance, but a very slender one," Cross told them and smiled at the girl. "Grand to see you with a mortar-board—I always did think you had brains, but never that you were all that clever."

Alan Shaw came up and took Deborah away to meet some friends of his. Cross studied Lamont and Griswald and decided that neither man trusted the other.

"You heard Dr. Reed's announcement in the auditorium?" Griswald said as they moved out of hearing of the Head.

"Yes," admitted Cross. "I was surprised to see that the doctor has grown so old and frail."

"It isn't pleasant to be suspected of waiting around for a dead man's shoes," Griswald added.

"Wouldn't it be strange if the old boy didn't live to name his successor?" suggested Lamont.

"Not half so strange as if the man he named didn't live to succeed him," the detective remarked.

"I'll send you the data for my obituary," Lamont said quickly, with a April 24th, 1937.

defiant look at Griswald, and walked off to speak with Susan Nash.

"Don't mind him," whispered Griswald. "He's a bit edgy."

"You're all edgy," Cross stated. "Every one of you."

Later Christopher Cross met Janet Griswald. The detective had never met Griswald and Lamont, but Janet had been a student there in his time, and they had done many chemical experiments together. She had always had an affection for Cross since the moment he mixed together some ingredients that he shouldn't have mixed, blew half the laboratory to pieces, and, badly hurt, managed to get her out of danger when the place caught fire. Later she had married Griswald and he had lost touch with her.

"Everyone seems a bit nervy, Janet," he said after greeting her.

"Dr. Reed's holding up of the new principal has made them edgy," Janet answered. "It's an edgy world."

Christopher Cross detected a sharpness in her voice, and when Janet went up to her husband and suggested they should go home he knew that Janet was just as edgy as the rest of them. Little did he know that within a few hours she would be dead, and that her decease would not be from natural causes.

The Pocket Book

THAT same evening Janet Griswald could have been seen busy in the huge laboratory attached to her house. All kinds of weird bottles and lamps and machinery. There was a huge switchboard and electric globes that flickered strangely. On a screen a lantern projected a queer picture of strokes, dashes and signs that would have meant nothing to most people, but were ABC to Janet. The top line of signs were solar-calcium bands, and the lower nebular-calcium bands. Janet sat at a table writing in a notebook, whilst an elderly little man hovered around. Now and again Janet looked at the screen chart.

"The light all right?" he asked.

"Perfect."

"It ought to be. It isn't everybody has a professor of physics for a handy man."

"Now don't begin that all over again," Janet spoke sharply. "What you were and what you are now are not matters that concern me. You played the fool with your chances and drank yourself stupid. You have only yourself to blame, so be thankful that through my husband you have this chance of getting back. Put on slide fourteen, please."

Muttering, the old man obeyed, and Janet had just finished her notes when there was a shrill barking. A Manchester terrier, which had been curled up on a mat near its mistress' feet, was now barking shrilly.

Janet glanced round and glanced upwards as a door closed.

"Turn on the lights, Rudolph," she ordered.

Rudolph Brehmer scowled when he saw the dark, foreign, almond-eyed girl that was coming down some steel stairs from the sleeping quarters of the house. The professor showed his teeth in an expression that was akin to hatred. Janet Griswald's great eyes never wavered from the girl.

Tonya van Horne did not hurry. She was a voluptuous, sinuous creature, and her lips were heavily painted.

"Do you mind knocking when you come in, Miss van Horne?"

"So sorry." The girl stared impudently back with a slight smile near the red lips. "Professor Griswald wanted to know if the notes were ready."

"I shall be ready for him when he comes."

"The time it is so very short. The department meeting is on Friday and it is already Tuesday."

"You'd better run along and let Mrs. Griswald get along with her work," cried old Brehmer. "Or else Professor Griswald will never get those notes for his precious speech."

"That's enough, Rudolph," sharply cried Janet. "Ask Professor Griswald to step in here, will you, Miss van Horne?"

Rudolph watched the girl go up the stairs.

"Pfft! Half-caste!" he sneered. "Rudolph!" cried Mrs. Griswald. "I will not have you being rude to people in my house."

The door opened and down the steel steps came quick steps. It was Griswald, and there was an angry, bitter expression on his face.

"Why couldn't you trust Tonya with those notes?"

"Rudolph, do you mind?" Janet said to the old man.

"Oh, no, no, no, no!" harshly laughed Brehmer. "I'm used to being sent about my business."

"That man's impossible—getting worse," Griswald muttered as Brehmer slouched away.

"Just a poor old man with a persecution complex."

"You're very charitable, my dear." Griswald twisted his lips, but it was not a smile. Then he sniffed. "Have you been burning something?" He saw some papers that lay partly burnt in the hearth of a brick fire. "Why, they look like your spectrum calculations." He stared at her in horror.

Her smile was bitter and mocking.

"Don't be frightened—everything is summarised here." She held up the leather book. "Such a small book to hold such a large theory."

"Large, that's hardly the word for it." Griswald licked his lips and squared his shoulders. "Imagine, Janet, you and I standing here and that great thing between us—ungessed—undiscovered by the world's greatest scientists. Can you see their faces when I stand before them on Friday and prove to them, step by step, that the only law in physics that has defied variation really does vary—that the velocity of light actually does slow down in travelling great distances? Can you picture the effect on the astronomers at Mount Wilson and Harvard when they find that the displacement towards the red in their own splendid spectrograph has been interpreted in a way that will force Einstein and all the others to revise their laws in accordance with my discoveries?"

"Your discoveries?"

"Ours, of course." He gave a condescending little smile. "Sorry, my dear."

"Ours?" Her voice was sharp. "Well, we've always done our work together, haven't we?" He gave her an anxious glance.

"We've accomplished a great deal in the course of your career."

"Of course, and I give you credit for it."

"Thank you, Marvin!" The large eyes were expressionless.

"Just between ourselves," Griswald spoke cheerfully. "Just between ourselves, my dear, as it's always been. Unless, of course, you've changed?" He still smiled, but he looked anxious.

"I haven't changed."

"Of course I could easily include you in my speech on Friday."

"The speech that will put you into Dr. Reed's shoes," Janet put the small notebook into her bag. "I doubt if you will ever make that speech now, Marvin."

"What are you talking about?" "My dear Marvin, I've been willing for years to do the work and let you take the credit"—her voice was shrill. "But in return—perhaps I was unreasonable—I did want faithfulness."

"You mean Tonya?" His expression was wolfish. "That's absurd. She's merely my prize pupil—the most brilliant graduate that—"

"Yes. That's the pretext on which you've brought her into our house and into my laboratory!" Janet cried fiercely. The little dog had got her mood because he was snarling. "Well, Marvin, she may stay here—but I'm going to-night." She held up the bag. "And this goes with me."

"Look here, Janet, you can't do a thing like that?" He was aghast.

"These years of work are mine."

"But you don't realise what—"

"I realise perfectly," she interrupted. "I'm leaving you to make your own way—with Tonya van Home to comfort you." She looked down. "Be quiet, Benny." She raised her voice: "Rudolph!"

Marvin Griswald walked to the fireplace and stood there biting and fingering his lips. His eyes were wide and staring as he looked at his wife. Then he seemed to shake as if in convulsions.

"Rudolph, tidy up here, will you, please?" Janet Griswald ordered her assistant. "And lock up after me. I'm leaving for a little holiday to-night as soon as our dinner guests have gone."

Janet walked to the stairs, pressed her hand to her side, and then went slowly up the stairs. Marvin Griswald watched her go, and then sensed that he was being stared at—the mocking grin of Rudolph Brehmer. The professor stepped forward with fists clenched, and Brehmer hurriedly moved away. The rage spasm that seized Griswald passed, and he ran up the stairs after his wife.

This was the last night Janet would be in this house, and if she took away those notes he was ruined.

Heart Failure
MARTIN GRISWALD was an ambitious man. All his life he had made use of people to gain his own ends. Janet was a wealthy woman—her money was useful. Janet was also one of the greatest women connected with science. He married her. By his will power he had made her almost his slave. Whilst he loved and cherished her she would do his will, but not while he bestowed his favour on another.

It was his ambition to be the new principal. This dinner-party was just one of those social links that play their part. Lamont seldom entertained. It was almost a foregone conclusion in Griswald's mind that he would get the coveted post, especially through Janet's amazing discoveries. He knew that she would still help him if he gave up Tonya.

One of the first guests to arrive was Deborah, and she was shown up to Janet's bed-room. Janet helped the girl off with her dark wrap and then laughed. From a chair she picked up a similar wrap.

"I'm sorry, my dear, but I had no idea when I bought it this morning."

"Oh, Janet!" half-laughed, half-sobbed the girl. "And I bought mine to-day especially for your party."

"Never mind, my dear, I'll put some colour to mine and no one will know. Be quiet, Benny."

The little dog was sitting up and begging; on the floor was a small ball. The dog picked it up, dropped it, barked, and then sat up again. Janet picked up the ball, threw it, and Benny caught it. He could play this game for hours. Janet threw the ball again, and he caught it on the second bounce.

"Oh, Janet, you spoil that little beast!" laughed Deborah. "Let's see if he'll do it with me."

Benny would have done it with most people. So they played with the dog, until all the ladies had arrived. Then with strict instructions that he was to behave himself Benny was left in charge of the bed-room.

All the guests were now assembled in the drawing-room. At the piano sat Christopher Cross, who was a very fair musician. Standing behind him and humming the tune he was playing was Deborah Reed. Janet Griswald and Susan Nash were seated near a fire discussing a popular play. Lamont and Griswald were standing nearby and saying very little, because Lamont was too busy watching Deborah near the piano and Griswald kept on glancing at the door.

Drinks were brought in by a butler, and all with one exception were cocktails containing alcohol. The one exception was a grapefruit concoction.

"I like that white grapefruit, don't you, John?" Janet called out gaily.

"I have to since my wretched stomach is allergic to alcohol," Lamont sipped the drink, shuddered, and cried: "Good health!"

An exclamation of annoyance from Susan.

"Oh, I've left my rouge at home!" "Here, use mine!" cried Janet, and fished in her bag.

Griswald's eyes narrowed as he saw that all-important notebook.

Cross abandoned the piano to go for his drink, and noticed the preoccupied expression on Griswald's face.

"Hallo, what's the matter with you?"

"Oh, nothing really!" Griswald was a good actor. "But I'm just a bit worried about Janet. She's not been quite herself these last few days."

Like a whirlwind Alan Shaw burst into the drawing-room, and he carried a huge cardboard box in his arms.

"Hallo—hallo, everybody!" he cried, as if everyone were deaf. "Greetings! Brought along some Mayan junk to show you. Hope I'm not late."

"I'll forgive you, Alan," Janet got up and walked towards him. "What's that—a present for me?"

"Hardly, Janet, but it's thousands of years old." Alan glanced at the detective. "Ought to interest you, Cross."

Alan Shaw began to untie the string of the cardboard parcel, and Susan frowned as she saw Janet beckon the butler, who had appeared with some more drinks.

"That's the third cocktail I've seen you take, Janet," she reproved in a whisper. "You know what it does to your heart."

Janet's laugh was reckless.

"Oh, it's a wonder what a human heart can stand!"

From the parcel Alan took out a grotesque and hideous grinning mask, which he proceeded to hold to his face. Janet had not seen what he was doing as she was busy with her cocktail. She finished this, and turned about a second after Alan had put on the mask.

Cross caught her in his arms just as she went off in a dead faint.

She gave a startled cry, swayed, and would have fallen but for Christopher Cross, who made a dash across the room and caught her just as she went off in a dead faint. Alan took the mask off and stared at her with anguish. Cross picked her up and carried her over to a couch and laid her gently down. Deborah brought a bottle of smelling-salts and Cross chafed her hands, while poor Alan just stood there looking a picture of misery.

"Alan, don't you ever grow up!" was all that Deborah had to say.

When Janet recovered the first thing she asked for was her bag, and Griswald's eyes narrowed as she clutched it and fingered it—he knew why she was worried. Janet thought someone might have taken her life's work—the work that bound him to her.

Janet got to her feet and said she would like to go upstairs and rest for a few minutes. She was quite all right, and Alan was not to worry any more. No, she would rather not have any help. She had reached the stairs when the front door opened to admit Tonya van Horne. Her husband hurried past her, and she saw the way his hands lingered on the girl's shoulders as he removed her cloak. White of face, Janet went to her bed-room.

Benny barked a greeting at her.

"I thought I could face it, Benny, but I can't." Janet went to a cupboard and brought out a suitcase. "We're going away now. Don't be afraid, little man, you're coming with me. I wouldn't dream of leaving you."

Janet was busy when she heard a step on the stairs that she knew. Her glance went to her handbag and she picked it up, to look desperately round like some trapped animal. Janet had learnt to fear her husband in certain moods. She took the precious notebook out of her bag and put it into the pocket of the black velvet coat hanging over the end of the bed.

Marvin Griswald came into the room.

"Janet—Janet!" he cried as he saw the suitcase. "You're not going to carry out that crazy threat—you're not going to leave me?"

"I told you." She eyed him defiantly. "You can give up Tonya van Horne or you can give me up."

"You'll ruin me, Janet. You can't do that. You can't do that to me."

"Please don't make a scene—I've stood all I can bear to-night!" Janet's hand was at her heart. The little dog was snarling his hatred of Marvin Griswald. "I leave to-night unless you give up Tonya van Horne for ever."

Marvin Griswald's eyes narrowed. He walked across to the French windows and flung them wide.

"Please don't open those windows!" she cried. "It's much too cold."

"As you don't feel well a little air will do you good." He came closer. "For the last time, Janet, will you stay?"

"Will you send her out of the house?"

Griswald's face muscles twitched, and then his eyes narrowed.

"No!" he shouted loudly, and, turning suddenly, whisked up the dog from the floor. Benny tried to bite him.

"Marvin!" she cried, as he strode towards the open windows.

He laughed harshly, and then hurled the dog through the open windows. It had the effect that Marvin had expected. Janet spun round and dropped in a heap. He picked up from the floor the rubber ball with which Benny loved to play and threw that after the dog. Then he knelt beside his wife and felt for her heart.

Marvin Griswald rushed downstairs crying loudly for help. Janet had collapsed. Everyone rushed up to the bedroom.

"Why, it seems only a minute ago she was laughing—playing with her dog," Marvin told them in anguished tones. "Then suddenly it happened." "What happened?" Cross asked gently.

"The ball bounced over the railing," Griswald pointed towards the open windows. "She was throwing it to him. She'd throw it, you know, and he'd catch it."

Deborah was so sympathetic that she had to speak.

"She was doing it to-night when—when I was upstairs with her," she whispered.

Griswald bowed his head.

"He loved it, poor little chap. This time when it bounced he jumped after it, and the balcony railing is so very low." He stared at the windows, and covered his face with his hands. "That dog was more like a child to her."

"How did the window happen to be open?" asked the detective.

"She asked me to open it. She said she wanted a breath of air." Griswald looked at them from haunted eyes. "She just gave one cry and crashed down before I could catch her in my arms."

They did everything they could, and then the little party went downstairs, leaving Griswald with the dead woman.

"I can't believe it—to go like that!" sobbed Deborah.

"She had a weak heart," answered the practical Susan. "And the shock of that poor little dog coming on top of all those drinks. I warned her about it."

Lamont gave a sneering laugh.

"It wasn't the cocktails." He glowered at Alan. "You forget the fright our sportive friend here gave her with his phoney mask."

"I beg your pardon?" cried Alan.

"I said your phoney mask!" cried Lamont.

"I was a fool, an awful fool, and you couldn't possibly call me anything worse than I'm calling myself." Alan stared squarely at Lamont. "But when you accuse me of faking specimens, Dr. Lamont—"

"I've got to dig a grave!" Rudolph Brehmer told them.

Griswald took the war club from Lamont. . . .

"Oh, Alan, can't you take a joke?" cried Susan, trying to save the impending quarrel.

"Was it a joke?" cried the youngster. "No!" shouted Lamont. "The mask is not authentic."

"We'll discuss this, Lamont, some other time, and in some other place!" blazed Alan. "And the sooner the better."

Alan stalked out of the house, and Deborah, who had promised Lamont that he could see her home, was so upset that she left her escort and ran after Alan, calling his name. That did not make Lamont any better tempered.

Christopher Cross frowned. He had only been here a few hours, and yet it was clear to him that all these people were at cross-purposes. Deborah loved Alan, but was a mischievous flirt—Cross decided she wanted smacking. Lamont wanted Deborah, who did not care very much about him, and poor Susan, who adored Lamont, seemed destined to be unlucky. Fancy them wanting to row when only a few minutes before poor Janet had been living! As they left the house Cross saw a figure slinking furtively towards a side entrance.

"Rudolph!" sharply spoke Susan, when Cross touched her arm and pointed out the figure.

Rudolph Brehmer was carrying something wrapped in a rug.

"I've got to dig a grave," he told them.

"What is it?" Susan stared at the bundle.

"It's Benny, her little dog. I saw him fall, poor fellow. I've got to find a grave for her dog. I've got to find a grave," Brehmer mumbled, and his eyes seemed to blaze like those of a fanatic.

"Come, Susan!" Christopher Cross gave the woman an encouraging push. "We must be getting along—I think it's going to rain."

Griswald Goes Out Into the Night

UPSTAIRS in Janet's room Marvin Griswald was busy going through a small desk. He tried the doors, and then stared in perplexity round the room. His eyes looked inquiringly at Tonya as she hastened in through the open bed-room door.

"Well?"

"It's not down in the laboratory."

"I didn't see how it could be. Did you look in the hall?"

She nodded.

"Not there." The girl pointed. "It must be in this room. Is it so important?"

"Merely my career, my child—my reputation," he answered with ironical humour.

"But surely you can get those notes up again. You did it once."

Marvin shook his head.

"No, Tonya, I didn't. She did everything—that was why I was so bound to her. I thought with Janet gone I should be free, but without those notes I'm ruined. We must find that book, Tonya, to-night."

"She had it downstairs."

"I saw it in her bag. Perhaps she gave it to someone."

"To the detective person?" suggested Tonya. "To Rudolph?"

"Rudolph wasn't in the house." Griswald pinched his lower lip as he thought. "Cross has been away so long—no, I don't think she would have given it to him."

"To Alan Shaw?"

"Possibly—possibly—or Lamont—or Susan Nash." Griswald went towards the door. "Have a final look round. I'll be back in a moment."

When Griswald returned he was wearing a dark rain coat, and was putting on black gloves. It accentuated the ghastly whiteness of his face. The girl shook her head.

"No luck. What about the Reed girl?"

"Deb? Possible, but not probable." He fixed the last button of a glove.

"No. Alan Shaw, John Lamont or Susan Nash. One of them has it."

"Do you think they'll give it to you?"

His eyes seemed to become suddenly large and terrifying, so much so that even Tonya shrank back.

"I shall not ask them, Tonya," Martin Griswald said.

"Are you going to see them to-night?" she whispered.

Marvin nodded.

"To-night!" he told her, and laughed strangely.

In the Dead of Night

JOHN LAMONT was studying a book when there came a short ring at his door, and he frowned when he opened it to admit Susan Nash.

"For heaven's sake, Susan, why have you come to see me to-night of all nights?"

"Well, you didn't expect me to sit around and correct exam. papers after what we've gone through at the Griswalds? I simply had to see you, Johnnie, and I thought we could have a nice cup of coffee together." She looked at him anxiously.

"I don't wish for coffee. Moreover, I'm going out."

"Where to?"

"That intrepid explorer, Alan Shaw." His smile was full of spite and malice. He held up a book. "Someone's got to take the cockiness out of that young cub, and I have text and line for him. This book proves that that Mayan war mask is a fake."

"What does it matter, John?" begged Susan. "He thinks it's genuine and it's all rather a matter of opinion."

"It is not!"

Susan gave a resigned sigh.

"Well, run along and get it off your chest, dear, and don't lose your temper. I shall wait for you until you come back."

"I shall probably be quite late."
"No matter. I shall sit and wait if it takes all winter."

Lamont shrugged his shoulders as if he did not care whether she waited or not and went out of his flat.

Alan was able to pacify Deborah on the ride back to town, and she so far forgave him as to consent to come into his flat for eggs and bacon, and to see some of the wonderful masks and things he had collected on the expedition.

There was no light or gas in the place—except candles. He explained that being an explorer he had quite forgotten to settle the electric light and gas bill before he went away, and so they were cut off. He was fixing all these things in the morning.

But before the eggs were out of the larder the jealous Alan had rashly brought up the name of John Lamont. Now that they were all friendly again she would have to stop going out with that bouncer, Deborah was stubborn, and in her opinion Lamont, though weak and bad tempered, was a good fellow at heart. She refused and told Alan not to be absolutely jealous. The eggs were not cooked, and it ended in a row, but Alan was very humble when Deborah said she was going home, and alone.

"How?" he asked.
"By subway," she blazed. "And don't you dare follow me or I'll give you in charge of the police for unwelcome attentions."

Of course, Alan rushed out after her and he followed her down the subway. Deborah's anger cooled because she saw how crazy he must be about her, but she decided to teach him a lesson. She gave him the slip by telling a policeman to stop that man from following her. How she laughed when she saw the policeman telling Alan to be off or else spend the rest of the night in the lock-up.

John Lamont, book under arm, entered the apartment house where Alan Shaw resided. He walked up the stairs quite quietly and was surprised to see the door of Number 6 wide open. He peered in, and saw that the room was lit by candles. He entered and saw a dark-coated figure going over the papers in a desk.

Lamont smiled as he watched. This was funny. He coughed and he chuckled when Marvin Griswald whipped round.

"Well, professor. This is a surprise!" Lamont raised his hat, then tossed it on to a chair.

The vicious defiance faded from Griswald's face.

"Hallo, John!" he managed a smile.
"You're the last person I expected to see here. Where's Alan?"

"He—he just stepped out for a moment. I suppose you think it strange—my being here?"

"Well, yes, rather," admitted Lamont.

"I imagined you would be at home."
"Alan asked me to come down and help him with something," Griswald explained, his eyes watchful. "I wasn't sorry to get away from my own house to-night."

"I see. Well, don't let me disturb you." Lamont's thin lips twisted into a mocking smile and he glanced towards the rumpled papers. "I didn't disturb you, did I?"

"Oh, no, merely startled me."
"Sorry! But you were so absorbed with Alan's effects," Lamont said blandly and still smiling. "Interesting, this Mayan stuff, isn't it?"

April 24th, 1937.

"Fascinating. Alan asked me to go through some papers for him."

"Inhospitable chap, isn't he?" Lamont glanced at Griswald. "He might have asked you to take off your coat and gloves."

Griswald's laugh was forced.
"Most amusing. It was cold in here, and these gloves are so light I hardly knew I had them on."

"For the moment, old man, I took you for a thief."

"Look here, John. You don't think I—"

"Don't be absurd," interrupted Lamont, smiling unpleasantly. "Of course I don't. A man can't be a thief and hope for the headship of the college. Now, can he? I suppose you're still doing considerable research for your speech on Friday?"

"There's practically nothing left to do," answered Griswald, who was now certain that Lamont had the book.

Lamont walked over to the table and picked up a queer piece of black ebony.

"Curious weapon, isn't it?"
"War club, I imagine."

"Hefty!" Lamont weighed it in his hands. "By the way, where did you say Shaw went?"

"He went out to post a letter."

"Well, he's—he's taking his time about it. I shall enjoy seeing his face when he finds us here."

"I told you he knows I'm here." Griswald had taken the club from Lamont, and was staring at it fixedly. "I'm afraid he'll get wet, poor fellow."

"I beg your pardon?" Lamont was startled.

"It's raining, isn't it?" Griswald answered, and John Lamont turned towards a window—turned his back on Marvin Griswald.

Susan Nash put a kettle on and made herself some coffee because she was tired of waiting for Lamont, but she vowed she would not go till he did get back. She gasped when she heard a noise in the service dumb-waiter. Who could be using it at this time of night? The waiter stopped at Lamont's small kitchen. Susan didn't know what could be coming up at this time, so she pulled back the sliding trap.

A body wrapped in burlap and with a hideous mask as a face rolled on to the floor. The woman screamed as the binding holding the mask gave and she looked at the dead face of John Lamont.

Half an hour later a woman soaked to the skin, her hair half down her back, her eyes wide with fear, got back to the same flat that she shared with her mother. Mrs. Nash stared in amazement at her daughter and abandoned her game of patience to scold her.

"A fine time of night to come in. You look half-drowned," she shrilled.

"Mother, mother, be quiet!" Susan rung her hands together. "I'm in dreadful trouble. John's been murdered."

Mrs. Nash listened to her daughter's story.

"You've been carrying on all these months with John Lamont, and it won't do you any good if it gets out," decided the vinegary old woman. "You know how they hate scandal at the college. One breath of it and out you'd go, my girl, and then where would we be? Therefore you won't breathe a word to anybody about where you were or what you saw to-night."

"But, mother, he was murdered. I've got to tell the police."

"Let them find things out for themselves." Mrs. Nash went back to her game.

"Oh, I don't care what becomes of me," sobbed Susan Nash.

"But I care, Susie," answered the calculating old lady. "I'm an old woman and I worked hard for you when you were little."

"All right, mother. All right."

"That's a good girl." Mrs. Nash nodded approvingly. "Just keep your mouth shut and you'll be safe."

"Safe?" shrilled Susan. "How can we be safe? Don't you realise that somewhere out there in the rain, somebody is walking who killed John Lamont, who knows that he's lying there, this very minute, murdered!"

Griswald's Cunning

MARVIN GRISWALD entered the Alumni Club and went straight into a telephone booth. The club kept open to the small hours of the morning. He rang his own house.

"Lamont is home," Marvin told Tonya. "He's been taken to his own flat. I know I rang up some while ago and told you something different, but Lamont has been taken home, and as a result I can't get into his place. I'm convinced it's there."

"What are you going to do?" came the voice of his secretary.

"I don't know—yet—but I've got to find a way. Don't worry. I'll get in somehow. Good-bye."

Griswald came out of the booth and stood there, his face quite expressionless. He wondered if some sort of refreshment might help him to think, and walked towards the dining-room for the purpose of speaking to the head-waiter—it was then that he heard the voice of Christopher Cross.

"My dear Fred, there is no such thing as Napoleon brandy, Napoleon rarely drank brandy. And if he did, it's extremely unlikely that he had the forethought to lay any down for the Alumni Club."

Marvin Griswald came to the door and saw the detective talking to the head-waiter.

"Fred, did you ever see a picture of Napoleon with his hand in his coat like this?" Cross adopted the characteristic Napoleonic gesture "You have? Well, the poor chap was suffering probably from a stomach ache from drinking stuff like that." He picked up a bottle. "Take it away, Fred. My spirit is broken. I shall never be able to get a satisfactory glass of brandy in this town."

Marvin Griswald walked into the room, and he looked pretty terrible in the rain-soaked coat and saturated hat—he still wore the black gloves.

"Griswald." The detective was all sympathy. "Here, come and sit down—you look all in."

"I've been walking in the rain, hours it seems. I couldn't rest," Griswald said in dreary tones. "I thought maybe some stimulant—a little brandy, perhaps."

"A spot of brandy wouldn't be bad," agreed Cross. "But you know the impossible stuff they serve here."

"Yes—yes," Marvin nodded. "There's only one man in this town has brandy fit to drink."

"Meaning yourself?"
"Oh, no, no. I was thinking of John Lamont."

"You don't say." Cross was at once interested. "Its year wouldn't be eighteen fifty-eight?"

"I like good brandy, though I'm not an expert," Griswald answered. "Let me think. The date was on the bottle. Yes, it was eighteen fifty-eight. I remember now because Lamont said it was laid down the same year as the Atlantic Cable. Something of a connoisseur, Lamont." He paused, and looked appealingly at Cross. "I say, why shouldn't we drop in on him?"

"Lamont? Now?"

"Well, if you're interested in that brandy," Griswald muttered, and bowed his head limply, "you see, I don't feel much like going home to-night or being alone either."

Christopher Cross decided that some of Lamont's brandy would do Griswald a lot of good. He felt himself in need of a little cheer, too. The two men took a cab round to Lamont's apartment house. The nigger porter said that Mr. Lamont was out. The man recognised Griswald and was quite willing for Griswald and Cross to wait till Lamont returned. Griswald made some excuse that Lamont would be pleased to see them, and the nigger, on getting a tip, would have let them sleep there if they had wanted.

On entering the flat the sharp eyes of Christopher Cross noticed the hat and coat on a chair.

"That porter must be wrong. Lamont must be in. Here's his hat and coat," Cross raised his voice. "Lamont!"

Cross tried the bed-room and found that the bed had not been slept in.

"Probably in hiding with that fifty-eight brandy?" suggested Griswald. "I wonder where he's gone?"

Christopher Cross opened the kitchen door and switched on the light, and his eyes opened wide at sight of the body on the floor and the ominous pool of blood. Without a word the detective knelt beside the body.

"Shall I send for a doctor?" Griswald muttered hoarsely.

"No, the District Attorney," Cross got to his feet. "Lamont's been murdered."

"There's no 'phone here."

"I'll go and 'phone Pritchard from the switchboard downstairs," Cross decided. "Will you stay here? Remember, nothing must be touched."

While Cross was out of the room Griswald began a feverish search through Lamont's desk. When the detective returned some fifteen minutes later with District Attorney Pritchard, Sergeant Lucks of the Investigation Bureau, and Dr. Bushy, the police surgeon, they found Marvin Griswald standing by the window. The detective introduced Marvin Griswald, who reported that nothing had occurred in Cross' absence.

The police surgeon at once got busy, and after a quick examination stated that he considered the crime had been committed about an hour to two hours previously. The cause of death was a hit on the head, left parietal area, with a sharp instrument. There were six wounds in the head, in distinct groups of three.

"Two groups—three wounds in each group and equidistant," thoughtfully whispered Cross, kneeling by the body. "Any idea of the weapon used, doc?"

"None," came the snappy answer. "This in my fourth murder to-day and I've had my share of corpses."

The police surgeon hurried away to another case.

"What do you make of it, Cross?" Pritchard asked.

"I'd say he was struck twice. Each blow left three marks. But it was a curious sort of weapon," Cross answered. "Let's take a look round."

A search of the apartments did not reveal the weapon.

"Would a tomahawk leave marks like those on the body?" suggested Griswald.

"That's an idea." Cross nodded eagerly. "A tomahawk of peculiar design or some sort of barbaric instrument."

"Wait a minute, sir," cried the thick-set, burly Sergeant Lucks. "A crime isn't going to be committed in an elevator apartment that way. A piece of wood with nails in it would do the trick. I reckon it's simple."

"Would you mind letting us in on it?" mildly asked Cross.

"Sure! This guy Lamont comes back to his flat a couple of hours ago, takes off his hat and coat in the dining-room, hears something in the kitchen and comes in here. Now this place has a fire-escape entrance and the killer has come up those back stairs. Gets in with a skeleton key, and is laying in wait for Lamont. He cracks him twice over the head and makes his getaway."

"Do you agree with the sergeant's theory?" Pritchard looked inquiringly at Cross.

"No, there's another possibility. Pritchard, have a look here, will you?" Cross beckoned the District Attorney to kneel beside the body. "Notice how the nap of the cloth is pressed down in grooves. Faint, but discernible. I think that negro porter was right when he said John Lamont didn't come back here to-night through the hall. Somebody brought him."

"What makes you say that?" Griswald asked.

"Because he couldn't have walked."

"Why not?" Pritchard asked.

"Because his legs were tied," the detective replied. "These marks on his trouser legs were made by cords. He was carried in—after he was dead. It fits in."

"With what?" demanded Pritchard.

"With his shoes being dry—bone dry! Look!" He pointed to the dead man's shoes. "He couldn't have walked through the rain without getting his shoes even damp."

"Unless he took a taxi," muttered Lucks.

"And got into it and out of it without even stepping on the sidewalk," countered Cross. "Here, what about this? What do you make of these stains, Pritchard?"

The D.A. looked at the soft hat found in the room.

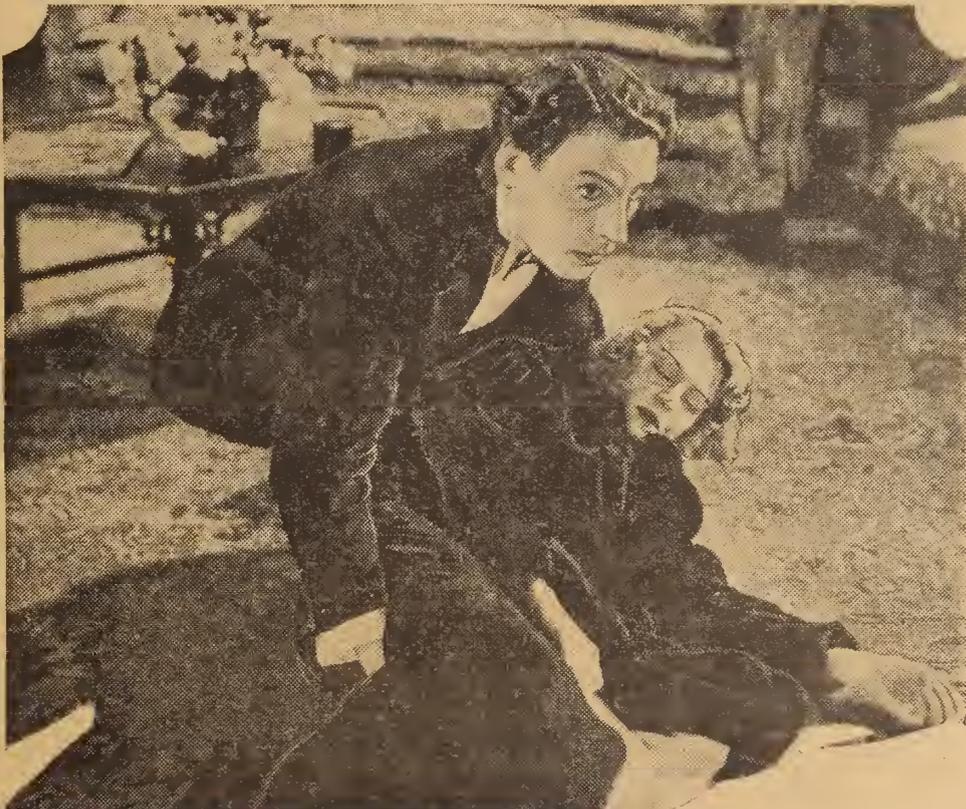

"They look like blood."

"Blood, but no marks on hat," Cross cried eagerly. "Impossible to make those wounds right through the hat without even cutting the felt. That hat was placed on Lamont's head after he was killed. The body was trussed up and brought here. The crime occurred somewhere else and the murderer not only brought back the body, but it is more than likely he brought back the hat and coat as well."

"It's not possible," cried the sergeant.

Cross stood up and glanced round the kitchen. He pointed to the dumb-waiter.

"What about this interesting survival of early service days? Lend me your torch, sergeant." He pulled back the sliding panel. "Hallo! Stopped right here at our very door." He flashed the torch.

He picked up the limp figure of Deborah Reed in his arms.

"There's one thing we can be sure of," stated Pritchard. "This body was never lugged around by a weakling."

"Then you'd look, I suppose, for a man who was something of an athlete—big, broad shoulders?" said Griswald. "Very good, professor, very good again," approved Cross. "That's exactly the type we'd look for. A young, muscular chap."

"Look, boss, we don't want to play around feeling muscles," cried blunt Sergeant Lucks. "I reckon we've got to find out if this guy Lamont had any enemies."

"By George, Lucks, I think you've hit on something at last!" Cross straightened his back from examining the dumb-waiter. "This enemy undoubtedly brought Lamont into the flat by means of this shaft. I did witness a heated argument Lamont had only a few hours ago. Pritchard, I think a little conversation with one Alan Shaw might be in order."

An Arrest

CROSS, Pritchard, Lucks and Griswald proceeded to the apartment of Alan Shaw, and the young explorer soon broke down under the detective's searching questions, especially when Cross found in a cupboard the bloodstained club and the Mayan mask.

"I didn't do it, I tell you! I didn't do it!" he cried, when Cross accused him of murdering John Lamont.

"You came in just before the rain started," Cross stated.

"I didn't come in till midnight." "Lamont came in a minute after you did."

"You're wrong." "You picked up the quarrel where you'd left it at Griswald's. You grabbed the first weapon that came in handy and struck him twice."

"I never touched him." "Why, man, your fingerprints are all over the club." Pritchard held out the weapon.

"Well, they've a right to be," argued the young explorer, whose face was beaded with sweat. "They're over everything in this room. It's my room."

"It would have been unnatural if they weren't," admitted Cross. "And you were smart enough to know it. When you saw him lying there on the floor you thought fast. You pulled his hat down over his bleeding head, you wrapped the body in burlap—you have quantities of burlap here—and you tied him with rope. Plenty of rope here. The idea of the mask over the face was good. It meant that if any person looked into your car they would see a mummified form. You drove to Lamont's house. You went up to his rooms by the fire escape, but you sent the body up by the dumb-waiter. You removed the wrappings of burlap and the rope bonds and when you left you took this mask and the rest of your accessories. You wanted the police to think Lamont died in his own rooms."

"How are you going to prove it?" shouted the accused.

"By the blood inside the mask," relentlessly cried Cross. "By a grain of stuff that I took off Lamont's hair—it came off the mask. By this tiny piece of headdress I found in the dumb-waiter. But most of all by this club." He took the club from Pritchard. "The three sharp pieces of steel driven into the club fit the wounds in Lamont's skull."

"All right, I did it," Alan admitted. "Well, that's solved," triumphantly grinned the sergeant.

"Wait a minute." Alan was on his feet. "I mean I carried him, but I didn't kill him—I swear it."

April 24th, 1937.

"What do you mean?" Cross frowned. "Look, everybody knew that we hated each other. We'd just had a row at the Griswalds," stammered Alan. "Well, I went out for a minute, and when I came back there he was dead on the floor. I knew nobody'd believe me, so I took a chance. I thought I could get away with it, that's the truth. I lost my head, don't you see? I knew if they found him here that—that I'd go to the chair."

"You can still make it," sneered Lucks. "But I didn't kill him." "Well, who did?" demanded Pritchard.

"There was somebody here before me," cried Alan.

"That's it—that's it!" Griswald stepped eagerly forward. "Of course you can prove it—you can prove it, can't you, my boy?"

"No, but—" Alan bit his lip in despair, then his voice sharpened as he pointed. "My desk, my papers, they—they've been gone through—turned over!"

"Is that the best you can do?" scoffed the District Attorney.

"Guess I'll take him to headquarters," said the sergeant. "It's a shut case."

"Just a moment, just a moment, gentlemen." Griswald gazed beseechingly at the three representatives of the law. "Surely you can't do this without a warrant. A man in Dr. Shaw's position, a member of our Faculty."

"I'm sorry, professor," answered Pritchard. "I understand your feelings, but it's quite impossible. Better get going, sergeant."

"Thanks, anyway, Griswald," Alan managed to stammer out as Lucks led him to the door.

"Well, that's that," said the D.A. with a smile of relief after the body had been removed. "Now, can I give you gentlemen a lift?" "Thanks, just as far as the subway," answered Griswald.

"I'm staying," Cross lit a cigarette. "I've a little snooping to do. I'll look up Pritchard, and when I go I'll leave the key in the manager's office."

Griswald shook hands with Cross before he left with the District Attorney.

"Good-night, Cross. I shall never forget your kindness—and your cleverness."

"Oh, it was pretty obvious, the whole thing.. Good-night."

When Cross was quite certain that he was alone he walked into the bed-room and up to a large wardrobe. He opened a door and said to the coats hanging there.

"All right, you can come out now."

The coats parted and there peered forth the frightened white face of Deborah Reed.

"How did you know I was here?" "I phoned your house."

"Why?" the girl asked.

"When I had connected Alan with this business," explained Cross. "I wanted to be certain you were safe abed."

"Well, I wasn't." She was defiant.

"So I naturally deduced that I'd find you where you most particularly ought not to be. How did you get down here?"

"Alan called me," Deb explained.

"He said I must never let on to anyone that I'd been here earlier in the evening—that I must believe in him and keep away from him. So, of course, I came right down."

"Naturally," grinned Cross. "And when we showed up he hid you in this wardrobe."

"Christopher, can't you get him out of this awful mess?"

"My dear child, if you'd only heard the evidence."

"I did hear it."

"And you still think—"

"I don't have to think—I know Alan."

Cross shook his head.

"If Alan didn't do it, who did?"

"Somebody with a grudge against Lamont." Deb answered fiercely.

"Somebody close to him, jealous of him—jealous of his attentions to me."

"Well, that's a pretty good picture of Alan."

"Good heavens, she might have done it!"

"Now what are you raving about?"

"Susan Nash!" She gripped his arm so tight that he winced with the pain.

"She was crazy about him and terribly jealous of him. She's strong enough and big enough to have hit him with that club. I'm going to see her. I'm going up there right now."

Christopher Cross tried to persuade the girl that she could not do anything so crazy, but she said that if he did not wish to come with her she would go alone.

"You can't wake up people in the middle of the night."

She laughed determinedly.

"I'd wake up a grizzly bear in these middle of the night if it would help Alan. You coming?"

"Just for the ride." Cross gave a resigned shrug.

On arrival at the apartment house where the Nashes lived they climbed to the fourth floor. The door was slightly ajar, and there came no answer to their ring. At last Cross ventured to open the door and peer round the corner. Something made him reach for a switch and when light flooded the small sitting-room he gave a gasp of horror.

Mrs. Nash and her daughter had been brutally murdered.

Accident or Murder ?

SOME twenty minutes later Christopher Cross waited outside the little apartment house for the arrival of the police. When the car arrived out tumbled Pritchard and a number of police officers.

"Hallo, Cross, this is a bad business." The D.A. looked in surprise at the girl.

"Who's this?"

"It's all right—she's a friend of mine. You'll find what you're looking for on the fourth floor."

"Any clues?"

"There were some dark hairs clutched in the old lady's hand."

"Good! Go on up, boys," Pritchard glanced at Cross. "Coming up?"

"You don't need me." The detective shook his head.

"Poor Susan! That poor old lady." Deborah clung to the detective's arm.

"It's terrible!"

"Stop thinking about them and go on home. Thank your lucky stars that dark-haired boy friend of yours is in gaol. Otherwise I might have connected him with this."

"You see how ridiculous that is now."

"Now that he's safely under lock and key." He hailed a passing taxi. "You get on home. I'll wait till Pritchard comes down in case he should need me."

Christopher had just lit another cigarette when up drove a car and out jumped Sergeant Lucks. The detective saw the swollen and blackened eye, but his grin vanished when he heard that Shaw on the way to headquarters socked him in the eye and got away.

Lucks had heard that his chief had had another call and he had come along

Halfway Island had spelled disaster to all who had ever tried to gain its shores. Halfway Island, with which the mysterious criminal known as the Tiger Shark was closely linked. Read in this powerful serial how two intrepid Marines braved countless dangers to solve the riddle of it. A thrill-packed drama of high adventure, starring Grant Withers and Adrian Morris

Corporal Jim Lawrence and Sergeants McGowan and Bob Schiller are three buddies in the U.S. Marine Corps, Schiller being the inventor of a gyro-compass regarding which a mysterious criminal known as the Tiger Shark seems anxious to obtain information.

Schiller is detailed to accompany an officer on a flight to Halfway Island, in mid-Pacific, where the Government hopes to establish an air base. This projects brings a warning from Douglas, a wealthy company promoter, who claims there is an aerial "dead-spot" over the island, but the flight takes place.

The Government 'plane crashes inexplicably, the authorities being unaware that agents of the Tiger Shark are quartered on Halfway Island with an amazing ray-gun which paralyzes the motors of any approaching craft. But later Schiller's compass is discovered by his sister Frances in Douglas' office.

Commandeering it, she is pursued by a man who overtakes her at the Marine depot and snatches the invention from her. Then Jim Lawrence coming to the rescue, the girl's assailant makes for a 'plane which is about to be sent aloft by remote control and sacrificed as a target for an anti-aircraft battery.

The man with the gyro-compass discovers McGowan in that 'plane, making a final adjustment to prepare the craft for its radio-controlled "take-off." He lays out Mac as the latter is about to climb from the 'plane, but takes fright and jumps to the ground when the ship, apparently of its own accord, moves off.

Jim Lawrence realises Mac's danger. Abandoning his pursuit of the thief, he boards the runaway 'plane, and he and the unconscious sergeant are carried skyward into the range of the anti-aircraft guns, which open fire.

Pursuit

CROUCHING in the forward cockpit of the target 'plane with the insensible McGowan, Jim Lawrence held his breath as the salvo of shells burst in the air all around the craft, raining shrapnel into the wings and the fuselage.

The machine rocked wildly as it was caught by the concussion of the exploding projectiles, but it escaped serious damage and flew onward. Nor were Jim and Mac hit by the iron splinters that riddled the ship, and before a second volley could be directed at the craft the corporal reached for the master-switch and turned it to the "off" position, breaking the contact which enabled the vessel's movements to be guided by remote control.

Then even as McGowan was beginning to come round, Jim took command of the 'plane and thrust the joystick forward, thanking his stars that he had taken a course in aviation and held his "A" certificate.

Away down on terra firma, beyond the hangars of the aerodrome, the wireless expert who was acting in co-operation with the anti-aircraft's battery was quick to realise that the target 'plane had ceased answering to the remote control apparatus which he was handling, and he immediately reported the circumstance to the officer in command of the gun-crews.

The officer in question merely ordered his men to continue firing, never suspecting that the 'plane was occupied, and once again a storm of death and destruction was hurled skyward at the target ship.

None of the shells struck the craft, but one of them burst close to the tail, and in the very act of sending the machine into a dive, Jim Lawrence realised from its behaviour that it had been badly maimed.

His object had been to land the 'plane with all possible dispatch, knowing that so long as he and Mac remained in the air they would court doom. But now the chances of grounding the ship safely were slender indeed, for like a wounded bird it was threatening to turn into a spin and plunge disastrously to earth.

It needed all Jim's skill as a pilot to retain some control over the machine, but he managed to sideslip towards the edge of the landing-field, and though it was a human impossibility to set it down without mishap, he succeeded in keeping the nose up until the 'plane actually touched ground.

Next moment, however, it had tilted madly and there was a rending of wood, metal, and fabric as the ship buckled. But luckily it did not burst into flame, and after a few seconds during which Jim and Mac lay in a dazed condition amongst the wreckage, the last-named contrived to pull himself clear.

Jim on his part was unable to extricate himself, but the sergeant made haste to lend him a hand, and on being dragged forth the bigger fellow quickly satisfied himself that, like Mac, he had escaped with only cuts and bruises.

EPISODE 2 -

"Isle of Missing Men"

"By golly," Mac said then, "we're sure lucky to walk away from this crack-up. But who was the guy that knocked me out?"

"The guy that knocked you out!" Jim reiterated. "Yeah, we've got to get after him. He's stolen the Schiller gyro-compass."

Without attempting to enlighten the bewildered McGowan he turned from the wreckage of the plane, and as he did so he caught sight of Frances Schiller hurrying towards him, for the ship had crashed only a couple of hundred yards from the spot where she had been overtaken by the thief.

Almost in the same instant Jim descried the figure of the man who had commandeered the gyro-compass. He was sprinting across the flying field in the direction of the road that skirted it, having doubled back with the obvious intention of regaining his sedan car.

Calling on Mac to follow him, Jim started towards the road in an attempt to head him off, and the two Marines were running at full pelt when Frances met up with them.

"Oh, Jim!" the girl panted. "Are you and Mac all right?"

"What do you think?" the corporal rejoined. "Don't look like a couple of stretcher cases, do we? Come on, Frances, we mustn't let that fellow get away!"

He raced on with Mac close at his heels, and Frances set out after them. But their quarry was considerably nearer to his car than they were, and he had scrambled into the vehicle and driven off before they could gain the road.

The dust from the automobile swept over them in a cloud as they reached the highway a few seconds too late. Yet Frances Schiller's car was standing nearby, and the three of them tumbled into it, Jim taking the wheel and starting up the engine.

He drove in pursuit of the man who had robbed Frances of the gyro-compass, and there ensued a hair-raising dash along the San Diego road, with the fugitive holding his foot hard down on the accelerator, but Jim keeping him in view despite the fact that the thief's car was the more powerful.

In entering the town, however, the difficulty of keeping track of the big sedan was increased by the presence of a good deal of traffic in the streets, and by the fugitive's successive efforts to throw the Marines and their fair companion off the scent.

Again and again the man turned off to weave his way through labyrinthine side-roads, and at last, under the impression that he had baffled his pursuers, he swept into a street flanked by tall warehouses and slewed his sedan into the dark, yawning entrance of a building that towered higher than any of its neighbours.

But he had made a mistake in imagining that Jim Lawrence had lost the trail, for the corporal swung round into that street in time to see the tail of the sedan disappearing through the wide doorway of the big warehouse.

"Now we've got him!" jerked McGowan, who had also espied the fugitive's car before it had vanished from sight. "Attaboy, Jim—drive right in after him!"

"That's just what I don't intend to do," the corporal retorted. "That guy may have friends inside there, Mac, and we don't want to run blindly into a tough spot—especially as Frances is with us."

At unabated speed he flashed past the entrance of the warehouse, and, if their quarry saw the two Marines and Frances

Schiller drive by, he must have been convinced that even if they had traced him to this particular street they had failed to see him swerve into the warehouse.

Now at the far end of that building there was a quiet side-road leading to the waterfront, and it was into this side-road that Jim elected to turn. Then, pulling up at the kerb, he climbed out of the car with Mac.

"You stay here," he said to Frances. "We're going in to take a look around. Wait fifteen minutes, and if we're not out by then—well, I reckon you'd better send for the riot squad."

A moment later the two Marines were striding round to the front of the warehouse. Here they discovered that the main entrance to the building had now been closed, but after a tour of inspection they located a small side-door that opened at a touch.

They passed through to find themselves in a narrow corridor with a flight of stairs leading up from it. Then all at once they heard the murmur of voices, and the sound of those voices drew their attention to a room on the left.

The door of the room was closed, but, stealing towards it, they crouched down by the keyhole, and on peering through Jim Lawrence saw three men standing beside a table on which Bob Schiller's gyro-compass had been placed.

One of those men was the rogue who had snatched the invention from Frances, and, taking closer stock of him than he had previously been able to do, Jim noted that he was as shifty-looking a customer as ever he had set eyes upon. As for the other two, one was a hulking, florid individual of a brutal cast of countenance, and the third man was a lean fellow dressed in flying kit.

The aviator was doing the talking at the moment, and he was addressing himself to the man who had stolen the gyro-compass.

"The Tiger Shark will sure be glad to hear that this invention is in our hands, Miller," he was saying. "But are you positive that you shook off the Schiller girl and her friends?"

"I'm certain of it," answered the rogue known as Miller. "But say, if you're goin' to Halfway Island to pick up a shipment of loot you'd better get up to the roof and take off."

"That's right, Nelson," the florid-faced individual put in. "And, by the way, I hope you're expected at Halfway Island, otherwise you might share the fate o' Bob Schiller an' that Marine captain."

"Not a chance," was the reply. "The boys have been warned, an' they know the plane I'm flying. They won't put the spot on me by mistake, you can depend on that."

Outside the door Jim Lawrence and McGowan had heard every word, and they exchanged startled glances. Then, nodding to his comrade significantly, Jim drew himself to his full height and barged his way into the room occupied by Miller and his associates.

Mac followed him, and, though the crooks whipped round at once, they were taken completely unawares by the sudden intrusion of the two Marines, Miller going down before a terrific right-hand punch that Jim aimed at him.

Almost in the same instant McGowan sprang at the man with the florid countenance, and his bunched knuckles took that worthy on the point of the chin, hurling him to the floor in a senseless heap.

Nelson, the aviator, had recoiled, and now he reached inside his leather jacket and plucked out a revolver. But ere he could cover the Marines Jim Lawrence was within striking distance of him, and a slashing upper-cut knocked back the aviator's head.

Nelson swung away across the room, cannoned against the far wall and slumped to the floor. Yet Jim was taking no chances, and, pouncing on him, he hit him a second time and then wrested the six-shooter from his nerveless fingers.

The crooks lay where they had fallen, and some thirty seconds elapsed before they struggled to their feet to find themselves threatened by the forty-five that Jim Lawrence had appropriated. Tlicu, surveying them grimly, the corporal spoke in a cool and deliberate tone.

"So you guys work for the Tiger Shark, huh?" he observed. "And you've got some kind of a set-up on Halfway Island, huh? All right, how about doing a little talking? How about telling us what happened to Bob Schiller and Captain Grayson?"

The three prisoners looked at one another anxiously, but presently assumed a sullen air, and, none of them volunteering any information, Jim spoke again.

"Close as elms, eh?" he commented. "Well, maybe you don't have to talk. Maybe we can find out for ourselves all that we want to know. We heard you say there was a plane on the roof, ready for a hop to Halfway Island. Okay, I reckon if Sergeant McGowan and I take that plane and make the trip, we'll have a clear run to the island without any accidents. How about it, Mac?"

He had directed a sidelong glance at the sergeant, and the latter was quick to respond.

"You mean, take the place of this guy Nelson, or what his name is? That suits me, Jim, and I reckon Colonel Bennett down at the Marine base won't mind us grabbin' time off for a job like this. There's just one thing, Jim. I'd like to see these fellers tied up afore we leave, and I think I spot some rope over in the corner there."

There was rope in plenty, and, after securing the three hivelings of the Tiger Shark and informing them that they would be picked up by the police in due course, the two Marines took possession of Bob Schiller's gyro-compass and made their way upstairs to the flat roof of the building, where sure enough a sleek plane was standing.

Before climbing into it, however, they moved across to the eastern parapet of the spacious roof and looked down into the side-street where Frances Schiller was waiting with her car. Then, having attracted her attention, Jim scribbled a note of explanation and added a request that she should repair at once to Colonel Bennett's quarters and have him communicate with the police.

Wrapping the missile around a fragment of mortar that was lying loose on the parapet, he tossed it into the street below and lingered long enough to watch Frances pick it up and to wave a hand to her in farewell, after which he and Mac strode across to Nelson's plane.

They clambered into the cockpits, and, from the forward compartment, Jim glanced round at McGowan.

"Here we go, sarge," he declared. "This is the second time we've heard talk of the Tiger Shark. The first time was down in Porto Rico, when the bandits who kidnapped Bob claimed that they'd been hired by the Tiger Shark's agents. But this time we've got a few more facts to go on."

Mac nodded. "You said it, buddy," he stated. "Okay, get that motor started and let's be on our way. Don't stop till you reach Halfway Island—an' don't spare the hosses."

Under Suspicion

A SWIFT drive from the city centre had brought Frances Schiller back to the Marine base, and, leaving her automobile in the carriage-way outside the officers' billets, she hurried to the quarters of Colonel Bennett, O.C. of the depot.

Entering the outer room that adjoined his office, she found Kota there, the colonel's Eurasian valet, a model of deportment and courtesy, with a bearing that was almost military, although he was merely a personal servant and in no way attached to the corps.

"Is your master in, Kota?" Frances asked.

"Yes, miss," was the reply. "But he is engaged at the moment. Mr. Douglas called on him a minute or two ago, and is in with him now."

Frances gave a start, and then, pursing her lips, spoke to the valet urgently.

"Please tell the colonel I wish to talk to him at once," she said. "It is very important."

Kota bowed, and made his way to the inner room, whence he reappeared a few seconds later and informed the girl that Colonel Bennett would see her immediately.

Frances passed through the O.C.'s office, and both the colonel and Douglas rose from their chairs as she crossed the threshold. Then, with a quick glance at the civilian, Bob Schiller's sister addressed the commander of the Marines.

"I have a message for you from Corporal Lawrence and Sergeant McGowan," she said. "I think it will be of great interest to you."

She handed Colonel Bennett the note that had been thrown to her from the roof of the warehouse, and as he read it the changing expressions on the officer's keen features indicated how profoundly he was impressed by its contents.

When he had scanned it he read it aloud to Douglas, and then laid it on his desk.

"So the mysterious criminal known as the Tiger Shark is in some way responsible for the inaccessibility of Halfway Island?" he said to the promoter. "What do you think of that, Douglas?"

Before the civilian could make any reply Frances interrupted.

"Perhaps Mr. Douglas could have told you about this beforehand, colonel," she announced. "I understand he hinted that something might happen to my brother and Captain Grayson, and it may surprise you to know that I found my brother's gyro-compass in his office early this morning. That's how Corporal Lawrence and Sergeant McGowan have become mixed up in this business. I took the gyro-compass, but a man outside Mr. Douglas' office saw me with it and chased me. Corporal Lawrence came to my rescue, and, together with Sergeant McGowan, we tracked my assailant to the warehouse from which Lawrence afterwards threw that note to me."

A frown had gathered upon the colonel's brow, and he looked sharply at Douglas, who now showed signs of agitation.

"How do you account for Schiller's gyro-compass being in your office, Douglas?" Bennett demanded.

"I was going to tell you about that just before Miss Schiller was shown in, colonel," he said. "As you're aware, I am interested in shipping as well as in aviation, and I may mention that the vessel which came across the floating wreck of Captain Grayson's plane was a cargo-boat belonging to the company I own. That's why I came to be in possession of the gyro-compass, which was salvaged from the wreck and which was handed to me when my ship put into port."

He paused, and then continued his explanation.

"I received the gyro-compass late last night," he went on, "and at once wrote to Miss Schiller asking her to call on me. She will verify that."

"You didn't mention in your letter why you wanted me to call," Frances interposed.

"No," Douglas admitted. "But I assure you I intended to give you that gyro-compass, as it seemed to me you were the one person who ought to have it. Unfortunately, when you called and were shown straight into my private office I happened to be out of the room, and, seeing the instrument, you jumped to a false conclusion and ran out of the building with it—apparently believing that it had found its way there in some sinister and guilty manner. But I ask you, would I have left it on my desk in full view if I had not wished you to know that it was in my possession?"

There was a silence, and then Colonel Bennett spoke.

"Your story is convincing, Douglas," he remarked. "Yet isn't it possible that Miss Schiller was shown right into your private office by mistake, and that you had no intention of letting her see the gyro-compass?"

"Why should I send for her, then?" The colonel shrugged his shoulders.

"I haven't the least idea, Douglas," he retorted. "But who was the man who gave chase to Miss Schiller after she left your office?"

"How should I know?" the promoter cried furiously. "According to this note from Lawrence and McGowan he was an agent of the Tiger Shark. All right, then, the Tiger Shark learned by some means or other that the gyro-compass was at my office. He sent that man to steal it from me, but the fellow spotted Miss Schiller with it and went after her. That's the way I figure it, anyhow."

Colonel Bennett looked at him in a penetrating fashion.

"I wonder if you're telling the truth?" he said. "Douglas, I don't trust you. You had a chance to establish a civil airport on Halfway Island, but failed—or, at least, so I have been led to believe. But now it appears that the Tiger Shark has some kind of set-up down there, and is in a position to keep away all intruders."

Staring fearfully at the stick of dynamite in the sergeant's grasp, the crooks began to move towards the entrance of the cave.

Anger and derision were struggling for supremacy on the civilian's countenance.

"Colonel Bennett," he ejaculated, "you're not trying to suggest that I am the Tiger Shark, or am in any way connected with him?"

The O.C. of the Marine base compressed his lips.

"I suppose actually I'm not in a position to suggest anything," he conceded, "and I'm certainly not in a position to prove anything. But I'm telling you, Douglas, that I mean to clear up the mystery that surrounds Halfway Island, and it may be that Sergeant McGowan and Corporal Lawrence will go a long way towards solving the riddle. It may be, Douglas, that in this flight which they've undertaken they'll discover the secret of that aerial dead-spot and the secret of the Tiger Shark's identity as well."

Douglas appeared to have some difficulty in controlling his emotions. Was it because he resented the aspersions that had been cast upon him, or because he was shaken and afraid?

For a moment, at any rate, he seemed unable to speak. Then he managed to express himself with some semblance of calm.

"The doubts you've thrown on my character constitute a grave injustice, colonel," he stated. "Perhaps you'll realise that if these two men—Lawrence and McGowan—obtain any vital information, all I can say is that I wish them every success—yes, every success."

And with that he took his leave, slamming out of the colonel's office in a manner that startled the manservant Kota, who was going about his domestic duties in the outer room.

The Ray-gun

THERE was a good deal of activity afoot on Halfway Island, far out in the Pacific Ocean.

A little way inland from the eastern shore, where the incoming surge of the sea boomed like thunder among the reefs, a group of dusky woolly headed natives were straining doggedly on the spokes of a crude windlass which provided a contrast to the amazing instruments of science that had been installed on the island by the Tiger Shark's agents.

By means of a cable the windlass operated a heavy truck laden with material salvaged from a steamer which had been wrecked with the loss of all hands a day or two previously, and, judding round slavishly with their chests to the axles of the hoisting gear, the native islanders were sending that truck up the steep gradient of a narrow-gauge railway leading to a cave three hundred yards distant.

The bulk of the unfortunate steamer's cargo had consisted of dynamite stacked in crates, and the truck had made many journeys to the cave. But it was ascending now with a final consignment of explosives, its progress being watched by a group of five ruffianly looking white men who were standing at the peak of the gradient.

Those white men were the Tiger Shark's hirelings, and every one of them was a criminal with a record that had necessitated a hurried departure from the United States.

They were gathered in the entrance of the cave, and one of them, a rogue whose features were partially shaded by the wide brim of a panama hat, was calling instructions to the natives below, April 24th, 1937.

who seemed to be completely under the domination of the gangsters.

"Come on, you swabs!" he was bawling. "Put yer backs into it. We ain't got all day ter wait."

His exhortations had the effect of spurring the dusky islanders, and a little while later the truck reached the upper terminus of the narrow-gauge railway, whereupon one of the white men laid hold of a rope that was attached to it and made this fast to a hook embedded in the rocky wall of the cavern.

"Okay," the fellow in the panama shouted then, hailing the natives who had been toiling in the blistering heat of the sun. "Now vamoose back to your village."

The dark-skinned islanders abandoned the windlass and slouched off in single file, directing their steps towards a dense tangle of forest and brushwood that smothered the hinterland; and as they disappeared from view the man in the panama hat squared his powerful shoulders.

"Well, that's that," he declared, glancing at the contents of the wagon and casting his eyes over a number of crates which were piled on the floor and which had been unloaded from the truck on its previous ascents to the cave. "Not a bad haul, eh? When this shipment o' dynamite is transported to the Tiger Shark's headquarters in the States it oughta fetch a pretty good price."

"Yeah," another of the gang interposed. "An' the Tiger Shark takes eighty per cent o' the proceeds while we take all the risks. He's safe enough, because nobody knows who he really is—not even the key-men in his organisation."

The rogue in the panama regarded the speaker ominously.

"Better not try to figure out who the Tiger Shark is," he commented. "It ain't healthy. I had a friend in this gang once that learned the Tiger Shark's identity by mistake—an' he took the information to the grave with him. No, my advice to everybody here is to ask no questions an' do just what you're told to do. And as for the risks we're takiu', we're a whole lot safer here than we would be back home."

He paused, and then indicated the truck that was now standing in the entrance to the cave.

"All right, get that last shipment outa there," he ordered.

The other gangsters moved forward to obey him, but before they could carry out his instructions they were checked by a sound that issued from the depths of the cavern, a strange, whining sound that was like the hum of a dynamo, rising to a crescendo and then gradually fading away.

"That's the television signal," jerked the man in the panama hat. "It means there's a message from headquarters."

Followed by his accomplices, he hurried towards the rear of the cave and halted before the switchboards that were built into the wall there, and a moment later he was manipulating a dial that enabled him to tune-in on the required wave-length.

A screen in front of him became illuminated, and the flickering outlines of a man's head and shoulders took form in the panel. Then, the vision growing clearer, it resolved itself into the clear image of an individual whose features were concealed by mask and goggles.

At the same time a voice was heard. It was the voice of the man who had appeared on the screen, and the listeners could not help wondering if this were the Tiger Shark.

They had no means of settling that question, even if they had wished to. They only knew that the voice was coming to them from far across the Pacific, where the fringe of the ocean washed the shores of California.

"M.3. calling Halfway Island," it said. "Two Marines, known as Lawrence and McGowan, traced one of our men to the warehouse this morning. There they overpowered him, together with another of the gang and our chief pilot, Nelson. Fortunately, our men were released before the police could be notified, and they made their escape from the building by the time it was raided."

"But Lawrence and McGowan are flying towards Halfway Island," the voice continued, "and they are in Nelson's plane. They should be due over the island within an hour from now. Bring them down."

Little did the gangsters beside the switchboards know it, but they were not the only ones who listened to that radio communication from San Diego. For, when they had turned back into the depths of the cave to answer the call-sign a figure in khaki had stolen from amidst a cluster of rocks where he had been hidden and had crept to the entrance of the cavern.

It was the figure of a sergeant of Marines. It was the figure of—Bob Schiller!

Bob Schiller, who had been more fortunate than Captain Grayson, and who had survived the plane crash in which the two of them had been involved. Bob Schiller, who had gained the shore of Halfway Island and who had been skulking in the vicinity of the cave for days, living on bread-fruit and yams, watching the movements of the Tiger Shark's agents and their native allies, and taking every precaution to ensure that his presence remained unsuspected.

He was now as close to the mysterious cavern of his foes as he had ever been, and the news that Jim and Mae were en route for the island had a powerful effect on him. Then, crouching in the entrance of that strange den, he saw the vision on the radio panel gradually fade until it disappeared completely.

Over at the switchboards the man in the panama hat turned to his confederates, and Bob Schiller heard him speak in a hoarse tone.

"So a couple of Marines are headed this way in Nelson's plane, eh?" the fellow rasped. "Well, this is where we get busy an' prepare a welcome for them. Come on, man the controls of the ray-gun."

Bob Schiller had taken up a position beside the truck that was laden with dynamite, and from this vantage-point he watched the gangsters operate the mechanism of the giant device which had given Halfway Island a reputation so ominous.

He had learned enough during his sojourn here to know what was happening now, for he had picked up scraps of vital information from snatches of talk that he had overheard between these men in the course of the last few days. He knew, for instance, that a screen of brushwood on the summit of the headland above the cave was being raised to disclose an instrument of death and destruction—a silent contrivance that was capable of paralysing the engines of any sea-going ship or any craft of the air which came within the scope of its fatal influence.

That contrivance, the masterpiece of a scientific genius with a warped and criminal mind, was operated from the depths of the cavern, and before long a sound-detector had betrayed the approach of a plane. Then, a little while afterwards, the machine was actually seen in a periscope at which the man with the panama hat had posted himself.

Next moment the latter was reeling off instructions to his accomplices, giving them the readings on certain range-finder dials that were co-ordinated with the periscope, and it was as the curt tones of the look-out were echoing through the cave that Bob Schiller bestirred himself.

He had noticed that one of the crates in the truck by which he was crouching had been broken open, and its contents were laid bare in the form of tightly packed sticks of dynamite.

Warily the young sergeant of Marines reached into that box and withdrew one of the sinister sticks. Then he began to move forward into the cave, and as he did so he heard the voice of the look-out again.

"All right," the scoundrel rapped out, his eyes glued on the periscope. "Let 'em have it."

A switch was thrown, and, up on the headland, an invisible ray was directed from the contraption which had been disclosed there. And like a finger of doom that ray searched out the high-speed 'plane in which Jim Lawrence and McGowan were approaching the island, so that all at once the motor failed and the craft began to plunge seaward, with the sun glinting on its wings and fuselage.

"Got 'em!" exclaimed the man at the periscope. "Now, keep that beam on 'em! Follow them down and don't let 'em regain control. We—"

But he said no more, for it was then that Bob Schiller revealed his presence, stepping quickly forward with the stick of dynamite held aloft in one hand.

"Switch off that ray-gun!" he ordered tersely.

The startled gangsters swung around from the instrument boards at which they were posted, and amazement was written on their villainous faces as they found themselves confronted by a young sergeant in the khaki tunic-shirt, breeches, and gaiters of the U.S. Marines.

"Come on," Bob grated in a tone of fierce command, "switch off that ray-gun, or I'll blow this whole cave sky-high! I mean it! Those fellows in that 'plane are my friends, and even if it costs me my life I'm going to see that you don't bring them down!"

It was clear that he was in deadly earnest, and at a gesture of assent from the man in the panama hat the firing-switch of the ray-gun was turned to the "off" position. Then, still threatening the gangsters with annihilation, Bob Schiller ordered them to the mouth of the cavern.

Staring fearfully at the stick of dynamite in the sergeant's grasp, the crooks began to move towards the entrance of the cave, and, if any of them doubted whether the Marine was actually prepared to detonate the explosive, none of them had the courage to put him to the test by offering resistance.

They stumbled to the cavern-mouth, and Bob brought up the rear, dividing his attention between his prisoners and the cloud-flecked sky beyond. Then he discerned the 'plane that was occupied by his two comrades.

The instant the ray-gun had ceased to operate, the motor of the ship had come into play again, and, in full control of the machine once more, Jim Lawrence was circling over the island in quest of a landing-place.

Bob Schiller smiled grimly as he watched the aeroplane. He could well imagine that Jim and Mac must be sorely puzzled by the eccentric behaviour of their craft's engine, which had petered out so unexpectedly and then recovered power. They could know nothing of the ray-gun which had almost destroyed them, and which would assuredly have destroyed them if he had not intervened in the nick of time.

Keeping an eye on the 'plane, Bob saw it swoop at last towards a jungle clearing not far from the headland in which the cave was situated, and he followed it with his gaze until it had descended beyond the trees. Then there ensued an interval of waiting, but finally he and his captives espied Jim Lawrence and McGowan emerging from the edge of the thickets on foot.

They came on in a cautious manner, looking to right and left. It was obvious, nevertheless, that they had seen the windlass from which the native labourers had long since departed, for they were making straight for this. But they had not yet perceived the cave at the summit of the narrow-gauge railway, and Bob decided to wait till they were well within earshot before attempting to attract their attention.

There was a deep gully between the newcomers and the windlass, and the pair of them slithered down into this and were lost to view for about thirty seconds. At the end of that time, however, they were seen scrambling up the nearest bank, and as they reached the rim of that bank they advanced to inspect the crude hoisting-gear.

It was at this juncture that Bob Schiller made a mistake that he had good cause to repent, for in his anxiety to reveal himself to his friends he took his eyes off the Tiger Shark's hirelings and stepped forward to give Jim and Mac a shout of greeting.

Before he could utter a sound one of the gang had seen an opportunity of tackling him, the rogue in question being a swarthy individual with a coloured handkerchief bound over his head.

With the liteness of a cat he sprang on Schiller, and in a trice he had wrested the stick of dynamite from the sergeant's clutch. And almost simultaneously, prompt to take their cue from their confederate's action, the other members of the gang closed in on the Marine and dragged him back from the entrance of the cave.

Cursing himself for his thoughtlessness, Bob struggled furiously, and for an instant he came near to wrenching himself from the grip of his assailants. But they were too many for him, and, fastening on him again like leeches, they overpowered him and pinned his arms to his sides so that he stood helpless amongst the ruffians.

Then he found himself face to face with the man in the panama hat, who was plainly in charge of this outpost of the Tiger Shark's widespread organisation.

"You ain't so smart, after all, soldier," the scoundrel jeered, eyeing Bob mockingly. "So you was ready to throw away your life to save your pals if need be, eh? Well, you ain't got long to live now, I reckon, an' neither have they, for we have a habit of turnin' any unwelcome guests over to the natives. They have a pleasant little way of dealin' with snoopers like you and them side-kicks of yours."

He paused, and then, significantly, he started to caress the bunched knuckles of his right hand.

"I guess your friends down there will start investigatin' our narrow-gauge railway pretty soon to find out where it leads," he drawled. "In case they're arned, we'll just wait for 'em and take 'em as they walk into the cave. And for fear you have any ideas about warnin' them—"

He did not finish the sentence, but suddenly drew back his fist, and with all the brute strength in his body he aimed a cowardly blow at the prisoner's jaw.

The punch landed with a sickening impact, and the cruel force of it knocked Bob Schiller out of the grasp of the men who were holding him. Yet the rogue who had struck him never bargained for all that followed, never dreamed of the consequences which were to result from that blow.

Back went the Marine in the direction of the cave-mouth, and, blundering against the rocky wall on the left-hand side of the entrance, he tried to save himself from falling by grabbing at a rope there.

It was the rope which was attached to the heavy-laden dynamite truck, the rope which had been made fast to the hook in the wall to prevent the wagon from careering down the gradient. And that rope was the only brake on the vehicle, as the chain cable of the hoisting-gear was governed solely by the windlass below.

The rope came adrift in Bob Schiller's fingers, and next second was plucked from his hand as the truck of dynamite jerked forward. At the same time the spokes of the windlass at the foot of the gradient began to spin madly, for there was no check on them.

Earlier on, the natives who had been toiling there had worked on an alternative system, forcing the windlass-spokes round when it had been necessary to send the truck aloft, holding those spokes back to bring the wagon down in easy stages whenever it had been emptied of its freight and released for a fresh cargo.

But the windlass was unattended now, and only Jim Lawrence and McGowan were beside it—two khaki-clad figures who started back in alarm at the first clank of the chain cable and then raised their glance to the summit of the gradient.

They saw the wagon rushing down the metals, and they drew aside, realising that it must crash into the windlass. Yet in calculating their retreat to a safe distance they were unaware of the truck's cargo of death—did not know that in the moment of impact a hundred-weight of dynamite would explode like a thunderclap and blast the two of them out of existence!

"UNDER COVER OF NIGHT"

to report his failure to recapture Shaw. The sergeant's mouth gaped when he heard of the murder of the two women.

"He got away from me and came here and murdered these two dames," exclaimed the sergeant. "Is that what you figure out, Mr. Cross?"

"Those dark hairs seem to indicate Shaw," irritably answered Cross. "I was hoping for Deb's sake that Shaw was innocent after all, but it looks mighty grim. You going in to report to the D.A.?"

"Not now these two dames have been killed," answered Lucks. "Unless I can pick up that guy Shaw I needn't bother to go back—I'll get my marching orders."

"When you feel depressed there's nothing like a Turkish bath," Cross advised. "You look as if you need a clean up, Lucks, so have this bath on me."

Alan Shaw knew of no place in New York where he could hide, and he decided that in the Turkish baths he would be safe until the morning. He could get a famous lawyer, a lifelong friend of the family, to come to the baths and tell him the best thing to do. Strange that Cross and the sergeant should go to the same baths and the three should meet in the steam-room. It was Cross who saw Shaw trying to sneak into a cubicle, and it was Cross who stopped Sergeant Lucks from attacking the man who had dared to give him a black eye.

"Wait a minute! Wait a minute!" Cross silenced the sergeant at last. "I want to ask Shaw a question, so keep quiet, Lucks."

He stared at the young man. "What made you kill those two women?"

The amazement on Shaw's face was so genuine that Cross was impressed. In a small rest-room the detective narrated the killing of Mrs. Nash and her daughter.

"Let's forget Lamont for a moment," was Shaw's answer at the end. "I can't prove I didn't kill Lamont, but I can prove I didn't kill those two women. I was here when it happened."

"If you didn't kill those women you didn't kill Lamont," Cross stated. "The mystery seems to be thickening."

Cross encouraged Alan Shaw to talk about the people at the Trent Memorial University. He heard about the activities of Lamont and Susan Nash, and suggested that someone might be killing off rivals to get old Reed's position. Alan at once mentioned the name of Rudolph Brehmer.

"He was a brilliant professor who was turned out because of his temper and his drunken ways," explained Shaw. "He has always thought that he should have had Reed's job. Griswald gave him work to do in their laboratory—I think Janet must have persuaded Marvin out of the kindness of her heart."

Cross at once got through to police headquarters. He got in touch with Pritchard and asked that Rudolph Brehmer be picked up at Griswald's and rushed down to the Turkish baths. He made no mention of having Alan Shaw with him. Cross had assisted the police in many cases, and as he was about the only popular amateur detective he could do much as he willed with the police.

Cross was half asleep when Lucks said April 24th, 1937.

he would need a good whisky to pull himself round after all this steam.

"Talking of whisky reminds me of the special old brandy of Lamont's that I didn't get," yawned Cross.

"He doesn't drink any brandy," cried Alan. "He never touches a drop of anything. He couldn't. The poor guy had stomach trouble."

Christopher Cross sat up on his couch. "That's funny," he muttered, and told of his meeting with Griswald. "Do you suppose Griswald used me as a means of getting into Lamont's rooms to-night?"

"Why should he?" argued Shaw. "What could he have wanted in Lamont's rooms? Unless he was looking for something."

"Maybe he was looking for something," Cross glanced at Shaw. "Didn't you say your desk was searched?"

"Yes, but nobody believed me."

"So was Susan's desk," muttered Cross.

"Was Lamont's?" questioned the sergeant.

"No. I looked at Lamont's desk and it was all straight. That's the only place I know that was. I still think Brehmer's our man." Cross lay back, then sat up. "But he could have searched Lamont's desk when I went down to phone Pritchard, and then straightened it out again." He ticked that off on one finger. "That makes three desks all searched and all connected with the Physics Department, and all guests at the Griswald house last night." And two of them were murdered.

Cross leapt off the couch and got an attendant to ring the house of Dr. Reed.

"Why were you phoning?" Alan asked when Cross returned from making the call.

"Deb Reed—she was a guest, too," stated the detective. "Apparently Dr. Reed heard his granddaughter drive up an hour ago, and she's quite safe in bed—thank goodness."

"You don't think Deb's in any danger, do you?"

"No, but she's an impetuous young woman," Cross explained. "There is a murderer at large, and I feel much happier knowing Deb's in bed."

Rudolph Brehmer gave Cross one item that made the detective sit up. He heard that it was Janet Griswald who was the brains, and that without her notes Griswald would be lost. He explained that Janet Griswald was crazy about her husband, and had stuck to him for years, working her heart out.

"Her heart?" sharply exclaimed Cross. "He knew she had a weak heart, and he was up there in that room with her."

"You mean when the dog jumped out of the window?" asked Brehmer.

"You picked up the little dog, didn't you?"

"I was right there when he jumped."

"Did you see him jump?"

"Yes, he jumped after his ball."

"Did you actually see him jump?"

"I was in the garden," said Brehmer. "I didn't properly see him jump—I only heard him hit the pathway."

"Did you see the ball?"

"Oh, sure, it bounced right near me."

"After the dog landed?"

Rudolph Brehmer looked at him curiously.

"What are you driving at, Mr. Cross?"

"I'm trying to find out which came out of the window first—the dog or the ball," Cross answered. "The answer will tell me whether it was accident or murder. We're going up to see Griswald right away. I'll call District Attorney Pritchard."

Walking Into the Spider's Web

DEBORAH REED was tired when she got home. She yawned, and put her hand into the pocket of the cloak to get her handkerchief. She drew out instead a notebook. She gasped when she saw inside the name of Janet Griswald. Very quietly the girl crept out of the house so that she should not disturb her grandfather and hastened to the house of Marvin Griswald.

When Marvin Griswald got back to his house he found Tonya waiting for him. He told her that he had failed to find Janet's notebook.

"That Reed girl!" Tonya cried. "She must have it. You must go to her and get it before it is light."

It was then that both heard the shrill pealing of the front-door bell. Griswald told the girl on no account to show herself. He went down to the front door and boldly opened it.

"Deborah Reed!" he exclaimed. "What on earth brings you here?"

"Oh, I know it's a dreadful hour, Marvin!" She smiled her thanks as he stood aside for her to enter. "But I've found something that I'm sure is of importance."

Griswald's eyes narrowed at sight of Janet's notebook.

"Where did you find this?" he asked quite coolly.

"In my coat-pocket. And I know just how it got there. You see, Janet and I had coats exactly alike, and I must have taken hers." She pointed to the notebook. "When I found it only a little while ago I knew I had to see you because of Alan. You see, I'm sure that notebook has something to do with what happened to-night."

"But how can it, my dear child?"

"It all fits in!" cried Deborah. "Brehmer saw his chance for the glory he's been cheated of when poor Janet had that heart attack. He looked for the notes and he couldn't find them because all the time they were in the cloak I'd taken by mistake. Then the idea came into his crazy head that somebody who was here at dinner stole them."

"I think you're very near the truth, my dear."

"Then let's call the police and tell them to get after Brehmer!" cried the impetuous girl. "They can compare his hair with what the old lady had in her hand."

"They found hair?" Griswald said slowly, and then smiled. "My dear, rest on this couch a while. I'll attend to everything."

In the next room he found Tonya.

"She knows too much!" Griswald snarled like a wolf. "She must be silenced—it is the only way. In my room you will find two old suitcases; see that there are no labels, no marks of any kind. Line them with newspapers." She backed away with a cry of horror. "It is the only way. If we are to gain our happiness we must not hesitate."

When Marvin Griswald came back to Deborah he carried a tray. She must have a glass of sherry to steady her nerves. The sherry was doped, and her senses began to grow muddled.

"The sounder you sleep the better it will be for you," Griswald said in a husky whisper.

The girl opened her eyes and saw the fanatical glare. She reeled back:

"I'm afraid of you! I'm afraid of you!" Then her senses left her, and she slid to the floor.

Marvin Griswald stared down at her, and his hands were crooked like claws when again the bell shrilled. Desperately he glanced round and saw the old oak chest. He picked her up in his arms and carried her across the room.

A small bottle of perfume tumbled from her open bag and smashed on the floor. Griswald placed the unconscious body in the chest, closed the lid, picked up the smashed scent-bottle, tossed it into the glowing embers, the wineglass he hid under a cushion, and when the bell shrilled again he opened the door to admit Christopher Cross.

"Good-evening, Griswald!" Cross said with an engaging smile. "Or should I say good-morning?"

"Oh, Cross, so it's you—come in!" Griswald twitched his lips. "Sorry to keep you waiting. I just dozed off. First rest I've had to-night. Anything further happened?"

"It's an unholy hour, but I wanted a few words with you. You see, you're the one man who can help me solve this murder."

"The one man?"

"Yes. I'd like to ask you a few questions about the suspect—Brehmer. We know he's the man."

"Yes, I was sure Alan had no hand in it. I suspected Brehmer. Are you sure you have a case against him?"

"Not quite, but we shall have," Cross watched the other warily. "We already have a sample of his hair to compare with something we found in the old lady's hand."

"What old lady?"

"Mrs. Nash."

"Don't tell me—how shocking. But what on earth should Brehmer want to kill them for?"

"Then?"

"Didn't you say—"

"I said the old lady."

"Strange—they were inseparable," Griswald licked his parched lips. "I always think of them as one."

"As a matter of fact you've guessed right—they were both killed," said Cross.

"How horrible!" Griswald gasped out. "This has upset me terribly. Might we defer our talk to some more seasonable time? My head aches terribly."

"To-morrow," Cross moved towards the door, then sniffed. "Is it close in here, or do I smell perfume?"

"This," Boldly Griswald held out his handkerchief with which he had mopped up the scent. "Funny about perfumes. They're so tied up with memories. This was something of Janet's."

It was then that Christopher Cross saw the lid of the chest move, but he did not let Griswald know.

"You get some sleep," he managed a smile. "I'll be round later in the day. Auf wiedersehen."

Griswald closed the door and hastened to the chest. He dragged out Deborah, who had partly recovered her senses, and laid her on the couch. He picked up a cushion with the intention of suffocating her, and had just pressed it down over her face when the front door burst open.

Marvin Griswald took one look at Christopher Cross and the police officers before making a flying leap for the stairs. He took refuge in his wife's own room, and when they hammered on the door tried to clamber along the thick ivy to one of the other rooms. The ivy gave, and with a scream of terror Marvin Griswald crashed down on to the very path where he had flung Janet's dog.

After satisfying himself that Deborah was all right, Christopher handed her over to the care of Alan Shaw and darted upstairs after the police. He stared down from Janet's balcony at the prone figure on the path.

"Now I know the ball came after the dog," said the detective.

"SECRET PATROL"

"I'm looking for Mr. McCord," she said agitatedly.

"I'm McCord," responded that harassed man, staring up at her. "What's wrong now?"

"The mounted police are trapped, and I've come for help!"

"Mounted police?" he echoed. "More than one of them?"

"Yes, two—and they'll both be killed unless you hurry."

"Where are they?"

"I don't know what the place is called, or whose it is. You get the men, and I'll show them the way. But, oh, hurry—do hurry!"

McCord turned to his companion, who was the clerk ordinarily in charge of the counter.

"Dan," he said urgently, "go find some of the men, quick!"

The clerk scurried off to the hotel, and in a very few minutes returned with several men. Others appeared with two horses, and a wagon outside the blacksmith's was commandeered. Not more than ten minutes later Ann was riding beside the wagon in the direction of Barstow's cabin.

In that cabin, meanwhile, the former prisoner known as Tom had ventured into the back room, over the broken door, only to be driven forth again by a bullet that sang past his left ear—and after that there was more silence.

Gene gave Alan a hand with the big packing-case, and it was moved to the edge of the loft to provide them with a shelter.

"Only one cartridge left, eh?" said Gene.

"Only one," Alan replied grimly. "And I'm saving that for Barstow."

Barstow, in the outer room, had ripped two curtains down from a window and made a roll of them.

"I'll drive those rats out if I have to burn this place down!" he raged, and from a cupboard he took out a can of paraffin which he emptied upon the rolled-up curtains.

"There's a window in the gable at the end of the loft," he said, "and I'm going to use it! Here, take this, Tom! As soon as I start firing outside, light it and toss it up from the doorway—there's a mattress up there, and when that's ablaze and they're trying to put it out I can shoot 'em down from the window! You come with me, Arnold!"

Tom took the improvised torch, and Barstow went out from the cabin with Arnold and round to the back of it.

"They're up to something!" said Alan, as the silence continued. "Things are too quiet!"

"Alan," said Gene, terribly afraid that the end of both of them was near, "there's something I've got to tell you. Dad was right about Ann—it's been you she's cared for all along! She admitted it to me this evening, after you'd left."

A ladder had been set against the back wall, under a little window in that end of the loft. Abruptly guns began to blaze out there, and Alan's attention, which had been distracted by Gene's confession, was diverted by the sudden din of firearms, so that he did not notice Tom creep into the room below, nor realise what was happening till the flaming roll of curtains cut through the air and fell upon the mattress.

He ran to stamp upon the flames, and he shouted to Gene to get a blanket from the other end of the loft. Gene made a dive for the indicated blanket, but stopped short half-way because Barstow was at the upper window, taking aim at Alan through one of its dirty panes.

In that moment he forgot to be a coward and sprang sideways into the line of fire as the trigger of a six-gun was pulled. He swayed on his feet, tottered on the very edge of the loft, and pitched backwards to the floor below while Alan's gun spat fire.

Alan had saved his last cartridge for Barstow, and he had not saved it in vain. The murderous blacksmith fell headlong from the top of the ladder to the ground with a bullet in his brain, and Jake and Arnold did not hesitate. They went tearing round to the front of the cabin, and they burst in upon Tom and the wounded Jordan.

"He's done for!" gasped Jake.

"Who is?" demanded Jordan.

"Barstow!" said Jake.

"We haven't got a chance!" shrieked the white-livered Arnold. "Let's get out of here!"

They stumbled forth from the cabin, in haste to escape. But the wagon from St. Johns was in the road, and the men who had travelled in it were approaching the door, headed by McCord.

"There's three of 'em!" McCord shouted. "Get 'em, boys! There's a fourth!"

Hank Berg was found under the trees at the back of the cabin, unconscious and bleeding badly from his wound, only a few yards away from the dead body of Barstow. But Alan had put out the fire by reversing the mattress and stamping on it, and had scrambled down to Gene with the useless gun in his hand.

He dropped on one knee and leaned over his dying chum, and it was thus that Ann found him when she ventured in at the doorway.

Gene opened his eyes as Alan raised his head, and in a voice so faint that Ann could barely hear the words he uttered he managed to say:

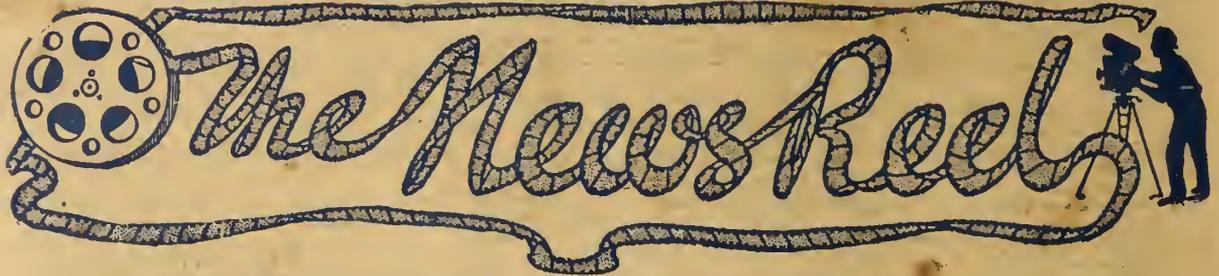

"I'll be—leaving—a clean record—like you—said. Permanently—disabled—in service."

With a smile on his lips he dropped back, in Alan's arms.

Eight days afterwards, Gene was buried with military honours at Fort Chapelle; and Alan was one of the bearers of his coffin, and Ann followed on the arm of the superintendent.

Hollywood "Twins"

A birthday celebration pact has been made between Tyrone Power and Alice Faye to take effect on May 5th, when they celebrate their joint birthdays.

Although separated by several sound stages, on one of which Tyrone is working in "Café Metropole" and Alice in "Wake Up and Live" at Twentieth Century-Fox, they managed to get together and work out some of the details for their coming celebrations.

They were both born on exactly the same day and will be twenty-three years old on May 5th. The only difference in their age is a matter of six hours by which Tyrone beat Alice into this world.

They decided that no matter where they may be or what they are doing, they will drop everything on that day to stago a six-hour birthday party.

New Goldwyn Film

With his studio working at high pressure on "The Woman's Touch," starring Miriam Hopkins and Joel McCrea, in production, and "Hurricane," "The Adventures of Marco Polo," "Stella Dallas," and "The Goldwyn Follies," in preparation, Samuel Goldwyn has signed Malcolm Stuart Boylan and Harvey Gates to begin work immediately upon the script of "The Real Glory."

This is described as a dramatic story of the occupation of the Philippine Islands by the American troops. Either Gary Cooper or Joel McCrea will star in it.

Spencer Tracy's Menagerie

The circus business lost a natural-born animal trainer when Spencer Tracy decided to become an actor.

Tracy admits it himself.

As an instructor of chickens, rabbits, Shetland ponies, Irish setters and New England codfish he has few, if any, equals, he declares.

He acquired his power over codfish only recently. After working among thousands of pounds of them, both alive and frozen, for a new Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture, he feels that he has more than a speaking acquaintance with them. For while ocean-location sequences went on for weeks and weeks, the codfish went on for ever.

Tracy fished for them with hand line and trawl. He hauled them into dories, he tossed them up into bins on schooner decks. He fought and wrestled with them, he sat on them, he worked entirely surrounded by them. After he got back to the studio and was shown splitting them and cleaning them for close-up "shots," cuts by the dozen would follow him into the driveway of his San Fernando Valley home at night.

Which added another species to his menagerie.

The chickens have been out on his ranch, of course, ever since he bought the place. The rabbits and the Shetland ponies belong to his youngsters. Then there are fourteen Irish setters.

Winfield Sheehan gave Spencer his original setter, several years ago. It seemed lonesome, so Tracy acquired a pal for it. Since then, the setter family has grown. The Tracys are hoping they won't have to move out of their house to make room for the dogs.

The horses—oh, yes, we nearly forgot the horses—occupy considerable space, too. Spencer has four polo ponies and his wife has two that are in active service. Then there are two more which are on the retired list. In addition to which there are two racing fillies and their mares. The fillies, two-year-olds, will get their baptism of fire this season. April Lass, the more promising of the two, will go to the post first, "to decide whether the horse eats, or we eat the horse," says Tracy.

If April Lass does pay her feed bill, then the chances are that somewhere on the Tracy ranch there'll have to be room for a genuine racing stable.

"I moved out into the Valley in the first place for peace and quiet," concluded Spencer, "but this animal thing just seems to be getting out of hand. I'll probably end up by starting a lion farm, too, and charging admission so as to pay expenses for the rest of the place."

Anna May Throws Her Weight About

When Anna May begins to throw her weight about, executives and technicians at work on the 20th Century-Fox's "Wee Willie Winkie," in which Shirley Temple stars, certainly take notice.

The reason? Anna May happens to be a two-ton elephant required for several scenes in the Kipling story, and, when she travels, it is by lorry.

On her way to the location in Santa Susanna Mountains, she decided against the lorry and in favour of the road, so she threw her weight about to such an extent that she threatened to send lorry, driver and production officials hurtling to the bottom of a cañon.

Naturally, Anna May was permitted to get out and walk.

Getting to Sleep

It's not unusual to see Joan Crawford, Luise Rainer, Katharine Hepburn, or Claudette Colbert driving along the open road by the beaches at midnight, trying to get rid of sleeplessness.

Spencer Tracy, Wallace Beery, Lewis Stone and other ranch-Hollywoodites think nothing of having a horse saddled so they can take a moonlight ride in order to bring them closer to the arms of Morpheus. Robert Taylor used this method when he lived on the outskirts of Hollywood and owned a saddle horse. Now that he is in Beverly Hills he has become a "walker."

Others in Taylor's classification include Bing Crosby (no, he can't sing himself to sleep), Jean Harlow, Nelson Eddy, Robert Montgomery and Arline Judge.

Clark Gable seems to "kill two birds with one stone." He gets out of bed and does setting up exercises for a half hour. He has passed this idea on to Gary Grant, Caroline Lombard, Madge Evans and Jean Parker. They find it works like a charm.

Light fiction does the trick for Eleanor Powell, Frances Langford, Janet Gaynor and Lionel Barrymore. James Stewart, Sid Silvers and Buddy Ebsen like to work out puzzles.

The Marx Brothers seem to be the luckiest people in Hollywood. They're so tired of playing tricks on people that they can't help but fall asleep at night.

Una Merkel likes to have the back of her neck rubbed. Franchot Tone goes to another extreme and takes a dip in his swimming pool.

May Robson still stands by the advice that her mother passed on to her, and takes a glass of steaming hot milk.

And Nat Pendleton plays solitaire. He gets so lonely that he always falls asleep.

The CASE of the BLACK CAT

A THRILLING MURDER MYSTERY

Starring
RICARDO CORTEZ

(س)

When a charred body is found in the bed of old Peter Laxter, an eccentric millionaire, after a fire, several different people are suspected of murder, and Perry Mason, lawyer-detective, sets out to solve the mystery. A black cat provides him with a clue, after an old caretaker is done to death, but there is still another killing before the entirely unexpected truth is revealed. Starring Ricardo Cortez and June Travis

A Troublesome Patient

FROM a post under one of the trees in the drive a wooden arm projected, something like a gibbet; but it was a quaintly shaped lantern that hung on a chain from the arm, and an electric lamp burned in the lantern, although it was after two o'clock in the morning.

A black cat had been perched on top of the wooden arm for some little while, half-asleep, but as an open two-seater came sweeping along the drive the creature rose up and arched its back, meowed defiance at the approaching headlights, then took a flying leap to the ground and disappeared into the darkness.

The two-seater was brought to a standstill near the brick porch of a fine old creeper-covered mansion, and a good-looking young fellow got down from behind its wheel and ran round to open the other door for the golden-haired girl who had been sitting beside him.

He took her in his arms as she rose to descend, and he continued to hold her after he had set her down upon her feet.

"This is good-night, Doug," she said. "Let me go."

"Aw, just a moment!" he protested. "Have a heart!"

"No!" She shook her head. "Don't you realise it's after two?"

"So what?" he laughed.

"So good-night."

He held her close, and he was in the act of kissing her when the crunch of a footstep on the gravel caused him to glance over her shoulder, and he saw the glowing end of a cigarette and glimpsed a tall dark figure, half-screened by a laurel bush, some yards away.

"Who's that watching us?" he asked abruptly.

The girl, who was Wilma Laxter, granddaughter of Peter Laxter, the millionaire owner of the house, looked swiftly round at the bush and released herself.

"That's my Cousin Frank," she said, and raised her voice indignantly. "You don't have to spy on us, Frank! Come out and be introduced."

The dark figure moved slowly towards them, and in the light of the lantern and the light that shone through the frosted glass panels of the front door of the house stood revealed as a bare-headed young man of twenty-five, or thereabouts, with wavy brown hair, a very pointed nose, and rather thick lips.

"Good-evening," said Wilma's companion stily, and Wilma herself said: "Frank, this is Douglas Keene."

"Someone else who wants to marry you for your money?" inquired the cousin sneeringly.

"That's not a bit funny!" she stormed at him.

"Oh, it really doesn't matter to me in the least, you know!" Frank Oafley drawled, flinging down the end of the cigarette he had been smoking and grinding it beneath his heel. "I get my share of the estate, anyway."

Douglas Keene was furious.

"Wilma always told me you were unpleasant," he said scathingly, "and I call that a magnificent understatement!"

Frank Oafley turned away without another word and strode off in the direction of a large garage at the side of the house.

"I'm sorry, Doug," murmured Wilma.

"Oh, that's all right, dear!" shrugged her lover. "I don't mind."

He climbed into the two-seater, and its self-starter buzzed.

"Good-night," he called out to her with a wave of his hand.

"Good-night," she responded, and she stood on the top step of the porch till the tail-light of the car had vanished under the trees that fringed the drive, then turned to open the front door with a key she took from her handbag.

In a room of considerable size on the first floor of the house, Peter Laxter was sitting up in a four poster bed with a dressing-gown over his pyjamas, going through some books and papers which strewed the coverlet. He was old, the skin of his face was like parchment, and he had the reputation of being eccentric.

His white hair looked as though no brush or comb had touched it for days, but he was cleanly shaven. A pair of gold-rimmed pince-nez drooped from the bridge of a nose that would not have disgraced an eagle, and as often as not he looked over the top of the lenses instead of through them.

Some months before he had slipped on the stairs and fallen down them into the hall, injuring his hip, and it was generally believed that he never would walk again. A nurse named Louise de Voc had been engaged to look after him—and suffered considerably from his temper. She was a beautiful woman, and quite a young one, but there was a hardness about her features which suggested that she was well able to take care of herself, and she bore her employer's insults with seeming equanimity.

At night-time she occupied an adjoining room, and she was in that room, dozing on a sofa, when Wilma entered the hall and quite unintentionally slammed the door.

Peter Laxter immediately dropped the paper he was holding and shouted angrily at the top of his voice:

"Who's that out there? Who's that? Come here! Who's that on the stairs?" There was no one on the stairs, and there was no reply at all. Peter Laxter banged a fist on the bed-post, and bellowed:

"Nurse! Nurse! Come here!" From the adjoining room Louise de Voe appeared.

"What is it now, Mr. Laxter?" she asked.

"There's somebody prowling in the hall," he snapped. "See who it is!"

"You're imagining things," she rebuked. "I never heard a sound."

"Of course not!" he retorted irascibly. "You were asleep! Huh! Fine nurse you are! I might he killed in here and you'd never hear it!"

"Now, Mr. Laxter," she said severely, "you mustn't excite yourself."

"I'll excite myself as much as I want!" he roared. "Go out and see who it is—and bring 'em in here!"

She went out along the upper hall to the stairs, and she met Wilma at the top of them on her way to bed.

"Oh, hallo, nurse!" exclaimed Wilma. "Did grandfather hear me?"

"He certainly did," Louise de Voe replied, "and he wants to see you."

"How is he? Is he any worse?"

"He's always worse!"

"Oh dear!" sighed Wilma. "Thank you."

She turned towards her grandfather's bed-room, and as she entered it she greeted the invalid cheerfully:

"Hallo, darling!"

"I thought so!" growled Peter Laxter, scowling at her as she walked round the bed. "I thought so!"

"I'm terribly sorry if I woke you up," she said penitently.

"I wasn't asleep!" he snorted.

"Don't fool yourself! Huh! And stop fiddling around! You can go to bed!" Her green eyes twinkled at him and her lips parted in a smile. But at that moment Louise de Voe walked in from her own room.

"It's time for your medicine," she said.

"I don't want any!" he bellowed at her.

Wilma sat down on the edge of the bed; Louise de Voe began to gather up some of the papers with which the coverlet was littered.

"Leave those alone!" rapped the millionaire, and waved her away with his hand. "Go to bed!"

The nurse retreated to her own room, but before she had closed its door he said in a voice intended to reach her ears:

"I never did like that woman, anyway!"

The door was closed, and Wilma rose. "Darling, how can you sleep in such a messy-looking bed?" she exclaimed.

"And what, in the name of goodness, is all that junk?"

"Nothing!" snapped her grandfather. "Just going through some old papers."

"Where did they all come from?"

"They were in storage. I had Ashton bring them."

She drifted to the foot of the bed and looked down at a huge chest she had never seen there before.

"Oh, what's in here?" she asked, and stooped to raise the lid.

"Nothing. Old papers. Leave 'em alone!"

"All right, darling." She let go of the lid. "Don't snap at me."

"Where have you been?"

She sat down on the edge of the bed again and tilted her head at him.

"I was out with a young man."

"With who?"

"With whom, darling," she corrected. "Whom."

He whisked off his pince-nez and pointed them accusingly at her.

"You were out with Johnny Briker!"

"Wrong again," she laughed. "I was out with Douglas Keene."

"Huh!"

"But, darling, he's so nice! We're—er—we're going to be—"

"How do you know for certain that he isn't only interested in the money you'll get from me?"

"You say that about all my friends," she complained.

A Call for Perry Mason

THE black cat had wandered round to the back of the house and was sitting on a fence near a cucumber-frame, making melancholy noises. Sam Laxter, another grandson of Peter Laxter and cousin to Wilma and to Frank Oaffley, was in a bedroom overlooking the kitchen garden, and the noise was an abomination in his ears.

He hated all cats, but in particular he hated Clinker—mainly because it belonged to Ashton, his grandfather's caretaker. He got out of bed, slipped on a dressing-gown and a pair of slippers, and went to a window, which he opened. With far more violence than accuracy he hurled a hairbrush at the disturber of the night.

The brush struck the cucumber-frame, smashing one of the panes of glass in it, and the cat leapt down from the fence and ran off.

Charles Ashton, a baldheaded old fellow and a cripple, had a room of his own on the ground floor. His bed was set against the wall, under a narrow window, and he rose up from it and opened the window.

"Here, Kitty, Kitty, Kitty!" he called out into the darkness. "Come here, Kitty—come on!"

Over the sill of the window the black cat scrambled into his arms, and he petted it.

"Nice Kitty," he said soothingly. "Nice Kitty! Nice Clinker."

The cat purred and rubbed its head against his face. But upstairs Sam Laxter went out from his room to the room of his grandfather in a fury. He was a very tall man, nearer forty than thirty, and not a pleasant one at any time. Like his cousin, Frank Oaffley, he had a long nose and thick lips, but his rather full face was a weaker one than his cousin's, and a little moustache accentuated the petulant droop of his mouth.

Louise de Voe began to gather up some of the papers with which the coverlet was littered. "Leave those alone!" the millionaire rapped at her.

He hardly noticed Wilma as he burst into the room.

"Listen, grandfather!" he shouted. "Something's got to be done about that damned cat!"

"Doesn't make half as much noise as you do throwing things at it and smashing glass!" retorted Peter Laxter.

"I'll poison it, that's what I'll do!" raged Clinker's enemy. "The beastly animal keeps me awake every night!"

"Oh, have a heart, Sam!" said Wilma. "The cat's in love. Haven't you ever been in love?"

Sam Laxter scorned to answer that question, but his grandfather shook a fist at him.

"You'll not molest Clinker any more," he cried, "and you'll pay for the broken glass! Now, get out!"

"All right," Sam Laxter scowled, but backed out through the doorway. "If my sanity is less important to you than the caretaker's cat, I—I'll—"

He did not complete the threat, if that it was, but closed the door with a bang.

"Good-night, darling," said Wilma, kissing her grandfather on the cheek before he could prevent her. "Sleep tight."

"Huh!"

She went out from the room, and he immediately reached over to a telephone on a little table beside the bed and dialed a number.

In the bed-room of a luxurious flat, situated on the sixth floor of an apartment-house in Inglewood Avenue, Los Angeles, a bell disturbed the slumbers of Perry Mason, attorney-at-law, and his black head moved uneasily upon a pillow. The ringing persisted, and he became sufficiently awake to reach out to a white-enamelled telephone on a reading-table beside his bed.

"Hallo!" said the voice of Peter Laxter in his left ear. "I want some legal work done! Laxter speaking! Legal work!"

"Yes, Mr. Laxter," yawned Perry Mason.

"I want to change my will before morning!"

"But, my dear, sir," protested the lawyer, glancing at a clock across the room and yawning again, "it's past two-thirty."

"I know what time it is!" barked the millionaire. "If you charge extra for late calls, you can put it on the bill!"

"All right."

The white-enamelled telephone was restored to its accustomed place, and Perry Mason flung back the bed-clothes.

Peter Laxter, who was not in the least bit sleepy, shouted for Louise de Voe until she emerged from her room and eyed him with unconcealed annoyance.

"What is it this time, Mr. Laxter?" she asked.

"I've sent for my attorney," he replied curtly. "I want you to go down to the caretaker and tell him Perry Mason's on his way here. He'll have to open the door for him."

"Very well."

She began to gather up some books which were upon the bed, but he knocked them out of her hands.

"Stop fiddling around!" she snapped at her. "I like the bed this way!"

A little over half an hour later a dark green coupé drew up outside the front door of the house, and Perry Mason alighted from it.

"I won't be more than a few minutes July 3rd, 1937.

if I can help it," he said apologetically to the chauffeur.

"Very good, sir."

The man stifled a yawn, and Perry Mason was about to mount the steps to the porch when a sound of footsteps on the gravel caused him to stop and to turn.

It was Sam Laxter who walked up to him, still in pyjamas, dressing-gown, and slippers.

"Good-evening, Sam," said the attorney dryly. "Taking a little moonlight stroll?"

"What are you doing here at this time of the morning, Mr. Mason?" countered the growler.

"That's just what I want to know," was the smiling reply. "Your grandfather phoned me—said he wanted to see me about something urgent. Is he getting worse?"

"I hope so!" The grandson's voice was harsh and his manner uglyly emphatic. "I hate people when they're old! They're just a nuisance! If ever I reach his age—which I doubt—I hope someone will have the kindness to do away with me!"

Perry's brows went up, but he made no verbal response to this statement, and Laxter went off under the swinging lantern. Perry tucked under his arm a leather brief-case he was carrying, ascended to the front door, and rang the bell.

Ashton might very well have been waiting in the hall so swiftly did he answer the summons, and he stood leaning on his crutch and holding the cat after the visitor had entered and the door had been closed.

"Well, here we are, Ashton," said Perry, and he reached out a hand to stroke the cat. "Hallo, Clinker!"

The cat spat at him, and he withdrew his hand in haste.

"Friendly little beast, isn't he?" he said.

"I guess you'd be that way, too," returned the caretaker, "if people had been throwin' things at you."

"Oh, is that what it is?" laughed Perry. "And why am I here?"

"Don't ask me, Mr. Mason, I don't know. I'm only the caretaker around here. All I'm told is to get dressed and open the door to you. You're to go right upstairs to his room."

Perry ascended to Peter Laxter's room, looking as fresh as if he had enjoyed a full night's rest. He was a handsome man of rather a Latin type, clean-shaven, with a pair of very quick brown eyes which could express everything, or nothing, as their owner willed.

Soon after he had disappeared, Sam Laxter entered the hall from the grounds, and he was on his way up the stairs when he caught sight of the caretaker near the door that led to the servants' quarters.

"Ashton," he shouted over the banisters. "I warn you for the last time! If that cat bothers me again I'll kill it! I haven't had a wink of sleep!"

"That's too bad," returned the caretaker insolently.

Perry Mason, by this time, was occupying a chair beside his aged client's bed and making notes on a sheet of paper.

"Now, is that all clear?" asked the millionaire.

"Certainly," nodded Perry. "You want your will changed so that your granddaughter Wilma—"

"S-s-sh!" Peter Laxter raised a warning finger. "Find out if that woman's listening at the door," he whispered.

Perry tiptoed to the door of the nurse's room, and he opened it so suddenly that Louise de Voe fell to her knees and very nearly dropped a small tray she was holding.

"Oh!" she cried out.

"I'm so sorry," murmured Perry.

"Did I hurt you?"

She shook her head and scrambled to her feet.

"I—I was just fixing Mr. Laxter's medicine," she stammered.

"And you got your own medicine!" Peter Laxter shouted from his bed. "I'm glad of it—you were eavesdropping!"

"I'll give it to him," suggested Perry.

"I won't take it!" bellowed his client. "Throw it out of the window!"

Perry smiled at the beautiful nurse, closed the door, and went back to his chair.

"And now, as you were saying," he resumed, "you want your will changed so that your granddaughter Wilma will be cut out entirely—"

"That's right," Peter Laxter interrupted. "And then she'll find out which one of those fellows hanging round her is really on the level!"

"And you want your estate to go in equal portions to your two grandsons, Sam Laxter and Frank Oafley?"

"That's right. And don't forget the eat!"

"Oh, yes, yes, the caretaker's cat!" Perry made a note. "Uhuh! Your heirs are to continue to employ Ashton, the caretaker, and he must always be permitted to have the company of his cat."

"That's right."

Perry put the sheet of paper in his brief-case and picked up his hat.

"And now," he said, "will you tell me just why you wanted all this attended to at this ungodly hour? Couldn't you have waited until the morning?"

"I may not be alive in the morning!" "You look a pretty healthy invalid to me."

"I don't anticipate death as the result of ill-health," was the unexpected rejoinder, and then a dismal noise rang through the house.

"What in the name of heaven was that?" exclaimed Perry.

"That was only the caretaker's cat," replied the old man.

Peter Laxter's Will

AT the back of the hall there was a door which opened into the garage at the side of the house, and Ashton used that door after breakfast in the morning. He stepped down on to the concreted floor of the garage with his crutch, and passed round the cars in it to open the big double doors beyond which was the drive.

He had heaved himself up behind the wheel of a big open touring car when Frank Oafley sauntered in from the grounds, dressed in tweeds and carrying a golf-bag.

"Good-mornin', Mr. Oafley," greeted the caretaker. "Want anything done in town? I'm goin' in to do some errands for Mr. Laxter."

"No, nothing for me, I guess," replied the young man.

Louise de Voe appeared on the top of the steps from the hall, and he went over to her.

"Well, good-morning, nurse," he said. "How's the—er—patient?"

"He's well enough to be very fussy about his breakfast," she responded wryly.

Frank Oafley jerked his head ever so slightly.

"Oh—er—Ashton's going into town," he said. "Is there anything you want?"

She glanced across at the caretaker, and she said in quite a different manner:

"I have everything I need, thank you, sir."

"Then I'll be gettin' along," announced Ashton. "Would you be good enough to close the garage doors after me, sir?"

"Sure!" nodded Oafley, and off went the touring car out from the garage and along the drive. Oafley flung down the golf-bag and closed the double doors, then went back to the girl and took her in his arms.

"Darling!" he said, and kissed her. "Careful, dear," warned Louise de Voe. "Someone may see us."

"I don't care," he declared. "Let them! I'm sick and tired of acting like a stranger when people are around!"

She freed herself gently from his embrace.

"Listen," she said in a low voice. "I came in a minute or two ago and no one was here. The engine of the roadster was running. I looked around and saw Sam coming. Then I turned it off."

"Sam?" Frank Oafley bit his lip. "Did he see you?"

"No." She shook her head. "He was in too much of a temper."

"Why?"

"He saw Chiuker, and then he tripped over the hose."

Perry Mason's office was on the fourth floor of the Hamilton Building, in Hill Street, Los Angeles, and he was at his desk in his own private room very early that morning, despite the lateness of the hour at which he had returned to the comfort of his bed.

He had made out a draft will in accordance with the instructions he had received from Peter Laxter, and soon after nine o'clock the draft was handed over to a member of his staff who made an engrossment from it. Before ten o'clock the engrossment was on its way to Peter Laxter's home at San Morego, fifteen miles away towards the Pacific coast, and Perry Mason had settled down to the solving of a crossword puzzle for all the world as though he had nothing more important to do.

He had filled in only a few words, however, when Wilma Laxter opened the door from the outer office and looked round it.

"Hallo, Mr. Mason!" she called across to him.

Down went the newspaper which contained the crossword puzzle, and Perry smiled at her.

"Hallo, Wilma," he said. "Come right in."

The golden-haired girl stepped into the room, and with her was Douglas Keene.

"Won't you sit down?" said Perry.

"No, we can only stay a minute," Wilma informed him.

Perry eyed her companion, an utter stranger to him.

"Well, I'm delighted to see you, young man," he said in his own smooth way, "but just who are you?"

"Oh, I'm so sorry," Wilma laughed. "I forgot. Mr. Mason, this is Douglas Keene. We're going to be married!"

Perry pursed his lips, gazing first at one and then at the other.

"In spite of the will?" he inquired. "Don't you know that Mr. Laxter has disinherited his granddaughter?"

"I know," nodded Douglas, "and I'm tickled to death. I don't like girls with money—they get too bossy!"

Wilma made a face at him.

"Mr. Mason," she said, "why have I been cut out of my grandfather's will?"

"My dear," lied Perry, "I haven't the remotest idea."

"I can't understand it. Grandfather just called us all into the room and

"Who sent this?" demanded Perry, and Frank Oafley replied: "You know as much about it as I do!"

bluntly said I wouldn't get a nickel. He said Frank and Sam would have it all and gave no explanations."

"Humph! And what were your reactions?"

"She told him to sit on a tack," Douglas replied for her. "Then she packed her things and moved right out."

"Atta girl!" said Perry. "And what are your plans?"

"Do you like waffles?" asked Wilma. "I beg your pardon."

"I'm opening a waffle shop quite near here—in Ninth Street. You see, I've saved a little money out of my allowance. In that way I'll be independent. Do you think it's a good idea, Mr. Mason?"

"Well, on one condition," replied Perry gravely.

"What's that?"

"I can't approve of any waffle shop unless you serve plenty of melted butter."

"Melted butter it is," laughed Wilma, and Perry asked her when the shop was to be opened.

"Almost right away," she replied.

"I'll be your first customer," he said. "That is—er—if you don't mind."

Wilma and her lover had departed, and Perry was frowning over the crossword puzzle again, when a telephone bell rang in the outer office, and Della Street, Perry's pretty and very efficient private secretary, dealt with the call.

Mrs. Pixley, the elderly and rather prim housekeeper at the Laxter residence, was on the other end of the line, standing beside the bed in which her employer was sitting bolt upright.

"Mr. Laxter wishes to speak to Mr. Perry Mason," she said. "It's very important."

"I'm sorry," responded Della Street, "but Mr. Mason is terribly busy. Oh, well, hold the line; I'll see if he can talk to you."

Several clients and would-be clients were waiting in the outer office to see the famous attorney, some of them being rather shady-looking characters. Wrongdoers, as well as perfectly innocent people, often sought his aid.

A fat man with a very coarse face intercepted Della on her way to Perry's room.

"Listen, sister," he said complainingly. "I've been waitin' an hour to see Perry Mason. How long is he gonna be?"

"I'm sorry," said Della, "but he's terribly busy."

She stepped into Perry's rather elaborately furnished room, and she closed the door carefully behind her.

"Mr. Mason?"

Perry looked up at her from the newspaper on his desk and stabbed the air between them with a pencil.

"Unless you can give me a seven-letter word beginning with 'X,' meaning a Mongolian lizard," he said. "I don't want to talk to you."

"But, Mr. Mason," she began, "this is very—"

"I'll tell you what I'll do, Della," he broke in. "I'll settle for a seven-letter word beginning with 'S,' meaning lawyer."

"Shyster," she promptly suggested.

"Getting a bit fresh, aren't you, Della?" he chided; but the word fitted and he wrote it in its appropriate squares. "What do you want?"

"Well, there's a Mrs. Pixley on the telephone. She says it's very important."

"Pixley?" Perry repeated the name with disfavour. "I don't know anyone by the name of Pixley, and if I did I wouldn't talk to 'em over the telephone."

"She says she's Mr. Peter Laxter's housekeeper."

"Oh, you've put the call through here?" Perry picked up his own telephone. "Yes? This is Perry Mason speaking."

Peter Laxter, in his bed, reached out a hand.

"If that's Masen, gimme that 'phone," he said.

The instrument was surrendered to him.

"Hallo, Mason," he barked into it, "I've just signed my will, and I'm sending it over to you now by your driver. Put it in your safe-deposit box and keep it there until you hear from me."

"I'll take care of it," promised Perry, and he planked his right hand down upon the newspaper because Della Street was bending over it with his pencil. "You work out your own crossword puzzles, young woman! What's that? Oh, no, Mr. Laxter, I wasn't talking to you. I'm sorry. Yes, I'll take care of it."

Peter Laxter put the telephone he had been using back on to its table, and from the coverlet of the bed picked up a long envelope containing the will he had signed a few minutes before. Louise de Voc, who had been one of the witnesses, was listening behind the door of her room.

"Give that to Mr. Mason's driver," the millionaire said to his housekeeper. "Tell him to take it to Mr. Mason right away. Go on, don't keep the man waiting!"

Perry Dictates a Letter

THAT morning Wilma Laxter took over the tenancy of the premises in Ninth Street which she proposed to open as a waffle shop. The place had been unoccupied for some months, but previously had been run as a restaurant, so that only minor alterations were necessary to its reopening.

The fact that the restaurant had proved a failure in no way dismayed the two lovers, and they embarked with zest upon rearrangements and decorations. Workmen invaded the shop during the afternoon, and among ladders and trestles the two went into figures and dispatched orders.

There were rooms over the shop in which Wilma proposed to make a home, and furniture for these rooms arrived before nightfall. Douglas Keene and the girl he was going to marry were far more active than the workmen in the shop, and they toiled for hours after the workmen had gone. The upstairs rooms were quite habitable by the time Douglas went off to his own flat in Acacia Avenue, tired out but happy, and Wilma slept soundly in a brand new bed.

Douglas was back with her for breakfast before seven o'clock in the morning, and the workmen arrived to find them most enthusiastically in the way.

"When will you men be through here?" Wilma asked anxiously of a carpenter who was erecting a sign over the front door.

"Oh, we'll be out of here in a few hours now," was the smiling reply. "You can start selling waffles by to-night."

At eight o'clock the raucous voice of a newsboy in the street rang out over and above the noise of hammering and the buzz of saws.

"Extra! Extra!" Wilma and Douglas heard. "All about the big fire! Millionaire dies in flames! Read all about it! Extra!"

For some reason she could not very well have explained, Wilma was filled with sudden misgiving.

"Get a paper!" she commanded. "We haven't got time to read a paper," objected Douglas.

"Get a paper!" she insisted, and he went out to the newsboy and acquired a copy of the "Los Angeles Chronicle."

July 3rd, 1937.

He was back in the shop with it almost immediately, and she knew by the expression on his face that her worst fears were confirmed. The paper was spread out on a table in one of the numerous recesses provided for customers, and they read together the front-page story beneath flaming headlines:

MILLIONAIRE BURNS TO DEATH.

FIRE DAMAGES LAXTER ESTATE.

Peter Laxter, eccentric millionaire, perished last night in a fire which started in his bed-room and for a time threatened destruction of his beautiful home. Trapped in his room, the aged man, a cripple, could not be reached by relatives. The charred remains were removed to an undertaker's parlour and the day of the funeral will be announced later. Valiant efforts were made to rescue the wealthy man from his burning home, but flames covered all entrances. . . .

Wilma's waffle shop was opened for custom that evening, but Wilma served those who patronised it with a heavy heart. She never had been very fond of her grandfather, but the manner of his death appalled her, and she told Douglas bitterly that most of the people who came and ate waffles did so only to stare at her and ask a lot of questions. Perry Mason was not her first customer; he did not appear at all.

The newly opened shop was closed on the day of the funeral, but Wilma did not attend the obsequies, and it was not till an elaborate monument had been erected in the San Morego cemetery that she paid a visit to the grave.

One morning, about two months after the fire, Della Street walked into Perry Mason's room on the fourth floor of the Hamilton Building, in Hill Street, and said to him in her quiet way:

"Mr. Mason, would you like to see a man about a cat?"

Perry Mason looked up from a law book which had been engaging his very close attention. His eyes frowned, but his lips smiled.

"Ashton!" he exclaimed. "Sure—send him in!"

The lame old caretaker hobbled in on his crutch a few minutes later, and sat down in a chair Perry indicated, holding the crutch.

"Good-morning, Ashton," said Perry pleasantly. "How are you? Glad to see you. What can I do for you?"

"You can do plenty, I guess," was the growling response. "Sam Laxter wants to get rid of my cat and I want you to stop him!"

"You're still working as caretaker in the household, aren't you?" inquired Perry.

"You bet your sweet life I am! That was in the will! But Sam says that arrangement don't include my cat—says if I don't get rid of him he'll poison him!"

"Does he?" said Perry. "And what do you want me to do?"

"You can help me, if you want to, Mr. Mason, and I can pay! Oh, I know that you big attorneys don't work for little apples, but if you'll just save Clinker for me I'll make it worth your while."

From the breast-pocket of his old-fashioned coat, Ashton produced a well-worn wallet, and from the wallet he took out quite a thick wad of notes.

"You certainly have plenty of money, anyway," remarked Perry. "Did—or—Mr. Laxter leave that to you?"

"Not a dime!" declared the caretaker. "Just said I was to be kept on in me job. But I worked for him for twenty years, fifty dollars a month and all found, and I've saved my money, I have!"

"Well, you needn't worry about a thing," Perry assured him. "I'll send a letter to Sam Laxter that will throw a good scare into him."

Ashton looked infinitely relieved.

"How much is that gonna cost me?" he asked.

"Oh, don't bother me about that!" Perry waved the matter aside with a paper-knife, and as he did so the door from the outer office swung back and a loose-lipped and youngish man with rather prominent blue eyes swept over to the desk, waving a newspaper.

"Look!" he cried excitedly. "It fits, chief! It fits!"

His name was Paul Drake, and he was a faithful if not exactly brilliant assistant, sometimes known as "Spudsy." The caretaker gaped at him and rose.

"I—I said, how much is it gonna cost?" he stammered.

"Don't you worry about a thing, Mr. Ashton," said Perry, silencing Paul Drake with a gesture. "Leave two dollars outside with the girl as a retainer and I'll save your cat for you."

"Two dollars, eh?" The caretaker looked astonished at being charged so little.

"Yes," said Perry. "Good-bye, Ashton."

The caretaker went out from the room, and Perry turned to his assistant.

"What's on your mind?" he asked. "Monandrous," was the reply.

"What?"

"Monandrous—a ten-letter word meaning a flower with a single stamen. It fits, chief! Look!"

Perry gave one glance at the crossword puzzle presented for his inspection.

"I solved that thing last Tuesday," he said.

Della Street re-entered the room.

"Somebody's following your caretaker," she remarked; and Perry went over to a window and looked down into the street. Ashton was driving off in the big touring car, and a dark saloon was close behind it.

"Huh!" Perry returned to his desk. "Della, did you notice the roll of bills Mr. Ashton was carrying? I wonder where he got it? Oh, Drake, did you make those inquiries for me?"

"You know me, chief," boomed the assistant, and took out a notebook.

"Here we are. I got the dope at the bank. Just about a month before the old man died he sold all his stocks and bonds and cashed in for about a million bucks in currency."

"That's a lot of money to have around," mused Perry. "I wonder what he did with it?"

"That's what the heirs would like to know," commented Drake.

"Perhaps it was burned in the fire," suggested Della.

"Perhaps," said Perry. "Take a letter, Della."

The letter he dictated was addressed to Sam Laxter, and it ran:

"Dear Sir,—My client, Mr. Charles Ashton, has consulted me regarding his cat Clinker, and has retained me as attorney to protect the cat's interests as set forth in the will of the late Peter Laxter.

"This is to advise you that I will rigorously prosecute anyone molesting the cat in any manner whatsoever.—Yours truly, PERRY MASON."

Something About Sam Laxter

TOWARDS noon on the following day, Sam Laxter was ushered into Perry Mason's room by Della Street, and with him was a fiery little attorney named Shuster, bald-headed except for two tufts of black hair which sprouted thickly over his ears; and Shuster's gold-rimmed pince-nez nearly fell from his prominent nose as he banged a fist upon the desk behind which Perry was seated.

"I know you, Perry Mason!" he shouted, flourishing the letter Sam Laxter had received. "You're trying to break Peter Laxter's will! What's the meaning of this letter to my client?"

"It's all very simple, Mr. Shuster," Mason blandly replied. "I want my client to keep his cat."

"Don't let him bluff you with the cat!" snorted the little lawyer. "Huh! He's trying to break that will!" He thrust the letter under Perry's nose. "You're hired to—"

"Calm yourself, Mr. Shuster," Perry interrupted sharply and rose to his feet. "I drew the will. I've no possible interest in trying to break it."

Sam Laxter found that statement hard to believe.

"Don't you represent my cousin Wilma, who was cut out of the will?" he demanded.

"I do not," Perry replied. "I represent the cat."

Sam Laxter scowled at his lawyer.

"Didn't you tell me that Wilma was behind all this?"

"Sure she is!" raged Shuster. "Don't let Mason fool you! You're a very clever man, Mr. Mason, but you're—"

"But you're much cleverer, counsellor," jecred Perry. "I know. Mr. Laxter, I'm sort of sorry you retained Mr. Shuster—Mr. Shuster, I mean. You see, he's apt to—"

"Now let's get down to brass tacks, Mr. Mason!" cried the angry little lawyer, with a thump of his fist. "Here's what my client is prepared to do. He'll guarantee not to molest the cat—on one condition."

"And what is that?" purred Perry.

"I want a waiver from Wilma Laxter, guaranteeing not to contest the will."

"I've already told you I don't represent Wilma."

"Very well, then. No waiver—no cat!"

Perry addressed himself to the client. "I advise you, Mr. Laxter," he said warningly, "to leave out the cat, or you'll be left out in the cold."

"There!" howled Shuster. "What did I tell you? What did I tell you? He's trying to break the will! He's representing Wilma! But you won't succeed, Mason! You're bluffing!"

Perry crossed the room and opened the door widely.

"Good-day, counsellor," he said. "Good-day, Mr. Laxter. I'm awfully busy. You'll forgive me, won't you?"

Lawyer and client went off together, the lawyer nearly bursting with rage, and Perry closed the door. Della, who had been present at the interview, burst out laughing.

"I think we should have charged a larger fee for representing that cat," she said.

"I think you're right," said Perry, "but don't be so mercenary. You just sit back and watch the fur fly!"

A telephone-bell rang, and he picked up the instrument.

"Yes?" he said. "Speaking. Oh, where are you, Drake? Fine; I'll be right over."

"Where are you off to now?" asked Della, as he replaced the telephone.

"Waffles and melted butter," he replied.

Paul Drake had rung up from Wilma's waffle shop, which was flourishing, and Perry joined him at a table in one of its recesses. Wilma and Douglas Keene were busy serving customers.

"So then," reported Drake, after they had both eaten waffles, "I got on the trail of De Voe, the nurse, see? And I found out where she's at. Here's the address here." He exhibited his notebook, from which it appeared that Louise de Voe was now living at flat 7B, Victory Arms Apartment-house, Olive Street.

"Uhuh!" nodded Perry.

"Then I nosed around to the bank," Drake went on, "and you were right, chief. Ashton's got a safety-deposit box there. He rented it about two months ago—just before the old man died. Couple o' days after he rents it he comes back and wants to rent the adjoining box for his half-brother—a guy named Watson Clammert."

"I didn't know he had one," commented Perry.

"Well, he has! He's at the General Hospital. They tell me, there, that Ashton paid all his half-brother's expenses."

"Drake," said Perry thoughtfully, "you know there are times when I almost think you're not as dumb as you look!"

That was praise from him, and Drake accepted it as such and was beaming with pleasure when Wilma walked up to the table.

"Now I can give you a little time, Mr. Mason," she said, seating herself beside the assistant. "But you'd better make it snappy because I may have to make more waffles any minute."

"And they're very tasty, too," said

Perry, who had become quite a regular patron of the place.

"Is there going to be some trouble about the will?" she inquired.

"It all depends on the cat."

"On Clinker?" she exclaimed.

"Yeah," said Drake. "Your cousin Sam wants to poison it. Nice boy!"

Douglas Keene had just served a customer in an adjoining recess and Wilma called him over.

"Glad to see you, Keene," said Perry.

"Oh, Doug," said Wilma, "this is Paul Drake, investigator for Mr. Mason. This is Douglas Keene, Mr. Drake."

"How are you?" murmured Douglas; and Drake gazed fixedly up at him, then turned a page of his notebook.

"Douglas Keene," he said, "I got the dope on him, too! Here it is, right here. Douglas Keene, unemployed architect. Worked in a filling station."

Perry grinned behind his hand; but Douglas Keene was annoyed, to put it mildly.

"Who is this man?" he burst out.

"What is all this?"

"It's all right, darling," Wilma assured him. "I told you—he's a sort of investigator."

"Well, I don't care to be investigated!"

He went off in quite a temper, and Wilma ran after him.

"Why do you always ginn up the works?" rebuked Perry.

"But, chief," protested the blunderer, "you told me to get a line on—"

"Let's call on the nurse. Pay the bill."

From Wilma's waffle shop the two proceeded on foot to Olive Street, which was not very far away, and in the hallway of a tall apartment-house Perry scanned a list of tenants framed upon a wall.

Perry went down on one heel between the gun and the dead woman, trying to reconstruct in his mind what had happened in the room.

"Louise de Voe," he said. "That name sounds more like a chorus-girl than a nurse!"

"What are you gonna tell her, chief?" asked Drake.

"She's the one who's going to tell—I hope!"

They ascended to the second floor, and in a wide and carpeted corridor Perry rang the bell of flat 7B. Louise de Voe, dressed rather elaborately in black, rose from a couch in a well-furnished sitting-room and went to the door.

"Who's that?" she called out, with one hand on the latch. "Is that you, Frank?"

No voice replied, and she opened the door.

"Good-afternoon, Miss de Voe," said Perry, raising his hat. "May we come in a moment?"

He brushed past her into the sitting-room, and Paul Drake followed.

"What do you want, Mr. Mason?" she asked, staring at him.

"Just a little information," Perry closed the door. "This is my assistant, Paul Drake. Expecting someone, aren't you?"

"No." There was a note of defiance in her voice.

"Then why did you say 'Is that you, Frank?' when I rang?" He perched on the edge of a gate-leg table, the leaves of which were down, and eyed her shrewdly. "That would be Frank Oafley, wouldn't it?"

"Suppose you tell me what you want to know, Mr. Mason," she said icily. "I have an engagement."

Paul Drake helped himself to a chocolate from an open box on the couch, and she glared at him.

"Oh, make yourself at home, Mr. Whatever-your-name-is!"

Drake grinned and sprawled on the couch. Perry said:

"I'd like to know how that fire started. Have you any idea?"

"No," she snapped. "Have you?"

"Come on, De Voe," bullied Drake, "quit the stallin'! You know plenty, and if you're a smart dame—"

"Now, take it easy, Spudsy, take it easy!" Perry intervened. "I understand from Sam Laxter—"

"Has Sam been saying things against me?" cried the nurse angrily. "If he has he's a liar! Do you want to know something about Sam Laxter?"

"Well, I wouldn't mind a little information."

She knelt on a chair and leaned over the back of it as though it were a sort of rampart.

"If you want to know what I think," she said, "he knows a great deal more about the fire than he'll admit! I think he had something to do with it."

"Why?" challenged Perry.

"There was something very funny going on in the garage. I went down to get something for my patient. The garage was empty, but the engine of Sam's roadster was running."

"When was this?" asked Perry.

"The day before the fire. After a while Sam came in and drove away. But a rubber tube had been connected to his exhaust that led directly to the furnace."

"That's all very interesting," remarked Perry. "Have you told anyone about this?"

"No, I—"

"You may as well tell the truth, Miss de Voe."

"Well, yes," she admitted, "I—I did tell Frank."

"And what did he say?"

"He told me to keep quiet about it—said I'd get into trouble, telling things like that. But if Sam Laxter wants to send you and this detective of July 3rd, 1937.

yours to snoop around, implying I had anything to do with it—"

"I'm not representing Sam," Perry broke in on her flow of words. "I'm the attorney for the cat, Clinker. Sam wanted to poison it. Do you know why?"

"Sam doesn't like cats or old men," she replied. "Says they should all be put out of their misery."

"I see."

She stood up, frowning at him.

"Anything else you want to know, Mr. Mason?"

"Not just now, Miss de Voe," he decided. "You've been a great help. Thanks very much." He moved towards the door. "Come on, Drake!"

The District Attorney Acts

THE District Attorney's office was situated on the first floor of the Municipal Building, in Hill Street, and late in the afternoon of that day Perry invaded it. He did not like Claude Burger, and Claude Burger did not like him, but District Attorneys have their uses, and Perry liked to keep inside the law—if not too far inside it.

Burger was a broad-shouldered man of almost military appearance, and he had a tendency to bark. His face was full, his ears were large, and there were bags of flesh under his eyes. A ragged little moustache added to the general fierceness of his expression.

He was most unwilling to do what Perry wanted, but Perry had a way of surmounting opposition.

"The insurance company found everything in order, and they've paid up," blustered the District Attorney. "Now why should—"

"Insurance companies, my dear Mr. Burger," interrupted Perry in the smoothest of voices, "have one thing in common with District Attorneys—they don't know everything."

Burger bristled, but at that moment a telephone on his desk claimed his attention.

"Hallo!" he snapped. "Oh, Dr. Jacobs? Yes, have him come right in."

A police-sergeant ushered into the room an elderly man with a stoop who looked in no way like a doctor, but was, in fact, a distinguished pathologist and the local coroner.

"Evening, Mr. Burger," he greeted briskly. "Sorry I'm late. I came over as quick as I could. Oh, hallo, Perry! Well, what's it all about?"

"Oh, sit down, doctor," said Burger pointing to a chair. "Mason wants to ask you something about gasoline vapours."

Dr. Jacobs sat, and he looked inquiringly at Perry, who said:

"This is the problem, doctor. A man has been burned to death by a fire, but I have reason to believe that he was murdered by exhaust fumes before the fire started. Could an autopsy determine that?"

Jacobs compressed a pair of very thin lips.

"Yes," he stated, "provided the remains were available."

Perry gazed triumphantly across at Burger.

"How about it, Mr. District Attorney?" he asked silkily. "Do I get the order to exhume the body?"

Burger put his arms on the desk at which he was sitting and leaned forward to address the coroner.

"But wouldn't there be a trace of the poisoning element in any event if the man perished in a fire?" he barked.

"There certainly would," agreed Jacobs.

"Then what do we gain?"

"But that's not the whole story," Perry intervened. "What I want to know, doctor, is this: Could you determine by examination if the man was dead before the fire was started?"

"Yes," said the coroner definitely.

"Would the blisters produced by the fire on the body of a dead man differ from those on the body of a man burned to death?"

"Show me the blisters," was the reply, "and I'll tell you."

"Okay," growled the defeated District Attorney. "You win! The body of Peter Laxter shall be exhumed."

When Perry got back to his own office he put through a call to the Laxter residence, and while he was doing so Mrs. Pixley, the housekeeper, entered the library of that residence with a glass of milk on a tray.

She looked up in surprise at Sam Laxter, who was standing on the top of a step-ladder by some of the bookshelves with an open volume in his hands.

"Here's the milk you ordered," she said.

"All right," Sam Laxter curtly responded. "Put it down somewhere. I'm busy."

"Looking for something?" she inquired, placing the glass on a long oak table.

"I'll ring if I need you again!" he snapped.

"If you're looking for the Koltzdorf diamonds, you're wasting your time," she informed him. "Your cousin Frank's been over this room a dozen times with a fine-tooth comb."

The telephone-bell rang, and she went to the main instrument, which was on the long table.

"Mr. Samuel Laxter's residence," she said.

Perry Mason was on the other end of the line, and he asked to be put through to the caretaker.

"Just a moment." She crossed the room and moved a switch to put the call through to the caretaker's room.

"Someone for Ashton," she explained.

"All right," said Sam Laxter. "You may go."

She went out with the tray, and he immediately descended the ladder and picked up the main telephone so that he could overhear the conversation which followed.

It was a very brief one.

"This is Perry Mason," said Perry. "Is your cat still alive?"

"Yes, Mr. Mason," Ashton replied. "No one ain't poisoned him yet. He's right here with me now."

"You needn't worry any more, Ashton. Sam Laxter won't have time to molest your cat from now on. No, he'll be too busy answering the District Attorney's questions!"

Sam Laxter replaced the instrument he had used, but the caretaker cried out in alarm.

"Hold on! Wait a minute, Mr. Mason. I don't want this thing to go too far!"

He might as well have saved his breath, for the line was dead.

In the region of half-past eleven o'clock that night, a long dark blue saloon swept up the drive past the lantern that hung on a chain from the arm of a post and came to a standstill near the porch of the house.

Perry Mason was the first to descend from it, the District Attorney followed, and Paul Drake joined them on the gravel.

"Who lives here now?" inquired the District Attorney.

"Sam Laxter, Frank Oafley, and three servants," Perry replied, and led the way towards the double-doors of the garage. "Hurry up with those keys, Spudsy!"

"I've got 'em!" Paul Drake held up a bunch of keys.

"Don't shout!" hissed Perry. "Open up!"

The doors were opened and the three stepped into the pitch darkness of the garage.

"Let me have the flashlight," said Perry, and a moment later the beam of an electric torch shone upon several cars in turn and shifted to a wall. "Put that light on over there."

The garage became illuminated, and Paul Drake pointed to one of the cars. "There it is!" he exclaimed. "She said it was a roadster, chief!"

They went over to the two-seater.

"Look, something's been clamped down on this," said Perry, stooping over the end of the exhaust pipe.

The District Attorney looked and nodded; Drake went to the dickey seat and raised its lid.

"Here!" he called excitedly; and they all three looked down at a large coil of rubber tubing.

"Well, Burger," said Perry, "do you still maintain that I've brought you on a wild-goose chase?"

"We'll go and question him right away," decided the District Attorney.

The light was switched off, and they went out from the garage.

"Who's there?" challenged a voice.

"Who's that by the garage?"

The voice came from the direction of the porch, and Perry recognised it.

"Hallo, Mr. Oafley," he said, and walked straight towards that startled young man who was standing at the foot of the steps. "A delightful evening, isn't it?"

"Yes," Oafley managed to say; and then Paul Drake arrived with the District Attorney, and Mason introduced them.

"Hope we haven't alarmed you," he said.

"No, I—I just couldn't figure who it was prowling around."

In the light that shone through the glass panels of the front door the District Attorney noticed that there was blood on Oafley's hands.

"You seem to have scratched your hands rather badly," he said sharply.

"Yes—er—this confounded rosebush was right in my way."

The three men looked round at the rosebush, and they saw that the ground beneath it had been disturbed.

"Rather an odd time to be gardening," remarked Perry, "or were you just digging?"

"Well, as a matter of fact, Mr. Mason," Oafley replied, "I was digging for treasure."

"Treasure? Ah, the Koltsdorf diamonds, no doubt!"

"Yes."

"What?" barked the District Attorney.

"Old man Laxter fell for some diamonds some years ago," Perry explained, "and since the fire there hasn't been a sign of them."

"What made you think they were out here?" rapped the District Attorney.

"Well—er—er—a telegram I received about—about half an hour ago," stammered Oafley, and produced a folded sheet of paper from his coat-pocket. "Here it is."

Perry took the telegram and opened it out. It was addressed to Frank Oafley; it had been dispatched from an office in San Morego, and it ran:

"You will find the Koltsdorf diamonds buried near the rambler rosebush at the south-east corner of the house not more than six inches down.—A FRIEND."

The District Attorney read the message over Perry's shoulder.

"Who sent this?" demanded Perry.

"You know as much about it as I do," was the reply.

"Well, did you find the diamonds?" asked the District Attorney.

"No, but we certainly looked every place else for them."

"I'd like to ask you and your cousin Sam Laxter a few questions."

"Well, all right," said Oafley, none too readily. "Er—let's go into the house."

The Dead Caretaker

IN the library, Braudon, the Laxters' butler, was on the step-ladder at the bookshelves when Frank Oafley conducted the unwelcome visitors into that spacious room. He looked a typical butler, but butlers do not usually perch on step-ladders late at night.

"What are you doing there, Braudon?" rapped Oafley.

"Restoring some of the books to the shelves, sir," was the reply.

"Has Mr. Laxter come in yet?"

"Not yet, sir."

"Well, let me know when he does. In the meantime bring us some whiskey-and-soda, will you?"

The butler descended the ladder, put it away in a corner, and went out from the room.

"You'd better put some iodine on those scratches," Perry suggested, but Frank Oafley looked at his hands and laughed.

"These?" he said. "Oh, they're nothing. We gardeners get used to that sort of thing."

The District Attorney walked over to him.

"Mr. Oafley," he said, "did Miss de Voe inform you of her suspicions about the exhaust fumes?"

"Exhaust fumes?" For a moment the young man seemed aghast. "Miss de Voe?"

"I wouldn't be too innocent if I were you, Mr. Oafley," rasped the District Attorney. "Better tell me all you know!"

Through the open doorway of the library came the sound of the front door being opened, and then the voice of the butler raised in alarm.

"Mr. Laxter! Why, what's happened, sir?"

"It's all right," responded Sam Laxter's voice. "Don't be excited. I just had a smash-up—nothing serious."

"The District Attorney and Perry Mason are here to see you, sir."

"What for?"

Perry began a story which was to grip the attention and the imagination of all who listened to it.

Perry Mason strode out into the hall with the District Attorney close behind him. Sam Laxter's face was cut and bruised, and his hands were bleeding. "We're trying to determine, Mr. Laxter," said Perry sternly, "if you know who murdered your grandfather. I suggest, Mr. Burger, that you quiz Mr. Laxter at once."

He beckoned to Drake, who was hovering in the background, and as Sam Laxter went into the library with the District Attorney he said in a low voice:

"Call Wilma Laxter on the 'phone. I want to speak to her."

Drake went to a telephone on a side table under the stairs, and then the door-bell rang and the butler hurried out from the dining-room with a tray in his hands.

"Never mind," Perry said to him. "I'll answer it. You'd better take those drinks into the library—Mr. Laxter looks as though he needs one."

He went to the front door and opened it. Bertrand Shuster was standing on the porch, about to ring again, and he scowled up at his tall fellow attorney.

"What are you doing here?" he blared.

"Roller-skating," replied Perry flippanantly. "Come in!"

The irascible little man stepped into the hall and the door was closed.

"Where's Sam?" he demanded fiercely. "Where's my client? What's going on here?"

"Step right this way, counsellor," said Perry, with a wave of his hand and a mocking bow. "Calm yourself!"

Shuster strode into the library, glared at the District Attorney, and thrust himself between his client and that official.

"I'll do the talking!" he shouted. "They've exhumed the body. They're trying to frame you, Sam. I'll take care of everything!"

He shook a puny fist in the District Attorney's face.

"What have you been trying to do with my client?" he raged—and became aware of his client's disordered appearance. "What's happened to you? Has he been trying to give you the third degree? This is not the Middle Ages, you know. You can't torture your witnesses!"

"Calm yourself, Mr. Shuster!" barked the District Attorney. But the little man was not to be calmed.

"I saw everything!" he stormed. "I was passing the cemetery—I hid behind a tombstone—I saw them exhume the body!"

Paul Drake slipped up to Perry and whispered, and Perry went out to the telephone in the hall.

"Hallo, Wilma!" he said. "This is Perry Mason speaking."

"Oh, I'm so glad you've rung up!" Wilma's voice agitatedly responded. "I've been trying to reach you everywhere. I can't talk very well here, but something terrible has happened. Can you please come over?"

"Why, yes," Perry assured her. "Gladly! I'll be with you as soon as ever I can."

Shuster was holding forth when he returned to the library.

"Why don't you question Mr. Mason's client, the caretaker? Why bother Mr. Laxter? Why don't you

"Oh, shut up!" roared the exasperated District Attorney, and he turned to Perry. "What's all this about Koltzsdorf diamonds and cats, and a missing million dollars?"

"It is a bit confusing, isn't it?" said Perry. "Why don't you send for Ashton?"

"Mr. Laxter's been ringing for him," July 3rd, 1927.

the District Attorney replied, "but he doesn't answer."

"He's usually somewhere at the back of the house. Let's go and find him. Come on, Drake!"

Brandon, the butler, led the way to the back of the hall and down several stairs to the servants' quarters.

"That's the door, right there," he said, pointing.

Perry knocked on the door, but there was no answer, and he and the District Attorney entered the very plainly furnished room and looked round it.

It appeared to be untenanted, but a soft-felt hat projected from the edge of the coverlet on the bed under the narrow window, and Perry swept over to the bed and raised the coverlet.

"Ashton!" he said, staring blankly at the District Attorney after he had looked down at a distorted face. "Dead!"

There were muddy paw-marks on the dead caretaker's face and upon the coverlet. The District Attorney saw them.

"Say, look at those tracks!" he exclaimed. "Right over the poor man's face!"

Perry lowered the coverlet and rubbed his chin reflectively.

"That's very interesting," he said. "Do you see any cats around here?"

"Probably jumped out again," suggested Burger, jerking a thumb at the narrow window. "Hi, where are you off to now?"

"You'll have plenty to do till I come back," said Perry, at the door. "I've a sudden desire to consume waffles."

"Waffles?" The District Attorney looked bewildered.

"Yes, waffles," said Drake from the passage outside the door, and he followed his employer up into the hall and out from the house to the dark blue saloon in the drive.

There was comparatively little traffic on the roads at that time of night, and Wilma's shop was reached in considerably less than half an hour. Drake was left at the wheel of the car, and Perry rang the bell at the side door of the shop. Wilma opened it almost immediately and conducted him to a pleasant little sitting-room upstairs.

"Sorry I'm late," he said on the way. "Oh, I'm so glad you're here!" she declared fervently.

"You said you were in trouble. What is it?"

The door of the sitting-room was opened, and a black cat on the hearth-rug sprang up, spat, and scuttled away under a chair.

"Great Caesar's ghost!" exclaimed Perry. "What was that?"

"That's Clinker," said Wilma.

"Clinker? Well, how on earth did he get here?"

"Douglas brought him." She sat down in a chair, and he saw that she had been crying.

"Tell me what's been happening," he said, perching on the edge of a table opposite her.

"Well, Ashton rang me up this afternoon on the 'phone. He was worried about the cat, and something you'd said about the District Attorney, and he asked me if I'd take care of Clinker for a few days. I said all right."

"How did Douglas get mixed up in it?"

"Well, he was here at the time," she explained, "so I gave him my key to the house—I still had one, although I'm not living there—and I asked him to go over and pick up the cat."

"What time was this?"

"Doug left about ten, and not very long afterwards he 'phoned me from the house that Ashton wasn't there. As a matter of fact, he said that everyone was out, and he asked me what to do. I told him to wait a while, and then, if Ashton didn't come back, he'd better bring the cat here, anyway. About a quarter-past eleven he brought the cat here."

"And then where did he go?" asked Perry.

"I don't know," she faltered. "He said good-bye and left."

"Are you sure he phoned you from the Laxter home?"

"Yes. He said he was using the extension in Ashton's bed-room."

"I've just come from that bed-room," said Perry gravely. "Ashton has been murdered."

"Murdered?" She rose from her chair in horror. "Oh, Mr. Mason, you don't think Doug could have done it? You surely don't think—"

"It isn't what I think, my dear," Perry said gently, "but what are the police going to think? Where is Douglas now?"

"I—I don't know," she sobbed.

"That's why I asked you to come here. You—you see, he rang me up again a little later. He seemed terribly excited, and—and sort of incoherent. He said something about a murder, and told me not to worry and to trust him."

She dropped back into the chair, weeping bitterly, and Perry was considerably moved by her distress.

"Now, now, now, please stop crying," he said. "You don't think he did it, do you?"

"No," she gulped.

"Neither do I. Now, listen. If Clinker is found here you're a cinch to be dragged into this."

There was a basket in a corner of the room, and it was open. Obviously the cat had been brought to the girl in the basket, and he prevailed upon her to coax the creature into her arms and put it back into the basket.

"Come on, cat," he said, when the lid had been fastened, "you're going for a ride! Now, Wilma, you answer no questions and you tell no one that I have been here. Do you understand?"

She nodded miserably, and he picked up the basket by its handle.

"Oh, by the way, did you mention the Koltzsdorf diamonds to Douglas?" he questioned.

"Yes," she admitted. "We talked about them. He had a theory that Ashton probably had them—I mean I—I thought Ashton had them, but he thought Miss de Voc might know more than she told."

"Miss de Voc?"

"Y-yes."

The black cat began to struggle inside the basket, making frantic noises.

"Maybe you're right, Clinker," said Mason. "Well, don't worry about a thing, Wilma. You'll hear from me."

He went off with the cat, and Paul Drake drove him to an apartment-house in Court Street, where Della Street lived in a cosy little flat, and was fast asleep in bed.

She was awakened by the ringing of the door-bell, and with mules on her bare feet and a silken wrap over her pyjamas she admitted her employer to a small but elegant sitting-room.

"Good-evening, Della!" he said.

"Good-evening my eye!" she retorted, staring at the basket from which prolonged meows issued.

"Do you know it's nearly two o'clock in the morning? What on earth have you got there?"

"Love brings a gift," said he, and with a flourish he thrust the basket into her arms.

"Have you gone mad?" she cried indignantly. "Did you wake me up just to bring me a cat?"

"This is Clunker," he informed her. "Keep the beast here and see that he doesn't get out."

"But why—what can I—"

"I'll tell you all about it at the office in the morning. I have many things to do, my pet. Nighty-night! Take care of Clunker!"

He went out from the flat, and he closed the door behind him.

Bloodstains!

FROM the apartment-house in Court Street Perry was conveyed swiftly in the dark blue saloon to the Victory Arms apartment-house in Olive Street. Paul Drake was left once more to doze over the wheel of the car, and Perry ascended the stairs to the second floor.

He rang the bell of Louise de Voe's flat again and again without obtaining any sort of response from within, and then he tried the handle of the door. To his surprise the door was unlocked and opened easily.

He stepped into the sitting-room where he and Drake had interviewed the nurse, and his eyes widened at what he saw. A broken crutch was lying on the pale blue carpet near the gate-leg table, plainly visible in the light of a tall standard lamp, and not far from the broken crutch Louise de Voe was lying upon her face, an overturned chair beside her feet.

Between the jet-black head of the nurse and a leg of the couch a six-chambered revolver attracted Perry's attention. He went down on one heel between the gun and the dead woman, trying to reconstruct in his mind what had happened in the room.

The presence of the broken crutch baffled him, however, and after a while he got to his feet and went to a little bureau upon which a telephone was standing. The top drawer of the bureau was open, and he looked down into it; then he picked up the telephone, dialed the operator at the exchange, and asked to be put through to Police Headquarters, Homicide Bureau.

"A woman's been murdered in Apartment 7B, Victory Arms apartment-house," he informed a startled sergeant, and with that he put down the instrument and went out from the flat.

From a flat farther along the corridor sounds of merriment were issuing, and beyond the front door of that flat a wooden seat was set against the wall of the corridor, under a window. Perry tiptoed to the seat, took off his hat and coat, and flung them on the seat, ruffled his hair, and went and rang the door-bell of the flat.

The door was opened by a very fat man in his shirt-sleeves, and Perry had a perfectly good view of what appeared to be a poker-party, seated round a table and making a lot of noise.

"Say, fellows," he said with a prodigious yawn, "how about piping down so a guy can get some sleep?"

"Oh, I'm sorry, buddy!" apologised the fat man. "I thought we were bein' pretty quiet. You must have heard the celebration next door!"

"Celebration?" yawned Perry.

"Yeah. Dame next door got married. A couple o' the boys here witnessed the ceremony."

"What did you do," asked Perry, "rope the happy bridegroom into a poker game on his wedding night?"

The men inside the room laughed, and Perry laughed with them.

"Gosh, no!" chuckled the man at the door. "We don't even know who he was."

NEXT WEEK'S BIG PROGRAMME!

BOB LIVINGSTON.

—IN—

"THE MOUNTIES ARE COMING!"

It was not for vengeance alone that the masked rider struck at Jason Burr's sinister organisation. He was out to smash a tyrant's ambition to build an empire beyond the Rockies. Don't miss the opening chapters of this thrill-packed serial of the early West, when California was a pawn on the chess-board of a scheming nation.

"LADY FROM NOWHERE"

Because she happens to be present when a murder is committed by a notorious crook, Polly Dunlop is afraid for her own life and flees from New York. She is befriended by a young reporter, but the crook's hirelings eventually track her down—with sensational consequences. A thriller distinctly out of the ordinary, starring Mary Astor and Charles Quigley.

"PARADISE EXPRESS"

The old railroad was in the hands of the receiver, for a motor-transport company by modern methods and a great deal of underhand scheming had taken away most of its trade. Finally, the railroad's fate rests on a race with the transport company. A gripping tale, starring Grant Withers and Dorothy Appleby.

"Guess they've calmed down now," remarked one of the players. "But there's been racket enough next door."

"Well, listen, fellows," said Perry wheedlingly, "keep the party quiet so I can get some sleep."

"Okay, pal," nodded the fat man. "Sorry we disturbed you."

Perry turned away and the door was closed. He smoothed his hair with his hand, put on his coat and hat, and sped to the stairs.

Ten minutes later the dark blue saloon had entered Acacia Avenue, a thoroughfare completely devoid of trees and lined with rather shabby buildings possessing basements and areas. Paul Drake was no longer sleepy; Perry Mason's sensational story had roused him very completely.

"I found the janitor," Perry said, "and he gave me the low-down. Sam Laxter and Frank Oafley were there—he knows them, and he saw them go into her apartment."

"So one of 'em killed her, eh?" suggested Drake.

"Take it easy!" rebuked Perry.

"What about the caretaker's crutch? Douglas Keene was there, too."

Drake braked abruptly.

"One-seventeen!" he exclaimed. "That's the number, chief!"

Perry got out from the car, crossed the pavement, mounted worn steps, entered a bare hallway, and rang a bell beside a door which bore the word "Manager" upon its upper panel.

After some little period of waiting, a grey-haired man appeared at the door, scantily clad and not by any means in the best of tempers.

"What do you want?" he demanded surlily.

"Does Douglas Keene live here?" asked Perry.

"Yes, but this ain't no time for visitin'!"

The door would have been slammed in Perry's face, but he thrust an arm against it.

"Now, just a minute!" he said imperiously. "I'm Perry Mason, insurance attorney. It's very important that I see him."

"First door at the end of the hall," said the manager.

"Thank you."

The door was slammed, and Paul Drake stood grinning beside his employer.

"He won't worry us any more!" he rejoiced. "Question is, can we get in?"

They went together along the hallway, past the stairs, and Perry had no difficulty whatever in opening the first door they came upon there. Lights were switched on, and they crossed a tiny living-room which seemed to be in perfect order and entered a bed-room.

There Perry proceeded to ransack the drawers of a dressing-table, but his companion drifted over to a wash-basin provided with running water.

"Look, chief!" he cried excitedly. "Bloodstains!"

"Don't touch 'em!"

Perry joined his assistant beside the basin and stared at some red stains on one of the two taps above it, then made straight for a wardrobe cupboard near the bed. On a suit hanging from a rail inside the cupboard bloodstains were almost too plentiful. He backed out from the cupboard with a coat to examine the garment in a better light.

"Huh!" he grunted.

Drake jerked a thumb at a framed photograph of Wilma, standing on the dressing-table.

"Poor kid!" he exclaimed. "She thought he was such a nice guy, too!"

Perry dropped the coat on a chair.

"Drake," he said, "there's a phone out in the hall. Call Wilma, and see if she's heard from Keene since I left there."

"Right," said Drake.

"And don't tell her about these stains!"

"Okay, chief."

Drake went out to find the telephone, and Perry was looking about the room when a voice in the doorway made him jump.

"Can I help you, mister?"

It was the manager, now invested in a dark brown dressing-gown and wearing slippers.

"Yes," said Perry. "What time did Keene leave?"

"I don't know." The manager shook his grey head. "What's happened?"

Perry did not answer that question.

"Did he have any visitors to-day?" he asked.

"Yes, there was a man called here late this evening."

"What did he look like?"

"Gosh, mister, I don't know!" exploded the manager. "I've got twenty rooms here, with people comin' all the time!"

"Anybody else call?"

"Well—er——"

"Come on now! Think hard—think hard!"

The manner Perry so often used in court when cross-examining witnesses had its effect.

"Well—er—Miss de Voe called," the manager remembered.

"De Voe?"

Perry was astonished.

"Yes, but that was earlier. Left word for Keene to call her. When he got the message he left at once."

"Did you see Keene come back?"

"No, I was asleep."

"I see. Well, if you hear from Keene tell him to 'phone me immediately."

"Yes, sir." The manager took the card Perry proffered and followed him out from the rooms. "Is Mr. Keene in a jam of some sort?" he asked.

"I'll say he is!" Perry replied.

"You'll probably have the police here in five minutes. But don't tell 'em I was here. Understand?"

Paul Drake was in the act of restoring a receiver to the prongs of a telephone on the wall when they reached the front of the hallway, but it was not till he and Perry were back in the car that anything was said.

"Well, what did you find out?"

Perry asked then.

"He was there, chief, but he only called in to say good-bye. The girl said he was very excited, but wouldn't give any explanation. She tried to hold him there, but he ducked."

A siren shrieked in the distance.

"Not bad for Burger!" commented Perry. "Here come the police now! We'd better find Keene before he does! Step on it, Drake!"

Shuster Loses a Client

IN the morning papers there were front-page headlines variously describing what most of them called a "Sensation in the Laxter Case," and there was a statement to the effect that District Attorney Burger had issued a warrant for the arrest of Douglas Keene, charging him with the murder of Charles Ashton and Louise de Voe.

Perry Mason's name was mentioned in the "Dispatch" as attorney to the dead caretaker's cat, and a parson was waiting to see Perry when Paul Drake arrived at the office. He gave his name as the Reverend Thomas Stillwell, and Drake conducted him into Perry's private room.

There he waited for more than half an hour while Drake struggled with a crossword puzzle and answered the telephone once or twice. Finally, the parson looked at his watch and rose.

"When will Mr. Mason be back?" he asked. "I have some matters to—"

"He's on his way now," Drake interrupted. "That was him on the 'phone a coupla minutes ago. He told me to hold you here if I had to knock you stiff!"

"I'll wait," said the parson.

"You're wise," said Drake.

And then footsteps sounded in the corridor, and Perry walked in with Della Street.

"What a break, chief!" cried Drake. "Here's the guy that married De Voe to Frank Oafley last night!"

"No!" exclaimed Perry, who had not telephoned at all.

"Yes, Mr. Mason," confirmed the Rev. Thomas Stillwell, bowing, "I performed the ceremony, and when I read in the papers this morning of this terrible tragedy to the bride, I thought perhaps I could give some information."

"You bet your sweet life you can!" said Perry. "Take this down, Della!"

July 3rd, 1937.

Della seated herself at the desk with pencil and notebook; Perry faced the elderly parson.

"At what time were you at the apartment-house?" he questioned.

"About ten o'clock," was the reply.

"Were there any witnesses to the ceremony?"

"Oh, yes, Mr. Mason—two gentlemen from the next-door flat. They were playing poker. Their names—"

"Never mind their names! What time did you leave the apartment-house?"

"I can tell you that with great accuracy. It was exactly ten-seventeen when I stepped into my car. You see, I had a little accident—er—a crumpled fender—which I reported to my insurance company."

"Was this in front of the apartment-house?" asked Perry.

"Yes, Mr. Mason. I was parked directly behind another car, and in pulling out I damaged my fender and scratched some paint off the other car."

"I see. Did you notice this other car?"

"Yes," nodded Stillwell, "it was a black touring car. It was empty, but I got the name of the owner from the licence. Now, let me see!" He turned over some pages of a tiny notebook. "Here it is! Watson Clammert."

"Watson Clammert?" exclaimed Drake. "Why, that's Ashton's half-brother!"

"Did you get the licence number?" asked Perry.

"Oh, naturally—naturally! Here it is!"

Perry copied the number on to a slip of paper and handed the slip to Drake.

"Call the Motor Vehicle Department," he instructed, "and find out where the car was bought and where it's insured—and you'd better hop down to headquarters and get that information I asked you about."

Drake went out, and Perry turned to his visitor.

"Mr. Stillwell," he said, "I can't thank you sufficiently for all this information. By the way, I may have to subpoena you as a witness at the trial of my client, Mr. Douglas Keene. Will you be willing to testify?"

"By all means," declared the parson; and Perry thanked him again and ushered him forth into the corridor, while Della disappeared into the outer office to transcribe the notes she had made.

In less than three minutes she was back in Perry's room.

"Sam Laxter, Frank Oafley, and Mr. Shuster," she announced. "Got your gun ready?"

"I'll see them out there," Perry decided, and followed her out just in time to prevent the fiery little lawyer from bursting in upon him.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Shuster?" he inquired.

"My client tells me you're libelling him!" was the fierce reply.

Perry looked at Sam Laxter, and that unpleasant legatee blurted:

"You said over the 'phone yesterday that I was going to be accused of murdering my grandfather!"

"I didn't speak to you over the 'phone yesterday," said Perry.

"You spoke to Ashton—I listened in."

"Oh, you did that? Well, since both Ashton and Miss de Voe are no longer with us, it's going to be difficult to prove that I said any such thing, isn't it?"

"It's a lie!" shouted Sam Laxter. "An invention of yours!"

"Not mine," disclaimed Perry, and turned to the cousin. "You shared Miss de Voe's suspicions, didn't you, Oafley, and discussed them with her?"

"Well, yes," Frank Oafley reluctantly admitted. "She—she told me about the tubing in the garage, but I couldn't believe it. I—I—"

"You want to know what I think?" Sam Laxter roared at him. "I think you married her because you each had too much on the other, and you were afraid one of you might be called on to testify!"

"What are you trying to insinuate?" howled Oafley. "You were in the garage! I saw you!"

Little Shuster thrust himself hastily between the two cousins.

"Now, boys, be careful!" he cried. "Let me do the—"

"What about the Koltsdorf diamonds?" Sam Laxter bellowed over the top of the attorney's bald head. "I suppose you didn't order the chauffeur to follow Ashton all the time? You thought he had them, didn't you?"

"Mr. Laxter, please!" implored Shuster, turning from one to the other. "And Mr. Oafley, remember I'm representing you two gentlemen."

"You're not representing me!" snorted Oafley. "I'm through with you! I'm getting another lawyer! You're a shyster!"

He strode out from the office, leaving the door wide open, and Perry smiled sardonically at Sam.

"You know, Mr. Laxter," he purred, "I'm inclined to agree with your cousin in that respect. Oh, good-bye, counsellor!"

Shuster had made for the door, very red in the face, and his remaining client followed him. Perry marched Della back into his own room, chuckling delightedly.

"What a break!" he exulted. "We've got 'em fighting among themselves!"

Ten minutes later, Drake rang up from police headquarters to say that he had just seen the autopsy surgeon's report concerning Ashton, and that it stated the caretaker was killed at approximately ten-thirty.

"Ten-thirty, eh?" mused Perry, after he had hung up.

"And Douglas Keene was out at the house from ten till eleven!" exclaimed Della.

"He certainly was."

"Well, that looks pretty bad for him, doesn't it? What are you looking so pleased about?"

"Della," replied Perry impressively, "I'm thinking about the caretaker's cat!"

The Arrest of Douglas Keene

THE District Attorney reached his office, on the first floor of the Municipal Building, that morning to find half a dozen newspaper reporters in possession of it. He was tired and irritable, and he tried to get rid of them, but they clamoured for what they termed "the doped on Keene."

"We haven't found him yet," growled the District Attorney. "But we will!"

"Yes?" said one of the reporters, with a wink for his colleagues. "And have you got a case against him?"

"Tight as a drum! He was seen leaving De Voe's apartment. My men searched his rooms and found blood-stained clothing, and the kid ran away."

A telephone-bell rang, and he spoke into an instrument on his desk.

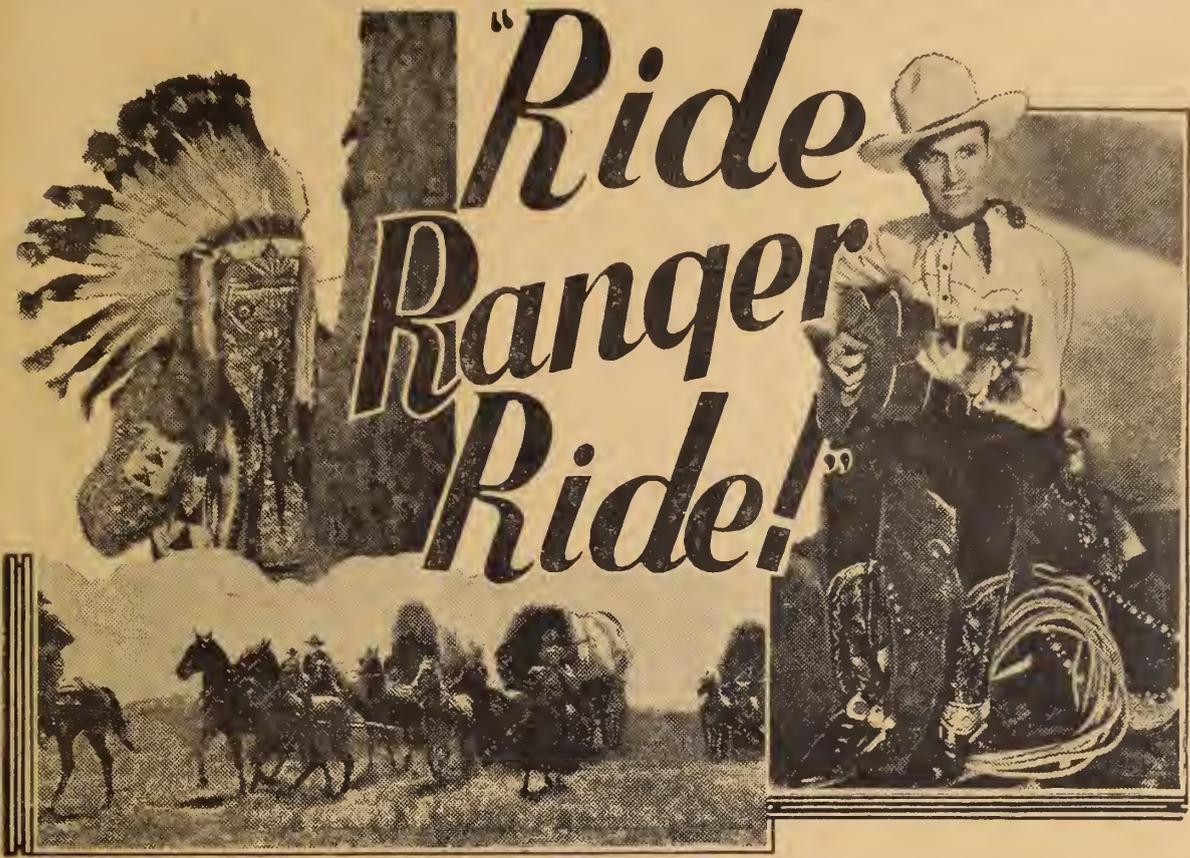

"Holcomb?" he said. "Oh, yes, send him in!"

Detective-Sergeant Holcomb was not

Through a difference of opinion with his colonel, a cavalry officer obtains a commission with the Texas Rangers. A rascally half-breed plans to pillage a wagon-train. Can the young ranger save it from a terrible fate? Starring Gene Autry

"Ride Ranger Ride!"

The Rangers Join the Cavalry

LIUTENANT GENE AUTRY felt very proud as he rode with his men along the trail. The authorities had decided that as there was peace in the United States it was not necessary to employ so many Texas Rangers. Therefore the men were all discharged, and several squadrons of United States cavalry were sent to take over their work. The lieutenant, knowing the Indians, felt sure that the disbanding of the rangers was a grave mistake. He had done such good work that he had been offered a commission in the cavalry. Not wishing to become a trapper or a guide he accepted the commission. The reason for his pride was the action of his own comrades. A dozen of them on being discharged had applied to join the cavalry, and had been accepted as scouts.

Now they were riding to Fort Adobe to report for duty to Colonel Summerall, and as they rode they sang a pleasant but for them a melancholy air:

Ride, ranger, ride!"
 You have conquered every foe
 Since a hundred years ago.
 Ride, ranger, ride.
 For old rangers who are gone
 You are pledged to carry on.
 Ride, ranger, ride!"

Naturally, the cavalry looked disparagingly at the lieutenant and his scouts when they rode through the heavy wooden gates into Fort Adobe, but they were soon to find it wise not to make any disparaging remarks, because these one-time rangers were quite fearless, easy to anger, and great horsemen.

They had not been in the fort many days when Dixie Summerall, the colonel's daughter, arrived. Gene decided that this dark-haired girl was as sweet as she was pretty. The handsome, swaggering Lieutenant Cameron informed Autry that he was as good as engaged to the young lady. Gene just smiled, because he felt sure Cameron was lying.

To celebrate the arrival of Dixie a ball was held in the mission hall, and both lieutenants asked Dixie if they could escort her. The bright-eyed young mischief said that both officers were riding in the horse race round the walls of the fort, and the first home should be her escort.

Lieutenant Cameron laughed to himself because he thought this would be easy, but he did not know that Gene's horse Champion was one of the fleetest animals in Texas.

On the parade ground the next morning Colonel Summerall addressed his men.

"I wish to explain why the Government has brought the United States cavalry here to Fort Adobe. We're not here to fight the Indians as has been the custom in the past, but to make friends with them."

"He don't know about Redskins," whispered one ex-ranger to another.

"Our orders from Washington are to sign an agreement with the Indians, and we do not expect any trouble." The colonel paused. "But we do want your co-operation in abstaining from antagonising the Indians. So if there are any Indians present at the race this afternoon, hold out the hand of friendship."

The race proved a most grueling and thrilling event. There were forty entries, but only two officers competed, and they were the first to complete the course. Lieutenant Cameron was a disgruntled loser because he had been so certain of victory. All the way he had been in front of Autry, but in the last mile his rival had begun to gain. A quarter of a mile from home it was neck and neck, and then Champion just seemed to stretch his mighty limbs and romp home an easy winner.

The colonel's daughter presented a beautiful set of saddlery to the winner, and with a blush said she would be pleased to accept his escort. The gruff old colonel patted him on the back and said that considering he had been a ranger he rode uncommonly well.

A lanky, bewhiskered settler was led forward by a sergeant.

"Sorry to bust in on ye, connel," mumbled the man. "But Injuns just stole some of my hosses."

"It must be one of Tavibo's renegade bands," reported the sergeant. "Anybody hurt?"

"Yes, suh," Proffer grinned proudly. "Some of them Injuns."

The colonel snorted.

"That's the way you Texans keep 'em on the warpath," he raged. "Now the policy of the Government is to avoid hostilities. Lieutenant Cameron, you will take Scout Jones here and a squad of your men. Persuade that band to come to the post for council."

"Pardon me, sir." There was a slight smile on Cameron's thin lips. "May I suggest, sir, that Lieutenant Antry and some of his men go along also. Being acquainted with the country, they would be of considerable help."

"Major Crosby," said the Governor, after a pause, "I authorise you to reorganise the Texas Rangers at once!"

"Scout Jones is very competent, sir," hurriedly spoke Gene, not wishing to be deprived of escorting the colonel's daughter. "And I'm afraid we couldn't be of very much help."

"On the contrary I think Lieutenant Cameron's suggestion is a good one," retorted the colonel, who was a very thorough, very genuine and very stubborn soldier. "Lieutenant Autry, you will take six of your men and accompany Lieutenant Cameron."

"Nice work, Cameron!" whispered Autry, as he saw the mocking grin of his rival, but he had some consolation in the angry frown that Dixie Summerall bestowed on the cavalry officer.

After two hours' riding the small party came to country that was heavily wooded and very hilly.

"Well, boys, we're heading into the Peace River Country now," grinned Rufe, who had been one of the finest guides attached to the rangers. "That river should have been called Trouble."

Proffer was with the party, and he indicated the land that had been allotted to him. His shack was just over the side of the hill and close to the river.

"My plan is to spread out and surprise the Indians," stated Cameron.

"Surprise them?" Gene gazed at the officer incredulously. "With about a dozen men and little reserve ammunition."

"We're only carrying regulation supplies," haughtily replied Cameron.

From the shelter of the trees three Indians watched the approach of the soldiers. The Indians clutched long-barrelled rifles, but their leader, who was lighter of hue, restrained them.

"The long knives hunt for stolen horses. When I give the signal—surround them—fight—"

The two Indians disappeared, leaving their leader to glower venomously down at the cursed white men. He turned as his two warriors returned, and they signed to him that his orders had been sent to the Indian braves hiding in nearby ravines. When the cavalry troop had entered a narrow ravine, then did Tavibo and his two warriors ride forth from the woods and make signals with their arms.

"Injuns!" cried Rufe. "Comanches, but they're making peace signs."

Lieutenant Cameron halted the troop.

"They want to pow-wow," said Gene.

"But I think it's a war party."

"What makes you think so?"

Gene touched his cheeks.

"War paint."

Cameron twisted his lips into his habitual sneer.

"War paint is hardly reason to mistrust their peace signs. Besides, there's only three of them."

"Lieutenant, when you see Injuns, be careful," warned old Rufe. "And when you don't see Injuns, be more careful."

"Tell them to advance and we'll hold a council with them," ordered Cameron.

"I think we're walking into a trap."

"That's my responsibility, Autry!"

cried Cameron, dismounting. "We three will hold council, and you men stay here. Remember, no firing unless I give the order."

Cameron, Autry and Rufe walked towards the Indians, who were holding their guns above their heads. Autry was on the watch for any treachery. The Indians dismounted and hitched their horses to a stunted pine. Autry noticed that two of the Indians had both hands holding their rifles above their heads, but one, who was the leader, used only one hand.

"You wish to hold pow-wow with us," began Cameron as each side halted within six paces of each other. "I am prepared to—"

That was as far as Cameron got because Autry had seen the leader's hand and the mirror that it contained. Out flashed his gun and the mirror in Tavibo's hand was smashed to pieces. The two Indians fell to their knees, but as they fired so did Gene and Rufe.

Tavibo sped like an arrow for his horse and scrambled into the saddle.

Safe among the trees Tavibo glanced back.

"One soldier—too quick—shoot—bad medicine." Two war-painted braves appeared. "No fight to-day. Soldier, one-time ranger, know my signal. But for him our belts would be heavy with scalps—Tavibo will not forget ranger." One Indian brave was dead and the other badly wounded, but the troop lost one man, who toppled from the saddle—he had been hit by a stray bullet when the Indians had fired wildly. One can imagine the kind of report that Lieutenant Cameron made to his colonel on getting back to the fort, with the result that next morning Autry and Rufe were for the orderly-room. The colonel read out a statement about preserving peace with the Indians, talking of the orders that he had given, and then listening to Cameron's report. At the end he turned to Autry.

"In the exchange of shots Trooper John Davis was killed. According to Lieutenant Cameron's report, you opened fire against the strict orders of your senior officer. Is that true?"

"Yes, sir."

"And you, Scout Jones, did you fire?"

"I always fires, cunnel, when I see Injuns," boldly answered Rufe Jones.

"That's why I stays so healthy."

"What have you to say for yourself, Autry?"

"I'm positive the Indians were trying to draw us into an ambush," was the answer. "I only shot to prevent the one with the mirror from giving the signal."

"Did you see the Indians in ambush?" the colonel asked Cameron.

"No, sir."

"Didn't have to see 'em, cunnel." Rufe spoke up. "Injuns don't carry mirrors to see how purty they are."

The colonel ignored these remarks, and glanced at his orderly sergeant.

"Bring in Duval, the interpreter, and the Indian prisoner," he ordered.

Duval was a tall, pallid-faced man of middle-age. Autry thought the interpreter looked a cunning and unpleasant half-breed.

"You sent for me, colonel?"

The colonel pointed to the prisoner.

"Ask him his name and what was their purpose in stopping my men."

There was much jabbering, which both Autry and Jones wished they could have understood.

"He says his name is Bobtail Horse," stated Duval. "That he and two other Indians had just killed a buffalo and wanted to trade some meat for sugar and coffee with the white men."

"Injuns don't go out hunting buffalo in war paint," cried Scout Jones.

"Scout Jones apparently isn't well acquainted with such peaceful people as the Comanches, colonel," Duval said in oily tones. "I've known Bobtail Horse a long long—very good Indian."

"Well, if he's a good Indian, maybe he'll tell us who's supplying Tavibo and his men with cavalry rifles and ammunition?" demanded Gene.

"We have no proof of that, Lieutenant Autry," cried the colonel. "I am not interested in groundless suspicions." The colonel nodded at Duval. "Tell him that he may go. Nothing this time will be said about him carrying a rifle and ammunition."

When the Indian had gone the colonel stared at Autry and the scout with harsh expression.

"Lieutenant Autry, I find you guilty of jeopardising our treaty negotiations with the Indians, and of rank disobedience to orders. And of being the direct cause of the death of Trooper John Davis. I cite you for general court-martial, and guarantee that you will be reduced to the rank of trooper. As for you, Scout Jones, I fine you one month's pay."

"That's okay, eunel," grinned the scout impudently. "I don't need the five dollars, anyhow."

Lieutenant Cameron was then told to march the two accused out of the orderly-room. Autry was on parole pending trial.

The colonel glanced at Duval.

"Personally I think the accusations of Autry are unfounded, but I wish you'd keep your eyes and ears open, Duval, and see if anyone is selling arms and ammunition to the Indians."

"I'll do that, colonel."

"And because of the large wagon train of settlers and supplies due during the month, I think it would be advisable to sign the peace treaty with the Indians as quickly as possible, and thus we'll assure the safe arrival of the wagon train."

Duval bowed.

"I'll speak to the chiefs, colonel, and arrange a meeting." The half-breed interpreter's eyes had a curious gleam when he left the colonel.

Rangers Once More

THE two who had been before the colonel for disobedience of orders paused in one of the corridors to discuss the business.

"I ain't natchally suspicious, but there's something mighty queer 'bout that Duval coyote."

"Certainly he did seem glad when the colonel let Bobtail Horse go."

"You bet he did!" Rufe snorted indignantly. "And I don't know Comanches. Why, dang his hide, I cut my teeth on a Comanche tomahawk!"

Frog Burnette, who had served under Autry in the rangers, hastened along the corridor as he saw the two talking together. He had been in many adventures with Gene. A big, plump, honest fellow was Frog.

"I heard the colonel let Bobtail Horse go," Frog said, with a glance round to see he was not overheard. "And that pesky Redskin went into the cantina."

"That's Duval's place, isn't it?" questioned Autry.

His two friends nodded.

"Round up some of the boys."

"We gonna grab him?" Rufe's eyes glistened at prospect of a fight.

"No, but we're gonna take a look around," answered Gene.

In a private room up some wooden stairs Duval sat at a table that was laden with papers. Before him stood Bobtail Horse.

"Listen closely to Tavibo," spoke Duval. "In the next moon many wagons come to fort carrying guns and supplies. White colonel wants to sign treaty with Indians. You tell chief's Tavibo says we must sign, then the colonel's eyes will be closed and he will leave the wagons poorly guarded."

"Bobtail Horse understand," the Indian answered, and nodded his head. "Tavibo wise."

"Wait," imperiously ordered Duval.

He had heard sounds that indicated some more customers in the cantina. The half-breed's eyes narrowed as he saw Gene and his two companions. He went to a curtained recess and held it back. "Go this way."

Duval from the top of the stairs watched the three men seat themselves and order drinks, then one of the string band handed over his guitar to Gene and asked for one of their famous camp-fire songs. The half-breed gave a slight smile—this would give Bobtail Horse plenty of time to get away from Fort Adobe. Back in his room he rang a small bell, and when a servant appeared gave orders that he wished to see two people immediately. Not many seconds later a fair-haired, bull-necked man and a fair-haired girl appeared. Jack was manager and chucker-out at the cantina, whilst Goldie was the chief of the dance girls. Duval whispered across the table how he wanted a suspicious ranger removed.

Goldie went downstairs and sauntered towards Gene's table.

"Hallo, soldier—how about a drink?"

"No, thanks," said Gene.

"Oh, come on, just one!" Goldie wound her arms round his neck.

"I'm sorry, I don't drink," said Gene, removing her arms.

"Say, that's my girl!" rasped Jack, pushing people to one side, and hit Gene full in the jaw.

Gene Autry crashed full length, but he was up like a flash, and the grin was wiped from the bully's face when a right thudded to his jaw.

"Go on—hit him!" encouraged Frog.

And Gene did with all his force. Jack slumped in a heap, got to his feet and went down before a furious hail of blows. Duval watched with angry eyes from the top of the stairs. He had hoped to see Autry beaten to a pulp, but it was his man Jack who was getting the licking. With a curse he took out a thin "throwing-knife," and drew back his arm to throw the knife.

"These men have been clubbed with this rifle!" cried Gene in horrified tones.

Some lucky chance caused Frog Burnette to glance upwards, and all he could see was an arm swaying backwards and forwards round the jamb of the door, and there was a knife in the hand. Frog saw that Gene was pouncing Jack to the floor and that his back was an easy target. Swiftly the scout picked up a chair and thrust it forward in the nick of time. Plunk! The knife was quivering in the woodwork.

Frog whipped out the knife and made a dash for the stairs. Like a rabbit Duval darted into his office, locked the door and left by the same secret exit as Bobtail Horse. Coming down the street was Lieutenant Cameron, and Duval knew how that officer hated Autry.

Gene Autry was dragging Jack to his feet to give him the chance of an apology when Lieutenant Cameron, two troopers and Duval charged into the cantina.

"What's going on here?" Cameron demanded.

"These two men got into a fight over this girl," explained Duval.

Cameron grinned unpleasantly.

"I'll have to place you under arrest, Autry."

Frog, after a vain search upstairs, came down and asked Rufe where Gene might be. His big mouth gaped open when he heard that Gene had been arrested for causing a disturbance.

Gene's friends were hanging about near the orderly-room when their friend and old leader appeared.

"Well, boys, the colonel just asked for my resignation." Gene gave a dispirited shrug. "Guess I'm not wanted in the cavalry."

"You mean they're kicking you out for fighting in the cantina?" cried Rufe.

"Fraid so."

"Well, we joined on account of you," cried Rufe. "I'm for quitting."

"And so am I," cried Frog, and all the rest.

"You can't quit like this," Gene argued, as they began to take off their tunics. "You've got to wait until your enlistment expires."

Frog suddenly whispered in Rufe's ear. Gene saw a lot of whispering, and then the whole bunch of them were running along the road to the cantina. By the time they had finished there, there wasn't a table left in that sink of iniquity. In fact, those husky ex-rangers had almost wrecked the place when they were attacked by a body of cavalry and eventually arrested.

The colonel told the prisoners that they were a disgrace to the cavalry, that they could turn in their uniforms as they were through, and clear out of Fort Adobe. Like a pack of children they set out to find Gene Autry, and ask if he would mind if they rode along with him when he left the fort.

Gene was very much touched by their devotion to him.

"Okay, boys, saddle up your horses and get ready for a long ride. In about an hour's time we'll be riding for the state capital."

Gene wanted to say good-bye to Dixie before he rode away. He found the girl seated on the veranda of the small bungalow that had been reserved for the colonel. She received him coldly, because Lieutenant Cameron had thought it his duty to tell Dixie that Autry had been fighting in the cantina over a dance girl.

"I wonder you have the impertinence to speak to me after quarrelling over a dance girl." Her eyes flashed her anger.

"I never saw the girl until to-day July 3rd, 1937.

She would try to flirt with me, and I was telling her that I was not interested when a big fellow got rough." Gene grinned. "I have an idea it was all arranged."

"Then why did you let them think that—"

"Because it was the best way I knew to get out of the cavalry."

Colonel Summerall came out on the veranda just in time to hear this astounding statement.

"What's wrong with the cavalry?"

"It's your way of handling the Indians, sir," politely answered Gene.

"You're endangering the lives of the people you're here to protect, as well as the safety of that supply train."

"What nonsense!" was the heated retort. "Why, the chiefs have already agreed to sign the peace treaty."

"Which means absolutely nothing with Tavibo on the loose. I'd suggest you send your men out to meet that supply—"

"I'm perfectly capable of making my own decision, Autry."

"I hope so, sir," Autry held out his hand to the girl. "I just came to say good-bye. I've leaving to-night."

"Leaving?" questioned Dixie, and her hand went to her lips as if distressed. "Where are you going?"

"That hardly concerns you, Dixie," cried the angry colonel.

Dixie pressed Gene's hand.

"Good-bye and good luck," she whispered.

"Thanks. Good-bye." Gene paused by the veranda steps. "Colonel, remember this. Make your peace signs with one hand and keep your rifle ready in the other."

Gene and his men rode day and night till they reached the state capital. First of all he visited Major Crosby, late leader of the Texas Rangers, and afterwards they had an interview with the governor.

"Sir, there's enough guns and ammunition on that cavalry supply train to outfit every Indian on the plains," stated Gene Autry.

The governor had listened to Gene's story with interest.

"And you think this unknown Tavibo is getting the Indians to sign the treaty intentionally to allay suspicion?"

"Yes, sir, I do."

"What do you think, Major Crosby?"

"I would say it was good reasoning."

"And you don't feel the cavalry can handle the situation?"

"They could if they would," was Gene's answer to the governor's question. "But Washington has given strict orders not to be antagonistic. Their hands are tied."

The governor thought for some moments.

"Naturally, I hesitate to interfere in Government business, but the security of the people must be safeguarded. Major Crosby, I authorise you to reorganise the Texas Rangers immediately, enlisting enough men to combat any situation that may arise."

"Certainly, sir," agreed Major Crosby.

"Mr. Autry, you will retain your old commission as lieutenant," added the governor. "And I want to thank both you gentlemen for your interest and concern."

Duval's Treachery

MAJOR CROSBY got busy at once, and within twelve hours he had got together from fifty to sixty of the old rangers. As Gene felt that no time must be wasted the rangers were equipped and set out for Fort Adobe within twenty-four hours of their reorganisation.

The route taken was through the Peace River country, and when a scout was fired at from the trees Gene executed an encircling movement. He rubbed his hands together as he rounded up two Indians, one of whom was Bobtail Horse. The other evil Indian was named Crazy Crow.

Naturally, they denied all knowledge of Tavibo, and Major Crosby ordered the prisoners to be taken to Fort Adobe. The Indians would talk when they got hungry.

Naturally, the cavalry did not give the Texas Rangers a warm welcome when they rode into Fort Adobe. Colonel Summerall was seething with indignation.

Quarters were found for the rangers in some old barns and it was as far away as possible from the cavalry. A small adobe hut was the prison of the fort and the two Indians were locked in with a ranger on guard.

That night Major Crosby discussed his plans with Gene.

"I'm leaving first thing in the morning with a detachment of men to meet the supply train at Buffalo Wells," stated Crosby. "You'll be in charge during my absence."

Duval was one of the first to learn about the arrival of the rangers, and he muttered angrily when he heard what his man Jack had to report.

"Autry and his men have got Crazy Crow and Bobtail Horse in gaol. Major Crosby and his men are riding out to Buffalo Wells to meet the supply train. They start at dawn."

Duval paced his room.

"You get to that supply train first," were his instructions. "Tell them the colonel sent you—that the Indians are laying for them at Buffalo Wells, and to come through Coyote Pass instead."

When Major Crosby and his men had left in the morning Duval went round to the gaol.

"I hear the rangers have secured a prisoner already?" he remarked, as if amused.

"Just a couple of Indians," answered the guard.

"Ho—ho!" Duval roared with laughter. "You'll never be able to keep 'em in that old prison."

"Why not?"

"Why, the bars are loose on the back window. Didn't you know that?"

"No," muttered the somewhat dense ranger, and he hastened round to the back of the hut.

Noiselessly as a cat Duval followed him, and when the ranger was trying the bars hit him over the back of the head with a gun butt. The limp figure he carried across to an old shack, where two of his men were waiting. They would dispose of the ranger. With the gaoler's keys Duval went back to the prison. He left the place some time later and securely locked the door. He went to report to Colonel Summerall that he thought it was monstrous that two Indians, one of whom was a man the colonel had pardoned, should be in prison again.

The result was a visit by Colonel Summerall and some of his troop to Gene's headquarters.

"Autry, I understand you're holding Bobtail Horse and Crazy Crow prisoners?"

"That's right."

"You will release them immediately."

"Sorry, colonel, but I can't do that until they answer some questions."

"If you have any question of importance, submit them to me and I'll take care of the matter."

Gene shook his head.

"You had that chance and didn't take it."

The colonel went purple in the face. "The signing of the peace treaty made those Indians wards of the United States Government and removes them from your jurisdiction."

"The treaty isn't worth the paper it's written on."

"As colonel in the United States Army, I demand that you turn those men over to me at once."

"As lieutenant of the Texas Rangers in command of this post during the absence of Major Crosby I am forced to refuse."

"Unless you turn those men over to me at once I'll order my men to fire upon you!" yelled Rufe.

The guns of the troopers were on Gene and the rangers clustered round him. The rangers clutched their guns and waited for the signal from their officer.

"Ye can start shooting whenever you're ready!" yelled Rufe.

"Lieutenant, prepare to fire!" the colonel shouted to Cameron.

Gene gave a reluctant sigh. What a stubborn old fool the colonel was! If Gene stuck to his rights then there would be heavy bloodshed, and the rangers being unprepared would have to surrender or die fighting. It would be playing right into the hands of the Indians under Tavibo.

"All right, colonel, you win. We can't afford to kill the men we are going to need."

Colonel Summerall grinned in triumph.

"Mr. Cameron, return carbines," he ordered.

Gene sent the rangers back to their quarters, and with Rufe went with the colonel to the prison.

"I thought Wilson was on guard here," Autry said in surprise at seeing no guard.

A duplicate set of keys had to be brought before the door could be opened.

Huddled in a corner were the two Indians, and Rufe gave a shout of surprise and went swiftly across to them. Bobtail Horse was dead and so was Crazy Crow. Gene picked up a blood-stained rifle.

Colonel Summerall and Lieutenant Cameron followed the two rangers into the prison, and they were staring at the dead Indians when Duval appeared—as interpreter he had a right to be there.

"These men have been clubbed with this rifle," Gene stated in horrified tones.

"And who could have done it?" rasped the colonel.

Gene stepped towards him.

"I'm going to look for Wilson, the guard. If someone got in here, they've done away with him, too."

"I think not," The colonel barred his progress. "You didn't need a guard for dead Indians. So this is the way the rangers ask questions. A rather persuasive method, I'd say."

Gene was amazed.

"Why, you don't think we did this, do you? These men were the only chance we had to prove who Tavibo is."

"That's right, cunnel," cried Scout Jones. "We wouldn't let 'em get killed before we knewed."

"You can save your explanations for the trial," stormed the colonel.

Duval gave a slight smile of satisfaction. He had dealt very satisfactorily with this interfering ranger.

"Lieutenant Cameron, place these two men under arrest," the colonel ordered.

"On what crime?" Gene demanded angrily.

"For the brutal murder of these two Indians," came the answer.

"But, colonel, this is absurd! Why—"

"Mr. Cameron, do your duty!" sternly cried the colonel.

Gene and Rufe had their arms taken away, and they were locked in the gaol to await trial for the murder of Bobtail Horse and Crazy Crow.

"Well, I'll be a horned toad!" muttered Scout Jones, as the door clanged on the two prisoners. "Imagine getting arrested 'cause a couple o' Injuns got killed!"

The Escape

SCOUT JONES stared moodily through the bars at the troopers on guard.

"Hey, hossface," he shouted. "How much longer we gonna have to stay in this calaboose?"

"Don't worry," leered the guard. "You'll be out pretty soon."

"We will?" questioned Rufe.

"Sure," said the guard. "We're gonna take you murderers out, stand you against a wall and shoot you full o' lead."

Rufe looked at Gene, who was sprawled on a bench.

"After fighting the Injuns all my life a bunch o' tin soldiers has got to get me. Why, it's a wuss disgrace than being scalped."

"Ah, I don't think they're gonna shoot you," Gene sat up. "You see, you were only acting under my orders."

Rufe glared.

"Well, dang yer hide if you think I'm gonna let you stand up there alone. No, siree! I'm going where you go, regardless."

"Halt! What do you want?" shouted the guard.

"It's Frog," Rufe reported.

"I wanna talk to the prisoners." "You'll have to leave your gun out here," the guard stated, and then unlocked the door.

"What have you found out?" Gene demanded, when the door had been locked.

"The wagon train is coming by way of Coyote Pass."

"Tell my men to get out and—"

"What men?" interrupted Frog.

"There ain't no men here—they're all out hunting Wilson."

"Guess they'll never find that poor fellow. If they did it would clear up the murder of those Indians," said Gene.

"A fine howdy do," grumbled Rufe. "We're in gaol—the rangers at Buffalo Wells, and the supply train right where Tavibo would want it."

"Have you seen Duval?" Gene asked Frog.

"Yes. He rode east right after you were jugged."

Gene was startled.

"Why, that's in the direction of Coyote Pass."

"And the wagon train," Rufe added with ominous meaning.

"We gotta get outa here somehow." Gene stood up and glanced round at the strong walls. His gaze came to rest on the table with its tin mugs and plates. "Gosh, I've an idea. Fellows, start singing and make plenty of noise. The guard will think we're trying to cheer up our last moments. I want to flatten out one of those plates."

The ranger removed the feathered headdress. "Duval!" gasped the astounded colonel. July 3rd, 1937.

"The gaol's getting him," Frog hissed in Rufe's ear. "Maybe we'd better humour him and sing."

They sang an old Indian hunting song, and while they sang Gene flattened out the tin plate by banging it with a stone he had picked up from the floor. When it was quite flat he hid it in his shirt.

The song ceased at his signal.

"Now you've fixed it so you can't eat off of it, what you gonna do with it?" demanded Frog.

"Never mind that," curtly spoke Gene. "You get outa here. Just saddle our horses and trot 'em by in front of the guardhouse."

"Horses?" gaped Frog.

"Yeah, hosses," snapped Rufe. "Them things you fall off."

So Frog banged on the door and shouted that he wanted to be let out, and the guard hastened to answer the request. But as the door was closing Gene whipped out the flattened plate and shoved it between the door and the doorpost, preventing the lock from catching.

"Slick as a whistle," chortled Rufe, and then scurried to the window. "Dang it, here comes our grub!"

The two prisoners stared from between the bars, and wondered if their trick was going to be discovered.

"Hey, we don't want that stew!" shouted Rufe.

"What do ya want—chicken?" leered a guard.

"We don't want nothin' 'cept to be left alone."

"You'll be alone a long time after to-morrow," the guard shouted back, and moved towards the door.

Gene was just in time to whip away the plate as the door opened inwards. The guard saw nothing, and dumped the stew pot on the table and looked round.

"Where's that other plate?"

"What plate?" said Gene.

"Got so hungry I musta et it," jeered Rufe.

"You don't get any stew till you find that other plate." The guard put some stringy meat on the one plate.

The guard picked up the pot and moved to the door, with Gene keeping as close to him as possible. As the door closed he was just in time to get the plate once more into position.

"Whew!" Rufe gasped. "That was a close one."

"I'll say it was." Gene moved over to the window. "Ah, here comes Frog with the horses. Get ready."

Very quietly they jerked open the door. The two guards were pointing their carbines towards Frog and the two lead horses as if suspicious, whilst the guard with the stew pot had vanished round the guard house.

The two troopers heard a sound behind them too late. Strong hands gripped them by the throat and flung them down and tossed their carbines into their late prison. A sprint and a vault and they were in the saddle of their horses.

A trooper tried to shut the gates, but he was too late, and the shots fired by the guard were wide of the mark.

Lieutenant Cameron rushed into the colonel's quarters.

"Prisoners Autry and Jones have escaped, sir," he reported.

"Get the men mounted!" bellowed the colonel.

Out of the fort charged Colonel July 3rd, 1937.

Summerall and forty of his troopers. A distant cloud of dust showed him the trail.

Laying a Trail

THE three rangers rode at a steady pace, but continually Gene was looking back to see if they were being followed.

In some dense woods Gene drew rein. "Frog, you ride to Buffalo Wells and tell Major Crosby to get to the supply train at Coyote Pass as quick as he can. We'll meet you there."

Frog half turned his horse.

"Say, I almost forgot something. Dixie told me to tell you that she didn't think you was no murderer. She said she would've come to see you herself, only the colonel wouldn't let her."

"Say, this ain't no time for that sort of slush," shouted Rufe, as he saw Gene smile happily. "Get going, you fat toad."

Frog spurred his horse and vanished among the trees, but Gene seemed in no hurry and cantered slowly towards an open stretch of grassland.

"What we waiting for?"

"The cavalry."

"Are you loco?" demanded Rufe.

"It ain't gonna be healthy for us if it catches up with us."

"Well, it isn't going to be healthy for that supply train if we don't have a convoy."

Rufe understood and grinned.

"You mean we're leading 'em there?"

"That's right."

"And what's gonna happen if the Injuns don't attack?"

"They will," Gene was confident.

He glanced back. "Good! They've located us."

"No, they haven't," said Rufe.

"They're heading south. They don't see us."

"They soon will," said Gene, and cupping his hands began to make a sound that carried for a long distance. Rufe followed his example, and then both men waved their hats. Not till the troop changed direction did they urge their horses to a gallop.

"They've seen us."

"Hope they didn't forget their guns," anxiously spoke Gene.

The troop were now not much more than a quarter of a mile distant, and several reports rang out as the cavalry opened fire.

"They haven't," Gene smiled, as bending low over the saddle, he urged Champion to a faster gallop.

.....

In the thick undergrowth overlooking Coyote Pass, Tavibo, in full war-paint, stared down at the huge supply train that wound along the valley. By his side were a number of bedaubed Redskins.

"Lame Bear and many warriors on other side of pass await your signal, Tavibo," a chief stated.

"Good!" Tavibo answered, and a piece of glass was turned to catch the rays of the sun. It flashed three times, and then there came an answering reply from several points on the other side of the pass.

It was the signal to attack.

When the Indians, yelling like fiends, came pouring down from both sides of the pass the wagon train was hurriedly turned to form a corral.

The horses and people were inside a circle or corral formed by the wagons, and the defenders were able to shoot at the Indians as they rode round and round in their circle of death.

.....

The rangers rode steadily and just fast enough to keep out of range of the troopers, and after a while Gene glanced at Rufe in significant fashion. The sound of distant firing was easy to hear. They reached a line of hills, and then rode through a narrow pass into the wide stretch of valley known as Coyote Pass. A mile distant was the wagon train, and round it rode a mass of shrieking fiends.

Gene and Rufe reined in their horses and waited for the troopers. They did not even bother to raise their hands.

The colonel saw first the two prisoners and then gasped as he saw beyond the wagon train and its attackers.

"Howdy, cunnel," mocked Rufe. "What da think o' your treaty now?"

"You were right, Autry," Colonel Summerall shouted. "But remember, you're still under sentence to be shot."

Gene laughed.

"It looks like we may be shot without any sentence."

Colonel Summerall drew his sword.

"We've got to get to that wagon train and prevent the Injuns breaking through!" yelled the old martinet. "Show no mercy! Charge!"

The cavalry with Colonel Summerall, Lieutenant Autry and Scout Jones in the lead raced across the flat grasslands towards the attacked wagon train.

A Fierce Battle

TAVIBO and his warriors had hoped to get the wagon train so completely by surprise that the settlers would not be able to form up in a corral. But the besieged put up a stubborn resistance and quite a number of braves bit the dust. Tavibo urged his men to attack more fiercely, and but for the guns and ammunition that he coveted would have shot blazing arrows and flung fire-brands at the prairie schooners.

Though there were several hundred human beings in the wagon train a great number were women and children, and that meant that no more than fifty men were endeavouring to beat off an attack of at least five hundred braves. They made a desperate and valiant resistance against these overwhelming odds. Inside the corral there was a dried-up ditch, and the women and children were able to lie down in comparative security. But the men and women of the wagon train knew they could hope for little mercy from these screaming savages.

Gene Autry rode alongside the colonel.

"Have you any plan of campaign, sir?"

"Attack the Indians and drive 'em off," was the reply.

"We're not strong enough," Gene shouted back. "Tavibo is a noted fighter, and as one man falls so will another rider take his place. On those wild ponies they can ride as well and perhaps better than your cavalry. The Indians outnumber us by about ten to one."

"What do you suggest, Autry?"

"I believe there are one or two rangers with the train," Autry answered. "They are there as a guard and to act as scouts. If you let me take the lead, sir, they will recognise me and act accordingly. Our best chance of beating off the Indians is to ride straight through the circle of death and into the corral. Your men are better armed and are better shots. Moreover, it is easier to shoot through a wheel of a wagon than from the back of a galloping bronc."

The Concluding Chapters of:—

The Get-away

TRAPPED between the contracting walls of the passage that led to the laboratory, Corporal Jim Lawrence and Sergeant McGowan strove in vain to arrest the vice-like motion of those steel partitions that threatened to crush the life from their bodies.

Powerful as they were, they could not hold the closing walls in check, and they had almost given up hope when suddenly Jim's glance fell upon a heavy crowbar that was lying on the floor of the corridor.

It offered a slender prospect of salvation. True, it might prove unequal to the strain—like the table which the two Marines had jammed between the shutters and which had been smashed to matchwood. But as a last resort Jim seized it and poised it horizontally above his head until the walls came into contact with the ends of it.

The crowbar did not bend to the strain, as the corporal had feared it would. It remained firmly wedged between the steel partitions and kept them apart, and all at once a silence descended upon that grim corridor in which Jim and McGowan had so nearly met their doom.

The drone of the hidden machinery that had operated the walls of the trap seemed to peter out of its own accord, and in the deathly quiet that ensued the Marines looked at each other thankfully.

They were still in an unenviable position—caught, as it were, in a narrow fissure which was like to become a lethal chamber if no air reached its interior. Already indeed the atmosphere was stifling and fetid, and with no means of escape visible to the prisoners they had little reason to nurse any feeling of triumph.

Yet at least the imminence of a cruel death had been staved off, and on that score alone they had cause to congratulate themselves.

Standing face to face with Jim, McGowan drew in a long breath and opened his mouth as if to speak. But before he could utter a word the big corporal restrained him, for a movement beyond the inner door of the corridor had reached his ears.

On the other side of that door, in the secret laboratory where they were ensconced, the Tiger Shark and his agent Steinbeck were posted by the switchboard that had controlled the walls of the passage wherein Jim and Mac had been trapped.

"The machinery has stopped!" said Steinbeck. "That means the shutters have come together. And it means, Tiger Shark, that you have nothing more to fear from those two Marines."

Jim Lawrence and McGowan heard those words, and then the muffled response of the scientist's unknown employer became audible to them.

"You are right, Steinbeck," the master-criminal declared. "They have meddled in my affairs for the last time. But the fact remains that the situation in San Diego has grown too hot for my liking—and besides, it is necessary that I should head for Halfway Island without delay."

Beyond the door of the corridor in which he believed that his foes had been destroyed, the Tiger Shark moved a pace nearer to the scientist known as Steinbeck.

"Halfway Island is no longer a haven of safety," the mysterious scoundrel went on. "Colonel Bennett of the Marine Corps is now aware of the activities which we carried on there, and, thanks to Lawrence and McGowan, he even knows that a ray-gun was responsible for the disasters which overtook so many sea-going ships and aeroplanes in that vicinity."

Steinbeck pursed his lips.

"Then it is only a question of time," he said, "before the Marines occupy the island in force and establish their projected air-base there. As it is, they recently succeeded in landing a troop-carrying plane. Admittedly, they grounded their ship without mishap owing to the bungling tactics of our men. But a second venture, perhaps by a whole squadron, would be even more effective. The ray-gun might bring down one plane—the others would come through safely."

The Tiger Shark inclined his head.

"Exactly," he rejoined. "Therefore we must abandon Halfway Island to the U.S. Government. But first I intend to secure the loot that is stored there—the loot amassed from innumerable vessels that the ray-gun has decoyed to destruction."

"And what then, Tiger Shark?"

"What then?" the unknown grunted. "I have not quite decided, Steinbeck. But you will hear from me in due course, when I shall acquaint you with my plans."

The other man looked at him apprehensively, and tried to read his employer's thoughts. But the mysterious and sinister aviator who stood before him was an inscrutable enigma. The flying helmet which he wore, and the scarf which was tightly wrapped about the lower part of his features, not only concealed his identity but screened from Steinbeck's view any expression which might have conveyed an inkling of what was going on in the Tiger Shark's mind.

Only the master-crook's eyes could be seen, and even these were partially obscured by the tinted goggles through which they regarded his hireling.

"Tiger Shark," Steinbeck faltered jerkily, "you—you're not going to run out on me? Remember, I've served you July 3rd, 1937.

EPISODE 12—

"Two Against the Horde"

well, I helped you to create the ray-gun. I—"

The Tiger Shark motioned him into silence with an impatient gesture.

"You have no cause for alarm," he said. "You have been useful to me, and I shall have need of you in the future. As for the rest of the organisation—well, such of them as are not already in the hands of the authorities can look to their own safety."

"But why not take me with you to Halfway Island?" Steinbeck protested. "Why not take me there with you, Tiger Shark—and thence to your ultimate destination?"

"No," came the reply. "I prefer you to remain here for the time being. You have nothing to fear, Steinbeck. No one knows that this building has been my headquarters. McGowan and Lawrence, who followed me here, lie dead between the walls of the corridor."

He paused, and then tapped his associate on the shoulder.

"Incidentally, you had better dispose of their carcasses as soon as I leave," he added. "When you have done that, stand by for a message on the television set. I shall contact you just before I take off from Halfway Island with the loot."

Steinbeck nodded humbly, and without further discussion the Tiger Shark moved away from him, to cross the laboratory and make his exit via a door at the far side of the spacious workshop. Then, as that door closed behind the unknown criminal, Steinbeck turned to the switchboard which controlled the walls of the passage where Jim and McGowan had been snared.

A touch on a lever set the walls in motion again, but this time they drew back, and if it had not been for the clamour of the mechanism that operated them Steinbeck might have heard the metallic thud of a crowbar on the floor of the sealed corridor.

It was the crowbar which had saved the lives of Jim Lawrence and Sergeant McGowan, and which now dropped from the position in which it had been jammed.

A few seconds after that implement had fallen, Steinbeck opened the door that connected the laboratory with the passage, expecting as he did so to see the crushed and mangled bodies of the two Marines. Instead he found himself confronted by their erect, stalwart and menacing forms, and the colour draining from his features in an instant, he whipped round with a hoarse cry of terror.

Another moment and he was running towards the door by which the Tiger Shark had left the laboratory, but Jim and McGowan had bounded after him, and they overtook him before he could make his escape.

"No, you don't!" Jim rapped out. Steinbeck attempted to put up a fight, yet either of the Marines could have dealt with him single-handed, and the scuffle was of brief duration. Then Jim Lawrence addressed Mac tersely.

"The Tiger Shark must have gone through this door!" he rapped out. "You hold this man while I—"

But the sentence was left unfinished, for at that juncture the two non-commissioned officers heard the unmistakable sound of a plane's motor somewhere above them, and, as the engine-note rose to a higher key, the pair of them thrust Steinbeck aside and stumbled across to a window of the laboratory.

Throwing up the sash of that window, they looked out and beheld an auto-gyro soaring into the sky from the flat roof of the building.

July 3rd, 1937.

"There goes the Tiger Shark!" Jim gazed.

"Yeah, and headed for Halfway Island," McGowan said.

Behind them Steinbeck had recovered from their somewhat violent handling of him, and, intent upon escape, he began to sneak in the direction of the passage whence the two Marines had emerged. Then, halting by the switchboard, he drew down a lever and opened the far panel which gave access to the main staircase of the premises.

Unlike the Tiger Shark, however, Steinbeck was not destined to make his get-away. For suddenly Jim and McGowan chanced to turn their heads, and as they saw the scientist in the act of entering the corridor they charged in pursuit of him and again overhauled him.

"Not so fast, my friend," Jim said grimly, as he and Mac rendered the fellow helpless. "It was mighty thoughtful of you to unhitch that outer panel, but we're going along with you."

"Me pal means that you're goin' along with us," McGowan interposed, addressing Steinbeck in a dry tone. "Where to, Jim? The Marine depot?" "Sure!" was the answer. "And when we've handed him over to Colonel Bennett we'll grab a plane and fly to Halfway Island."

Mac directed a sharp glance at his comrade.

"You think the O.C. will let us do that?" he queried.

"I'll say he will," Jim retorted. "He may organise a squadron as well, but that's liable to take up valuable time, and I reckon we can persuade him that every second counts."

The Ray-gun

AN atmosphere of excitement prevailed in the jungle village which was inhabited by the native population of Halfway Island. For an auto-gyro had been seen flying from the east, and when it had glided to earth somewhere beyond the belt of forest there had been a good deal of anxious speculation amongst the savages regarding the identity of its occupant.

They remembered the defeat they had suffered at the hands of the platoon of Marines who had made a brief sojourn on the island only a day or so previously, and they could not help wondering whether they were to undergo a further chastisement.

But they need not have been concerned, for the auto-gyro was no troop-carrying outfit. It was the machine piloted by the Tiger Shark, and within twenty minutes of landing his ship the unknown criminal marched into the native village.

The savages at once clustered around him and began to ply him with questions in their barbarous dialect. But, giving no indication as to whether he understood their interrogations or not, the Tiger Shark singled out a woolly-headed individual who appeared to be a witch-doctor of some description, and to this personage he addressed himself in English.

"Follow me—alone," he commanded. "Leave the niggers here."

The witch-doctor turned to the rest of the tribe, and, silencing the blacks with a gesture, he spoke a few words to them in their own tongue. Then he glanced at the Tiger Shark again and indicated that he was ready to accompany him.

Together they made their way from the clearing in which the native village stood, and, entering the jungle, they trekked through the gloom of the tangled thickets until they reached the headland where the cave containing the Tiger Shark's loot was situated.

On a patch of open ground in close proximity to that headland was the auto-gyro which had brought the unknown master mind to the island. But, ignoring the craft, the Tiger Shark conducted his companion to the lair in which his agents had stored the spoils of their grim depredations.

Once in the shelter of the cavern, the mystery airman and the witch-doctor halted. Then suddenly, with a kind of grimace, the latter plucked the mop of black woolly hair from his head.

It was a wig, and underneath it the fellow's own hair was the light-coloured thatch of a white man. For a white man he was, though even the natives among whom he had lived had been deceived by his skilful disguise.

"Gee, Tiger Shark," he stated, "it sure is good to act natural again. I'm plumb sick of playin' medicine man to them niggers. Say, how much longer have I got to keep up this pretence, anyhow? When am I gonna be able to scrub this black dye off my face an' body?"

The Tiger Shark eyed him thoughtfully through the tinted goggles he was wearing.

"Your rôle has been a useful one, Larsen," he commented. "Your knowledge of the Pacific Islands and the dialects of their inhabitants enabled you to go amongst the savages here in the character of a witch-doctor, and through you we succeeded in establishing an allegiance with that jungle tribe. Yes, you played a valuable part—while the game lasted."

The man known as Larsen glanced at him quickly.

"While the game lasted?" he reiterated. "You mean, it's all washed up now?"

"Isn't that obvious?" the Tiger Shark rejoined. "Metcalf and the others who occupied this cave are either dead or in the hands of the Marines. The secret of Halfway Island is a secret no longer. There is only one course open to us—to transfer our plunder before this whole area is swarming with troops."

Larsen nodded.

"I get it," he muttered. "All right, where do we go?"

"Back to the mainland for the time being," the Tiger Shark announced. "But come, let us first load the auto-gyro."

With that he turned towards a steel door embedded in the left-hand wall of the cavern. It was the door leading to the vault-like chamber in which the loot had been cached, and a moment later the Tiger Shark and Larsen were standing beside a number of strong-boxes packed with the spoils of the activities which had been afoot on Halfway Island during the past few months.

Opening the lid of one of those boxes, the Tiger Shark revealed a mass of treasure that was fit to dazzle a man's eyes, for there in close-packed profusion lay pearls, diamonds, rubies, sapphires—gems of every description. Here in this single iron-bound chest reposed a fortune as great as a king's ransom; and from Larsen, who had not had the opportunity of entering this room before, there came an inarticulate cry of wonder and greed.

Stumbling close to the Tiger Shark's side, he ran his fingers through the jewels caressingly, scooping them up and letting them rain down into the box again, crooning like some evil miser as he did so. And in the meantime the scoundrel who had enlisted his services watched him in a sly fashion, a hint of amusement playing in his dim-seen eyes.

"Wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, eh, Larsen?" the Tiger Shark observed presently. "Yes, and you are fondling only a portion of the riches that this room contains. In these other boxes there are more gems—and gold and silver, too."

"Tiger Shark," Larsen blurted, "we're made—made for life. We can live like princes!"

The unknown airman inclined his head.

"Yes, like princes," he murmured. "H'm, we have had a good innings. The ships that we snared were rich prizes. Indeed, we only concerned ourselves with those which were carrying valuable cargoes, for I made it my business to learn what was below the hatches of every vessel using this trade-route, and I gave my instructions accordingly. The boats which were not worth sinking were allowed to pass. The others were made helpless by the ray-gun, so that with engines paralysed they were trapped by the dangerous currents in these waters and left to founder on the reefs. Believe me, Larsen—"

And then he paused, for all at once a familiar sound reached his ears. It was the drone of an aeroplane's motor, and with an oath the Tiger Shark stumbled out of the treasure room and hurried to the mouth of the cave.

Larsen followed him, and, looking up into the sky, the pair of them espied a monoplane circling over the island. Then, as he noticed the unmistakable cipher of the U.S. Government on the craft, the Tiger Shark gave vent to an exclamation.

"A Marine 'plane!" he snarled.

A seared expression dawned on Larsen's face, and he clutched at the other man's sleeve.

"We've got to get outa here," he jerked.

"And abandon the loot?" the Tiger Shark rasped. "Don't be a fool! Listen, we can deal with that solitary 'plane by means of the ray-gun!"

In another moment he was diving back into the cave, and, Larsen accompanying him, the Tiger Shark ordered the fellow to the controls of that singular device and instructed him to throw the elevating-switch. Then he himself took up a position at the periscope.

Up on the summit of the headland, high above the cavern, the ray-gun rose into view from its emplacement, and within the space of a few seconds it was ready for action.

In the gloom of the cave the Tiger Shark was preparing to take the readings from the range-finder attached to the periscope. Mirrored in the dead-centre of that periscope he could now see the Marine 'plane.

"Quadrant north-east 12!" he bit out. "Quadrant north-east 12," Larsen intoned, moving a lever on the main control-board.

"Altitude two thousand feet!" the Tiger Shark added swiftly.

Again Larsen operated a switch.

"Altitude two thousand feet."

"Power!" barked the man at the periscope, and in an instant his hiring had pulled back the firing-lever of the gun.

There came a whining of dynamos, and that sound was the only indication of the sinister forces that had been released. Then, staring into the periscope, the Tiger Shark saw the Marine 'plane waver uncertainly—saw it come down by the nose and turn into a fatal spin—its motor rendered useless by the invisible ray which had been launched against it.

Next second, however, two dark figures leapt from the plunging craft, and immediately afterwards a couple of parachutes billowed out to check the rapid descent of the men who were wearing them.

Through the periscope the Tiger Shark watched the 'plane crash to earth on the edge of the jungle and burst into flames. Then he transferred his attention to the parachutists who had jumped from it, and he followed them with his narrowed eyes until they had sunk out of view in the heart of the tropical forest that clothed the island's interior.

Larsen had joined him by this time, and the Tiger Shark spoke to him in a muffled voice.

"There were two of them in the 'plane, and they bailed out," he informed Larsen.

"Bailed out," the other echoed. "Then we're liable to have trouble with 'em, yet."

The Tiger Shark drew back from the periscope.

"No," he said, "we won't have any trouble with them. They landed in the thick of the jungle, close to the native village. The savages will take care of them, Larsen."

Unmasked

IN estimating that the occupants of the ill-fated Marine 'plane had come down within a short distance of the native settlement, the Tiger Shark had not been mistaken. For, after plunging through a tangle of foliage, both men alighted on the edge of a swamp that was no more than a couple of hundred yards from the village.

The two men in question were none other than Jim Lawrence and Sergeant McGowan, and, having picked themselves up and divested themselves of their parachute harness, they joined each other on a beaten track that skirted the morass.

"You all right, Mae?" Jim panted.

"Yeah," came the response. "I bounced around a little, but I'm still in one piece. Huh, that 'plane sure took a nose-dive."

Jim Lawrence gritted his teeth.

"The Tiger Shark must have seen us," he stated, "and he put us on the spot with that ray-gun. It's lucky we had parachutes."

McGowan nodded, and was about to make some comment when Jim interrupted him and swung round in an attentive posture.

"Listen, Mae," he hissed. "D'you hear what I hear?"

From somewhere not far away there came a swift pattering as of many feet hurrying over the sun-baked trail. Then all at once a swarm of dusky humanity turned into view round a bend in the forest path, a throng of demonic savages from the nearby village.

They had witnessed the descent of the khaki-clad parachutists, and, smarting under the defeat they had sustained only a day or two before, they had rushed eagerly from their settlement to avenge themselves by murdering the two representatives of the Marine Corps.

On sighting Jim and Mae they raised a tumult that might have been likened to the howl of a wolf-pack, and in another moment they were surging forward in anticipation of the "kill," brandishing spears and knives and war-clubs as they charged.

The situation looked ugly for Jim Lawrence and McGowan, but in taking it for granted that the Marines would fall easy victims to their wrath the savages had erred. For corporal and sergeant had not made the flight to Half-way Island without preparing themselves for an eventuality such as this.

Both of them carried hand-grenades as well as revolvers, and it was on their supply of bombs that they relied now. And no sooner were the natives within range than the two non-commissioned officers began to lob those deadly missiles at them—with dire effect.

Grenade after grenade burst in the path of the dark-skinned islanders, and the storm of destruction broke the onset of the tribe. With the foremost warriors lying stricken on the ground the rest of the mob turned tail, and soon they were fleeing back in the direction of their village.

"You!" McGowan breathed. "So you—are the Tiger Shark!"

Jim and Mac pursued them, harrying them with more bombs—not from any wanton desire to slaughter them, but in the conviction that the more rigorous the punishment the less likelihood there would be of these barbarians rallying to menace them afresh.

At length, however, the two friends gave up the chase, feeling satisfied that they had nothing more to fear from a crew of natives so severely chastened. Then, wheeling to retrace their steps, the pair of them set off through the dense jungle.

Their objective was the cave in the headland, and, familiar as they were with the island, they pushed steadily onward until they gained the edge of the forest, where the close-knit trees and the riotous undergrowth gave place to a sweep of terrain strewn with boulders.

There was one patch of clear ground in that rocky scene, and it was in the middle of this patch that Jim and Mac perceived the Tiger Shark's auto-gyro. Then, even as they set eyes on the craft, their attention was diverted to the headland by the approach of two men.

One they recognised as the Tiger Shark, from the distinctive flying kit that he wore. The other, a stranger to them, was Larsen, the pseudo witch-doctor of the savages whom they had routed.

The rogues had emerged from the cave that had been the lair of the Tiger Shark's agents on the island, and they were laden with sacks that doubtless contained the spoils of the nefarious handiwork which had been practised there.

From the cover of the boulders Jim and Mac watched the scoundrels descend to the auto-gyro and pack those canvas bags into a compartment of the machine. Then the Tiger Shark and his accomplice turned to climb in the direction of the cave again, with a haste which suggested that they were anxious to be quit of Halfway Island at the earliest possible moment.

"They're stovin' the loot aboard that crate, and they're goin' back for more," McGowan volunteered superfluously.

"Yeah," Jim answered, "and this is where we get close enough to hold 'em up. Come on."

The two Marines stole in the direction of the headland, being careful to keep out of sight as they did so. But, when the Tiger Shark and his minion had vanished into the cave above, they quickened their steps and struggled up the slope as rapidly as they could.

A minute later they had gained the mouth of the cavern, and here they paused to draw their Service revolvers from their holsters. Then they advanced boldly into the half-light of the cave, and immediately they heard the murmur of voices issuing from the vault on the left.

"We'll have to make a good many more trips afore we get all this stuff loaded, Tiger Shark," Larsen was saying.

"Yes," came the reply, "and we've got to act fast. I didn't like the sound of those explosions away in the heart of the jungle. Those Marines must have been equipped with grenades, and I doubt if the natives made much of a show against them."

Jim and Mac exchanged a glance, and next instant the pair of them were advancing into the treasure-room, to surprise their foes in the act of stuffing quantities of gems into a couple of sacks that were lying on the floor.

"You're right, Tiger Shark!" Jim Lawrence announced crisply. "The natives didn't make much of a show against us. In fact, I reckon they won't July 3rd, 1937.

be bothering the U.S. Marine Corps at all from now on."

The Tiger Shark and Larsen had started to their feet, the former recoiling with a hoarse ejaculation as he clapped eyes on the men whom he had believed to be dead.

"You!" he panted. "Yep, Corporal Lawrence and Sergeant McGowan at your service," Jim declared. "I guess you didn't squeeze us hard enough when you had us trapped between those walls at your San Diego headquarters, my friend."

He paused, juggling ominously with the revolver that he was grasping. Then he went on speaking in a conversational tone.

"By the way, Tiger Shark," he observed, "your pal Steinbeck is under lock and key, and it may interest you to know that before we left the Marine Depot we had word that the police had rounded-up Miller, Crowley, Red and Pete. So you and your side-kick here will have plenty of company in the gaolhouse when we get you back to the mainland."

The arrest of the Tiger Shark and his last accomplice was not to prove so easy of accomplishment as Jim imagined, however. For, actuated by an intense though natural curiosity, McGowan moved forward with the object of unmasking the scoundrel there and then, and in doing so gave Larsen an opportunity to strike.

Larsen was not slow to take advantage of Mac's blunder. With an unexpectedness that took the sergeant completely unawares he pounced on the burly Irish-American and brought him headlong to the floor.

McGowan lost possession of his revolver, the weapon rattling out of reach as Larsen fell a-top of him, and in another instant both men were rolling to and fro in a fierce tussle for supremacy. Meanwhile, Jim Lawrence had turned to aid his comrade, but the Tiger Shark had promptly engaged him, snatching at the barrel of his gun in an attempt to wrest the six-shooter from him.

With Mac and Larsen at grips on the floor, Jim found himself involved in a desperate struggle with the unknown airman, and it was a struggle that kept him fully occupied, for although the corporal of Marines was a head taller than his antagonist and a stone the heavier, yet the Tiger Shark was a creature of unusual strength, and moreover he fought with the fury of desperation.

True, Jim was never at any time in danger of being overpowered. Nor did the Tiger Shark ever come near to relieving him of the gun. But the big corporal had a tough job in handling the blackguard—a far more difficult job than the one with which McGowan was faced, for it did not take the sergeant long to turn the tables on Larsen and stretch that ruffian senseless with a heavy jolt to the chin.

Having disposed of the bogus witch-doctor, Mac scrambled to his feet and jumped to the assistance of his comrade, and in the space of a few seconds the Tiger Shark was a helpless captive.

With Jim pinning the scoundrel's arms to his sides, McGowan lifted a hand to the scarf that the man was wearing across the lower part of his features, and in one swift gesture he dragged down that improvised mask to disclose a sallow, thin-lipped face. Then the Irish-American whipped away the prisoner's goggles, and the Tiger Shark's countenance was revealed from forehead to jaw.

Mac stared at that countenance amazedly. He had anticipated a shock, since there had been reason to believe that the arch-criminal was someone in close contact with the Marine Depot. But he had never suspected that this individual who was glowering at him now had been the ruthless killer in question—this man who had always seemed so bland and suave, but who had become in this moment the very picture of rage and chagrin.

"You!" McGowan breathed. "So you—are the Tiger Shark!"

Jim Lawrence drew back, and, his revolver still in his fist, swung the culprit round with his free hand. Then he, too, gazed at the murderous-schemer's features in astonishment.

"Kota!" he rapped out.

Kota it was. Kota and the Tiger Shark were one and the same, and it was easy to see now why every move that Bennett had made had been frustrated. The Eurasian had entered the colonel's employ as a valet about the time that the Government had first instructed the O.C. to report on the suitability of Halfway Island as an air base, and Jim recalled that the half-caste had applied for the position of manservant immediately after Bennett's former valet had mysteriously disappeared.

It was all plain to Jim now. Kota, the Tiger Shark, had been responsible for the disappearance of the colonel's previous employee. Then this sinister rogue, this man who had shared with Steinbeck a genius which might have been acclaimed by science if he had only turned it to more honourable uses—this deep-dyed villain had assumed the rôle of a menial to safeguard his dastardly interests in the Pacific.

Such were the thoughts that flashed through Jim Lawrence's mind, and no doubt McGowan was a prey to similar reflections. At any rate, neither of them saw that Larsen had recovered his wits and was reaching for a heavy stick that lay near him—and neither of them realised, until too late, that the man was preparing to launch an attack.

It was on Jim that Larsen concentrated, for McGowan had not retrieved his gun and the corporal alone was armed; and, suddenly springing to action, the man who had played the part of a witch-doctor struck Jim a stunning-blow before the Marine could raise a hand to defend himself.

Jim went down like a log, and with a shout Mac flung himself at the big fellow's assailant. But though he connected with a right that sent Larsen staggering, the Tiger Shark threw himself into the scuffle and swung his bunched knuckles to the base of the Irish-American's skull.

McGowan pitched forward, and, striking his head on the floor, finished up in a sprawled and insensible attitude. Then, wheeling towards Jim Lawrence the Tiger Shark secured the latter's revolver.

He straightened with the gun clutched in his fist, and as he did so Larsen called out to him excitedly:

"Okay, Tiger Shark. Fill them guys full o' slugs, an' then we'll dump the rest o' the treasure in the plane and pull outa here."

Kota, alias the Tiger Shark, was eyeing his satellite narrowly.

"You think I'm going to let you live, Larsen?" he said in a low, tense voice. "You think I'm going to let you live, and take a chance on you? No, my friend, you have been unfortunate enough to learn who I am, and you will carry my secret with you—to eternity."

Larsen's face had fallen.

"Tiger Shark!" he blurted. "You can't mean this! I'll play square. You can trust me—"

"I trust no man," the other broke in harshly. "That is why I have lasted so long. Steinbeck was closer to me than alone, yet even he did not know who it was. No, Larsen, this is the end—for you as well as for these two Marmies."

"Tiger Shark!"
Larsen screamed the name in wild, imploring accents as he saw the Eurasian level the revolver that he was gripping. Then, realising that his abject appeal was in vain, he tried to hurl himself at the assassin, but the gun belched flame and lead in the instant that he sprang.

The bullet thudded into Larsen's chest, and the impact of it stopped him in mid-career. Back he went, with a queer, choking sob on his lips—to reel against the wall and to sink down there in a heap.

The Tiger Shark looked at him for a brief interval, and then turned towards Jim Lawrence and McGowan. The former was showing signs of regaining his wits, and the murderer waited until he had opened his eyes before he levelled the six-shooter.

He wanted Lawrence to be fully conscious before he drilled him—yes, and McGowan, too. He wanted both these men to experience the mental torture of anticipating their doom—these men who had struck at the very roots of his organisation and who had been primarily responsible for his enforced evacuation of Halfway Island.

Another moment and Jim must have died, but over at the wall Larsen had roused himself with an effort and had laid hold of a gun which had been overlooked by all in the last few minutes.

It was McGowan's, and Larsen had fallen within arm's length of it; and now he was picking up the weapon to take aim at the Tiger Shark's back—not because he had any interest in the fate of Jim Lawrence, but because he was determined to avenge himself on the Eurasian.

Larsen was at the point of death. Yet his glazing eyes marked the figure of his victim clearly enough, and his trembling wrist seemed to steady itself the instant before he fired.

A shot burst from the gun he was clutching, and through the haze of smoke he watched the Tiger Shark come up on his toes and crash lifelessly to the floor. Then, with his mouth twisted in a ghastly smile, Larsen keeled over and lay still.

Several weeks had passed by, and at Halfway Island, once the haunt of the Tiger Shark and his agents, but now occupied by a company of Marines who had established friendly relations with the natives, the work of building an aerodrome was going ahead.

Jim Lawrence and McGowan had no part in that assignment. Their associations with Halfway Island were at an end, and they were enjoying a fairly restful life at the depot in San Diego.

During the weeks that succeeded their return, however, two events of special consequence took place, one being the marriage of Corporal Jim Lawrence to Miss Frances Schiller, sister of that promising, but ill fated, young inventor who had been numbered among the victims of the dreaded Tiger Shark.

The wedding ceremony was performed in the chapel attached to the Marine Barracks, and, although he himself had once fondly imagined that he might lead Frances to the altar, McGowan bore Jim no grudge on account of the girl's preference for the corporal, and took over the duties of best man with a heartiness characteristic of him.

The other event worthy of mention was one in which Colonel Bennett officiated as O.C. of the Marine Depot.

On a platform raised above the level of the magnificent parade ground, and in full view of the assembled officers and men under his command, he pinned to the tunics of Corporal Jim Lawrence and Sergeant McGowan the highest and most coveted of those decorations which the United States Admiralty can grant.

"For gallant and courageous service above and beyond the call of duty," Colonel Bennett announced in clear, ringing tones, "it is my pleasure to award to each of you in the name of a grateful Government—the Navy Cross."

Scientists gave us the AEROGRAM

The image shows a scientist in a laboratory setting, wearing a headpiece and looking at a device. To the right is a diagram of a radio station with several masts of varying heights.

Radio messages sent from shore stations or ships are sometimes called 'aerograms.' In the smaller picture you see a diagram of the famous Post Office Wireless Transmitting Station at Rugby—the hub of the Empire's radio system. It occupies a 900-acre site. There are 12 long-wave aerial masts, each of steel lattice work and 820 feet high (more than twice as high as St. Paul's); and 27 short-wave masts (varying in height from 120-180 feet). Note the screening arrangement of the masts.

"THE CASE of the BLACK CAT"

a very tall man, but he was heavily built and very self-important. He did not seem to realise that he cut rather a comic figure as he hustled into the room carrying a basket in which a black cat clawed and complained violently; but some of the reporters laughed.

"Chief," he said, advancing to the desk and holding up the basket, "I've got something here that'll interest you. This is Clinker, the caretaker's cat. I checked up on that guy Mason, like you said, and I found out that late last night he took this cat to his secretary's apartment and left it there with her."

Burger's brown eyes gleamed.

"Get him on the wire," he said. "No—wait a minute. We'll go and see him."

He put on his hat and swept towards the door, ignoring the reporters' eager questions as to where the cat came in, and what Mason had to do with it.

"Holcomb," he turned to bark at the door, "see that that cat is locked up, and meet me downstairs. See you later, boys!"

With the sergeant he entered the Hamilton Building, and they burst into Perry's office—and Burger nearly sent Della flying as he flung wide the door of the inner room.

"Oh, do come in, gentlemen!" she said derisively, recovering her balance; and she would have gone out, but Burger caught hold of her arm.

"Wait a minute!" he rasped. "I want to talk to you, too! Now, listen, Mason!"

"Splendid work, Burger!" jeered Perry, "and let me be the first to congratulate you. I can see by your face that you've got it all solved!"

"Where's Douglas Keene?" the District Attorney bellowed at him.

"I wish I knew," said Perry. "You took the question right out of my mouth."

"Mason, you're up to your tricks again!"

"Della," said Perry innocently, "what does the gentleman mean?"

"Why did you take that cat to her apartment last night?"

"Why," began Della, "he didn't—"

"Now, there's no use lying!" the District Attorney shouted at her. "My men searched your apartment this morning, after you'd left. I have the cat in my office." He turned to Perry again. "Where did you get that cat, and why did you try to hide it?"

"Just a minute, Mr. Burger," protested Perry. "Can't a gentleman give a lady a cat without being browbeaten right here in his own office?"

"I'm not trying to browbeat you. I—er—"

"My 'phone's ringing," Perry pointed to the instrument on his desk. "Do you mind if my secretary answers?"

The District Attorney shook his head, and Della went to the telephone.

"Mason," stormed Burger, "you know where Douglas Keene is, and if you don't turn him over by noon I'll have you disbarred!"

"Mr. Mason," said Della, "it's your Aunt Effie."

"Oh, my Aunt Effie? Excuse me, won't you?" Perry took the telephone, July 3rd, 1937.

and the voice of Douglas Keene sounded in his left ear.

"When I got back I saw the papers," it said, "and I 'phoned Wilma. She said I should call Mr. Mason."

"Yes, I am very busy right now, dear," said Perry. "Yes, you see, the District Attorney is here with one of his great big detectives. You—er—you understand, don't you?"

"I get you, Mr. Mason," was the almost immediate response. "I'm at the corner of Tenth and Alameda, in a drug store. No cops in sight."

"Oh, that's awful, Aunt Effie!" said Perry in a sympathetic tone. "Why, yes, dear—of course. You stay right there and I'll come over to you."

He put down the telephone.

"Poor thing's had an accident," he said. "Trying to curl her hair with a curling-iron last night and burned herself badly. She's having hysterics. I'll have to go over and calm her down, and you'd better help me, Della. You don't mind, do you, gentlemen?"

He put on his hat and caught hold of Della's arm, and a few minutes later they were in a taxicab travelling along Hill Street in the direction of Tenth Street. Ninth Street was passed, and Della looked back.

"Burger's following you!" she exclaimed.

"Bless his heart," said Perry complacently, "of course he is!"

"You and your cats! You'll probably end up in gaol!"

"Lot of interesting people in gaol, Della."

Tenth Street was reached, and the cab turned into it. The drug store on the corner of Alameda Street loomed up on the right.

"You'd better hurry!" said Della. "They're close behind!"

"I know it," Perry signalled to the driver to stop outside the drug store, but he waited on the pavement till the District Attorney arrived in a squad car with Holcomb beside him.

"Hallo, Burger!" he said with a flip of his hand. "I thought you'd lost me for a minute! Just going in to get some medicine for my Aunt Effie. Oh, say, you'd better not double-park—you're apt to get a ticket."

He dived into the drug store, and Della, still in the taxicab, did her best to delay the District Attorney.

"He's so good to his relatives, Mr. Burger," she said. "You can't imagine."

Douglas Keene emerged from a telephone-box inside the drug store as Perry hastened towards it, and his face was white and drawn.

"Oh, Mr. Mason," he began agitatedly, "I—"

Perry gripped his arm.

"Hallo, George," he said to the proprietor of the place, "can I use your prescription-room?"

"Sure, Perry, help yourself," was the reply; and Perry bundled Douglas into a region of bottles and measures and pestles and mortars, where there was no one to overhear their conversation.

"I didn't do it, Mr. Mason," blurted Douglas. "I swear I didn't!"

"S-s-s-sh!" hissed Perry. "I know—I know. Tell me exactly what happened. Louise de Voc left a message at your rooming-house, didn't she?"

"Yes. She—she—she said she had something important to tell me. When I got to her place I—I found her dead on the floor."

"Anyone see you?"

"Yes, th—that's why I got panicky."

"Did you touch the body?"

"No." Douglas shivered.

"Now, don't lie to me! How did your suit get so bloody?"

"Why, I don't know. I—I—"

"Your landlord said you had a visitor yesterday. Who was it?"

"Oh, it must have been after I'd left! I went home and packed some things, and then I got scared they'd pin something on me, and I beat it."

"Listen, the District Attorney is outside, and I'm going to turn you over to him in a minute. Tell me—"

"But I didn't do it!" Douglas howled.

"That's up to me to prove! Will you relax, please, Keene? Take it easy, and tell me just this. You went to the Laxter house to get the cat. At what time did you leave?"

"Bout eleven."

"Were you in Ashton's room?"

"Yes."

"See anyone?"

"No one."

"And you took the cat with you—is that it?"

"Yes, I—I took him to Wilma's. But what's Clinker got to do with this ghastly business?"

"Clinker, my boy, is going to save your life!"

The District Attorney had entered the shop and had spoken to its proprietor. He strode into the prescription-room, and he glared at Perry, who was using a telephone on the bench in there.

"Well, what are you doing here?" he barked.

"Meet my client, Douglas Keene," said Perry calmly; and then, into the telephone: "Hallo! That the news editor of the 'Dispatch'? Do you want a scoop? This is Perry Mason speaking."

He glanced at the astounded District Attorney over his shoulder and saw that he was still staring at Douglas Keene.

"This is how it goes," he said. "While the police and the District Attorney's office were completely baffled as to the Laxter killings, Perry Mason, noted criminal lawyer, to-day—at noon—surrendered Douglas Keene, who will stand trial. That's all!"

"Douglas Keene," said the District Attorney harshly, "I arrest you—"

"Don't be so formal, Burger," Perry interrupted. "Just call him Aunt Effie!"

The Man Who Wasn't Dead

DOUGLAS KEENE was charged with the murder of Louise de

Voc instead of that murder of the caretaker, and the case came up for hearing at the Municipal Court a few days later. The District Attorney, in opening for the prosecution, explained that this preliminary hearing was to determine whether there were sufficient grounds to hold the prisoner on a charge of first-degree murder of the woman, and whether other charges should be preferred against him.

"In order to show motive," he stated, "it will be necessary for us to introduce evidence relating to the murder of Charles Ashton."

The judge, a lean-faced man of very stern appearance, inquired if there were any objections to this procedure on the part of the defence.

"We'll make our objections at the proper time," Perry Mason replied.

Detective-Sergeant Holcomb was called to the witness-stand and gave evidence concerning the manner in which he had found the dead body of the nurse. Asked if he had found anything at the scene of the crime, he did not mention the revolver, but spoke of the broken crutch, which, he said, was covered with blood.

"How did the deceased meet her death?" asked the District Attorney.

"She'd been beaten over the head with some blunt object, and the skull was fractured," was the reply.

From ten o'clock in the morning till three o'clock in the afternoon—except during an interval for luncheon—one witness after another was examined and cross-examined, while Douglas Keene sat with compressed lips at Perry Mason's table in the well of the court. Then Frank Oafley, asked by the District Attorney if anyone outside the immediate family knew of the Koltzdorf diamonds, replied that Douglas Keene knew about them.

"He told me he thought they might be concealed in the crutch," he added.

"Thank you," said Burger, and turned to Perry with an air of triumph. "Your witness!"

Perry walked over to the witness-stand.

"Mr. Oafley," he said, "your hands were pretty badly scratched that night you were digging for the diamonds, weren't they?"

"Yes," admitted Oafley. "There was a rose-hush near by—a very thorny one. The scratches were caused by the thorns."

"You're sure they weren't caused by a cat?"

"Of course not!" cried Oafley. "Ridiculous! Clinker wasn't there!"

"How did you know Clinker wasn't there? Did you look for him?"

For a moment Oafley seemed to be at a loss for words. Then:

"It's already been testified that Keene took the cat away!" he blurted.

Dr. Jacobs, the coroner, was questioned by Mason concerning his examination of the body taken from the grave of Peter Laxter, and gave it as his opinion that the man had been dead for many hours before the fire started.

"You made your examination at the request of the District Attorney, didn't you?" said Perry. "At my request, what further examination did you make?"

"I had X-ray photographs taken of the hip-bone."

"What did you find?"

"I found no evidence of any broken bones."

The doctor had just left the witness-stand when a Western Union messenger squeezed his way towards the well of the court and a telegram was handed to Perry. It had been sent off from Kansas City, and it ran:

"Man posing as Watson Clammert, driving 1935 Buick, arrested to-day. Car contains suitcase with million dollars currency.—Chief of Police, Kansas City."

Perry advanced towards the judge's bench, waving the telegram.

"Your Honour," he said, "I ask for an adjournment. I've just received news of an arrest that will blow this case wide open!"

The District Attorney sprang up to object. He contended that far too much time had been wasted already on irrelevant matters.

"The point is well taken," decided the judge. "Mr. Mason, has this person anything to do with the specific murder we are investigating? I refer to the murder of Louise de Voe, of course."

"Most decidedly!" declared Perry.

"Well, how much time do you want?"

"Until ten to-morrow morning, your Honour, I'll have the suspect brought here by plane."

The adjournment was granted, and the "mystery witness"—as the evening newspapers described the man arrested by the Kansas City Police—was conveyed in custody to Los Angeles by aeroplane, reached that city at five minutes to nine in the morning, and was rushed off to the court in a squad car.

At ten o'clock, when the judge took his seat on the bench, Perry created a sensation.

"The witness I am about to call, your Honour," he said, "can be very helpful. You see, he actually killed Louise de Voe! Call Watson Clammert!"

In a silence so complete that the ticking of the clock could be heard, the clerk of the court stood up and repeated the name, and the bailiff opened a door at the side of the well.

Douglas Keene gasped, and Frank Oafley and Sam Laxter started up from their seats at the District Attorney's table; for the white-haired old man who walked in at the doorway and crossed the well to the witness-stand was Peter Laxter, very much alive!

He moved with only the slightest trace of a limp, and as he took his seat on the stand he bestowed a grim smile upon the grandchildren who had believed him to be dead and buried. Wilma, in one of the front seats beyond the well, clasped her hands together, her eyes wide with amazement.

A buzz of excited chatter was stilled by the judge, who rapped again and again on the bench with his gavel, and then Peter Laxter was sworn in his right name. Perry walked over to the witness-stand, enjoying his triumph, and looked up at the judge.

"Your Honour," he said, "before questioning this witness, who has been considered dead for quite a while, I think it will be helpful if I go back to the night of the fire in which he was supposed to have perished and explain the chain of events which brought us to this hearing."

The judge inclined his head, and Perry began a story which was to grip the attention and the imagination of all who listened to it.

"Mr. Peter Laxter was not the invalid he seemed," he began. "His hip had healed well enough to enable him to walk long before any of the events I am about to describe took place. He knew that one, or more, of his dear relatives was attempting to asphyxiate him, and he knew that they were planning to destroy the evidence by burning the house down.

"With the aid of Ashton, the caretaker, he substituted in his bed the body of a dead vagrant named Watson Clammert. This vagrant had been dead for twenty-four hours, and was in the city mortuary when the body was claimed by Ashton, who established himself as the dead man's half-brother. It was conveyed to Peter Laxter's bed-room in a chest.

"While Peter Laxter's bed-room was being filled with poisonous fumes, Ashton helped his master to escape in a car.

"Now, prior to his supposed death, Peter Laxter had sold stocks and bonds valued at over a million dollars. This money was placed in a safety deposit box under the name of Watson Clammert, but the Koltzdorf diamonds were hidden in the caretaker's crutch. Peter Laxter remained in hiding at the General Hospital for a while, under the name of Watson Clammert, visited at intervals by his faithful servant, then disappeared.

"Now we know that on the night of the twenty-third Douglas Keene went to the Laxter residence to get the cat, and that Ashton was not in the house. Keene left just after eleven with the cat, but Ashton's death occurred at ten-thirty. Where was Ashton?"

For a moment Perry paused dramatically, and he looked across at the two grandsons.

"Ashton," he said, "had gone to Louise de Voe's apartment-house. Peter Laxter was hidden in the shadows outside it, and saw him go in. Frank Oafley and Louise de Voe had just been married. Whether it was a love match, or whether they'd married so that they could not testify against each other, is immaterial. They got rid of the parson as quickly as they could, because they had an appointment with Ashton. They were convinced the diamonds were concealed in his crutch!

"The Reverend Thomas Stillwell came out from the building, got into his car, and had the little accident of which we've already heard. Meanwhile, up in Louise de Voe's apartment, Ashton had accused the two of contriving his employer's death, and very foolishly had boasted that the diamonds were in his crutch. The nurse caught hold of him, and Frank Oafley snatched away the crutch, knocked the caretaker down, and beat the life out of him.

"After that the crutch was broken in two, and the diamonds were shaken out of a hollow in its stem."

Perry looked up at the judge.

"That, your Honour," he said, "occurred at ten-thirty. The question now arises, how did the body of Ashton get back into his own room?"

"Quite simply! The apartment was on the second floor. Oafley, a powerful man, picked up the body of Ashton, lifted it out of the bath-room window, and carried it down the fire-escape and into his car. He drove back to the house, and at the back of it lowered the body on to Ashton's own bed, which was directly under the window.

"But where did the muddy cat tracks on the counterpane and body come from? Clinker had been taken away by Keene. The answer is that Oafley found a strange cat and made the tracks himself. In doing so he was badly scratched, and he sent himself a telegram to furnish an alibi, and pretended to dig under a rosebush to explain the scratches."

Frank Oafley shifted uncomfortably in his seat at the District Attorney's table. He knew that scores of eyes were upon him.

"Now in the meantime," Perry went on. "Louise de Voe was nervously waiting for the return of her killer bridegroom. She heard the door-bell, and, putting the diamonds quickly into the top drawer of a bureau in the sitting-room, she opened the door—and was horrified to find herself face to face with the man she thought had perished in his bed!"

"Laxter wanted to know what had been done with the caretaker, and, seeing the broken crutch, he demanded the diamonds. The nurse backed away from him to the bureau, but not to get the diamonds she had placed there, but to get a gun! Peter Laxter saw the diamonds as she took the gun from the drawer. The broken crutch was in his hand, and as she turned to fire at him he struck at her with it.

"The gun fell from her hand, and she collapsed upon the floor with a broken skull. Her death, mark you, had been brought about in self-defence, but Peter Laxter was panic-stricken at what he had done, pocketed the diamonds, and hurried away. Is that right, Mr. Laxter?"

Peter Laxter nodded his head. "That's just how it happened," he said.

"We now come to my client, Douglas Keene," Perry resumed, "and his bloodstained suit. Some minutes after Peter Laxter's hasty departure, a visitor arrived for Miss de Voe. He knocked and rang, and getting no answer tried the door, which was unlocked. The visitor"—Perry flung out a hand—"was Sam Laxter, intent on having a little talk with Miss de Voe. You will remember that she had been trying to put the blame on him for his grandfather's death, and he wanted to put a stop to it.

"While he was in the apartment, horrified—no doubt—at finding her dead on the floor, Douglas Keene knocked at the door. Sam Laxter quickly hid in a cupboard, but did not quite close the door. Keene entered the room and saw the body, and his first impulse was to telephone the police, but he changed his mind and hurried from the flat.

"Sam Laxter then came out from his hiding-place. He, too, was afraid that he would be accused of this murder, and now he knew exactly where to throw the blame—and probably make it stick. He rushed out from the apartment-house, jumped into the open car which Ashton had left there, and drove to Douglas Keene's rooming-house. He cut himself with a penknife and put his own blood all over one of my client's suits!

"Now he had to find some alibi for those self-inflicted cuts; so on his way home he deliberately drove into a fire plug, smashed the car up a bit, and had all he wanted—in the shape of a broken wind-screen!"

Dramatically Perry walked away from the witness-stand to his table and put a hand on Douglas' shoulder.

"Your honour," he said, "I move for the dismissal of the charges against the defendant, Douglas Keene, and I request that Frank Oafley be held for the murder of Charles Ashton. For the death of Louise de Voe, Peter Laxter will plead self-defence—and I will defend him!"

July 2nd, 1937.

"Motion granted," said the judge without the slightest hesitation. "The case of the people versus Douglas Keene is dismissed!"

Frank Oafley was arrested in court; but Douglas Keene walked out from it a free man and a happy one, holding the arm of the girl he loved, and facing a whole battery of cameras on the steps of the building.

The District Attorney took old Peter Laxter off to his own office, but decided to charge him only with justifiable homicide, and permitted him to return to his own home. Perry Mason received the District Attorney's grudging congratulations with a grin, arranged to see his original client later in the day, and went off with Della to eat waffles at Wilma's shop in Ninth Street.

These two faced one another across a table in a recess, and a flustered woman Wilma had engaged to look after the customers in her absence served them. Wilma and Douglas were far too taken up with their own affairs to pay any attention to anyone else; they had decided to get married next day.

"I'll bet we'll have a chain of waffle shops in less than a couple of years," declared the excited young man.

Perry had been supplied with melted butter for his waffles, but Della's were unadorned.

"Don't I get any syrup?" she asked plaintively.

"Oh, I'm sorry, Della!" said Perry; and he lifted up his voice. "Service! Service, please!"

The woman help was busy on the other side of the shop, and though Douglas and Wilma were standing together at a counter only a few feet away they took no notice.

"Wonderful thing, this love!" remarked Perry.

Della shifted her feet.

"Just what are you trying to do, Mr. Mason?" she asked reprovingly.

"Do?" He gazed at her blankly.

"You're tickling my ankles!"

"I'm certainly not!"

She looked down under the table, and she burst out laughing.

"I thought it was you!" she said, and then she reached down and lifted the black cat up on to her lap.

"RIDE, RANGER, RIDE!"

"Take the lead, Antry," was all the colonel's brief answer.

Tavibo cursed and raved when over the crest of a hill came the cavalry. It was too late to give his braves orders to gather together in a body and to try to overwhelm the cavalry by numbers.

The besieged settlers gave a whoop of joy at sight of the blue uniforms, and one of the late rangers was quick to recognise Antry on his famous horse.

"They're riding straight for us," the ranger told the leader of the train. "I know what he wants us to do. He wants us to move two of the schooners so that the cavalry can ride straight into the corral. We don't want to do it too soon or the Injuns may guess the move and try to stop Antry getting through."

"I'll get some of the men to stand by to shift those schooners," decided the leader. "They'll be under your orders."

"I'll signal Antry," the ranger cried.

The cavalry swept down on the Indians, who were disorganised by the unexpected advent of the white men. They cut a path clean through the circle. Antry glanced at the corral and saw two men waving their rifles and hats.

"Follow me, colonel," Antry shouted, and as he charged forward the two schooners were dragged away.

The cavalry rode through and did not lose a man, but Tavibo's braves had suffered heavily. The schooners were at once pushed back into place, the cavalry dismounted and rushed to take up positions, and renewed fire was poured on the attackers.

Behind some boxes the colonel, Gene Antry and Rufe Jones took cover and fired at the Indians as they flashed past on their horses.

"That's five," chuckled Rufe, reloading his gun. "Betcha I make it ten straight."

The colonel looked in horror at the scout. All his dreams of peace were being destroyed.

"But this is terrible—this is war!"

"But if we win this war then we'll have peace," answered Gene. "If only we could get that renegade Indian, Tavibo." Coolly he raised his long-barrelled pistol and fired.

"Good shooting, Gene," shouted Rufe, as a brave toppled from his horse. "This is just like the old days, ain't it, cunnel?"

Tavibo realised that he was wasting needless men and he signalled for a withdrawal. He must think out some plan of campaign. Perhaps it would be wise to make a surprise attack and try to break through. If he could once get his braves inside the corral he would make short work of the defenders.

Colonel Summerall was delighted when the Indians could be seen scurrying away to high ground.

"They're retreating, lieutenant—we've driven them off."

"Only to get their breath, cunnel." It was Rufe who replied. "Them Injuns will be back."

"I'm afraid Scout Jones is right," stated Gene.

"We seem to have lost a good many men." The colonel looked gloomy when Lieutenant Cameron came up to report that many of the wild shots of the Indians had found a mark and that there were over thirty casualties in dead and wounded.

"Shall we be able to withstand another attack?" The colonel glanced at Antry and Scout Jones.

"Mebbo we won't have to if the rangers get here," Scout Jones stooped to peer through the wheels of a schooner.

"Rangers?" The colonel stared in amazement at Rufe and then suspiciously at Antry.

"I sent Frog to Buffalo Wells to tell Major Crosby to get here in all haste," reported Antry. "And if Frog hasn't fallen off his horse they should be here pretty soon."

Tavibo called a hurried council of his chiefs. For years he had been leading a double life. His father had been French and his mother a Comanche squaw. He had lived with white people, but all his sympathies were with the Indians; moreover, by serving the latter he hoped to make himself a very rich and powerful chief. He had learnt that the white soldiers were clever fighters, and he knew that if whites had been attacking their first object would be to break through the corral. Therefore, he ordered the braves to start once more the circle of death, whilst several bands would form up outside the circle ready to make a sudden swoop on the corral of schooners.

Tavibo's scheme met with a certain amount of success. In several places where there had been few casualties the braves were beaten off, but in weaker places they broke through. Inspired by fanatical hatred the braves attacked with reckless fury.

Lieutenant Cameron undoubtedly owed his life and his scalp to the bravery of Antry. Cameron was at one of the weaker posts, and four painted Redskins broke through. They tomahawked two of the defenders, but one fell to a shot from Cameron. The three rushed at him, and he managed to shoot one before being felled to the ground. A settler flung himself at one of the braves. The settler got his hands to the brave's throat and managed to throttle him slowly, but Cameron was on his back and only just conscious.

Out came the third brave's knife, and it was then that Gene, glancing round to see if he could help at any place where the defenders had been overcome, saw the predicament of Cameron. Gene raced to the rescue and flung himself forward to grip the brave's arm.

Gene twisted the Indian's arm and forced the fingers to open and drop the knife. A right-hand punch to the ribs surprised the Indian, and when his head came forward Gene lashed out with a left and right that settled the Indian. Gene picked up Cameron and carried him to the dip in the ground, where he left him in the hands of the women.

Gene saw that two Indians had broken through in another place and his pistol blazed, dropping one. The other, a hideous painted creature, pointed a pistol at him, but the ranger ducked and the bullet missed him. The brave whipped out a knife as Gene rushed at him.

The knife point went through Gene's sleeve and drew blood, but it did not stop the young ranger. His steel-like fingers gripped the Indian's wrist, and one of his legs went out, so that as the man was forced back he fell—that fall dragged Gene down as well, but the knife arm was twisted behind the Redskin's back. Thus he died by his own knife.

Gene stood up and was about to rush off to assist in the defence when some instinct made him pause. He knelt down and looked closely at the hideous painted face. But a yell made him look round.

"The rangers! The rangers!" came the cry.

Gene sprang to his feet and clambered up on the wheel of a schooner to get a better view. His heart thrilled as he saw a line of horsemen sweeping down on the corral.

The Indians had lost many men and had been losing heart because it was whispered that Tavibo had been killed. At any rate, he was not there to urge them on with his vehemence. The sight of another armed body of white men struck terror into their hearts. The circle broke and the braves turned their horses towards the hills. Those still trying to fight their way through the schooners turned and ran, and in most cases were shot down.

Major Crosby showed little mercy. The Indians had to be taught a lesson that would subdue them for many years to come. The rangers pursued the disorganised armies of Tavibo and routed them heavily. The braves were scattered, but thirty or forty were taken prisoner. Major Crosby gave the signal for the rangers to abandon the pursuit and to gallop back to the corral.

But Gene Antry had seen that Colonel Summerall made no further mistakes. The wounded were tended to, and the defence reorganised in case of another attack—not that Gene expected one. No one was allowed to leave the corral as many of the Indians lying out there might not be dead and would be armed. "Colonel," Gene touched the officer on the shoulder. "I've got something over here I'd like to show you. I think you'll be interested in this."

Gene led the colonel over to the Indian who had fallen on his own knife and died. The colonel stared down at the painted face and then glanced questioningly at the ranger.

"Is there anything peculiar about this Indian?" he asked.

"Don't you notice anything?" Gene grinned. "Don't you recognise him?"

"I've never seen the man before in my life," the colonel stated. "Doesn't look so much like the usual type. Is he a half-breed, Gene?"

"Yes, and one you have had plenty of dealings with in the past," the ranger answered. "Just watch."

Gene knelt beside the dead man and lifted the head, but no look of understanding appeared on the colonel's face until the ranger removed the feathered headdress. Then Gene rubbed some of the paint off the dead man's cheeks.

"Duval!" gasped the astounded colonel.

"Yes—or Tavibo, as the Indians call him."

Colonel Summerall was staring at Duval in bemused bewilderment when the fact that some of the schooners were being pulled away showed that the rangers had returned. Major Crosby was at their head, and close behind was Frog, who was proud of what he had done.

"Well, colonel, I'm glad to see you've still got your hair," the major said with ironic humour.

"Major, I want to apologise for the way I've acted," mumbled Colonel Summerall in subdued tones. "Texas does need the rangers."

"And I want to apologise for my attitude, colonel." Crosby jumped from his saddle and held out his hand. "Texas needs the cavalry, too."

"Danged if ye ain't both right," cried Rufe Jones, who had scant respect for his superiors, though he was a fearless fighter. "Together there ain't nothing we can't take care of. Cannel, I'll bet ye a new gun that treaty'll hold good now."

And there was much wisdom in Rufe's words, as they all knew. Both rangers and cavalymen shouted themselves hoarse as Colonel Summerall and Major Crosby gripped hands. Finally, the colonel glanced shamefacedly at Lieutenant Antry.

"I'm sorry, Gene, I guess I got you all wrong. Dixie stuck up for you all the time and she certainly was right."

It was Gene who held out his hand, and the older man gripped it gratefully.

Some months later, when there was peace and understanding between the white men and the Redskins, there was a wedding at Fort Adobe. Outside the church cavalry and rangers lined the path to the wicket gates. The rifles of the rangers were held up touching the swords of the cavalry. Down the arched aisle came Gene and Dixie, and as the carriage took them off for a happy honeymoon the rangers made the hills echo with their singing.

"Ride, ranger, ride,
From Red River to the sea
You have written history,
Ride, ranger, ride.
You're a loyal Texas son
And she needs you, every one,
Ride, ranger, ride.
For old rangers who are gone
You are pledged to carry on,
Ride, ranger, ride."

Unknown Star for £300,000 Film

An unknown player, Jon Hall, has been signed for the leading rôle in Samuel Goldwyn's £300,000 production, "The Hurricane." More than 150 actors received screen tests before Hall was selected.

Hall is a cousin of James Norman Hall, co-author of "The Hurricane," and is twenty-four years of age. He was born in Tahiti, possesses a magnificent physique and has distinguished himself as a swimmer and athlete. During the past two years he has appeared on the screen in minor rôles under the name of Lloyd Crane.

Goldwyn has also signed Dorothy Lamour to play "Marama," the native girl, opposite Hall, replacing Margo, who has withdrawn from the cast. Other featured players include Jerome Cowan, Raymond Massey, Walter Brennan and Barbara O'Neill. John Ford is directing.

Zanuck to Make "Hudson's Bay Company"

Planning an epic film about the outposts in the frozen North which made history during the pioneer days, Darryl F. Zanuck, vice-president in charge of production at 20th Century-Fox studios, has assigned Kenneth MacGowan as associate producer of "Hudson's Bay Company."

The picture, which Zanuck is scheduling as one of the studio's foremost productions for 1937, will weave into the background the story of the Hudson's Bay Company's far-flung operations in unknown wilds during the pre-revolutionary war days, and will strike the same epochal keynote as "Lloyd's of London," which depicted the rise of the famous insurance firm as set against the Battle of Trafalgar and other historic incidents.

Already working on a script for "Hudson's Bay Company" are Art

Arthur, Richard Collins and Michael Jacoby, all writers of numerous film hits in the past. Research experts also are assembling all available historic information about the company's famous trading ports.

Blow-up Specialist

For fourteen years now Art Brown has been specialising in explosions for motion-picture scenes. He can tell you to an ounce just how many pounds of dynamite will be required to blow out a shellhole ten feet in diameter and six feet deep. He can burst a load of shrapnel at any desired height.

At the moment Art is supervising the bombardment sequence of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "They Gave Him a Gun," on five hundred acres of Chatsworth land where once stood the farmhouses and terraced rice-field of "The Good Earth." And Art is in his element.

To-day he had to plant his dynamite in one hundred and twelve spots where shellholes were to form during the American advance. And he had to be sure that Spencer Tracy, Franchot Tone, and six hundred "extras" were in no danger.

First, Mr. Brown digs his hole. Then he plants in it from four to eight sticks of dynamite, depending on the desired effect. The hole is filled with sifted earth, wet down. Each hole is then marked with a numbered red sack, which photographs black and doesn't show up on the film. As long as Tracy, Tone, and the rest of the troops avoid the red sacks, as they are repeatedly instructed to do, they are in no danger.

Four keyboards operate the explosions, each key numbered to correspond with the numbers on the red sacks. At each keyboard sits one of Brown's assistants. On the side of a hill where he can see all the terrain to be blown up Brown sits at a telephone, issuing his instructions to his four men. No charge is touched off unless he and his keyboard men can see that the troops are sufficiently far back, or in front, or to the side.

For the shrapnel bursts Brown manufactures his own bombs from a formula which he doesn't care to disclose. Like the chef who can tell you how to get the ingredients for a prize cake by adding "a pinch of this and a pinch of that," but can't give you the exact measurements, Brown has his own system, learned through experience.

The effect of machine-gun bullets is not obtained through having an expert machine-gunner shoot chips off a wall. A wire is planted in the wall with squibs attached to it at desired intervals. The squibs, none of which are copper-jacketed, because fragments of copper can cause serious injury, are fired from a keyboard as rapidly as possible to give the machine-gun effect.

In the sequence in "They Gave Him a Gun," in which Tracy and Tone take shelter behind a cemetery wall while advancing on a village, the aforementioned method was used. And it speaks well for Brown that W. S. Van Dyke, directing the picture, who makes a point of never taking a chance with an actor, has absolute faith in Brown's ability.

During fourteen years Brown has put his unique talents to use in practically every Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture which has shown any shooting, and has had no accidents. He doesn't care to discuss accidents which have occurred elsewhere, "because I can't afford to get jittery about this job. As far as I'm concerned, the cause of most accidents is carelessness. But I can't give any expert opinion, because I wasn't there when the accident occurred. I hope I never will be."

Detective Story*

A mysterious receiver of stolen gems is hated both by Scotland Yard and the underworld. The first because he is elusive, and the second because he betrays those who will not sell to him at his own price. Barrabal, once one of the Yard's smartest men, is given a chance to make a come-back by rounding-up the Squeaker, starring Edmund Lowe

At Dead of Night

THE hour is 2 a.m.; it is a foggy, chilly and filthy night. The whole of London seems to be sleeping, and the only sound: the dripping of water from the house-tops.

Down a street that during the day is a hive of industry comes a silent-running car. It pulls up at the kerb and two men get out, each carrying a bag. The driver remains at the wheel. "If I see a mark I'll flash me headlights," he told them.

An understanding grunt and the two men, collars turned up, hurry down the street, till they come to the side entrance of the lion of Wainwright Bros., diamond merchants. Months of scheming have obtained them a key to the lock. No one sees them enter. In the main office there is a huge safe, and to experts it is a simple matter to open and rifle the contents.

The burglars make little noise, and there is no warning from their driver. With a rich haul of diamonds they make good their escape, and only when they are hastening towards their car does a constable come round a corner and become suspicious.

"Hey, you!" the constable shouted, but he spoke in vain, because the car had roared away into the mist.

The constable had no proof, but he guessed something was wrong, and soon he found the open doors. A few minutes later, from a police-box, he was in touch with his sergeant.

"There's been a job done—27, William Street."

The police of London act swiftly, and in five minutes a police car was down at the warehouse of Wainwright Brothers. They had scarce noted the open safe when another police car arrived and Inspector Elford, from December 4th, 1937.

New Scotland Yard, was on the scene.

There are news-dogs that are on duty all night, ready to rush out after a story, because such things as fires, burglaries and murders often happen during the dark hours. These same men, or their brothers, hang around Scotland Yard, half asleep, yet ready to leap to their feet if there is work to be done. It was to these news-dogs Superintendent Marshall and Inspector Elford were talking less than an hour after the robbery.

"Inspector Elford has given you all he knows about the robbery," stated the superintendent. He was clean-cut, tall and aggressively capable. "The diamonds are worth roughly about five thousand pounds. There are one or two clues, and we hope to trace the burglars."

Perched casually on the edge of the superintendent's table was a curious-looking fellow. He wore an old mac and had a bowler hat on the side of his head. No one could call Joshua Collie good looking, but his eyes were sharp, shrewd and alert, and the wide forehead did not belie his intelligence.

"Don't you think it would be more interesting to trace the diamonds, superintendent?" he asked with a pronounced Scottish accent.

"What do you mean?"

"Just that you might land bigger game than a jewel thief if you could follow those diamonds to-night."

The superintendent frowned heavily at the reporter and announced to the inspector that "That would be all for the moment."

And when Collie said it would be interesting to follow the diamonds he was right. At four o'clock in the morning a powerful limousine stopped along a deserted part of the Embankment, and from across the street one of the three burglars went across to the car. A muffled figure sat in the back of the car. A white hand appeared and took the silk handkerchief containing the diamonds, and the gems were quickly surveyed by means of a torch. The white hand passed the handkerchief and its valuable contents back to the burglar.

"Fifteen hundred, guv'nor," hissed the burglar.

On the steamed rear window the white hand reached over and drew the figures 800. The burglar began to argue, and the white hand wrote 600.

"But, guv'nor, I've got to split three ways with the boys. Can't you make it seven hundred?"

The white hand at once wrote "No."

"Then I won't do it. I know a man in the City who'll pay more than a thousand pounds for this lot," the burglar cried in hoarse tones. "Why —" The engine of the car awoke to life, and the window began to rise. "Here, wait a minute—wait a minute—I'll take the cash."

Out came the hand and took the handkerchief. A moment later a number of notes passed to the burglar, then with a roar the car driven by the Squeaker vanished along the Embankment.

In a side street the burglar met his two assistants.

"Six hundred quid," cried the driver, "Why do we have to deal with this dirty swine?"

"Because he knows we did the job," cried the man who had bargained with the Squeaker. "If we didn't sell he'd turn us over to the police."

"And six hundred quid is better than a cell in Pentonville," snarled the other burglar.

"Hasn't anybody ever tried to follow him?" asked the driver, who was new to London's underworld.

"Nobody who's alive to talk about it," he was told. "And he'll get away with this till the day he meets a man what knows him."

The three cheap crooks slunk away to their various haunts. Now, there are haunts that never seem to be asleep, and if they are, then it is during the day. One of the most fashionable and popular of these places was the Leopard Club.

A man, swarthy, slight of build and no more than thirty, sat at a table by himself. He smoked his cigarette jerkily, as if he were nervous, and from time to time he kept on glancing at his watch. It was just after four, and he had work to do before the dawn. The manager appeared, and with an oily smile announced that Miss Tamara would entertain the company. The man leaned eagerly forward and his eyes turned towards the stairs down which the star must come.

Tamara was a dark, very beautiful Russian. The revolution had driven her parents from the land of their birth, and with Tamara they had settled in Germany. The child had shown an amazing aptitude for dancing, and when she took up a stage career had won many hearts. Tamara had come to London and lost her heart to Larry Graeme.

The star could sing almost as well as she could dance, and Larry watched her entranced. It was for her sake that to-night he was going to take the biggest, rashest gamble of his life. Many times did Tamara glance across at Larry's table and give him a fleeting smile. When her act was finished he hastened to her dressing-room.

"Larry, I'm so happy to see you," Slim arms went round him and held him close. "You'll have supper with me?"

"I can't stay, Tommie." Larry used his pet name for her. "Please don't look at me like that, darling, but this is big business. Big enough to end all our worries if it works."

"To-morrow night?"

He kissed her.

"Supper?" he asked.

Tamara nodded happily.

"Yes, and come early. Good luck, darling."

"I need it!" he said tensely, kissed her almost roughly, and then hastened from the room.

At a quarter to five a figure climbed through a window of an impressive mansion in Mayfair. Larry had been to this mansion on many occasions as a guest, now he was entering it in the dead of night as a burglar. By clever scheming he had learnt the combination of a small wall safe which contained some valuable pearls. He made no noise, and with fingers that were steady he opened up the safe. The mist and gloom had gone, and now a watery moon gave a ghostly light to the big room. When Larry got to the window he held up a long string of beautiful pearls, then with a jubilant chuckle he clambered out of the window. It was not till the morning that the theft was discovered, and curiously enough, one of the newshounds who failed to pick up the scoop was Collie. Field, the editor, was furious, especially as his reporter was usually first on a story. He was scowling at the "Bulletin," which had splash headings announcing "£50,000 Jewel Robbery—Mrs. Van Rissik's Jewels Stolen," when he turned to find his errant reporter beaming at him.

"That story has been on the street for two hours!" The editor flung down the paper. "Where've you been all night? I tried every place I could think, even your home."

"Was I not there?" mocked the reporter, who was the most independent in Fleet Street. "Have you seen the grand story in the 'Bulletin' about the jewel robbery?"

"I'm glad you like it, Mr. Collie," the editor said with bitter sarcasm. "But you're paid to cover crime stories, not read about 'em."

"But I've been working all night. Mr. Field, on a real story—about a certain man who buys stolen jewels and sometimes squeaks on the robber to the police."

"You've been chasing the Squeaker for months, Collie, but I can't print guesses." The editor spoke with growing impatience. "Right now I've got two million readers to please, and they'd like to know who stole the Van Rissik pearls."

Collie chuckled.

"Aye! So would Scotland Yard." He went to his desk still laughing in that maddening way that made his editor so furious.

The Down-and-out

THAT morning there was a parade of undesirables and suspects at New Scotland Yard, and Superintendent Marshall, accompanied by a sergeant, was looking over the unhealthy and dirty specimens of humanity parading before them.

"What've you brought me here for, guv'nor?" groaned, one unshaven ruffian. "I ain't done no jewel robbery."

"No?" instantly retorted the sergeant. "But not so long ago you did a five-year stretch for one."

If the sergeant was doubtful of any of these suspects he would hug the man out of the line and question him about his movements during the last twenty-four hours. The records of nearly every man the sergeant knew, and they had been rounded up from haunts well known to the police.

"Just a moment, sergeant," said Superintendent Marshall. "I'd like to talk to this man myself. Take him along to my office."

"What do you know about the Van Rissik affair?" the sergeant suddenly demanded of a broad-shouldered fellow who kept his eyes studiously on the ground, as if ashamed to be there. Like the others, he was unshaven, but though ragged and down-at-heel, he seemed cleaner.

"Just a moment, sergeant." The superintendent shot out a restraining hand. "I'd like to talk to this man myself. Take him along to my office."

The man shot a quick glance at the superintendent, but the latter was seemingly interested in the rest of the parade.

"Come on!" gruffly ordered the sergeant.

The man was conducted to a large, well lighted, but rather bare room. The panelled walls, the large desk, the few severe chairs gave one the impression of a court. The door opened and in strode Marshall.

"I'm glad you recognised me, superintendent," the man said with a twisted grin.

The officer studied the ragged figure disapprovingly.

"I'm surprised I ever did," he stated tersely.

"You, Barrabal, one of the best men I ever had—picked up as a suspect in a jewel robbery!" He motioned to a chair. "What have you been doing with yourself?"

"It's a long story."

"Tell me."

"Well, my last assignment was in India—you know all about that," stated the one-time Yard man. "I started drinking and let you down—I think India rather got on my nerves, but that's no excuse. After that I went home to Canada. And now—" He shrugged his shoulders. "Well, here I am."

"Are you still drinking?"

Barrabal grimed.

"At the moment only by invitation."

"Why don't you give it up?"

"I tried that once for six months—it took me two years to get over it. How are things going with you, sir?"

The superintendent stood up and walked to the window.

"Not very good," he said over his shoulder. "I'm worried."

"Worried?"

"Yes!" The superintendent came back from the window and stood staring down at Barrabal, who faced him quite fearlessly. "What are you doing now?"

"Looking for a job."

"Tried the detective agencies?"

"I won't chase any lonesome husbands—not after ten years in the Yard."

The superintendent went back to his chair.

"You were a good detective. I've missed you badly." He paused and studied Barrabal closely for some moments. "As a matter of fact, I could give you a job right now, but there's no room here for a man who only wants to play."

An eager glint came into the tired eyes.

"I've taken a long time to learn that, sir," he said humbly.

"Barrabal, do you think you could cut out drinking if I were to give you another chance?"

"I'd cut out breathing for that."

"All right." The superintendent's mind was made up by that answer. "There's a man in this town who's been running us around in circles for months."

"You mean the Squeaker?"

"Yes. He's the cleverest criminal December 4th, 1937.

in London. He runs the underworld, and he's getting more dangerous every day. Now, if you were to get him—"

"Then I get my job back?"

"You can have the whole Yard!" A rare smile appeared on the hard face, to vanish in a flash. "Only remember, there must be no more drinking."

When Barrabal walked out of the Yard he wore exactly the same clothes, and though he had money in his pockets he did not shave or make himself respectable. He headed towards the docks, and many a time he glanced covertly at public-houses, but resisted the temptation.

Late that night a car pulled up on the Embankment, and Larry Graeme walked across the road. Inside was a muffled figure only faintly discernible. Shrewd eyes stared at Larry.

"Are you looking for a valuable silk scarf?" It was the pass sentence he had been given.

A white hand wrote on the steamed side window "RISSIK."

"Right!" Larry glanced round and then fished out a handkerchief, which he half-opened to reveal the contents. "The Van Rissik pearls. They're worth fifty thousand, but you can have them for twenty thousand for a quick sale."

The Squeaker wrote on the window: "10,000."

"Ten thousand!" Larry said angrily. "Do you think I'm crazy? Why, you can sell them anywhere for twice what I'm asking."

The hand rubbed out the ten thousand and wrote twelve thousand.

"I'm not giving the stuff away!" Larry retorted.

The only answer of the Squeaker was to draw two definite lines under the twelve thousand.

"You can have it, but not at that price."

The Squeaker rubbed out all the writing and roared his engine to life. Now that the moisture was off the window Larry could see the driver more clearly. He jammed his face close against the window.

"I know who you are!" he cried hoarsely. "Why, you're—" He fell back as the car roared away. He stood there staring after the vanished car. His mind was a turmoil. He knew the Squeaker. What was this discovery worth to him?

Larry Graeme went back to his comfortable flat, for which he owed considerable rent, and pondered the matter. He gave a start when his flat bell rang shrilly. Knowing the methods of the Squeaker, he jumped at once to conclusions. Cautiously he walked to the door, and the hand in the pocket of his dinner suit held a gun. He decided that if it were the Squeaker he would come alone. Graeme grimed—now it would be his turn to name the terms. He unlocked the door and stood back.

A ragged, unshaven tramp lounged into the room.

"Hallo, Larry?"

"Who are you?"

Barrabal grimed.

"Is that a nice way to talk to an old friend?" He looked longingly at the whisky on a small table.

"Why, it's Barrabal!" gasped Graeme. "You've changed a bit. What do you want here?"

The detective took his eyes reluctantly away from the whisky.

"A little information," he said with just a slight touch of significance.

"Oh, so you're back with the Yard?"

"No, but I hope to be. I thought you might give me a helping hand."

"Why should I want to help a copper?" harshly demanded Graeme.

"Because you'll be helping yourself." Barrabal glanced at the whisky, then resolutely away. "Larry, I want to get back into the Yard, but I can't do it unless I get one man—the Squeaker!"

The eyes of Larry Graeme narrowed. "Well, what's that got to do with me?" he demanded harshly.

"I know the game you're in, and I know how you get rid of the stuff. Sooner or later you've got to sell to the Squeaker, and every person who's ever dealt with him has wound up behind the bars—or worse. I'd like to make a deal with you."

"You're talking to the wrong man, Barrabal. I don't know the Squeaker, and if I did I wouldn't talk." Larry had decided that giving information to Barrabal would be foolish, when he could demand thousands for his silence. "I'm not running any risks I don't have to," he added.

"Then you'd better keep away from the Squeaker. Guess I'll be going."

"Good-night! Thanks for the call!" Larry grinned mockingly. "And give my best to Superintendent Marshall."

Then Barrabal returned to dockland and sought out a certain humble public-house. He walked casually into the place, and nobody took any notice of him. He leaned against the bar and ordered a beer. Very slowly and cautiously the ex-detective glanced round until he found the man he sought sitting at a table in a corner, busily writing.

Very quietly he went across the room and took the vacant chair.

"Hallo, Collie! I'm Barrabal," he said as the other looked up.

There was surprise in the eyes of Joshua Collie, but pleasure as well. He held out his hand.

"Glad to see ye again, Barrabal. What are you doing here?"

"Looking for work."

"What's wrong with Scotland Yard?"

"Nothing's wrong with the Yard—that's why I'm here. Can you help me?"

"I'll try to."

"Good. Have a drink?"

"Thanks."

Barrabal pushed across the beer he had bought.

"Take it—I'm off the stuff." He leaned forward and lowered his voice.

"I understand there's a man round here who goes out of his way to help people who are down and out. Doesn't object to beards, clothes, past reputations. As a matter of fact, they tell me he's particularly kind to men with criminal records. Who is he?"

"Mr. Frank Sutton. A very respectable business man."

"Where is he?"

"At A.G. Stedman & Co. He's their general manager."

"Could you give me a note to him?"

"I'll be glad to." A slow smile came to Collie's lips as he watched the unshaven man closely. Collie was a very cute reporter. "But you've no criminal record, Barrabal."

It was the other's turn to smile.

"I might have by to-night," was his answer.

The Good Samaritan

A fuzzy-haired girl sat at a table in the outer office of Stedman & Co.

She dealt with the phone and all inquiries, and also did a certain amount of secretarial work. She considered herself overworked, and on this fine morning was not in a very sweet temper.

"No, Mr. Stedman's not in," she snapped into the telephone. "I don't know when he'll be back. No, you won't be able to see him at all to-day. Well, I can't do anything about that."

Mr. Sutton hasn't any jobs. Oh, well, that's your worry."

"That wasn't very kind of you, Milly."

The girl looked round nervously.

"I'm sorry, Miss Stedman, but they're always pestering," she explained.

Carol Stedman could never be called beautiful, but she had pleasant features, a lovely skin, and a slender figure, added to which she dressed very well. Though the only daughter of rich and adoring parents, she was unspoiled. She was carrying a tray—it was a flag day in aid of a big hospital.

"Well, you've got a job and they haven't," Carol answered reprovingly. "But you ought to listen to what they've got to say."

"But you should see some of the people who come in here," argued Milly, a spot that wasn't make-up showing in her cheeks.

"But you can't judge people by their clothes, Milly." The kindly Carol shook her dainty head. "You've got to talk to them to find out what they're really like."

"Well, what would you like me to do, Miss Stedman?"

"Well, next time somebody asks for Mr. Sutton, see how nice you can be."

"Yes, Miss Stedman."

Milly smiled angrily as Carol walked across to Frank Sutton's room and went in, closing the door.

A few minutes later the swing-doors opened to admit the unshaven wreck of a man—Barrabal.

"Is Mr. Sutton in?"

"No. Not at the moment."

"I'll call back later, then."

"Oh, no!" Milly smiled in her honest manner. "Please don't go. I'm quite sure he'll be in very shortly. Would you care to wait?"

"Thank you. Shall I wait outside?"

"Oh, please go right into Mr. Sutton's office!"

"Thank you."

Milly saw him open the door and go in, shutting it behind him, then she held her sides with laughter. That ought to teach Miss Carol Stedman a lesson.

A young lady had been arranging the flowers in the luxurious office, and she had glauced round, expecting to see her fiancé. Instead she saw one of the most down-at-heel tramps she had ever seen.

"Oh, I'm sorry!" stammered Barrabal. "But the young lady outside asked me to wait in here. If she did the wrong thing, I'll—"

"No!" quickly spoke Carol, and smiled. "She did exactly what I told her to. Won't you sit down. Mr. Sutton won't be long."

"Are you his secretary?"

"Oh, we're friends."

"Oh, maybe you can tell me what I want to know! I'm Captain John Leslie. Has Mr. Sutton any jobs open?"

"No, I don't think so." She gave him a searching look. "Well, what sort of a job did you want?"

"Oh, I've done practically everything!"

"What, exactly?" Carol demanded, and took a chair close to the tattered wreck.

Barrabal, having tried many jobs since leaving the Yard, was able to talk about life on a freighter with a great deal of knowledge. He narrated some of his own adventures when seeking work in Canada in a manner that interested the girl immensely. She looked up with a start to find that they had been talking for nearly an hour. She murmured an excuse and went into the outer office. Milly just gaped at

Very quietly he went across the room and took the vacant chair.

"Hello, Collie. I'm Barrabal," he said, as the other looked up.

her—Miss Stedman was beyond comprehension.

"Where is Mr. Sutton, Milly?"

"I suppose he's still at lunch, miss," Milly answered. "His habits aren't regular. You never know when he's coming back. Now, last Friday—"

The swing-doors opened, and a very immaculate, good-looking young man entered. He smiled broadly to see Carol.

"Hallo, Carol! How long have you been waiting?"

"So far back I can't remember."

"Sorry, I was down at the dock. What can I do for you?"

Carol picked up the tray which she had deposited on a chair and the money-can.

"First of all, your good deed for the day."

"That's easy." Sutton placed a coin in the tin, and she pinned a flower to his lapel. "Anything else?" he asked, when she stood back to admire the effect.

"I want to ask you a question."

"Fire away."

All this while Carol was standing in such a way that she barred his way to his own office.

"Thanks!" she smiled at him. "Suppose, Frank, you'd been out of a job for months, absolutely broke, your clothes were shabby, and you—you couldn't even afford a shave. You'd still be the same Frank Sutton, wouldn't you?"

"Why, yes, of course, dear." He knitted his brows. "But what are you getting at?"

Carol smiled mysteriously and went to the door of his room.

"Frank, I want you to meet Captain Leslie."

"Well, I never!" gasped Milly when the door had closed. "What a cheek she's got."

Frank Sutton looked the tramp up and down. Not the first down and out Carol had befriended.

"Will you tell Mr. Sutton everything you told me?" Carol looked at Barrabal, then turned to Sutton. "Thank you, Frank, now I must get back to my flag-selling. Help him if you can."

"Excuse me a minute." Sutton indicated a seat to Barrabal. He followed Carol out of the room, closing the door. Milly pretended to work. "What is all this about?"

"You'll know when you've heard his story. He's managed shipping offices, captained ships, and been all over the world."

"But he looks like a tramp."

"He doesn't talk like one. You will try and give him a chance, won't you, Frank?"

"I'll try."

"You're a darling!" She laughed happily, and, standing on tiptoe, kissed him lightly on the lips. "See you for dinner."

Early that afternoon Joshua Collie's small son came running into his father's den.

"Daddy, daddy, there's an awful looking man at the door with a funny beard on his face."

"On his face?" Collie gave a chuckle. "Now, isn't that a peculiar place for a man to have a beard!" He pushed back his chair and went out into the hall. "Well, well, well, I didn't expect to see you so soon. Did you get a job?"

"I did," answered Barrabal. "That's why I dropped in to thank you."

"It was nothing. I thought Sutton would be the man for you." He took Barrabal's arm. "Come on in and sit down. Come and meet the boy."

The two men chatted idly about various matters of the day when the phone bell shrilled. Collie gave a nod, and his son rushed over to answer it. The boy started back in alarm. It sounded as if someone were being murdered.

"It's Mr. Field down at the newspaper," laughed Collie, and turned in December 4th, 1937.

his chair. "As soon as he stops talking, tell him I'll be down right away."

"Your friend seems a bit excited, doesn't he?"

Barrabal raised his eyebrows. "Oh, it's only the boss!" Collie chuckled. "You see, I promised him a story"—he glanced at Barrabal—"on the Squeaker. A thousand words, and I can't even think of one. You wouldn't know anything about the Squeaker, would you?"

"Well, only the talk down at the docks. You know you can't roll around in mud for six months without getting some dirt in your ear." Barrabal paused for a moment to look round the room. "You're a lucky fellow, Collie. Lovely home and a fine family. They'd miss you a lot if anything went wrong, wouldn't they?"

The laughter faded from the reporter's face. There was a warning note in Barrabal's voice.

"What d'you mean by that?" Collie asked tensely.

"Don't let your job drag you into something that you can't get out of," Barrabal got up and placed his hand on Collie's shoulder. The ex-detective's eyes were grave and serious. "The Squeaker moves in a different world from this, and a much more dangerous one. Good-night!"

Scotland Yard Warns Sutton

FRANK SUTTON was shown at five o'clock that day into the office of Inspector Elford.

"You sent for me, inspector?" Sutton stated.

"How do you do?" The inspector shook hands and pulled forward a chair. "We'd like you to help us."

Sutton nodded and took the proffered seat.

"Gladly," he agreed.

"Do you know a man called Frank Weston?"

Sutton pondered this for a moment.

"No, no, I'm afraid I don't."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite."

The inspector picked up his peaked helmet and stood up.

"I'm just going to check over his fingerprints," he stated. "Perhaps you'd like to come along, Mr. Sutton. You might find it interesting."

"I'd like to very much."

"Good." Elford opened the door for his visitor to pass. "Ever been in the Yard before?" he asked when they were crossing a quadrangle.

"No," Sutton said with an amused smile. "But I've always wanted to."

They went up some steps and along a corridor into a huge room that seemed to be filled with steel cabinets. A number of clerks were busy at desks. Elford waved his hand towards the walls and the cabinets.

"All the male fingerprints are filed here," he explained. "Women are in an adjoining room—about six million of them."

"I see."

"Nothing very romantic, but still we get results." The inspector glanced round and called curtly: "Rogers!"

"Yes, sir?"

A clerk got up from a desk and hurried forward.

From his pocket Elford produced a slip of paper. "Check that print for me, will you?" he requested.

"Very good, sir."

Rogers looked at the paper and at once went across to the wall, where he slid out a long steel drawer and began to run his fingers through the contents. Inspector Elford turned to Frank Sutton.

"You see a lot of our work lies now in preventing crime—shutting the door

December 4th, 1937.

before the horse is stolen," he remarked.

"I'll be glad to co-operate with you in any way I can, inspector."

"Thank you."

Rogers approached with a large card and handed it to the inspector.

"Here we have Mr. Weston's other names," he explained to his visitor. "Maybe you know one of them. George Frinton, Sir Charles Minter, Harry Stormer, and Captain John Leslie."

"Why, yes," Sutton exclaimed. "That's the name of the man I engaged only a few hours ago."

The inspector said "Ah!" in a knowing sort of way, and then added:

"He probably told you he was an ex-Canadian Army officer, a bit down on his luck, of course, and he has a batch of very impressive references."

"How on earth do you know?"

"Take a look at this."

The inspector handed Sutton the card and pointed. There was a picture of Barrabal, No. 7045, his various names, descriptions, and the record that he served two years in Montreal for forgery.

"My word, he did eighteen months at Pentonville for embezzlement," read out Sutton, running his finger down the record. "And three years at Parkhurst for receiving stolen property. Dangerous." He frowned thoughtfully and looked at the inspector. "But Leslie was sent to me by Joshua Collie. You know, the 'Post Courier' man. That's most peculiar."

"Collie's a most peculiar man." The inspector answered significantly. "He has contacts that even the police know nothing about."

"What would you like me to do?"

"We can't advise you, Mr. Sutton; we can only tell you the facts. Weston or Leslie or whatever he calls himself hasn't been through our hands for four years, and, of course, he may be going straight. On the other hand, he has had three convictions, and I should advise you to keep your eye on him."

"Thank you for warning me, inspector." Frank Sutton gave the officer a grateful glance. "I'll think it over. Good-day."

That evening Sutton called for Carol and took her to dinner at the Leopard Club. The girl was so happy because she had done very well with her flowers, and especially because she had obtained a job for Captain Leslie.

When Carol mentioned Leslie's name he lingered his chin and looked uncomfortable and embarrassed, so she asked him if anything were wrong.

"Well, I wasn't going to tell you this, Carol," he said at last. "But your Captain Leslie has a very bad criminal record. Scotland Yard sent for me this afternoon and told me all about it—aliases, prison sentences. I was never so surprised in my life."

"But are you sure it's the same Captain Leslie?" demanded Carol, who looked horrified by this information.

"My dear, I saw his photograph." Sutton gave a resigned shrug of his shoulders. "Don't know quite what to do about it. He seems a smart man to me. The police have nothing against him for the last four years. I've half a mind to take a chance on him. It's up to you, Carol, to give the deciding word."

Larry Graeme was at the Leopard Club that night, and Tamara was worried by his white, drawn face and restless manner.

"Tommy, if I decided to leave town very soon, will you come with me?"

"Yes, dear, of course." She gazed at him anxiously. "Is anything the matter?"

"Oh, no, not a thing." His smile was forced. "I have a headache. I fear I shall have to go home early."

Tamara soothed him as best she could, but she was worried because she understood his moods. Something very serious was the matter, and in the end he would tell her.

After Frank Sutton had escorted Carol to her home he went back to his own house. Martin, his butler, was waiting up for him.

"Any packages for me?"

"I put them on your desk, sir."

"Thanks," Sutton smiled a little as he saw one parcel. He had an idea of its contents, but a flat package puzzled him, and he opened it first. It was a gramophone record. "Martin," he held it out to his perfect servant. "Put this record on, please. That'll be all to-night."

Martin opened a gramophone, put on the record, and, as the sound of a waltz filled the room, silently withdrew. The record went on for some while, then the music suddenly stopped and there came the sound of a voice.

"This is the man who tried to sell you the Van Rissik pearls on the Embankment. I hope you remember me as well as I remember you; in case you were thinking of mentioning our meeting, I don't think that would be a good idea for either of us. It would upset me very much; it would probably upset you."

Sutton switched off the record and began to open his letters and packages. One parcel contained a valuable necklace. He stared at it, then tossed it on to his desk. For some moments he stared at the gramophone, then, his mind made up, he walked over to a typewriter.

"To Superintendent Marshall,
Criminal Investigation Department,
New Scotland Yard.

"Find Larry Graeme, and you will find the Van Rissik pearls."

The missive was received by the superintendent the next morning.

"This is the fifteenth Squeaker note we've had, Elford."

"And in every case we've made an arrest," retorted the inspector.

"Yes, but the Squeaker isn't helping the Yard—he's giving us orders! He makes us arrest every crook who refuses to sell to him."

"And not one of them knows the Squeaker. Do you think Barrabal will have any luck, sir?"

"I hope so," muttered the superintendent. "I want you to go ahead on your own lines, but give him all the help you can." He gave a dry chuckle. "You and I have our suspicions, and I told Barrabal to follow it up in his own way."

The Popular Criminal

BARRABAL had never enjoyed anything so much in his life as the time spent changing himself from a tramp into a gentleman of means. A bath, a visit to a barber's, the purchase of several suits of clothes, the finding of comfortable lodgings and that glorious feeling of respectability all combined to make Barrabal hold up his head and walk with a slight swagger to take over his new duties with the firm of Stedman.

Milly did not recognise him.

"Who do you wish to see, sir?"

"Why, Mr. Sutton."

"Oh, Mr. Sutton's not in yet. You'll have to wait."

"Would you mind if I waited in that office?" Barrabal indicated a glass door on which his pseudo name was printed.

"I should think I would mind," cried Milly, not in a very sweet temper that morning. "That's Captain Leslie's office, our new traffic manager."

"Thank you." Barrabal laughed and walked over to the door. "Will you let me know when he comes in?"

Milly was astounded and was about to go after him to argue the point when she gave a gasp—she had just realised that this well-dressed man was the unshaven tramp.

Barrabal found that his room had an occupant. Carol Stedman was busy arranging some flowers.

"Good-morning, Miss Stedman."

"Good-morning." The girl glanced towards him, and his appearance even made her give a slight gasp.

"It's nice seeing you here this morning," Barrabal remarked, as he placed his hat on a stand. "You know yesterday I didn't have a chance to thank you for everything you did for me."

Carol stared fixedly, accusingly at him.

"Is your name Captain Leslie, or is it Weston or Harry Stormer or—"

"What do you mean?" he interrupted sharply.

"Why did you do it? Why did you lie to me? You could have told me the truth, it—it wouldn't have made any difference. I wanted to help you as I'd have helped anyone who was in trouble. I wanted to be your friend, and—and you made a fool of me."

Barrabal was deeply touched. The girl was so sincere and genuine. She stirred his heart strangely.

"Who told you about me?"

"Frank Sutton."

"Who told him?"

"Scotland Yard. The one place you haven't fooled."

"I see." Barrabal looked away as if ashamed. "You've gone to a lot of trouble to tell me this." Then he faced her with an air of cynical amusement. "I suppose you've arranged for my dismissal?"

"I didn't think that would be necessary," Carol answered icily, and walked past him quickly as if she could not bear to be in the room with him.

When Barrabal came into the outer office a few minutes later he learned from Milly that Miss Stedman had left. Half an hour later Frank Sutton appeared, made no mention to Barrabal of what he had learnt from Scotland Yard, and, after a lengthy discussion on the traffic problem, announced that he would not be in during the afternoon. He had promised to go down to the Stedmans' house to a tennis party.

"I should like you to meet the Stedmans," Sutton stated. "So why not show up about four in time for tea. Charming people, the Stedmans, no stuck-up nonsense about them, and I know Carol will be pleased to see her protégée."

When Barrabal went out to lunch he heard a newsboy shouting about another Squeaker sensation. He bought a copy and read that Larry Graeme had been arrested on the top of a motor-bus.

"Larry Graeme has been arrested for the Van Rissik robbery. His imprisonment will not end the stolen jewellery racket in London. Only the capture of the Squeaker, who was behind Graeme's arrest and is behind organised crime in this city. Can Scotland Yard do the trick?"

Barrabal grinned because he was sure that this paragraph had been written by Joshua Callie. Then a frown took the place of the grin—what would happen when he went down that evening to the Stedmans? More than likely he would be told then that his services were no longer required, yet he had a strong idea that Sutton would do his best to keep Captain Leslie on the books of Stedman & Company.

Frank Sutton turned up at the Stedman house at Reigate about three, and watched Carol, most attractive in smart tennis attire, playing in a mixed doubles. Carol was not playing her best and threw away the last game by double-faulting.

"Hallo, Carol!" Frank cried when she came off the court. "You were off your game, my dear. You shouldn't have taken that trip to town this morning. Why did you go?"

"Nothing important."

"By the way, I've asked someone down this evening; I hope you don't mind?" Frank Sutton stated, watching the girl under half-closed eyes.

"Who is it?"

"Captain Leslie."

"Oh, you haven't—to this house?" Carol was indignant. "Oh, why did you ask him?"

"Well, I've been thinking about Leslie," he said thoughtfully. "He may have knocked about a bit, but—"

"Several bits in London and a bit in Montreal for two years," commented Carol sarcastically.

"That was some time ago. But he does understand shipping, and I could use him."

"Well, Scotland Yard seemed to think you could do without him; besides, you've got no right to take that risk with my father's business."

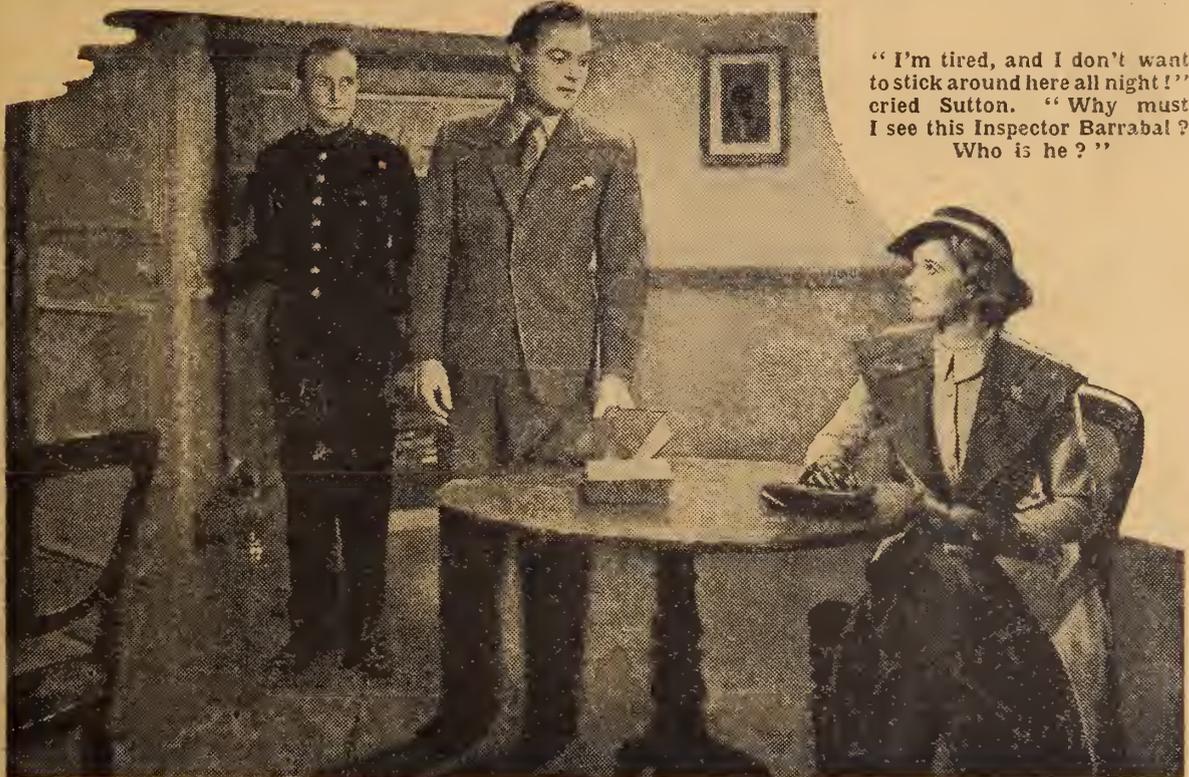

"You mean you want me to let him go?"

"Yes."

Sutton gave a resigned shrug. "Well, it was your idea to take him on, and now you want me to fire him. If it's going to be done, don't you think you should do it?"

"All right, I will!" snapped Carol. "I've played enough tennis, Frank, so I'm going to change."

Punctually to the dot, Barrabal arrived at Reigate and he was shown into a large drawing-room with a big conservatory. Through the latter he could see some people playing tennis. "Good-afternoon, Captain Leslie." "Oh—good-afternoon!" he stammered, for he had not heard Carol come into the room.

"I'm tired, and I don't want to stick around here all night!" cried Sutton. "Why must I see this Inspector Barrabal? Who is he?"

"Sorry if I've kept you waiting." "Oh, that's quite all right," Barrabal answered with a bland smile. "I was just admiring your lovely home. I rather thought Mr. Sutton would be meeting me, though—"

"Mr. Sutton told me to talk to you," Carol interrupted coldly.

Barrabal decided that he was now going to be told that his services were no longer required, when suddenly a woman's voice was heard:

"Carol! Carol!"

"I'm here, mother."

A pleasant, elderly woman hurried into the big room.

"Have you seen my handbag? Oh, I—I beg your pardon."

"Mother, this is Captain Leslie," politely murmured her daughter.

"How do you do?" Mrs. Stedman held out her hand.

"How do you do?" replied Barrabal.

"Carol's told me so much about you."

"Not too much, I trust," he said with a sly glance at Carol.

"I simply told mother about some of the interesting places you've been to—South America, Egypt, Canada."

"Canada? Fascinating country," Mrs. Stedman said with a reminiscent smile. "Have you spent much time in Montreal?"

"Montreal?" Again he glanced at the girl. "I spent—that is, I was there for—"

"Two years, wasn't it?" Carol remarked pointedly.

"Two years exactly."

"I've the greatest affection for Montreal—that's where I met my husband, you know," gushed Mrs. Stedman.

"Where did you live there?" "Oh—er—I had a nice little place—overlooking the river." Barrabal was enjoying the conversation. "Nothing elaborate, but it was very quiet, especially at night."

"Carol," Mrs. Stedman turned eagerly to her daughter, "you must ask Captain Leslie over to dinner one night soon. I'm sure we've got so many mutual friends in Montreal to talk about. Now I must go and find my handbag." She smiled as she shook hands again. "Good-bye."

"It was kind of your mother to ask me to dinner," Barrabal remarked when they were alone.

"You're very good at making first impressions, aren't you, Captain Leslie?"

"Yes, and sometimes they last." Barrabal began to move towards the door. "Well—good-bye. Please tell Mr. Sutton I called and that I'll send the money for these clothes as soon as I get another job. And will you please accept my thanks?"

"What are you going to do?" "Well, for one thing, I'm going to stop telling lies to charming ladies."

"I don't know why I went to the office this morning." A slight frown appeared on the smooth forehead. "I don't know why I'm talking to you now."

"You're talking to me because Mr. Sutton wants to keep me on," Barrabal said with his usual frankness. "And you don't."

"It's got nothing to do with me. This is my father's business. He's built it up for years. It wouldn't be fair to him. So I think—"

The conservatory door opened and December 4th, 1937.

Frank Sutton walked through into the room.

"Good-afternoon, Captain Leslie." He gave a slight nod and a smile.

"Miss Stedman been talking to you?"

"Yes—she has. I'm sorry, but—"

"Frank!" Carol interrupted sharply.

"What night next week is our party?"

"Wednesday." Sutton gave her a questioning look.

Carol ignored the look and gave Barrabal a smiling glance.

"You will be able to come, won't you?" There was a definite wish in her voice.

"I'll be delighted."

"You must stay and see the gardens." Carol laughed now. "You'll enjoy chatting to mother."

"Splendid! Splendid!" Sutton beamed at both of them. "I'm very glad, Leslie, as far as I'm concerned, I don't care what you've been as long as you can produce results. This is a great opportunity."

"And believe me, I'll make the most of it," Barrabal assured Carol, with his most earnest expression.

Barrabal made himself very affable at tea and delighted Mrs. Stedman. He returned to town well satisfied. He got through to Scotland Yard and asked if Graeme had made any statement. He learnt from Superintendent Marshall that Graeme was still undergoing cross-examination, but, so far, had kept his mouth very tightly shut.

Graeme's Escape

IN an office at Scotland Yard Larry Graeme sat in a chair. His black hair lay dankly over his forehead and his face was pasty white. Seated at the table were Inspector Elford and two of his plain-clothes men, whilst in the background was a uniformed policeman.

Larry Graeme had been searched and the pearls found. On being questioned he had told a story of the jewels being sent to him for disposal on the Continent, and that he had no idea who had sent him the pearls. Naturally the mystery gang would have followed his movements, and when he had realised the pearls, would have made themselves known. Larry's record was that of a one-time thief, and later suspected of being a fence. Naturally the police could not believe this story, but they could not shake him. It was Larry's hope that he would not get too long a sentence, so that he could deal with the man who had betrayed him.

Scotland Yard questioned him persistently, and from the time of his arrest they had not given him a moment's peace. He was worn out and exhausted, yet still stubborn.

"What time is it?" he asked.

The police made no answer. They were trying to break him down.

"Can I have a glass of water?" They might not have heard, for all the attention they gave him. "Listen, we've been here half the night. How long is this going on?"

Then did Inspector Elford repeat what he had been saying for hours:

"Until you tell us who the Squeaker is."

Graeme bowed his head in his hands.

"You're facing a fifteen years' sentence," stated Elford.

"And all because the Squeaker put you here," cried one of the plain-clothes men.

"You tell us who he is and we'll get him," promised the inspector.

"No thanks." Larry looked up, his face transformed into a vicious snarl.

"I'll settle that account myself."

"Not for fifteen years you won't," the inspector commented. "You talk sense, and we may be able to help you."

Larry Graeme looked at the stolid officers of the law and then towards the policeman standing near the door.

"All right—I'll talk."

At once the officers came to life.

"Have a cigarette?" One offered a packet.

Larry took one, and it was the inspector who struck the match.

"Can I have that glass of water?" The inspector looked across the room.

"A glass of water for Mr. Graeme," he ordered.

Larry stood up and straightened his weary limbs. He yawned, but his half-closed eyes were alert. The policeman at the door poured out a glass of water, and Larry moved across the room to take it from him.

They thought that Graeme was all-in, and they had no idea that he was foxing them, a desperate plan in his mind.

Graeme took the water, drank it, and as he gave it back to the policeman suddenly gripped the latter's arm with his free hand. His wrists were very strong, and the policeman was pulled off his balance, stumbled over Graeme's outstretched foot and rolled to the floor. Graeme hurled the glass at the inspector, and it caught the officer full in the chest, wounding him.

The prisoner sprang to the door, flung it open and dashed out into the corridor.

By the time Elford and his men were outside the room Graeme had vanished down a corridor. A tinkle of glass gave them a clue, and they raced down to the second floor to find that he had smashed a window with a chair. It was a dozen men that swarmed out on to the roof in pursuit. Graeme went down a fire-escape. He had seen plans of Scotland Yard, and succeeded in getting into a building where a window overlooked a side street. It was a long drop, but Graeme was desperate, and he scrambled to his feet as the police rushed into the room.

All police were rushed out from Cannon Row, but by some miracle Larry Graeme made his escape.

What a tale Collie was able to tell the next morning in the "Post Courier." First Yard break for twenty years. London man hunt. Graeme eludes the net. What will the Squeaker do now? Collie described the phenomenal escape of Graeme and gave it as his opinion that Graeme was believed to have information concerning the notorious fence and police informer. The police were certain that Graeme had not managed to get away from London, as every street, every station and every airport was being watched.

It was by a private entrance, early some nights later, that Graeme entered the Leopard Club and crept upstairs without being seen. He listened outside Tamara's room, and very quietly opened the door. The girl was lying on a couch asleep—resting in readiness for the last cabaret of the session. Graeme locked the door then softly knelt down beside the couch. The long eyelids fluttered open, and she lay there for a moment perfectly still, then she started up.

"Larry!"

"Tommy, I've come to say good-bye." Graeme gripped her thin hands. "You've seen the papers?" She nodded, searching his face with anxious eyes. "I should have told you about that before, but I was afraid to lose you."

"You can never lose me, Larry."

"I should have known that." Graeme buried his face against her shoulder.

"I should never have started this. I thought I could beat the game by pulling off one last job and getting away. I thought I could make a new start—live like a human being."
 "But you can—you can!" Tamara cried.

Graeme pushed himself away. "I'm a fugitive from justice, Tommy. Do you know what that means?" he demanded gloomily. "You can hide here till I've finished," she schemed desperately. "Then I might be able to help you."
 "I'm afraid not, Tommy. The police are after me." He started up as there came a rapping at the door.

"Yes?" Tamara asked fearfully. "You're on soon, Miss Tamara." It was the dresser. "Can I help you?"
 "No, thank you. I'll let you know." They waited till faint footsteps had died away.

"I asked a friend of mine to send a parcel here—did it come?"
 "A parcel? Oh, yes!" She pointed to a corner and watched him with worried expression as he hastened to get it. "What's in there, darling?"
 "Just a hat and coat." Graeme turned his back as he wrenched out a coat and fumbled in a pocket. Ah, there was the gun.

Tamara helped him into it. "Take me with you, Larry," she begged.
 "No, Tommy, it's too dangerous." His fingers, fumbling in a pocket, found a piece of paper. He took it out eagerly.

"SUTTON AT STEDMAN HOUSE, LITTLE GREEN, REIGATE, TONIGHT.—R."

Larry crammed it back into his pocket and pulled the wide-brimmed hat over his face.

"Must you go?" she whispered anxiously.

"It's an appointment I've got to keep with a man named Sutton," he said in harsh tones. "If anybody asks for me, you don't know where I am—you don't know anything about me."

"Won't I ever see you again?" Fearfully she clung to him.

"I hope so, Tommy." He drew her into a close embrace. "But whatever happens, I love you."

"Take care of yourself, darling," she begged as she helped him out of the window on to the emergency fire-escape.

A last kiss, and then he was gone. When Tamara went down to sing to the patrons of the Leopard Club tears glistened in her eyes.

"He's gone, he was my only one. He's gone, he took away the sun. And left me sympathy. He's gone, the Lord alone knows where he's gone. And what is there to care for Since he's gone from me?"

The Squeaker at Bay

SOME hours before, a conference had taken place at Scotland Yard between Superintendent Marshall, Inspector Elford and Barrabal.

"You're quite sure Sutton will be at the party to-night?" Marshall asked.

"Well, it's part of his game, sir, and Graeme is desperate enough to follow him there," Barrabal answered.

"That means trouble for them and a great chance for you, Barrabal. You are sure you don't need any help?"

"No, sir."
 "Good!" The superintendent spoke curtly. "Keep your eyes and ears open and be prepared for anything."

"Right, sir." Barrabal donned a great coat over his dinner dress. "And thanks for the chance to handle this alone."

When Barrabal arrived at Stedman House he was greeted by Carol, who looked at him critically.

"I don't think I quite approve of your collar."

Barrabal laughed. "Sorry." He grinned down at the sweet face. "You didn't seem to worry about my clothes the first time we met."

"Why do you arrive late for my party?" she asked, ignoring his remark.

"Business responsibilities," Barrabal suddenly pointed at three elderly guests. "Who are those distinguished looking gentlemen?"

"Ssssh!" she cautioned. "Friends of the family."

"Your daddy's?"

"No mummy's."

"Mummy's!" he remarked, and with a laugh led her towards the ball-room.

"It will be best if we dance," whispered Carol. "Mother has some friends from Montreal that she has invited especially to meet you."

As they were about to dance, a waiter appeared with a tray laden full of drinks. Instinctively he reached out and took a glass, then he remembered and quickly put it back again. Resolutely he put his arms round Carol and waltzed on to the floor.

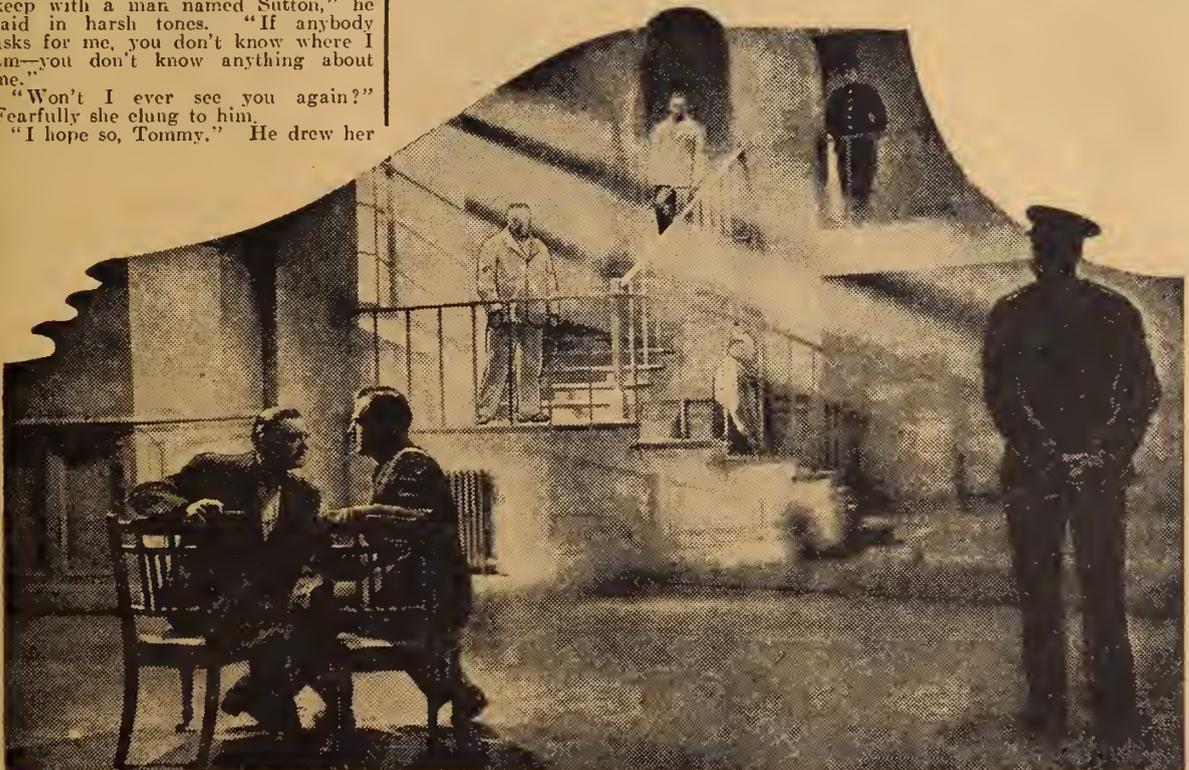

Through the gardens a figure walked stealthily. The coat-collar was turned up and the hat pulled down. It came to the windows of the ball-room and cautiously peered through. Seeing no sign of Sutton, the figure moved towards the next window.

Frank Sutton, coming up the garden path from a side gate, saw that figure silhouetted by the lighted window and stealthily darted towards a bush.

Carol found that her partner danced easily, but he seemed pre-occupied. All the while his gaze seemed to be more interested in the dancers. At the end of the second encore he piloted her through open french windows on to a terrace.

"Don't you like dancing?"

"Very much, but no,—er—at the moment." His eyes were searching the gardens.

"That's Jack Mayne—he'll be out next month," Barrabal told Sutton. "He'd shoot the Squeaker on sight if he knew who he was!"

"Are you worried about anything?" Carol asked.

"Yes—yes, I'm afraid I am."

"Something I've done?"

"No! No! I'm terribly happy about you." He stared down into the bluest of eyes. "As a matter of fact, I—"

"I'm so glad," she whispered, and her slim fingers crept up the lapels of his dinner jacket.

"You're grand—grand!" Barrabal's voice was husky as his arms went round her, and when she stood on tiptoe, her face uplifted, he just had to kiss her.

"Oh, we should go inside." Carol freed herself from his embrace. She was in love with a criminal, and she thought desperately for some means to get away so she could think what this meant. "There are hundreds of people—guests, newspaper men—"

"Suppose you go and talk to them, and I'll join you later."

"All right." She leaned forward swiftly and kissed him, and then, with a gay laugh, sped towards the windows, where she paused. "But not too much later."

But Barrabal had gone, striding swiftly among the trees. He must banish all thoughts of Carol from his mind until the Squeaker had been captured.

Frank Sutton gripped the revolver in his pocket and stealthily stalked the shadow, which he knew must be Larry Graeme. The Squeaker was determined to remove this menace to his security from his path.

Taking advantage of bushes, trees and beds of flowers, he drew nearer and nearer, and his hand viciously clutched at the hidden gun.

But Graeme had heard a slight sound and he was alert for danger. Without looking round, he walked on and was able to gain the cover afforded by the corner of the house. Here he crouched, tense and with a gun held ready.

Thinking that Graeme was unaware of danger, Sutton strode over the grass plot, but he became very cautious as he approached the corner. Graeme might be round the corner, peering in at a window, and he must not blunder into the man's arms. He must creep to the corner, and if Graeme's back was towards him, he would shoot his enemy down.

Sutton peered round the corner and saw no sight of his quarry. Thinking that Graeme had gone on round the house, he stepped forward to follow, and it was then that Graeme, who had flattened himself against the wall and camouflaged himself with the ivy, jumped out of cover.

"Good-evening, Mr. Sutton."

"Hallo, Graeme."

"We're going to take a little walk."

"Where?" Sutton demanded, his finger on the trigger of the gun concealed in his overcoat pocket.

"To a police station," Graeme rapped out. "I came here to-night to kill you, but I've changed my mind."

"If you turn me in they'll get you, too."

"They've got me," was the answer. "I'll do fifteen years, but you'll do life."

"Don't be a fool, Graeme." Sutton began to edge round so that the gun covered his enemy. "I can get you out of the country to-night."

"Life in a prison, full of men who know you and hate you." Graeme laughed mockingly. "How will you like that, Sutton?"

"Listen! I'll give you all the money December 4th, 1937.

you want. Anything. You'll get everything that's coming to you. I'll give it you right now." All the while he had been turning, and as he finished he fired through his coat.

The bullet caught Graeme in the stomach. His gun slid from his hand and he clutched at the fatal wound. The agony made him bend double, whilst the Squeaker watched, ready to blaze off again. Graeme groaned once and then sprawled full length on the stones.

Putting on gloves, the Squeaker vigorously wiped the gun he had used before throwing it into some bushes, then he darted round the back of the house, heading for the main entrance.

Barrabal heard that single shot and for a moment was unable to tell the exact direction. He raced forward and almost stumbled over the still figure. His torch flashed and he muttered fiercely under his breath when he saw that it was Larry Graeme.

Inspector Elford had posted men in the grounds and he had heard that single shot. He came tearing across the lawn to find Barrabal bending over the body, searching the pockets and transferring some of the contents to his own pockets.

wise by Elford that there might be trouble down at the Stedman mansion, and, together with a number of police, was present when the body of Graeme was taken away in an ambulance shortly afterwards. He got through on the 'phone to his paper.

"Graeme had been linked to the Squeaker case before his escape from Scotland Yard," he reported. "Inspector Elford and several policemen began questioning the guests and servants at the Stedman house shortly after ten o'clock. Late this evening the police appear to have narrowed their case down to a single suspect."

And that suspect was Barrabal.

The inspector had suggested that it would be best for Barrabal if he went back and joined the guests. Superintendent Marshall had given certain instructions if such an emergency arose. In the house, Elford strode up to Barrabal and touched him on the shoulder.

"Captain Leslie, you're under arrest."

"For what?" demanded Barrabal, knowing he had to play a part.

"Murder!"

Elford had requested, after interviewing some of the guests and servants, that Captain Leslie, Frank Sutton and Carol go to one of the many rooms. A policeman had been posted outside the door. The idea was to save the ineognito of Barrabal and allay the suspicions of Sutton.

Carol was much upset when Elford ordered the arrest of Leslie, and she demanded to know the reason. It was Sutton, well pleased that no one had questioned him, that answered.

"Because, I'm afraid, there's nothing else the police can do in the circumstances."

"But you've no proof against him," Carol stormed at the inspector. "Nobody saw him do anything."

"You're only making things difficult for the inspector, Carol," cried Sutton. "I'd like to help Leslie, too, but, after all, Scotland Yard have a job to do."

Carol swung round on him.

"Are they going to do it whether they're right or wrong?" she cried indignantly. "Whether a man's innocent or guilty. Are they interested in justice, or merely making an arrest?"

"Wait a minute, Carol," Sutton spoke as if to a wayward child. "Let's be fair to the police. Leslie, unfortunately, has a bad record. He admits knowing Larry Graeme, and papers were found on him that could have been taken only from the body. You said yourself that he disappeared into the garden shortly before the killing."

"But that doesn't prove anything," Carol gazed at Barrabal, who was sitting with his head in his hands.

"The murderer must have come from the house," patiently spoke Inspector Elford. "Otherwise you would have seen him, since you came along the drive." He was looking at the Squeaker. "Isn't that so, Mr. Sutton?"

"Yes."

Barrabal looked up and said in weary tones:

"Can't we get along now, inspector?"

"We can."

When Barrabal stood up a policeman stepped forward and snapped handcuffs on his wrists.

"Have you nothing to say? No explanation? Nothing?" Carol stood in front of the arrested man.

"There's nothing I can say."

"Then you did it?" She recoiled as if he were some loathsome creature.

YOU CAN'T BUY LUCK

The Mascot That Wasn't!

JOE BALDWIN sat in the pouring rain in his box at the Kentucky Derby and watched his horse, Sarcasm, lose by a big margin. He was dismayed; he couldn't understand it. Sarcasm was famous for his victories on a wet track. Conditions were ideal for him to-day—yet he had lost!

On his way back to New York, sitting with set face in his big car, Joe reviewed his philanthropies. Nothing seemed wrong there. Joe Baldwin was wealthy, generous, and very superstitious. He denied the latter, saying that his particular form of superstition—the donating to charity of large sums—was merely a form of insurance against bad luck, so that his horses would always win.

To his friends' gibes he returned his enigmatic smile, and saw his theory fulfilled by the romping home of his entries as easy winners. His tall figure was always to be seen at big meetings, his inscrutable face rarely showing any excitement. Anyone with a hard-luck story could be certain of getting something out of him if one of his horses was due to race.

Yet something had gone wrong this time, although his luck insurance seemed in order. Why, he had just given his pet mascot, Jean Jason, that dark and exotic gold-digger, enough money to ensure her a grand holiday on the Riviera. She had said her health was giving the doctor concern. Joe, having no illusions about her, had rung the doctor himself and found she was in perfect health, and had, in fact, suggested the trip herself. Still, Joe gave her the money, for he sincerely believed she brought him luck. As she herself once said to Paul Vinette, the artist, who had his share of Joe's donation: "I'm his luck token, his rabbit-foot, four-leaved clover and horse-shoe all rolled into one! He spends money on me, I cheer for him, his horses win—and he spends more money on me!"

Joe's mind went back to the evening when he had seen her off on the boat for Europe. She had feigned illness, much to his secret amusement. After all, this would bring him luck again. Her good-bye was fond, but even Joe didn't know that the man who had brazenly asked him for a light outside her cabin was Paul Vinette, who was sharing the trip with her.

The process was simple: when he was short of money, she just bought one of his etchings with the cash given her by Joe Baldwin, and everybody was satisfied. Privately they had a good laugh at Joe, but they kept their association secret, for it would never do to have their source of wealth drying up.

Joe dismissed Jean Jason from his mind, but it wasn't until he was in his New York home, discussing the scratching of Sarcasm from the next big race, the Preakness Handicap, that a chance remark made by his trainer, Ben, put him on the right track.

"Scratch him?" Ben was aghast. "Listen, boss, it's your horse and your money—but that baby could win the Preakness on crutches! I know horses, I've spent my life with them since I ran away from the Orphans' Home—"

The Orphans' Home! Into Joe's mind flashed a reason for the failure of Sarcasm. He remembered the call he had made at the orphanage in Kentucky with his sister, when she and her husband, on the way to the Derby, had gone there to choose a child for adoption. Having nothing to do, Joe had hung around reading his racing paper.

He remembered now! The children had been erecting a maypole, ready for the outdoor fête next day, and praying for fine weather. He had wished for a wet day, and said so, much to the surprise of Betty McKay, the assistant there. Betty McKay was small and dark, with great luminous black eyes aglow with life. But Joe hadn't noticed that aspect of her during a sharp exchange of words, and for her part she had wondered how any man could be so self-confident and selfish.

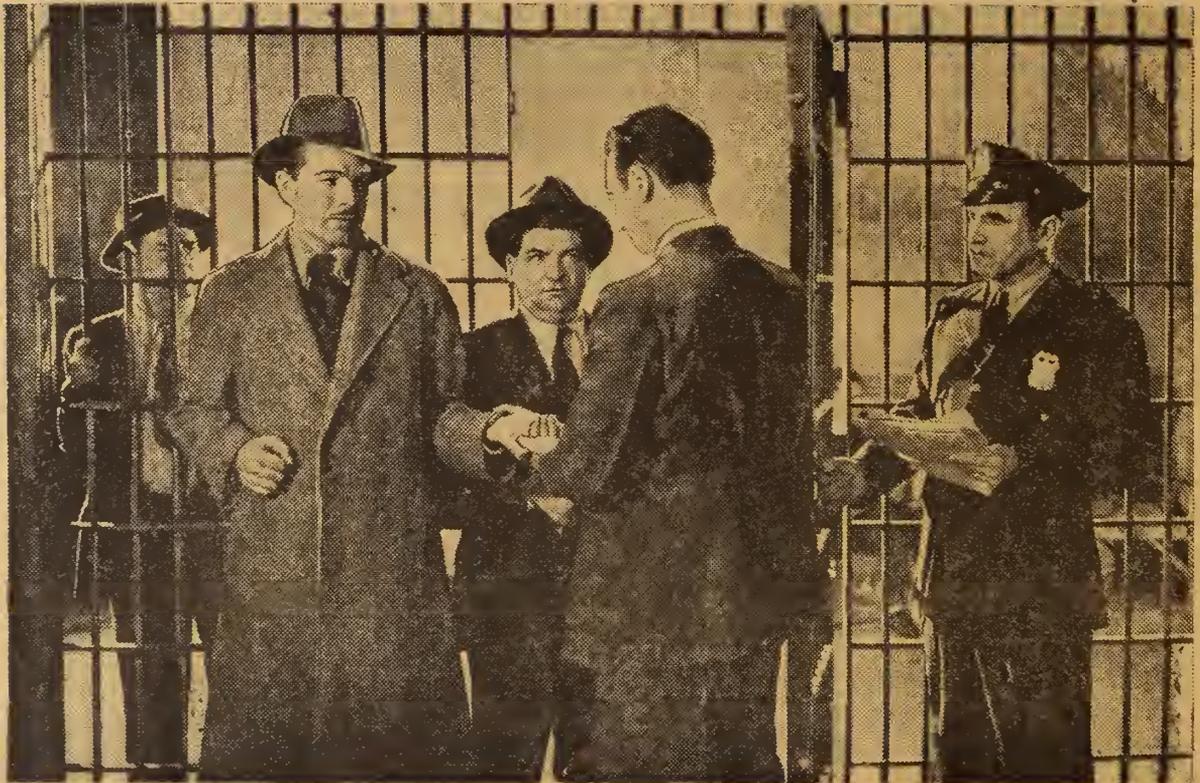

Well, he had had his wish! It had rained. The children, woebegone, had spent the day indoors, and Joe equally woebegone, had watched his horse lose! That was it—his attitude to their party had brought him bad luck! Calling Spike, his chauffeur, and Rivers, his dignified butler, he set off straight away for Kentucky. Some time later he was down at the orphanage, talking to Miss King, the superintendent, and Betty McKay.

"What possible objection can you have?" he asked. "The kids would enjoy a party, wouldn't they?"

"I doubt it," said Betty coldly.

"Why do you say that, Betty?" Miss King exclaimed. "I think Mr. Baldwin is making a very generous offer."

"And I'm sure there must be a catch to the very generous offer," said Betty.

Joe was ordered to put out his left hand to be handcuffed to another prisoner.

"All right," said Joe, striding to and fro in the neat office, "I'll tell you. Those kids heard me ask for rain on Derby Day. Every last one of them had it in for me, and my horse lost the Derby!"

"It's a superstition?" asked Miss King.

"You can call it a superstition if you like," Joe shrugged. "But anyway, I want those kids to change their minds about me before the Preakness next Saturday."

"Well," gasped Betty, "that's one reason I never thought of!"

"Now can I do what I want?" Joe smiled.

"As long as you've explained, it's all right with me," Betty shrugged.

"And I've no objection," said Miss King.

"Splendid! I'll arrange everything and check it with you later."

Joe did the thing thoroughly. The flabbergasted Spike was given money and told to get all the things necessary for a party—a real blow-out. Spike was given full control, much to that perky young man's amazement and horror. However, the chauffeur got Rivers on the 'phone and ordered him to find entertainers.

"I want you to round up some acrobats, some jugglers, and dogs that can do tricks, and anything else you can find that kids would like. Put them on the train to-night for Louisville. So-long, Laughing Water!"

Rivers made a round of the theatrical agents, and did nolly. Spike rounded up three very tough pals of his, and they found themselves roped in to help look after the children, hand the food round, tell stories, and, in fact, make themselves generally useful.

When Joe Baldwin strolled into the decorated hall where the party was being held, he found things going with a bang. The jugglers, the acrobats, the performing dogs were going over very well. Soon, to his own surprise, he found himself enjoying it as much as the youngsters. By the time the meal was laid and being tucked into, he had forgotten all about his reason for giving the party, and losing himself in the general gaiety. Later, when the wreckage was being cleared up, he met Betty.

December 4th, 1937.

"Well," she smiled, "you've squared yourself with the children."

"Squared myself?" he said, puzzled. "Oh, yes! You know, I'd forgotten about that!"

"You're strange," said Betty softly. He smiled. They had become friends.

He was getting very interested in this girl, so much so that he lingered in this beautiful Kentucky countryside long after Sarcasm, who was in great form, won the Preakness at record speed. Whether the jinx had been laid or not Joe didn't know. Betty didn't care. Seated one evening in the arbour in the orphanage grounds, she tried to draw him out, to find out something about this strange man. She found a hidden warmth. Joe Baldwin was human. It was in his own drawing way that he proposed to her. He didn't believe in beating about the bush.

But there came a time when he had to return to New York on business, and he learned that Jean Jason was back and asking for him unceasingly. He prepared himself for an awkward interview, having told Betty before he left what he was going to do.

"I'm going to see Jean Jason," he said. "Then, when I come back, we'll set a date."

"You don't think she'll make any trouble?"

"Of course not! I've too much luck insurance now, with you and the whole orphanage pulling for me!"

"Joe," she said pleadingly, "I do wish you'd get over that!"

"What d'you want me to do?" he laughed. "Stop doing things for people?"

"Of course not! I want you to know the real pleasure of doing things for people just for the sake of doing them. Oh, it's different from being generous for just what you yourself get out of it!"

"What difference does it make," he smiled, "as long as I do them?"

"A lot of difference." "Oh, I don't get it," he exclaimed, rising. "Come on, let's dance."

"I Killed Jean Jason!"

JOE found Jean Jason awaiting him in her luxurious apartment at the Renrad Arms. She was elusive; he was calm.

"How was your trip?" he asked. "Not nearly the fun I thought it would be," she said caressingly. "I missed you too much. Were you lonesome for me?"

"Well," he hedged, "I've been rather busy. Jean We won't be seeing much of each other from now on."

"Really?" she said coolly. "Do I know her?"

Baldwin laughed and explained. She was disbelieving at first, but realised he was serious when she chipped him about getting married and living in the little suburban home.

"What about little Jean?" she asked bluntly.

"Little Jean," smiled Joe, handing her a cheque, "goes right on cheering for me and my horses."

"No sale, Joe," she said calmly, looking at the cheque as he turned away. "If I keep on being your luck insurance, you'll have to multiply this by four!"

"But I can't, Jean!"

"It's your fault," she told him. "You taught me to like expensive things."

She was calculating. Cold, he saw, as he considered a while. She would be dangerous if her demand were not met. "I might double it," he said slowly. "But that's the limit."

"All right," she nodded. "For old times' sake!" As it would take a day or two to get that much ready cash together, he promised to see her on Saturday at eight, and left her smiling triumphantly. She was all ready to receive him on the appointed evening, more carefully made up than usual, dressed more alluringly than usual. When the door-bell rang, she went eagerly to open it, then stepped back with a little gasp.

It was not Joe, but Paul Vinette. Agitatedly she asked him to go away, fearing Joe would arrive any moment. He, knowing a cheque was expected, intended to be on hand in case she tried to double-cross him.

"You know I wouldn't double-cross you!" she protested. "You'd double-cross yourself for that much money," he said calmly. "You don't get rid of me so easily. I'm going to be hiding right in there!"

He started towards the bed-room; she pulled him back. "If you must stay, hide in the kitchen!"

Suspiciously he looked at her. "Why not in there?" She started to make excuses, but he ignored her, went in and stopped short, whistling gently, his expression menacing. Trunks and suitcases, partly packed, littered the floor.

"Going to run out on me, eh?" Lazily he strolled to a chair, sat down and lit a cigarette. "I'm going to stay here until Mr. Baldwin arrives."

Desperately she went into the bedroom, and when she came back he taunted. Her expression had changed, was now hard and dangerous. Unwaveringly she pointed a little automatic at him.

"Get up out of that chair!" Eyes staring, he hunched forward, hands gripping the arms of the chair till his knuckles showed white. Slowly she came towards him, her eyes narrowing.

"Jean, Jean, darling!" he stammered. "Be careful!" "Hurry up!" she said through clenched teeth.

"But — but — you don't understand, dear." He was watching for a chance. "I — I was only trying —"

"Get your coat!" "You win," said Paul, and suddenly leaped at her. The gun flew from her hand. Together they fell to the floor, grabbing for it. There was a struggle, a sharp report. Presently Paul rose, panting. Dazed, he looked down at her. Jean Jason was dead!

He got his hat and coat, and, leaving her lying there, went downstairs. He was standing in the shadow of the porch when Joe Baldwin arrived. Nervously he lit a cigarette.

"Hold that light, please," said Joe pleasantly as he came up the steps. Only for a brief moment in the flaring light did he glimpse the artist's face. "Here, keep them," said Paul Vinette, handing him the box, and watched with a slight grin as Baldwin, thanking him, ran up the steps. As soon as the racehorse owner was inside, Paul, his brain seething with an idea, ran for the nearest call-box.

"Police headquarters?" he said. "This is Joe Baldwin speaking. I've just killed Jean Jason in the Renrad Arms!"

Only the love of Betty Mackay sustained Joe Baldwin in the next few days. The case made a sensation in the papers—"Gambler Held for Murder!" they shouted, and, later, "Baldwin Indicted for Slaying!"

Wooden-faced, he sat in the court on the day of his trial, and listened to the circumstantial evidence piling up from witness after witness. The porter at the Renrad Arms had seen him entering at eight o'clock. The desk sergeant who had received the phone call described it. The detectives who had investigated described finding Joe in the apartment, searching him, and discovering the cheque for fifty thousand dollars. The gun which had killed Jean Jason was traced by the serial number to have been bought by Joe. On the stand he battled this evidence.

"I did go to the apartment that night to give her the fifty thousand I'd promised her. As for the gun, several apartments near hers were burgled last October, and she asked me to buy a weapon for her. I didn't make that call to headquarters. I didn't kill Jean Jason!"

He went on to testify that he hadn't needed matches to find his way in the apartment, because all the lights were on. He had been there only a minute or two when the police arrived.

"Not long enough," suggested the District Attorney. "to 'phone her quarters and smoke a couple of cigarettes while you changed your mind about confessing?"

"No," declared Joe decisively. Triumphant the District Attorney dismissed him and recalled the detective. It was proved that the matches found in the apartment came from the packet found on Joe when he was searched.

"I asked a man for a light," he exclaimed. "He gave me a packet of matches. It must have been he who left the burnt matches in the apartment!"

But after the formidable array of evidence the truth seemed slight even to Joe. It was with no visible emotion that he heard the jury declare him guilty. Betty stood by him. She was the first to come and see him in his cell.

"If only," she said desperately. "there was some way of finding the man who gave you those matches!" "I'd know him if I saw him," he said dispiritedly. "But I can't look for him while I'm here. No, I tell you, luck's turned against me."

"Luck!" she exclaimed scornfully. "Nonsense, Joe. I know you're innocent. I'll find another lawyer." "No, there's nothing you can do, honey."

"Don't give up hope, Joe," she cried. "I'll do something!"

The Eleven Suspects

BUT Joe Baldwin had little hope that Betty would be able to do anything. He must get out, find that man for whose crime he was facing death. It was on a misty night that he was preparing to leave the cells and go to the prison where he would await execution. Two by two, the criminals were taken out to the police van.

Joe's turn came next. He was ordered to put out his left hand to be handcuffed to another prisoner. Suddenly he acted. His right fist swung, knocking the policeman off his feet, and the other prisoner fell on top of him.

"You know my record, Brent," urged Joe. "Bring him here so that I can see him. You've got to give me a break!"

Heart in his mouth, Joe ran for the door and flung it open, knocking flying another policeman who was guarding it outside. He was free! Dodging the people gathered round the door, he darted behind a car and tore up the street, followed by shouts and the shrilling of police whistles.

Revolvers cracked. He heard bullets whistling overhead. Still he ran on, not daring to slacken his pace. A dark side turning offered refuge. Up it he tore, sprinting between high walls and round a corner. The sounds of pursuit had died down. He had shaken them off.

There was only one place he could think of to go. Nearby was a small garage, owned and run by a young chap to whom he had lent a sum of money recently when he was in danger of having his taxis seized for debt. The garage was empty when Joe arrived there, but he hid and waited patiently. Some time later he heard the whine of a car, and when it stopped and the driver got out, he stepped out from hiding.

"Frank!" he called.

Frank Brent turned with a start.

"Joe!"

"You've got to help me," said Joe urgently. "I'm in a jam."

"Yeah, I know," Frank nodded. "The extras are on the street already—Baldwin Makes Spectacular Escape!"

"I need some money," said Joe. "Enough to hide out."

Frank Brent grinned. He wouldn't hear of Joe's seeking another hiding-place, with all the police in the city looking for him.

"You're staying with me," he declared and, in spite of Joe's protests that he'd get himself into trouble, took him to his quarters. "Not much like your home, Joe, but it'll do for a hide-out."

"If the police find me here," said Joe desperately, "you'll get a ten-year stretch!"

"Didn't you come through for me?" said Frank Brent easily.

"No, I didn't!" snapped Joe. "I came through for myself. I didn't give that for you. I never cared a hoot for anyone I helped," he added bitterly. "I did it for luck, but I see things differently now and I'm getting out."

"Just a minute!" Frank pushed him into a chair. "You did a great thing for me. Maybe you helped yourself by doing it, but that didn't change what you did. Now don't do me out of helping you, because I want to. Take it easy. I'll fix some coffee."

It was as they were discussing the case later that Joe suddenly got an idea when he was taking a light from Frank. His eyes narrowed as the flaring match brought back memories. He thumped the table excitedly. They had been discussing the man who had given him the light outside the apartment building. Joe had a tantalising idea that he had seen him somewhere before. Now he knew.

"The boat!" he exclaimed. "Now I know where I saw him!"

Quickly he went on to explain, telling Frank of the scene on the night Jean and the man had gone abroad together. The chances were that they had come back together.

"If we could get the passenger lists from those two boats, and find which names appeared on each—"

"I'll get those lists in the morning," Frank declared.

"No, not you," rapped Joe. "Jean's name appears on both. If anyone in the steamship office got suspicious you'd be December 4th, 1937.

followed and the police would come here. Betty—she can get them!"

"But it's a cinch they'll be trailing her!"

"Of course. But," suggested Joe, "if she happens to take your cab, and happens to leave the lists in it—"

"Betty it is!" grinned Frank.

Sitting impatiently in the little room next day, smoking cigarette after cigarette, Joe was beginning to wonder if something had happened, when Frank returned. Joe jumped up in pleased surprise, for with him was Betty. She had made Frank bring her there after she had got the lists, and they had taken all the afternoon dodging the two detectives who were trailing her in the hope that she would lead to the hidden Joe.

"And the chances he took in traffic!" she exclaimed, smiling.

"Look at the chance he's taking in hiding me here," said Joe quietly. "Well, he's taught me what it means to do something unselfishly."

"Cut it out!" said Frank uncomfortably, and they got to work on the lists. After hours of patient work, checking, re-checking, they narrowed the list of duplicated names to eleven.

"Now," sighed Joe, "I've got to go out and find these men and get a look at each of them."

"That's too risky," remonstrated Betty. "Tell me what he looks like and I'll see if he matches any of these."

"Well," Joe concentrated, "I can only give you a general idea—thirty or thirty-two, close to my height, slender, a small moustache. And he had dark eyes."

Betty was weary and footsore by the time she had found the eleven men, and by various pretexts spoken to them for a while and studied them. Had she but known it, she was talking to the man himself when she called on Paul Vinette, the artist, and talked to him about buying one of his etchings.

"It's exactly what I've been looking for," she mused, "if it will fit over my fireplace."

"It is a bit large," he agreed.

"I'll measure the space," she said, preparing to go, "and come back to-morrow."

In Brent's cab, she told him the result of her inquiries.

"Well, you've seen them all," he remarked.

"Yes, and only three of them fit the description."

"I'll have Joe pick you up in the morning," he declared. "Then you can point these three out for him."

Meanwhile, the police had not been idle. Betty's comings and goings had puzzled them. The keen-faced Lieutenant Bond pored over the steamship lists, and noted the fact that Jean Jason's name appeared on both.

"Whatever this McKay is up to," said McGrath, his assistant, "Baldwin is back of it."

"You're right," snapped Bond. "I guess we'd better have a little chat with her."

Thus it was to Joe's dismay as, wearing dark glasses, he sat in Brent's cab outside a big building, waiting for Betty, he saw her stopped by two detectives as she approached the cab. Nervously he stared to the front. As soon as Betty knew they were police she tried to get Joe out of it.

"You can go, driver," she said calmly.

"No, you don't," said the detective, not unkindly. "Get in, Lieutenant Bond wants to talk to you. Police headquarters," he added to Joe's back.

Now that he had got over the first shock, Joe found a certain grim humour in the situation. What would the detectives say if they knew they were being driven to headquarters by the very man they were seeking! He drew up outside the building and waited while Betty was taken inside. His heart went out to her. It would be a nasty ordeal. He hoped she kept her head. To while away the time he bought a newspaper from a boy who was yelling all about the escaped murderer.

He was ready when she came hurrying out. Her interview had not been so terrible. Bond had been very kind, but it had been a game of bluff. He knew very well that she was aware of Joe's hiding-place. He had warned her that she was heading for trouble, aiding and abetting a fugitive from justice. She only smiled and asked permission to go. Although he admired her courage, he set a man to follow her when she came out.

"He's sure I know where you're hiding," she told Joe as they drove away.

"He must be," he replied grimly. "We're being followed. No, don't look around."

"Oh!" she exclaimed. "What are we going to do?"

"Lose that car," he said quietly, "and then run down those three men before anyone sees this."

He handed the newspaper back to her and she gave an exclamation of dismay. Under the headline, "Fugitive Still At Large" were pictures of herself and Joe.

They worked quickly after that. Two of the men were brought by Betty to the doors of the establishments in which they worked, so that Joe, in his cab by the side-walk, could identify them. Both were passed.

"There's only one name left on the list, isn't there?" he asked, as wearily he got into the cab.

"Only one," she agreed. "So it must be the man."

"Unless we've figured the whole thing wrong," he said dispiritedly. "Well, what's the name?"

"Paul Vinette," she said.

To the artist's apartments they drove, and she went up, leaving Joe outside in the cab once more. Had she only known it, the newspaper had already done the damage. Even as she rang, Paul Vinette was just getting his bags out preparatory to packing, for one look at her picture in the paper was enough to make him decide that things were getting too hot.

"Good-morning," said Betty, when he calmly opened the door. "I've come for the etching."

"So the space over the fireplace is large enough, eh," he smiled, with a note of irony.

"Yes, you said fifty dollars," When he nodded she added, her heart pounding: "Would you mind very much carrying it to my cab?"

"No, not at all," he replied, to her relief "I'll wrap it up."

"You needn't bother!" she exclaimed hurriedly, but with a smile he was gone upstairs with the etching. His movements were swift when out of her sight.

He looked out of the window and smiled grimly. Even with the dark glasses he could recognise the man at the wheel of the cab. Eyes glinting, he went to the telephone, and once more Paul Vinette put the police on the trail of Joe Baldwin.

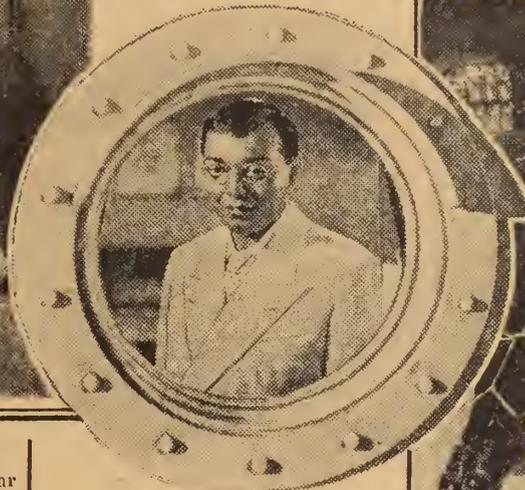

He took his time over wrapping the picture. Police sirens shrilled outside. Agitatedly Betty ran to the window below. Even as Joe, warned by the

Chinese New Year's Day

THE night of the Chinese New Year in Chinatown, in San Francisco. Processions of grotesquely clad figures wearing huge masks, fireworks, the clash of cymbals, and the high-pitched shoutings of the many thousands of Chinese who inhabit this part of the great city.

Bells clanging, boys and girls dancing and laughing and making whoopee. Large policemen parading the streets and not seeing any more than they wished to see.

One officer of the law had to stop. A small, insinuating little pedlar persisted in offering his wares to all and sundry. He had a rug and a sack of oddments over one shoulder, and, although dirty and shabby, he had an engaging smile under his scrubby little beard.

"Listen, Wung Hi Foo, or whatever your name is. No trading on New Year's Day," said the policeman. "Can't you see all the shops are shut? I've told you twice already—third time's unlucky!"

The little Chink gave him an upward glance, then nodded his head.

"I go, illustrious sir. This one sorry."

The policeman watched him shuffle away into the crowd, then passed on. The pedlar made a way into a side street, his glance darting right and left at the noisy crowd. He suddenly pulled up at a curio shop from which a merry-maker was just emerging.

This man had on a monstrous head-piece shaped like an overgrown turnip. His long, white tunic and Chinese trousers made him quite ridiculous, and the pedlar stared as he watched the masked man fumbling with the shop door-key.

"Can I assist you, sir?" he asked politely.

The masked man jerked out the key from the lock and ran off into the crowd without troubling to reply. The pedlar tried the shop door—the handle turned, the latch lifted, and the door gave to his push. He entered.

The shop was a deep, narrow one, and seemed empty. But as the pedlar padded softly alongside a counter, a tall European suddenly rose up from behind it.

"What are you doing here?" came the sharp demand. "The shop is closed."

"The door was open, so this humble person ventured to enter. He is interested in curios. That is a very beautiful banner of pictured silk in your window."

"The standard of the Chinese tiger," snapped the shopman. "He bites and scratches!"

"So?" The slanting, brown eyes gazed up innocently. "You are interested in strange things. Let this poor person show you a treasure." He dived into his sack and brought out a small, brass figure. "A netsuke from a great Japanese collector."

"I don't trade to-day. Get out!"

"But look, honourable gentleman. See, the head screws off, and underneath, in secret place hidden, is this jewel." A gem flashed under the shop lights, and the shopman's hard eyes, catching the gleams from it, changed swiftly. "A diamond from the Romanoff crown."

"Probably only cut glass." The gem changed hands, and the big shopman put up his jeweller's eyeglass, scrutinising the stone. "I'll give you a hundred dollars—and chance where you stole it."

The little, cringing pedlar wailed:

"But it is worth twenty thousand dollars!" He plucked at his stubby beard. "It matters not how this one comes to possess it—I sell it to you for five thousand dollars, because you ask no questions. Verily it is a gift."

The diamond was hastily passed back. The large policeman had trailed the pedlar.

"At it again?" He strode up to the little man, who had dropped his sack. "This is the third time!"

The pedlar caught at the great hand stretched out to grab him. He pulled hand and arm across his chest, got the policeman clear off his feet by a ju-jitsu trick, and flung him right over the counter into the shopman as the latter leapt to assist the law. The shopman was staggered for a moment or so, but came at the small beggar, who, ready for him, snatched him into the same embrace, hurled him up, and banged him down flat on his own curio-littered counter. A sharp crack of his head on some brassware as he fell put him out for the count.

The pedlar gathered up his sack, draped the Persian rug over it; then, without hurrying, took a cat-like departure.

On Board the Marco Polo

A BOISTEROUS party of young folk were being shown by a steward into the cabin allotted to Mr. Bob Hitchings, son of the wealthy owner of the Hitchings Steamships, trading between San Francisco and the East. Naturally, the best cabin on the Marco Polo had been reserved for the young gentleman, and he and his friends were celebrating his departure for Shanghai with much noise and champagne. The steward, sharp-featured and wiry, extolled the comforts of the suite.

"Everything you want, sir, I fancy. And I'm here, name of Henry Carson, to serve you morning, noon, and night."

"Good man," spluttered Mr. Bob, slightly flushed and rather excited.

December 4th, 1937.

"Have some champagne? Let everyone have champagne—pailsful of it!"

Great cheering followed. The noise became so great that the door of the opposite suite opened and a small, dapper Japanese gentleman emerged. He gazed smilingly through gold-rimmed spectacles at the hilarious crowd across the passage.

The steward whispered in a lull to his young master:

"Your father, sir, is here. In your bed-room. Wants to see you. Alone."

Bob Hitchings put down his glass and hiccupped a little as he called:

"Excuse me, boys and girls—back in a minute."

He went into the bed-room to face his father, a tall, up-standing man with grave face lighted by humorous, blue eyes.

"Bob."

"Yessir?"

"Sober?"

"Fairly so, sir."

Bob sat down on the bed and tried to get his good-looking face into proper expression.

"Son, I expect big things of you. You are to take over the Shanghai office eventually, but for the next year you'll work with our representative, Joe Wilkie. Here is a very confidential letter for him which I give to you in secrecy. That's why I'm here. Don't leave this letter about."

"Okay, sir." Bob took the long, narrow envelope and slipped it into his breast-pocket. "Dad, I won't disgrace you. To-day I'm a little—well, slightly

"Quite so." Mr. Hitchings' eyes twinkled. "Well, good-bye once more. I know you'll be a credit to the Hitchings' line and carry it to further successes." His voice shook a little as he finished.

The old fellow led the way back to the cabin.

"Glad to see you, folks—but forgive my hurrying away." He almost bumped into the small, smiling Japanese in the passage as he turned to go towards the stairway. "Sorry!"

"My fault, please. I was not looking." The voice was soft and smooth, the cleanly shaven face was expressive of all kindness. "It is pleasing to watch young persons when they are happy."

"Go in and join them," spoke Hitchings over his shoulder. "My son Robert is going to Shanghai—he's a good boy."

"Thank you." The Japanese entered the cabin, beaming right and left. "I am Hiroshi Moto, if you please. I also go to Shanghai."

"Have a drink?" Bob gripped Mr. Moto's soft hand. "Pleased to have your company. These are my friends, but no time to introduce 'em. What's yours?"

"Some fruit juice, if you please. Not champagne—I do not drink when I go to sea."

The steward broke in. "Ship's bell ringing, ladies and gents. All visitors ashore."

In much laughter and confusion the party broke up. Mr. Moto and Bob were left smiling at each other in the passage between their suites.

"I will not now intrude," said Mr. Moto. "If you wish company any time, my cabin is opposite." He added, with a little gesture: "And we have same steward, I think?"

"Carson?" Bob nodded. "Carson's been with the line a long while. Reliable and—and all that." He pressed a hand to his forehead. "Bit of a headache—hopo to see a lot of you, Mr. Moto, later on."

December 4th, 1937.

"Gloria"

NEXT day Bob's headache still persisted. Mr. Moto was most sympathetic.

"Come with me to the bar," he invited. "There I make you very pleasing 'morning-after' cocktail."

He made Bob drink an extraordinary concoction of mint and sugar and raw spirit. The youngster pulled a wry face over the edge of the long glass tumbler, but presently began to cheer up.

"Gee, I'm better!"

"If you please," smiled Moto. "Now we take the little promenade along deck."

A friendship grew up quickly between them. Moto never asked questions, but had a knack of making Bob talk.

"The gov'nor's worrying about the smuggling that's going on," Bob told Moto when they were chatting in the smoke-room. "Some blokes are using us to get diamonds and other things through the Customs. There's a receiver in San Francisco."

"Sure!" agreed Mr. Moto. "But you go first to Shanghai?"

"To see what's being done there by Wilkie, our representative. I have a letter for him—" Bob checked himself. "A tip from the gov'nor, I guess. The line would be heavily fined if smuggling were traced to us, whether we were innocent or not."

"Yes," again agreed the Japanese. "Your Mister Wilkie good fellow, eh?"

"Oh, sure!" Bob answered. "I know him well—he comes over every year on furlough. You travelling on business, too?"

"For health," replied Mr. Moto. "Sea air very good. I do a few parlour tricks," he added modestly. "With the cards. You wish a fine hand at nap? Watch me, please."

He snapped his fingers and immediately had the ace of clubs between thumb and forefinger. Another gesture—and the king was there. Then, with a jerk of his wrist, the hand was complete—ace, king, queen, jack, ten.

"Show me how you do it," cried Bob. "Gee, it's marvellous!"

"Some little practice," smiled Moto. "Also the ju-jitsu—I do him. Useful sometimes."

Days passed and they entered Honolulu, where new passengers came aboard. A very pretty girl, garlanded after the Honolulu fashion with a necklet of flowers, attracted Bob's prompt attention. While he was talking to her, Mr. Moto crept up behind them with a Kodak and took an unbeknown snap of the girl.

She seemed foreign, although her English was perfect. She told them that the native dock officials had insisted on giving her the floral necklet.

"I'm going to Shanghai," she told Bob in answer to his question. "Excuse me now, I must see if my baggage is all aboard."

Bob found out from Steward Carson that she was a Miss Gloria Danton and that she had engaged an expensive suite. She did not appear on deck until the next day.

Bob fell head over heels in love with her and, despite one or two rebuffs, managed to draw her into deck games and dancing, rather neglecting Mr. Moto.

"Who is the little man?" Gloria asked him one night.

"Just an acquaintance on board," Bob told her.

"He has a beautiful ring on his little finger—a royal diamond," said the girl.

"Has he?" Bob hadn't noticed.

"Let's go on deck—it's a lovely night." He asked her to marry him when, presently, they stood together under the moon, the great ship throbbing her way onward.

"Three days ago you didn't even know me," she answered. "Who am I—who are you?"

"Oh, I'm Bob Hitchings," he answered quickly. "My father owns this ship and the rest of the Hitchings fleet." He took her hand in his; her fingers were trembling a little. "And you, you'll be my wife—and we'll live happy ever afterwards!"

She shook her head.

"I may be all sorts of a designing person. No, Bob, we'll stay friends."

She turned abruptly from him.

"Let's go down; I'm chilly." Mr. Moto was prowling around the ship. He saw the young couple saying good-night outside Gloria's cabin. He stayed in hiding, watching them. While he was hidden he became aware of Carson, the steward, also peeping from a cabin doorway near by. Mr. Moto shrank farther into the shadows. The cabin was Bob's.

Mr. Moto watched Carson close the door; whereupon the little Japanese gentleman crept up to it. Bob and Gloria were thinking only of themselves. Mr. Moto silently opened the cabin door and caught Carson by Bob's locker with a letter in his hand.

"Thank you," purred Mr. Moto. "I take that letter."

Carson drew back with a snarl, the long envelope in a hand sharply thrust behind his back.

"Stand clear, you sneaking rat!" he whispered tensely. "I knew you the moment I saw you."

"So?" Mr. Moto gently breathed.

"All the same, I take the letter."

"Get out of here!"

Mr. Moto still smiled.

"You wear big head mask at the New Year," he stated. "But I recognise walk of your legs. You are working with that jeweller. So—you give me that letter."

Carson fired and the Jap dropped to the floor. There was little noise; the gun had a silencer. The steward regarded Mr. Moto's spread-out body for a long moment; then he began to sidle towards it.

Mr. Moto's hand caught his ankle. Carson was suddenly gripped in a ju-jitsu throw. He was flung upward in a wild whirling of legs and arms against the hard teak ceiling and, as his head crashed into it, bounded from there to the floor. Carson lay still and the Jap kicked the pistol out of the way.

But when he went to snatch at the letter, Carson was all alive again. A desperate struggle in deathly silence followed—a hopeless struggle for the steward. He was thrown again; this time with such violence that the fight was finished. Mr. Moto picked up the feebly jerking body and, held high above his sleek head, he ran with it along the corridor to the open deck. He flung Carson clear of the liner into the deep blackness of the sea.

The splash of the body's fall was unheard in the wash of the great ship as it raced onward. Mr. Moto smoothed down his coal-black hair and adjusted his dark coat; put straight his tie and went back to the cabin, where he secured the steward's silenced pistol and the letter which Hitchings senior had entrusted to his son—still saying good-night to Miss Gloria Danton at her cabin door.

Wilkie Draws Blank

A NEW steward called Bob to his bath next morning.

"Carson sick?" Bob asked.

"We can't find him, sir. We are afraid he must have fallen overboard."

"But he's a good sailor."

"Lifts his elbow, sir, if you take my meaning," said the new man. "He's been warned once or twice."

A sudden thought came to Bob. He waited until the man had gone, then hastened to feel for his father's letter in his day-suit breast-pocket. It was there—and he blew a long breath of relief.

When he came on deck he found the Marco Polo had already docked in the harbour at Shanghai. Mr. Moto was finishing his breakfast.

"Make port while we sleeping," he said. "Very fast ship—good timing. Some people already gone."

"I shan't hurry," Bob decided. "I'm going ashore with Miss Danton."

"I think she leave early," doubted Moto. "Very pleasing lady. But always in great hurry."

"I haven't noticed it," Bob laughed a little self-consciously. "I—she's going to marry me, Moto. I had to tell someone, I'm so happy."

Mr. Moto looked grave. "She run away, Mr. Hitchings. Perhaps there is reason?"

But Bob didn't wait. He dashed off to Gloria's suite. It was true. She had already left the ship.

He came back to see Moto tipping the new steward and expressing much concern that Carson should be missing.

"She's gone, Moto! Left no address," Bob burst in. "You know Shanghai—you must help me find her!"

"Shanghai big city," Moto eyed Bob through slightly slanting gold spectacles. "Maybe good she is gone?"

"I must find her," Bob spoke desperately.

Mr. Moto nodded, saying again: "Very pleasing lady."

Bob had to be busy getting ashore, where he was met by the firm's agent Wilkie, a pale man, rather sharp-featured. He scarcely listened to Bob's chatter about Gloria.

"A White Russian, I guess," he checked him. "Heaps of 'em in Shanghai. They're refugees from Moscow. Let's get along to my office—I've engaged a suite for you in the same building. Your father cabled me."

When they were alone in Wilkie's private office Bob handed over the confidential letter. Wilkie tore it open and drew out—a sheet of blank paper!

"What's this?" he asked frowningly. Whilst they were staring, the 'phone buzzed. Wilkie caught up the receiver.

"Long distance." He listened. "It's your father. Yes, Mr. Hitchings—he's here. Just given me your note. It's a blank sheet. I'll let him speak to you—"

Mr. Moto flung Carson clear of the liner into the deep blackness of the sea.

He passed the 'phone to Bob, who heard his dad's urgent voice.

"That you, son? Wilkie says the letter was blank. Someone has tampered with it. Now listen, and get this—diamond smuggling, on a large scale, is being done through us. Us—get me?" The receiver crackled angrily. "My letter was to warn Wilkie to check up on everyone in the firm. The stones are being sent in under some very clever cover—maybe in tea samples—can't talk now, someone may be tapping the line. Keep both eyes open. 'Bye!"

Bob told the agent, who looked down his thin nose.

"It's impossible," he declared. "I check everything this end." He rubbed his chin, deep in thought. "Tell you what—there's our up-river station. You go there at once and do a bit of sleuthing."

"I'll go to-morrow," Bob agreed. "To-day I'll find Gloria."

In the telephone exchange down below Mr. Moto was chatting with a Chinese operator, a pretty child. He had listened-in to the call unperceived. Now he rose up, smiling.

"Will honourable young lady favour this one with company to-night?" he asked. "Some very agreeable restaurant—perhaps lady can give address?"

The girl nodded her dark head. "I shall be pleased, sir. Here is a good place."

She hastily scribbled Chinese letters on her pad, tore off the sheet and gave it to him. Mr. Moto translated mentally:

"Meet you International Club seven. Present procedure through Adram's in the bazaar."

"Gracious thanks, honourable lady," Moto murmured, taking his leave.

That evening a note was thrust under Bob's bed-room door.

He picked it up wonderingly. Written in block letters, he read:

"She whom you seek is at the Club International."

There was no signature.

Mr. Moto Writes a Poem

MR. MOTO had spent his afternoon in the bazaar, keeping his rickshaw waiting whilst he made purchases here and there. He stopped presently at a curio shop bearing the sign "Adram's." He entered. A bearded Hebraic person stepped out from a small back-room where Moto glimpsed, as the door opened, some men engaged with a lot of little gay labelled bottles set on the table in front of them.

"Interested in silk banneret in window," smiled Mr. Moto.

"Flag of an ancient order, sir," came the slow, soft answer. "It presents the Chinese tiger."

"I will buy this," said Mr. Moto, taking up a small soapstone figure. "You have old rings, perhaps, to break up? I collect coloured stones and old gold, also diamonds. This one has commission from very rich gentleman."

He handed a ten-dollar note to Mr. Adram.

"No change, if you please. That is, I understand, present procedure?"

Sad brown eyes studied the glinting, gold-rimmed spectacles of Mr. Moto.

"I do not understand you, sir. I am sorry." Adram raked money out of the till. "Three dollars fifty cents American, for the figurine—real Tanagra. Your change, sir—six-fifty dollars."

Mr. Moto smiled, thanked him—and came away.

Mr. Adram bowed him out of the shop and watched him depart in the rickshaw, making a secret sign to one of the rimmers. On the way out of the bazaar a street fight occurred and a Chinaman drew a gun on his assailant. His shot missed, but very nearly caught Mr. Moto.

On the way to the International Club that evening Wilkie steered his car slap into a rickshaw. An accident was just avoided—Mr. Moto had jumped out of the rickshaw in time. He listened smilingly to Wilkie's apologies.

"Second time this one in accident to-day. Perhaps third one more unlucky." He gave a cry of pleasure. Bob had alighted from the car. "Happy accident! We meet again!" He turned towards a second rickshaw in which a pretty Chinese girl was bending forward to see what had happened. "Mr. Bob Hitchings—Miss Liu. Pleased to make you acquainted." "This is Mr. Wilkie." Bob introduced the agent as he grinned at the girl. "Mr. Moto, whom I met on the Marco Polo. We're going to the International Club."

"So also this person and Miss Liu. We go together, yes? I think rickshaw broken."

At the International Night Club, a tall, wiry-moustached, fattish man met them in the hall.

"I'm Nicholas Marloff. I run this show. I'll get you a good table."

Mr. Moto talked in his cheery way and Miss Liu was very pretty. The dinner was quite a success, but there was no sign of Gloria. The walls of the dance-hall were hung with kake-monos and flags. Mr. Moto drew attention to one flag.

"Ancient order Chinese tiger," he told them. "Very interesting."

Presently the orchestra struck into the opening bars of a song. A girl entered from the artistes' room, singing the air and carrying a small loose bouquet of flowers. She came to Bob's table and stopped, a beautiful statue of surprise. "I've found you, you see," said Bob in triumph.

People were watching. Gloria whispered: "Come to my room." Then went on with her song, tossing the little scattered blossoms here and there.

After she had gone and the applause had died down, Bob rose from the table. "Excuse me, will you?" he said to the others.

Moto laid a plump hand on his arm. "Advise discreet behaviour," he murmured.

But when Bob was in Gloria's dressing-room across the passage there was little discretion. He caught Gloria to him.

"We're going to get married—nothing shall stop us, dearest. I love you and you love me."

For a moment she resisted him, then gave in.

"Forgive me. I was told to spy on you. They cabled me at Honolulu."

Two of the attendants had followed Bob into the room. They seized his arms. Nicholas Marloff stood in the doorway.

"Put them in the cell—both," he ordered. "Quickly—quietly. I'll deal with them later."

He disappeared just as Bob freed himself with a jerk and hit out. But the thugs were wily; one of them dropped to the floor and wound sinewy arms around Bob's legs. The youngster toppled over and, next instant, was in their power.

"Look after the girl, Blake," spoke one of the pair. "If she starts anything knock her out."

Marloff went back to the dance-hall where Moto was building a castle of matches on the table, Lela Liu and Wilkie looking on. As Marloff came to them, Wilkie knocked over the glass on which the castle rested.

"Oh, sorry!" he cried. Marloff added: "What a pity!"

He stood there with hanging-down arms.

"You are clever, sir." He met Moto's spectacled glance with stolid face. "Care for a game of cards?"

"Yes, if you please," said Mr. Moto. He was writing on the back of the menu as he answered. "A little poem Japanese," he explained. "It is of seventeen syllables—very difficult."

He tossed the menu amid the fallen matches and rose to follow Marloff to the gaming-room. "Please dance with Mr. Wilkie," he told the Chinese girl.

She nodded. She picked up the menu. "Call police if not returned in ten minutes," she read. She smiled into Wilkie's inquiring eyes. "My friend very foolish. Writes admiration praising me."

Mr. Moto Thinks Fast

THEY played the simple game of cutting the pack for the highest card. No matter what Marloff cut, Moto was always one pip better. "Confounded luck," Marloff growled. "Let us leave this play of children," said Moto. He produced a small folded paper from his breast-pocket and unfolded it. Marloff, standing up, saw several large unset diamonds. "From jewels of the Russian Czar," whispered the Jap.

"Cut glass." Marloff spoke as the San Francisco jeweller had done. But he knew at a glance that the stones were real. "What's your game?" he asked darkly.

"This person desiring to sell such things in United States. You know way to do so, yes?" Moto insinuated.

Marloff regarded the upturned innocent-looking spectacles.

"I'd want seventy per cent of the sales."

"This person agrees fifty per cent," Moto purred.

"Come along to my downstairs office." Marloff led the way, Moto meekly following him.

On the way they passed an iron door where the gangster Blake was on guard. At a sign from Marloff, Blake opened the door and revealed Bob and Gloria gagged and trussed hands and feet in a cell-like room. Marloff studied Moto's reactions.

EPISODE 10—

"The Circle of Doom"

Read This First

Learning that their friend Larry Munro and his sister Lucy are in trouble, Kentucky Wade and his three partners, Trigger Benton, Dude Hansford and Mike Morales, leave New Mexico for Paradise Valley, Arizona.

There they discover that Larry has located a rich deposit of platinum, and is being threatened by an organisation of crooks who are out to dominate the valley. It is an organisation secretly headed by Matt Keeler, owner of a newspaper in the nearby town of Brimstone, and in a brush with some of Keeler's men Larry is wounded.

Kentucky and Dude Hansford pick up the trail of two of the gang, but become trapped in a fire that sweeps through the thickets of a box canyon.

Dude falls and wrenches his ankle, and even as Kentucky is helping him to rise, a blazing tree plunges towards them!

(Now Read On)

The Deserted Shack

WITH a hoarse cry Kentucky stumbled aside, dragging his friend with him, and only a second or two after they had quit the spot where they had been standing, the blazing tree-trunk crashed to earth with a resounding shock.

The ground trembled under the feet of Dude and Kentucky, but the falling bole had missed them by several yards, and they were lucky enough to escape being pinned under its outspread branches, though burning twigs and foliage swept their heads and shoulders.

They still had to contend with the fire that was raging through the thickets all around them, however, and with

Dude crippled by a twisted ankle, and Kentucky overburdened by the effort of supporting him, they could never have won their way clear of the canyon if they had not blundered upon a wide but shallow stream that meandered through the underbush.

That stream enabled them to push onward without running the gauntlet of a welter of flames. True, the smoke of the conflagration rolled over them in dense, suffocating clouds, and an intense heat played fiercely against them. Yet they managed to keep going, Kentucky helping Dude along with him in resolute fashion, and at last they reeled out of the canyon's mouth and turned their backs on the inferno through which they had struggled.

Thirty or forty paces beyond the entrance of the ravine the two of them collapsed, and for a brief interval lay gasping on the sloping bank of the stream they had followed. Then Kentucky roused himself and crawled up to some rocks on the rim of the bank, and as he looked out across the plain before him he saw two riderless horses some little distance away.

One was his own palomino and the other was Dude's sorrel. They, too, had escaped from the canyon of death, and, trembling with fright, were now standing near a copse of oak trees.

They were not the only living creatures in view, for Steve Claggett and his accomplice were still in the offing, and, riding southward, were casting backward glances in the direction of the canyon.

Kentucky espied them and, realising that they could not possibly see him lying there among the rocks, he decided not to show himself, but waited until they had disappeared over a low divide in the landscape. Then he climbed to his feet and walked quietly towards his palomino and Dude's sorrel.

Coming up with the horses, he took hold of their reins and led them to the spot where he had left Dude, and after hoisting the latter on to his brone, he swung himself astride his own saddle.

"I saw Claggett and that other fellow high-tailing it over the prairie," he told Dude. "But it was no use taking after them because they had too big a start. Besides, I suddenly figured it might pay us to lie low."

"Why, Kentucky?"

There was a thoughtful expression on the ex-deputy's handsome face.

"Unless I miss my guess," he said, "Claggett and the man who was with him were responsible for firing the brush in the canyon, Dude, and no doubt they think we've both been burned to death. Well, let 'em keep on thinking that. We may stand a better chance of getting the low-down on the whole gang if the word goes around that we've cashed in. We can sort of root around quietly, and maybe find out plenty."

"Not a bad idea, Kentucky," Dude conceded. "But where do we go from here—back to the Circle B? Lucy and the others will be wonderin' what's happened to us."

Kentucky shook his head.

"We'd better not go there while it's daylight if we aim to play 'possum," he declared. "We might run across somebody on the way, and the news would get about that we were alive and kicking. No, Dude, we'll have to hide out until after dark, and I think I know the very place. Do you remember that cabin we passed near the Indian trail?"

December 4th, 1937.

"The one that looked as if it had been deserted for years? Sure, I remember it. It oughta make a good cache right enough."

The two of them being agreed on this score, they set out at a brisk trot for the dwelling in question, and on reaching it some ten or fifteen minutes later, they concealed their ponies in a lean-to built against the shack. Then they went in through the front door of the abode.

There were one or two holes in the roof, and such crude furniture as the cabin contained was thick with grime and dust. In a corner stood a number of barrels which proved on examination to be gunpowder kegs, each being stuffed full of explosive material.

"Some prospector probably lived here at one time," Dude commented, as he sat on a rickety stool and watched Kentucky investigating the barrels. "I guess the Redskins murdered him. He took a chance, livin' so close to the trail that leads to their village."

"If the Redskins got him they must have bushwhacked him at a fair distance from this cabin," Kentucky replied. "What's more, they certainly never came across the homestead or they would have taken away the gunpowder."

Dude nodded.

"You're right," he said. "When you come to think of it, the shack's fairly well hidden in a fold o' the hills. We wouldn't have seen it ourselves if we hadn't struck across from the trail and tried to head off Claggett and his side-kicker. Well, I hope the Injuns don't happen across it while we're here, that's all."

"We'll light out quick enough if they show up," Kentucky answered, "and if we have to run for it I'll back either of our ponies against any Redskin cayase. But, say, let me take a look at that ankle of yours."

Dude's injured ankle was badly swollen. There was a spring of ice-cold water near the shack, however, and after Kentucky had treated the sprain with a kerchief soaked in that water the inflammation died down appreciably.

"Okay," Dude said then. "It feels a heap better already."

He pulled on his sock and boot again, and after a short silence broached the subject of the two rogues who had decoyed them into the box canyon and set the brush afire.

"Hey, Kentucky," he asked, "you didn't recognise that fellow who was with Steve Claggett, did you?"

No, Kentucky had not been able to recognise the man. He did not know that the gangster in question was the half-breed who called himself Buckskin. And he did not know that at that very moment Buckskin was riding back towards the Indian encampment of Red Hackett, having seen Claggett safely to the Driscoll ranch, where the latter intended to keep under cover.

Arrived at the tepee village where his elderly kinsman held sway, the half-breed took charge of the wagon which had contained the guns that had been handed over to the Indians. Then, hitching his mustang to the tail of the vehicle, he clambered on to the driving-seat and made tracks for Brimstone, waving farewell to a crowd of braves and squaws who assembled to see him off.

En route to the town he passed within a mile of the cabin where Dude and Kentucky were located. But the clip-clop of hoofs and the creak of wagon-wheels did not carry to the ears of the two friends, and they were as oblivious of Buckskin's proximity as he was of theirs.

The half-breed drove on, and, arriving in Brimstone later that same afternoon, he pulled up behind Braden's store.
December 4th, 1937.

Braden, dealer in firearms, came out through the back door of his premises as Buckskin drew the wagon team to a halt.

"Well," the storekeeper inquired, "did you have a good trip?"

"I'll say I had a good trip," Buckskin rejoined. "Braden, I've got news that the boss will be powerful glad to hear. Kentucky Wade won't bother anybody no more."

Braden shot a startled glance at him. "How come?" he demanded.

"Well," drawled Buckskin, "he an' one of his pals kinda got tangled up in a brushwood fire that cleaned out a box canyon 'way in the hills. Their horses broke away from 'em and cut loose into the clear. But Kentucky an' his pardner, they didn't make it, poor fellers."

He grinned smugly. Yet the expression on his swarthy features would not have been so complacent had he known that a boy who chanced to be loitering around the corner of Braden's store had heard every word, a boy who was known to the inhabitants of Brimstone as the Mouth Organ Kid.

On Buckskin's Trail

NIGHT had fallen, and, in the living-room of the Circle D ranch-house, Lucy Munro and Mike Morales and Trigger Benton were looking at one another uneasily.

"I don't like it," Trigger said all at once. "Dude an' Kentucky ought to have showed up long ago. I'm gonna ride over to Brimstone an' find out what's happened to 'em."

Mike Morales hitched his gun-belt. "That ees good idea, Treeger," he declared. "I go weeth you."

"No, amigo," Benton told the Mexican. "Somebody's gotta stay here, what with all the cowpokes bein' in town on the spree. We can't leave Larry with nobody to protect him but Miss Lucy and Wong, the Chinese cook."

He had scarcely spoken the words when the Oriental to whom he had referred came through from a back room in which Larry Muuro had been put to bed.

"Missy," Wong reported to Lucy, "plenty men ride this way lickety-split. I think mebbe they are cow-hands back ffrom town."

He was right. Amid a clatter of hoofs and a jangling of harness the punchers of the Circle D outfit descended upon a corral at the rear of the ranch-house. Then, after an interval of a minute or two, one of them came round to the front of the dwelling and tapped on the living-room door.

He was a man by the name of Connell, and as Lucy admitted him she saw that his features wore an expression of gravity. Obviously, he had bad news, but, standing just inside the threshold and shifting his weight from one foot to the other, he did not seem to know how to begin.

"Ma'm," he blurted at last, "I got something to say that's gonna upset you an' Kentucky Wade's friends here. Me an' the boys, we heard a rumour goin' around town that he and Dude Hanford had got caught in a brush fire. I dunno who was responsible for the story, but it—it appears they was trapped by this fire in a box canyon out among the hills, and they—they was burned to death."

Mike Morales was just in time to catch Lucy as she swayed back in a half-faint. As for Trigger Benton, he had started to his feet with every vestige of colour drained from his leathery countenance, and for several seconds he stood staring at Connell in horror. Then he found his voice.

"I don't believe it!" he jerked out. "Dude and Kentucky were too range wise to get themselves trapped in any canyon fire! Connell, somebody bushwhacked them, then set fire to the brush to cover up the killing and spread this rumour around town—"

And then he stopped short, for ere he could say more two figures loomed up in the doorway behind Connell, and a hoarse cry of relief broke from Trigger Benton as he recognised Kentucky Wade and Dude Hanford.

It was a cry that was echoed by the other occupants of the room, and Lucy, recovering herself, ran forward spontaneously and clung to the younger of the two newcomers.

"Dude!" she sobbed. "Thank Heaven you're alive! Oh, Dude, Connell and the boys heard in town that you and Kentucky had been wiped out in a brush fire!"

"Yeah, so we gathered from the fellers over at the corral," Dude observed.

Connell drew a long breath.

"I'm sure glad it wasn't true," he said fervently.

"An' I knew it wasn't true," Trigger Benton struck in. "I figured there was something phoney about that rumour."

"It wasn't as phoney as you think, Trig," Kentucky remarked. "We were trapped in a canyon fire all right, but we managed to get out."

He went on to relate all that had happened, and when he had finished his narrative Trigger eyed him keenly.

"So now, Kentucky," he said, "you an' Dude are gonna keep under cover so as you'll stand a better chance of nobblin' the gang Steve Claggett belongs to."

"Exactly," came the rejoinder. "They're liable to get careless if they think two of us are out of the way. In fact, I've been thinking it would be all to the good if you and Mike didn't seem to be around either. You could go into town and make out you were leaving. Keeler would be the man to approach. He'd probably publish the news in his paper that you were clearing out."

"Mebbe we take Senor Keeler into our confidence, huh?" Mike Morales suggested. "He seems one verree good man."

Kentucky considered for a moment, and then shook his head.

"No, we won't take anybody into our confidence," he decided. "When there are too many folks in on a secret, that secret has a habit of leaking out. Which reminds me, Connell, you keep it under your hat about Dude and I being alive, and tell the boys to do the same."

Lucy interrupted, assuring Kentucky that he could depend on the ranch hands, and after some further discussion the two men who were supposed to have perished in the brushwood fire prepared to take their leave.

"Dude and I will go back to that deserted cabin," Kentucky said, "and you and Mike will join us there later, Trig. You can't miss the place if you follow the directions we've given you."

Dude and Kentucky departed, and shortly after they had gone Mike Morales and Trigger Benton also left the Circle D ranch, setting forth on the Brimstone trail.

It was pretty late when Trigger and the Mexican reached town, and, not expecting to find Matt Keeler at his office, but imagining he might be located at the Silver Dollar, they drew rein at the veranda of the saloon, dismounted from their broncs and tied the animals to the hitch-rail.

Sure enough Keeler was in the barroom, and, with Mike at his heels, Trigger singled him out and addressed him respectfully.

"I reckon you remember us, Mr. Keeler," he said, little dreaming that he was talking to the real head of the gang which was endeavouring to gain a strangle-hold on Paradise Valley.

The owner and editor of the "Brimstone News" answered him in sober accents.

"Why, yes, of course. You're friends of Kentucky Wade. You know, I can't tell you how sorry I was to hear about Kentucky and that young fellow Hanford. A tragic business—a tragic business."

Both Trigger and Mike assumed an expression of deep mournfulness.

"That's what we came in to see you about, Mr. Keeler," the former groaned. "You bein' a newspaper man, we figured maybe you'd heard some o' the details. We thought maybe you could tell us where we could find what's left of pore Dude an' Kentucky."

"Si, senior," Mike interposed. "We want to put up som' leetle monument to—what you call 'commemorate' them—before we go away from thees valley."

A queer glint seemed to flicker in Matt Keeler's eyes.

"You're leaving Paradise Valley?" he asked.

"Yeah, we ain't got no heart to stay here, Mr. Keeler," Trig Benton explained disconsolately, "after what's happened to our pals."

"I understand how you feel," the newspaper man said with a spurious kindness. "As to the locality where pore Wade and Hanford met their deaths, I'm told it's out by Rimrock Mountain. You take an old Indian trail that leads north-east of Brimstone here—"

He proceeded to detail the route to the box canyon where Kentucky and Dude were supposed to have met their doom, and when they had received the unnecessary directions from him, Mike and Trigger thanked him and made their exit from the saloon.

Outside in the street Trigger exchanged a glance with the Mexican.

"I hated foolin' a nice guy like Keeler," he stated, "but it had to be done. Let's hope he mentions in his paper that we've pulled our freight."

"Eef he doesn't," Mike commented, "et weel get around just the same. There was one or two hombres nearby that seem' centerested in our conversation weeth Keeler. But lees'n, Treeger, you know som'theeng? You are one verce fine actor. When you talk about Dude and Kentucky being dead I almost want to cry."

Trigger smirked self approvingly.

"Reckon I did pretty good, huh?"

"Good! Why, you are the most grandest mentidoso I have ever known!"

"Thanks, Mike," Trigger rejoined with considerable gratification. "Mighty nice of you to hand out the bouquets. Matter of fact, I thought you ought've looked more sorrowful-like, but I guess we can't all be born actors. Say, what was that Spanish compliment you paid me jest now—mentidoso? What's it mean, anyway?"

"Eet means a beeg liar."

Trigger darted a glance at Mike's grinning face and promptly took a swipe at him, but the Mexican skipped clear, and was chuckling over his friend's discomfiture, when all at once he saw someone beckoning to him from an alley-way alongside the saloon.

A boy was standing there in the shadows, and as Mike called Trigger's attention to the lad, the two men approached the alley inquisitively.

They recognised the boy as the Mouth Organ Kid, that youngster who was a familiar figure in Brimstone with the harmonica which he played in the hopes of picking up a few dimes from passers-by.

"What's on your mind, son?" Trigger asked him.

The Kid beckoned them deeper into the alley, and then spoke in a low voice.

"You're friends of Kentucky Wade an' Dudo Hanford, ain't yuh?" he said. "All right, I got somethin' to tell yuh. Do you know a man named Buckskin?"

"Buckskin?" Trigger echoed.

"Yeah, you mean that half-breed."

"The same," the Kid answered.

"Well, he's the one that brung the news about Kentucky an' Dude. I heard him tell Braden, the storekeeper, an' the way he talked didn't sound good. He said 'the boss'—whoever that might be—would be glad to hear about it."

"I ducked outa the way a minute after," the lad went on, "because I thought he might catch no listenin', and that Buckskin is an ugly customer. I was gonna tell the sheriff, but he's outa town, an' I didn't like to say anything to anybody else. It's hard to figure which are the honest folks around here and which ain't."

Mike and Trigger had listened to him with sharpening interest, and now the Mexican spoke.

"Tregg," he jerked, "thees hombre Buckskin must have been the fellow who was weeth Steve Claggett. Remember, Kentucky and Dude told us when they got back to the Circle D ranch to-night that they—"

He checked himself, but the Mouth Organ Kid fastened on to the slip he had made.

"What's that?" he breathed. "Kentucky an' Dude were at the Circle D to-night? Then they—they ain't dead a-tall?"

"I deed not mean for you to know that," Mike granted sheepishly. "Nawbody cen town ces supposed to know that."

The Kid looked at the Mexican with the astuteness characteristic of a street arab.

"I get it. Kentucky an' Dude wanna flo low. Okay, mister, I'll keep my mouth shut."

"I know you will," Trigger cut in. "Dude and Kentucky told us about you, and from what they said I reckon we can depend on you. But this guy Braden—where can we locate him?"

"You won't be able to locate him to-night," the Kid replied. "I saw him get aboard the stage-coach this evenin', and heard him say he had business in Yuma. He'll be back, though, I guess."

"And thees Buckskin?" Mike Morales queried.

"He ain't in town neither, mister. I spotted him leavin' about ten minutes ago. Headed north-east, he was—on the Injun trail."

Trigger gripped Mike by the arm and swung round.

"Come on," he rapped out. "Maybe we can catch up with that half-breed. If we do we'll make him talk and tell us who his 'boss' is."

They hastened out of the alley, and the Mouth Organ Kid heard them mount up and ride away. Then he himself began to move towards the street, but before he had taken a couple of steps there was a scuffle of feet behind him and someone caught him by the shoulder in a vice-like clutch.

He wheeled to find himself in the grasp of Doc Hardy, owner of the Silver Dollar Saloon.

"Just a minute, you little runt," Hardy grated. "What have you been up to? What were you telling those two men?"

"Which two men?"

"Don't stall!" Doc Hardy snarled. "I heard Benton say something about catchin' up with a half-breed and makin' him talk. Who did they mean? Buckskin?"

The Kid gritted his teeth.

"I ain't sayin'," he retorted, and then, with a sudden jump, he tore himself free, taking to his heels and sprinting out of the alley like a stag in full flight.

The gangster tottered back, and, pouncing on him, Kentucky caught hold of him with one hand and hit him with the other.

Hardy blundered after him, cursing, but as he stumbled out into the main thoroughfare of the town he saw the lad turning off down a side-street fifty or sixty yards away and realised the futility of pursuing so nimble a quarry.

Instead he hurried round the veranda of his saloon and entered the bar-room, and as he discerned Matt Keeler, he strode towards him and drew him aside.

"Matt," he whispered, "Benton and that Mexican are up to something. I happened along the alley and spotted 'em with the Mouth Organ Kid. I couldn't get much of their talk, but I heard Benton say he an' Morales were gonna catch up with 'that half-breed' and make him spill the works. They must've meant Buckskin, for I don't know any other half-breed around this town."

Keeler's face had tightened. "What are you telling me this for?" he bit out. "You know what to do. Send some of the boys after Benton and Morales. Go on, get busy! Baldy is in the back room with Jake, Red and Slim. Send them!"

Hardy made tracks for a door in the far wall and disappeared beyond it, and less than thirty seconds afterwards four men issued from the apartment on to which that door opened—four men who filed quickly across the bar-room, shoved their way out through the swing doors and strode towards the hitch-rail.

Their horses were tied up there, and, casting loose the reins, they mounted in hot haste.

"Which way, Baldy?" one of them rasped.

"The Indian trail," came the terse reply. "Buckskin was goin' out to Red Hatchet's camp."

Brimstone's frame buildings echoed the drumming of hoofs as the four men spurred through the town. Then, pounding forth on to the open range, the ruffianly quartet turned their broncs north-east and urged them over the mesquite grass at full stretch.

The Beleaguered Cabin

LIKE the gangsters who had been dispatched to overtake them, Trigger Benton and Mike Morales were covering the ground at a rapid pace, yet they were a good many miles from Brimstone ere they sighted the figure of Buckskin away ahead of them.

Meanwhile, however, the rogue known as Baldy and his three accomplices had been gradually making up on them, for their horses were fresher than those ridden by Mike and Trigger, and even as the two friends espied their quarry they themselves were seen by the four pursuers in the rear.

A blatter of gunplay rent the quiet of the hills. It was the first intimation of danger that Trigger and Mike received, and as they looked round and saw the men who had started out after them from Brimstone they drew rein abruptly. Then they swerved aside into a clutter of rocks, and, dismounting to take cover, they plucked out their forty-fives and opened fire on the gangsters.

Farther along the trail, Buckskin had also heard the volley that had been discharged by Baldy and his associates, and had pulled up with a jerk. But Trigger Benton and Mike Morales had no eyes for him now. Their attention was concentrated on the foes who had blazed at them so unexpectedly.

Trigger and the Mexican pumped lead at the advancing crooks, and, though they drew no blood, the whistle of their shots served to arrest the headlong approach of the four gunmen.

December 4th, 1937.

The men sawed on the reins of their ponies, brought the animals to a standstill and dived from their saddles in quest of shelter. A few seconds later they were trading lead with Mike and Trigger at long range, and the heavy blasts of their revolvers challenged the smashing reports of the weapons handled by the two riders whom they had surprised.

Baldy and his companions had taken up a position on a stretch of ground matted by patches of scrub, and between their vantage-point and the rocks where Trigger and Mike had gone to cover the air hummed with the vicious flight of bullets. Yet none of those slugs took effect, and it seemed as if the duel might proceed fruitlessly enough until the combatants had run out of ammunition.

Crouching amidst the scrub, Baldy addressed his comrades sourly.

"This ain't gettin' us nowhere," he growled. "Why don't Buckskin take a hand and see if he can draw them two hombres' fire? That might help us some."

Buckskin was hovering uncertainly away along the trail, however, and made no attempt to play any part in the affair.

"We oughta stayed on our hosses an' rushed Benton and the Greaser," one of Baldy's companions declared. "How about mountin' up again and tryin' it?"

"And get picked off like jack-rabbits?" Baldy countered. "No, Red, we gotta use strategy. Say, supposin' you an' Slim sneak off and try to work behind Benton and Morales, while Jake and me keep pluggin' away at 'em from here."

Red and Slim were willing to essay that manoeuvre, and, with the other two rogues maintaining a steady fire on the rocks, they began to effect a detour that would fetch them up in the rear of Trigger and Mike.

Their object was to take Mike and Trigger unawares and let them have it in the back—a murderous plan which depended for its success upon the secrecy with which the killers might carry out their flanking movement. But, unfortunately for the two gangsters concerned, their intended victims caught a glimpse of them circling through the scrub, and Trigger promptly appointed himself to the job of turning the tables on them.

"Keep shootin', Mike," he ordered. "an' make it look as if we're both slingin' lead. I'll handle those birds if they're aimin' to jump us from behind."

He crept back through the rocks and settled himself in the shadow of one of the largest boulders, and he had not been waiting there long when Red and Slim passed within a few feet of him.

They were picking their way cautiously through the tumbled blocks of stone, and Trigger let them go by before starting up from his hiding-place and training his six-gun on them.

"Drop your hardware, boys," he said evenly, "or sure as Fate I'll drop you!"

The gangsters seemed to become paralysed. Then, without turning their heads, they let their revolvers fall to the ground, and even as they did so Trigger heard Mike Morales raise a sudden shout of exultation.

Driving his prisoners forward, Trigger joined the Mexican and found him capering on the edge of the rocks in a high state of excitement. Then he saw two horsemen issuing from a narrow gulch between a line of foothills a little to the south of the trail.

"Treeger!" Mike ejaculated. "Let ces Dude and Kentucky! We are near that cabin they told us about, of course. Kentucky—Dude," he added in a resounding yell, "get those hombres over there!"

Baldy and Jake had scrambled to their feet and were running to their horses in a panic. But at the sound of Mike's voice, Dude and Kentucky spurred towards them, and, coming up with the rogues ere they could fork their saddles, they ordered them to stay where they were.

The two gunmen offered no resistance. They were still armed, but in their desire to escape they had allowed Kentucky and Dude to get the drop on them, and at a brusque command they discarded their revolvers. Then plainly dumbfounded by the presence of two men whom they had believed to be dead, they obeyed Kentucky as he instructed them to head for the boulders where Mike, Trigger and the other captives were standing.

Kentucky "rode herd" on Jake and Baldy, while Dude brought along the four horses belonging to the crooks, and in another minute or so they had joined the group over at the rocks.

"Heard the shooting from the cabin where we're hiding out," Kentucky said to Mike and Trigger laconically. "What's it all about, anyway?"

Trigger related how he and Mike had encountered the Mouth Organ Kid, and how, as a result of that encounter, they had set out to track down Buckskin.

"Then, just as we elapped eyes on the half-breed," he went on, "these here rats came on the scene. They're all in the same gang that's been making trouble for Larry Munro, I guess."

"There's not much doubt of that, but I don't see any sign of that fellow Buckskin," Kentucky said, gazing up the trail. "Reckon he must have sheered off when he saw how things were going."

Kentucky was wrong. Buckskin was still in the vicinity, but had concealed himself in a copse of trees, and from the darkness of that spinney he watched his foes till, after a brief consultation, they moved off with their prisoners.

They made for the foothills from which Dude and Kentucky had galloped, and, having given them a considerable start, Buckskin rode after them until he saw them file into a verdant valley.

The cabin which Dude and Kentucky had taken over was situated in this valley, but while they were still some way from it they and their two comrades dismounted and compelled their prisoners to do the same. Then the horses were haltered, the gangsters' ponies as well as the broncs owned by their captors, and, the animals being left to graze on a rich strip of pasture, the men who had climbed down from them tramped across to the shack.

They were ignorant of the fact that they had been followed. As they entered the cabin, in which a kerosene lamp was burning dimly, they had no idea that Buckskin was turning away from the head of the valley to take a course that would lead him towards the village of his Navajo kinsman, Chief Red Hatchet.

Inside the cabin, Kentucky and his friends bound their prisoners hand and foot and began to demand information from them, but soon found that the crooks were not disposed to be enlightening. For they would give no response to the interrogations which were launched at them, and after wasting a good deal of breath, their questioners reached the limits of their patience.

"Look here," Kentucky broke out at last, "you men had better open up, or I'm liable to get plenty tough with you."

Baldy spoke. He had regained something of his courage, and there was an insolent expression on his face.

"Is that so?" he sneered. "Well, if I wasn't hog-tied and you didn't have that gun in your hand I'd show you just how tough I can be."

Kentucky looked down at him in silence for a moment. Then he laid aside his revolver and addressed the gangster quietly.

"I kinda like that idea," he said. "Trigger, untie this man."

Baldy was released, and rose to his feet, whereupon Kentucky spoke again.

"Trig, you and Dude and Mike stick your irons back in your holsters," he directed, "and don't draw 'em unless this fellow tries to grab the six-shooter I've set aside. I'm giving him a chance to make good his boast, and, whichever way the fight goes, I don't want any of you to interfere until one or the other of us has had enough."

His friends returned their forty-fives to the leather sheaths they were wearing on their hips, and Kentucky faced round towards Baldy again—just in time to see the rogue getting off to a flying start and running forward to aim a savage punch.

Kentucky tried to put up his hands to defend himself, but was too late. That punch caught him flush in the mouth and sent him spinning away, so that he cannoned against the door of the cabin and slammed it shut with the impact of his body.

He was quick to recover himself, however, and as Baldy rushed in at him to follow up his advantage, he ripped loose an upper-cut that took the man under the chin and rocked him from head to heels.

The gangster tottered back, and, pouncing on him, Kentucky caught hold of him with one hand and hit him with the other. It was a blow that might have knocked the wits and the valour out of any of Baldy's three accomplices, but to give him his due, Baldy was a formidable specimen. A man of powerful physique, he had not dissipated his stamina in bar-room carousals, being fairly temperate, and he was almost as fit as his opponent.

Wrenching away, he shook off the effects of the two successive blows. Kentucky had landed, and in retaliation he launched an attack that few could have resisted. Yet Kentucky stood up to it, and for the next ten minutes the pair of combatants battled like titans for the mastery.

Slowly but surely Kentucky gained the upper hand, till Baldy was taking terrific punishment. Nevertheless, the crook fought on as long as he was able to raise an arm, and when in the end he collapsed under a barrage of rights and lefts his ugly countenance was swollen almost out of recognition.

"Okay," he moaned as he lay huddled on the floor, "you win. I—I know when I've had enough."

Kentucky stepped back from him. "You do?" he panted. "All right—if you've had enough, start talking. Who's the boss of your gang? Who's the brains behind the—"

He never finished the sentence, for at that instant the inmates of the cabin heard their horses whinnying as if in alarm—heard the brones scattering across the pasture until they were brought up short by their tightening stake-ropes.

Something had startled the animals, Kentucky realised, and, wheeling from the crumpled form of Baldy, he made for the door of the shack and tugged it open. And as that door swung wide on its hinges he saw a cloud of befeathered horsemen sweeping into the valley—a war party of Navajo Indians, headed by an individual attired in the clothes of a paleface.

The latter was Buckskin, and he had not found it necessary to ride to the Indian village, for while he had still been a fair distance from it he had run across a strong band of braves, returning from a hunting trip in which they had sampled the new rifles supplied to them by Keeler's organisation.

Buckskin was now leading these braves in an assault upon the cabin occupied by Kentucky and his party, and at sight of the hostile cavalcade of warriors the ex-deputy slammed and barred the door of the dwelling.

"Indians!" he shouted. "Get to the windows, boys!"

Apart from the lean to, the cabin was a one-room structure, but it had an aperture in each wall, and, Kentucky having doused the lamp and snatched up his gun, the four friends posted themselves so as to cover all approaches to the shack, for the oncoming Redskins were swerving with the clear intention of circling it.

Rifles spat flame, and the desultory crackle of the first dozen shots swelled into a steady fusillade as the Indians ringed the cabin and poured in a ruthless fire while they galloped around it. Bullets thudded into the stout timbers of the outer walls, or wheeped through the windows to sear their way across the dwelling's interior.

Again and again some yelling foeman was seen to plunge from his mount, and, heavily outnumbered though they were, Kentucky and his friends told themselves grimly that if they could keep up so effective a resistance they might drive off the besiegers yet.

But all at once several of the warriors swung out of the attackers' formation and made for a clump of small trees, and when they rode back to rejoin their comrades a few minutes later each was carrying aloft a blazing torch—a fragment of wood lopped from a bough and set alight.

It was plain what they meant to do, and as the torch-bearers broke through the circle of braves who were galloping round the cabin and shooting at the windows, Kentucky and his companions tried to pick them off.

Two of them fell to the defenders' revolvers, but the others got close enough to hurl their flambeaus at the roof of the shack, and the inmates of the building heard the thump of the burning brands dropping on to the timbers overhead.

One of the torches slithered off again, yet the rest remained lodged on the roof, and lay there with the flames from them eating into the rotten, worm-eaten wood till the men inside the dwelling could see the red-and-yellow tongues of fire darting between the crevices and licking at the undermost surface of the laths.

A feeling of despair gripped Kentucky Wade and his three friends. They had no means of stemming that fire, and they had only the choice of two equally fatal courses—either to charge out into the open and die before the rifles of the Indians, or to perish in a blaze that would ultimately reach those gunpowder barrels in the corner and blow the shack and its occupants to smithereens.

"THE SQUEAKER"

The inspector gave a signal to the policeman, and with bowed head Barrabal was led away.

A Last Chance

INSPECTOR ELFORD took his prisoner to the superintendent's-room and the handcuffs were removed.

"Well, it's worked so far—that fake arrest certainly made Sutton talk." Barrabal rubbed his wrists. "Who've you got watching the house?"

"Collins and Bateson—both good men," said Elford.

"Fine! A pity those papers we found on Graeme aren't of any importance." Barrabal relaxed into the superintendent's chair. "What we need is a definite link between Sutton and Graeme." He sprang up as the door opened and the superintendent appeared. "Good-evening, sir."

Superintendent Marshall scowled fiercely, and the sight of Barrabal using his chair did not soften his temper.

"You've let me down, Barrabal!" he cried. "A man was killed to-night right under your nose, because you were off dancing with a girl. You've let someone get away with a cold-blooded murder."

"Sutton is the murderer, and he isn't getting away with it."

"Then why didn't you bring him in?"

"Because we couldn't have held him for one minute on the evidence we had. Sutton's known as a respectable business man, and he's almost engaged to a very fine girl. Unless we had a perfect case, his solicitor would make Scotland Yard look ridiculous. Sutton's no ordinary crook."

"But this is not good enough," cried the superintendent. "I'm not satisfied, Barrabal. You were told to watch that house, and yet you were having a darned good time instead of—"

"One moment, sir," interrupted Barrabal. "Suppose I could break this case for you to-night?"

Marshall was amazed.

"Impossible! How do you imagine you could do that?" he said in less harsh tones.

"Let me have Elford for two hours and I'll show you."

"What are you going to do?"

"First of all I'm going to talk to Larry Graeme's girl. I think she knows something. If she doesn't, I have another plan to make Sutton talk."

"All right!" growled Superintendent Marshall. "But you've got to do it to-night."

"I will—or my name isn't Inspector Barrabal."

"Inspector Barrabal?" Marshall gaped at him, then grinned. "Very well, that's a deal. I'll appoint you an inspector right away, but if you want to stay with the Yard you must get the Squeaker to-night!"

Naturally the party at the Stedman house had broken up, and though the guests had gone, many of the household were still up. Frank Sutton had stayed many nights at the house, and one room was regarded almost as his own. He even had several changes of clothes here, though they were mostly light suits or sports attire. After the arrest of Captain Leslie he went to December 4th, 1937.

this room after telling Carol not to go to bed as he wished to talk to her. He made several telephone calls before seeking Carol, who had retired to her own private sitting-room.

"Well, I'm all ready to go," Sutton announced. "I've packed the few things I've got here and they'll have to do. I've secured reservations, and I suggest we leave to-night, motor to Southampton, and—"

"I'm not running away, Frank. I told you that some while ago."

"It's not running away," he said irritably. "It's the only sensible thing to do. By to-morrow this place will be overrun with newspaper-men and policemen—you won't have a moment's peace."

"That doesn't worry me."

"They'll drag you into court—get you up in front of a lot of people—ask you all sorts of questions. What possible good can you do by staying?"

"I may be able to help Captain Leslie."

"He's not worth helping. Carol," he argued. "He's just killed a man—the police proved that."

"With your assistance," Carol looked at him with something akin to contempt. "I don't believe he could harm anybody."

"You'll tell me next you're in love with him," he sneered.

"I am!" Carol answered without hesitation.

"Why—you can't be!" Sutton cried. "A murderer! Why, it's—"

The telephone-bell shrilled.

Carol answered the call.

"Hallo—yes, yes, he's here—wait a minute." She put her hand over the mouthpiece. "It's Scotland Yard—for you."

"Scotland Yard?" Sutton muttered shakily, and took the phone from the girl. "Hallo—yes, it's Frank Sutton speaking. Come down to-night. Well, I'm very sorry, Inspector Elford, but I'm terribly tired—would to-morrow do?"

"You can't do that, Frank," dramatically cried Carol. "You'll be out of the country by to-morrow."

Sutton glanced angrily at the girl.

"I've had enough excitement to-night," he whispered hoarsely. "And quite enough of policemen."

"But you must go!" she insisted. "You've talked a lot about your duty as a citizen, and how you would like to help Captain Leslie."

"All right," Sutton had been thinking. If he refused to go to the Yard to-night suspicions might be aroused if it were found that he had gone to the Continent. "Very well, inspector," he said in cordial tones. "I'll be down in about an hour."

"And I'm going with you," stated Carol.

Tamara proved a disappointment to Barrabal. He went with Elford to the Leopard Club and they were taken to her dressing-room. Directly she saw them the girl seemed to guess that something was wrong. She admitted Graeme had been to see her that night, but, remembering his warning, she would say nothing more. She kept on asking why they had come to see her, and finally Barrabal told her.

"I want to get the man who killed Larry," Barrabal rasped out. "So you've got to tell me where he went."

Tamara put a hand to her forehead and collapsed in a heap. As time was urgent they took her down to a car and whisked her back to the Yard, where a nurse took charge of her. Tamara came out of the faint, and was willing to talk, but the shock seemed to have numbed her brain. She knew Graeme had been going to meet some man, but could not remember the name. An orderly informed Barrabal that Carol Stedman and Frank Sutton were in the waiting-room.

Sutton was kept waiting—on purpose. He became very restless and impatient. A policeman informed him that Inspector Barrabal wished to ask him a few questions and would he mind waiting?

"I'm tired, and I don't want to stick around here all night," irritably cried Sutton. "Why must I see this Inspector Barrabal? Who is he?"

"Criminal Investigation, sir."

"Why can't I see Inspector Elford?"

The policeman said he would make inquiries and came back in a few minutes to request Mr. Sutton to come this way, and would Miss Stedman please remain in the waiting-room.

Sutton was shown into Inspector Elford's room.

"You know I want to help the police, inspector, but I'm a very busy man," Sutton stated. "I've told you everything I know. Why have I got to see Barrabal?"

"He's in charge of the case, Mr. Sutton."

"He knows all about Leslie, doesn't he?"

"All about him."

"Then what can he possibly want with me?"

"You'd better ask him for yourself." The inspector turned his head. "Ah, here he is now!"

It was a big shock for Sutton when Barrabal came into the room and grinned at him mockingly, but the Squeaker quickly recovered his wits. He sensed danger at once, and was on the alert.

"I hope you will forgive my little deception," Barrabal said in friendly tones. "You see, it's all in the day's work."

"May one inquire the reason for the disguise?" Sutton asked calmly.

"I was on a case down at the docks, looking for a man they call the Squeaker."

"I've heard of him," Sutton said with an air of interest. "He's a chap who buys stolen property, isn't he? You have a name for that sort?"

"A fence, Mr. Sutton."

"Yes, a fence. But what's that got to do with this murder case?"

"Nothing, except that the Squeaker killed Larry Graeme."

"Really?" Sutton raised his eyebrows. "How do you know?"

"Because Graeme told his girl he was out to get him."

"Did he say who the Squeaker was?" Sutton seemed amused. "I see by your faces, gentlemen, that he did not tell his girl. A very great pity, but he appears not to have trusted her. It's a great shame that no one witnessed the shooting, because now you can't arrest anybody, can you?" He smiled slyly at Barrabal. "Well, I don't suppose I'll be seeing you at the office to-morrow."

"No, I don't think you will." Barrabal was equally cool and affable.

"But before you go, Mr. Sutton, I should just like to show you how we handle a murder investigation."

"You should go along, Mr. Sutton," gruffly remarked Inspector Elford. "It might be a new experience for you."

The Master Trick

FRANK SUTTON was conducted into a huge room, where there was little except a winding staircase coming down from a gallery. Two seats were brought, and Inspector Elford quietly withdrew. The lights in the ceiling became dim, and then a greyish light was shone on the stairs. A warder appeared at the top of the stairs with a man in convict's garb. The convict began to descend the steel stairs.

"THE SQUEAKER"

"That's Lon Perrigan," Barrabal told Sutton. "He's doing three years in Pentonville. The Squeaker put him there." Another warder appeared at an open door with a convict. Another prisoner came slowly down the stairs. "Jack Mayne—he'll be out next month. He'd shoot the Squeaker on sight if he knew who he was. See that big, surly fellow coming down now—that's Tom Hand. He wouldn't meet the Squeaker's price—we got the usual note."

"What note's that?" Sutton asked. "Oh, you wouldn't know about that!" Barrabal answered, and pointed. "Here comes Harry Black. His wife committed suicide when the Squeaker double-crossed him."

"Can't we go now? I'm tired." Sutton pushed back his chair. "There are several more," quietly spoke Barrabal. "Men whom the Squeaker betrayed. This big man has been insane once—always he imagines himself strangling the Squeaker. When he is freed in two months' time it will be his one and only aim in life."

"Look here," cried Sutton, "I've had just about all I can stand of this."

"Larry Graeme had more than he could stand."

"What's that got to do with me?" "You were at the party where the murder occurred."

"Yes, and so were seventy other people," Sutton's voice was shrill. "And they were there before I even arrived."

"Yes, but you said yourself that Larry Graeme must have been shot after you reached the house."

"Are you trying to pin something on me?"

"There's nothing I can pin on you, is there?" viciously spoke Barrabal.

"Then I'll be going."

"Come this way, Mr. Sutton." Barrabal opened a door for his visitor, and after walking down innumerable passages for the purpose of setting Sutton's nerves even more on edge, they came to a door. "In here, please."

Frank Sutton found himself in a darkened room—the only light being a watery gleam from the moon that came through barred windows.

"What else do you want?" Sutton demanded shrilly.

"I'd like to have a statement before you leave."

"I'm not doing anything until I've seen my solicitor." Sutton gazed fearfully round. "Why don't you turn on some light?"

"Sorry, but the lights don't work!" harshly spoke Barrabal.

"You've no right to hold me here!"

screamed Sutton, perspiration pouring down his face. "I demand that—"

There was a click and the door opened. The light from the passage revealed three figures, the superintendent, Elford, and a policeman. With a gasp of relief Sutton moved towards them. "I want to make a complaint against this man," he managed to stammer out. "He's been trying to intimidate me—to implicate me in a murder I know nothing about."

"Why don't you tell Superintendent Marshall about yourself, Mr. Sutton," cried Barrabal before his chief could reply. "Tell him how that job of yours is a blind—a cover up for the biggest fence racket in London."

"You can't talk to me like that!" Sutton shouted.

"Tell him why you hire ex-convicts, so that you can frame them on their records when you get yourself in a tight spot—the way you tried to frame me."

Barrabal was merciless. "Tell him about Larry Graeme—how you squeaked on him when he wouldn't sell to you, how you saw him at the house, and all the time you carried in your hand this gun."

"I never saw it before," stuttered Sutton, staring with horror at the gun he had flung into the bushes.

"Tell him how you followed Graeme round the house, through the garden, and then shot him. You killed Larry Graeme because he knew who you were, and you were afraid."

"You're mad! I never knew Larry Graeme—I wouldn't know him if I saw him."

"You wouldn't?" Barrabal's voice was mocking. His hand went out and gripped a cord, whilst his other hand touched a switch. A bright light threw a beam on dark curtains. Barrabal gripped Sutton and spun him round to face the curtains. "Then look!"

He jerked the cord. The curtains rolled back, and there on a stretcher lay the ghastly figure of Larry Graeme.

Frank Sutton gave a yell of fright, and, white as death, sagged back against the wall, his eyes staring and his whole body shaking.

"I—I had to kill him!" The words came slowly from quivering lips. "He recognised me that night. I sent a note, but he escaped. I was a-afraid he might g-get me." His hands went over his face to shut out the figure of the man he had shot. "I had to kill him—"

Joshua Collic was given the scoop, and his story was all over the front page. His final paragraph was a typical Collic surprise item.

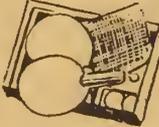

"Not only has the capture of the Squeaker led to the reinstatement of Inspector Barrabal of Scotland Yard, but this reporter strongly suspects a romantic conclusion to the case."

"YOU CAN'T BUY LUCK"

noise, tried to get out of the cab, two men leaped from the police car and he was caught.

She knew then that Paul Vinette suspected something. Quickly she looked around. An ashtray caught her attention. With hurried fingers she picked up a cigarette stub with her handkerchief, and when Paul Vinette, smiling, came downstairs with the wrapped cellophane she had gone.

Third Degree

JOE had already told the full story to Bond, who listened sympathetically, when Betty burst in.

"I was waiting for—for my friend to bring out the last one, Vinette, when you caught me."

"Tough luck, if you're telling the truth," Bond muttered, studying him reflectively.

"I am," said Joe, with a quietness that carried conviction.

"We've found him, the man who murdered Jean Jason!" interrupted Betty excitedly. "I'm certain of it. Look! I picked this cigarette-stub up in Vinette's studio after he had handled it. It must have his fingerprints on it. Couldn't you check it with the ones found in Miss Jason's apartment?"

"Well," said Bond dubiously, "we've identified every print we found in her place, either as Miss Jason's, the servant's, or Baldwin's."

"Did you find any on the cigarette-stubs in the ashtrays?" asked Joe.

"None that we could raise. Some of the cigarettes were burned to ashes. The prints on the others were blurred. I'm afraid there's nothing we can do, Miss McKay."

"You've got to do something," Betty said desperately. "He's suspicious, and might disappear."

"Lieutenant," said Joe suddenly, "Vinette doesn't know those prints were useless. If you told him this cigarette-stub—the one that Betty took from his studio—was found in Jean's apartment, maybe you could bluff him into a confession."

Bond pointed out that they had nothing on Vinette for which they could pull him in; that Joe, not having seen him, wasn't even sure he was the man, and that accusing him on the off-chance might bring serious trouble to his own department.

"You know my record, Bond," urged Joe. "Bring him here so that I can see him. You've got to give me a break!"

"It'll mean our jobs," put in McGrath, "if—"

"It'll mean Joe's life if you don't," said Betty spiritedly.

"I'll take a chance," snapped Bond. He handed the stub to McGrath. "Mac, plant this. Miss McKay, you come with me. You can point out this Vinette for me."

Paul Vinette was picked up just in the nick of time. He was drawing away in his roadster when the police car containing Betty and Lieutenant Bond forced him into the kerb. Trying to put a bold front on it, he was taken to the police headquarters.

In a side room, Joe and Betty and Bond looked through a partly opened door at the anxiously waiting artist.

"That's him!" whispered Joe.

"You're sure?" Bond questioned.

"I'd stake my life on it!"

"That's just what you're doing," said

Bond grimly, and, leaving them watching, he joined McGrath and Paul Vinette in his own office.

"I still don't know why you want to detain me," the artist was saying. "I admit I was speeding. Can't I post bail, and—"

"Just why were you in such a hurry, Mr. Vinette?" interrupted the lieutenant.

"I told you that on the way down here." Vinette looked at him belligerently. "I was trying to catch the noon train."

"That's funny," said Bond. "It looked more like you were running away."

"That's ridiculous!" Vinette plucked at his moustache as Bond sat down. "I didn't even know I was being followed, and I still don't know what you want."

"Well, I'll tell you," Bond leaned forward, his keen eyes fixed on Vinette's. "I just want to ask you a couple of questions. For example, did you know Jean Jason?"

"No." Vinette's eyes shifted. "I don't believe I do."

"That's not an answer," snapped McGrath, behind him. "Either you knew her, or you didn't!"

"Well, I meet a number of people. It might have been that I was introduced to the young lady at a party."

"Well"—Bond picked up a photograph and gave it to him—"perhaps this will refresh your memory."

"No." Vinette studied it. "I never saw her before."

"I suppose you've read about the Jason murder case?" asked Bond, taking the photo back and quietly handing it to McGrath.

"I saw the headlines, yes." Vinette was too worried now, too eager to appear composed, to notice McGrath leaving the office. "But I didn't pay much attention to them."

"Too lurid for your tastes?" asked Bond ironically.

"Well," Vinette laughed nervously. "A trifle."

"When were you last at the Renrad Arms?" snapped Bond suddenly.

Vinette almost gave himself away.

"Renrad Arms?" he replied, fighting to control his voice. "I don't believe I've ever been there."

"No?" murmured Bond, and took the photograph that McGrath brought back at that moment.

"Here you are, John," his assistant said. "Identicals."

"Say, what's this all about, anyway?" Vinette was getting fidgety.

"I'll show you," said Bond grimly. "On the night Jean Jason was murdered you were seen leaving the Renrad Arms."

"That's impossible! I was at home all evening."

"Really? In an ashtray in that apartment we found a cigarette-stub. There is the paper from that stub. We developed a fingerprint on it. McGrath just checked it against the prints you left on that photograph. Now, are you certain you were never in the Renrad Arms, and that you didn't know Jean Jason?"

To the delight of the watching Betty and Joe, the artist fell into the trap.

"Well," he said hesitantly, looking round like a hunted animal, "I guess I should have told you the truth. I did know her, and I did go to her apartment, but not the night she was killed. It was the day before."

With a glance at each other the two officers fired accusations at him.

"You're lying! You killed her!"

"I didn't! I didn't! I tell you I wasn't there that night!"

"You used her gun! You left fingerprints on it! On the trigger! They match these!"

"That's impossible!" Vinette was breaking fast under the inexorable questioning. "I wasn't near the apartment that night!"

"You were seen. You gave a man a light. In front of the building—"

"Now I understand!" he shouted.

"Baldwin's trying to pin this on me!"

"Well, if you weren't there," said Bond menacingly, icily, "how did you know it was Baldwin we were mentioning?"

"Why—why— I just guessed it," he stammered, aghast at his mistake.

"Why, you just said it was Baldwin who—"

"McGrath said a man," said, Bond icily.

"I didn't even know Baldwin!" screamed Vinette. "I only knew his name from the newspapers! He was jealous," he blubbered. "Jealous, I tell you. I wasn't near his place, not that night. I was at home in my studio—" He broke off and passed his hand nervously over his face. "All right," he gulped, "I did it!" And with a rush of words told the detectives how the crime had been committed.

Bond and McGrath heaved deep breaths and looked at one another. White-faced, trembling, Paul Vinette was taken to the cells.

The papers had a new sensation the next day, and they told it in glaring headlines—"Baldwin Innocent! Killer Confesses!"

Not long after, Joe Baldwin and Betty McKay were leaving for an air trip.

"I got yo' bags all aboard, Mr. Baldwin," grinned the negro porter at the airport. "I sho' hopes Sarcasm wins that Santa Anita handieap, suh!"

"Say"—Joe handed him a big tip—"pray for one of those Californian fogs, will you?"

"Mr. Baldwin!" exclaimed Betty severely.

He grinned. "A little rain will be good for the orange crop. Come on, Mrs. Baldwin!"

"THINK FAST, MR. MOTO"

The Jap nodded.
"It was necessary." He considered for a moment. "The boy you will keep for ransom—his father is rich. But the girl—" He snapped his fingers. "Slit her throat and drop her in river."
Blake slammed to the iron door, and Marloff led on into a room where a secret roulette-table was littered with coins.

They played awhile.
Nearly half an hour passed. Lela had made several abortive attempts to enter the 'phone-box in the hall. A sailor was there, chattering endlessly. At last she got in and managed to ring through to the Chinese police headquarters. She had just spoken when the box door was gently opened. A hard, round point touched between her shoulders; a gentle, hissing sound was lost in the closed privacy of the box. The girl dropped the 'phone and crumpled up on the floor.

"Fainted!" muttered Mr. Wilkie, who, following her from the dance floor, was prompt to run forward and carry her into the reception office. He passed her over to the woman there, then hurried downstairs to the roulette-room. Mr. Moto was standing by the door, his white-coated back to him when Wilkie opened it. He was holding up Marloff with a gun. "Why, Mr. Moto!" cried Wilkie in surprise. "What's all this?"

He knocked up the Jap's outstretched arm, and the revolver clattered to the floor. Wilkie then became aware of a bearded, Hebraic man standing behind Marloff. A shot rang out. Mr. Moto fell sideways, a black, scorched mark showing on his white coat just below the heart.

Marloff growled:
"Adram, you've saved me the trouble." He snatched up Moto's pistol and stooped over him. "Not quite dead? A pity."

Mr. Moto gasped painfully:
"Gentleman knows when he is beaten. Please finish quick." He feebly put his left hand to his temple. "Here, if you please."

"Don't worry," Marloff gritted.

"This time luck's against you, stool pigeon!"

He was pressing the muzzle of the gun to the Jap's forehead when a foot shot up into his stomach. His hand was gripped in pudgy fingers that closed like a vice. He was lifted high with the foot and hurled like a stone from a catapult right across the room, falling with a crash on to the bearded Adram.

Mr. Moto sprang to his feet, revolver once more in his grasp.

"Mr. Wilkie, take gun from Adram," Moto ordered. "Quick, if you please!"

Wilkie, ashy grey, obeyed. Marloff's arms were high above his head. "Search also that one."

You could hardly do better than to book one or more of these fine gift volumes for Christmas.

Wilkie, Adram's pistol in hand, stepped up to Marloff. A second report snapped out, and Marloff, with a grunt of surprise, fell face forward, clawing at the carpet with his fingers.

"The—gun went off," Wilkie stammered.

"Everything all right, Mr. Wilkie," came Moto's quiet voice. "That odd head of smugglings. I think now police have come."

A big Chinese officer entered with a squad of his men. They had Bob and Gloria with them. They grabbed Adram and another of his kind who came creeping in the room. The big officer spoke gruffly to Moto. "Miss Liu is not hurt too much. I have sent her to police hospital."

Moto's sallow face had flashed at mention of the Chinese girl. But he was still calm. He held out both hands to Wilkie.

"Admiring presence of mind," he said.

Wilkie's hand came forward to shake Moto's. The Jap gripped Wilkie's fingers, and, like a conjuring trick, clapped a pair of handcuffs on his wrists.

"You killed poor Mr. Marloff"—Moto's voice was quite unemotional—"because you think he betray you. You make attempt to kill Miss Liu, my friend, for same reason. You act with poor Mr. Marloff in the smugglings. It is very sad."

"You're in the police!"

Bob stared at the little Jap as he clutched at Gloria's hand. She cried in alarm:

"And—Oh, you're wounded!"

The black, scorched ring showed sinisterly on the white coat.

Mr. Moto smiled at them kindly.

"Beneath is bullets wastecot. See!" He threw open his dress jacket. "Necessary sometimes. I am not police, if you please. This humble person managing director Heroshima & Company, Fifth Avenue, in New York, dealers of diamonds, precious stones, jade, all things very beautiful and rare of fine quality. Smugglings not good for honourable Messrs. Heroshima's affairs." He beamed round at them all through his gold-rimmed spectacles. "So this one take steps to prevent smugglings. That is all!"

What a Life!

Porter Hall, who has been playing roles in two pictures at the same time, recently found himself Hollywood's busiest actor.

He wears a beard in "Bulldog Drummond's Peril" and is clean shaven in "Dangerous To Know." The result is he has been constantly on the jump.

So far, during the production of these two Paramount pictures, he has put on and taken off his whiskers no fewer than twenty times, and it requires one hour and ten minutes in the make-up department for every change!

Ohio Town Built for New Film

With fifty trucks bringing in building materials, machinery and equipment over the "Rim of the World" road, a force of one hundred men constructed an Ohio town, of the period just preceding the Civil War, on the shores of Lake Arrowhead. Tons of material were transported to the site, 6,000 feet above sea level, for the village, used as chief location set for "Of Human Hearts," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture, starring Walter Huston, with James Stewart and Beulah Bondi.

The location was one of the most extensive of the year. Several hundred extras, as well as all the principals, were at the lake for more than two weeks to complete all exteriors. During the location trip the town was remodelled to show a lapse of years. Clarence Brown is directing the new picture, a dramatic story of the sacrifice of the itinerant preacher and his wife for a son who forgets, until his feet are set on the right path, at the close of the Civil War, by Abraham Lincoln. It is based on the fiction story by Honore Willis Morrow.

Players include Charles Coburn, distinguished New York stage actor, brought West for his first screen rôle, Guy Kilbee, Charley Grapewin, Ann Rutherford, Ted Healy, and Leatrice Joy Gilbert, daughter of John Gilbert and Leatrice Joy, who is making her screen debut in the production.

Your Pencil

I feel sure that all readers have been collecting the tokens which have appeared week by week since the scheme was announced in the February 26th issue. It is a grand pencil, and I strongly advise all those who have collected tokens to take careful note of the announcement on page 25.

World's Largest Correspondence Bureau

The world's largest correspondence bureau is going full blast again.

Overhardened postmen daily pour thousands of letters from fans to their April 2nd, 1938.

favourite film stars into the studios and private offices of the players.

A check-up of those stars who handle their post with private staffs reveals that the present flow of fan mail into Hollywood is the largest since 1929.

Last year, Bing Crosby mailed over 175,000 autographed photographs of himself to fans. This year he will mail more than 200,000 photographs, if the present rate is maintained for the rest of the year.

Crosby has offices away from the studio, and consequently maintains his own letter bureau instead of making use of the studio facilities at Paramount. His fan mail this year is so large that he employs three stenographers and a clerk.

The screening of his recent Paramount picture, "Double Or Nothing," and his return to work, after a holiday, in "Doctor Rhythm," has maintained his fan mail at its high level.

The Crosby records are borne out by those of other stars. For example, the return of W. C. Fields to work in "The Big Broadcast of 1938," has sent his mail soaring.

The normal upward trend in fan mail is said to be from January until September and October; there is a slump during these last two months. Then fan mail picks up again in November, only to go into another slump until after the Christmas holidays, when everyone is busy with shopping and New Year celebrations.

Make-up Miracles

It's easier to make a purse out of a sow's ear than to make a Chinaman out of an Englishman.

But in Hollywood anything is possible, and so Boris Karloff, who was born William Henry Pratt, became an Oriental.

It took Percy Westmore and his assistant, Ray Lopez, two weeks to work out the make-up that Boris Karloff wears in "West of Shanghai." The preliminary work was the hardest part of it, and after the two make-up men had worked it out, the rest was comparatively easy. Karloff had to spend only three hours each day in the make-up department during the filming of the picture.

To begin with, Karloff's eyebrows and part of his hair were shaved off. His eyelashes were removed and the back of his neck was shaved round, like a cattleman's haircut. The space between the eyes was built up and the shape of the eyes was changed to almond.

The cheekbones were high-lighted to make them more prominent. Westmore and Lopez experimented with Karloff's cheekbones for several days before they hit upon the high-lighting. They tried building them up, but this didn't work, for every time Karloff smiled the built-up cheekbones cracked.

The wig was next. Karloff's hair is fine, and brown in colour. That's all right for an Englishman, but Chinese have straight, black, coarse hair, so a wig was necessary, and that's what Karloff wears in the film. He also wears a black, wiry moustache. Finally he was painted a nice yellow, as though suffering from a permanent case of jaundice.

Karloff says the make-up for "West of Shanghai" was harder to apply than the one he wore in "Frankenstein," but it was less uncomfortable. It was a bit hard on the eyes, but

Starring William Boyd

Also

Another episode of the fighting serial:

"RADIO PATROL,"

Starring Grant Withers.

An oilfield has been discovered by Jim Hallet in North China, and he has borrowed money to develop it, but is unable to carry on for lack of funds. Two unscrupulous American financiers plan to acquire the concession, but General Wu Yen Fang, a Chinese war lord, has taken possession of the territory by the time they reach the nearest village—and Fang has his own way of dealing with troublesome people. An absorbing melodrama, starring Boris Karloff, with Beverly Roberts, Ricardo Cortez and Gordon Oliver

The Night Train from Peiping

A LONG train was standing at the main departure platform of the Peiping-Suiyuan Railway, in Peiping, and, according to a huge board near the booking-office, it was due to start upon its journey at half-past seven, and, according to a clock on a wall above the board, the time was seven-twenty-six.

In spite of the fact that the passengers of various nationalities who streamed past the barrier had a full four minutes in which to find their seats, a Chinese porter on the platform kept shouting monotonously in Mandarin:

"The train is leaving! The train is leaving! Hurry! The train is leaving!"

A tall, clean-shaven man of rather a Latin type, though actually an American, walked up to the Chinese ticket-collector at the gate of the barrier, carrying a leather portfolio under his left arm and a suitcase in his right hand.

He was a handsome man in his own dark fashion, with a pair of very quick brown eyes which could express everything or nothing, as their owner willed. A slouch hat was upon his head, and he was wearing a heavy rainproof.

"I understand this train isn't leaving on time," he said.

"That's right, sir," replied the ticket-collector in perfectly good English. "We are waiting for a distinguished passenger, General Chou Fu Shan."

"Well, I'm Gordon Creed." A paper was exhibited. "I have a reservation in coach three, compartment seven."

A yellow-skinned conductor, who had been standing within earshot, walked over and looked at the ticket.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Creed," he said in English as perfect as that of his colleague. "Compartment seven has been taken for General Chou Fu Shan. The entire compartment."

"I made my reservation yesterday," complained Creed, "and I paid for it."

"I can't help it, sir. This is a Government order."

"Well, can't you find me a seat somewhere?"

"Not in first-class. There might be something in second."

Creed laughed scornfully.

"I'm not in the habit of travelling second," he said. "I insist that you find a seat for me."

"I will do my best, sir," promised the conductor.

A Chinaman, dressed all in black, with a tight-fitting black cap upon his head, was leaning against the inside of the barrier, seemingly immersed in a newspaper; but a pair of beady brown eyes glanced over the top of the paper at Creed as he walked discontentedly towards the train.

Abruptly a voice called out, "Gordon!" and Creed turned about as a man nearly as tall as himself, but lean of face and middle-aged, came running up to him, exclaiming as he arrived:

"I've been looking for you!" "Hallo, Harry!" Creed said in obvious surprise. "What are you doing here? Anything wrong?"

"No," was the reply, "but it's a lucky thing they held the train, or I'd have missed you."

"What's up?"

Henry Hemingway fished a folded sheet of paper from a pocket.

"This letter came right after you left the office," he said. "It's a confidential report on the Jim Hallet oil property. The Discovery Field is worth millions, but Hallet is broke and he can't operate it."

"Humm!" Creed put down the suitcase to thrust the letter into one of his own pockets. "I'll check up on that when I get there."

"The situation is made to order for us," exulted Hemingway. "Hallet needs cash. I stopped at the bank and got fifty thousand."

Creed accepted a wad of notes as calmly as he had accepted the letter.

"Good idea," he approved. "I'll make him an offer for a quarter interest—just enough to keep operations going."

"Good luck to you!" said Hemingway.

"Good luck to all of us," laughed Creed, and he boarded the train just as cries of excitement rang out beyond the barrier and a Chinese officer in khaki shouted to the crowd that gathered there to get out of the way.

Creed stopped and looked round on the top of the steps of the coach he had been about to enter.

"That's General Fu Shan," he said to Hemingway with a nod of his head. "That's the fellow who grabbed my reservation!"

A military escort had lined up at the barrier, saluting General Chou Fu Shan as he walked past the bowing ticket-collector—a fine figure of a soldier who might have passed for a British officer but for the saffron hue of his skin and the slant of his eyes. A little clipped moustache decorated his upper lip in approved British style; an adjutant walked beside him.

The top-hatted stationmaster hurried towards him, bowed, and fell into step.

"Pardon, your Excellency," he said obsequiously. "May we have your honourable permission to depart?"

"We will leave immediately," Fu Shan replied.

"I wonder why he's going north?" remarked Creed, watching the very erect general as the stationmaster piloted him and the adjutant across the platform to the steps of the third coach.

"I don't know," returned Hemingway. "Must be trouble brewing."

Creed waved a hand and disappeared into the corridor of the coach he had selected at random. General Chou Fu Shan reached the steps of the one reserved for him—and then a commotion arose at the gate as a full-faced and full-bodied American dashed up to it with a girl who was wearing a fur coat and a little felt hat and who looked a mere slip of a thing beside him.

"Hurry, father!" cried the girl, as a whistle whistled. "That's the starting signal!"

"You're sure that's the train for the north?" panted the man.

"Of course it is!" she replied impatiently. "Come on!"

A conductor shouted to them, and they raced across the platform, followed by a Chinese porter carrying their luggage and perspiring freely. The luggage was deposited hastily in the gangway of a coach, the two passengers scrambled up the steps past the conductor, and the porter stared blankly at a button in the palm of his right hand.

"Why do you give me this money?" he asked in Mandarin; but the man who had bestowed the button instead of a coin had vanished inside the coach with the girl.

Railway servants shouted, the gate of the barrier was closed with a clang, and the Chinaman in black dropped the paper he had been pretending to read, streaked across to the last coach, and swung himself up on to the steps as the train began to move out from the station into the darkness of the night.

He fitted along a corridor, making no sound in his hish—or heelless shoes—and a slant-eyed conductor who followed opened the door of a third-class compartment for him without a word.

He seated himself beside an elderly and spectacled yellow man, and he regarded covertly two other compatriots on the opposite seat; then, turning sideways, he took from the front of his long gown a fan and from the fan removed a long, thin-bladed dagger with a handle of ivory shaped like a tiger.

He opened the fan, and, behind it, slipped the naked dagger inside the left sleeve of his gown.

The Knife of the White Tiger

AFTER Peiping Station, with its network of lines, had been left behind, Creed made his way along several corridors to coach three, April 2nd, 1938.

and outside the open door of compartment seven he encountered the conductor who had promised to do his best.

"Did you find a seat for me?" he inquired.

"I'm sorry, sir," was the reply. "Every seat is taken."

"All right, then," said Creed calmly. "I'll sit in number seven."

"Impossible!" cried the conductor, barring his way. "This is the compartment of General Chou Fu Shan!"

"Well, what of it?" Creed flung out a hand. "He can't use all those seats—and besides, I paid for one of them!"

"Sorry, sir. Nothing can be done."

"Now look—"

General Chou Fu Shan, alone in the compartment with seven vacant seats, appeared suddenly in the doorway.

"Just a moment, please," he interrupted. "Did this gentleman have a seat reserved in my compartment?"

"Yes, Excellency," admitted the conductor, whisking off his cap.

"Then he shall have it!"

"But, Excellency—"

"The matter is settled!" Fu Shan smiled slightly at Creed and stood aside for him to enter.

"I don't like to intrude, general," said Creed, "but—er—"

"Nonsense! Come in!"

"You're very kind." Creed stepped into the compartment, but remained standing.

"Please sit down," urged the general, and resumed his own corner seat by the door with his back to the engine.

The baffled conductor closed the door and went off with the intruder's suitcase, and the intruder took off his hat and rain-proof, stowed them on a rack, together with his portfolio, and sat facing his benefactor.

"I'm Gordon Creed," he said, "of the International Oil Company. I'll be leaving the train in the morning at Ting Fou."

"I daresay we shall not disturb each other," returned Fu Shan politely. "I will have my dinner brought to me presently. And—er—after my dinner I shall sleep very soundly."

He unfastened the collar of his tunic and settled back against the cushions, and Creed began to read a newspaper he had bought at the station.

The big American and his daughter, meanwhile, had been conducted to seats they had reserved in coach ten.

"What time do we arrive at Ting Fou?" the girl inquired of their guide as she took off her fur coat.

"At seven in da momini," was the reply.

"Will the train be on time?" asked the man, whose name was Myron Galt and who looked almost as gross a figure without his overcoat as with it.

"He'll be satisfied if it's on the track," laughed the girl, because no answer was forthcoming from the stolid conductor.

"Can we arrange for overland transportation from that point?" Galt questioned.

"Yes, sir." The yellow man seemed to come to life again. "Pack trains and guides may be engaged at Ting Fou. Are you going far?"

"To the town of Sha Ho Shan, and from there to an oilfield back in the hills."

"What time is dinner served in the restaurant car?" asked the girl.

"The service will be late to-night," the conductor informed her, clipping the tickets her father had produced and returning them. "General Chou Fu Shan is on the train and he might dine first."

"Dine first?" she echoed with a grimace. "Well, I hope he doesn't go on a sit-down strike in there—I'm hungry!"

General Chou Fu Shan had dinner served in his compartment upon a table erected for the purpose, and Creed read. Instead of coffee at the end of the meal, the general drank tea. He smoked a cigarette with the tea, and he spread a map upon the table and studied it.

"I see," remarked Creed, looking up from his paper, "that the rebel army of General Wu Yen Fang occupied Ku Chou yesterday, and that he calls himself the 'White Tiger of the North.'"

"Fang is a plague of locusts to the North," said Fu Shan emphatically, "and like the locust he can only be fought with fire. Fang's days are numbered."

Creed did not pursue the subject. The general's presence on the train was explained; he was on his way to deal with Fang, a self-styled war lord and a bandit.

"I think I'll go and have a meal myself, now," he said; and he went off to find the restaurant car.

Myron Galt and his not quite beautiful daughter were seated at a table, studying the menu, when he entered the car and exchanged greetings with two acquaintances near the doorway. Galt looked round, and he said to the Chinese attendant who was waiting for an order:

"Steward, I know the gentleman who has just entered. Ask him if he'd care to sit here."

"Who is he?" asked the girl after the steward had gone.

"Gordon Creed of International Oil. I want to find out where he's going, so be nice to him."

"That won't be difficult," said she; and then Creed walked up to the table and Galt rose from his chair.

"Well, this is a pleasant surprise," said the newcomer. "How are you, Mr. Galt?"

"Fine, thank you." Galt indicated the girl. "This is my daughter Lola. Mr. Gordon Creed, my dear."

The two men became seated side by side, and Creed said with a smile for Lola:

"Well, I had resigned myself to a dull evening and a very bad train. But I see that Fate has been kind to me."

"Travelling far, Mr. Creed?" asked Galt.

"I'll be leaving the train in the morning at Ting Fou."

Lola repeated the name as though in surprise.

"Well, that's a coincidence!" exclaimed her father.

"That's where we're going," said she. "Really?" Creed raised his dark brows. "I suppose you'll be leaving by mule train?"

"Of course."

"Good! Then we can all travel together."

"Oh, how nice!" cried Lola. "How far north are you going, Mr. Creed?"

"Sha Ho Shan."

Lola laughed, and he asked her why she laughed.

"Well, that's where we're going!"

"You wouldn't, by any chance, be on your way to make a deal with Jim Hallet, would you?" inquired Galt.

"Jim Hallet?" Creed's face was a mask.

"Yes. Hallet's Discovery Oilfield is near Sha Ho Shan, you know."

"I'm going to see my wife," said Creed. "She's an apprentice missionary in the Medical Mission in Sha Ho Shan."

"Oh!" Lola looked disappointed. "You have a wife?"

"Yes," said Creed, "but we've been separated for years. That's the reason for my journey. You aren't by any chance going to see Jim Hallet, are you, Mr. Galt?"

Under his keen gaze Galt found it difficult to evade a direct answer.

"Why, I—er—I—I—" he stammered.

The steward bent over them.

"May I have your order, please?"

"What?" Galt was very glad of the interruption. "Oh, yes, of course—yes, to be sure."

While he was studying the menu again, Creed talked to the bright, but rather hard-eyed, girl. Her blonde hair had a reddish tinge; her mouth was a trifle too large.

"I'm travelling in distinguished company," he informed her. "I'm sharing a compartment with a very famous Chinese general."

"How thrilling!" she breathed. "Will you introduce us?"

"Of course," said he.

The dishes Galt ordered were served without any undue delay and proved quite appetising. The three lingered over coffee and liqueurs, and then Creed led the way along the corridors to coach three, compartment seven.

The Chinaman who had concealed a naked dagger in the left sleeve of his gown was in the corridor as they entered it, but immediately flitted into the lavatory. Creed opened the door of the compartment and pulled back a curtain that screened its glass panel. General Chou Fu Shan was in his corner and his eyes were closed.

"He's sound asleep," whispered Creed.

"We'd better not disturb him," said Lola, gazing with interest at the lined, yet peaceful, face; and then one brown eye was opened, and the general said:

"Not quite asleep, dear lady, but I expect to be very soon."

"I'm sorry we troubled you, general," apologised Creed.

The general opened his other eye and rose to bow.

"Please do not speak of it," he said.

"My friends, here, wanted to meet you," Creed explained. "This is Miss Galt, and this is her father, Mr. Myron Galt, of Peiping—General Chou Fu Shan."

"How d'you do?" murmured daughter and father in unison.

"Delighted," declared Fu Shan.

"Won't you come in?"

"I'm afraid you'd rather finish your nap," said Creed. But the general insisted upon their entering the compartment and did not sit down till they were seated.

"I always sleep much better when I have company," he stated then.

"I hope you intend that as a compliment, general," flattered Lola.

"A very great compliment," he assured her gravely. "I only sleep in the presence of those I trust."

"But surely you're safe with so many soldiers to guard you! The train seems to be half-full of them."

"Soldiers are a calamity," he sighed. "I trust them only when my eyes are open, and I need rest badly—I have much work to do. Please make yourselves comfortable. I am very much at peace."

He rested the back of his head against the linen-covered cushion again and his eyelids drooped and closed. The train clattered through a rocky gorge out into open, but almost invisible, country, and Creed offered cigarettes to his companions as the general began to snore.

"Doesn't he sound a little flat to you?" asked Lola impishly.

"S-s-sh!" Creed held a lighter to her cigarette, and presently the three were smoking. He turned to Galt. "How long have you known Jim Hallet?" he asked abruptly.

"Oh, not too long," was the non-committal reply.

"Why don't you two stop fencing with one another?" Lola intervened. "It's quite evident that you're both interested in the Discovery Oilfield, and I'm sure Mr. Creed will be delighted to know that my father owns it!"

"Owus it?" exclaimed Creed. "How do you mean?"

"I will own it," said Galt, "when I take possession. You see, I loaned Jim the money to buy the property and develop it, but now his note's overdue. He'll have to give it up."

"Unless," suggested Creed smoothly, "he can find the money to pay for it."

"He won't find it."

"I wouldn't be too sure about that, Mr. Galt."

The Chinaman who had vanished into the lavatory had stolen out from it again and was reaching up to a fuse-box at the end of the coach. With startling suddenness the whole coach was plunged into pitch darkness.

"Good heavens," gasped Lola, "what's wrong now?"

"Nothing serious, Miss Galt," Creed reassured her. "Probably a short circuit."

Cries rang out from various parts of the coach; footsteps sounded in the corridor; the door of the compartment was opened, the curtains flung back, and some Chinese soldiers looked in at the motionless form of the general with the aid of an electric torch one of them carried.

"Nothing to worry about," said Galt as the soldiers moved off along the corridor.

"Those men were just as worried as I was," shivered Lola. "Anything can happen in China!"

The lights of the coach shone brilliantly again as suddenly as they had failed, and Creed said cheerfully:

"It didn't seem to annoy General Fu Shan. He slept right through our little excitement."

Lola, who was sitting next to the general, looked closely into the yellow face.

"But, look, he's not breathing!" she

"You were right," said Creed to Lola in a horrified voice. "I'm afraid this means trouble for us!"

cried. "His eyes are open and glassy! Something did happen, I know it!"

Creed leaned forward in alarm.

"General Fu Shan!" he shouted. "General! General Fu Shan!"

He shook a limp arm, and as he did so the general's head fell to his knees.

Lola gave vent to a piercing scream, and almost immediately the conductor appeared in the doorway with a soldier on either side of him. Ejaculating something in Mandarin, the conductor stooped and picked up from the floor a long thin-bladed dagger with a handle of ivory shaped like a tiger.

"Where did this come from?" he demanded in his own language, examining the handle. "The knife of the White Tiger! The spies of General Wu Yen Fang!"

"You were right," said Creed to Lola in a horrified voice. "I'm afraid this means trouble for us!"

Across the Desert

UNTIL nearly half-past seven next morning, when the train arrived at Ting Fou, the three Americans were kept prisoners in the compartment, guarded by four soldiers; and to add to the horror of the night the dead body of General Chou Fu Shan remained in the corner seat, covered with a martial cloak.

Myron Galt sat with an arm round his weeping daughter, who got no sleep at all; but Creed had at least six hours slumber, and was wakened by the jerk with which the train came to a standstill a full minute before the soldier on his right clamped a hand upon his arm.

The three prisoners were marched out from Ting Fou station and along narrow streets to the headquarters of the Military Governor, a building of brick facing a courtyard inside a high wall, and in a big and very scantily furnished room they were lined up facing a table at which the Governor, General Mu, and two officers were seated. The train conductor was present.

A junior officer read the charge in Mandarin, and General Mu stood up, holding the dagger in his right hand.

"You admit," he said slowly, and speaking English with manifest difficulty, "that during the time you were in the compartment with General Chou Fu Shan no one else entered it, and that he was killed with this knife, and yet you insist you know nothing of how he was killed."

"But, general," faltered Lola, "surely you don't suspect us of killing him?"

"That's ridiculous!" cried her father. "General Mu is not accusing you," rebuked the officer who was acting as clerk. "He is seeking information which will lead us to the killer."

"Information which you have so far refused to give," added the general sternly.

"But we've told everything that we know," protested Creed.

"You say you know nothing?" asked the junior officer.

"But that is not possible!" rapped the general, stabbing some papers on the desk with the dagger. "The man was killed before your eyes!"

"But he wasn't killed before our eyes!" cried Lola. "He was killed in the dark—the lights went out for a moment!"

"We had nothing against the general," said Galt defensively. "We didn't even know him. Why should we kill General Chou Fu Shan?"

"That is exactly what I am trying to find out," returned Mu. "He was on his way to fight Wu Yen Fang. Fang has foreign spies in his employ."

"But we're not spies!" stormed Creed.

April 2nd, 1938.

"You've no right to keep us here any longer!"

The blade of the dagger was pointed in his direction, and the general said ominously:

"You are now in the military province of Shanhaikwan. As Military Governor of this province it is my duty to execute you if I see fit."

"Execute us?" Galt's flabby face went a sickly white.

"Exactly! And unless you tell me what you know I shall order you before a firing-squad at once!"

Creed compressed his lips; Lola shuddered. And then a commotion arose out in the courtyard, and abruptly two Chinese soldiers burst into the room with the black-robed Chinaman a prisoner between them, and one of the soldiers cried in his own language:

"General Mu, we have got the killer!"

The general stared at the captive, whose face was void of expression.

"Did you kill General Chou Fu Shan?" he demanded in Mandarin.

"Yes," was the defiant reply. "It was great to kill him!"

"Execute him!"

The soldiers marched the imperturbable yellow man out from the room and the general threw down the dagger.

"Sorry to cause you this trouble," he said in English to the three who stood facing him. "We have found the murderer."

"I'm certainly glad you found him," said Galt fervently.

Lola turned to Creed.

"What are they going to do with him?" she asked tremulously.

A volley of rifle fire, somewhere outside the building, made her jump.

"They're going to bury him," said Creed.

With a feeling that they themselves had escaped death only by a miracle the three walked out from the military post, soon afterwards, and at an alleged hotel near the railway station had breakfast together.

Their luggage, which had been confiscated, was returned to them at the hotel, and General Mu sent one of the members of his staff to help them make arrangements for a mule train to convey them across fifty odd miles of waste land, mainly desert, to Sha Ho Shan.

The mules carried the luggage and provisions for the journey, and were driven by coolies; the passengers, their slant-eyed guide, and three armed guards rode horses, and when night came the whole party camped among the sand dunes beneath bright stars and a new moon.

On the second day Creed rode beside Lola, behind the mules, and Galt followed. Galt was saddle-sore, and at intervals emitted a grunt of discomfort.

"How're you doing, dad?" Lola looked round to inquire.

"Not too well," admitted her parent with a grimace. "This horse makes me seasick."

"I wish I had a bottle of smelling-salts," she lamented.

"You're not going to faint?"

"No, but I'm afraid that mule is!"

About half an hour later the guide cried out from the front of the train:

"Stop! Bandits!"

Away in the distance, from the general direction of some hills that had become visible at dawn, two horsemen were galloping across the sand. The whole train was stopped, and the three armed guards trained their rifles on the approaching horsemen. But no other riders were anywhere to be seen in the barren landscape, and as the two drew near Lola cried out in a very relieved voice:

"It's Jim Hallet!"

The guards lowered their rifles at sight of a young and particularly handsome white man, who signed to his yellow-skinned companion to stop, dismounted, and walked over to the train. He was taller than Creed and considerably younger, and he looked a fine figure of health and vigour in a leather jumper, riding-breeches, and high-laced boots. His strong, clean-shaven face was tanned by sun and wind, his grey eyes were honest, and his jaw suggested a dogged nature.

"Hallo!" hailed Galt.

"Well!" exclaimed Jim Hallet, and he swept off his hat. "I could tell this was a white man's mule train, but I had no idea I'd find you people in it. I was tending some sheep belonging to the Mission. How are you, Lola? You're looking fit."

"So are you, Jim," responded Lola.

"Mr. Galt, how are you?"

"Well," said Galt, descending clumsily from his mount, "I could be better. You know Creed of International Oil, don't you?"

Creed swung himself down from the saddle and shook hands.

"I think I do," said Jim, without any great enthusiasm. "Met you at the Shensi Club in Peiping."

"That's right," confirmed Creed.

"Glad to see you, Hallet."

The yellow man who had ridden with Jim Hallet turned back towards the hills and a patch of grass beneath them upon which a flock of sheep were grazing.

"You people shouldn't have come here," said Jim with a shake of his head. "Didn't you know there was fighting in this province?"

"Well," said Creed, "we had no idea of it until we reached Ting Fou. We were held there for a military investigation."

"General Fu Shan," explained Lola, "was assassinated on the train, and we were there when it happened."

"So Fang has knocked off another enemy!" commented Jim wryly. "It's his army that's fighting in this province now. We'd better get to the Medical Mission as soon as we can. Come along!"

The horses were remounted, and the whole train moved on again. Jim rode in front, and Creed caught up with him.

"Hallet," he said, "if it's capital you need to operate your oil wells we might make a deal."

"Capital's the one thing I need most," Jim confessed frankly.

"Well, I'm prepared to make you a cash offer. When can I look at the property?"

"As soon as the war is over."

"War?" Creed's brows ascended.

"Right now," said Jim, "my oil-fields are completely overrun by Fang's handits."

Creed's jaw dropped ever so slightly. "Well, I don't think my company would be interested," he said.

"No?" Jim bestowed an amused sidelong glance upon him. "I didn't think so, either. Excuse me."

He turned his horse and joined Myron Galt and Lola.

"Well, are you getting tired?" he asked.

"We'll be glad to get there," said Lola.

The grass and the sheep were only a little way ahead, and under the hills to the left the walls of a town that was really nothing much more than a village had become distinguishable. Sha Ho Shan was at hand.

"Well, Jim," said Galt, "why haven't I heard from you?"

"As a matter of fact," responded that young man rather dolefully, "I was going to Peiping to see you."

"Broke again, Jim?" suggested Lola. "Completely."

"Don't forget your first note's already overdue," said Galt.

"I know it!"

Lola decided that it was time to change the subject.

"Is that the town?" she asked, pointing a gloved hand.

"Yeah, that's Sha Ho Shan," replied Jim. "But I don't know that I'd call it a town."

Jim Makes a Mistake

THE gates of Sha Ho Shan were open, and the riders and the mules and the coolies passed under an archway set in a tower that formed part of the encircling wall of baked mud.

Excited Chinese men, women and children clustered in the narrow street beyond the archway to point at the strangers and to jabber in their own dialect concerning them; but Jim led the way into a congested market-place, noisy with the quacking of ducks in crates and the shouts of vendors at their stalls.

The crowd followed, but on the northern side of the market-place a wooden gate was opened as Jim reached it, and the whole party entered a courtyard shut off from the region of stalls by a wall.

A brick building, two stories high and of considerable extent, flanked this courtyard, and the double doors of the main entrance were open.

From the front step a bare-headed man of about fifty-five, dressed sombrely in a black lounge suit, descended to meet the visitors. He was Dr. Abernathy, a man of distinguished appearance who might have been a clergyman or a physician, and he was in charge of the Mission.

"How d'you do, doctor?" said Creed, who seemed to recognise him. "I'm Gordon Creed."

A girl looked down into the courtyard from an upper window—a girl no older than Lola but of altogether a different type. She saw Creed, and she withdrew her head in haste.

"This is Miss Galt," said Creed. Abernathy bowed. Jim, who had dismounted, introduced Myron Galt.

"Well, friends," said the doctor, "I welcome you all to the Mission, but I'm afraid these poor walls won't be much protection against Fang and his soldiers."

"Fang," said Creed, "is a blood-thirsty devil!"

"I've been laughing at devils all my life," returned the doctor with a smile. "Come with me and I'll show you where you're to sleep. Your rooms may not be comfortable, but they'll be clean. At least, there will be no vermin in them."

"Not until the bandits get here!" remarked Creed dryly.

"Ugh!" exclaimed Lola. "That's a jolly thought!"

The mules were unpacked, the luggage was carried into the building, and Galt and Creed settled with their guide—who was in haste to start back for Ting Fou with his men, his mules, and his horses.

The rooms of the Mission proved to be far better appointed than Dr. Abernathy had led his guests to suppose. A large living-room, which opened out of the main hall, was particularly attractive with its Chinese furniture, rugs and screens; the bed-rooms were airy and adequately furnished.

"Ve'y nice." Fang looked again into Jim's face. "Me not want see him die, too."

Jim Hallet did not accompany the party on their tour of inspection, but went out into the courtyard again because his Tartar companion had just ambled into it.

"The ponies don't amount to much, Pao," he said, "but I'd hate to have Fang get them. Hide them out somewhere."

"Yes, sir," nodded the yellow man; and he led his own mount and his employer's out at the gate, presumably to put them away in some place likely to be overlooked by any warlike invaders.

The girl who had peeped from an upper window ran out from the building, dressed very simply in a plain black frock with a little white collar.

"Jim!" she called. "Jim!" Jim, who had been watching his servant cross the market-place, turned about.

"Jane!" he exclaimed, and joined her. "Why weren't you in the welcoming committee? Don't you know that your husband, the eminent Mr. Creed, is here?"

"Yes," she said, with very patent loathing for the "eminent" Mr. Creed, "I saw him."

"He came to see me," said Jim, "about my oil property. Say, does he know you're in the Mission?"

"His attorneys do. They wrote me here."

"Well, I'm glad he came. Now you can tell him you're going to divorce him and marry me!"

But Jane Creed shook her golden head.

"No, I can't, Jim," she said definitely. "We settled that once before."

"You thought we did," he amended.

"Oh, here comes your husband now!" Creed had just sauntered out from the Mission, and he advanced with a cryptic smile on his lips and an extended hand.

"Well, how nice, Jane," he said in his smooth way. "This is a pleasant surprise."

Jane ignored the hand. "You knew I was here, Gordon," she said frigidly.

"But I didn't know what a thrill it would be to see you again," he declared, tilting his head at her. "Shouldn't I kiss you?"

"No, I don't think that's necessary."

"H'mm!" Creed turned to Jim. "Why didn't you tell me you knew my wife, Hallet?" he asked.

"I didn't think that was necessary, either," Jim replied stiffly.

"When did you meet her? Before or after our separation?"

"After."

"Attractive, isn't she?" Creed looked at his beautiful young wife again, and he said sarcastically to her: "So you're a missionary, eh? A young goppler, harvesting souls in the vineyard. Well, is Jim your first convert?"

"Yeah, I'm converted," Jim answered for her, "but I'm still sinner enough to take a poke at guys that kid me about it!"

He walked away into the building, and Jane followed. Creed strolled towards the gate and reached it just as one of the Chinese servants of the Mission was closing it.

By this time the mule train was well on its way across the sand to the south of Sha Ho Shan, but towards the walled village from the north an open touring car was travelling at moderate speed, and behind the car galloped fully a hundred armed yellow men, the one in front bearing aloft a blue flag emblazoned with a white tiger. A few of the men were in uniforms, the rest were dressed in a variety of styles.

They formed the "army" of General Wu Yen Fang, and Fang was sitting in the back of the touring car with a youngish Chinaman beside him, and another Oriental was at the wheel.

Fang was distinctly ugly, even for a Chinaman. His face was lean and lined, his heavy-lidded brown eyes seemed to be set at different angles, and his moustache resembled a couple of miniature rats' tails. He was wearing a khaki uniform and a military coat with an astrakhan collar. The young officer on his right was typically Chinese, but almost handsome by comparison.

About a quarter of a mile from the gates of Sha Ho Shan, Fang turned to his companion, and in very halting English he said:

"Let Captain Nui ride village. Say General Wu Yen Fang has come. All who oppose will of Fang we fix—most dang quick."

"Yes, Excellency."

The officer, upon whom Fang had bestowed the rank of captain but whom he invariably addressed as "Mr." Cheng, turned and beckoned to a tubby little yellow man riding behind the bearer of the flag, and the man spurred forward to the side of the car. His face was fat, his lips were thick, and he had a scar on his left cheek which in no way improved his appearance.

Cheng gave him Fang's orders, and he in turn bellowed to the soldiers. The car came to a standstill, and the "army" swept past it.

"Most dang best army in China, Mr. Cheng," said Fang contentedly.

"Yes, Excellency," responded Cheng.

In under the archway of the tower that formed part of the wall galloped Captain Nui with the flag-bearer, and the frightened inhabitants of the village scurried in all directions at sight of him and the soldiers who galloped after him.

It was not long before the marketplace resounded with shouts and the lamentations of stall-holders whose wares were being trampled by the horses of the invaders, and Jim ran out from the Mission to look over the wall of the courtyard.

Jane and Dr. Abernathy joined him: Myron Galt appeared. Creed sped round the building from a garden at the back of the building, and Chinese servants huddled in a corner.

"What is it, Jim?" asked Jane anxiously.

"It's Fang's advance guard," Jim replied, dropping from a tree he had climbed.

"I'm afraid this is it, gentlemen," said Abernathy. "You'd better go in, Mrs. Creed, and reassure our patients."

Jane went back into the Mission, and he instructed a trembling native to open the gate.

"What're you going to do about it?" demanded Creed, as the gate was unbarred and opened.

"Let them in," was the quiet reply. "There's nothing else we can do."

"We have a number of men here. Why don't we do something to defend the place?"

"You can't fight China, Mr. Creed." Abernathy shook his head. "Let's go into the house."

Gunfire sounded in the distance, and then in at the open gateway rode Captain Nui and the flag-bearer and nearly a score of Fang's soldiers.

"Halt the horses!" bellowed the tubby little captain in Kalmuk, and he waved a hand imperiously at the group of white people. "Everybody go in the house!"

"He wants us to go in the house," translated the doctor. "Please obey him."

They entered the hall, and Creed immediately made for a window that overlooked the courtyard; but Galt explained nervously:

"Better keep away from there!"

April 2nd, 1935.

Jane descended the stairs at the foot of which he was standing.

"I'm Mrs. Creed," she said. "Try not to act afraid. We mustn't lose face before them."

The repulsive little Nui stalked into the hall, and two of the soldiers stood between the open doors with rifles in their hands.

"Everybody stand in line!" shouted Nui.

"He wants you to line up here," Abernathy explained. "Please do as he tells you."

The five became lined up below the staircase, but he himself stood a little apart. Nui walked over to Galt, looked him up and down and uttered a harsh command.

"What does he want?" asked Galt, who did not understand Kalmuk.

"Your wrist-watch," replied the doctor. "Give it to him."

"It cost two hundred dollars," protested Galt; but Nui rapped out at him again, and Abernathy said urgently:

"Please give it to him."

The wrist-watch was unfastened and handed over. Nui turned to Lola, who was standing next to her father.

"Don't touch me!" she screamed.

"Don't do that, I beg of you," said Abernathy.

"I'm not afraid of him!" she shrilled.

"It's not a question of fear, child. I know these people. The man's simply curious about you. He won't hurt you."

Captain Nui's repulsive face was very near to Lola's and his breath was unpleasant. She closed her eyes, repressing a shiver, but opened them again as he made some laughing comment.

"What did he say about me?" she asked.

"He gave you a name," replied the doctor, "that's all. 'Small dragon.'"

"Well, tell him I've got a name for him, too!" she cried indignantly. "You—"

Captain Nui laughed and touched the make-up on her lips. He said something, and again Abernathy translated.

"He says that General Fang has graciously ordered that we're not to be harmed for the time being."

"Huh!" scoffed Jim. "Well, isn't that sweet of the general?"

Captain Nui scowled at him and caught hold of Jane's left hand.

"White as snow," he said in Kalmuk—and put a hand to the golden curls upon her head.

Jim, who was standing next to her, gave him a punch in the jaw that sent him floundering backwards.

"Please, Jim!" cried the doctor.

Nui recovered his balance, mouthed at his assailant, and barked a command.

"He wants you to go out with the soldiers," said the doctor.

The two soldiers stepped forward, and Jim went out between them into the courtyard and disappeared.

"What will they do to him?" asked Jane, in an agonised voice, as Captain Nui turned to follow.

But that was a question the doctor was not prepared to answer.

Fang Remembers a Friend

FOR a minute that seemed infinitely longer than a minute those that remained in the hall gazed fearfully at one another, and then there came a sound of hoof-beats in the courtyard and the voice of Nui rang out.

No shot followed, but into the hall walked the self-styled General Wu Yen Fang, and behind him walked Mr.

Cheng and Captain Nui. Two soldiers halted in the doorway.

"How do you do?" said Fang, addressing the startled group. "I am Fang. I speak mos' dang bad English, but I t'ink I make you understand."

"We understand, general," bowed Abernathy. "We're your prisoners."

"No," Fang spread his gloved hands. "I your guest. But please not to leave the town. It not nice make Fang mad. The missionary is who?"

"I am Dr. Abernathy," replied the doctor.

Fang nodded.

"I have heard of you," he said. "You bring to poor of China not only new God, but cure for pain. These people missionary, too?"

The doctor indicated Jane.

"Mrs. Creed is my assistant. The others are my guests—Americans."

"Ah!" Fang eyed the four in turn. "From wonderful glate country. Our Mr. Cheng is learn fix people in America." He waved a hand towards the tall young Chinaman. "Is body-guard—most excellent big shot. Is learn take people for ride."

Lola stared at the inscrutable young Chinaman.

"A Chinese gangster!" she remarked.

"One of the best," confirmed Cheng without even a ghost of a smile.

"Now Mr. Cheng fix people for me," said Fang, and he moved closer to Jane and Lola. "Oh, only two woman, eh? This one—not so good."

"What's the matter with me?" bridled Lola.

"Hair like straw—eye like flog—have wide mouth of fish."

"Well, you're no geranium yourself!"

Cheng drew a six-shooter from the holster attached to his belt and Abernathy became alarmed.

"Please, Miss Galt, be careful!" he cried.

But Fang motioned to his bodyguard to put away the weapon.

"Not yet, Mr. Cheng," he said. "By'n by we fix, maybe. Not yet—I'm hung'y."

"You shall be served, Excellency," said the doctor.

"No can eat your food. Have cooks my own." Fang walked over to the open door of the living-room. "My boys fix this room for me," he decided. "Now please to leave."

In the living-room he eyed with disfavour a framed text on a wall above a lacquered table: "Peace on Earth, Goodwill Toward Men." He unfastened his sword and flung it on the table, and he called for Cheng.

Half a hour later he sat down to a meal of Chinese dishes, prepared in the kitchen of the Mission by some of his men with food filched from the market-place, and consumed wine taken from a café in the village. By this time he had changed out of his uniform into a black silk san—or jacket—and patterned koo that looked more like a skirt than trousers. A tight-fitting cap was on his head and slippers were on his feet.

Cheng stood in the background while he fed; Captain Nui acted as messenger, and two of the soldiers waited upon him. After he had finished the meal he smoked a cigarette, and he had flung the end of the cigarette into a bowl when Jane entered the room. "Captain Nui said you wanted me," she faltered.

"Captain Nui right," nodded Fang, rising to his feet and studying her with his odd eyes. "Velly nice. I like. How old you are?"

"Twenty-three," she told him. "Oh, too bad. That mos' dang old! How much you—er—" He turned to his silent bodyguard. "How you say that, Mr. Cheng?"

"How much do you weigh?" suggested Cheng.

"Yes. How much you weigh?"

"I don't think that's any of your business, general." Jane found sufficient courage to rebuke.

"I no care," shrugged Fang. "What name you got?"

"Jane Creed."

"Shane—Shane— No can say it! I give you mo' better name, maybe, bye'n bye. You like me, ch?"

"How can I like anyone who has killed thousands of people?" she countered.

He smiled at that.

"Too many people in China," he said. "I kill only man—only bad man. When I killed bad man I feel good. I have did good deed."

"And who decides whether a man is good or bad?" she asked.

"I do!" He puffed out his chest. "I am Fang!"

He pointed to a chair with fretted sides and back.

"Please to sit," he said with a bow. "East meets West. How you do? Velly nice."

Jane sank down into the chair, and he sat facing her across the table at which he had fed.

"You go, now, Mr. Cheng, I t'ink," he said. "Not wish be disturb."

Cheng went out into the hall and closed the door, and as he did so Creed strode up to him.

"Will you tell General Fang me like speak to him at once?" he said. "You savvy?"

Cheng, with much dignity, retorted: "It isn't necessary to speak pidgin-

English. I speak the language quite as fluently as you do."

"You tell General Fang I'd like to see him at once!" snapped Creed.

"Impossible! The general is entertaining Mrs. Creed. I'd advise you to move on, please."

Creed made to pass him, but out came the six-gun, and he changed his mind.

Lola and her father had emerged from another room in time to hear the rebuff, and they walked out into the courtyard with Creed.

"Are you going to let your wife stay in there with that horrible brigand?" asked Lola.

"What can I do?" shrugged Creed. "I can't fight an entire army. It's too bad they got Hallet—he likes being a hero."

"What have they done with Jim?" "He's under guard in the mule-house," her father replied. "Here, what are you going to do?"

"Help him to get out of there," she said determinedly.

"Lola, you'll get us all into trouble!"

"Well, Jim's man enough to try to get us out of trouble," she returned with a toss of her head, and she went off round the building to a long row of stables at the back of it.

Soldiers on duty in the courtyard and at the gate paid no attention to the movements of the white people because they had received their instructions, and there were no soldiers in the garden. But Pao was at the door of one of the stables, and she saw him unlock and open it.

Jim immediately came out from the gloom of his prison, and he had a six-gun in his hand.

Lola ran to him.

"Jim!" she cried.

"Hallo!" said Jim. "Where's Jane?"

"Fang has her in the living-room."

"Come on, Pao!" Jim raced towards the house with his servant.

He reached a side door, but a soldier there recognised him and shouted, and though he knocked the soldier aside and dived into a corridor that led to the hall, other soldiers heard, and the hall was full of them when he looked out from the corridor into it.

"Run, Pao!" he said breathlessly. "It's no use! Don't get caught!"

Pao streaked behind a curtain a fraction of a second before Fang's men closed in upon his master and wrested the gun away from him. A few moments later Cheng knocked on the door of the living-room, and Fang came out, followed by Jane.

"Forgive me, Excellency," said Cheng, holding on to Jim's right arm. "This prisoner escaped. They captured him as he was trying to reach this room."

Fang looked into Jim's set face, his own expressing no emotion.

"So you like kill me, my friend?" he inquired.

"Gladly," replied Jim, "if necessary."

"To save lady?"

"You guessed it."

"Shall I fix him, Excellency?" asked Cheng.

"Not yet, Mr. Cheng. Bye'n bye we fix, maybe. Too bad we got kill him."

"Oh, no, general!" implored Jane, and Fang turned to her.

"You not want see him die?" he questioned.

"No!" she shuddered.

"Velly nice." Fang looked again into Jim's face. "Me not want see him die, too. You not member so good, my friend!"

"I don't know what you mean, general," said Jim, astonished by the complete change in the brigand's manner.

Cheng caught hold of the girl's wrist in a grip that hurt; but Fang looked at her in a more kindly way than he had ever done before.

"Look!" Fang pointed to his own unattractive face. "One time poor coolie chased by General Mu's soldier. You hid him till soldier all gone."

"Yes," Jim nodded. "Well?"

"Where was bullet in that coolie? Tell me that."
"He had three slugs in his left shoulder."

"Ah, you remember," Fang seemed quite pleased. "Then what you do?"
"I dug 'em out and patched him up as well as I could, but he sneaked away one night when I was asleep. He was an ungrateful son-of-a-gun!"

"Son-a-na-gun?" Fang repeated the scornful term with relish if not with accuracy. "That was name you give him, son-a-na-gun?"

"What's the idea?" asked Jim.

"Is he a relation of yours?"
"No." Fang shook his head. "No relation. He is me! I am him! Now you know me?"

"Well, I'll take your word for it."

(Cheng let go of Jim's arm.)

"So we don't fix him, Excellency?" he said in a disappointed voice.

"Fix him?" roared Fang. "Fix my friend who save my life when it is almost finish? You think the great Fang have no grateful in his heart? For that should fix you, Mr. Cheng!"

Jane's face became radiant, and Fang noticed the circumstance.

"This your woman?" he inquired.

"Well, no," replied Jim uncomfortably. "but I—I'm interested in her."

"'Tis all right," said Fang with a magnificent gesture, "I give her to you." He clapped his hands and shouted: "Hua Mei! Hua Mei! Liqueur!"

A Chinese girl appeared from the kitchen, bowed, and retreated.

"My friend!" said Fang affectionately.

"Tell me," said Jim, "how did a coolie so soon become the great General Fang?"

"Is easy," Fang waved the soldiers away and motioned to Cheng to stand back. "I leave you. Join other army. Most dang soon I'm great Fang!"

"But how did you manage it so quickly?" asked Jane.

Fang spread his hands, palms upwards.

"One day the captain is killed," he said. "I become captain. Next day the major. I am major. Bye'n bye the colonel. I become colonel. I kill the colonel myself."

"And now you're a war lord!" said Jane.

"Ah, it is beeg life! I come with me, my friend Jim—I make you general quick, eh?"

"No, thanks." Jim shook his head most emphatically. "Not for me."

"I so 'fraid for that," sighed Fang; and then the girl Hua Mei returned with two glasses of wine on a tray. "Come, we drink!"

He handed one of the glasses to Jim and took the other.

"Gambel!" he toasted. "To me!"

"To you?" laughed Jim.

"Of course. I am Fang!"

The glasses were drained and restored to the tray; Hua Mei flitted away.

"Now tell what you do here," said Fang.

"Well," said Jim, "I've been operating the Discovery Oilfield, but I had to quit."

"All money gone?"

"That's it! Mr. Galt—the elderly man from Peiping—holds my note for fifty thousand dollars."

"He came collect?"

"Yeah, but I couldn't pay him."

"Too bad! Other man is what?"

April 2nd, 1935.

"Gordon Creed."

"'Ceed?" Fang looked at Jane.

"He your husband?"
"Yes," she admitted, "but we—we're separated."

"He is bad man?"

Jane made no response to that question, and Jim said slowly:

"She'll never tell you, general."

Fang looked from one to the other.

"My friend here is good man," he said. "Why not take him?"

"I'm not divorced yet," Jane replied.

"And she doesn't believe in divorce," added Jim, none too happily.

Fang, with his Oriental ideas, was very plainly puzzled.

"She has husband who is bad man," he said. "She want my friend who is good man, but no take him. Ve'y strange." He patted Jim on the shoulder.

"My friend, you got plenty trouble."

"Plenty!" confirmed Jim.

"All right, in morning we fix."

The Way of a Brigand

GENERAL FANG retired to the living-room he had taken for his own use, and nobody in the Mission saw any more of him that night except Cheng. A staircase ascended from the living-room to a balcony, and a bed-room opened out of the balcony. He slept in the bed-room; but Cheng reclined upon a couch near the foot of the stairs.

Sentries mounted guard in the courtyard and in the streets of the village. Captain Nui took possession of the hall after the other people in the Mission had ascended to their rooms.

Jane, still dressed, knocked on a door at the end of a long corridor, and the voice of Lola called out in alarm:

"Who's there?"

"Jane Creed," Jane called back.

"May I come in for a minute?"

"Why yes, of course," Lola replied with a sigh of relief, and she opened the door.

"I—I just want to thank you for what you did to-night," Jane said gratefully to her. "Jim told me you tried to set him free."

"All I did was to warn him," Lola, who was in pyjamas, slipped back into bed, because the night air was cold. Jane closed the door and sat beside her.

"Why did you come to Sha Ho Shan?" she ventured to ask after a while.

"Well—er—my father had business here."

"Is that the only reason?"

Lola sighed.

"Perhaps I had other ideas," she said.

"About Jim?"

The girl nodded, and she said:

"I didn't know until this evening that he was in love with you."

"Well, I'm afraid that can't make any difference," said Jane sadly.

"There never can be anything between Jim and me."

"That still doesn't help me," lamented Lola. "But thanks just the same."

Next morning, after breakfast, Dr. Abernathy, Jim, Jane, Myron Galt and his daughter and Creed all became assembled in the spacious living-room. Cheng mounted the stairs to the balcony and Galt said nervously to the doctor:

"What do you suppose they want with us now?"

"I don't know," was the reply.

"They say the general ordered us to be brought here."

"Perhaps," suggested Creed with grim humour, "they're preparing for an execution." He turned maliciously to Jim. "It wouldn't be yours, by any chance?"

"Sorry to disappoint you, Creed," returned Jim curtly.

Cheng reached the door of Fang's bed-room and tapped on it, and immediately the door was opened and Fang stepped forth in the uniform of an officer, with three metal stars upon each of his shoulder straps and a whole row of medals on his chest.

"His Excellency General Fang!" proclaimed Cheng, and Fang stepped to the rail of the balcony and looked down.

"How you do?" he said. "Very nice day."

He descended the stairs, Cheng close behind him, and he advanced towards the group of six.

"How are you this morning, general?" inquired Jim.

"How you do?" Fang gave him a smile and looked at Jane. "You ve'y beautiful even in daytime," he said appreciatively. "But I give you to him."

"Just a minute, general!" exclaimed Creed. "Let me set you straight. You can't give her to anybody. She happens to be my wife."

"Is too bad," said Fang. "But not to get excite about."

"Well, I promise you I will get excited about it!" Creed retorted heatedly.

"Mr. Cheng!"

"Excellency?" Cheng moved forward, his right hand on the butt of his gun.

"You shall shoot first one to intellupt me."

"Very good, Excellency."

"Please to sit," Fang motioned to chairs, and they all became seated about the room. "I begin with you, Dr. Missioner. You are good for poor China. I not intellupt your work."

"Thank you very much, general." Abernathy rose and went out from the room, and Fang stood before Lola;

"I don't want you," he said with a flip of his hand. "Not like woman who is tough guy."

Lola went out, and he faced her father.

"Who are you?"

"Myron Galt of Peiping," Galt replied.

"Are you rich man?"

"I wouldn't say that exactly."

The brown eyes that did not match became fierce.

"I have way make people say truth!" threatened their owner.

"Well," stammered Galt, "what I mean to say is—er—that I—I have enough money to live comfortably, and—"

"Vo'y nice, ve'y nice. How you make money?"

"I'm a financier."

"That is what, Mr. Cheng?"

"A financier," replied Cheng instantly, "is one who loans money, Excellency, and charges very high interest. In the great, excellent country of America he would be called a 'loan shark.'"

"Oh!" nodded Fang. "Mo know shark. Huh! Make good soup. You loan money my friend Jim oilfield?"

"Yes," Galt admitted.

"No can pay."

"Well, that's too bad. In that case I'll have to take possession of the field and operate it myself."

"Why you no lend him more money so ho operate field? You get money back."

"The field is mine now, and I intend to hold on to it."

Fang tilted his head.

"I think maybe not," he said

ominously. "Fang number one man this province."

"Oh, I'll do the right thing by Hallet," said Galt hastily. "When I take possession I'll give him a nice fat bonus."

"What is that—fat bonus—Mr. Cheng?" inquired Fang without looking round at his bodyguard.

"An extra dividend, Excellency," was the reply. "A profit beyond that which is agreed upon."

"How fat that bonus?" demanded Fang.

"Oh, say five hundred dollars." Galt glanced across at Jim, tight-lipped and silent. "That's fair, isn't it?"

"You like money too much, Mr. Galt," rapped Fang. "Velly solly for you." He strode over to Creed. "You come here buy interest oilfield?"

"That's right," confirmed Creed.

"How much you pay?"

"I offer him fifty thousand dollars for a quarter interest."

"You got that money here?"

Creed did not hesitate.

"Why, of course not," he declared. "I never carry that amount with me."

"Please not lie," rebuked Fang. "People do business China oilfield always cash. Mr. Loan Fish!"

Galt rose.

"You mean me, general?" he asked with a feeble grin.

"You got my frien' note, fifty thousand dollar?"

"Right here!" Galt patted the breast-pocket of his coat.

Fang turned to Creed, and Creed walked over. "You got fifty thousand dollar, Mr. Cleed. I want it!"

"I won't submit to being robbed!" Creed exploded. "My Government—"

"I not rob," Fang interrupted masterfully. "You give, I take. Give!"

"Absolutely not!"

"Mr. Cheng."

Out came Cheng's gun, and Creed changed his mind. He took out a wallet, and from the wallet produced a thick wad of notes.

"I no touch," said Fang, as the notes were offered. "To him!"

Galt took the notes readily enough. "Why, thank you, general," he murmured. "I didn't expect this."

"Mr. Loan Fish," said Fang curtly, "you got fifty thousand dollar. Give me my frien' note."

"Oh, but I can't do that!" cried Galt, with a complete change of tone and expression. "You just stole this money from Mr. Creed!"

"Mr. Cheng!"

The invaluable Cheng jabbed the barrel of his gun between the ribs of the indiscreet American, and a folded sheet of paper was very promptly forthcoming. Fang opened it, showed it to Jim, saw by his face that it was indeed his promissory note, and offered it to him.

"Now, my friend," he said, "you are indeed all fix."

But Jim protested that he could not take the note—that it wouldn't be legal to do so.

"Mclican people ve'y strange," remarked Fang, and with that he tore the note to shreds. "Now is legal!"

He tossed the fragments of paper into the air and held out a hand to Galt.

"Give me money, please!" he commanded.

"The fifty thousand?" gulped Galt.

"You want it back?"

"You been paid," nodded Fang.

"Yes, but— Oh, this is an outrage! I won't stand for it!"

"Mr. Cheng!"

Galt fished out the wad of notes he had pocketed, and Fang handed them to Cheng.

"To Dr. Missioner," he said, "for poor people China."

Cheng went out from the room with the notes, but almost immediately returned with them still in his hand and Abernathy beside him.

"I can't accept this money," protested the doctor.

"Not even for poor China?"

"No, general."

"No? Then I take!" Fang received the notes and stowed them in a pocket of his tunic. "I am most dang poor people China. Now, please to leave everyone 'cept Mr. Loan Fish, Mr. Cleed."

Cheng closed the door on those who went out into the hall and stood stolidly with his back to it. Fang motioned to Creed and Galt, and became seated with them at a round table with an inlaid top.

"Fang is number one man here," he said significantly. "General Mu yesterday—to-day is mc. That is China. Discovery oilfield is rich."

"I think I understand, general," said Creed. "You will grant a concession to operate the oilfield to the man who offers the most money—is that right?"

"I am poor man."

"Well," said Galt, "I'll give you ten thousand."

"I am ve'y poor man!"

"I'll give you fifty thousand," offered Creed.

"Fifty-one," said Galt, and was rewarded with a scowl that caused him hurriedly to increase his bid to a hundred thousand.

"One hundred and fifty!" snapped Creed.

"A hundred and seventy-five!" retorted Galt.

"One ninety!"

"Two hundred thousand!" Galt glared at his competitor.

"Is enough," said Fang, banging his fist upon the table.

"Enough?" Galt stared at him in jubilant astonishment.

"Too much!" Fang sat back in his chair with a disconcerting grin. "I no take cheque, and I no dang fool! You t'ink I let you go get two hundred t'ousan' dollar? Two hundred t'ousan' soldiers, maybe!"

"Well, what was the idea of the auction in the first place?" asked Galt blankly.

"I wish see how much you worth hold for ransom."

"Ransom?" gasped Galt.

"Ransom?" echoed Creed in consternation. "How much ransom?"

"Just what you have bid. Two hundred t'ousan' dollar you, Mr. Loan Fish. One hundred ninety t'ousan' you, Mr. Cleed."

Fang went to Captain Nul—and at the same moment Cheng drew his gun from its holster. "He is ready," Fang said.

"But, general," began Creed, "we—"
 "Show out, Mr. Cheng," interrupted Fang.
 "Yes, Excellency." Cheng advanced with his gun, and the two unhappy men rose meekly and departed.
 "I am good business man, Mr. Cheng?" inquired Fang, after they had gone and the door was shut.
 "You are the grandfather of wisdom, Excellency," bowed his bodyguard.

Revolt!

FROM the living-room Creed and Myron Galt crossed the hall into the courtyard, rivalry forgotten in their joint misfortune.

"This is a fine mess!" growled Galt.
 "Wait a minute!" Creed caught sight of Captain Nui standing at the entrance to a brick-walled passage between the main building of the Mission and an annex in which ailing natives were treated. "I think I see a way out of this!"

He turned towards the ugly little officer.

"Captain!" he called.

"He doesn't understand a word of English," said Galt, keeping pace with him.

"He'll understand this language," returned Creed, and he fished a handful of Chinese money from the pocket of his riding-breeches and shouted in Mandarin: "Come here!"

Nui heard, understood, and hurried forward. Jim, who had just emerged from the annex with Jane and the doctor, was in the little officer's way, and he bellowed something in Kalmuk, pushed him aside, and followed Creed and Galt round the building into the garden behind it.

"What did he say?" asked Jane.

"He threatened Jim," Abernathy replied. "It is very fortunate for you, Jim, that Fang has befriended you. I don't like the fellow at all—a treacherous dog, I should say."

The three walked on along the courtyard to the gate, and they found Lola there watching a procession of white-robed natives who were following a shrouded bier across the market-place.

"What's that?" she asked curiously.

"That's a funeral," Jim replied.

"The funeral of a merchant who refused to pay tribute to Fang," added the doctor gravely. "I'm afraid there'll be others before he leaves here."

"Jim," said Jane with a sigh, "at least you can trust Fang."

"Not for a minute!" he replied to her dismay, and she appealed to Abernathy.

"Don't you think we can depend on Fang's gratitude to Jim?" she asked.

"No telling what he'll do," said the doctor.

"That fat-faced little captain is the man to worry about!" asserted Lola.

"Possibly," the doctor admitted. "He has power among the men all right. I'd feel better if I knew that General Mu was on the march in this direction."

"If only we could get word to him!" said Jane.

Jim went over to Pao, who was standing on the other side of the gateway.

"Where did you hide the horses, Pao?" he asked.

"Last night with Ku Ting," replied the yellow man. "In his place behind the wall outside the town."

"I want you to ride to General Mu and tell him Fang is here."

"But since Fang arrived," protested the servant, "the town gates are closed and guarded, master."

Jim looked out at the long possession of white-robed figures. Many had passed, but there were more to come.

"The cemetery is outside the wall, isn't it?" he said.

"Yes, master," nodded Pao.

"Then there's your chance! Get something white over you and join the mourners. Hop to it, Pao!"

The yellow man flitted away into the Mission and presently returned with a white robe similar to the robes worn by the mourners of the dead merchant. There were no soldiers in the courtyard, and behind the gate he enveloped himself in the hooded garment.

As the tail-end of the procession passed he joined it, and no one paid any attention to him except those who watched from the courtyard.

The market-place was left behind, the long narrow street that led to the archway in the tower seemed endless at so slow a pace; but at last the open gates and the soldiers of Fang who were on duty at them were passed, and then Pao gathered up the robe and ran to a shed-like structure under the wall of the village, and a few minutes later came galloping out from it on a horse.

Across the desert he rode, in the general direction of Ting Fou, but his task proved to be an easier one than he had expected, for General Mu had left his headquarters the day before with a considerable number of troops, bent on capturing Fang, and he was encamped upon the desert no more than twenty miles from Sha Ho Shan.

Pao was halted by a sentry on the outskirts of the camp, and declared frantically that he had information for General Mu concerning Fang the bandit. He was taken to the general, who was in his tent.

"You have information regarding Wu Yen Fang?" questioned Mu.

Pao did not understand Mandarin, and he said in English:

"Fang has captured village of Sha Ho Shan. Some foreigners are in danger there."

General Mu summoned an officer.

"We ride to Sha Ho Shan at once!" he barked. "Take your orders!"

Not very long after Pao had escaped from the village, Myron Galt found his daughter in her bed-room at the Mission, and he said to her:

"Lola, I don't want you to leave this room under any condition. Creed has bribed Captain Nui to start a revolt against Fang!"

"Then Creed's a fool!" she cried.

"No," said her father. "Fang was going to hold us for ransom. Creed knows what he's doing."

"But you don't!" she storned. "If Nui gets the upper hand he's sure to kill Jim!"

A Chinaman in the uniform of a lieutenant opened the door and strode unceremoniously into the room, guided to it by a yellow-skinned servant of the Mission named Chan.

He rapped an order in Kalmuk, and Galt looked past him to the servant.

"What did he say?" he asked.

"General Fang wants you, master," Chan translated.

Galt walked towards the door, and Lola would have accompanied him, but the officer barred her way and blared at her in his own tongue.

"No, no, missy," said Chan urgently. "No want you. Mo' better you stay."

So Galt went off with the officer to the stairs, and Lola remained in her room.

An hour passed, and then suddenly a look-out in the tower above the wall of the village shouted down to Fang's men at the gates:

"Open! Open! Someone is coming!"

It was one of Fang's numerous spies who galloped up to the archway on a horse covered with sweat and dust, and as the gates were opened for him he cried out that General Mu and his men were advancing upon the village.

He rode on to the Mission with two of the soldiers, and he was conducted into Fang's presence.

Fang was in the living-room, and all his "guests" were there except the despised Lola. Cheng would have dismissed them, but Fang told them to stay.

"So General Mu comes to capture me, eh?" he said to the spy in Kalmuk.

"Yes," was the reply. "That fellow that rode away—we couldn't shoot him, and we couldn't catch him, so I followed. He came from here. When I saw him on the horse I knew him. He is servant of that man."

Fang beat down the hand that pointed to Jim.

"Enough!" he snapped. But after the spy had gone out from the room he looked strangely at Jim, and he asked sharply:

"Where your Tartar servant? Where he go?"

"He was watching a funeral," said Jim evasively. "That was the last I saw of him."

"You not know he have horse behind wall?"

"Which wall?"

"Why don't you stop playing dumb?" roared Creed. "You'll only antagonise the general."

"Please!" Fang waved Creed away.

"You send him for help?"

"Yes," confessed Jim.

"You not trust me?"

"As far as I'm concerned, yes. But I'm not so sure about the others—Creed and Galt."

"Mr. Creed no good frien' for you," said Fang.

The repulsive Captain Nui had entered the hall with half-a-dozen of the soldiers under his command, and at that moment he burst into the room with them.

"What do you want?" demanded Fang; and Cheng whipped out his six-shooter.

"Your gun is no use to you!" cried the tubby little officer with scorn. "You see the soldiers?"

He strode over to the table at which Fang was standing, and he flung out a hand.

"I've come for this man," he said, indicating Jim. "Are you going to turn him over to me for execution? If not, the soldiers will revolt against you!"

He spoke in his own dialect, but his meaning was all too clear, and Jane clung to Jim in terror.

Fang put his hands behind his back and regarded his insubordinate officer thoughtfully.

"Most disfortunate situation," he said slowly. "Make plenty trouble me, my friend, for blow you striko Captain Nui. No lose face, but Nui insist you die."

"But, general, you're not going to permit that?" shrilled Jane.

"Speak mos' dang bad English," said Fang. "Think maybo Mr. Cheng explain what happen?"

Cheng, without moving, responded:

"Captain Nui has incited the men to revolt. Unless permitted to settle his blood feud with Mr. Hallett there will be much trouble."

"But, general," protested Dr. Abernathy, "you can't let them execute your friend!"

"You said yourself he saved your life!" cried Jane. "Why don't you do something?"

Gene Autry is the foreman of a ranch owned by young Sandra Knight. The girl blunders badly by buying a flock of sheep, and rouses the ire of the local cattlemen, and a crook frames Gene in order to obtain possession of the Knight ranch, but the singing cowboy escapes from prison and put things right with smashing fists and blazing six-guns

Sheep—the Cattlemen's Menace
DAN MORGAN was as wiry as he was tough. His clothes, his waistcoat and his striped trousers were old and dirty, his chin was bristly and his hair uncut. His weather-tanned features seemed to be twisted constantly into a scowl. A hard, fierce man with a queer sense of justice. But he was a worker, and by hard labour had established a paying ranch. He was talking to his foreman, Tracy, when the clatter of hoofs made them look round. A tall youth with a foolish, ugly face was riding towards them on an ancient stallion.
 "Hey, Mr. Morgan, sheep!"
 At once the ranch-owner stiffened.
 "Where?" he demanded.
 "Thorpe's ranch."
 "Tell the other ranchers."
 "Yes, sir," cried Bub Bailey, a grin of gloating anticipation on his face. His half-witted nature thrived on stirring up strife.
 Bub came eventually to a ranch situated in a valley. The house inside was surrounded by trees, and there was a shaded drive. A board at the gate announced that it was the "KNIGHT RANCH."
 The time was late afternoon, and most of the heavy work of the day was at an end. Gene Autry, the singing cowboy and champion of so many rodeos, was sitting on a bench under a huge tree, whilst a number of cowboys were sprawled on the grass. Most evenings the happy ranch hands would gather on the grass in front of the large bungalow to have a sing-song. A big, fat-faced, comical fellow was strumming on a guitar and grinning his appreciation. Frog Millhouse thought Gene was a dandy singer.

 "Give me a pony and the open prairie And let me ride till my days are done.
 Give me a saddle and a herd of cattle; Let me go roping 'near a blazing sun—"
 "Sheep!" yelled Bub, and when the cowboys paid him no attention jumped from his horse and rushed forward, yelling "Sheep!"
 "Don't you know no better'n to interrupt a concert?" cried Frog.
 "Well, I was just tryin' to tell you that Jed Thorpe's bringin' in a earload of sheep."
 The smile vanished from Gene's handsome, sun-tanned face.
 "Are you sure, Bub?"
 "Sure I'm sure!" the boy answered.
 "Morgan and the other cattlemen are on their way over to his place now."
 "Get your horses, boys!" Gene rapped out. "That hot-headed, quick-tempered Morgan is likely to get mad and shoot somebody."
 The foreman of the Knight Ranch was quite correct in his surmises. When Morgan had collected a bunch of cattlemen, who were almost as fanatical as himself, he headed for Thorpe's ranch. Their furious banging on the door of the ranch-house was answered at last by Thorpe himself. Thorpe was a fugitive, pasty-looking fellow with a slight cast in one eye. Behind him was Briggs, who had a share in the ranch; he was large and had the same eunring expression in his small, beady eyes.

 "So you thought you'd turn sheep-herder, huh?" shouted Morgan.
 "Why, no, of course not!" Thorpe eyed Morgan apprehensively. "There ain't any sheep on this ranch. Why, you can see for yourself."
 "You tried bringing sheep here once before." Morgan slid from his horse and stepped forward, his jaw aggressive. "You're lying!" He leaned forward and whisked the paper protruding from Thorpe's shirt pocket. "So you did lie, and this bill of sale proves it—you're expecting a carload of sheep."
 "Too bad he won't be here to receive 'em!" Foreman Tracy called out. "Let's give the skunk a neck-tie party."
 They were dragging the yelling Thorpe towards a tree when Gene, Frog and half a dozen of the Knight cowboys rode up.
 "What's going on here?"
 "Thorpe's raising sheep!" Morgan shouted.
 "Where are they?" Gene glanced round.
 "You keep out of this, Autry!" shouted Morgan. "You've got nothing to lose, but we ranchers stand a chance to lose everything if sheep come in—you're only a foreman."
 "I'm just as much against sheep as you are, but I'm against murder," Gene answered, and turned to the prisoner. "You oughta know better than raise sheep in a cattle country."
 "I got a right to earn a living, ain't I?"
 "You've no right to ruin the range, April 2nd, 1935.

and we're not letting you. Better think of something, mister."

"The sheep are on their way here by rail." Thorpe became fearful of his fate. "But I'll ship 'em back."

"All right, fellas, I guess that settles it," said Antry, with a satisfied nod.

"Not as far as I'm concerned it doesn't!" raved Morgan. "You mind your own business, Antry, and stick to your singing."

"Not a bad idea. Maybe a little song would kind of cool you off. How about it, Morgan?"

"I'm no canary!" shouted Morgan, and vaulted into his saddle. "I ain't through with this, and later—"

There was the roar of a gun, and Morgan's sombrero was whisked off his head by a bullet from Gene's gun.

"Say, are you crazy?" yelled Morgan, staring fearfully at the gun which was pointed at his chest.

"Don't be selfish with that fine haritone," smiled Gene. "I'm doing the ordering around here now, and a song might help that nasty, ornery nature of yours. So sing, fella, sing!"

When Antry spoke so softly and with that slight mocking smile it was as well to go warily. Those cattlemen knew Gene and his reputation as a rider and a gunman.

"When it's Springtime in the Rockies I'll be coming back to you," quavered the unwilling Morgan. "Little sweetheart of the mountains with your bonny eyes of blue."

"Come on—everybody sing!" ordered Gene.

Thus a situation that might have ended in tragedy became one of comedy. Everyone sang lustily:

"Once again I'll say I love you,

While the birds sing all the day.

When it's Springtime in the Rockies,
In the Rockies far away—"

"Well, Gene, that trick sure turned the tide," chuckled Frog as the cowboys and cattlemen began to disperse.

"It's hard to sing and be mean at the same time," laughed Gene.

"That old Gene's got a lot of tricks up his sleeve, boys," Frog said to the cowboys still remaining. "Did I ever tell you the time he turned a royal flush into a ranch?"

"No, what ranch was that?" someone asked.

"The Poker Ranch—it lies right over yonder."

"A fine place for raising a bunch of rocks," a man sang out.

"Yeah, I've been thinking about selling if I can get my price," Gene grinned. "Do I hear any offers?" They shook their heads. "In that case I'll have to give it back to the State."

"Well, you might as well," muttered Frog. "The Injuns wouldn't have it."

Singing Gene Antry and the hands of the Knight Ranch rode home. In front of the house was a large truck, and several weighty parcels and packages were being unloaded by Logan, the carrier from the railroad.

"Where's this stuff from, Jim?" Gene asked.

"Chicago, I guess—that's what the labels say."

"Well, I'll be hung for a horse thief!" gasped Frog, who was a person full of curiosity. "Listen to what it says on this cartage slip. Soil-testing equipment, encyclopedia, chemicals and poisons. Say, who sent all this junk?"

"That's easy—our lady boss," answered Gene. "She's been to an agricultural college. Any message with them, Jim?"

"Oh, yeah, I nearly forgot. Here's an express letter from Chicago."

April 2nd, 1933.

"That's what I was afraid of." Gene handed the letter to his friend. "Go ahead and read it, Frog—I feel kinda scared."

Frog opened the letter and cleared his throat. The cowhands gathered round.

"Dear Mr. Antry, since inheriting the Knight Ranch from my late uncle I have been preparing to take over its operation by making an intensive study of the science of animal husbandry—"

Frog looked up. "It don't sound decent to me."

"She means she's taking up animal raising—go on."

"While I'm not criticising your management," Frog read out and scowled. "Well, she'd better not—why, you sent more money from this place than she ever got before." He turned again to the letter. "I feel that the application of modern scientific methods will make a marked difference to the profits. Am arriving on the afternoon train on Tuesday."

"Gosh, that's to-morrow," gasped Gene. "Anything else?"

"Just 'Sincerely yours, Sandra Knight—bah!'"

"What?"

"Bah—that's what it says after her name."

"That's Bachelor of Animal Husbandry, doll!" chuckled Gene.

Sandra and Her Friends

SANDRA brought three of her classmates—Miss Snow, Miss Hilton and Miss Parker. They were seldom known by these names, being referred to as Jane, Peggy and Silly. Naturally, they had all got diplomas from the Colby Agricultural Hall for Animal Husbandry. Now, Sandra was a dark-haired and very attractive young woman; moreover, she was keenly interested in making a career for herself. Her friends had taken up husbandry as a hobby, in fact obtaining good husbands for themselves was much more in their line. They accompanied Sandra not because they wished to work like Trojans on a ranch, but to have a good time. They were pleasant, attractive girls, and their only crime was that they were inclined to giggle.

"By the way, Sandra," remarked Peggy, when their train was nearing its destination, "what's this foreman of yours like?"

"Oh, I've never seen him, but I can imagine. A long, lanky weather-beaten old fellow with a droopy moustache."

"Did you wire him to meet you?" questioned Jane.

"No, but I wrote him that I was arriving to-day."

There was great excitement among the girls when the guard came along to say that a few minutes' time would see them at their destination. They imagined they would find cowboys all over the place, but so far they had only seen one from the train and he had not seemed quite the romantic figure that they had imagined.

A funny sort of shack was the station master's office. There were no sort of platform or waiting-rooms. There were one or two dusty-looking cowboys, but what interested the girls most was a pen full of sheep—the property of Thorpe.

The four girls collected their luggage and clambered down from the train, and as the pen was right opposite them they had to go and look at the creatures.

"Aren't they sweet?" simpered Silly.

"Girls, here's our chance to put our knowledge to practical use," cried Sandra. "Now, what would you say was wrong with these sheep?"

"They seem rather skinny," said Silly.

"The owner will lose all his profit marketing them so early," Sandra remarked after the manner of an expert. "They should be allowed to graze for at least two months. Why, even their fleece hasn't reached its full length."

Thorpe and Briggs had come to the rail-head to say good-bye to the sheep, which had been such a loss to them. Still, it was no good trying to keep sheep when there were hot heads like Morgan about the district. Briggs had suggested going to law, but Thorpe reckoned the only thing to do was to get rid of the sheep. They were standing near the pen when Sandra and her friends approached. They doffed their slouch hats.

"Are either of you Mr. Antry?" Sandra inquired.

"Why, no," Briggs shook his head. "Were you expecting him?"

"Yes, I was."

"I reckon he'll be along soon," Briggs came closer and motioned towards the pen. "I couldn't help but overhear what you were saying. It's a mighty unusual thing for young ladies to know so much about live stock."

Sandra explained that they all obtained their degrees at college for animal husbandry, and that they were now out in the West to make use of their learning. Modestly Sandra stated that modern scientific methods should double the profit of the Knight Ranch. Briggs called forward Thorpe and the two men were most courteous. They were sure that the college education of the girls would put old timers like themselves very much in the shade.

"Well, I bet you could take these sheep right now and make a handsome profit out of them," Thorpe said with a smirk.

"Say, that's an idea," cried his friend Briggs. "Why don't you try it, Miss Knight? We couldn't do any good with them, and I know Thorpe here would be agreeable to selling at less than what he gave for them."

Frog Millhouse having stopped at least four times on the way to the railroad to talk to people that he knew did not arrive on time. He halted the ancient and battered Ford car at the precise moment that Thorpe and Briggs concluded the sale of the sheep and a truck for the transportation of the animals. After much inquiry, Frog found out which was Sandra Knight.

"I'm Frog Millhouse," he announced, a smile all over his fat face. "Gene couldn't come. He was tied down to the ranch so he sent me. Right here's our car!"

"Thank you." Sandra looked at the car disdainfully. "Well, girls, you'd better get in." She turned to Frog. "You'd better load the truck." She indicated the empty truck.

"With your luggage?"

"No—the sheep."

"Sheep!" gasped Frog. "But you can't—why, you don't—"

"I've just bought them," Sandra interrupted sharply. "I've made arrangements to use that truck. You can drive it and I'll take the car."

There was no help for it, but to get the sheep on the truck. Frog glanced apprehensively around, but now that the one train of the day had gone everybody had departed about their business or gone to sleep under the few trees. Frog kept his hat well pulled down over his face as he drove the truck away from the station. What in goodness' name was Gene going to say?

Gene had decided to ride round the Knight Ranch to see that everything was satisfactory for the coming of the new owner. Satisfied, he went across to another ranch to discuss a sale of cattle, and was cantering down a gentle incline towards the road when Sandra appeared in the Ford. The car did not slow for the main reason that Sandra found the foot brake did not seem to function. Gene's horse reared up in the air and the car seemed to flash under the animal's hoofs.

"Slow down!" raged Gene. "Where do you think you are—in the city?"

In the dust kicked up he did not recognize the old ranch car, but he recognized his friend Millhouse when he came down the slope in the truck. Gene flung up his hands as a signal and Frog brought the truck to a stop.

"What are you doing with those sheep?" demanded Austry. "Are you out of your mind?"

"Well, I ain't, but I'm getting that way fast." Frog stared malevolently at his charges. "You know that rat Briggs went and palmed these sheep off on your lady boss."

"Why didn't you stop her?"

Frog shook his head.

"Well, she don't stop easy," was his remark.

"Where is she?"

Frog pointed to the cloud of dust.

"There she goes, cowboy."

Gene gave his horse a dig and off he went like the wind. The girls were vastly thrilled by the sight of the galloping horsemen and urged Sandra to make it a race. At any rate, the girl had to stop the old Form, or else smash through a gate.

"Well, what is this—are we playing games?" she demanded when Gene reined in his horse.

"I'm sorry if I seemed rude back there by shouting at you." Gene doffed his sombrero. "But I thought for a moment the car was going to strike Champion. I'm Gene Austry—your foreman."

"How do you do?" Sandra was slightly mollified. "These are my class mates and they're spending the summer with me. Miss Snow, Miss Hilton and Miss Parker."

"How do you do?" Gene gave them a cursory glance and then looked anxiously at his new boss. "About those sheep you've just bought—you can't keep them."

"I'd like to know why not?" cried Sandra, her eyes flashing.

"Because this isn't sheep country."

"Well, I see plenty of grass—sheep eat grass, don't they?"

"Yes, and they eat the roots, too, and grass can't grow without roots." Gene snapped out, losing his patience. "That's why they don't allow folk to raise sheep around here."

"I'll raise whatever I like on my own ranch," Sandra answered just as abruptly. "And I don't want to discuss the matter any further." She pointed. "Will you open that gate, please, and tell me which of those tracks—trails I take."

Gene slid from the saddle and opened the gate.

"Take the trail to the left," he said.

The truck came lumbering up as the Ford moved away.

"Hey, that ain't the right way," Frog called out.

"Pipe down, idiot!" tersely cried Gene. "They mustn't hear you."

"But that ain't the way to the ranch."

"I know it. Follow the car, and when you get there play up to all I say," Gene ordered. "Now get going."

After a while the road down which Gene had guided the girls became little more than a track. They looked back and saw the truck following them, so they went on and the going became very rough. On every side was rocky, barren foot-hills, stunted trees and occasional patches of grass. At last they came to a sort of amphitheatre with a small shack. They pulled up the car, and a moment later Frog appeared with the truck. Along the trail at a leisuredly canter came Gene.

"Welcome home, Miss Knight."

"Home?" Sandra stared at the shack with its dusty windows and air of neglect. "But this is awful."

"Come to think about it, it does look a bit dingy," agreed Gene. "Maybe a coat of paint would help it."

"A fine manager you are." Sandra was very angry. "You might have spent some of that money you sent me for improvements."

Gene apologized and explained that they had been terribly busy with the cattle, and that they had had no time to use the shack the last few weeks. Sandra demanded to know what had become of the equipment she had had sent out. He said he had had it stored but would get it over as soon as possible. Would they step inside? The interior of the shack was festooned with cobwebs and dust was everywhere; the chairs and tables were broken down things, whilst the bunks and beds sent out clouds of dust when touched.

Gene and Frog fixed up the sheep in a corral and returned to see how Sandra was getting on in his shack—for this was the Poker Ranch. He found them busy with some old brushes and brooms tidying the place up.

"Let's me and you resign before them ranchers find them sheep," suggested Frog.

"Stop worrying. One night here will be plenty. They'll be grabbing the first train East in the morning," Gene grinned. "Listen, Frog, and I'll tell you what we're going to do."

The girls got the place reasonably clean, and they were so tired from their exertions that they decided to turn in. Silly took an upper bunk which promptly collapsed and deposited the girl on the floor. In the midst of the confusion Gene showed up.

"It isn't your fault she wasn't killed," Sandra accused. "The way you have let this place go to wrack and ruin is a disgrace—say, what are you doing here, anyway?"

"I thought you'd feel safer if you had this." Gene held out a rifle.

"But there's nothing to be afraid of—is there?"

"No, nothing, only the wolves and coyotes."

"Wolves?" the girls gasped.

"Yeah, but they're not likely to break in unless they're hungry." Gene placed the gun on a table. "Oh, another thing. If you should find a snake coiled beside you, don't disturb it and make it mad. They only come in to keep warm, and they won't bother you if you don't bother them. Guess I'd better be going. Good-night."

"Where do you and Frog sleep?" asked Sandra.

"We roll up in our blankets and sleep out in the brush—unless, of course, you'd feel safer if we slept on the porch."

"No, thank you, we'll get along all right," haughtily answered Sandra. "Good-night."

"Pleasant dreams!" mocked Gene.

When Gene thought the girls would be in bed and thinking of turning out the light he tossed a can full of pebbles on to the roof. It made an awful clatter. From some trees Frog made a superb imitation of the call of a coyote, ending with the dismal howl of a wolf. Then came yells for Gene, and the girls begged him to sleep the night on the porch.

The foreman felt suddenly sorry for the trick. Maybe it was the gratitude in Sandra's eyes when he assured her that the coyotes would stay away whilst he was there. In the morning Gene took Sandra for a ride round the barren ridges of Poker Ranch to seek out some pasture for the sheep.

"Sheep would starve on this range." The girl stared round at the uninviting scene. "But I don't understand it. The man who sold me the sheep said I had plenty of grazing land."

"Aw, he was just trying to make a sale."

"Yes, I suppose he was." Sandra gave a nod of her head. "I can't think how you've ever made any profit out of this ranch."

"Oh, we've got along somehow," Gene replied, and hoped she wouldn't ask any more questions. "Hey, not that way, Miss Sandra." He had awakened to the fact that the girl was cauterizing the horse he had procured for her down a slope towards the Knight Ranch.

"Oh, what a beautiful place." Sandra reined in her horse, as she saw the big ranch house between the great trees. "Who does it belong to?"

"An Easterner—doesn't even know what it looks like."

"If that place were mine I'd never want to leave it. Lets go over and take a look at it."

Gene decided that the situation was becoming awkward. Moreover, he did not like deceiving this charming girl.

"It's kinda hard to explain about the ranch, but—"

"I'm sure it is, Gene." Her smile was friendly now. "Now that I've seen what you had to contend with I think it's marvellous what you've done. No wonder you didn't often use that shack."

"Thanks—thanks," Gene grinned nervously. "Most of the profits have been made from cattle, and I think it would be wise to stick with them. Why not let me sell the sheep?"

The smile went slowly from the girl's face and a stubborn expression took its place.

"Perhaps the manager of this ranch would lease me some grazing land for the sheep."

"Not a chance, Miss Sandra, he's against sheep."

"Not if I ask him nicely." Sandra urged her horse into a trot. "I'm going to find him."

A number of Gene's cowboys were grouped round the bunk house, and they straightened up when they saw the girl and their foreman.

"Morning, Gene," shouted one of the older boys. "Any orders?"

"Nothing to-day, thanks," quickly answered Gene, trying to give them warning glances to be quiet. "Mighty fine neighbours these boys." He grinned at Sandra. "They take my orders into the store every day."

The cowboys stared at each other—what was Gene talking about and who was this girl?

"Pardon me, but could you tell me where we could find the manager?" Sandra requested of an elderly cowhand.

"The which?"

"The manager of this ranch."

"No, ma'am, I can't." The cowboy could see Gene shaking his head.

"Good-bye, boys," shouted Gene. "Guess we oughta be getting along," he hinted to Sandra. "They've got plenty to do."

Gene gave a sigh of relief when he April 2nd, 1938.

had got the girl away from the Knight Ranch, but they hadn't gone half a mile when down the road came a cloud of dust. Gene saw it was Frog, and guessed that for his pal to go so fast meant trouble. With a murmur of apology he galloped forward to hear the worst.

"What's wrong?"

"You know that kid, Bub?" Frog panted out. "Well, he came snooping around. Reckon he's used your old ranch for a playground—he went and spotted them sheep."

"Are the girls there?"

"Nope. They've gone off for a walk round the place."

"Okay, I'll fix this." Gene turned his horse and dashed back to the girl. "Something came up at the ranch unexpectedly, and I've got to get back. Your friends have gone for an exploration. I reckon if you took the trail we took you should meet them."

"All right, I'll go join them," answered the unsuspecting Sandra, but she did wonder what the nature of the business at the ranch could be that Gene should gallop off so madly.

Twenty-four Hours' Warning

AS he galloped with Frog along the dusty trail Gene learnt how the inquisitive Bub had come nosing around and spotted the sheep. Frog had done his best to persuade the lad to say nothing, but the mischief-maker was all out for trouble. Frog felt certain that it would be Morgan who would cause trouble.

Frog was right in his surmise. They reached the old ranch in time to see Bub leading half a dozen horsemen towards a small stretch of pasture where Frog had corralled the sheep. Most of the cattlemen had drawn their guns but spun round at the sound of horses' hoofs.

"Hey, Antry, you're just in time!" sneered Morgan. "Pretty smart on your part getting Thorpe to promise not to take those sheep so you could buy 'em cheap."

"I didn't buy 'em!" shouted Gene.

"No? Well, what are they doing on your ranch?"

"I'll get 'em off of here to-morrow," promised Gene, hating to have to eat humble pie to a man like Morgan.

"Well, we ain't taking any chances of a double-cross," was the sneering reply. "So we'll save you the trouble. Boys, start shooting."

As Morgan raised his revolver Gene Antry spurred his horse alongside and grabbed hold of Morgan's gun-arm. The two men rolled from the saddle to the ground. Frog whipped out his guns in defence of his friend, but it was not necessary.

"Let 'em fight it out alone!" a cattleman shouted.

Gene managed to twist Morgan's hand in such a way that the man had to let go of his gun. Morgan rolled free, and, getting to his feet first, crashed his fist into Gene's face as the latter struggled to his knees. That enraged Gene, who was one of the straightest of fighters, and when Morgan rushed again he swung his legs up and caught the attacker a nasty blow in the chest. Gene catapulted Morgan away, jumped to his own feet and waited for Morgan to rise. Morgan looked round for his gun, saw it and made for it, but Frog Millhouse got there first.

Morgan at once rushed at Frog and knocked him down, but before he could get his hands to the gun Gene was on the scene. Morgan stopped a punch on the point that made him see stars. Cursing, he abandoned his grip of Frog and rushed at Gene, who hit him just twice to lay him flat on his back.

"Now, get on your horse and get out of here!" Gene raged.

The battered Morgan scowled, but backed away before those clenched fists.

It was Harris, the elderly man who had suggested that Morgan and Gene fight it out, who laid down the law now.

"You'll have to get rid of those sheep, Gene," he stated. "And inside of twenty-four hours. I give you my word they won't be touched till then, but I should advise you, Gene, not to heed this warning."

"All right, I'll have 'em away. I give you my word," Gene promised.

"Your word don't mean anything!" sneered Morgan, now safely in the saddle.

"We're not here to settle personal grievances," Morgan," Harris said sternly. "Now, let's get going."

"Twenty-four hours—that doesn't give us much time," Gene said, as he walked into the ranch-house. "Why you holding your arm? Did you get hurt?"

"Oh, it ain't much."

There was a first-aid case in the house, and Frog had a nasty cut in his arm where he had fallen on some sharp stones. Gene bathed the place with iodine and made Frog yell.

"Don't that stuff hurt! And look at my arm now—why, I might have some disease like smallpox."

"Smallpox—you've got it!" Gene's eyes lit up. "I'm sure it'll work."

"Am I crazy, or are you?" demanded Frog.

"You've given me an idea of how to get rid of those sheep!" cried Gene. "We got to get busy before those girls get back."

Sandra had failed to find her friends, and had so lost sense of direction that she was glad to see the road again. There she encountered a buggy with Thorpe and Briggs in it. They wished her good-morning and asked what she was doing round here.

"Just looking over my ranch," Sandra gave a regretful smile. "It's hardly what I expected—it's so shabby and run down."

"That's strange," Thorpe frowned in bewilderment. "I understood Gene had been making a lot of improvements lately."

"Well, I don't see any, do you?" Sandra stared at the barren hillocks.

"Or that pasture land you spoke of either, Mr. Briggs."

"Why, but, Miss Knight, this isn't —" Thorpe broke off because his friend had kicked him.

"It certainly isn't the place it used to be." Briggs winked covertly at Thorpe.

"Of course, I haven't been here for some time, but I suppose the droughts and the dust storms have worked havoc. What you need is a smaller place that you could cultivate more intensely. Have you ever thought about selling?"

"No, I haven't, but I'm afraid I wouldn't get much for it."

"Well, I'd be willing to pay five thousand dollars cash for it right now."

"Five thousand dollars." Sandra was astounded. "Well, I'd like to think it over and let you know."

"Why, that ranch ain't worth fifty dollars," muttered Thorpe, when the girl was out of hearing. "Have you gone soft?"

"How much is the Knight Ranch worth?"

"A hundred thousand or more."

"Well, that's the only ranch she has a legal right to sell—now do you get it?"

Thorpe's loose mouth sagged open.

"You mean she thinks she's selling this, when she's really selling her own ranch?"

"Sure, she'll never recognise the legal description of the ranch on the deed," answered Briggs.

"Say, that's the slickest landgrab I ever heard of!" cried Thorpe. "But what about Gene and Frog—they won't let her do it?"

"I reckon Gene has been kidding her for reasons of his own, and we must step in first." Briggs fingered his chin. "We'll have to figure out some way to keep them from interfering."

Frog Opens His Mouth Too Wide

SANDRA rode back to the ranch, and on the porch she found her three girl friends very exhausted from a strenuous walk. Gene appeared to say that the sheep didn't look too grand and he'd like Miss Sandra to bring her animal husbandry knowledge to bear on them.

"Why, their mouths are all red!" cried Sandra.

"And so are their hoofs," pointed out Gene.

Jane had brought out a large "doctor" book, and she looked up the matter.

"Here we are!" she cried. "The membranes of the mouth become swollen and discoloured, livid blotches appear on lips and skin, and red lines on the hoofs." She opened her eyes wide with horror. "What do you think it is?"

"I can guess!" shrilled Silly. "Foot and mouth disease."

"And the whole flock is affected," added Peggy. "They'll have to be destroyed."

"We feared as much, Miss Sandra," Gene said gloomily. "If you'll go on up to the house we'll take care of it."

"That was like taking candy from a kid," chuckled Frog, as the girls disappeared inside the house.

"Yes, but it was all for their own good. I tell you what we'll do. We'll take 'em to the dance in town to-night."

"You can't do that," argued Frog.

"Somebody'll tell 'em they're on the wrong ranch."

"I intend to tell Sandra the truth before we get there," Gene spoke with confidence. "Now, you take the sheep into town, get rid of 'em, ship 'em anywhere you like, and I'll see you at the dance later."

It was getting dark when Frog drove the truck with the sheep towards town, and he was jogging along when who should he encounter but Thorpe and Briggs in their buggy.

"Where you going with them sheep?" Thorpe demanded.

"I'm going to town. I'm gonna sell 'em."

"Has Miss Knight changed her mind about raising sheep?" demanded Briggs.

"No, but Gene and I changed it for her," Frog guffawed. The joke was so good that there would be no harm in passing it on. "We went and put red goo all over them sheep's noses and all over their hoofs so that she'd think they had the hoof and mouth disease."

"Ha, ha, ha! Pretty clever!" Briggs held his sides; but the laughter was forced, for he was thinking hard. He regained his breath. "Frog, I'll take those sheep off your hands. I've got an out-of-town customer who can use 'em."

"That's fine!" Frog beamed. "But you mustn't let Miss Knight know, because she's got to think they're destroyed. And where do you want 'em delivered? I'd kinda like to go to that dance to-night."

"I'll take 'em right now!" Briggs cried with hearty cordiality. "And we'll lend you a horse, so that you won't miss the fun. One horse is all we really need for the buggy. When you bring back my horse we can go into the matter of sale."

"Well, gee, Mr. Briggs, you're a swell guy!" cried the astonished and delighted Frog.

Thorpe and Briggs winked slyly at each other. Not very far along the trail they came to some fine pasture land. Here the two men turned the sheep lose.

"Morgan will sure see red when he finds Autry's sheep on his range!" cried Thorpe, rubbing his thin hands together in glee.

Faked Gun-play

GENE picked out the most presentable of the boys from the Knight Ranch, and with the four girls went in a big wagon to the dance. Sandra sat on the box seat next to Gene, and her three girl friends whispered that they scented a romance.

"Sandra, there's something I want to tell you—about the ranch."

"Oh, this is a fine time to talk business," Sandra protested.

"Well, it's important." She screwed up her small nose and laughed provokingly.

"And I, sir, don't want to hear it."

The wagon pulled up before the town hall, outside which was a large cloth banner displaying the information that this was a "PIONEERS' DAY DANCE." There was dancing for a while, and then the master of ceremonies announced that Mr. Millhouse had just arrived and would oblige with a comic song.

Everybody was happy, and there was no hint of impending trouble. Gene was sorry that Sandra had given him no chance to explain, but he could explain everything on the way home.

But trouble was brewing because Briggs had made it his business to go to the Morgan Ranch. The sour, hot-headed Morgan had no time for dances, and was sitting round a fire with Tracy and drinking heavily.

"Just saw a flock of sheep on your land, Morgan," stated Briggs. "I didn't know that you turned out to be a sheep-herder."

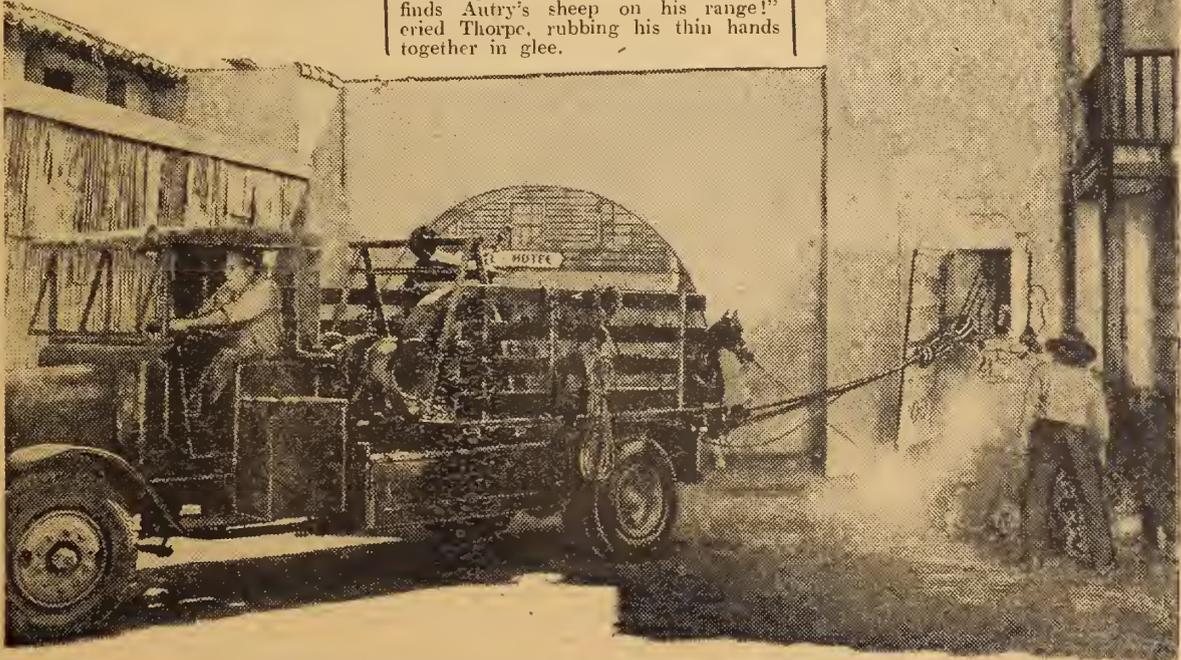

"On my land?" Morgan jumped to his feet.

"Yeah!"

"So that's the way Autry got rid of 'em." Morgan buckled on his gun-belt. "You don't suppose he's gonna be at the town dance to-night, do you?"

"It's very likely."

Briggs got into his buggy and drove furiously into town. Arriving at the Frog gave the signal and the truck slowly moved forward.

dance, he sought out Sandra, and was fortunate to find her for the moment unattached.

"May I have this dance, Miss Knight?"

"Certainly."

Briggs danced round the room several times, and then guided his partner out of the crowd.

"I don't want to butt in, Miss Knight, but I think those boys played an awful mean trick on you."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, about those sheep—I bought them ~~back~~."

"But they were diseased."

"No, they're perfectly healthy," Briggs said with an ominous shake of his head. "The boys just painted them up to make them look that way. I imagine it was their idea of a joke—they seemed to think it was very funny."

One can imagine how angry Sandra was at this news. She decided there and then that Gene Autry was nothing more than a smiling, double-crossing adventurer. The M.C. announced before Sandra could find Autry that the cowboy would sing:

"Stars may come

And stars may go,

Way up in the heavenly blue

But of all the stars that shine to-night
None shines as bright as you."

And though Gene sang the song with his eyes constantly glancing towards Sandra, he was a little puzzled by the fact that the girl did not smile. She looked exceedingly forbidding, and he wondered if anything could have gone wrong. The song over, he walked off the platform to deafening applause.

"Very funny, aren't you? Anything for a laugh!" Sandra confronted him with blazing eyes and crimson cheeks.

"What's the matter?"

"You must have had a good time laughing over the way you fooled me!"

"You mean—about the sheep?"

"So you admit it."

"Yes, but—"

"Never mind!" she interrupted fiercely. "And you needn't bother returning to the ranch to-night, Mr. Autry, for we can get along without you!" She turned to her smirking companion. "Mr. Briggs, will you take me home?"

"Gladly!"

"Wait a minute, Sandra—you don't understand!" cried Gene.

But with head held high the girl walked away, and Gene would have gone after her if Thorpe hadn't stepped forward to play his part.

"Gene, got your gun with you?"

"Of course not."

"You'd better take this one—Morgan's out looking for you."

"Yes, but—" Gene muttered in surprise.

"There's no time to argue, Gene. He's coming in for a showdown."

"All right," Gene said, taking the gun.

Thorpe smiled to himself. Besides the five live shells there was one fired shell. Soon he would have his revenge on Morgan, whom he loathed for stopping him bringing in sheep, and Autry, whom he envied for his popularity.

"Look out!" Thorpe clutched at Gene's arm. "Here he is!"

A silence fell on the crowd when they saw Morgan, his ugly features twisted into a sneer of hatred, standing in the door with a six-gun in his hand. No one was carrying a gun, and with the women everybody stood back to give the man passage—they knew Morgan was a killer. Morgan stalked up to April 2nd, 1933.

Gene and stared at him with gloating satisfaction.

"Autry, I'm gonna give you something that you've had coming to you for a long time."

The two guns came up simultaneously, but Autry did not fire but jumped to one side. It was his intention to try to get to hand grips with this madman and wrest the gun away. There was a roar of two explosions. Morgan dropped his gun and toppled forward to crash to the floor.

Naturally, the sheriff was at the dance, and with a deputy he took charge. He looked accusingly at Gene.

"I didn't fire my gun, sheriff."

The sheriff took the gun, broke it and took out the shell that had been fired.

"This doesn't back up your story, Gene," the sheriff stated. "It looks like a case of self-defence, but I'll have to put you under arrest."

Frog Millhouse, perplexed and worried—somehow he felt that he had something to do with this—came to Gene to see if he could do anything.

"Check the bullet that hit Morgan and let me know," Gene whispered.

Another disturbance was caused by the arrival of Tracy, who, when he heard Autry had shot Morgan, wanted to kill the young foreman. He had to be forcibly restrained.

Frog managed to have a look at the bullet-wound on Morgan before the unconscience rancher was carried away. He went outside to think what he should do, and overheard the sheriff speaking to his deputy.

"Go out and arrest Frog Millhouse—he may be mixed up in this."

Frog made himself scarce, but when the town was quiet he made his way by devious twists and turns to the gaol, where there was only one cell. He went close to the bars and whistled a tune that was a signal Gene would know. Then he caught hold of the bars and drew himself up. Gene, who had been lying on a rough bed, was on his feet.

"Gene, I can't go and see the sheriff about that bullet," he whispered. "Because he's after me, too—what'll I do now?"

"Get back to the ranch and look after the girls," ordered Gene. "Try and square things with Sandra."

"All right, leave it to me," replied Frog, and hastened away.

Briggs had taken full advantage of seeing Sandra back to the Poker Ranch. What was the use of a place like this to a girl like Sandra? All the boys mistrusted Autry, and she would be well advised to sell and get back to the city where she belonged.

"I'll take your offer," Sandra said as she bade him good-night. "I might as well sell—I'm going back East as fast as the train will take me."

"I'll have the deed drawn up and the cheque here first thing in the morning," Briggs assured her.

At the Thorpe Ranch he found his confederate waiting for him, and heard that Autry was safely behind bars and likely to stay there.

"We've got to work fast to get the deed signed and recorded before anybody gets wise."

Thorpe chuckled gleefully.

"With Gene in gaol and Frog hiding out, I don't know who's gonna stop us."

Gaol-break

PEGGY, Silly and Jane came back to the ranch to find Sandra packing.

"You're a fine one, running out on us," complained Jane. "What are you packing for?"

"We're leaving to-morrow, and you'd better start packing, too!" was the curt answer.

After a lot of argument the girls started to pack. Suddenly Peggy held up a hand for silence and asked if she had heard a noise outside.

"Gosh, it's spooky round here," shivered Jane.

"I'm not scared," cried Silly, and from a shelf took down the rifle that Gene had brought them that first night. Clutching the rifle, she stalked out on to the porch, and saw a figure squatting down in a corner. "Stand up, you!" she ordered. "Get your hands in the air."

Frog Millhouse stumbled into the shack.

"So it's you?" Sandra said, hands on hips. "What are you doing here?"

"Well, Gene sent me out here to protect you."

"How thoughtful," Sandra laughed scornfully. "Well, you can both look for new jobs. I'm selling the ranch to-morrow."

"Ranch—you're selling!" stammered Frog. "Not this ranch?"

"Naturally."

"But, Miss Sandra, you can't—"

"And why not?"

Frog was nonplussed.

"Well, Gene wouldn't like it," was all he could think of to say.

"Am I supposed to turn down five thousand dollars because Gene wouldn't like it?" Sandra demanded, and then pointed a hand at the door. "Get out of here!"

Frog tried to argue, but the four girls seized him and flung him outside and bolted the door. The girls eventually went to bed, but they did not sleep very well.

Gene was lying in his cell, trying to figure out what had happened, when he heard that familiar whistle. Dawn was breaking as he scrambled to his feet.

"Why aren't you with the girls?"

"Well, they went and run mo off,"

Frog called from the window. "Say, did you know Sandra's leaving to-day, and she's gonna sell your ranch?"

"If she does she's a smart girl," Gene said with a laugh.

"Well, I should say she is. She's getting five thousand dollars for it."

"Five thousand dollars?"

"Yes, sir."

"Hold on here." Now Gene was worried. He paced up and down his cell. He stopped suddenly. "Why, the only ranch she's got a right to sell is her own. Who made that offer?"

"Well, I ain't sure, but Briggs was out there last night."

"Of course he was—the snake in the grass!" cried Gene. "Hurry up and get me out of here."

Tracy was as much a firebrand as Morgan, whom he had regarded as almost akin to a hero. The shooting had aroused him to fanatical fury, and in the early hours of the morning he called together the cattlemen who had supported Morgan so enthusiastically in stopping the importation of sheep.

"Listen, men, Morgan is dying—murdered by Gene Autry," he raved at them. "Autry tried to bring sheep into this country, but Morgan wouldn't let him. Morgan was out to protect our interests, and Autry was out to get him. Are we going to stand by and see Autry get away with this?"

"No!" went up a chorus of protests, and at the head of a dozen or more crazy cattlemen Tracy raced towards the town gaol.

Gene did not know of this animosity. He had been one of the most popular foreman in the district for years, but where cattle and sheep are concerned opinions can change over night. He would have pooh-pooled the idea that men with whom he had fraternised would want to lynch him.

Meanwhile, Frog Millhouse was wondering how he could rescue Gene. All very well for a fellow to demand that he be got out of gaol, but when one hadn't the key and there were iron bars over the window, it was asking a lot, yet if Gene asked for the impossible it had to be achieved some way or other. With a pickaxe one could have broken a hole through the age-old walls of the ancient gaol, but that would take too long. Desperately he stared round.

Across the street an old store was being pulled down to allow for bigger premises. Parked outside was a lorry, and Frog's eyes lit up as he saw in bold lettering:

"BOONEVILLE WRECKING COMPANY."

On the lorry was a heavy crane.

A discordant yelling made Frog dart behind a tree. He saw Tracy and a number of men rushing down the street. It flashed to his brain that they were going to see the sheriff, and the fact that they carried a rope was ominous. Frog knew he had got to act quickly. He sped across the street.

"Say, mister, how'd you like to make five bucks?" he demanded of the truck driver.

"Doing what?" suspiciously demanded the man.

"I want you to pull down that wall yonder."

The man had no idea, being a stranger to the town, that the wall was part of the gaol.

"Does look a bit rickety. Is it dangerous?"

"Yeah, I want it pulled down to build a fresh one," lied Frog. "It's dangerous 'cause I've loosened some of the bricks. You see, my truck with its tackle ain't got here yet, and this is a rush job." He took out some money. "I'll make it six bucks."

"I can always use six bucks," said the fellow. "Hop in!"

The truck was driven the hundred yards or so down the street to the gaol, and the driver rubbed his chin.

"Guess we can pull it out with this." He pointed to the crane and the cable. He backed the truck and then got out again. Leisurely he took out a grappling iron and a hefty length of cable.

Frog could hear the shouting up the street, and was scared stiff that Tracy and the cattlemen would take the law into their own hands and charge down on the gaol. He had got the grappling iron fixed to the prison bars when he heard:

"We want Antry! We want Antry!"

Luckily the roaring of the engine killed the sound for the truck driver. Frog gave the signal for him to get going. The driver slowly moved forward and just before the cable tightened speeded up.

The grappling iron whisked out the iron bars as if they were mere sticks, and also took away a large part of the wall, leaving a gaping hole through which Gene scrambled.

Tracy, with a protesting sheriff, were on their way to the gaol when they heard the sound of falling bricks. They arrived in time to see the whole of the gaol-house collapse in clouds of dust. It was Tracy who saw Gene making for Frog's horse.

"It's Gene!" he shouted. "Plug the skunk!"

Gene leapt to the saddle, but he knew that he had a slim chance of getting away from the guns of the cattlemen. But there were two people on his side. The sheriff, who believed in Gene's innocence and was determined that there should be a fair trial, and his friend, Frog. Without thought of his own danger, Frog rushed forward waving his hat at the cattlemen as a signal that they must not fire.

Two bullets from Tracy whined close to Gene before Frog grabbed the gun from the cattlemen. The ruse enabled Gene to make good his escape.

"Gene's probably headed for his own ranch!" cried the sheriff. "We'll get him there. Lock Frog Millhouse up."

"Whereabout, sheriff?" a deputy questioned. "The gaol's kinda draughty."

"Then bring him along."

The truck driver just stood there gaping. He had just arrived from the east and had thought till then that the west was sleepy. In about two minutes he had seen enough to last him a lifetime. He took one look at the wreck of the prison and decided it would be best to get out of town as soon as possible.

Frog, locked to a deputy's wrist by handcuffs, went in the sheriff's car. Down the street behind the posse of cattlemen went the sheriff and a cloud of distant dust Frog knew would be his friend. The sheriff speeded past the horsemen.

Gene took a short cut over a hill, and the sheriff had to keep to the road, but the old car was fast, and they got round this hill before the cowboy. The sheriff pulled up his ear right in the path of the oncoming horseman and signalled for Gene to stop.

But Gene dare not be captured. He drove Champion straight at the car, and when the sheriff ducked down the horse rose gracefully into the air in a spectacular jump.

The deputy whipped out his gun, but Frog hit the man with his sombrero and kicked the sheriff. In the confusion he managed to take the key from the ignition and pretended to throw it out of the car.

"Get out and help find that key!" shouted the angry sheriff.

"I had to get out to stop you selling your very valuable ranch for about a hundredth part of what it's worth!" cried Gene and snatched the cheque from the startled girl.

As they were searching the posse of cattlemen came charging past.

"That mob's out to get Antry!" raved the exasperated sheriff. "Thanks to you they'll more than likely get him. I was trying to protect him."

"Oh, well, in that case," Frog straightened his back and opened his hand. "Here's the key. Come on, let's go!"

The Deed is Signed

At a table sat Sandra, whilst in the background were grouped her three friends—all looking very discontented at having to leave. Briggs and Thorpe were fawning round the girl, and watching her anxiously as she scanned the deed that the two rascals had drawn up so cunningly.

When Sandra started to turn over the page they looked at each other nervously.

"I can assure you, Miss Knight, that that deed is quite in order," murmured Briggs. "Everything is set down very clearly. A lot of the names are boundaries, which you would know nothing about as you are a comparative stranger to this district."

"I back that up, Miss Knight," added Thorpe. "These bills of sale have to be long-winded to be legal." He laughed at his attempt at joking.

"Are you sure this describes the property correctly?" Sandra said uncertainly. "I don't like signing anything I haven't read properly."

"I can assure you there's nothing to worry 'your pretty head about." Briggs' hand shook slightly as he held out a pen. "Sit down, Miss Knight, and sign on this line. There's always a lot of business in town, and this deed should be handed in at the earliest possible moment."

"Well, I suppose I had better sign." Sandra took the pen and sat down at a table. "Which line do I sign on?"

"This one," both men cried together. Sandra dipped her pen in the ink and hesitated again. She was going away and she would never see Gene again. She knew that was going to make her very unhappy. She must banish this double-crossing rogue out of her heart. Probably in time she would forget. Yet it would be hard. It would have been so easy to have been happy out here under the sun and in this glorious air. Her three friends did not want to go, and that made her feel miserable.

Sandra seemed to see the document through a haze.

"Sign here," urged Briggs.

The girl, making up her mind, signed her name bodily. Briggs snatched it up and peered at it, then from his pocket he produced a cheque for five thousand dollars.

"Are you quite satisfied, Miss Knight?" asked Thorpe.

"I suppose so," gloomily answered Sandra, staring at the cheque.

"Good-day, Miss Knight. Good-day, ladies," Briggs clutched at his companion's arm.

"Good day, Miss Knight," Thorpe cried.

The two men hastened to the door, almost falling over themselves to get out. They clattered down the wooden steps of the veranda and ran to their car. They piled themselves inside and slammed the door. Speedily they drove away.

"Well, that's that," murmured Sandra. "Guess I'm sorry to leave."

Meanwhile, Gene was leading the posse a fine dance. He could make the ranch before the pursuit, but he wanted a few minutes clear, so he headed towards a valley, with the cattlemen like a pack of ravaging wolves in close pursuit. In the valley was a big fence that separated his ranch from the Knight property, and it was very high. Gene jumped that fence like a bird, but it was too high for the cattlemen. The young foreman was over the hill and out of sight by the time the cursing Tracey had managed to open the gate.

The four girls was just finishing their packing when they heard the clutter of hoofs. Unceremoniously the door was burst open.

"Did you sell?" yelled Gene.

"Why, of course," cried Sandra, and held up the cheque. "Why aren't you in prison?"

"Because I had to get out to stop you selling your very valuable ranch for about a hundredth part of what it's worth." Gene snatched the cheque from her hands. "Was that Briggs and Thorpe that just left here?"

"Yes," cried Sandra. "But—" "I've got to stop 'em before they get to the county seat!" cried Gene. "See you later."

"I like that young man," Silly said as they watched him ride away and saw him leap a fence like a swallow. "He's a go-getter."

"But why did he steal that cheque?" cried Sandra.

"I don't think he did steal it," opined Jane. "And I don't believe Gene shot Morgan. Most of the boys I met at the dance had a big opinion of Gene."

"In my opinion he's a straight-shooter," said Silly, brandishing the rifle. "I'd like anybody to say different."

"Maybe his fat friend Frog's on the level," hopefully murmured Peggy, who had a soft spot for that yodelling Romeo. "And one thing I am sure about is that I don't like Briggs or Thorpe."

"Oh, girls," wailed Sandra. "I think we've misjudged Gene. I wish—" she broke off as a posse of cattlemen appeared. "Oh, I wonder what they want."

"Have you seen Antry?" demanded Tracey.

"No!" the girls shouted in unison. "He's been around here. We know —" Tracey jerked up as he saw the rifle.

"You get to blazes outa here!" ordered Silly.

"We've seen him," a cattleman shouted. "Come on, men!"

The whole posse vanished among the hills. A minute later the sheriff appeared on the scene, and the girls learnt with horror that the cattlemen were out to lynch Gene.

In the Nick of Time

BRIGGS and Thorpe had gone some distance when they heard the sound of shooting, and looked round apprehensively.

"They're after us!" cried the cowardly Thorpe.

"No, you sap. They're after Gene," retorted Briggs. "I wonder how he got free?"

"Stop wondering and step on the gas," shrieked Thorpe. "They may be after Gene, but he's after us. Get going!"

Gene Antry outdistanced his pursuers, but he could not hope to overtake the car, but the twists and turns of the trail enabled him to take short cuts. A water splash helped him considerably, so that as the overheated car chugged into town Gene was not more than two hundred yards behind, and his noble horse was showing no signs of flagging.

Gene was holding his rope in his hands.

Briggs had to slow down and stop the engine by the town hall, and the seconds used were valuable to Gene. The cowboy reined in his horse as Briggs and Thorpe, side by side, ran towards the main entrance. A rope snaked through the air, and it landed over their heads. Steel-like hands drew the rope taut, and as Champion moved forward at his master's orders the two rogues were jerked off their feet.

"Like a flash Gene was out of the saddle and, holding the rope taut, stepped towards his prostrate prisoners. In Briggs' hand was the deed that Sandra had signed.

"Gunme that!" raged Gene, and wrenched it away.

"That's mine!" screamed Briggs.

Gene's only answer was to tear the document into small pieces.

Tracey and the cattlemen came clattering into town. By now they had ridden off a great deal of their fanatical rage. Moreover, they sensed that there was something mysterious about the whole affair that needed explaining, and when they saw Gene standing over two roped men they just drew rein and waited for some sort of explanation.

A roar and another car was on the scene. Out piled the sheriff, his deputy and Frog.

The cattlemen began to close in and Gene, a contemptuous grin on his face, made no attempt to escape.

"You want me for shooting Morgan," he said clearly. "Well, I didn't shoot him."

"And he's right, men!" The sheriff raised his hands for attention. "One of my deputies rode out to report that the hospital have rung through to say that Morgan's conscious and better. Morgan says he saw who shot him. It was Thorpe."

Those fiery cattlemen felt very small at the injustice they had done.

Tracey got down from his horse, and with head bowed stepped forward, then he looked shamefaced at the foreman.

"I'm right sorry, Gene."

"That's all right, Tracey." Gene took the outstretched hand. "I'd go a long way myself to keep this country from being ruined by sheep."

When Briggs and Thorpe had been locked up in the strongest room the sheriff could find Gene and Frog rode back to the Poker Ranch. There was a lot of explaining that had to be done.

At any rate, the girls did not go East by the next train. In fact, they all moved down to the Knight Ranch, where the cowboys gave them a rousing reception. In the evening there was a kind of celebration party, and afterwards Frog and Gene and the girls did some singing.

"When it's Springtime in the Rockies I'm coming back to you.

Little sweetheart of the mountains

With you bonny eyes of blue.

Once again I'll say I love you

While the birds sing all the day."

Sang Gene with his eyes turned to Sandra, who was blushing and laughing.

"When it's Springtime in the Rockies, Oh, in the Rockies far away."

Frog and the cowboys bellowed the chorus. Peggy whispered in his ear that she could hear the sound of wedding bells.

Read This First

Pat O'Hara and Sam Maloney, Los Angeles radio cops, are summoned to the Wellington Steel Works, where John Adams is demonstrating a metal which he has invented and which is known as flexible steel.

The police have received an anonymous warning stating that an attempt is to be made on the life of Adams, with whose small son Pinky the two radio patrolmen are acquainted.

The warning proves genuine, for before Pat O'Hara and Maloney can reach the steel works Adams is murdered, and the formula of his invention disappears mysteriously.

A man named Selkirk is arrested on suspicion, and in the course of an investigation Pat O'Hara becomes friendly with Selkirk's sister Molly, who persuades him her brother is innocent.

Later, though admitting he took the formula, Selkirk declares that he did so to prevent it falling into the hands of Adams' murderer. He adds that in his opinion the culprit may be one of two men—Harrison, head of a steel company which rivals the Wellington Plant—or Tahata, agent of an Asiatic government—and he requests permission to visit the scene of the crime and test a theory he has evolved.

Selkirk is shot dead ere he can put that theory to the test, and later the Adams' formula comes into the possession of his sister Molly, who is accompanied by Pat O'Hara to the city dump, where Pinky is at present living.

It is Molly's intention to hand over the formula to Pinky, but she and Pat are set upon by Harrison and two of the latter's accomplices, and Pat, knocked senseless, falls in the shadow of a boiler-engine that suddenly explodes owing to an excess of steam-pressure.

Flight

WITH the echoes of the explosion ringing in their ears, Pinky Adams and Molly Selkirk wheeled round and saw the prostrate figure of Pat O'Hara lying motionless near the wrecked boiler-engine. At the same time they beheld the two men known as Dorgan and Clegg running down the road in their own direction, obviously intent on making good their escape with Harrison.

Dorgan and Clegg passed Molly and her youthful companion without paying any heed to them, and they came up with Harrison as the latter was talking urgently to the cab-driver who had brought Pat O'Hara and Molly to the scene.

It was clear that Harrison was endeavouring to persuade the taximan to drive him away from the city dump. But Dorgan and Clegg apparently reminded the steel magnate that there was no need to rely on the cab as a means of transport, for they led him to a commodious shed higher up the road and presently the three of them were issuing from that shed in a powerful car that had been concealed there.

As for Pinky and Molly, they were torn between their concern for O'Hara and a desire to follow the crooks, and they were still hovering on the road in an uncertain fashion when they perceived a sleek grey form pursuing the departing automobile.

It was the form of Pinky's wolf-hound Irish, recovered from the blow which Dorgan had dealt him earlier on, and, overtaking the car before it could gather speed, the dog leapt on to a luggage-carrier at the back of the vehicle and managed to gain a foothold there.

He was still crouching on that carrier when the auto swung out of sight, and, exchanging a significant glance, Pinky and Molly lost no time in making for the huddled body of Pat and examining the plain-clothes officer to discover the extent of his injuries.

There was an ugly bruise on his head where the blackjack wielded by Dorgan had struck him. Yet so far as Pinky Adams and Molly Selkirk could tell he was otherwise unhurt, and when he recovered consciousness some ten minutes later he corroborated their impression that the explosion had caused him no harm, for when they asked him how he felt he complained of nothing but a violent headache.

To his two friends it seemed miraculous that he had come off unscathed so far as the bursting of the boiler-engine was concerned. But the truth was, it was lucky for him that he had been lying senseless on the ground when the blast had occurred, for the flying fragments of metal that had been hurled far and wide had passed high above his prostrate figure.

Owing to the throbbing in his head, however, it was some little time ere he could collect his wits and remember all that had taken place. Then, as he recalled the events which had preceded the stunning blow he had received, he struggled to his feet and spoke to Molly Selkirk in a terse voice.

"A Bargain With Death"

"The formula!" he panted. "Did Harrison get away with it?"

"Yes," the girl answered heavily, "he got away with it—he and the two men who were with him. They made off in a roadster."

"But Irish is on the luggage-carrier of that roadster," Pinky Adams struck in, "and from what I know of him he'll stick there till those crooks get to their destination—wherever that may be. You see, Pat, one of those men hit him with a life-preserver before you and Molly showed up, and though he's usually docile enough, Irish never forgets or forgives anybody that ill-treats him. He'll probably go for the guy that struck him as soon as the car stops."

"If he does, he's liable to get himself laid out for keeps," Pat murmured, whereupon an anxious expression dawned on Pinky's features.

"Gee, Pat, you're right!" the lad faltered. "I—I hadn't thought of that. Pat, what are we gonna do? If anything happened to Irish I'd never get over it."

Pat clapped a hand on the boy's shoulder.

"You and Molly give me the details of that roadster," he said, "and I'll call up police headquarters on the nearest 'phone and have 'em broadcast a description to all patrols. Then maybe those crooks will be picked up before Irish can come to any harm."

Neither Pinky nor Molly could give him many particulars regarding the car in which Harrison and his confederates had made their getaway. But Pat figured that the presence of a dog on its luggage-carrier would render that vehicle noticeable, and he was soon in communication with headquarters, using the telephone installed in the office of old man Crockett the junk merchant, for that worthy had not locked up his premises when he had left the dump some time previously.

Pat having made his report to headquarters, Molly informed him that now she had seen where the orphaned Pinky was living she felt that the boy ought to be in more congenial surroundings, and suggested that he should make his home with her for the time being. And though he had been happy enough at the dump, Pinky was persuaded to accept Molly's hospitality when Pat supported the girl's proposal, so that presently the three of them were walking down the road to the ramshackle abode the lad had hitherto occupied.

Here the boy packed his most prized belongings into a small case. Then, in company with Pat and Molly, he made his way to the taxicab which had fetched the girl and the police officer from town.

The driver looked at them askance as they approached. He was probably somewhat ashamed at failing to lend a hand in the fight that had taken place, for Pat had made no secret of the fact that he was a plain-clothes police-officer when he had engaged the fellow's services. However, Pat did not reproach the man for his chicken-heartedness, merely giving him Molly's address and telling him to drive there as fast as he could.

Half an hour afterwards the former radio cop was bidding "good-bye" to Molly and Pinky outside the city apartment house in which the girl's flat was located. Then he instructed the taximan to convey him to police headquarters, and on arriving there he paid off the cab-driver and hurried to the wireless-room.

He found Sam Maloney there, and after an exchange of greetings Sam referred to those agents of Tahata who had been so neatly tricked when they had attempted to shadow Pat and Molly.

"I led 'em right to headquarters, Pat," he said, "an' it was only when they moved past that they realised you an' Molly Selkirk weren't in the police car any longer. They accelerated like blazes then, an' the last I saw of 'em they were headed east."

Pat looked at him ruefully.

"Yeah, we got rid of Tahata's mob all right," he muttered. "But a lot of good it did Molly and me. You've heard what happened down at the dump, of course?"

"Sure," Sam rejoined, "and I've been waitin' here in the hopes of hearin' that Harrison an' the guys with him have been picked up."

He glanced at an officer who was seated at a short-wave radio set. It was this officer's duty to relay instructions to patrols and to deal with all incoming reports, and about twenty minutes after Pat O'Hara had joined Sam Maloney the man at the wireless set received a message relating to Pinky Adams' wolfhound, which Pat had described in detail when he had telephoned headquarters from the city dump.

It was a message to the effect that a patrol had found the dog wandering in a distressed condition along an out-of-town highway known as the Coldwater Road, and there being no trace of the auto on whose luggage-carrier it had been riding, the animal had been taken to a veterinary surgeon living on the outskirts of the city.

The address of that surgeon was given in the report, and not long afterwards Pat O'Hara and his comrade Sam Maloney were driving thither.

Sure enough, the dog that had been left there in the veterinary surgeon's care was Irish, and on Pat and Sam identifying the wolfhound the medical man told them that an examination had revealed abrasions on the animal's body which were undoubtedly due to heavy and brutal kicks. The creature now seemed to have recovered from its ill-treatment, however, and the surgeon offered no objection when Pat suggested that he and Sam should take charge of Irish.

When the two police officers had returned to their car with the animal, Pat instructed Sam to drive out to the Coldwater Road, and then, on reaching that highway, he ordered his friend to bring the automobile to a standstill.

The moment Sam had done so, Pat opened the door nearest to him and turned Irish loose, whereupon his colleague looked at him blankly.

"What's the idea, pardner?" he queried.

Pat was climbing out of the car, and he glanced smilingly at Sam as the latter encroached after him.

"Pinky claims that this pooch of his has more intelligence than a lot of human beings, Sam," he declared, "and this is where we test the truth of that statement."

The other's rubicund face betrayed perplexity.

"How come?"

"Well," Pat replied, "Irish was laid out down at the dump by a clout over the head, and from what Pinky told me he certainly didn't get any kicks there."

"Go on."

"That indicates to me," Pat continued, "that Irish stuck with Harrison and those other rats until they came to their destination—and got the kicks then. As soon as those crooks' car stopped he probably tried to tackle the man who had crowned him earlier on, and no doubt he was booted out of it for his pains.

"And now," he added, "we're going to give Irish the opportunity of leading us to the spot where those skunks went to cover, see?"

While he had been speaking the wolfhound had moved a little way from the police auto, and presently it paused and looked back at the car and the two plain-clothes men who were standing beside it. Then it padded forward again for a few yards, stopped once more to throw another glance in the direction of Pat and Sam, and finally resumed its progress along the road.

It was clear that Irish was inviting them to accompany him, and Pat gripped Sam by the lapels of the coat exultantly.

"It seems like Pinky Adams was right about his dog's intelligence," he said. "That wolfhound is asking us to follow him, or I'm a Dutchman. Come on, buddy, get in behind that wheel and we'll drive after him slowly."

The Spy

A TELEPHONE was ringing insistently in the office once tenanted by the president of the Harrison Iron and Steel Works. It was not the telephone which W. H. Harrison had been accustomed to use in the normal course of business, but an auxiliary instrument attached to a private wire.

Harrison's sanctum was vacant at the moment. But next door to the apartment was the laboratory occupied by Stevens, the company president's chief research chemist and right-hand man, and before very long Stevens came through from the laboratory to answer the call.

Mechanically he picked up the receiver of the 'phone whose bell was ringing, and as mechanically he spoke into the mouthpiece.

"Hallo?" he queried.

A man's voice reached his ear, a voice that he had no difficulty in identifying.

"I want to talk to Stevens."

The research chemist's eyes dilated.

"Harrison!" he blurted. "Say, I was beginning to wonder if the police had caught up with you. Yes, yes, this is Stevens speaking. Where are you, anyway?"

"At my shooting-box in the hills," came the reply. "I'm up here with Clegg and Dorgan. And listen, Stevens, I've got the formula—the Adams formula. I grabbed it from the Selkirk girl."

The scientist drew in his breath.

"You've got the Adams formula?"

he reiterated. "Well, that's fine, Harrison. But you're not kidding yourself that your shooting-box is a safe hide-out, are you? Why, the police are bound to check up eventually on all the property you own, and they'll send a—"

Harrison cut in on him.

"I know, I know!" he snapped. "But I'm not staying here any longer than I can help. I intend to head for the border at the earliest possible moment."

There was a pause, and then the president of the Harrison Steel Company went on speaking.

"You'd better pull out with me, Stevens," he said. "But before you leave the office I want you to get hold of some negotiable bonds belonging to me. They're in the safe there, and you know the combination of that safe."

"Yes, Harrison," Stevens answered huskily. "I know the combination."

"Then get busy. You'll find the bonds in a satchel. Bring them out here as soon as possible."

"Sure, Harrison. I won't waste any time. Let's see, that shooting-box of yours is in Diablo Canyon, isn't it?"

"That's right," Stevens' employer answered, "and your best route is via the Coldwater Road. I'll expect you within the hour."

Stevens hung up, and, as he did so, a man who had been listening at the door of the office tip-toed across an outer room and made a stealthy exit. He was a man who held an unimportant post in the Harrison Steel Works, but who was actually in the pay of Tahata—a man who had been detailed to keep the Asiatic informed regarding any developments at the premises of that concern—and, after quitting the vantage point from which he had heard the conversation of the unsuspecting Stevens, he left the company's offices and repaired to a public 'phone booth not far from the site they occupied.

Fifteen seconds after he had entered that call-box he was in communication with the Oriental to whom he was secretly allied, and, in his private suite at the Hotel Cairo, Tahata listened to his agent's report with earnest attention. Then, having received that report, the Asiatic crossed to the door of a room that adjoined the one in which he had answered his hiring's 'phone call.

Zutta, his secretary, was in that room, and Tahata spoke to him tersely.

"Is Franklyn in the hotel?" he demanded.

"Yes, master. I believe he is."

"Then bring him to me at once," Tahata instructed.

Zutta hurried off to do his bidding, and returned in a little while with that individual who seemed to be a complete slave to Tahata's will.

The Eastern diplomat stepped towards Franklyn as the latter appeared in company with Zutta, and his penetrating eyes searched the expressionless, trance-like face of the man whom his secretary had fetched into his presence.

"Franklyn," he said, "you failed me in your allotted task of keeping a watch on Molly Selkirk. Nevertheless, I have it on the authority of another of my agents that we need no longer concern ourselves with the Selkirk girl, because the Adams formula, which means so much to me, has changed hands."

Franklyn's features remained impassive, but Zutta craned forward with a look of eager inquiry on his swarthy countenance.

"The formula has changed hands, master?" he echoed. "Then who possesses it now?"

Tahata responded to the question without removing his gaze from Franklyn.

"Harrison possesses it now," he announced deliberately. "Harrison, president of the Steel Company that bears his name—Harrison, whom the police are seeking to arrest on a charge of attempted murder."

Zutta moistened his lips.

"Then if we can find out where Harrison is before the police can get to him—"

He was interrupted by the other Asiatic.

"I know where Harrison is, Zutta," Tahata declared, still focusing his attention on Franklyn. "My informant overheard a conversation between our friend Harrison and his chief research chemist, Stevens. In the course of that conversation it came out that Harrison was hiding in a shooting-box that he owns up in the hills. Stevens is to join him there with some negotiable bonds. Those bonds, I may add, are of no interest to me. The point is, Harrison apparently told Stevens that he had secured the Adams formula."

He paused, and then addressed himself to Franklyn.

"Harrison's shooting-box is situated in a ravine known as Diablo Canyon," he observed. "My informant could not tell me precisely where Diablo Canyon is, and I am not familiar with the hill-country myself. But it seems that the Coldwater Road passes close to the spot in question, and it will be your duty to see that some of my men are sent to that road for the purpose of trailing Stevens, who is known to several of them by sight. As for yourself, you will travel there separately and see that no mistakes are made. I want that formula—do you understand?"

Franklyn bowed his head submissively.

"Your commands will be obeyed," he rejoined, and, turning on his heel, he strode from the room.

The Hide-out

BACK at the office where, unbeknown to him, his telephone conversation with his chief had been overheard by a furtive cavedropper, Stevens was kneeling before a safe which he had opened and was searching for the bonds that Harrison had mentioned.

He located them. As Harrison had said, they were reposing in a satchel, and, after satisfying himself as to the contents of that satchel, Stevens thrust the leather receptacle under his arm and hurried from the office.

A minute or two later he was driving through the city's streets in a small car that he possessed, but, though he travelled at a rapid pace where traffic conditions allowed, it took him fully half an hour to gain the outskirts of town and pick up the Coldwater Road.

It was as he opened up along this highway that a big tonner swung out of a side-road and proceeded to follow him. That tonner was occupied by a group of men in the employ of Tahata, but, since the individual in control of it was careful not to press after Stevens too closely, the research chemist failed to apprehend that he was being trailed, and pushed on for mile after mile without suspecting that circumstance.

He had left the city far behind him when, turning a bend, he espied a closed car ahead of him. It was moving very slowly, and ordinarily Stevens would have paid little attention to it, but as he was overtaking it he noticed that a sleek, silver-grey wolfhound was trotting in front of it, and, struck by the oddness of this, he glanced curiously at the inmates of the saloon car in passing by.

Next instant he was cranking his foot hard down on the accelerator. For the occupants of that slow-moving automobile were Pat O'Hara and Sam Maloney, and, although the latter was a stranger to Stevens, the research chemist had seen the other police officer during a visit Pat had once paid to the Harrison Steel Works.

Neither Pat nor Sam showed any interest in Stevens as he came abreast of them and forged past them, for they were too intent on keeping track of Irish to observe other users of the road. They were equally oblivious, too, of the open touring-car which swept by them shortly after Stevens had disappeared round a curve about a couple of hundred yards farther along the highway.

Not much more than a stone's throw beyond that curve, Stevens braked sharply and turned on to a secondary road which branched off through a country of rolling hills, and only a few minutes afterwards he was driving into a ravine where a timbered hunting-lodge was situated.

It was the shooting-box owned by

Pat gripped Sam by the lapels of the coat exultantly. "It seems like Pinky Adams was right about his dog's intelligence," he said. "That wolfhound is asking us to follow him, or I'm a Dutchman."

Harrison... and, drawing up in front of it with a screeching of brakes, Stevens scrambled out of his automobile and ran to the door of the dwelling.

The door was opened from within even as he was approaching it, and Harrison, Clegg and Dorgan appeared on the threshold.

"You didn't waste any time getting here, Stevens," Harrison said to the chemist, in a tone of satisfaction.

Stevens' responso was delivered in breathless accents.

"No," he panted, "and it's just as well. Back on the Coldwater Road I passed that guy O'Hara. He was in a car with a feller that I imagine to be another police officer. They were tailing a dog—a wolfhound—and they may be headed this way."

Consternation had dawned on the faces of Harrison, Dorgan and Clegg.

"A wolfhound!" the first-named ejaculated. "I'll say they're headed this way! That brute got aboard the roadster that brought us here, and attacked Dorgan as soon as we stepped out. We booted it down the road, and thought no more about it. But I'd have brained the cur if I'd ever imagined it would bring the police here!"

Stevens pursed his lips.

"It's too late now to talk about what you should have done," he jerked. "We've got to get out of here, Harrison, and we've got to get out quick. I've left the engine of my car running, and the bonds are in a satchel on the back seat."

"We won't use your car, Stevens," Harrison answered tensely. "The roadster is parked in the garage at the side of the lodge, and we'll make our getaway in it, because it's a whole lot faster than your outfit. Look, you pick up those bonds and put this formula in the satchel with 'em. Clegg, you hurry round and get the roadster started up."

Clegg darted off to obey his command. Meanwhile, Harrison had withdrawn a folded document from his pocket and handed it to Stevens. It was the vital formula that had cost John Adams his life—the formula for the manufacture of flexible steel—and on receiving it Stevens sped to his auto to collect the satchel containing the bonds and to place the precious document in that receptacle before joining Clegg at the garage.

As for Harrison, he took Dorgan by the arm and ducked back into the interior of the hunting-lodge with him.

"We're going to make this trip fully armed," the steel magnate said. "If O'Hara and that other officer try to chase us, we'll fight it out with 'em."

There was no lack of guns and ammunition in the shooting-box, and in less than a minute Harrison and Dorgan were re-emerging from the dwelling, their pockets stuffed with cartridges, firearms in their hands. And as they sallied forth they saw Clegg driving the roadster from the garage—saw Stevens hastening towards that auto from his own car, with the satchel containing the bonds and the formula held tightly under one arm.

Stevens piled in beside Clegg. By that time Harrison and Dorgan were starting for the roadster as well. But they were never destined to reach it, for all at once a big tourer raked into view and swung between them and their objective.

It was the tourer occupied by Tahata's agents, and, every one of them grasping a revolver, they blundered out of the vehicle to prevent Harrison's escape.

"No yuh don't!" one of them said to the steel magnate. "Stand where you are; an' pass over that formula. We know you've got it!"

Harrison glanced in the direction of the roadster. It had come to a halt only a yard or two clear of the garage, and Clegg and Stevens were gaping anxiously towards their employer and Dorgan and the group of newcomers. Then all at once Harrison made a desperate attempt to dodge past Tahata's underlings, and Dorgan followed suit.

That concerted bid to gain the roadster sealed the doom of the two of them, for there was a blatter of gun-play, and, each recoiling as a leaden slug ripped through his body, Dorgan and Harrison slumped to the ground—the former dying instantaneously, his chief uttering a long, drawn-out moan before the life went out of him like the dwindling flame of a spent candle.

Over in the roadster, Clegg was spurred into frantic activity by the dual murder he and Stevens had witnessed, and, with the awe-stricken scientist cowering at his side, he worked clutch-pedal, gear-lever and accelerator to send the car roaring on to the canyon road, where he swung sharp to the right and drove for the far end of the ravine.

Tahata's men made no attempt to challenge the flight of Clegg and Stevens. Their business was concerned with Harrison—or at least they believed it was, not knowing that the formula had changed hands. It was only when they had searched the steel magnate's body, and Dorgan's as well, that they guessed the paper which they were seeking was in the departing roadster.

"Those birds in that two-seater must have the formula!" one of the murderous ruffians shouted then. "Come on, you guys, let's get after 'em!"

They packed into the tourer, and it was soon on the move. Yet even as it was storming away in pursuit of the vehicle that held Clegg and Stevens, another automobile entered the canyon—the automobile containing Pat O'Hara and Sam Maloney.

Irish was still trotting ahead of the police car, but at sight of the two crumpled bodies lying in front of the hunting-lodge Sam thrust his foot on the accelerator and put on a spurt that carried the auto past the wolfhound, and the plain-clothes' men had reached the scene of the murder and were stooping over the victim when Pinky's dog came up.

"Neither Harrison nor this fellow with him will ever talk, Sam," Pat said grimly, as he straightened from a cursory examination of the bodies. "But somebody is going to."

He glanced down the canyon trail, on which tourer and roadster were still in view. Then, gathering Irish in his arms, he climbed back into the police car, summoning his comrade to the steering-wheel at the same time.

"After those other outfits, Sam!" he rapped out. "And step on it!"

In another moment the police car was pulling away from the hunting-lodge, and, though the trail through the ravine was scarred with ruts and pot-holes, Sam drove the automobile along it in head-long style. Nevertheless, the pace set by Clegg and equalled by the man at the wheel of the tourer was no less furious, and the police car did not gain an inch until all at once the vehicle in which Tahata's men were travelling executed a sudden swerve that carried it off the road.

Almost simultaneously the echoes of a sharp report came up the ravine and reached the ears of Sam Maloney and Pat O'Hara, and an instant afterwards the latter observed that one of the tourer's rear tyres had become flat.

"Those fellows are ditched, Sam," he ejaculated, "and unless they scatter we'll grab every mother's son of 'em."

The rogues did not scatter. True, they observed the approach of Pat and Sam, but, seeing the two detectives for the first time, they mistook them for ordinary civilians, and one of the gangsters uttered an exclamation of satisfaction.

"We're in luck's way!" he jerked. "Here's a coupla guys in a fast-lookin' car, an' we're gonna take that car away from 'em so we can chase after the fellers in the roadster. Keep your gats outa sight, boys, an' leave the rest to me."

The speaker set his companions an example by thrusting his revolver into his pocket. Then he moved out into the middle of the trail and waved to Sam and Pat, appealing to them to stop and never dreaming that they had every intention of pulling up in any ease.

Sam brought his car to a halt within a yard or two of the gangster, who then came round to the side of the machine.

"I'd like to borrow your sedan, friend," the crook told Sam. "Me and my buddies are plain-clothes officers, and we're after the birds in that roadster. They're wanted for murder."

Sam looked at the ruffian narrowly, then fired a question at him.

"You got your detective's badge with you?" he asked.

"Now listen, pardner," the other retorted urgently, "this is no time for formalities. Can't you see the men in that roadster are getting away from us?"

The impostor's accomplices were closing in, but on resorting to violence if the inmates of the sedan proved unwilling to surrender the automobile to them. But ere the discussion could proceed further, Sam and Pat plucked out their Service revolvers and covered them.

"Plain-clothes officers, eh?" Pat said to their spokesman. "Feller, you've tried out a bluff on the wrong parties, for my pal and I happen to be plain-clothes officers ourselves, and I reckon none of you rats ever saw the inside of a police station unless it was from the wrong side of a cell door."

The crooks had recoiled, and it was in a thoroughly discomfited fashion that they now raised their hands, that sign of surrender being accelerated as the two detectives motioned upwards with the barrels of their guns. Then Pat addressed himself to his comrade.

"I want you and Irish to stay here and keep these men company, Sam," he announced. "I'm going to see if I can run that other car down."

Sam alighted from the police auto, and, after thrusting Irish out after him, Pat took up a position behind the steering column and drove off down the road in the hope of overtaking the vehicle which the tourer had been following.

It was still in sight, but had cleared the canyon, and, pursuing it determinedly, Pat saw it swing right at a fork about a quarter of a mile beyond the ravine.

That circumstance convinced him that the fugitives in the roadster were none too familiar with the trails in that section of the countryside. He himself happened to know that the route which they had now taken was a mere loopway that joined up with the other branch a mile or two farther on after executing a somewhat lengthy detour.

Coming to the fork, Pat turned left along the more direct course and blazed along it in a smother of dust until he gained that point where the trails met again, and here he lodged his car across the road so as to block it completely. Then he descended from the police automobile and posted himself on the blind side of it.

A couple of minutes later the machine occupied by Clegg and Stevens stormed into view round a bend in the loopway, and as he found that the road ahead of him was barred, Clegg involuntarily stamped his foot on the brake.

It seemed, indeed, that he had no alternative but to draw up, for if the hill-trails themselves were of a crude and uneven surface, the ground on either side of them was far rougher in character, and in many places was nothing but treacherous morass even in times of drought.

Yet all of a sudden Clegg elected to take the chance of swerving aside and making a circuit that would fetch him beyond the obstructing car if fortune favoured him.

Removing his foot from the brake, he veered off the road, and next second he and Stevens were being thrown against each other as the two-seater rocked wildly over the broken terrain. But Clegg managed to keep the auto on its four wheels, and succeeded in rounding the police car safely, though he could not attain any speed in doing so, and at one stage came near to hemming the vehicle in a patch of swamp.

He picked up the road again about fifty yards past the police car. In the meantime, however, Pat O'Hara was sprinting along the trail as fast as his legs would carry him, and even as Clegg regained that trail and started to accelerate the plain-clothes officer hounded on to the running-board.

"Pull up!" he roared at Clegg, and with the words he levelled his revolver threateningly in an attempt to overawe the fellow.

He reckoned without Stevens—Stevens, who knocked up his hand and aimed a savage blow at him. It was a blow that must have hurled Pat from the running-board had it connected, but somehow he warded it off, and then, tumbling in upon the research chemist, he grappled with him furiously.

He lost possession of his six-shooter in that brief struggle, the gun falling to the floor of the car, which was rapidly gathering speed. But he had soon dealt with Stevens, a short-arm jolt to the point of the chin scattering the scientist's wits so that the man slumped down in a heap.

In another instant Pat was lunging towards Clegg, but even as he was in the act of tackling that worthy the roadster swept round a sharp curve in the trail, and all at once the driver of the vehicle and the police-officer who was about to come to grips with him realised that both of them—and the unconscious Stevens as well—were on the verge of disaster.

Immediately beyond the bend the ground fell steeply away from the right-hand side of the trail into a deep gulch, while on the left-hand side of the trail a rock-strewn acclivity rose abruptly to a height of several hundred feet. And, close to the bend, some miniature landslide had cast a number of great boulders on to the terrace-like roadway—boulders that loomed now in the very path of the onrushing car!

"WEST OF SHANGHAI"

"What can I do?" shrugged Fang. "Captain Nui have all soldier. If say no, we all get fix mos' dang quick!"

Unnoticed by the others, and ignored by the soldiers, Lola had entered the room in time to hear what Cheng had said. She darted forward, and she cried out:

"General, it was Creed who bribed this man to start the revolt!"

Creed gave her a murderous look that betrayed his guilt more plainly than words, and Fang said:

"So Mr. Cleed start this trouble?"

"Why not?" gritted Creed. "You were going to hold me for ransom."

Captain Nui waxed impatient.

"Don't talk so much!" he rapped in his native tongue. "Are you going to turn this man over to me?"

Fang turned to Jim.

"I am sorry, my friend," he said.

"In little while you die. But I not let you die alone. I come watch."

"Thanks," returned Jim grimly.

"That'll be a big help."

"I am Fang!"

CAPTAIN NUI issued instructions, and two of the soldiers marched Jim out from the room while the others remained near the door. Nui himself went out, and Creed was about to follow when Fang caught hold of his arm.

"One moment, please, Mr. Cleed," he said. "I like make conference. Ve'y private."

He led the American across the hall into a small room, and Cheng silently followed. The door was closed, and Fang seated himself in a chair and looked up into his betrayer's face.

"No hard feelings, I hope?" said Creed uneasily.

"Hard feelings?"

"Why, yes—er—I hope you're not angry at me. You see, you sort of had me on the spot, and—er—well, I had to do a little double-crossing."

"Double—" Fang stumbled over the word. "What that mean, Mr. Cheng?"

"To double-cross a friend," expounded Cheng, "is to betray him, Excellency."

"Oh! How you get Captain Nui double-cross me?"

"Well, you can do almost anything with money." Creed achieved a mirthless little laugh. "You know that, general."

"Wisdom fall from your lips," nodded Fang. "You know, maybe, Captain Nui ask life of Mr. Hallet?"

"I'm sorry for Hallet," shrugged Creed, "but that's his look-out. And besides, he's in love with my wife."

"You love your woman?"

"Well," hedged Creed, "he'll never get her, will he? Let's get back to business, general. You know, you and I could make a much better deal than the one I made with Captain Nui."

"You mean we double-cross him, too?" inquired Fang.

"Why not? You're in this racket to make money, aren't you?"

Fang sat back in his chair.

"You ve'y smart man, Mr. Cleed," he said. "I give you mos' bes' deal anybody. You go leave here now, and it not cost no money."

"What's the catch?" Creed asked suspiciously.

"Is no catch," was the quiet reply. "Is easy. I just go kill you."

Cheng drew his gun, and Creed tried to conceal his fear with a very wry grin.

"You must be joking, general," he said.

"Do I look like joker?" demanded Fang. "Do Mr. Cheng look like joker?"

Creed drew a long and quivering breath.

"General, what would you gain by doing this?" he asked.

"Alive you no good," Fang replied.

"Dead you ve'y good—make two people happy."

"You mean you want to kill me so that my wife can marry Hallet?"

"Is best way, I think."

"Well, if that's what's worrying you, general, I can arrange it. I'll give her a divorce. He can have her."

Fang's brows ascended.

"Have seen man not fight for his money," he said. "Have seen man not fight for his life. Not before have seen man not fight for his woman."

"Whenever you're ready, Excellency," said Cheng.

"But, general, if—if it's money you want," stuttered Creed, "why, I—I'll give you plenty of money. Anything that you want."

"It not that I no want money," returned Fang. "Is that I no want you."

He took out his own gun and levelled it. "I do this myself, Mr. Cheng."

"Well, at least fight fair!" cried Creed hoarsely. "You—you both have guns. Give me a chance!"

"But if I give you gun you maybe shoot me," said Fang. "You think I am dang fool?"

Creed made a frantic dash for the door, but Fang's gun blazed and he reeled sideways and thudded to the floor.

There he lay for some little time after the two had gone out from the room; but he was not dead, and Chan found him there, with a wound in his left shoulder, and fetched brandy and raised him up and held a glass of the spirit to his lips.

Chan was still ministering to him when Fang walked out from the building with Cheng. Jane and Lola and Galt and Abernathy were standing by a creper-covered screen between the courtyard and the garden, and Jane called out imploringly:

"General!"

"Please, Miss Jane!" rebuked Cheng. But Fang walked over to her, and she said with tears in her voice:

"You're not going to let them do this to him? There must be something you can do to save him!"

"It makes me ve'y sad," Fang assured her.

"If it's money you want," cried Lola, "I'll make my father give you every dollar he has!"

Cheng caught hold of the girl's wrist in a grip that hurt; the doctor put a restraining hand upon her shoulder; but Fang looked at her in a move kindly way than he had ever done before.

"Oh!" he said slowly. "So you love my friend Jim, too? Two women love him. Must be ve'y good man!"

He walked past the group and past the screen into the garden, and Cheng followed him. Jim was standing with his back to a wall, faced by a firing-squad, and Captain Nui was standing beside the firing-squad.

"Very good-looking boy, eh?" he said evilly in his own language. "Be sure to shoot straight. Attention!"

Cheng remained motionless just behind the repulsive little officer. Fang walked over to Jim.

"You feel all right?" he asked.

"What do you think?" Jim retorted.

"I t'ink, my friend, you not lose face." Fang produced a silver cigarette-case from his pocket and opened it. "Cigarette?"

"You want to make it a good show, eh?" said Jim bitterly. "With all the trimmings."

"Is velly good cigarette." Fang took one from the case and put it between his own lips, then took a lighter from his pocket. "Look! I kill two man get this. It make fire." He tried to ignite the lighter, but failed. "Some time! Son-o-ma-gum!" He tried again, and this time the lighter flared. "Ah! Is velly nice."

He lit the cigarette, puffed at it, and put away the lighter.

"You want dlink?"

"No, thanks."

"Me, I want dlink when I die. Gambei! You all leady now?"

"I'm ready," gritted Jim.

"Me, I am leady, too." Fang, with the lighted cigarette in one hand and the case in the other, turned about and went to Captain Nui—and at the same moment Cheng drew his gun from its holster.

"He is ready," Fang said in Kalmuk. Nui roared orders, and the members of the firing-squad loaded their rifles and held them to their shoulders.

"Fire!"

Five rifles and one six-gun spat flame and bullets simultaneously; but the rifle bullets went over the wall—and Captain Nui fell forward on his face with the bullet from the six-gun in his left lung.

Cheng put away his smoking weapon and took command of the firing-squad and of the other soldiers in the garden, ordering them all to attention. Fang went back to Jim, who was wiping his forehead with his hand.

"You feel all right?" he asked.

April 2nd, 1938.

"I have felt worse," Jim replied rather shakily.

"You t'ink I let you die? Huh!"

"I don't know yet how you put it over."

"Is easy." Fang struck an attitude. "I am Fang!"

At that moment the quiet of the garden was shattered by the din of gunfire all round the village, and one of Fang's men came flying past the side of the Mission to announce breathlessly that General Mu's soldiers were at the gates.

"All men to gate!" cried Fang. "General Mu at gate of town with soldier."

Cheng repeated the command in Kalmuk and in Ningpo, and the soldiers ran off in disorder to defend the gates and to fire at the enemy from the tower and from the wall. Fang, with the lighted cigarette still in his hand, said wryly to Jim:

"Your servant cook plenty trouble for me, but is all light. I am Fang!"

The Last Toast

GENERAL MU and his forces had encircled the village before advancing to attack, but the defenders had the advantage till machine-guns were brought into play. From the high wall they fired down at the Government troops, and they worked havoc with the extended ranks of horsemen.

A dozen of Mu's men were wounded to every rebel that was shot and fell from the wall, and the attackers fell back to make room for the machine-guns. The top of the high wall thereupon became a place on which no man could live, and scores of Fang's men who elambered ladders pitched from them immediately they showed themselves.

The gates were attacked, but the gates held till a tree hastily cut down was used as a battering-ram, and even then there were many casualties before Mu's men fought their way into the narrow street, only to encounter barricade after barricade, and every barricade a veritable hornets' nest.

Out of the street into the marketplace the invaders progressed by slow degrees, and Fang and Cheng fell back before them with the remnant of Fang's "army" to the gateway of the Mission. There another barricade of crates and boxes and broken stalls was built with feverish haste, and from behind it the doomed "army" blazed away at the inevitable victors.

Jim, meanwhile, had returned to the hall of the Mission with Jane and Lola and Galt and Abernathy, all of them—with the possible exception of Galt—rejoicing at his escape from what had seemed to be certain death. Lola immediately went off to her room; Galt, frightened almost out of his wits by the battle that was raging in the village, sought refuge in a cellar. The doctor disappeared to look after his patients, and Jim and Jane were left together.

They were about to follow the doctor when Chan ran out from the room in which he had been attending to Creed, crying:

"Mr. Creed ve'y bad hurt! He tell me to ask you come quick!"

Jim went straight to the room and found Creed lying back in a chair, coatless and with his collar and shirt unfastened. His eyes were closed, and the left shoulder of his shirt was stained with blood that was still wet.

Jane, who had rushed to get a first-aid outfit, appeared a few moments afterwards, and she was opening the case upon a table when Creed opened his eyes and suddenly rose to his feet.

"Chan said you were hurt!" she exclaimed, shrinking away from him as he advanced towards her.

"Yes," said Creed, "I was watching the fighting from the yard and a—stray bullet hit me."

"What is it, a flesh wound?" asked Jim.

"Seems to be. It knocked me out for a few minutes."

The sound of many shots reached their ears. The defenders out in the courtyard were suffering badly.

"Is enough, I t'ink," Fang said to Cheng. "We go in Mission."

Jane nerved herself to step nearer to the husband she loathed.

"Hold still, will you?" she said, and took from the first-aid case a pair of scissors with which to cut away the shirt over the wound.

Creed glared at her with bloodshot eyes, and Jim was filled with misgiving. "Take it easy, Creed," he said gruffly.

"You don't care whether I'm living or dead!" snarled Creed. "It's him you love!"

"Gordon!" screamed Jane, and she dropped the scissors and sprang in front of Jim as Creed whipped an ugly automatic from his hip-pocket and levelled it.

"You listen to me!" he roared. "I stopped a bullet on account o' you, Hallet. Well, now you're gonna stop one. And we'll call it an accident!"

Fang looked in at the open doorway, and a gun was in his hand.

"How many times I got kill you, Mr. Creed?" he asked disgustedly, and his gun jetted flame.

Creed collapsed with a bullet in his heart, and the automatic fell as he fell.

"General!" cried Jim in a horrified voice.

"Is my mistake," said Fang quietly. "Should let Mr. Cheng fix him first time."

Into the hall burst a soldier from the courtyard, dripping blood from a wound in his leg.

"General!" he blurted in Kalmuk. "General Mu's soldiers are in the gate."

Fang looked dolefully at Cheng, who was standing beside him.

"Is too bad," he lamented. "Soldier are beaten—am caught in trap."

"We won't let 'em take you alive, Excellency!" howled the faithful captain. "We'll barricade the house!"

"Is too late." Fang raised a restraining hand. "Guns smash house, kill my friend. No, no. Tell General Mu Fang is finish."

"Excellency!"
"I let you die with me." Fang offered his gun by its barrel. "What more you want?"

Cheng bowed his head.
"I shall do as you say, Excellency," he murmured, and he took the gun and went out from the hall.

"General Mu will execute you!" exclaimed Jim.

"Yes, my friend," nodded Fang quite calmly, "with ve'y great pleasure."

General Mu was in possession of the village, and there was joy amongst its native inhabitants. Most of the survivors of Fang's "army" were shot out of hand, but Cheng was in custody when the general himself arrived at the Mission—and so was Fang.

Cheng was denied the privilege of dying with his leader. At a very informal sort of court-martial, held in the living-room, it was decided by General Mu that he should be taken to Ting Fou, where there was a prison.

Fang's fate was exactly what he had expected. He was taken out into the garden to face a firing squad from the wall against which Jim had stood some hours earlier. Jim asked for permission to be present, and permission was granted. General Mu went with him.

"Are you ready, Wu Yen Fang?" asked the general gruffly, and in English.

"One moment, please." Fang beckoned to Jim, and Jim went miserably over to him. "He's too big lully. You feel all light?"

"No, general, I don't," Jim replied. "It's my fault all this is happening to you."

"Not your fault." Fang shook his head. "Is fortune of war."

"I'd give my right arm if I could help you like you helped me!"

"I tink maybe you need light arm." Fang fished out his cigarette-case. "Is more best you keep, eh?" He opened the case. "Cigarette?"

"Thanks." Jim hadn't the heart to reject a cigarette, though he did not feel in the least like smoking.

"Souvenir you, my friend." The cigarette-case was pressed into his hand after Fang had helped himself, and Fang took out the lighter.

"Nice fire machine," he said, without a tremor in his voice, and tried to ignite it. "Not so good." He tried again. "Ah, ve'y nice!"

The lighter flamed, and with it he lit first Jim's cigarette and then his own.

"For you, too," he said, and Jim accepted the lighter. "You dlink my health, huh?"

Jim looked at General Mu, and General Mu spoke to an orderly. Two glasses of wine were brought out from the Mission on a tray by Chan, and Fang handed one to Jim and took one for himself.

"Happy journey, general," said Jim in a voice that choked.

"Gambel!" toasted Fang.
They drank the wine, and they threw the glasses upon the ground so that they were smashed to pieces.

"Are you ready, Wu Yen Fang?" General Mu asked again, and this time Fang nodded.

A junior officer rapped orders. The firing squad became divided into two ranks of five men, and the men in the front rank knelt. The rifles were loaded, the men took aim—and Fang blew a smoke ring from his lips just as a volley rang out and he became riddled with bullets.

General Mu walked back with Jim to the hall of the Mission, and in the hall Jane and Lola were in tears, and the doctor and Galt were trying to comfort them.

"So sorry," said the general to Abernathy, "but it is necessary for all foreign women to leave as soon as possible."

"Very well, general," Abernathy responded. "These ladies are leaving in the morning."

"It is better so," said Mu.

Next morning, not long after sunrise, a mule train set out from Sha Ho Shan across the desert in the direction of Ting Fou; and one of General Mu's soldiers led the way on horseback, and behind him rode Myron Galt with his daughter, and behind them Jim rode beside Jane.

otherwise it felt quite natural; except for the fact that the stretching of the eyelids to make them almond-shaped caused a pressure on the eyeball by the lower lid and the pressure distorted his vision. As a matter of fact, during the first two or three days Karloff got the reputation of being "high hat."

He could see a visitor to the set or in the café or out on the lot, but the visual distortion was sufficient to blur and change the facial outlines. As a result, many persons he knows were not greeted with that smile of recognition most people in pictures expect from a star before they speak to him.

His assistant was the still photographer attached to the unit, a man named Bert Sixe. The camera expert was always on hand with the company, and knowing most of Karloff's friends by sight, he informed the actor when one approached.

Finally, word spread about the reason why the star failed to recognise friends, in the hope that any who hadn't been told in person would hear about it and understand. The reason Karloff took so much trouble wasn't on his own account, but because he dislikes to hurt anyone's feelings.

Casting Bureau for Horses

Actors and actresses are not the only ones in Hollywood who find film jobs through casting bureaus. Horses have a casting bureau of their own.

The equine employment agency is operated at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios by Fred Gilman, horse casting director. At a few hours' notice he can supply any breed or kind of horse demanded for film work.

Gilman's biggest job was to supply the hundreds of horses for "The Girl of the Golden West," which has a California setting of 1850.

A white saddle horse was required for Jeanette MacDonald, but she supplied her own mount, White Lady. Leo Carrillo also rides his own spirited pinto, Suisun. All other horses had to be rented.

Aside from established stables, horses are also rented from racing stables, farmers, riding clubs and Society debutantes.

Directors' "Shock Absorbers"

In law schools they tell of a great lawyer who had a habit of fingering a certain coat button while speaking. One day a young opponent surreptitiously snipped the button off. The famous man missed it when he arose to address the jury, became flustered, made a fool of himself, and lost the case.

Hollywood is full of important "props" like that, and an old observer sometimes wonders what would happen if one suddenly turned up missing in a tense moment.

There is, for instance, Fritz Lang's monoco. The precise Austrian producer-director of Paramount's "You And Me," starring Sylvia Sydney and George Raft, has never been seen without it. During a scene he screws it into one eye or holds it in his hand, nervously polishing the glass with his thumb.

"It's a shock absorber," he explains. "Some men use chewing gum, others cigars or cigarettes to absorb nervous tension. I use my monoco."

Ernst Lubitsch and Henry Hathaway belong to the cigar school. Lubitsch always has one in his mouth during a "take," and can roll it from one cheek to the other, without using his hands. Hathaway, now directing "Spawn Of The North," employs a cigar as a conductor does a baton, agitating it violently to call forth a crescendo emotion from his players, or moving it delicately to the pianissimo of a love scene.

Cecil B. DeMille always has a pocket full of foreign gold coins, and holds one in his hand as he watches his actors do a scene. It is said that by watching the coin you can tell what he thinks of the acting. If he strokes it like a "feeling piece" of Chinese jade, he is satisfied; if he keeps rotating it, he thinks the scene is terrible.

James Hogan chews gum or matches. Wesley Ruggles keeps thumbing through the pages of his script, and on more than one occasion has ruined a "take" by making too much noise flopping the pages.

Mitchell Leisen lights one cigarette right after another, Robert Florey hugs his pipe bowl, Theodore Reed always has a pencil in his hand, and Frank Lloyd plunges his hands deep into his pockets and stands there with clenched fists.

Cowboys of Texas are Dudes of Range, Buck Jones States

Speaking as one tenderfoot to another, did you ever know that cowpunchers can spot which part of the country another cowboy comes from just by his "git-up"—the cut of his range garb and the way he wears the various items?

For instance, a Texas cowboy wears a different shaped ten-gallon headpiece than a California cowboy, and dents or rolls it differently.

Buck Jones, top flight Western star of the screen, for years a real range cowboy is the authority—and a good August 26th, 1938.

one—for this revelation on the significance of cowboy dudes.

Adding to this interesting Western lore, the screen star stated that the cowboys of Wyoming, Texas, Idaho, Colorado, and California all wear their bluejean levis or overalls turned up at different lengths. The Texas cowboy rolls his the highest. Buck attributes this to the fact that the Panhandle cowpoke is notoriously swank and dandish about his apparel.

"They usually go in for the most expensive hand-tooled boots, and wanting to show them off they turn their levis up higher than any other American cowpuncher," explained Buck.

From hat to boots the apparel of the cowboy varies with the traditions of the range he comes from, Buck averred. The California cowman even knots and wears his neckerchief at a different angle than any other. As to hats—some turn the brims of their hats full down in front as in Colorado—some wear the brim up saucer-fashion all around, and others, as among California range men, affect the brim rolled to a hard point in the front.

Chaparros or chaps worn by all cowboys on round-ups or on dress parade are different in each cattle-raising sector. Some like them long and flaring. Others wear them short and rather skimpy. In California the style trends toward plain tanned and tooled leather chaps. Again, the Texas cowman goes opposite. He likes the shaggy, sheepskin variety.

It Wasn't In The Script, But—

Experienced motion picture directors are quick to capitalise on incidents occurring during production which add to story development.

Many of them watch the progress of a picture, planning inclusion of scenes which are not in the script, but which are suggested by gags between players "ad-libbing," or by the nature of the story. They are "on top" of their picture all the time, watching carefully for production aids.

During the filming of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "Test Pilot," Victor Fleming glimpsed some off-stage foolery by Clark Gable and Spencer Tracy. The script called for a scene in a lingerie shop with the two stars purchasing a night-gown for Myrna Loy. It was rehearsed as written. Following rehearsal, Gable held the night-gown up against Tracy, saying, "Let's try it for size." The immediate burst of laughter from the entire company at sight of Tracy's face caused Fleming to include the scene in the picture. It won one of the biggest laughs at the preview showing.

In the same picture, Fleming capitalised on an aviation superstition, planning a bit of business which was not in the script, but which carried a tremendous wallop in front of an audience. Every time Gable took off for some dangerous flight, Tracy would stick chewing gum on the fuselage of his plane. The gum-sticking business was carefully built up to the climatic scene where Tracy goes up for his first test. In his excitement he throws the gum on the ground. The audience grasped the significance of the gesture, were justified in their gasps when the plane crashed and Tracy was killed.

Director H. C. Potter was watching a publicity man pose James Stewart for pictures peeling potatoes. Stewart, in army uniform, looked so natural peeling potatoes that Potter included the scene in "Shopworn Angel."

Having paid for the education and legal training of his brother, Bruce, with the idea that he shall become a lawyer, Frederick Garth, a racketeer posing as a big business man, is dismayed to find that Bruce has become a G-Man instead—and consequently a danger to himself. An action-packed drama, starring Don Terry with Jacqueline Wells and Robert Paige

"White-collar" Rackets

A HIGH-POWERED limousine drew up at the kerb in Eighth Avenue, New York City, opposite the tall Sherman Building, and a liveried chauffeur got down from it to open the door for his employer, Frederick Garth, who got out on to the pavement with some papers in his hand.

"Be here at twelve sharp, Jackson," said Fred, a very tall and very broad-shouldered man who was still on the right side of thirty, and whose clean-shaven face suggested strength of character, either for good or for bad. "I want to go to the printing plant."

"Yes, sir," nodded the chauffeur; and Fred crossed the pavement into the building, ignoring an impudent newsboy who tried to sell him a morning paper, and was swept up to the twenty-fourth floor in the cage of an elevator.

Twelve rooms on that floor were rented by him, but the one he entered was a general office, labelled on the frosted panel of its door, "Garth Investment Service."

A fair-haired man at a desk looked up to greet him.

"Good-morning, Morton," returned Fred, and he held out the papers. "Rush these air-mail."

"Yes, sir."

"Have you been able to locate Jennings?"

"He's waiting in your office," was the reply, "with Mr. Phillips."

Fred crossed to a door that bore the word, "Private," upon its long glass panel, and stepped into his own well-appointed room; whereupon Albert Jennings, a thick-lipped and bushy-browed fellow, slid off the edge of a very substantial desk and said rather nervously: "Hallo, boss—how are you?"

Frederick Garth's right fist smashed into his jaw and sent him sprawling upon his back, and then Fred turned to the other occupant of the room, long-nosed and lean of face, whose name was Clifford Phillips, but who was known as "Clip."

"How was that," he inquired, "any better?"

"Fair," returned Clip critically, "but you're still a little slow with that right cross."

"It's these new shoes," said Fred. "My foot slipped."

"Maybe you ought to cover the floor with canvas," suggested Clip, "and put a resin-box in the corner."

Fred looked down at Jennings, who was still on the carpet, holding his jaw.

"All right," he said curtly, "get up! On your way—report to Jonesy."

Jennings scrambled to his feet, his brown eyes wide with astonishment.

"You—you mean I'm not fired?" he stammered.

"Not yet," replied Fred. "I just wanted you to have a sample of what you'll get the next time you try holding out on any collections."

Jennings made for the door and disappeared.

"The cheap chiseller!" exploded Clip.

"Yeah," Fred delivered a right cross that was quite perfect—and Clip went down with a thud practically where Jennings had fallen before him.

"What's the big idea?" he howled, sitting up and rubbing his chin.

"That was for letting Jennings get away with his chiselling."

Clip rose to his feet.

"Some day you're going to bounce one o' those off a guy that will lut back," he said, his voice comparatively mild, but his eyes blazing.

"Yeah?" drawled Fred. "I never get the best out of a man until he knows who's boss. If I'd handed you that one a month ago you'd have caught Jennings before I did. Come on, let's make the rounds."

He hung his hat on a peg, and they went out across the corridor into a room where a girl was busy at a switchboard, and out of that room into a very large one full of desks and the confused sound of many voices. At every desk a man was seated, and every man was either talking into a telephone or waiting for a number.

Fred, with Clip Phillips at his elbow, went from desk to desk. One of his "enterprises" consisted of bookmaking on a large scale, and the men were dealing with bets.

"That long shot, Chicago, is getting a heavy play," a man with the curious nickname of "Numbers" glanced up to say. "One o' those tipsheet hunches."

"Lay it off," said Fred.

At another desk he glanced over an employee's shoulder at a sheet less than half-filled with names and figures.

"What's the matter with Kansas City?" he asked.

"It's just before harvest there," was the reply. "In about two weeks they'll be coming through good."

"They ought to do better than that!"

Get Rocky on the wire and jack him up."

From the room devoted to book-making Fred proceeded to one in which various "white-collar" rackets (to use an expression of his own) were conducted. Men in that room were appealing, by telephone, for contributions to funds which existed mainly for his own benefit. He paused beside the desk of a venerable looking old fellow who had a telephone to his ear, a pencil in his hand, and a sheet of names, addresses, and telephone numbers in front of him, and this is what he heard:

"Hallo, Mr. Sanderson? This is Professor Atterbury. Perhaps you are unfamiliar with my name, but I know you are in sympathy with my cause. Two very dear friends of yours suggested I call you—Dr. Prescott, and the Reverend Mark Morgan. They are very enthusiastic supporters of a charity I'm heading; the 'World Association for International Peace.' They were certain you would welcome the opportunity of joining them as contributors to our fund. Dr. Prescott contributed fifty dollars, and— Oh, thank you, Mr. Sanderson. One hundred? Thank you, Mr. Sanderson."

"Nice work, professor," said Fred, and moved on to another desk at which an ugly fellow, who looked like a prize-fighter, was saying:

"Hallo, Jorgy, dis is Kid Lacey. You heard about Batl'n' Johnny Grogan? He took de long count, last night, yeah. Dey found him in a flop-house as stiff as a mackerel, widout a dime in his pocket. I been tryin' to get enough together to bury de guy, and I still gotta raise fifty bucks. What say? Dai's swell! I'll send a kid right over to pick it up."

"Business good this morning?" questioned Fred, as the ex-boxer put down the telephone to make an entry on a sheet of paper.

"Oh, swell," Kid Lacey declared. "I raised enough already to bury every pork-and-beaner between here and Frisco!"

"Well, keep punching."

On the other side of the room, Fred listened for a while to the soft voice of a military-looking man who hailed from Virginia and was known as the "Colonel." He was coaxing people into promising contributions towards the erecting of a memorial in a far-away town which never would be built.

In the next room to be visited, Fred called three men away from their desks to a tall window.

"Have you got the new lay-out?" he said to Clip Phillips, who joined him there.

"I'll get it."

Clip disappeared, presently to return with a number of folders.

"You men can quit raising that defence fund," said Fred. "I've got a new racket for you."

"What is it?" inquired one of the three.

"The Society for Keeping America American." Hand out the lists, Clip."

The three received a folder apiece, and Fred took another and opened it.

"Opposite these names," he said, "you'll find each man's pet peeve listed. That's what you'll hammer on. Take, for instance, Robert Amerson here, anti-anarchist. Tell him the society is for the purpose of driving the anarchists out of America."

He ran a finger down a list.

"Here's another one—Louis Prentice, tax evasion. Tell him it's for the purpose of checking up on tax dodgers."

He laughed as he fastened on another name.

"William Corbett, pet peeve— August 29th, 1938.

racketeers. Tell him it's for the purpose of wiping out men like us! D'you get it, boys?"

The "boys" assured him that they had got it. One of them declared that it ought to be worth fifty thousand dollars.

"Okay," said Fred, "go to it! Clip, you'd better stay here and check up on the first few calls. Make sure they have the right idea. See you later."

He gave Clip back the folder he had used, and he walked off into yet another room. The men in it were of a commoner type than those he had just entrusted with the new racket, but they were quite well dressed.

"Finish up your 'phone calls," he said, addressing them collectively from the doorway. "I've something I want to tell you."

Possibly, in order to impress his employer, one of them—a thin and melancholy-looking man, very aptly known as "Shifty"—lingered at his desk to finish a conversation he had begun.

"And, Marty, these tickets are so good that even the promoter would think they was real! You can get any price you ask, because the fight's a sell-out. Yeah, one buck a ticket, but you've gotta take a hundred. Okay, I'll send 'em over—"

"Come on!" cried Fred impatiently. "Come on, make it snappy!"

Seven men gathered round him at one of the desks.

"I've just gone over the month's report," he informed them, "and you fellows are below your quota."

"Business is bad this time o' the year," protested Shifty.

"Yeah?" Fred motioned to an assistant who had just entered with a big parcel to place it on the desk. "Pittsburgh, St. Louis, and Portland are all doing all right. Even the Boston crew is ahead of you. Now, listen, we've got a printing plant as near perfect as money can make it. We're turning out the highest grade of 'trini' paper in the country. You men have the best territory, and what do you bring me? Excuses!"

He eyed them in turn.

"Well, I'm sick of excuses!" he barked. "I want action, and I'm going to get it, or you'll find yourselves out in the sticks!"

He pointed to the parcel which the assistant had opened.

"Now, here's your quota for the next thirty days, and you'd better see that it's all moved. Five thousand tickets to the police benefit, and they're so good you can sell 'em to the cops! Four thousand dupe theatre tickets, and two thousand Gasoline Company credit cards."

"The service stations are checking up on those phoney credit cards," complained one of the seven.

"This is a new company," returned Fred. "The railroad and the street car passes, as well as the cigar coupons, will stay the same as last month." He produced a little book in paper covers from his coat-pocket. "Look at that!"

Seven pairs of eyes stared at the book.

"Lottery tickets?" suggested Shifty.

"Yeah, tickets for the Irish Sweepstake—and they're so good you could put them beside the real article and couldn't tell the difference! Do you realise that over seven million dollars went out of this country to Ireland for the last sweep? It's a crime! I want these books in every pool-room, cigar-stand, and beer-joint from New York to San Diego, from Seattle to Key West. And I want you to sell more in this city than any two other cities put together. Happy will give you the rates. That's all."

He was on his way out from the room when a smartly dressed young fellow intercepted him.

"Say, Mr. Gath, I've been looking all over for you. Can I see you alone for a minute?"

"Well, come on, make it snappy."

Fred led the way into a small and untenanted room.

"I want to talk to you about that programme for the Society Hospital Benefit," said the young man, who went by the name of "Dressy" amongst the rest of the staff. "Here's the sample I'm going to show Mrs. Graham—I thought you might like to take a look at it first."

Fred sat down at a desk with a dummy programme, its blank pages marked off with prices for advertisements of different sizes.

"These what you told her we'd charge for space?" he asked.

"That's the lay-out," Dressy replied. "One hundred dollars for a full page, seventy-five for a half, fifty a quarter, and thirty-five for an eighth."

"That ought to satisfy her," commented Fred. "And what do we really charge?"

"Here, it's right here." Dressy produced another dummy programme, marked with very different prices.

"Five hundred dollars a full page, three-seventy-five a half, two-fifty for a quarter, and a hundred and seventy-five an eighth."

"That will do."

"These Society dames are harder to see than the President," declared Dressy, "but when I told her we'd solicit all the advertising and print the programme at cost—"

Clip Phillips entered the room just as a telephone-bell rang.

"Answer that!" said Fred.

It was Morton on the telephone, calling from the general office. Fred rose and went to the instrument, whereupon Dressy whispered to Clip:

"Why does he play around with these chicken-feed Society programmes?"

"Aw, he's tryin' to muscle in on the social register!" scoffed Clip. "This stuff gives him an intro—"

"Now, get those rolling," Fred said, putting down the telephone, "and see to it that you sell every sucker on that list you've got!"

"Yeah," added Clip, "or you might get a few teeth knocked down your throat!"

Fred went out from the room into a corridor and along the corridor to the general office.

"What's up?" he questioned Morton.

"A man's in your room," replied the clerk.

"What's he doing in there?"

"I don't know, sir. He brushed past me before I could stop him."

Clip, who had followed Fred, arrived in time to hear that.

"Probably some smart cop, nosing through your papers," he growled. "I always said you oughta have a couple o' guards here."

"Yeah?" Fred was scornful. "I might as well hang a sign on the door telling the world exactly what business I'm in! You come in with me."

Bruce Provides a Shock

VERY little of the invader was visible when Fred opened the door of his room, but it was evident enough that he was sitting in Fred's own chair behind the desk. Apparently he was reading a newspaper, and the newspaper concealed all of him except the two hands that held it.

Fred strode towards the desk, and as he did so the newspaper was dropped, and his eyes widened at sight of a young fellow of about twenty-three, dark-haired and brown-eyed like himself, but of slighter build, who said smilingly:

"Hallo, Fred!"

"Bruce!" exclaimed Fred delightedly, and he sped round the desk to clap a hand upon the young man's shoulder.

"Bruce! You're a sight for sore eyes!" "You're not so hard to look at yourself!" was the prompt rejoinder, and Fred looked across the desk at Clip.

"Okay," he said. "You can go, Clip—this is my brother."

Clip went, and Bruce Garth deserted the chair he had appropriated, but was immediately pushed down into it again.

"You old son-of-a-gun, where have you been hiding?" demanded Fred affectionately. "No letters—nothing!"

"Oh, I've been pretty busy, Fred!" said Bruce. "And, besides, I wanted to surprise you."

"Well, tell me all about everything," Fred perched on a corner of the desk. "How's Philadelphia?"

"Sleeping peacefully the last time I saw it. Say, you've got quite a place here."

"Like it?"

"I should say I do. I'd no idea there was so much money in the investment business."

"H'mm, that and other things! I own a printing plant, too."

"Well," laughed Bruce, "I've always said there should be one successful man in every family."

"Oh, you haven't seen anything yet! I've got something I've been waiting a long time to show you. Come on!"

They went out into the corridor and entered a room a little way beyond the elevator—a sunny room, attractively furnished, and in every way complete and ready for occupation, except that shelves set in two niches were bare.

"Well, how d'you like it?" asked Fred with a wave of his hand.

"It's fine, Fred," replied Bruce, "but I don't understand—"

"This is your office."

"Mine?"

Astonishment was writ large all over the handsome, clean-shaven face, but the astonishment was mingled with something very like dismay.

"It's been waiting ever since you finished law school," his brother informed him.

"You mean you've had this all the time that—"

"All the time you've been in Philadelphia," Fred completed.

"But, Fred, I—"

"Oh, I didn't mind waiting!" Fred spread his hands. "You'll find everything here but the law books. I didn't know just which ones you'd want, but if you'll make out a list I'll have them here by morning."

"Fred, I don't understand. This is all too—"

"Come here!" Bruce was marched round the desk and pushed into the arm-chair behind it, which had been provided for him. "I've been planning this for a long time, kid. You're going to be my lawyer—handle all my business."

"Just a minute—"

Bruce started to rise.

"Sit down!" said Fred. "I need a lawyer—a smart lawyer—one I know I can trust. And you're it!"

But Bruce shook his head.

"I appreciate it, Fred," he said. "Really I do. But I can't accept it."

"Nonsense!"

"No, wait." Bruce deserted the chair. "I let you put me through school. I let you give me everything I needed, and more. Well, from now on I'm going to stand on my own feet, and I'm going to pay you back every penny I've cost you. Can't you understand that?"

He held out his hands almost imploringly, but Fred said:

"I understand just one thing. I need you. I've done fairly well. I've built a strong organisation, made some money. Now, with your help, we can really go places. I haven't told you the set-up, because I wanted you to learn every angle of the legal profession. That's why I didn't say anything when you went into Judge Frazer's office. I know you'd learn a lot there. I knew you'd make contacts that would help us both."

Bruce gulped.

"Fred," he said unhappily, "I haven't been in Judge Frazer's office."

"What d'you mean?"

Fred gaped at him.

"I haven't even been in Philadelphia. I've been in Washington, training for a different kind of a job."

From a breast pocket he produced a tiny leather case and opened it. Inside was a metal badge, inscribed "Federal Bureau of Investigation. U.S. Dept of Justice." Frederick Garth's face became almost distorted with horror after one glance at it.

"A G-man?" he gasped.

"That's right," said Bruce.

"You mean you're giving up a legal career to wear a tin badge and work for pennies?"

"You can call it that if you want—"

"What else can I call it?"

"I call it giving up a life of 'afore-saids' and 'whereases' to do something worth while. I've been finding out facts, Fred—facts that the average business man like you never thinks about. This country is overrun with crime. Rackets flourish that make the liquor gangs of Prohibition days look like kids at a Sunday-school picnic."

Fred turned away lest his face should betray him; but his brother went on impressively:

"Right now there are men—if you can call them men—that are using fake charities as their cloak to swindle millions of dollars yearly from worthy causes. Talk about stealing from children! The men I'm speaking about, the scum, are taking money that ordinarily would go to hospitals and crippled kids, and people that really need it."

Fred mastered his emotions sufficiently to face Bruce again.

"You've been taken in by that sob-stuff, kid," he said gruffly. "The old newspaper scare."

"That's what too many people think," Bruce retorted. "but I happen to know that it's the truth."

"Well, suppose it is?" countered Fred. "There are plenty of other men to play hero. I need you to—"

"Sorry, Fred, but I'd rather be back of this badge than the biggest desk in the biggest law office in this town."

"Okay, kid, if that's the way you feel about it, go ahead." Fred drew a long breath. "Play cops and robbers. Maybe some day you'll come to your senses."

The door of the room was opened, and Bruce put away his badge in haste as a very beautiful girl in a dark frock put her head round it to inquire:

"May I come in?"

"Certainly," welcomed Fred, whose eyes had lit up at sight of her, and she walked into the room, a leather satchel under one arm and a slip of paper in her hand.

"Morty told me I'd find you here," she said, and held out the slip of paper, which was a cheque. "All I want is your autograph, Fred."

Fred took the cheque.

"Marjory," he said, "this is my brother Bruce. Bruce, this is Marjory Drake."

Bruce murmured a "How d'you do?" gazing with undisguised appreciation at beauty.

Frederick Garth's face became almost distorted with horror after one glance at the metal badge. "A G-Man?" he gasped.

"So you're the chap who caused me so much trouble!" she laughed.

"Trouble?" echoed Bruce in bewilderment.

"Yes," she nodded. "I helped Fred choose the furnishings for this office. How do you like it?"

"He doesn't like it at all," said Fred bitterly.

"I didn't say that," protested Bruce.

"I think it's swell."

"But he won't move in," said Fred.

"He prefers to—"

"Get a well-earned rest before he settles down to work," Bruce swiftly completed; and Marjory's hazel eyes were turned reproachfully upon him.

"Do you mean that Fred has had all this trouble for nothing?" she asked.

"I'm afraid so. You see, I'd made other plans, and—well—"

"Keep it dusted, Fred," she broke in brightly. "If my charity work piles up, I'll sub-let it!"

"Oh, do you go in for charity work?" asked Bruce.

"My aunt does," she replied.

"And all the heavy work falls on Marjory's shoulders," Fred added.

"Oh, I really like it!" she declared.

"Speaking of charities, by the by, will you sign that cheque, please? Morton made it out. It covers the money you collected for the hazaar programme."

Fred went to the desk to sign the cheque. Bruce said to Marjory, with a note of real regret in his voice:

"I'm sorry I won't be using this office. It really looks great. You must have worked very hard."

"Oh, think nothing of it!" she returned lightly. "I really enjoyed doing it."

Fred came back from the desk, whereupon Bruce stated that he must be going.

"Is the bazaar to-night?" asked Fred.

"Yes, of course it is," Marjory replied. "And with five thousand last-minute details to attend to, I'm afraid I'd better be running along." She offered her hand to Bruce. "It's been nice meeting you."

"I'll see you to your car," he said, holding the hand as though reluctant to part with it. "Dinner to-night, Fred?"

"It's a date," declared his brother.

"We'll both see you at the bazaar, Marjory."

She put the cheque away in the satchel, and she and Bruce went out together.

Tapped Wires!

THE charity bazaar, organised mainly by Marjory—though her aunt enjoyed all the credit for it—was held in the extensive grounds of the Drake residence at Far Harkaway, on Long Island. The stallkeepers were all members of Society, male and female, but the side-shows were run by show people and had been hired for the occasion.

The grounds were thronged, the stalls and side-shows were besieged by the cream of Long Island society, and Fred and his brother spent nearly half an hour trying to find Marjory before they ran into her—Bruce in a literal sense.

Immaculately arrayed in evening clothes, they were squeezing their way past a stall when she came out from behind it with a pile of boxes of chocolates in her arms that reached right up to her chin and she and Bruce collided.

Down she showered the boxes all over the grass at his feet, and he heard the voice of the girl for whom he and his brother were looking.

"Oh, I beg your pardon!" she cried.

"Hallo, there!" exclaimed Bruce.

August 20th, 1938.

"We've been looking everywhere for you," said Fred.

"Did you win all these?" inquired Bruce, as he stooped to gather up the boxes.

"Heavens, no!" she laughed. "I'm the hired help around here. They're for the randy booth."

"They should equip you with a wheelbarrow," said Fred.

"Or two strong men," said she pointedly; and the two strong men carried the boxes for her to a covered stall, where one of the girls in charge of it received them gladly.

"And now," said Bruce, "you're elected to be our personal guide for the rest of the evening."

"Oh, I'm sorry, but I can't possibly," Marjory protested. "I've got a hundred and one things to do."

"The other hundred can wait," said Fred.

"Yes," said Bruce, and dared to catch hold of her arm. "Do you come willingly, or must we use force? We're known as the gory Garths where we come from!"

"Well, I seem to be outnumbered," she sighed, as Fred caught hold of her other arm. But the sigh was only a make-believe one, and she was a very willing captive.

They visited the side-shows, and at one of them they threw little hoops at articles ranged on shelves, and she won an alarm clock.

"Say, you must have played this game before!" exclaimed Bruce.

"What do you want with an alarm clock?" inquired Fred.

The clock was left at a stall for sale to anyone who fancied it, and they proceeded to seek amusement elsewhere.

Marjory had won a bowl of goldfish by choosing "13" on a sort of roulette board, when another girl came running up to her, crying:

"Marjory, your aunt wants to see you! They're having trouble at the dance-floor ticket booth!"

"Where is she?" asked Marjory.

"On the terrace," was the reply.

"You'll have to excuse me," Marjory informed her captors.

"We will not," said Bruce firmly.

"We'll go with you," said Fred; and they went with her.

On the way back to New York, at a fairly late hour that night, Fred said to his brother:

"So you had a good time, eh?"

"Oh, a grand time!" Bruce declared.

"Do you run around much with that crowd?"

"No," Fred shook his head. "Why?"

"Oh, I was just thinking your investment service and your printing-press business must be mighty profitable to allow you to afford that gang of play-mates."

"If you'd give up that G-man idea and come in with me," said Fred.

"We'd both be able to play around with anyone we chose."

"Sorry, Fred, but I'm still not interested."

The high-powered limousine in which they were travelling had covered another couple of miles before either of them spoke again. Then Bruce said rather dreamily:

"Nice girl, that Marjory."

"They don't come any better!" asserted Fred with enthusiasm.

Bruce stayed with his brother that night at his luxurious flat in West Fifty-seventh Street, but next day he acquired a cheaper and less elaborate flat for himself nearly up in the Bronx, and the two brothers met only occasionally during a whole fortnight that followed.

One morning, at the end of that fortnight, Bruce was at the wheel of a small motor-van and was driving slowly up Eighth Avenue when a man who was sitting beside him motioned to him to pull up outside the Sherman building.

The van, according to an inscription on its sides, was the property of the Central Telephone Company, and both Bruce and his companion might well have passed for linesmen: they were wearing leather jackets and dungarees. Both, however, were G-men—and they were on the trail of racketeers.

"Well, what have we here?" asked Bruce, as he ran the van to the kerb and braked.

Theodore Neale, his colleague, a bulky fellow with a fat face and a pair of slightly bulbous blue eyes, picked up a box from between his feet and prepared to alight.

"Well," he said, "we've got a couple o' firms, one using twenty-eight phones and the other sixteen. We can check 'em on the terminals in the basement."

Bruce did not mention the fact that his brother had offices in the building.

"Maybe," he commented, "this is our lucky place."

"You've been sayin' that twenty times a day for two weeks now!" retorted Neale.

"Well, we're bound to be right some time," said Bruce, "if we keep this up long enough."

"Sure," drawled the pessimist, "what's forty or fifty years to a couple o' guys like us?" He descended to the pavement.

"Hi, it's your turn to lug in the equipment. I'll run in and get the janitor to open up."

"Okay."

Theodore Neale disappeared into the building, and just then a limousine drew up behind the van and its chauffeur got down to open the door for Fred, who said to him:

"I'll call you, Jackson, when I want you."

Bruce got out from the van, but he did not reach into it for the box because his brother was staring at him.

Instead, he said calmly:

"Hallo, Fred!"

"What's the gag?" demanded Fred, looking from him to the van and back again. "What are you doing here?"

"Oh, part of our work," said Bruce.

"Tell you about it later."

"Why not now?"

"Business before pleasure," Bruce fished out the box. "So-long, Fred."

He left his brother on the pavement and entered the building. From the hall he descended to the basement, where the janitor had unlocked and opened the door of a room which contained the main frame of all the tenants' telephone wires.

Neale was there and took the box, and presently was clipping the wires of a head-phone to various wires on the frame. It was after he had tapped a number of lines that his fat face lit up with satisfaction, and Bruce immediately inquired:

"Got something?"

"S-s-sh!"

Bruce waited in silence for the better part of a minute.

"What is it?" he asked then.

"Somebody cadging a donation for a cancer-cure foundation," Neale replied, and he slipped off the head-phone. "That's funny—the line went dead, just like that." He snapped a finger against a thumb.

Fred had ascended to the twenty-fourth floor by elevator almost as soon as Bruce had reached the basement, and he had summoned all the members of his staff to one of the big rooms.

"No more 'phone calls from here!" he said incisively. "Understand? We're moving! Everybody clean up your papers, each man's responsible for his own desk. You, Eddie, take care of the files. You, Jonesy, clean up the 'triu' paper. Cut those direct-track wires and pull out the inter-office communicators. Naw, get busy, everybody! I want this place emptied in minutes!"

The men hurried off to carry out his instructions; but Clip remained.

"Who got on to us?" he asked.

"Never mind," snapped Fred, and handed him a slip of paper on which addresses were written. "Here's where the new stuff goes. Sob-room boys will go down to Slaver Street. The bookies, Brant Avenue. The 'paper-hangers' will headquarter on Burlington Avenue."

Clip studied the addresses, two of which were in Jersey City, and one in Brooklyn.

"When did you line up these joints?" he questioned curiously.

"Months ago, just in case. Now get going!"

Down at the main frame in the basement Theodore Neale had tapped other lines associated with the twenty-fourth floor, but to no purpose.

"Dead as a door-nail!" he complained. "I'm goin' up there!"

"Wait a minute," said Bruce. "Let me see that list of firms."

Neale handed over a card. "Twenty-fourth floor, eh?" Bruce bit his lip.

"D'you know them?" asked Neale. "I know a chap who has an office on the same floor."

"Well, let's get going."

"No," Bruce shook his head. "If the two of us were to go up there it would create suspicion. I'm going up alone to smell around, and maybe I can find out about the others."

"Okay," Neale picked up the head-phone. "I'll stay here and check."

Vanished!

ON the twenty-fourth floor, Bruce walked into the general office labelled "Garth Investment Service," and he said to Morton:

"Is Mr. Garth in? I'm his brother."

"Oh, yes, certainly." The fair-haired clerk had not recognised him at first because of his clothes, but he turned immediately to a dictograph. "Mr. Garth, your brother to see you. Yes, sir." He looked up at Bruce. "Go right in, please."

Bruce entered his brother's room to find Marjory in there, looking very businesslike in a chair at the side of the desk behind which Fred was seated. He would have backed out again, but Marjory greeted him and Fred told him to come in.

"I didn't know you were busy," said Bruce, "or I wouldn't have bothered you."

"We're just about finished."

"Well, don't let me disturb you. I'd take a look round outside."

"No, no!" cried Fred. "No, wait, Bruce! Come on over and talk to us. There you are." He pointed to a chair. "Sit down."

Bruce hesitated, but Marjory assured him that she was leaving almost immediately.

"I only dropped in for a moment," she said. "Is that what the well-dressed idler is wearing this season?"

She was looking at his leather jacket and dungarees.

"Oh, these are my hunting togs," he informed her; and she, having no idea that the words bore a double meaning, laughed at what she took to be a jest.

"That's the kind of evidence we can take to court!" Preston exulted. "How many more records have you?"

"Marjory's lined up some more charity programmes for me to print," explained Fred.

"You do quite a lot of that, don't you?" asked Bruce.

"A bit."

"He does more than any other printer in town," declared Marjory. "It's a shame the way he lets people impose on him, particularly me."

"Don't look so guilty," chaffed Fred. "I always charge you for the cost of the materials."

"That's the smallest part of it!" she retorted. "How about the preliminary work—planning the programme, soliciting all the advertising?" She sat bolt upright. "Say, why don't you let me do that for you? On all your charity work?"

"I wouldn't think of it," Fred replied.

"Why not? I'd feel that I was really accomplishing something."

"She's certainly in a position to contact the right people," said Bruce.

"Of course I am!"

Fred said that he would have to think it over.

"Think it over nothing!" Bruce retorted. "You're hired, young lady. Are you still paying rent for that office I turned down, Fred?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"It's yours!" Bruce gave the room to Marjory with a gesture, then grinned at his brother. "Any arguments?"

"Well," began Fred dubiously, "I—"

"It's all settled, then!" Bruce addressed Marjory in the manner of an employer. "Report for work to-morrow morning, and if he doesn't treat you right let me know."

"I will," she promised laughingly.

"He won't be sorry, really."

"Sorry?" scoffed Bruce. "He's tickled to death!"

She rose and gathered up some papers.

"Then we can discuss these to-morrow in my office," she said impishly.

"So now I'll be on my way."

"Well," said Fred, "don't forget that as long as you work for me your time is mine."

"Only eight hours a day," corrected Bruce. "I lay first claim to her evenings."

"I'll fire her!"

"Go ahead—I'll hire her!"

"Gentlemen, please!" cried Marjory. "I love a battle, but I can't stay to watch one. Won't you both come to dinner one evening this week?"

"We'd love to," chirruped Bruce,

"only Fred's going to be too busy."

"I'm not going to be busy at all!" averred Fred.

"Then prove it!" she challenged.

"Seven o'clock Thursday?"

"Fine!"

"It's a date," Bruce confirmed.

"Good-bye, boss." She sailed away to the door, and Bruce went with her to open it. But after she had gone the light manner Fred had adopted deserted him.

"Well, kid, what's on your mind?" he asked almost stiffly.

"Those neighbours of yours down the corridor," said Bruce.

"What neighbours?"

Bruce consulted the card he had taken from Neale.

"The Beauty Weave Hosiery Company, and the Melo Wax Products, Limited. Do you know anything about them?"

Those names were on the doors of several rooms that opened on to the corridors of the floor and were rented by Fred—though not in his own name. But he shook his head.

"No," he said, "I never pay any attention to the other tenants. Why?"

"Oh, just curiosity."

"Do you suspect them of something?"

"I suspect a lot of people, Fred."

"In that case," said Fred dryly, "maybe I'd better watch my step. Some of you smart G-men will come in and want to look at my ledgers here." He pushed a box across the desk. "Have a cigar?"

"No, thanks." Bruce looked at him strangely. "Come to think of it, you would make a good suspect. You have a comparatively new firm, evidently earning a pot of money, and your offices are near definite suspects. Besides that, Fred, the telephone lines we were listening on downstairs went dead a few minutes after you entered the building."

Fred raised his brows.

"You must be running very short on suspects," he said; and then, quite seriously: "Listen, kid, supposing you did find out that I was running a racket. What would you do about it?"

"You know that as well as I do!"

Fred picked up a pen and dropped it again.

"I see," he said, and looked his brother straight in the eyes. "Well, if I ever have to be arrested, I'd just as soon you took the bows for catching me."

"I don't want those sort of bows, Fred," said Bruce gravely. "You're the last guy in the world I'd ever want to pinch. I guess you know that." He looked at his wrist-watch. "Well, I'd better be going, or my partner will be wondering what's happened to me."

"Supposing I pick you up on Thursday evening?" suggested Fred.

"I'll give you a ring," said Bruce. "So long, Fred."

He went out through the general office into the corridor, but instead of crossing the corridor to one of the elevators, he passed along it to the door of the big room in which the professor and others had worked.

Fred was peeping out from his own room as he turned the handle and slipped into the room. According to the sign on the door it was one of the offices of Melo Wax Products, Limited, but it was untenanted, and empty drawers were piled upon deserted desks.

Bruce visited other rooms, but they were all dismantled and unoccupied. He rejoined Theodore Neale in the basement, and about three hours afterwards the motor-van was in a yard off Wall Street, and they were in a room on one of the upper floors of the Treasury Building in that thoroughfare, talking to Robert Preston, the keen-eyed chief of all the G-men who operated from the Department of Justice there.

"Don't tell me they vanished into thin air!" barked Preston.

"We couldn't find a trace of them," lamented Neale.

"But their papers, their equipment, their furniture—"

"They left most of the furniture," Bruce broke in, "but they took a few filing-cabinets down in the freight elevator."

"Then the elevator operator must have seen them."

"He did," said Bruce. "But only as far as the ground floor. They carried the stuff out to the alley at the back of the building themselves."

"And we've checked with all the moving and trucking companies," put in Neale.

"They must have used their own cars," Preston decided. "Could they have heard a sound of any kind when you were tapping their lines?"

"No, sir," Neal was emphatic.

"Then what tipped them off?"

August 29th, 1938.

"Well, I don't know—but maybe they won't be so lucky next time."

"They'd better not be! You keep on with your listening until further orders. They're still at it, and I'm going to get that bunch if we have to tap every 'phone wire in the city!"

On the Trail

FOR the next fortnight, Bruce and Neale spent most of their time in manholes below the pavements of the city, or perched on telephone poles in the city's outskirts. They arrived, one morning, with their van at the base of a huge pole at the corner of Shaver Street, Brooklyn, and Concord Street, and they fastened safety belts round their waists preparatory to climbing.

Neale preceded Bruce, and as he mounted he became vocal:

"So I say to myself, 'Theodore—I always call me by my maiden name—I says, 'Theodore, are you gonna spend your life in a rat? No! You're gonna be a G-man and live a life of romance and adventure.' So I became a Special Agent, and what happens? I live one half of my life in manholes, and the other half sittin' on top of telephone poles trying to be a woodpecker!"

He looked down at Bruce.

"Here, you can start decoring the Christmas-tree now! I hope you can stand the altitude! We're gonna find out what Mrs. Crossmeyer is orderin' from the butcher!"

He reached a little platform, high up on the pole, and Bruce joined him there. Each was carrying a portable telephone equipment slung over a shoulder.

"Here, you flatten your ears," said Neale, "mine's cauliflowered."

Bruce put on a headphone, a wire was tapped, and suddenly a tense expression appeared on his face.

"What are you lookin' so serious about?" demanded Neale. "Something comin' through?"

Something was coming through the professor's voice was in Bruce's ears.

"Yes, Mr. Macdonald, your old friend Major Duncan suggested I call you in regard to our Foundation to discover a cure for cancer."

"We'd better get down," said Bruce. "This is what we've been looking for—cancer cure racket!"

"Boy," rejoiced Neale, "if I were any place else I'd turn a handspring!" He looked round at the buildings in the vicinity of the pole. "Say, listen, if we could rent a room around here some place I could run a lead into it."

"You get to work," said Bruce. "I'll arrange for the room."

They descended the pole, and it was not very long before Bruce had found a semi-underground room to let at the bottom of an area, associated with a tenement house. He interviewed an agent, and after a somewhat hurried meal he and Neale took possession of the room.

Wires were run from the line that had been tapped down through the area and in at the top of a window, and in the gloom of the room these were connected with an electrical recorder, something like a gramophone in appearance.

All through the rest of the day they listened and recorded till the professor's voice was no longer heard; and next morning they were at it again, the recorder this time attached to another pair of wires.

"How are you doing, fellow?" Neale inquired towards noon.

"They must have collected three thousand dollars or more this morning," Bruce informed him.

"Oh, boy, will Preston be glad to hear that?"

"You said it!"

Late in the afternoon, Bruce set off for the Department of Justice, dressed in his own clothes and carrying a parcel of disc records; and Robert Preston listened to the records through a headphone as they revolved upon an electrical reproducer.

"That's the kind of evidence we can take to court!" he exulted. "How many more records have you?"

"Twenty-three when I left," Bruce replied, "and Neale was still recording."

"You've studied the premises, of course. Is there any particular time of day when all the men are in the place?"

"We caught a telephone call from a man who told them he'd pay them off at nine to-night," said Bruce. "He didn't identify himself, but he sounded like the head man."

"To-night at nine?" Preston removed the headphone and beamed at his informant. "We'll clamp down then! Get back to your hide-out and keep on recording. Call me every hour to make sure there's no slip up. I'll have a raiding party prepared."

Bruce went back to the basement room, but at eight o'clock that night the pangs of hunger assailed him and his colleague, and they repaired to an underground place of refreshment, almost next door, known as Finn's Café.

They had chosen that very modest establishment not merely because it was near, but also as the result of a telephone conversation they had intercepted; and they were at a table with high partitions on either side of it, and had finished their meal, when Fred descended the outside steps with a satchel under his arm and walked up to a long counter behind which the proprietor was serving customers who preferred to perch on stools.

"Hallo, Finn," he said, "has Clip Phillips been around?"

Charlie Finn, a tall and flaxen-haired Swede, shook his head.

"He has no come in to-night yet," he stated.

"Well, when he comes in tell him I'll be in the usual booth."

"All right, Mr. Garth."

Fred made straight for the table next to the one at which Bruce and Neale were sitting—a table in a secluded corner—and he caught sight of them as he was about to pass and stopped short with startled eyes.

"Well, hallo!" he exclaimed.

"Hallo, Fred," returned Bruce, none too pleased at having been discovered.

"What are you doing here?"

"Contracting ptomaine, I think! Meet my partner, Theodore Neale. This is my brother Frederick."

Fred sat down at the table, and he saw that the two had been eating. He came to the conclusion that their presence might be accidental.

"By the way," said Bruce, "what are you doing in a dump like this?"

"Oh, business," Fred replied. "Told a fellow I'd meet him here. How's trouble-shooting?"

"All right. How's Marjory?"

"Fine. She said you'd 'phoned her several times."

"Tell her I'll be around to see her soon."

"I will." Fred returned to the subject his brother seemed to have no desire to discuss. "You getting that trouble all cleared up?"

"A bit."

Clip Phillips had entered the café, and at that moment he reached the table.

"Been waiting long, boss?" he inquired.

"No." Fred got to his feet. "Well, here's my man," he said to Bruce and his companion, "I have to be on my way. Glad to have met you, Neale."

He and Clip went off together, and on the steps outside the front door of the café Fred handed over the satchel.

"Here's the pay-roll," he said. "Take my car and park it a block beyond the Luster-Glo Building. Stall the men until I get there."

"What's up?" asked Clip.

"Get going—I'll tell you later."

Clip got into the limousine that was standing at the kerb near the corner of Shaver Street, and the limousine shot off round the corner; but Fred went no further than a doorway from which he could keep an eye on Finn's Café.

He had been in the doorway less than two minutes when Bruce looked at his wrist-watch and said to Neale:

"Time we 'phoned in."

"Right," said Neale, and they paid for their meal and sauntered out from the café and along the pavement to the steps that led down to their retreat.

Fred stole after them, and as soon as they had disappeared into the basement room he crept down to the area and flattened himself against a wall under the arch of the steps that led up from the pavement to the front door of the tenement house.

He heard Bruce say into a telephone: "Hallo, Preston? Garth and Neale reporting. Just back from dinner. All set for nine o'clock? Fine! We'll meet you about eight fifty-five, The Luster-Glo Varnish Company."

The Gothic Press

THE Luster-Glo Varnish Company had no real existence. The name figured on a list of tenants attached to a wall in the hall of a fairly big building in Shaver Street, and it was painted on the panels of two doors on the second floor, but behind one door was a small office in which a clerk kept up appearances for the benefit of strangers who really thought they could order varnish there, and behind the other was the so-called "sob-room," in which the professor and the colonel and all the rest of the men engaged in Fred's charity rackets had continued their activities after leaving Eighth Avenue in a hurry.

By half-past eight Fred was in this second room, and all the men in it were grouped round him.

"Now get this," he said with dramatic abruptness, "the Federal Bureau has got this sob-room spotted! They're going to raid it to-night!"

His words created panic.

"Let's get out of here!" shouted one of the men, and several of them started towards the door.

"Wait a minute!" roared Fred. "Stay here! Listen to me! There'll be plenty of time for you to get out—if you want to!"

Kid Lacey, who had been about to open the door, returned from it to question in astonishment:

"What d'you mean if we want to?"

"Just this," Fred replied. "They chased us out of our other place, now they've located us once more. We could vanish again, but it would be the same story in another month. That's why I want them to find just enough men working here to fool them into thinking that they've wiped out the whole racket. Understand? Those of you who want to stay and take the rap will go on a fifty dollar a day pay-roll, starting right now, and they will stay on that pay-roll until they're either acquitted in court or released from gaol."

The men stared at him and at one another.

"Fifty bucks a day for sitting in clink?" exclaimed Lacey. "Hi, why are you doin' dis?"

"It's my way of doing business."

"I'd do a ten-year stretch in solitary for that kind of dough!" declared one enthusiast.

"Not me!" cried another man. "It'd make my fourth rap, and you know what that means in this State!"

"When do we get paid off, if we do it?" questioned a third man.

"When you walk out of the court room or the pen," said Fred. "Come on, make up your minds. Those of you who want the fifty a day step over there. The rest of you get to work and clean this place up—get every scrap of paper that might possibly lead to me."

Ten men volunteered to be caught, and to those he said:

"Now remember, the man who owns this place is a short, dark, smooth shaven fellow, fifty years old and named—or—John Hoffman. However many questions they ask, stick to that. You will have the services of a good lawyer, and I'll do everything I possibly can to get you off. That's all, and good luck!"

He turned to Clip.

"Where are the keys of my car?"

"Here." The keys were handed over. "You and the other men had better get out in ten minutes to be on the safe side. I'll see you later."

At five minutes to nine several squad cars drew up outside the building and G-men and uniformed police officers got down from them, all armed, some carrying sub-machine-guns. The front and rear entrances were covered, and Bruce and Neale joined Robert Preston, who led the raiding party up the stairs.

The ten volunteers were arrested at their desks, protesting volubly, and from the rear window of his limousine down the street Fred watched them being bundled into the squad cars.

"Take me to the office, Jackson," he directed.

Two days after the raid, Bruce and Theodore Neale were summoned to Robert Preston's room at the Treasury Building, after enjoying a little well-earned rest.

"I know we haven't brought the 'phone racket to a stop," Preston said to them, "but at least we've slowed it down for a while. Are you two tired of climbing telephone-poles?"

Jennings completed the filling of the middle bag with notes from the safe, while Turk stood on guard with his gun.

"Oh, I'm getting used to it," Neale assured him ironically. "I can't sleep in a bed any more—I'm used to a perch!"

Preston chuckled.

"Well, I'll give you a different assignment for a week or two," he said. "Our fingerprint check-up on the Luster-Glo plant turned up quite a few prints that didn't match those of the men we caught. Washington identified one set as those of Syracuse Charlie Lamb—and Syracuse Charlie was picked up this morning. He was carrying this!"

An opened parcel on Preston's desk was indicated, and a book of Irish Sweepstake tickets was extracted from the parcel and displayed.

"Some of the best fake lottery tickets I've ever seen!" Preston declared, and he held first the cover of the book and then one of the tickets up to the light. "Only the watermark gives them away. Look! One kind of stock for the cover, another for the actual tickets. Now, if you can find out what printing press in this State has purchased both types of paper you may get a lead."

He tossed the book across to Bruce. "You'll have to work fast, though," he went on. "Note the date of the drawing—October 1st. That means the tickets will have to be sold before the 16th of September, and the men behind this swindle will undoubtedly destroy all the evidence after that. They may decide to drop out of sight, once all the money's in their hands, so they must be found in the next ten days. Neale, you get to work on Syracuse Charlie—find out anything you can from him."

"I'm on my way," said Neale; and he rose and went out from the room.

"This looks like a complicated printing job," remarked Bruce, studying one of the tickets.

"It is," confirmed Preston. "You can't do that kind of work on a hand press."

"Probably done in some supposedly respectable plant, eh?"

"Probably. Get some of those samples into the lab. for a check on the stock."

Bruce visited the laboratory on the top floor of the building, where experts examined the paper of the covers and tickets of the sweepstake books, and from the laboratory he went off to interview the manager of Messrs. Rayburn & Fiske, wholesale paper dealers, in Madison Avenue.

The manager, an enormously fat man, turned up records, and finally informed Bruce that only three firms had bought any quantity of the paper on which the covers were printed.

"Here they are," he said, jotting down the names on a slip. "The Colonial Printing Company, Cosmopolitan Engravers, and the Gothic Press."

"The Gothic Press?" Bruce remembered that name. "Thanks very much."

The printing works of the Gothic Press were situated in East Thirty-fourth Street and occupied the whole of the ground floor and basement of an old-fashioned building. While Bruce was on his way to the address in a taxicab, Fred descended from the office on the ground floor to a big room in the basement where compositors were setting up type and two printing machines were in use.

The foreman printer joined him as he went to one of the machines and picked up a proof which had just been pulled.

"It was matching the ink that slowed us up, boss," the foreman said, "but now we can run the rest of 'em off in no time."

August 20th, 1938.

Fred screwed up the wet proof and tossed it into a big wire waste-basket.

"Stay with it," he said. "Put on a night shift if you have to."

He went back to the office on the floor above, and he said to Clip Phillips, who was leaning against a desk in it:

"We've only got a few days left, so we'll fill the out-of-town orders first and sell the last batch around here. I'm going along to my office now."

His limousine was out in the street, but as he was about to descend the front steps to it a taxicab drew up at the kerb and Bruce alighted from it. Fred dived back into the room he had just left.

"It's my brother Bruce," he said to Clip, "just arrived."

"What's he doing here?" demanded Clip.

"I don't know." Fred slammed the door. "Do something! Get busy!"

"He's a G-man!" roared Clip. "I'll take care of him!"

He whisked a six-gun from his coat pocket, and with his left hand went to re-open the door. But Fred stopped him.

"Hold it!" he commanded harshly. "I told you he was my brother."

"So what?" challenged Clip. "You know he's a G-man. What are you tryin' to hand out here? Let me get him!"

"Wait a minute," insisted Fred. "Give me that rod!" He took the gun and pocketed it. "You do as you're told—I'll handle this. Pretend you're working."

Clip went over to some bookshelves and took down a volume which had been printed by the Gothic Press. Fred sat at the desk, jabbed a finger at a bell-push underneath its knee-hole, and picked up a telephone.

A red light flashed over the door of the big room below, and the foreman printer saw it.

"Cover up, boys!" he cried. "There's the light!"

The men at the machines and the compositors at the type-cases immediately stopped work to gather up everything of an incriminating nature, and the foreman dashed to a card on one of the walls which bore a notice "No Smoking." He turned the card upside down on its nail and tugged at a lever in a box-like cavity the card had concealed.

The whole of one section of the wall moved as on a central pivot, taking type-cases and shelves with it, and another room beyond was revealed. Printed matter was bundled hurriedly into this room and the wall was restored to its normal position.

By this time Bruce had paid off the taxi-driver and ascended the steps into the building. As he entered the office his brother appeared to be talking to someone on the telephone.

"Twenty thousand handbills in black and red? I'll have to figure that out, Mr. Taylor." Fred looked up at Bruce with well-simulated surprise. "Hallo, kid! Come on in. What's that, Mr. Taylor? Oh, certainly, ten per cent off for cash. Thanks."

The telephone was replaced, and Fred leaned back in his chair.

"Well, kid," he said, "looking for someone to have lunch with?"

"No, I'm not, Fred," Bruce gravely returned. "I'd like to take a look at your press room."

"Why?"

"Oh, just a matter of business. Do you mind?"

Clip looked round from the book he was pretending to study and Fred got to his feet.

"What's this all about?" he asked, and his voice had an edge to it.

"I'm going to take a look, at that press room, Fred, whether you like it or not."

Fred shrugged.

"That's okay with me, kid—I've nothing to hide. This way."

He went with his brother to the stairs.

"Straight ahead," he said at the foot of them, and they entered the big room.

Men were at work on two presses, but the one on which the printing of spurious sweepstake tickets had been in progress was idle. Bruce roamed about the room while Fred looked on with his hands behind his back, seemingly amused.

There were stacks of paper on shelves and benches, but Bruce could not find any of the kind for which he sought. On one of the machines in use elaborate two-colour programmes were being printed; on the other—a Cropper—were some bills concerning a boxing match. After inspecting pulls of these programmes and bills, Bruce turned to a bench just inside the door on which hundreds of large cards were stacked.

On the cards were texts, and he noticed two of them in particular: "All who believeth shall have everlasting life," and "Those who live by the sword shall perish by the sword."

"We print quite a lot of these for the Bible Institute," said Fred, walking over to the bench and holding up one of the cards.

Bruce turned away and came to the wire waste-basket. He caught sight of the crumpled proof his brother had tossed into it, turned his back on the basket and covertly scanned the proof and slipped it into a pocket.

"Anything else you'd like to see?" Fred inquired after a while.

"No," Bruce replied, "but I'd like to know what you're doing with the ivory-coated translucent Bristol stock you bought from the National Paper Supply Company."

If Fred was startled he did not show it.

"I imagine we can get that information in the files," he said. "Come on up to the office and I'll ask Phillips."

They went back to the office and the question was put to Clip, who promptly turned up files and order books.

"Here we are," he said after a while. "That run of announcements for Halstead's new Undertaking Parlours—and an order from Consolidated Dairies."

"What about the canary coated stock you bought last month from Rayburn & Fiske?" inquired Bruce.

Clip turned some more pages of the order book.

"The canary stock," he said, "we used on a couple of jobs, part of it for the Lyceum Theatre Club and some for a couple of High School shows."

"Did that use up the whole stock?"

"No, only part of it," admitted Clip. "We still have some left."

Fred glanced at his wrist watch.

"I'm due at my office in a few minutes," he said, "but if there's anything else you'd like to know—"

"No, I think I'll be on my way, too," Bruce decided, and he thanked Clip and walked out into the street with his brother.

"I hope you weren't disappointed in your visit to the plant?" Fred said casually as they reached the limousine.

"I found out just what I expected," Prince replied.

"I understand you cleaned up your telephone assignment, the other day."

"How did you know?"

"Oh, I read the papers. Did it help you any with the authorities?"

"You don't get medals in this work, Fred."

"What are you working on now? Why did you check my plant?"

"You'll have to read it in the papers."

"All right." Jackson was opening the door of the limousine. "So-long, kid. To the office, Jackson."

The limousine had shot off in the direction of Eighth Avenue before Bruce got into a taxicab, and the taxicab had left East Thirty-fourth Street behind before he took the crumpled proof from his pocket and examined it with frowning eyes.

Clip Goes Too Far

A FEW minutes after the two brothers had gone out from the printing works, Clip Phillips telephoned down to the foreman that he wanted a word with him, and the foreman ascended to the office.

"Do you know who Garth just showed through the plant?" Clip questioned.

"No." The foreman shook his head. "Who?"

"His brother—a G-man."

"The boss' brother a G-man?" The elderly foreman screwed up his eyes. "Oh, you're kidding!"

"I wish I was. I think we're being framed for a double-cross—all of us."

"Oh, but—but why should the boss double-cross us?"

"Women and rackets don't mix. I've been watching him for a long time, and I've seen it coming. He's getting ready to quit."

"Yeah?"

"Sure." Clip was malignantly emphatic. "All he thinks about is that Drake dame he's got workin' for him. He's planning on marrying her and museling in on Society—and he's fixin' for us to hold the bag."

The foreman printer rubbed his chin. "Got any idea what we ought to do about it?" he asked.

"I know exactly what to do," rasped Clip. "I'm gonna get all the boys over and give them the low-down."

He telephoned to members of the gang who had been installed in offices in Brant Avenue and Burlington Avenue, Jersey City, and to the remnants of the "sob-room" staff who had been transferred to the Bronx, arranging for them all to meet him at the works at four o'clock in the afternoon, and soon after the appointed hour they were all crowded in the office, listening to him in astonishment.

"I tell you he hasn't any use for us!" he blazed. "We're just a bunch of stoogies to be socked around if we make mistakes. Pretty nearly all of you have taken a licking from him at one time or another. Well, now it's his turn to take one."

The professor and the colonel gazed dubiously at one another, and Clip pounced on them.

"You think he wouldn't double-cross us, eh?" he snapped. "How about the other boys in the Luster-Glo hide-out? He let them get knocked off, didn't he? And he knew that raid was coming—knew it in plenty of time to get 'em all out, but it didn't catch him, did it? No, and the next one won't, either. But it will us!"

"But," protested the Professor loyally, "he's paying those men fifty—"

"He promised them fifty bucks a day, yes," interrupted Clip, "but d'you think they're gonna get it? By the time they're out of stir he'll be in Monte Carlo or some place, I tell you. And how about his brother? You guys didn't know his brother was a G-man, did you?"

He flung out his arms.

"Yeah, a G-man!" he raged. "A Federal snoop! He led that raid, and d'you want to know what happened here a while ago? Garth showed his brother all over this plant. Now, do you think he'd do that if he wasn't plannin' on sneaking out?"

The men looked at one another, and there were mutterings, but few of them had any great liking for the speaker and their faith in their employer was not wholly shattered. Clip adopted a fresh line of attack.

"Do you want to know how he splits the dough this outfit takes in?" he demanded. "Out of every ten bucks he grabs off six and pays us out of the other four. What's stopping us from running things ourselves? We've got as much brains as he has, haven't we?"

"Now you're talking!" cried Jennings.

"You bet I am!" Clip pressed his advantage. "We do the work, we earn the money, and I'm gonna see that we get it. I'm gonna tell Garth where he gets off—tell him we're through working for him. We're taking over. Who's coming with me?"

There were ten who offered to accompany him, and after some further talk he and the ten set off for Eighth Avenue. They swarmed into the Sherman Building there, ascended to the twenty-fourth floor and invaded the general office.

Morton blinked at them from his desk, but as Clip strode towards the door of Fred's room the clerk sprang up indignantly.

"You can't go in there like—" he began, only to break off because Clip was already inside the room and slamming the door behind him.

Fred, seated at his desk, frowned at the intruder.

"I thought I told you never to walk in without knocking?" he barked.

"Yes, I know," Clip coolly responded. "I've just come from a meeting of the boys."

"The boys at the printing plant?"

"And the bookmaking office, and the sob-room, and the whole mob! They don't like the way you let the Luster-Glo outfit get knocked off."

Fred stood up, and his jaw was set. "Oh, they don't!"

"Half a million bucks if you let us go!" Fred had nearly reached the piled-up texts.

"No," said Clip fiercely, "and they don't like the way you've moved that Drake girl in here."

"Since when have you or the boys been running my business?" thundered Fred, moving round the desk with clenched fists.

"Since right now. We're through taking orders from the brother of a G-man!" Clip thrust a hand under his coat to a shoulder-holster.

"Who told them Bruce is a Federal agent?"

"I did. I saw him at the Luster-Mo raid, and I know you let him knock that joint off just to stick a feather in his hat. Well, me and the boys are makin' sure it doesn't happen again."

"Just what do you and the boys expect me to do about it?"

"Step out. You've made yours—now we're gonna run things on an even-split basis."

"And supposing I'm not ready to step out?"

"Then I'll tell your precious brother all about you. I'll even tip off the Drake girl, too."

That last threat seemed to have more effect. Fred's hands dropped at his sides, and he said:

"You've got everything figured out, haven't you? Looks like you've got me coming and going."

"We have!" snarled Clip.

"All right, you win," Fred pointed to the chair he had vacated. "If you're going to start running things you might as well take over the throne."

"You're being smart about this," said Clip, his evil brown eyes showing his elation, but his right hand remained on the butt of the gun that was in the shoulder-holster. "Most guys don't know when they're through."

"If you don't mind, I'll take these letters with me," Fred moved to the desk as though to pick up some envelopes that were lying there, and Clip nodded and stepped aside.

For the moment the crook was off his guard, and the moment sufficed. Like lightning Fred seized upon the arm that was under the coat and with his other hand secured the gun and pitched it across the room behind him. Clip struck out with his left fist, but the blow was evaded, and then with all the weight of his body Fred drove his right to the point of his treacherous lieutenant's jaw.

Clip was lifted clean off his feet with the violence of that terrific drive, and he went crashing backwards through the long panel of the door to fall amid a shower of glass almost at the feet of the men in the outer office.

Fred stepped through the broken panel, ready for any sort of action.

"Who wants to be next?" he challenged; but not one of the rebels made a movement or uttered a word.

"You bunch of fatheads!" Fred blazed at them. "Don't you know this whole business runs because of me, not you? As long as you're in rackets with me, I'm running them, and I'll keep on running them until I'm ready to step out—not until some half-smart mug like him tells me to quit!"

Clip was struggling feebly to rise. The glass of the panel had cut his forehead, just over the left eye, as he had crashed through it, and blood was streaming down his face. His companions seemed to be completely cowed.

"In case you have any more smart ideas," Fred went on, "let me tell you that a very good friend of mine has a couple of letters he'll mail if I should—or—disappear. One of them's to the Chief of Police, the other to the Department of Justice. If those letters are ever read, you'll be the most hunted group of men in the country! Remember that, and I'll forget this. Now get back to work, the whole bunch of you!"

August 20th, 1938.

Jennings and another man helped Clip to his feet and led him away. The others followed, and Morton closed the door upon them. Fred's face relaxed into something like a grin.

"You know, Morton," he said, "that isn't a bad idea about those letters. Come into my office and I'll dictate a couple of real ones. Then arrange to have the door fixed."

"Yes, sir." Morton snatched up a notebook and pencil, and in Fred's room the letters were dictated.

"When did Miss Drake say she'd be here?" Fred broke off to ask.

"Oh, not for another half-hour, sir."

"Good! And in conclusion, I wish to make it clear that my brother, Bruce Garth knows absolutely nothing of my connections or my work. Make two copies of each, and then tear up your shorthand notes."

At the end of half an hour Fred entered the room that was to have been his brother's and found Marjory at the desk in it, taking some papers from a satchel.

"Hallo, hard worker!" he greeted.

"Very hard worker," said she, smilingly. "Would you mind looking over this proof for the Wednesday Morning Club programme?"

"Not right now," he demurred. "I want to talk to you about something else. How long have we known each other, Marjory?"

"Oh, about a year," she replied.

"One year, three months, and eleven days." He sat on the edge of the desk beside her. "We were born on different sides of the tracks," he said wistfully. "Has that ever bothered you?"

"No," she assured him, "I don't think it makes very much difference where you start. It's where you finish that counts."

"I thought you'd see things that way. Do you like me?"

"Why, certainly, Fred."

"Do you like to travel?"

"Why—yes," she hesitated.

"How would you like to spend a couple of years going around the world? Visiting all the little out-of-the-way places that you've read about and always wanted to see? Staying as long as you like, and moving on when you felt in the mood?"

She murmured that it sounded interesting.

"I'm quitting business," he said, "retiring. I have a deal coming up—my last one. It'll put me on Easy Street for life. I'll have enough money to do whatever I want—enough for two people to do whatever they want."

She saw what was coming and tried to stop it.

"Fred, I—"

"Let me finish," he pleaded. "I'm going to ask you something that I've wanted to ask you for a year. I want you to marry me, Marjory. I haven't mentioned anything about love on your side, but you can't stop me from hoping."

She got to her feet, and she looked away from him, biting her lip.

"I hardly know what to say, Fred," she stammered as he ventured to put a hand on her arm. "I—I admire you very much. I think you—you're one of the finest and most generous men I've ever known, but—"

"Don't say any more now," he urged. "Don't say, 'I like you as a friend.' Take your time—think it over. My deal won't be terminated until the 16th; I'll wait until then for my answer."

He slid off the desk and, with a complete change of manner, said:

"Now let's get down to business and look at these proofs. The men are waiting for them."

Face to Face!

AT seven o'clock that evening, Clip sat at the desk in the office of the Gothic Press, a piece of sticking-plaster over the cut in his forehead, and the other members of Fred's outfit were clustered round him.

"A dumb guy, Garth," he remarked venomously. "We offered him an easy way out and he wouldn't take it. Now he can go the hard way. I'll show him he can't handle me like that!"

"What are you figuring on?" asked Jennings.

"That's what I'm gonna tell you. Garth doesn't believe in bank accounts—he keeps practically all his dough in ready cash where he can get at it. Any of you ever get a look inside that safe in his office?"

"I have," said Jennings. "You could park a truck in it!"

"Yeah," nodded Clip, "and right now it's full, jammed to the door with the money from the lottery tickets. Well, we're gonna split that jack-pot!"

"What about the letters his friend's got?" asked a full-faced fellow, short of stature but stocky of build, known as "Turk," who habitually wore his hat with the brim pulled down over one eye.

"I can get around them," was the confident reply. "Now Garth will be at his office to-night, waiting for Numbers to show up with the race-track winnings, so we're all going to dinner together, just in case one of us is a loose-mouth. And after dinner we're coming back here to show Mr. Garth who gets the last laugh. Come on, let's go!"

They all went out from the building, and the ground floor and basement were in darkness half an hour later when Bruce forced open a window of the printing-room from a yard at the rear of the premises and proceeded to search it thoroughly in the light of an electric torch.

Paper on shelves and benches engaged his attention, and he studied a number of line and process blocks; but he looked in vain for spurious sweep-stake tickets, or the sort of paper upon which they were printed.

He became convinced that there must be some hidden room, but though he roamed the whole of the basement he could not find it. Back in the printing-room he began to tap the walls, and the one near the "No Smoking" notice gave back a hollow sound.

He pushed against the type-cases, but they did not move, and he was tapping the walls again when he came to the "No Smoking" notice, and knocked it aside by accident. He turned the light of the torch upon the box-like opening, and he saw the lever inside it, pushed to no purpose, then gave it a tug.

The section of the wall that had sounded hollow began to revolve, and he squeezed into the room beyond it. There he found the tickets and the plates and the unused paper that had been stowed away in haste; but the sound of many footsteps overhead caused him to slip out into the printing-room again, lest he should be caught.

He pushed the lever, waited only to see the section of the wall swinging back into place, and then made for the

In the fever-stricken areas of Cuba a brave band of scientists and U.S. Marines fight a losing battle against the deadly plague of "Yellow Jack," until the great heroic risk taken by an Irish sergeant at last brings victory. A stirring story starring Robert Montgomery, Virginia Bruce and Lewis Stone

Sergeant O'Hara

HEADED by a band playing a stirring march, a tired but cheerful column came marching into Havana. In spite of the fetid heat and the blistering sun, these men had sung most of the march, because that evening they would be embarking on transports and returning to the States, and they hoped that they would never see this pestilential country again.

This is a story of the days when the United States became masters of Cuba. They were the victors, but yet it looked as if they were going to be beaten. Not by force of arms, but by a deadly tropical fever known as "Yellow fever" or "Yellow Jack." Taken in time, it was possible for the doctors in some instances to effect a cure, but generally the victim succumbed before the medical authorities could do anything. It was a swift and deadly fever that struck mysteriously, and none knew the cause. No wonder soldiers were glad to leave Cuba and wish never to return.

Suddenly one of those marching soldiers began to stagger and reel as if he were drunk. He collapsed in a heap as a corporal hurried up the line to find out why the column had broken step.

It chanced that the soldier had collapsed almost outside the white-washed walls of the Havana Military Hospital, and from the grounds came a small party of stretcher-bearers, headed by Sergeant O'Hara. The section of men with the sick man were ordered to fall out, whilst the rest of the column continued their march to the docks.

The Irish sergeant was a tall, handsome young fellow. His eyes were fearless and hard, his jaw was stubborn, and yet his lips had a way of twisting into a mocking, sarcastic grin. He had joined the Red Cross because the pay was better than the ordinary ranks of the Army, and he hated foot-slogging. He was witty, tough, and hard as nails.

O'Hara knelt beside the unconscious man, felt the pulse, and flicked up an eyelid with professional skill. As he got up an officer appeared and demanded what was wrong.

"Yellow Jack!" drawled the sergeant, and grinned as he heard the soldiers round him gasp.

The officer gave orders for the section to be isolated and for Sergeant O'Hara to instruct his stretcher-bearers to take the sick man into hospital. The Red Cross men did not fancy touching the soldier, but O'Hara did not worry. He picked up the limp form, slung the soldier across his shoulders, and hastened off to the hospital. It was not exactly devotion to duty that made the sergeant take this risk, but because it would afford him the opportunity to see and talk with Nurse Blake.

Nurse Frances Blake was one of the brave girls on the staff of the Fever Hospital. She was fair and very pleasing to the eye. Her job came first, and she had no time for the flirtatious attentions of the sergeant. When he staggered in with his load the nurse gave a sigh of despair. They had had eight new cases in two days, and here was another. The sergeant dumped the soldier on to a vacant bed. The matron hurried off to call Dr. Lazear.

Charlie, the fat, unwieldy orderly, stopped O'Hara as he left the ward.

"Say, has he got it?"

"Yeah," drawled the sergeant, and then leaned forward. "You look a little yellow yourself, Charlie."

The orderly gave a frightened moan and scampered for the nearest mirror. O'Hara knew that Charlie would spend the next ten minutes looking at his tongue and taking his own temperature, and that would give the sergeant the chance of talking to the nurse.

Even the prim and proper uniform could not conceal the beauty of this girl, and her flaxen hair under the small white bonnet seemed to gleam. She entered the outer office and looked at him in businesslike fashion.

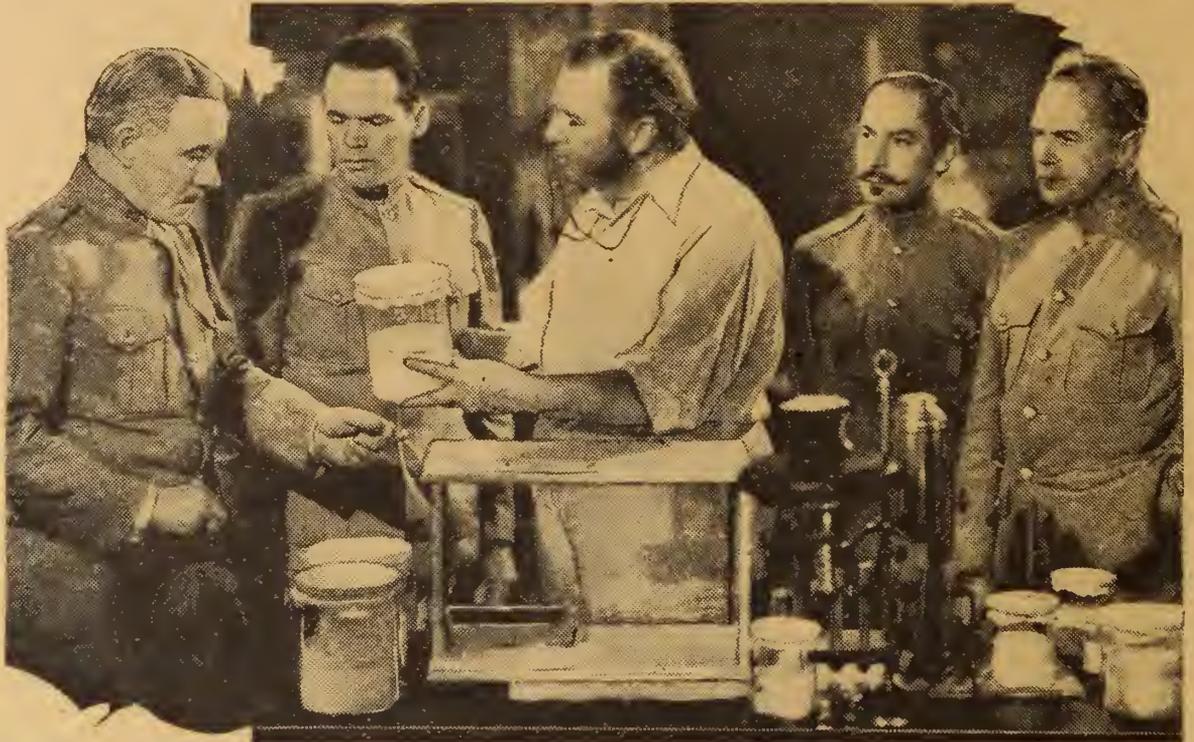

"You'd better wash up with some carbolic solution, sergeant."

"No yellow bug'll ever hurt O'Hara!" he boasted, and her disdainful smile goaded him. "I'll be taking that back, Miss Frances," he cried, hand on heart. "I'm a sick man. A little starched bonnet has got me on my knees."

"Men are dying all around you, sergeant. Your fellow-soldiers." Nurse Blake stared at him resolutely. "Doesn't that mean anything to you?"

"Sure. That's bad luck for them, poor devils," he answered, and came nearer. "But I'm alive, Frances. And so are you."

She backed away nervously, because those smiling eyes were so ruthless and so determined.

Major Reed looked at the bottle containing the eggs. "If I hatch these out and let them bite a man down with Yellow Jack I make them instruments of death," he said quietly.

"You'd better go about your work, hadn't you?"

"I'm thinking you're working too hard. A little rest now and then would do you good." O'Hara smiled at her boldly. "A walk on the beach, say, or a boat ride—"

"With you, sergeant?" Her eyes did not waver. "I'll look forward to that."

"Then you'll go?" he demanded ardently.

"Thank you—no!"

Nurse Blake spoke sharply, and, pushing past him, disappeared into the ward.

Sergeant O'Hara shrugged his shoulders. For weeks and months he had been trying to persuade Nurse Blake to take up with him, but with no success. But the sergeant had plenty of confidence in his own powers to charm the fair sex. He liked them stubborn and hard to win.

A Puzzling Clue

THE doctors of the Yellow Jack Commission that had been sent by Washington to solve the problem were looking glum. For more than a year they had been trying to track down the germ of this dread disease, and they were no nearer than when they started. That morning there had been a request to attend the office of the general in command of Western Cuba, and the interview had not been too pleasant. The commission had a thorn in its side in the person of Colonel Tory of the Marine Hospital Corps.

Major Reed, the head of the commission, was sunk in the depths of despair. Assisted by three other doctors, Carroll, Lazear, and Agramonte, he had worked night and day to solve the mystery of Yellow Jack, and they had failed. It was galling to have officers like Colonel Tory hinting that they were doing more harm than good, and that the commission should be sent back to Washington. Colonel Tory reckoned August 20th, 1938.

that by hygiene he had done more to check the fever than any person living, and he resented an inferior officer being in the position to hand out orders to his superiors. It was Tory who had been responsible for this day's meeting, but the one bright thing was the loyal support of General Wood. The general appreciated the amount of work done by the commission, and he felt certain that one day success would crown their efforts.

"It's a thankless, back-aching task," complained the outspoken, hot-tempered Dr. Carroll. "Look at Lazear squinting down that damned microscope. He could squint till Doomsday and not be any the wiser. We've made every sort of examination possible, and yet we can't, and never will discover how these people get Yellow Jack. Agramonte thinks the same."

The latter, who was a Cuban, shrugged his shoulders.

"Truly I am beginning to despair," he agreed.

"We must find the secret," Lazear had French blood in his veins and could be very intensive. "We can't go back and admit that we're beaten."

"Better to do that than stick here till the fever gets us," sneered Carroll.

"Gentlemen! Gentlemen!" Major Reed begged a trifle irritably. "We have had so many of these discussions, and they lead nowhere. You know we cannot go home unless ordered to, and that is the one thing that I dread. At a great price Cuba became part of the United States, and yet Cuba is beating us. We've got to find what causes Yellow Jack or give up Cuba." There was a knock at the door. "Come in!"

Sergeant O'Hara stepped smartly into the laboratory and saluted. He held out some papers.

"My report on the Ferguson case, sir."

"Thanks, O'Hara." The white-haired, weary Major Reed tossed the report on the table. "A pity we were too late to do anything for him."

The sergeant should have saluted and gone, but he lingered, and Major Reed glanced up at him.

"Anything else, O'Hara?"

"You'll excuse me, sir, but there's something unusual about this Ferguson case," answered the sergeant. "It looks like Ferguson couldn't have been near Yellow Jack for a month."

"What do you mean?" sharply questioned Lazear.

"He was locked in the Pinar guardhouse." O'Hara looked at Lazear with a mocking grin. "Doctor, eight men shared that guardhouse. We checked 'em at mess, and they were eating like horses. The whole eight were due to go home, and they were a section of the repatriation convoy."

Major Reed pondered this point.

"Those men were all isolated and you checked them." He stared at the sergeant under beetling brows. "They show no signs of fever?"

"None, sir."

"Something in Ferguson's food—"

"I don't suppose any of you gentlemen have ever been in a guardhouse." O'Hara grinned at them derisively, and his eyes were twinkling. "Meals are sort of democratic. Food in one trough and water in one pail. They all ate and drank the same."

Major Reed sat up alertly and looked across at the other doctors.

"This does sound unusual. It seems that it couldn't be the food, and I don't see how it could be contagion, and yet Ferguson is dead." He picked up the report. "You've got all the details here, O'Hara?"

"Yes, sir."

"Very well, that will be all."

The major dismissed him.

For a long time the doctors discussed the unusual case, and all theories put forward did not satisfactorily explain the mystery.

"Nine men slept, ate, and drank together," the major said at last. "Same food, same room, same air. Yet only one of them caught Yellow Jack. O'Hara is one of the most reliable sergeants that I have met, and I'm sure is correct in all his details. By all the known laws of contagion, Ferguson should not have got Yellow Jack, and as he came out of that guardhouse this morning he must have caught it in that guardhouse and nowhere else." He jumped up, his jaw set and his eyes alight with hope. "We'll go to Pinar. We'll inspect that guardhouse."

Colonel Tory's dark, swarthy face did not light up when Major Reed appeared, and he laughed sneeringly when he heard that the commission wished to inspect the guard-room, but as the order was signed by the general the colonel could not refuse the request. He considered it just eye-wash to impress the general.

Major Reed and his doctors made a thorough examination of the guard-house, and, to the colonel's disgust, asked for the prisoners to be removed. The colonel could not refuse, and after that the major went over the room even more thoroughly. He pointed to a small, grilled window.

"That window isn't screened."

"Why should it be?"

The colonel took umbrage at once.

"It could be some insect." The major spoke patiently. "What else could explain a plague which travels along one side of a street, then, for no reason at all, skips a house, then jumps to the other side? What would pick one man out of nine? An insect. It would answer all our crazy riddles."

The colonel laughed ironically.

"Major, you're daffy! As daffy as that old Scotch idiot Finlay and his menagerie of mosquitoes. The man insists they carry yellow fever."

Reed seemed bewildered by this information. He looked at the other doctors.

"Have you ever heard of this man?"

"I sort of recollect something," murmured Carroll. "But I can't remember what it was."

"Colonel Tory,"

Reed faced the officer.

"Do you mean that this Dr. Finlay has a complete theory worked out for a mosquito carrier?"

"Complete?"

Tory's face was convulsed with ironic amusement. "The man's a lunatic!"

"Maybe, but mosquitoes make sense," quietly retorted the major. "We'll get hold of this Finlay."

Finding that the Scotch doctor resided on the outskirts of Havana in the native quarter, the commission left Pinar and the derisive witticisms of Colonel Tory. Agramonte, on getting back to the hospital, went into the library. He had remembered something about Finlay, and he found what he sought in an old medical journal. Nineteen years ago this same Dr. Finlay had expounded his theories on mosquitoes, and the people present had laughed him to scorn. The doctor had called them harsh names, and, as far as Agramonte knew, his name had not appeared in a medical journal since.

Major Reed wrote a note and dispatched it by Sergeant O'Hara, and the Irishman came back with the note torn in half. The commission learned that the doctor wanted nothing to do with them. So Major Reed, his doctors, and the sergeant went down to the native quarters. They found the house.

Dr. Finlay was a great bull of a man with flaming red side-whiskers and mud-tidy, scanty locks. His harsh voice was not friendly. It was the infinite tact and courteous speech of Major Reed that appeased the Scot's anger, so much so that he invited them eventually into his laboratory.

"Nineteen years ago I told a world, populated apparently by fools and idiots, that yellow fever was caused by mosquitoes. They laughed at me, and so I retired to Havana." The Scot laughed mirthlessly. "I might do the laughing now, because many people have died since I tried to save the world from this plague. Why don't you laugh at me, sir?"

"I would never have laughed in the first place," the major replied. "I only wish that your name had been mentioned to me before. We have tried many experiments, and only recently a man died that caused me to suspect that the fever might be caused by insects. When I heard of your theory that the mosquito was a carrier I felt that at last we were progressing. Dr. Finlay, you would be rendering the commission a very great service if you would advise us."

The fiery old Scot, mollified by the major's words, nodded his head briskly and said that the work of the last nineteen years was at their disposal. He showed the commission a glass cage that buzzed with mosquitoes.

"I have made a study of these little beauties, and, so far, I have found over eight hundred different varieties," Dr. Finlay explained. "I have tried experiments with animals, but they won't take yellow fever. Only human beings seem to get it, and it is caused by a certain type of mosquito. Naturally, it is a female. Most mosquitoes like the flesh round the ankles, the wrist, and the neck, and my pet is no exception. There are plenty of them in that glass cage, but this will answer your purpose." He picked up a bottle covered with fine muslin. "In this bottle lies sleeping death. There are enough eggs in there to hatch out hundreds of this particular brand of mosquito. Just add a few drops of clear water, and the heat will do the rest." He held out the bottle to the major. "But you can make the tests for yourself. I've proved my own theory."

Major Reed looked at the bottle containing the eggs.

"If I hatch these out and let them bite any man down with Yellow Jack I make them instruments of death."

"If you let them escape," agreed Dr. Finlay. "Well, gentlemen, I have handed you nineteen years of my work, in spite of my solemn vow that I wouldn't help any of the medical authorities even if they went down on their bended knees." He laughed. "If there is anything else I can do, you'll let me know."

"I will inform you of all the tests that we carry out, Dr. Finlay," solemnly answered Reed. "On behalf of the commission, I thank you for the very great trust you have placed in us."

Woman's Wiles

MAJOR REED, on obtaining authority from the general, ordered two new shacks to be built, and soon rumours began to fly round the camp that they were being erect, for some sort of experiment. They were very similar in design to the guardhouses at Pinar. Somehow it leaked out that the major was going to try experiments with mosquitoes, and this was strengthened when Finlay's pots were taken to the hospital and allowed to bite every man down with Yellow Jack. A mosquito was kept in a small test-tube and very cautiously placed on bare flesh, and when the creature had done his worst, great precaution was taken that he did not escape out of the tube.

One person who did not take a great deal of interest in the major's experiments was O'Hara. Major Reed was a great man, in his mind, but definitely "nutty." Besides, he had much more to worry about than the major. He himself was "nutty" about Frances, but whenever he tried to get a few moments alone with her she would either be cold and distant or else talk about the work done by Major Reed. It seemed her dearest wish that the major should solve the mystery of Yellow Jack.

O'Hara shared a large tent with his four orderlies, and, naturally, there was a great deal of talk among them regarding the mosquitoes. They were an odd assortment. There was a big, slow-speaking fellow, who talked of the girl back in Montana that one day he hoped to marry, and for some strange reason was called by his buddies "Jellybeans." There was a little, fiery fellow, who had German blood in his veins and who was almost a Bolshevik—that was Busch. Brinkerhof was a good-looking, lazy fellow, who was popular at camp concerts. Breen was the youngest, a mere boy, and he would spend hours reading medical journals, because it was his ambition to become a great doctor. He hated Cuba and dreaded Yellow Jack. Sometimes the four would discuss the major and run him down, and then O'Hara would butt into the conversation. The major might be "nutty," but it he heard any of them expressing their opinions aloud he'd be after knocking their heads together.

Then came the official announcement that startled the camp. Volunteers were wanted. Three hundred dollars would be paid to any man who allowed a mosquito who had bitten a Yellow Jack patient to bite him. To the men it seemed a certain form of suicide, and as a result there was not one volunteer. Colonel Tory came to see the general and kicked up an awful fuss; in his opinion Major Reed and his commission should be sent off before they did a lot of harm. It was monstrous to suggest that men should sacrifice themselves for such criminal folly. The general listened, and he also talked with Major Gorgas, who was having similar trouble with Yellow Jack in Panama. Gorgas supported Major Reed, and so the commission was allowed to go on with its work.

One day the Red Cross orderlies were digging a grave, whilst O'Hara looked on and smoked beneath the shade of a palm tree.

"How could a harmless little bug carry germs?" Busch questioned.

"Why not?" replied Brinkerhof. "Mosquitoes are small, but this germ is smaller. Maybe it's our place to volunteer."

"I sure could use the dough," mumbled Jellybeans.

"Boys, here's one good old army rule," called out O'Hara. "Keep your mouth shut, your eyes open and never volunteer."

The argument was interrupted by the appearance of Charlie Spill, the hospital orderly. That worthy shuffled his feet and said he'd like to speak to the sergeant sort of private. He had a message from Miss Frances. The nurse felt she needed some relaxation, and she would be pleased to meet the sergeant down on the beach by the big rock at eight o'clock. Charlie hated giving this message. He had argued and argued with Frances, who was such a nice girl, that she should not go out with the sergeant, but the nurse had made up her mind.

Sure enough, Frances was down on the beach, and she was wearing a summery dress that made her look divine. O'Hara had rented a canoe, and it was a perfect night. Cuban music drifted across the water as O'Hara paddled lazily along the coast.

"Without your uniform and cap you're very human, Frances. You're the most beautiful girl in the place." He rested on his paddle. "What lucky city did you come from, darling?"

"Washington." Major Reed brought Miss MacDade and myself with him," she smiled at him. "Now you answer a question. Why did you switch to the Medical Corps?"

"Sure. I did it because I thought the work would be lighter."

"I don't believe that."

"Well, then, since I know you feel the same way about the fine, foolish man—I did it to look after the major." O'Hara almost convinced himself. "Him chasing about with his doctors, worrying after a will-of-the-wisp he'll never find." His dark eyes studied her intently. "Why did you ask that?"

Frances avoided his eyes. She pointed to a promontory and suggested that they land and sit for a while beneath the shadow of the palms. She sat down with her back against a palm, and O'Hara wondered if he might dare kiss her—he was scared that she would be annoyed and run away.

"Why are you a soldier, John? Drilling, maybe twenty years of drilling. Maybe another war, and more life thrown away. Finally, a pension, and the old soldier's home."

"It ain't much," he admitted, and wished she would talk of more pleasant things.

"For the first time since armies began soldiers have a chance to do good instead of harm. Why hasn't one man dared come forward for Major Reed?"

"There's a lot of 'em talking about it."

"But the doctors are desperate. It's been two weeks. Won't he get a single volunteer?" Frances saw him stifle a polite yawn. "The major said only tonight that the first man to step forward would touch the heart of the whole world. He'd give our army a new sort of hero, the major said." O'Hara's head jerked round and his eyes narrowed, but Frances did not notice because she was so wrought up with emotion. "Oh, John, I could have cried to see him so helpless. At the edge of his great discovery he's unable to move."

"And what did you say to him, Miss Blake?" demanded O'Hara, his voice biting. "Didn't you say 'Leave it to me, major. I know the very man?' I'll bet you did. I'll bet you promised to lead me back with a ring in my nose."

"No! No!" Frances gazed at him in distress. "I thought if I could make you see—"

He jumped to his feet.

"What a fine rotten thing to bait a man on. If you'd asked me straight out I might have done it silly as it is. But this!"

"John—" She jumped up and gripped his arm, but he shook himself free.

"You had a fine opinion of John O'Hara, didn't you?" His lips were twisted into a sneer. Then he saluted. "I'm sorry I ever annoyed you. And I won't again." He darted off into the palms before she could say a word.

Dr. Lazear a Victim

WITHOUT a volunteer, Major Reed could do little. Dr. Carroll wanted to volunteer, but the major would not hear of it. His services were far too valuable to take such a chance. Victims of Yellow Jack kept on coming into the hospital, and the doctors continued with the work of allowing the Stegomyia mosquito bite the sick man. The mosquito was then taken to a thin-meshed cage and allowed to rejoin its companions.

Rather difficult to take a roll-call of your mosquitoes, so that if a few escaped it would not be noticed, and those mosquitoes were always on the look-out for a chance. There are careless people in this world, and one day a clumsy orderly hit the wire mesh with a broom handle and made a small hole. He discovered it later and managed to repair the damage, but not before one Stegomyia had escaped. That mosquito set out to find someone to bite, and it did not want a pallid human being.

Dr. Lazear was busy in the ward at the time, and after a while he bent down to scratch absent-mindedly at his ankle. Three days later Dr. Lazear went down with the yellow fever.

It was Breen who brought the news to the orderly tent, and his distress was pitiful.

"He's a goner," he stammered out. "Doc Carroll was out in Havana. Major Reed sent me after him, that's how I know."

"You mean he's got Yellow Jack?" questioned O'Hara.

"Yes—yes! They're in his quarters now. He keeps raving about his wife and kids. They sent me here for a stretcher, sergeant."

"Stop shaking like a jellyfish and get busy," the sergeant shouted. "Don't stand there gaping, all of you, get busy."

O'Hara helped the orderlies with the removal of Dr. Lazear from his house to the hospital. Lazear was muttering and raving, whilst poor Major Reed stared down at the man who had been his ablest assistant, in helpless despair.

"One man!" the dying man cried deliciously. "An army of men—and not one man!"

On the way back to the orderly tent young Breen began to moan to himself, and the others looked at him uneasily. Suddenly he buried his face in his hands.

"A whole army!" he shouted. "And not one man! We'll never see him again." A wild cry of despair, and then he had dropped in a heap.

O'Hara picked him up in his strong arms and carried him to the tent. He picked up a pail of water and flung it in Breen's face. The boy coughed and spluttered.

"Well, my little man! Aren't you proud of yourself fainting away like a flower for no reason at all? You lily!" the sergeant said with bitter contempt.

"I never said I wasn't afraid," hoarsely came the answer. "But so are you! All of you!" The boy's voice became shrill and high pitched with hysteria. "You're all scared stiff—the whole army! I couldn't stand it any more, that's all—trying to shout 'I volunteer' when the words wouldn't come."

O'Hara made no answer. What Breen had just said had shocked him. So this kid had been trying to volunteer and hadn't got the nerve. They hadn't even thought about volunteering, and he had dared to call Breen a lily. He looked up and saw that all those others were staring at him. In moments of crisis they always turned to him involuntarily. He seemed to read their very minds, and they were looking to him for guidance.

"I'm beginning to think," said O'Hara with that whimsical smile of his. "That I might have to do something about it, after all."

Major Reed and Dr. Carroll strove desperately to save the life of Lazear, but it was in vain. Agramonte had collapsed because Lazear was his greatest friend. The major was in despair because not only was his best man dead but it seemed that Finlay's theory about mosquitoes was wrong. Directly Colonel Tory heard he would make another outcry and the commission would be all washed up. He left the hospital in a daze and walked across the compound to his quarters. He did not hear the tramp, tramp of marching feet until a hearty cough made him glance round. He saw O'Hara, and behind him the four orderlies—all standing stiffly to attention.

"Well, sergeant, what is it?" the major asked wearily.

"We wish to volunteer, sir," stated O'Hara. "But we none of us want the reward."

Major Reed was for a moment robbed of all speech. Then impetuously he stepped forward and held out his hand to O'Hara.

"Thank you, sergeant. Thank you, boys."

Five Brave Men and True

IN the laboratory the next morning the five volunteers listened to the solemn words of Major Reed. Carroll and Agramonte were in the background, but Nurse Frances was seated close to the major and taking down notes. Very solemnly the major told the volunteers of the grave risk that they were taking and that it was not too late for them to back out if they wished. Young Breen was sweating a little, but he made no attempt to throw in his hand. The major's tired eyes were proud as he gazed at them. He had always regarded them as his boys, for they had served him very faithfully in the months they had been at Havana. The eyes of Nurse Blake were full of pride, and several times she tried to smile at the sergeant, but he looked straight to his front.

"Men, you must know exactly what these new houses are for and what we intend. Then you can draw lots, or divide up, as you please."

They made no answer, so the major continued:

"House One we will call the dirty house. Three men will go into it and unpack the sealed boxes waiting there. Those boxes contain pesthouse beds and bedding, pyjamas that men have died in, pillows and mattresses soaked with fever. A stove will increase the heat, and tubs of water will make the air stifling. All present theories say that those men should develop yellow fever."

The major looked at them inquiringly. Busch spoke almost at once.

"I'm for that."

"So am I, sir," spoke young Breen, very white about the gills.

"Me, too," drawled Jellybeans.

Sergeant O'Hara smiled as if well satisfied.

Nurse Blake jotted down the names.

"House Two is anti-septically clean," went on the major. "Two men will live there. One, before he enters, will be bitten by an infected Stegomyia mosquito. Anticipating fever, we can catch the disease at its inception." He paused. "There's a very reasonable chance of recovery."

Brinkerhof clicked his heels.

"I'll do that, sir!" he cried.

"It seems that I'll have to be the fifth man, sir," O'Hara said with a grin. "I seem to have got off lightly."

"You will not be bitten, but will bunk with Brinkerhof," stated the major. "Our experiment attempts to prove that contagion is impossible; that no human being can acquire yellow fever without the bite of an infected Stegomyia. Do you all understand your tasks?"

"Yes, sir," they answered in one voice.

"I forgot to mention that the three volunteers lodging in the filthy hut will have to stay there twenty days," murmured the major, and could not quite suppress a smile at the look of horror on their faces.

The volunteers saluted and Sergeant O'Hara marched them out of the laboratory.

Major Reed began to discuss details with Carroll and Agramonte, and that gave Frances a chance to slip out unobserved. She darted out on to the veranda and called out to the sergeant, but if he heard he paid no heed. She had to run after him. The sergeant halted and the others went on.

"John, I wanted to tell you. I'm glad you're doing what you are."

She looked up at him wistfully.

"I'm going for the relaxation of it, Miss Blake," O'Hara answered stiffly and formally.

"But you still don't understand."

"Maybe not. Is there anything else, Miss Blake?"

"Yes, John. I'm sorry about the other night. I think you were perfectly right, but I was so anxious for the poor major to get a volunteer, but now that you—"

Her voice trailed away.

"What are you trying to say?"

He was puzzled.

"That now you have volunteered I'm terribly frightened," she whispered, and

Very solemnly the Major told the volunteers of the grave risk they were taking.

then added with a half-sob: "For you!"

The big hands of Sergeant O'Hara went out and gripped her shoulders. His eyes were twinkling and gay.

"Darlin'," he cried, "you pick out the funniest darned time to come to your senses!"

Nights of Torment

IN House One life was scarce worth living. The atmosphere was so heavy and fetid that you could cut it with a knife. There was hardly any ventilation, because the major wanted a high temperature in the room. The bedding and night attire of the victims of yellow fever stank. The tubs of water soon became warm.

"And we're doing this for nothing," complained Busch. "I've been in here about twelve hours, and it feels like twelve years. The major sure lived up to his reputation for thoroughness when he made this a filthy hut. It's not mosquitoes that'll be biting me soon."

"I wonder how my girl in Montana is getting on," dreamily murmured Jellybeans.

"Well, she'd not think much of you if she could see you now," gibed Busch. "How you feeling, Breen?"

"So far, I have no symptoms." Breen looked up from a book. "I suppose we should take our temperatures again."

"You took yours only an hour ago," growled Busch. "Let's have a game of cards. We'll play for the three hundred bucks each of us hasn't got."

In House Two everything was spotlessly clean. The beds were marvellous, and there was mosquito netting. There was plenty of air, and, as far as Sergeant O'Hara was concerned, it was a rest cure. All his life he had had a great deal of confidence in himself, and he would have wagered a year's pay that he would not get Yellow Jack. He was certain that he was immune. A pity that he had to stay cooped up in this place when he could have been taking Frances out for a canoe trip, but that could come later. The world was very rosy to the Irishman.

Brinkerhof had been bitten by an infected Stegomyia, but did not look ill. Of course, the disease might be days in developing. Bad luck for the major if nothing happened to Brinkerhof. And in his heart of hearts O'Hara did not expect anything to happen to his companion. He had not given Yellow Jack very much thought, but he did not think a great deal of this mosquito idea. It couldn't have been a skeeter that killed Doc Lazar.

So the days passed. Regularly at the times stated on the chart the two men took their temperatures. They wiled away the time with cards and books.

One morning O'Hara was lying flat on his back, dreaming that maybe he and Frances would get married some time, when the restless movements of Brinkerhof made him glance round.

"You okay, pal?"

"Sure, sure!" came the answer. "Though I find it darned stuffy in here."

"The window's open."

Brinkerhof rolled off his bed.

"Guess I'll have a breather." He stood by the window for a moment, and then closed it. "Gee, that wind seems cold. I'm all chilly."

O'Hara looked up from a book.

"Come back to bed," he called out.

"Another four days and we'll be outa here."

"I feel awful hot, O'Hara."

The sergeant rolled out of bed.

"First you're hot, then you're cold, now you're hot again. Here, steady on!" He caught Brinkerhof by the arm August 20th, 1935.

as the orderly swayed. He peered closely and then helped Brinkerhof to the bed. A moment later he had flung back the window. At the top of his voice he yelled: "Ambulance! Ambulance! Ambulance!"

The three prisoners in the dirty hut scrambled off their beds and stood on a ladder to peer out of the window.

"It's Yellow Jack!" gasped Breen. "Brink's got it."

"And whether we get it or not we've got to stay here another four days," moaned Busch. "And I'm being eaten alive with lice; I smell like a polecat, and I've a thirst that I'll never quench. Ah, here comes old Charlie with the ambulance!"

"They're carrying Brink out," cried Breen. "He's not delirious yet."

"I'll be babbling when I gets outa here," drawled Jellybeans. "My gal in Montana will have to marry a loony."

Brinkerhof had got Yellow Jack right enough, but as the major had said, they were prepared for the first symptoms, and O'Hara was like a schoolboy when he heard that his companion was out of danger.

The three wretches in House One now and again hammered to be let out before they went crazy, and O'Hara felt so sorry for them that he spent a week's pay on champagne. The sergeant had hoped that Brinkerhof might have been allowed a drink, but this the doctors would not allow.

O'Hara was planning on taking Frances out one evening when he got an order to report to Major Reed, and he wondered whether he was to be called over the coals regarding the champagne. To his surprise, when he reported at the laboratory, he found not only the doctors there, but Dr. Finlay and Major Gorgas. The latter had been forced to leave Panama with his canal-building crew because the place was rampant with yellow fever.

"John"—Major Reed looked at the sergeant almost eagerly—"I've got something to ask you."

"Yes, sir."

O'Hara beamed at the doctors and waited for the major to speak.

"You and the others have done enough to warrant Congressional medals: Medals, I'm quite sure, you'll never receive."

That made O'Hara laugh.

"Here's a chance to be a real hero, O'Hara." It was Carroll who spoke, and he seemed unduly excited. "A man who'll step forward and do it all over again."

The sergeant looked inquiringly at Major Reed.

"Dr. Carroll is quite right, John. Only this time we know that our mosquito is the criminal. Those three in the dirty house will walk out tomorrow perfectly well, demonstrating definitely that nothing but the Stegomyia matters. You yourself have proven that Yellow Jack can't be acquired by contact."

"But can we prove that you're not immune, O'Hara," impetuously cried Carroll. "Maybe you'd never get it, anyway, under any circumstances. That's the first question the world will ask us!"

"It seems a good question," O'Hara admitted.

"If we could give you yellow fever now with a mosquito—" began the major.

"It's a temptation to me, sir," interrupted O'Hara. "But I couldn't do it."

"Afraid?" sneered the hot-tempered Carroll.

"In a way." O'Hara smiled and nodded his head. "It's the fear I have of blasting all you've done. No chance of John O'Hara catching Yellow Jack or anything else from the nastiest little bug that ever lived."

"We'll take that chance, O'Hara," urged Carroll. "We'll unloose every Stegomyia in the menagerie on you."

"You're under no compulsion, John," said the major, but his expression was pleading.

"It'll be ruinous to you, sir," replied O'Hara. "But I'll do it if you like."

"Bravely spoken, young man," chimed in Dr. Finlay as he rose to his feet. "I wish you gentlemen the best of success with your experiment."

"There's no time like the present, John," stated the major. "In hoping you would agree we have everything prepared."

"There's one condition I'll be after making," O'Hara's eyes were twinkling. "Can I have anything I like to eat?"

"Anything, John."

"Then I'll have strawberries and cream for my breakfast."

John O'Hara was placed in a sterile bath and left to soak with a canvas cloth exposing only his head. After a while a door opened softly, and Nurse Blake came in, and her hand went to her mouth when she saw him.

"John, I've just heard," she cried. "Are you mad? You mustn't do it! You've risked your life once, you're young. Your whole life's before you. Let someone else do the rest of this."

"Sure, it's sweet to know you'll worry." He smiled at her affectionately. "But I couldn't let the major down."

"But, John, I won't let—"

"Major! Major!" John raised his voice. "I'm all set."

When Frances heard the footsteps of the major in the next room she had no option but to go.

They took the sergeant to House One. He was wrapped in a dressing-gown and seemed to be quite content. Carroll opened the door, whilst Charlie held a glass bottle with a cap over it and shook as if he were holding some sort of infernal machine. The major took the bottle from him and handed it to O'Hara.

"You know what to do?"

"Sure—sure." Holding the bottle, O'Hara went up the steps of the house. He looked back and grinned. "And my strawberries and cream?"

"You'll have them with your breakfast in the morning," the major assured him. "Good luck!"

The door closed.

"If he comes through this he deserves medals and promotion," muttered Carroll.

"I have already spoken on the matter to the general," answered the major. "Now, O'Hara is an impetuous young man, and he will probably release all those Stegomyias, and he may get the disease quicker than he imagines. I don't want O'Hara to know we're watching him, but I want it done without him knowing. Nothing can happen till morning. Perhaps it would be as well if you took him his breakfast, Carroll."

"Certainly, major, certainly," agreed the doctor. "And I'll go in there sheathed in armour. I'll report on him."

"And if he is still all right then, watchers will be posted. He's promised to ring that bell, but the fever may overcome him so quickly that he won't have the chance. Every so often someone must take a quick look in at one of the windows."

THE PAINTED STALLION

Read This First

Backed by Dupray, a scheming Spaniard who is Governor of Santa Fe, but who has received news that he is to be deposed by the newly established Mexican Republic, a band of renegades led by one, Zamora, is preying on the wagon-trains that ply to and fro across the Western wilds with rich merchandise under their awnings.

The activities of these renegades are hampered by a mystery rider on a painted stallion, who has sworn to defeat outlawry and who again and again warns the bandits' intended victims of their danger by means of whistling arrows.

The year is 1824, and in that year an American frontiersman known as Clark Stuart is detail 2 by the U.S. Government to negotiate a trade treaty with the Mexican authorities. It is a treaty which Dupray is anxious to prevent from being conceded, and at his instigation Zamora invites the Indians to attack a wagon-train led by a trader named Jamison—a wagon-train with which Clark is travelling, and whose personnel also includes Jim Bowie, famous as the inventor of the Bowie knife, and Kit Carson, a boy later to become renowned as a Western scout.

The Rider of the Painted Stallion saves the train by calling off the Redskins, who regard that mysterious figure as a supernatural being, and later the Rider rescues Clark from the clutches of some of Zamora's henchmen.

Clark afterwards learns the Rider is in reality a white girl, and then, while he is on the trail of a renegade named Macklin, the frontiersman is robbed of a letter of authority from the U.S. Government. Clark tracks Macklin to the headquarters of Dupray, but is discovered hiding in a cupboard, and, the door being locked on him, a squad of soldiers are ordered to pour a volley through the panels.

Imprisoned

AWARE that a fusillade was about to be discharged through the locked door of the cupboard in which he had concealed himself, Clark Stuart had almost given himself up for lost when suddenly he chanced to look up, and in spite of the gloom which shrouded the narrow confines of the press he saw that there was a shelf above him.

It was a shelf which was at a higher level than the lintel of the door, the cupboard being loftier than that door, and in desperation Clark flung his hands over his head and clutched this shelf. Then he pulled himself up to it, and had hardly scrambled on to it when the muskets of the firing-squad belched in unison.

From his perch Clark heard the bullets smash through the panels of the door below him and spank into the cupboard's wall, and knew that if he had not hoisted himself to the shelf he would have sunk lifeless under that leaden hail. As it was, he was not by any means out of danger, for inevitably the door would be opened so that Dupray might behold the result of his men's handiwork, and the scout could only hope that he would be able to fight his way out through the scoundrelly Lieutenant Governor's minions and escape from the presidio or fortress without being shot down.

Crouching on the shelf he drew his gun, and waited, and after a moment's silence the cupboard door was unfastened and opened, the soldiers of the firing-squad appearing on the threshold with their captain.

On the instant Clark sprang from his vantage point, charging headlong into the uniformed men and taking them completely unawares. But though two of them were bowled over by his onset and the others were scattered to right and left they quickly recovered themselves and closed in on him.

A fierce scuffle ensued, a scuffle during which Clark had no chance to use his gun. Indeed, it was wrested from his grasp at the commencement of the mêlée, and for all that he gave a good account of himself with his bunch of knuckles, the odds against him were too heavy and he was finally overpowered.

He might well have been slain there and then, but looking on with Zamora and Macklin, Dupray suddenly ordered the soldiers to bind his hands behind his back, and for some reason best known to himself withheld the command to destroy him.

Rope being procured, Clark's wrists were lashed firmly together, and soon he was standing there helplessly, the captain of the firing-squad by his side and the rest of the soldiery gathered about him. Then Dupray stepped forward and addressed the scout.

"When a spy is captured in this presidio he usually receives short shrift," he observed in English, "for I am determined to safeguard my life against assassins and malcontents of every description."

Clark eyed him steadfastly. He sensed that the Lieutenant Governor had delivered himself of that speech for the sole purpose of misleading the soldiery and disguising the real motive behind his wish to dispose of him.

"I didn't come here to assassinate you," the frontiersman announced. "What's more, I'm not a spy—and I've a pretty good idea you know it."

Dupray's eyes glittered.

"You are not a spy?" he reiterated smoothly. "Then why do we find you hiding in my headquarters? Listen, scout, the Mexican Republic has just been established in place of the old Spanish regime. This is a new country, and its enemies are not treated kindly."

"But I'm not an enemy," Clark retorted, "and if I can see the Governor—"

"Our new Governor has not yet arrived from Mexico City," Dupray cut in. "Until he does arrive I am in full charge here, and if you have anything to say I am the only one to whom you can appeal for a hearing."

Clark bit his lip. In view of the snatch of conversation he had previously heard between this man and Macklin, he had no hope of making any impression on the Spaniard by stating his case.

"Well?" snapped Dupray, as the frontiersman remained silent. "Have you nothing to say, after all?"

"I can only say that I am Clark Stuart," was the reply, "and that I've been authorised to represent the United States Government in trade negotiations with Mexico."

"I see," the Lieutenant Governor murmured. "And your credentials?"

Clark glanced at Macklin, who was hovering beside Zamora.

"I had a letter of authority from Washington," he announced, "but that man stole it from me."

Dupray affected to frown.

"That is a serious charge, senior," he remarked, and then turning to Macklin:

"Did you steal any such letter from this man who calls himself Clark Stuart?" he asked the gangster.

"Naw, of course I didn't," Macklin rejoined. "I don't know who he is an' I don't know what he's a-doin' here, but I know he's sure lyin' about me."

Clark glared at the outlaw, and then flashed his eyes on Dupray again as the latter raised his voice once more.

"It's only your word against Macklin's, apparently," the Lieutenant Governor said to the scout. "And Macklin is known to us. I have every reason to regard him as honest and trustworthy."

The frontiersman's lip curled at that. "When my friends of the Jamison wagon-train show up here," he retorted, "they'll not only identify me, but they'll also bear me out in statin' that Macklin is a low-down, treacherous, murderin'—"

"Enough!" Dupray interrupted sharply. "I am not prepared to listen to any lying calumnies against Macklin. You have been caught in this presidio under suspicious circumstances, and you cannot give adequate account of yourself. Therefore as Lieutenant Governor of Santa Fe I August 20th, 1933.

am instructing that you shall be removed to a cell, whence you will be taken out and shot when I choose to name a day for your execution."

Clark ground his teeth together.

"You listen to me!" he jerked. "I don't know why you're so anxious to get rid of me, but I know that all this talk about me bein' a spy is so much eyewash, and—"

Once again Dupray broke in on him, wheeling abruptly on the captain of the guards.

"Get the prisoner out of here!" he barked. "Take him to one of the cells and lock him up! Pronto!"

Clutched by the arms, Clark was hustled along the corridor, and as the U.S. Government agent disappeared in the custody of the soldiery and the garrison officer, Dupray smiled at Macklin and Zamora.

"So much for Senor Stuart," he commented. "Perhaps it was just as well that he followed you here after all, Macklin."

"So," Zamora interposed, "just as well, your Excellency. But why delay his execution? Why not have him shot at once?"

Dupray fingered his clean-shaven chin.

"I had intended to have him shot at once," he mused. "But as it transpired that he escaped that first death-volley and was disarmed and captured without bloodshed, it occurred to me that we might wring some useful information out of him in due course regarding the details of his mission. Moreover, I rather like to think of this man Stuart spending a day or two in reflecting upon his approaching end, and wondering just when it will come."

Macklin looked at him comprehensively.

"Meanin' he's caused us a deal o' trouble an' you'd like ter see him squirm, hey?" he said. "Well, them's my sentiments, too, an' there's nothin' like suspense fer breakin' down a man's nerve."

In the meantime, while the foregoing discussion was afoot, Clark Stuart was being marched from the presidio to a long, low shed which stood on the outside of the stronghold's north wall. It was a shed divided up into mean cells whose windows were rendered impenetrable by strong iron bars, and into one of these cells Clark was cast, a stout wooden door being locked and bolted upon him. Then his escort marched off and the frontiersman was left to his thoughts—thoughts that were gloomy enough, though in his plight he clung to one slender possibility of rescue.

He had not forgotten Davy Crockett, that staunch friend whom he had encountered in Santa Fe, and who had ridden on his behalf to meet the Jamison wagon-train with the news that Macklin had right of entry to the Lieutenant Governor's citadel.

If the wagon-train arrived in Santa Fe before Dupray carried out his threat of execution then there was a chance that the imprisoned frontiersman would be saved from death, for his friends of the column, would move heaven and earth to find out what had happened to him, and if they discovered his situation, they would leave no stone unturned in their efforts to secure his release.

Ahead of the Wagon-train

TWO days after Clark had been lodged in the cell building adjoining the north wall of the presidio, Dupray and Zamora might have been found in close consultation within the Lieutenant Governor's study.

"Three times I have visited Stuart, your Excellency," Zamora was saying, "and on each occasion I have asked him many questions concerning his instructions from Washington. He has answered none of them, however. What is more, he does not seem to be giving way under the strain of awaiting execution. I tell you, that fellow is a man of iron."

Dupray uttered a grunt.

"He may be a man of iron," he remarked, "but another day or two of suspense may find him more pliable. Anyhow, we—"

He did not complete the sentence, for at that juncture there was a tap on the door, and as the Lieutenant Governor called out in answer a soldier put in an appearance and saluted smartly.

"Three men are at the main gateway of the presidio, your Excellency," the soldier announced. "They are Americans, and they claim to be from the Jamison wagon-train. It is their desire that you should permit them an interview, Excellency."

Dupray and Zamora exchanged glances. Then the Lieutenant Governor addressed the man in the doorway.

"Bring these Americans to me," he ordered. "I will see them."

The soldier departed, and when he had gone Dupray went out into the corridor where Clark Stuart had been captured a couple of days previously. From a chest there he picked up a gandy serape, and looking back at Zamora significantly, he pulled ajar the door of the cupboard in which Clark had come so near to death and draped the serape over that door so that the bullet-holes in its panels were concealed.

He now stepped back into his sanctum, and was seated at his desk with Zamora by his side when the representatives of the Jamison column were shown in.

The foremost of the trio was Jamison himself, and his companions were Jim Bowie and Davy Crockett, the last-named remaining a little in the background as the wagon-boss and his whiskered aide moved close to the Lieutenant Governor's desk.

Pretending to have been busy with a quill pen and an official-looking document, Dupray eyed the newcomers blandly, his sallow features radiating that genial expression which could mask his true character so effectively.

"Senores, I do not believe we have met," he declared. "But I understand you wish to have an audience with the Lieutenant Governor of Santa Fe, and I am he—Escobedo Dupray at your service. Er—this gentleman with me is Zamora, my—er—my confidential secretary."

Jamison squinted at Zamora, and could not help thinking that he was a pretty unsavoury-looking customer to be the confidential secretary of a Lieutenant Governor. For that matter, however, he was not favourably impressed with Dupray, either. The man's veneer of charm did not deceive him. He saw through it, and marked the underlying craftiness of his eyes, the ruthlessness of his thin-lipped mouth.

Jamison's scrutiny was more than ordinarily critical perhaps. Nor was that to be wondered at. Davy Crockett had come to him with word that Macklin had apparently had right of entry into the Lieutenant Governor's headquarters. Therefore he, Jamison, had come here with the suspicion already formed in his mind that the Lieutenant Governor might not be a pretty honourable personage.

"My name's Jamison," the wagon-boss now said. "These here are two friends o' mine—Jim Bowie an' Davy Crockett."

"Ah, Senor Jamison!" Dupray exclaimed. "I am happy to welcome you to Santa Fe. My good wishes have been with you on your long trip."

"Thanks," Jamison murmured. "As a matter of fact, the wagon-train ain't due to arrive till to-morrow. We three pushed on ahead expectin' to find Clark Stuart in Santa Fe, but we've combed the town an' there ain't no word of him there. That's why we came out to the presidio. We figured he was bound to have called here."

Escobedo Dupray spoke suavely.

"You refer, of course, to Clark Stuart, the agent of the U.S. Government," he said. "Yes, he did call here, and he presented his credentials to me. It seems they'd been stolen from him, but he had succeeded in recovering them."

He made a motion with his quill-pen as if to indicate that Jamison and his companions should draw up chairs for themselves, but neither Bowie, Crockett, nor the wagon-boss accepted the invitation.

"So Clark Stuart looked you up, eh?" Jamison remarked. "And where is he now?"

"Why, he rode out to meet the new Governor who is coming here from Mexico City," Dupray rejoined glibly. "But pray be seated, gentlemen. You look uncomfortable standing there."

Jamison did sit down now. So did Davy Crockett. But Jim Bowie remained on his two feet, and, while Dupray went on to give an imaginary description of Clark's visit, the old Indian fighter began to range about the room in a suspicious fashion, and even wandered a little way out into the corridor.

The serape hanging over the cupboard door took his eye, and, with the sharp wit characteristic of a scout and tracker, he wondered if it might have been placed there to hide anything, and as a consequence he surreptitiously drew aside a loose corner of the sheet.

He immediately perceived the bullet-holes in the door-panels, and without a word he let the hem of the serape fall back. Then he sauntered back across the threshold of Dupray's study, giving no indication of the discovery he had made.

"Clark musta left pretty sudden," was all he said, breaking in on the conversation the Lieutenant Governor was holding with Jamison and Crockett.

"Yes," Dupray admitted. "As a matter of fact, he did. He was anxious to contact the new Governor as quickly as possible."

Jamison stood up all at once.

"Well," he declared, "I reckon we won't take up any more o' your time, your Excellency, but I hope we'll see you again after our wagons get in to-morrow."

"Amigo," Dupray replied, "not only will you see me again, but you will see me in holiday mood. For I propose to order a fiesta in honour of your arrival—a fiesta which will take place to the south of the town, and which will be attended by all citizens of Santa Fe who care to fraternise with you and partake of the victuals and entertainment I shall provide."

After expressing pleasure at this happy thought on the Lieutenant Governor's part, Jamison took his leave in company with Crockett and Bowie, both of whom followed the wagon-boss in a silence that was not broken until they had mounted their horses and left the presidio.

"Hey, what in tarnation's the idea of you believin' that varmint Dupray?" Davy Crockett demanded of Jamison, then. "Didn't I tell you that he must be in cahoots with Macklin?"

Jamison pacified him with a gesture.

"Davy, I didn't believe a word that hombre said," he announced. "But as long as Dupray thinks he's fooled us we'll stand a better chance of findin' out what's really happened to Clark. And if Clark's in any trouble, we'll get him out of it just as soon as we can locate him."

"Yeah?" Bowie struck in grimly.

"Well, if you ask me, I got a hunch Clark is past helpin'."

He went on to mention the bullet-holes he had seen, and gave it as his opinion that there had been a fight in the corridor outside Dupray's sanctum, his words casting a dark depression over the minds of Jamison and Davy Crockett. Then after a while the wagon-boss spoke again.

"Pardner," he said to Bowie, "I'm hopin' things ain't so bad as you figure. But if they are, then somebody's got to answer for Clark Stuart's death."

About that same time, up in the Lieutenant Governor's sanctum, Zamora was delivering himself of a caustic observation.

"You told those Americanos a pretty story, senor," he muttered, "and they were clearly deceived by it. But I do not understand why you should go to the expense of arranging a fiesta for them."

Dupray smiled evilly.

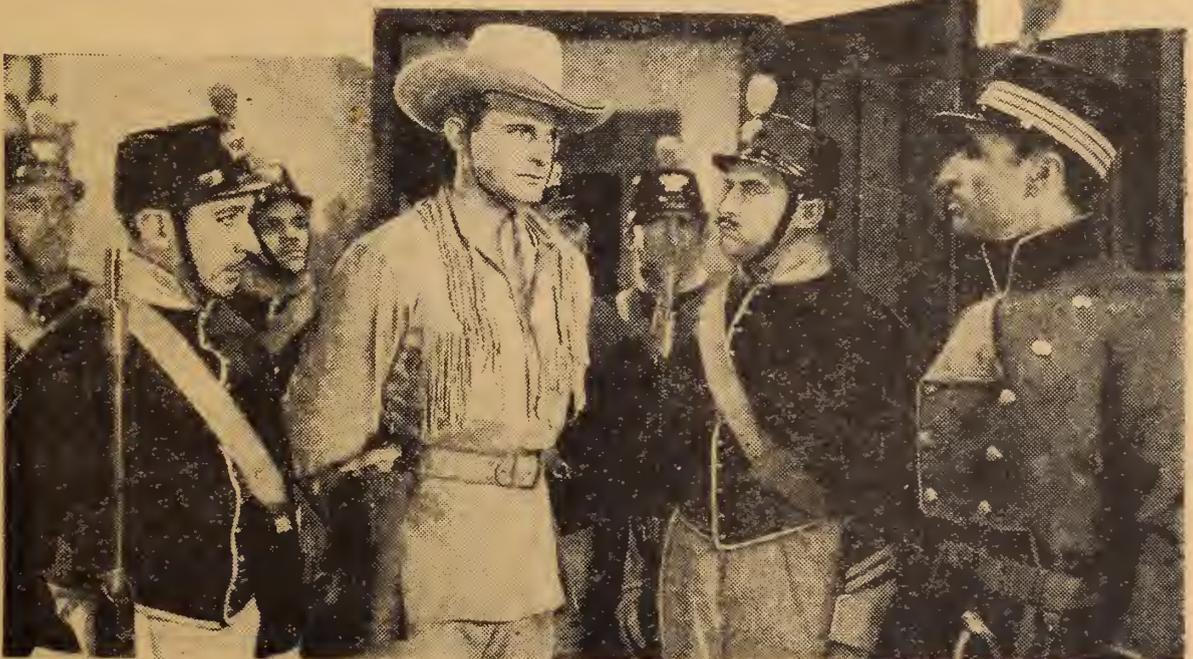

"Let me explain," he said. "While that fiesta is in progress, some of your men will make a trip to the Jamison wagon, which will no doubt be unattended, or nearly so. One of those wagons is bound to contain the powder and ammunition supply of the train, and it will be your job to locate it and remove it, so that Jamison and his followers will be at a disadvantage in a fight."

"A fight?"

"Yes, Zamora. For after you have got rid of that powder wagon, I will devise plans for you to attack the Jamison encampment. You see, amigo, I still intend that the merchandise of that train shall fall into our hands before it can be marketed here, and I might say that it will recompense us many times over for the expense of the fiesta."

Zamora's eyes gleamed.

"Now I follow you," he murmured. "The Americanos will only be able to resist so long as the ammunition in their belts holds out. After that, there will be none to fall back on, and Jamison and his crowd will be at our mercy," he gloated evilly.

Rope being procured, Clark's wrists were lashed firmly together, and soon he was standing there helplessly, the captain of the firing-squad by his side and the rest of the soldiery gathered about him.

August 26th, 1938.

"Exactly," Dupray answered. "Moreover, you may rely on me to requisition all ammunition from the stores in Santa Fe, on the pretext that it is needed for the garrison of the presidio. Thus Jamison will not be able to lay in a fresh supply when he discovers the powder wagon is missing. And, incidentally, you need have no fear of the people in Santa Fe interfering when you stage your attack on the encampment, Zamora. They may be in sympathy with the Americanos, but if I know anything of them they will not choose to throw away their lives in an affair that is no concern of theirs."

Zamora looked at him shrewdly. "You are right enough there," he agreed. "The people of Santa Fe will keep out of harm's way. There is just one point, however. What about the presidio garrison? They might take up arms against my bravos. Remember, they have no idea that you and I are behind the banditti who operate between here and the U.S. frontier. Remember, the troops are only loyal to you because they believe you stand for law and order."

Again Escobedo Dupray smiled. "I have not overlooked the question of the troops," he said. "Before the time comes for you to attack Jamison and his friends, I shall see to it that the presidio is practically denuded of soldiery. I shall see to it that after the fiesta the bulk of the garrison is despatched from here into the northern hills—to punish the Indians there, who, I am told, scalped some fool of a prospector up in Canyada Colorado the other day."

Death-Freight

A NEW day had dawned, fresh and fair—such a day as might make men feel that it was good to be alive. But in his cell, hard by the north wall of the presidio, where he had been visited only by Zamora and an occasional soldier who had fed him at meal-times, Clark Stuart gained no enjoyment from the brightness of the weather.

He was alive, but could not help wondering sombrely if he would still be so when the westering sun had crossed the sky and the shades of another night had drawn in over the landscape. Or would his bullet-riddled body be lying in some nameless grave near the fortress? Would the threat of execution that was hanging over his head have been carried out by the time dusk had fallen?

Such were Clark's thoughts as, with hands still bound behind his back, he stood gazing out through the window of his cell—a window fitted with grimy panes, outside which were bars of iron embedded in the adobe of ledge and lintel.

Clark's cell was the end one in the row, and his window was located in a side wall that faced east. Nevertheless the sprawling settlement of Santa Fe was not within the scope of his vision, and he was unaware that the Jamison wagon-train had arrived this morning and was encamped to the south of the town. He was likewise ignorant of the fact that a fiesta was in progress—a fiesta that had provided the newcomers from the States and the citizens of Santa Fe with an opportunity of mingling pleasantly.

All that Clark could see from his prison was a strip of open terrain bounded by a dusty ridge, and he was looking towards that ridge gloomily when all at once his glance was attracted to a figure which appeared on the crown of the eminence.

The figure, silhouetted against the skyline, was mounted on a horse, and, although far out of call, was identified almost immediately by Clark. It was the figure of the mysterious white girl who wore the clothes of a Redskin and who was known throughout the wilderness between Santa Fe and Independence as the Rider of the Painted Stallion, enemy of outlawry.

Why she had wandered so close to the town the imprisoned frontiersman did not know—though if he had been aware of the Jamison wagon-train's arrival he might have guessed that she was merely there to satisfy herself that the column had reached its destination safely. As it was, he only knew that a person who had already proved herself friendly towards him was in sight, and would assuredly endeavour to help him if only he could acquaint her with his unenviable position.

No guard or gaoler was in the neighbourhood of the cell-building. Clark's captors seemed to consider that he did not need watching, and, Zamora excepted, did not come near him between meals. But the frontiersman had no doubt that if he broke the window and tried to hail the Rider, someone in the presidio would hear his voice and come running to investigate. Into the bargain, it was all too clear to him that, even if he bellowed with all the force of his lungs, no shout from him could ever carry to that figure on the ridge.

Yet Clark did decide to break the window, for all of a sudden an inspiration occurred to him.

Climbing on to a bunk that was the cell's only article of furniture, he lifted his boot and smashed one of the panes. Then he twisted round and thrust his pinioned wrists into close contact with the jagged edge of the breach he had made in the window, and in another moment he was chafing his bonds against the rent in the glass.

Before long he had severed the thongs, and, his wrists free, he turned and peered out through the window again, noting to his relief that the Rider of the Painted Stallion was still limned on the ridge.

Clark now picked up a fragment of glass that had fallen on to the sill, and by means of this he extemporised a kind of semaphore, catching the sun's light and flashing the reflection of that light afar, with such shrewd aim that it smote dazlingly into the eyes of that silhouetted figure he had recognised.

The girl twisted her head this way and that, as if to elude the irritating glint, attaching no special significance to it at first. But as it continued to play upon her eyes persistently, even when she tugged the rein of her horse and moved a little to one side, she suspected all at once that someone was purposely directing it on her, and she quickly focused her gaze on the quarter whence it was coming.

As he realised that she was staring towards his cell-window, Clark pulled out a white handkerchief and waved it through the rent he had driven in the pane, and, detecting the flutter of that handkerchief, the girl hesitated only for a few seconds before starting to ride down from the ridge.

She advanced cautiously, very likely fearing a trap, but a few minutes later she was near enough to distinguish the prisoner who had attracted her attention, and, as she saw the handsome scout who had saved her life when she had been trapped in the box canyon some days previously, she gave vent to an exclamation of concern.

In another moment she was urging her stallion close to the door of Clark's cell, and then she spoke rapidly to the horse in the Comanche Indian dialect, whereupon the animal wheeled right-about and proceeded to lash out at the door with its hind hoofs.

Under the onslaught of those powerful hoofs the woodwork splintered and gave way, flying into smithereens, and, ordering the stallion to desist when the door had been disposed of, the Rider waited for Clark to emerge.

The big frontiersman slipped out into the open almost immediately and addressed words of gratitude to the girl. Then she motioned to her horse's back, indicating that he should climb up behind her, but he shook his head and turned towards a small stable adjoining the cell-building.

He had seen one of his captors lead his blaze-faced sorrel into that stable, and he now fetched the bronc out. At that the Rider of the Painted Stallion nodded understandingly, and then with a wave of her hand she swung around and headed for the ridge from which she had come.

Clark himself lost no time in climbing astride his pony, for he imagined the Painted Stallion's attack on the cell door may have been heard in the presidio. Nor was he mistaken, for as he was about to gallop off Zamora came charging round the north-east angle of the fortress wall on horseback.

There was a gun in his fist, and as he clapped eyes on Clark he attempted to bring the weapon to bear on the scout. But before he could do so the American had spurred close to him, and, striking up the Dago's arm with one hand, he hit him flush in the jaw with the other.

Zamora plunged out of the saddle and lay grovelling in the dust. As for Clark, he drove his heels into the flanks of his sorrel and "hit the breeze" for town, and it was as he was approaching the settlement that he saw a great number of prairie schooners assembled some little distance to the south of Santa Fe.

He knew then that the Jamison column had arrived, but none of his friends appeared to be with the wagons. He suddenly espied a mob of people gathered close to the south gate of the town of Santa Fe, however, and as he drew nearer he made out familiar faces among them—the faces of wagon-drivers and outriders who belonged to the Jamison train.

They were fraternising with the people of the settlement, and in that genial concourse of human beings courteous Spanish-Americans were rubbing shoulders with rough-and-ready, jovial manured Yankees, gathering in groups around fires where haunches of venison and leef were being roasted, or tripping a measure to the strains of music provided by guitarists and fiddlers.

Such was the fiesta that had been arranged by Escobedo Dupray, and the Lieutenant Governor had graced it with his presence—was riding, resplendent in uniform, among the crowds, exchanging nods and smiles with citizens and visitors, receiving the salutes of unarmed soldiers of the garrison, for most of the troops of the citadel had been given a few hours furlough so that they might attend the festival.

Dupray did not realise it, but three men and a boy were keeping very close to him as he moved to and fro amid the throng. They were Jamison, Bowie, Davy Crockett and Kit Carson, and they had elected to watch the Lieutenant Governor and shadow him diligently, in the hope that he might meet with some one of his hirelings, and make some reference to Clark Stuart—some unguarded reference which the friends of the missing scout might overhear.

Jamison, Bowie, Crockett and Kit Carson were still sticking to Dupray's trail through the crowds when the swarms of revellers were scattered by the advent of a horseman. That horseman was none other than Clark, and as Jamison and his three companions beheld the frontiersman they shouted his name in accents of relief.

A few seconds later Clark was beside them, and, breaking in on their interrogations, he pointed acensingly at Dupray, whose face had become the picture of dismay and who was pulling at his mount's rein as if bent on making himself scarce.

"Stop that man!" Clark rapped out, and with characteristic promptitude Jim Bowie and Davy Crockett closed in on Dupray and gripped his pony's bridle, at the same time covering the Lieutenant Governor with their guns.

Dupray's escape having been frustrated, Clark Stuart went on to denounce him as one who was plainly hand in glove with a pack of outlaws and renegades, and in loud tones he detailed those facts which supported his indictment against the Lieutenant Governor.

His story raised angry murmurs from the men of the Jamison wagon-train, who had now mustered about their leaders. As for the citizens of Santa Fe and the soldiers on furlough from the presidio, they seemed amazed by the charges that were being made against the high personage they had held in esteem and respect, and they were giving tongue to a confused babble of exclamations when an elderly American was seen elbowing his way through the press of humanity.

He was a member of the Jamison column, and at sight of him the wagon-boss confronted him sternly.

"What are you doin' here, Saunders?" he demanded. "I thought you were detailed to stay at the encampment and keep an eye on the prairie schooners."

"Jamison," the other panted. "I ain't here 'as a man that shirked his duty. I'm here to tell you that a bunch o' gummies sneaked up on me at the encampment. One of 'em laid me out with the butt-end of a six-shooter, but I wasn't knocked cold, and I saw 'em pick out the powder-wagon an' make off with it, headin' south-east. What's more, one o' them was Macklin!"

Those within hearing lapsed into a blank silence at this piece of information. Then Clark Stuart found his voice.

"Jamison," he cried, "we've got to get after those outlaws, and there's no time to lose. Leave a couple of men in charge of Dupray and then come on with the rest of the boys. I'm ridin' ahead."

With the words he pushed his bronc forward through the crowd, and, clearing the mob, he struck out for the south-east, passing the wagon-encampment about a minute later and spying ahead of him a cloud of dust amidst which he was able to make out a group of horsemen and a speeding prairie schooner.

Boldly he gave chase, and he had not gone far when he looked back and saw that Jamison and his followers were running to the encampment and mounting up, having presumably left a couple of their number to stand guard over Escobedo Dupray. Nor was it long before the wagon-boss and his men were thundering in a body over the route the fugitives and Clark were taking.

Meanwhile, Clark was gaining steadily on the crooks, and these becoming aware that he was in pursuit, they opened fire on him viciously, but without effect.

The frontiersman responded with his gun, and saw one of the renegades clutch at his arm. Then all at once those of the rogues who were on horseback swerved off, abandoning the wagon—not because they feared Clark alone, but because the rest of the Jamison column's personnel were coming up fast in support of the scout, and the mules harnessed to the stolen prairie schooner were no match for saddle-ponies in pace.

Clark kept to the trail of the powder wagon, and, swiftly overhauling it, he drew abreast of the vehicle as it was racketing along the edge of a deep gulch. Then he set eyes on a solitary gangster crouching on the driving-seat with the mule-team's reins gripped in his fists—a gangster whom he recognised as one of the rogues who had figured in the attempt that had been made on his life at Boulder Notch.

The fellow, deserted by his comrades and lacking a bronc himself, had had no choice but to remain aboard the wagon and hope for the best. Now he reached for a forty-five and tried to draw a bead on Clark, but ere he could do so the U.S. Government agent had thrown himself from his horse and landed beside the outlaw.

He swung his right in a slashing upper-cut that took the ruffian under the chin, and the man went tumbling back amongst the powder barrels and ammunition boxes that packed the interior of the covered wagon. But in his fall he must have dragged on the reins in such a manner as to throw the mule-team into a wild swerve, and suddenly the whole equipage was going over the rim of the gulch.

Away to the rear, through the smother of dust set up by the powder-wagon's wheels, Jamison and his comrades saw the vehicle plunge down the declivity with its team. Pulling up, they watched it in horror as it capsized and went rolling towards the gulch's bed, the mules losing their footing and rolling with it in a kicking, struggling heap. Then it crashed with violent impact at the foot of the slope, and instantly there was a blinding sheet of flame and an ear-splitting roar as its deadly contents exploded!

"WHEN G-MEN STEP IN"

window at which he had entered, and scrambled out at it.

The foot-steps that had alarmed him were those of Clip and his companions, but the crooks did not descend the stairs—they passed on into the office, where Clip once more sat down at the desk.

"I've been waiting for this opportunity for a long time," he said, as he pulled a telephone towards him. "Now pipe down, all of you!"

"You're sure this'll work?" asked Jennings, as a number was dialled.

"I'm making it work!" snapped Clip; and then, into the telephone: "Let me speak to Miss Marjory Drake, please."

He had rung up Marjory's home, and in a very little while he heard her voice in his ear. He told her that some men from out of town were at the printing works with what looked like a really good order, but that they were leaving New York that night, and he had been unable to locate Fred.

"I've phoned everywhere," he lied. "If you could just come over to the plant and settle the deal, that would be fine. You will, right away? Oh, that's good!"

He put down the telephone. "She'll be here in about half an hour," he informed the others with evil satisfaction. "Jennings, you and Turk go to the boss' office. See that you get there at half-past nine. Tell him I sent you."

"He'll throw us out," growled Jennings.

"No, he won't. Tell him I'm in a jam—tell him anything. Turk, you keep him covered, then get me on the phone. I'll give that guy something to worry about! We're trading the girl for the money in his safe and those letters. On your way now, and bring him back as soon as you can."

At a quarter-past nine Fred was in his room at the Saerman Building and the door was locked. He had sent Morton home at seven o'clock, and, after Marjory had left for Long Island, he had gone out to get a meal, visited his own flat, and returned a little before nine, with three travelling bags.

The bags were on his desk, and the steel door of a huge safe was wide open. From the shelves of the safe he had transferred bundles of notes to two of the bags, and he was filling the third bag when a rap at the door startled him.

He deposited the bag in the safe, closed the steel door, and then went over to the door at which the rapping persisted. The broken panel had been replaced.

"Who is it?" he called out. "Bruce," replied his brother's voice; and he unlocked and opened the door. "Well, this is unexpected," he said. "Come on in!"

Bruce stepped into the room, and the door was shut and the key turned in the lock.

"How did you know I was here?" asked Fred.

"I went to your apartment," Bruce replied. "Your valet told me."

"Well, I had a little book-keeping to take care of. It's just about finished."

No account-books were on the desk, but Bruce picked up from it a pamphlet concerning European tours.

"Planning a little trip, Fred?" he inquired.

"Yes," admitted his brother. "Quite an extended one."

"Rather a sudden decision, isn't it?"

"Yes and no. I've sort of lost interest in the business since you refused to come in with me."

"Is that the only reason?"

"No, the trip's going to be a honeymoon. Marjory and I are going to be married."

Bruce stared.

"You're not going to marry Marjory Drake!" he said sternly.

"Why not?"

"Have you told her you're skipping the country, Fred?"

"What are you talking about?"

"I've just come from the Gothic Press," Bruce replied, and added significantly: "I found the revolving wall section."

Fred compressed his lips.

"Was your partner with you?" he questioned abruptly.

"No, I went alone."

"That simplifies things a lot. Listen, kid, I'm through with the rackets for good. I'll give you my word on that. I've never really hurt anyone—I've just taken a lot of suckers for a joy ride. Forget what you saw to-night and I'll give you more money than you've ever seen before."

"Commonly known as bribery!" scoffed Bruce.

"Why not?"

"You wouldn't understand."

"Bruce, there's such a thing as being a hero, and there's such a thing as being a sap."

"If it's being a sap to live up to an oath," Bruce retorted implacably, "then I guess I'm a sap. You know why I came here, Fred?"

"Yes, I know," sighed his brother, "the jig's up. Well, I've always said if I had to be arrested I'd want you to take the bows." He squared his shoulders and he held out his wrists. "Get your handcuffs, Mr. G-man, I'm ready!"

Bruce took out a pair of handcuffs, but somehow he could not snap them round the extended wrists, and he looked as miserable as he felt.

"What's the matter?" asked Fred. "You've been hunting me ever since you arrived in town. The hunt is over now, and you're in at the kill."

"I can't do it, Fred," Bruce said hoarsely. "I came here to arrest you, but I can't do it. No, you've taken care of me for a long time—now it's my turn. There's one way out."

"What do you mean?"

Bruce put away the handcuffs and pointed to the desk.

"Write down all you know concerning the rackets," he said. "Names, figures, addresses—everything the Government will need to wipe them out of existence."

"And?"

"I'll wait till you and Marjory are safely out of the country, then I'll turn in the information and my badge with it."

But Fred shook his head.

"Don't be a fool," he said, "the whole case would be open and shut. You're my brother—they'd know why you did it!"

"What difference does that make?" shrugged Bruce. "You never thought much of my being a Federal Agent."

"You couldn't even be a lawyer, after that! They'd disbar you!"

"You're wasting time, Fred. Start writing!"

"I've got a better plan. Wait until Marjory and I have gone out of the August 20th, 1938.

country, then tell your chief you've just found out about the Gothic Press."

"No dice, Fred."

"Well, suppose you were here tomorrow, bound hand and foot? You could tell 'em you'd come to arrest me, but I overpowered you."

Bruce was not to be persuaded.

"We'll do it my way," he insisted.

"Listen," said Fred, stepping closer, "you could say that we were talking. I took you off your guard and knocked you out—like this!"

The blow was entirely unexpected. It was a right cross to the jaw, and just to make sure that his brother really was knocked out, a left hook followed. Bruce thudded to the floor, on his back, and Fred was kneeling beside him, binding his ankles and his hands with rope from a parcel of programmes, when a rap at the door made him jump.

"Who is it?" he called.

"Jennings," was the reply.

"What do you want?"

"We're in a jam, boss."

"Okay, be there in a minute."

The Text

IN less than a minute Fred had tugged his unconscious brother into a large cupboard, across the room, and shut the door upon him. He flung the tell-tale pamphlet into a wastepaper basket, and then he went to the door, on the other side of which Jennings and Turk were waiting, and opened it.

The two entered the room, Turk with a hand in his coat-pocket, and the door was kicked shut by Jennings.

"Well, spill it!" barked Fred.

Turk's hand came out from his pocket, and in it was an ugly little Derringer.

"Lift 'em!" he snarled.

Fred raised his hands.

"What's this all about?" he asked.

"Get 'em high! Higher!"

Jennings passed his hands swiftly over Fred's pockets, and reported that there was nothing on him.

"You know what this is going to get you?" rasped the captive.

"Sure," drawled Turk, "all the dough in that safe!"

"Don't forget those two letters I told you about!"

"We ain't forgettin' 'em. Get over there!"

Fred was driven back against the safe, and Jennings went to the telephone on the desk and dialled a number.

"If that's Clip you're calling," said Fred, "you may as well tell him to start running, because if ever I catch up with him—"

"Shut up!" hissed Turk, and jabbed him in the ribs with the gun.

Clip, in the office of the printing works, answered the call. The rest of the gang were there, and Marjory was a prisoner in a chair.

"Put him on," directed Clip; and then, as Jennings held the telephone to Fred's ear: "I suppose you're kind o' mad, Mr. Garth?" mocked his voice. "Well, let's see how tough you are after you talk to a guest I have here."

The crook rose from the desk and thrust the telephone he had used upon Marjory.

"Say 'Hallo' to your boy friend," he directed harshly. "Go on, talk to him, and tell him he'd better get down here and bail you out, or it's gonna be just too bad. And don't think we're foolin'!"

Fred heard most of that, and then he heard Marjory's voice; but what she said, bravely enough, was:

"Don't pay any attention to him, Fred. He wouldn't dare touch me. I'm perfectly safe."

"Recognise that voice, Garth?" demanded Clip.

"You crazy fool!" stormed Fred. "You can't get away with anything like this, especially with a girl like Marjory Drake! You'll have every policeman in the country looking for you! Where are you?"

"Never mind where I am," Clip retorted. "The boys will bring you to me—and don't forget your girl friend's health depends on how quick you get here!"

Bruce, by this time, had recovered consciousness in the cupboard and was gnawing at the knots in the rope that bound his wrists. Jennings took the telephone from Fred, dropped it on its plunger, and said:

"Now, let's have that dough!"

"Yeah," said Turk, "and then we can go to that friend o' yours—the one who has the letters."

Fred, more concerned for Marjory's safety than his own, confessed that the letters were not with any friend, but were in the desk.

"Well, get 'em!" snapped Jennings.

Fred bent over the desk and opened a drawer in it; but his hope of being able to knock the gun out of Turk's hand was frustrated, for Jennings produced a gun of his own, and cried:

"No fumbling! Come on!"

Two envelopes were taken from the drawer, and Jennings pocketed them. Fred was then compelled to open the door of the safe and to step inside it.

"Where's the dough?" Jennings demanded, following him, while Turk remained by the door.

"In the bags," Fred replied.

"Grab two of 'em yourself, porter! I can watch your mitts better!"

Fred stooped and picked up two of the bags, and Jennings picked up the third one. They were deposited on the desk, and Jennings completed the filling of the middle one with notes from the safe, while Turk stood on guard with his gun. In the cupboard, Bruce had freed his wrists and started to unfasten the rope about his ankles.

The third bag was closed and fastened, the door of the safe was locked, and Fred was forced to carry two of the bags out to an elevator, with Turk very close beside him, and Jennings bringing up the rear with the bag he himself had filled.

The elevators were self-working after eight o'clock at night. Jennings pressed a button, a cage ascended, and the gates were opened. The three got into the cage, and the cage was disappearing from sight when Bruce came unshing across the corridor.

He had to wait for the cage of another elevator, and by the time he reached the street Jennings had followed Fred into the back of a saloon car that was standing there, and Turk was at the wheel and starting the engine. Bruce raced along the pavement to another car and scrambled into it beside Neale.

"Theo, tail that car!" he cried. "The one that's just pulled out—and don't get too close to it!"

Neale shot off in pursuit, and East Thirty-fourth Street was reached via Broadway. Bruce, realising that the crooks were taking his brother to the Gothic Press, told Neale to stop about a block away from the building, and there he alighted.

"Get to the nearest 'phone," he directed. "Call Preston, and tell him to bring a squad of men to the Gothic Press as fast as he can!"

Higher up the street the saloon had been brought to a standstill by Turk, who covered Fred while he got out, cumbered with the three bags, then he descended. Jennings followed, and the three entered the building.

Marjory was in the office with the gang, but a man was standing over her with a six-shooter in his hand, and she did not attempt to rise as they appeared. She looked at Fred, but she did not speak.

"Have a seat," said Clip with a wave of his hand.

"Drop them bags first!" snapped Jennings.

Fred set the bags on the floor and dropped into a chair.

"Did you get the dough?" demanded Clip eagerly.

"Right in them bags," responded Jennings.

"And the letters?"

The two envelopes were handed over, and the letters they contained were examined while the bags were being put away in a safe.

"How do I know you didn't make copies of these?" rasped Clip, whirling round on Fred.

"You don't," was the quiet reply, "but there's one way you can find out."

"That's what I was thinking. Let's you and me and Miss Drake talk things over in the press-room, where any noise we make won't be heard in the street."

"You've got nothing against her!" protested Fred. "Let her go!"

"Oh, I think she'd better come along," drawled Clip, "seeing that she knows almost as much now as you do."

"Wait a minute."

"On the way, both of you!" Clip roared. "Come on! You with me, Jennings—the rest of you stay here. Close the doors and lock them."

Fred was jerked to his feet by Jennings, who brandished a six-gun; Marjory rose of her own accord, and Clip caught hold of her arm. The two prisoners were marched out to the stairs and down the stairs to the printing-room.

Bruce had entered that room by way of the window-less than a minute before the door was opened, and he ducked down behind a bench.

Marjory and Fred were driven over to a wall and ordered to turn about, and Clip was advancing towards them when Bruce rose up behind the bench with an automatic in his hand, and shouted:

"Get 'em up!"

"Bruce!" screamed Marjory.

"Look out!" shouted Fred.

But Jennings had fred, and Bruce dropped the automatic, wounded in the wrist.

"Nice work, Jennings," said Clip, and he eyed Bruce malevolently. "Well, if it isn't little brother G-man, just in time for the party! Get over against that wall!"

Bruce stood beside his brother, who whispered hurriedly:

"If you get out of this alive, kid, there's a couple of letters in my desk that will tell you all you want to know."

"Stall them," Bruce whispered back. "The Feds are on their way."

Clip had stepped back to the other side of the bench on which the printed texts were piled, and Jennings was behind him.

"Turn round and take what's coming to you!" blared Clip. "Come on! We haven't got all night!"

Fred, with upraised hands, took a step forward.

"Wait a minute, Clip," he pleaded. "You're a smart guy—I'll make a deal with you."

"You get back!" Clip roared at him. "I'm not interested in any deals."

But Fred dared to take another step forward.

"I've got half a million bucks in a safety-deposit box," he said.

"They can stay there!"

"Half a million bucks if you let us go!"

Fred had nearly reached the piled up texts.

"Get back, there! I'm warning you!"

"You'd better do it, Clip, because if you don't—"

With a sudden sweep of his right arm he sent a stack of texts showering off the bench against the crook and with his left fist sent him crashing to the floor.

"Bruce, the wall!" he cried.

Bruce was close to the box-like cavity behind the "No Smoking" notice. He reached into it and tugged at the lever. But Jennings' gun spat flame, and Fred fell in a crumpled heap amongst the fallen texts.

In almost the same moment, Neale appeared at the open window, and he fired at Jennings, who dropped his gun and held up his hands, blood streaming from a wound in his cheek.

The movable section of the wall was beginning to revolve, but Bruce did not bundle Marjory into the room beyond it. Robert Preston had burst in at the door from the stairs, and with him were half a dozen armed G-men. Neale scrambled in over the sill of the window and hurled himself upon Clip, who was beginning to rise, and Preston shouted:

"All right, get 'em and hold 'em!"

Upstairs other G-men had captured the rest of the gang, but Fred was lying dead upon the floor.

Bruce dropped on his knees to look mournfully down into glazing eyes, and Preston put a hand on his shoulder.

"It's too bad, Bruce," he said sympathetically.

Fred's limp right hand was resting upon one of the texts he had sent flying, and, somehow, it seemed appropriate to his end.

"Those who live by the sword," it ran, "shall perish by the sword."

Mosquito Versus Man

THE sergeant closed the door of House Two and glanced round in an amused, whimsical way. He held up the bottle and made a face at the small things beating against the glass walls. He put the bottle down on a table, yawned, and wandered round the room to see that everything was in order. Satisfied, he took off his dressing-gown. Except for trunks he was naked. He pulled back the mosquito netting over the bed and climbed inside, lying there for a while on his back, musing about the anxiety of Frances. Then he reached out a hand, and, lifting the netting, picked up the bottle. Might as well do the job thoroughly and release all these little darlings inside the netting so that they cannot escape. He lifted the lid and one escaped, and that made him laugh. He watched it for a while, then removed the cover completely and placed the bottle between his knees.

Buzz-zz-zz-zz! The Stegomyias buzzed forth, and for a while flew round the netting.

"Come on, girls!" shouted O'Hara. "I'll stand you a drink!"

Arms folded across his chest he watched them with amused tolerance, and then winced. He raised his hand. One little beauty had bitten his ankle.

"Hope it poisons ye!" he cried, and watched one settle on his knee. A moment later there were ten or more mosquitoes on his body. "Let 'em all come!"

He laughed, and couldn't resist squashing one that dared to settle on the end of his nose.

Tiring of the sport, O'Hara relaxed, and, though he itched from the bites, managed to fall asleep. He woke up in the morning, yawned, and suddenly thought of the strawberries and cream. If the major did not keep his word, he'd quit the Service. Except for a slight headache he felt fine, and that would pass off after a nice cup of tea.

Carroll brought his breakfast, but did not stay very long, though O'Hara assured the doctor that the majority of Stegomyias were still under the bed netting. They might be useful for another experiment.

The sergeant looked out of the window. It was a grand morning. He rubbed his hands together and sat down at the table. He lifted a lid and peered at the strawberries. He poured some cream over them, then poured himself out some tea. He made a face over the tea—it tasted like dish-water. He touched his forehead—he was sweating. He put it down to the mugginess of the room. He opened a window and felt much better. Once more he went back to his breakfast. He ate a strawberry liberally soaked in cream and chewed it slowly. It did not taste very nice. He smelt the cream to see if it were sour. He shivered suddenly and got to his feet. Curse this confounded weather, one moment hot and the next cold.

For a while he sat there looking at the strawberries and making no attempt to eat them. Why did he feel so rotten? He was far too tough for any pesky mosquitoes to get him down. Maybe it was something else he was sickening for.

Not hearing any sounds from the hut, a watcher stole up to the window and August 26th, 1938.

saw O'Hara sprawled across the table with his nose buried in the strawberries and cream.

After that O'Hara knew little for a very long while. Sometimes the major or Dr. Carroll seemed to float before him and sometimes it was Frances. They were worried about him because he seemed so angry that the mosquitoes had got him down and he couldn't raise a hand against them. In his nightmarish dreams hundreds of Stegomyias were charging at him, buzzing like an angry cavalry charge.

The three volunteers were released at last from House One, and what a sight they presented. Unshaven, dirty, haggard and staggering like drunken men.

"Don't come too near me," protested Charlie Spill, who had been sent to release them.

"Why not?" demanded Busch, with some slight resemblance of his old truculence.

"Because you don't look too clean," Charlie answered. "Now you boys mustn't argue with me. You gotta get busy."

"Busy?" the three wrecks cried.

"Your orders are to burn them dudes before they crawl away, have a bath, and report for duty in an hour," Charlie backed away. "It ain't any use getting sore with me. They're the major's orders. He needs every man."

Busch's language was unprintable, but it was amazing what a bath and a change of clothing can do. And when they reported back on duty they held their shoulders square, because the few words Major Reed had spoken to them had made them feel like heroes.

Major Reed was determined to wipe out Yellow Jack, and he needed the help of every man. The orderlies were put in charge of large parties of troops with provisional rank. The major told them exactly the sort of places where the mosquitoes were likely to breed, and he wanted them wiped out. If the people protested, then the troops were to use force. The movement had the backing of the general. If any officers made any protest the matter was to be reported to Major Reed. Nothing was to stand in the light of this purge. The existence of the Stegomyia mosquito was to be wiped out for ever. The troops set to with a will.

And the man who had proved conclusively that Yellow Jack was caused by the Stegomyia lay in a coma in the pest house. Major Reed and the other doctors were constantly at his side, because it was going to be a hard fight to drag O'Hara from the valley of death.

It was days before that dreadful buzzing ceased for O'Hara and he opened tired eyes. He knew at once that he was in a hospital cot and that those cursed skeeters had beaten the great O'Hara. He turned his head painfully and saw Nurse MacDade bending over him.

"Morning, John," she greeted him brightly.

"Hey, what's up?" he demanded.

"Your fever's breaking, and you'll soon be well again," the nurse assured him. "The major's in Havana. They've cleaned out the city. Every rain-barrel, every cistern, every water-hole—the soldiers haven't left the mosquitoes a drop of uncovered water to breed in. Yellow Jack is licked in Cuba."

O'Hara moved restlessly.

"Where's—where's—"

"Asleep," laughed the nurse. "The poor girl's worn out from spending the day and most of the night by your bed—" side. She'll be back soon. Now relax and stop talking."

There was intense excitement in Quemados, the military camp on the outskirts of Havana, because the majority of troops were to be relieved and sent home. Transports were at anchor in the bay.

It was a great moment in Major Reed's life when he was sent for by the general and Colonel Tory stepped forward to make his apology for the hard things he had said about the commission. The general thanked the major because the conquest of Yellow Jack meant so much to the United States—it meant that Major Gorgas could go back to Panama.

Major Reed and Major Gorgas, after the little ceremony, went off to enjoy a quiet chat, and the latter said he wished that he could get hold of men like Sergeant O'Hara to volunteer for Panama.

"Why don't you ask him?" replied the major. "Maybe you might tempt him with extra pay and the promise of a commission."

Sergeant O'Hara had never given very serious consideration to anything, but these last few weeks had changed him. He wanted to marry Frances, and what had he to offer her. Maybe it would be best if he went home on the first ship available and forgot Frances. His job was finished here. And then Major Gorgas came to see him.

There came a day when O'Hara was once more on his feet and he went down to the nurses' office to see Frances, who was returning to New York on the first available transport. Frances thought that O'Hara might be going as well.

She was waiting for him. Never had she looked so beautiful. She held out her arms to him and he drew her into a bear-like hug.

"I'm a little weak in the knees yet," he told her.

"Once you get home you'll soon feel better."

"Well—er—I'm after staying out here for a while longer." He grinned boyishly as he saw the expression of horrified surprise. "Didn't I tell you I was heading for Panama, to watch out for Major Gorgas?"

"Panama!"

"He's a fine man, darlin', although a little daft with this notion he has of digging a ditch across the hemisphere."

"You mustn't go." Frances elung to him. "Oh, John, do I have to do the asking? Come to Washington. Get a job—settle down."

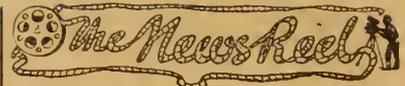

"The army's in my blood," cried O'Hara. "Besides, I've been offered special pay and maybe the chance of a commission. Darlin', wouldn't you like to be a captain's wife?"

"I want to be Sergeant O'Hara's wife," sobbed Frances. "Besides, it's dangerous in Panama."

"Not at all." O'Hara stuck out his chest. "And nothing can harm an O'Hara—for long." He gripped her shoulders. "But I'm to have special leave some time. Could you be in Washington round about the middle of April?" She nodded. "Meet me there and we'll get married even if I'm a general."

"I think you could persuade me, John O'Hara"—Frances stood on tiptoe—"if you kissed me just once again."

While "Yellow Jack" was in production, George Seitz took advantage of an incident on the set, including it in the finished picture. Robert Montgomery and Sam Levene were seated in a tent, discussing yellow fever. Following the rehearsal, Montgomery turned to the mirror, felt his face, wondered if he was really coming down with the disease. The action fitted the scene so well that Seitz included it in the picture.

Directors are alert for these seemingly meaningless incidents, realising that the natural reaction to a scene is often more dramatic than anything the writers can anticipate.

Ronald Reagan—Ex-Announcer.

Look to the movies for proof of the wisdom of some old proverbs.

Take that wheeze about "It's an ill wind that blows nobody good!" Small comfort, perhaps, it is to hear that when you're down on your luck—but if it hadn't been for somebody else's misfortune the screen might be deprived of some of its brightest stars to-day.

And there's another saying—"Some are born to greatness and some have greatness thrust upon them"—which doesn't reflect on those achieving greatness but is true nevertheless.

If Ronald Reagan hadn't just happened to have been broadcasting the 1937 spring training of the Chicago Cubs at Catalina Island, he probably still would be a radio announcer. Instead, Max Arnow, Warner Bros' talent scout, heard his voice on the air, a screen test was given and followed by a long-term contract.

Now Reagan is playing the leading rôle in "Accidents Will Happen," his third picture, and is ready to declare that there is something in a title after all. But while it was through chance he won his opportunity, sheer talent made it possible for him to make good, and it made him one of the outstanding discoveries of recent years.

Actors Too Rough.

A fist fight between Warner Bros' new star, Ronald Reagan, and actor Elliott Sullivan is part of the melodrama, "Accidents Will Happen."

Director William Clemens explained that the scrappers were to pull punches, be careful not to hurt each other, and, above all, not to blacken each other's eyes.

"I'd put this fight sequence at the end of the picture, to play safe, but as the schedule stands I can't do it," he explained. "You'll just have to be careful, that's all. Ronnie gets a black eye, supposedly, but remember that's to be applied by the make-up man, not a fist!"

The boys promised faithfully. They rehearsed in good order. They emerged with a black eye each—and the make-up man spent next day keeping the "shiners" white-washed.

Hollywood Has Arranged For Guaranteed Weather.

Hollywood weather may be brilliant or sunless, but it is always guaranteed weather.

A day in advance, sometimes as much as a month ahead, studios get an analytical report on the weather for film shooting. As a result, no

TO-DAY!

1000 FREE FOOTBALLS

for Scoring "Goals" with FOOTER-STAMPS

ARE you collecting FOOTER-STAMPS? They're all the rage, and you really must be in this wonderful scheme! This is what to do: Every week in BOY'S CINEMA we are giving "Footer-Stamps"—pictures of six different actions on the football field. The object of this great stamp-game being to score as many "goals" as possible in time for the first prize-giving next week, when the first 250 footballs are to be awarded.

TO SCORE A "GOAL" you must collect a complete set of six stamps (they're numbered 1 to 6), made up of the following movements: KICK-OFF—DRIBBLE—TACKLE—HEADER—SHOT—GOAL.

Easy, isn't it? The more stamps you collect the more "goals" you can score. (Note that the "goal" stamp by itself does NOT count as a "goal"—you must get a set of the stamps 1 to 6 each time.)

We give ten more stamps this week. Cut them out and try to "score a goal"; then keep all your stamps until you get some more in our next issue.

If you want to score some other quick "goals" to swell your total, remember that "Footer-Stamps" are also appearing in "Sports Budget" and "Triumph."

Keep at it, pals, because the August contest will close next week, and we shall then ask you how many "goals" you have scored. Up to 250 of the FREE Footballs are going to be awarded then—for readers scoring the highest number of "goals" with "Footer-Stamps" for the month. More footballs will be given in the next month, and so on.

Don't send any stamps until we tell you how and where next week, when the closing date will be announced.

RULES: Up to 250 Footballs will be awarded in the August contest to the readers declaring and sending in the largest number of "goals" scored with "Footer-Stamps." The Editor may extend or amend the prize list in case of too many ties.

Each "goal" must consist of a set of "Footer-Stamps" Nos. 1 to 6, inclusive—all claims for prizes to be made on the proper coupon (to be given later). No allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence! No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

(N.B. "Footer-Stamps" may also be collected from the following papers: "GEM," "MAGNET," "MODERN BOY," "DETECTIVE WEEKLY," "TRIUMPH," "WILD WEST WEEKLY," "THRILLER," "SPORTS BUDGET" and "CHAMPION.")
OVERSEAS READERS! You pals who are far away—you're in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best "scores" from overseas readers. There will be a special closing date for you as well, of course!

The News Reel

companies sit about idly twiddling thumbs waiting for the weather to clear, as happened many times in the past.

The Producers' Association Weather Bureau, subscribed to by all studios, has put a stop to costly loss of time through uncertainty as to weather.

The man responsible is Dr. Irving F. Krick, at the California Institute of Technology. A teletype in the production office of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios, for example, connects with his weather bureau. The studio transmits queries on weather conditions a day, week, or even a month ahead, and receives a reply in a few minutes.

Because of this arrangement the studio was enabled to make "Test Pilot," a picture which required more than half of all scenes to be made outdoors, without a day's loss because of weather. There were no occasions of transporting Clark Gable, Myrna Loy, and Spencer Tracy to location and back again without making a shot. The studio knew in advance when bad weather was ahead and stayed in sound stages at these times. When clouds were required, the studio even knew in advance when to expect them.

The same thing is being done on "Too Hot To Handle," the newsreel cameraman story starring Gable and Miss Loy, for which many outdoor scenes are required. Fortunately, bright sunshine prevailed when the picture started, and two big exterior sequences were cleared up. A week before the present "high fog" hit the locality, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer knew it was coming and that it would last for days. So the company adjusted its schedule and settled down to an extensive stay on sound stages.

When Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer sends Spencer Tracy, Mickey Rooney, and a crew of a hundred back to Omaha with Director Norman Taurog for "Boys' Town," it will do so with complete knowledge on weather conditions, even that far away. Day by day, the Hollywood production office will be able to let the company in Omaha know what to expect in weather right where they are.

The same plan will be carried out when W. S. Van Dyke II takes Tracy, Robert Taylor, and Wallace Beery into Idaho for "North-West Passage."

Such lengthy location trips demand accurate in-the-future forecasts to avoid waste, for, once on location, in bad weather there is little to do but wait. So locations are planned only at ideal times.

Shorter locations, such as day trips, are just as important. For example, "The Boy From Barnardo's," starring Freddie Bartholomew and Mickey Rooney, demanded more than half of all scenes either at Malibu Lake, fifty miles away, or a school thirty-five miles distant. A single trip to either spot on what seemingly was a bright day, only to have the sun vanish after a short time, would have entailed great waste. By the time the company moved equipment and players back to the studio, at least a half and possibly an entire day would have been lost.

Years ago, every location call carried the joker, "weather permitting." This meant that the location would be at the mercy of the weather. If the day dawned cloudy and murky, quick changes were made and the company summoned to a stage rather than to location. It meant rapid telephone calls to cancel arrangements, and "extras" always got those location jobs on a conditional basis.

To-day, because Hollywood really does something about the weather, "weather permitting" is almost an obsolete phrase.

Taylor Plays Strenuous Fighting Scenes

Taylor fought almost continuously all day in the long shots for "The Crowd Roars." First of all he fought four rounds with McAvoy, because McAvoy was to fight Maxie Rosenbloom at San Diego that evening and had to get away early. Big laughs came when Taylor knocked out McAvoy in the fourth, according to the script. McAvoy fell on Taylor, who was off balance, and both went down to the canvas. They laughed so much they had to be helped to their feet.

In this bout Charlie Randolph was the referee; Art Lasky and Benny Mozelle were seconds for McAvoy; Lionel Stander and John Kelly were seconds for Taylor.

The fight crowd of extras wouldn't yell loud enough, and had to be continually prodded via the portable microphone.

"Come on, this is one time you can yell anything you want to!" Director Richard Thorpe yelled at them.

Atmosphere complete, with Press row, Press photographers, candy butchers, and nut-shells strewn all over the place.

Altogether, Taylor had the gloves on for fourteen days before this fight was shot. Before he was assigned the stellar rôle of this picture he had never had a boxing-lesson. Consensus of opinion of professionals appearing in the picture is that he is 95 per cent better than they expected; that he has a fast, wicked left, is a swell counter-puncher, and strips better than most guys of his weight who are professionals.

Second fight was with Bill Gargan, playing the rôle of Johnny Martin, former light-heavyweight champion, who raised Taylor as a kid, and has now been substituted at the last minute in a Madison Square Garden bout. Martin is trying a come-back, and gets killed in the second round when a blow to the head causes a blood clot. Crowd boos Taylor lustily as he leaves the ring.

Maureen O'Sullivan was an off-stage spectator most of the day, not working until late afternoon. In private life Maureen never goes to fights—can't stand them—but got a thrill out of these.

Gargan's seconds and handlers were Sam Bagley, Jack Masters, Mike Donovan, and Freddie Welsh. Taylor's were Frank Morgan, Lionel Stander, Phil Bloom, and John Kelly. Dan Tobor, famous announcer at Olympic and Legion stadiums, worked this and next bout.

Final bout was eight rounds with Perroni, shot in the afternoon, after Taylor had rested for an hour at noon. Perroni's actual manager, Henry Andrews, acted as his second, along with Joe Lynch, Si Malis, and Monte Vandergriff. Spike Mason substituted for Frank Morgan among Taylor's handlers in this bout. Morrie Cohen refereed.

Lou Ambers, world's light-weight champion, was among the spectators. He climbed into the ring and wished Taylor luck between rounds.

A TALE OF A SCOTTISH REBEL

The early days of the union between Scotland and England, when Alan Breck was the last rebel fighting for Scottish freedom. A stirring story of this stalwart fighter, a brave lassie and a boy named David Balfour, portrayed by Warner Baxter, Arleen Whelan and Freddie Bartholomew

A Mysterious Past

SCOTLAND in 1747. The Highland clans had twice rebelled against English rule. The rebellions had been crushed in blood, but there was still one man who refused the British yoke. His name was Alan Breck. The notorious outlaw gathered together a small force and rode for Edinburgh, rousing all the clansmen on the way that was possible. It was his last gamble for justice.

The Duke of Argyle, Lord Justice General of Scotland, was urged to sign a warrant for Breck's arrest, but those Scottish chiefs who had agreed to the union with England warned the duke that the outlaw was the popular hero and that such an act might cause the whole of Scotland to rise.

"While he is alive the country will remain in a ferment, so that we have no choice but to fight and kill," was the final decision of the duke. "You say the people will make a martyr of him. It is better to deal with one martyr than a nation of martyrs."

As a result a reward of five hundred pounds was offered for the capture of the traitor, Alan Breck, in the name of his Majesty George II, King of Great Britain and Ireland.

In a small village many miles north of Edinburgh one of those reward notices reached Dominic Campbell, who was the law-abiding schoolmaster of a small class of boys ranging from six to fourteen years of age.

The schoolmaster brought the notice into the class-room and rapped on his desk for attention.

"There's trouble among us again. Rebels riding by night and the King's September 17th, 1938.

troopers along the highway. There's one man behind it all. You know his name—Alan Breck. That man is a traitor to our King. Have no truck with him or his men. They will come to your houses at night and whisper and beg of your father for food and guns for the cause—a lost cause—Scotland's freedom. You've all taken with me the oath of allegiance. If you are faithful to that oath, Alan Breck and his men are your enemies."

When the class was dismissed Dominic Campbell came across to young David Balfour and bade him come across to the house. Kindly mother Campbell bowed her head when she saw them and made herself busy with the fire. The schoolmaster, as if weary, seated himself at an old desk, and from a drawer produced a long envelope.

"This letter came to-day from Newfoundland."

"It's from my father?" was the eager question.

"No, David." The schoolmaster looked at him sorrowfully. "It says that your father is dead."

The boy went very white, then pulled himself together.

"That is sad news, sir," he said with no sign of tears.

"Yes, but not as sad as it might be, considering you never really knew your father. He died a brave death." The schoolmaster handed over the letter. "Here, read it for yourself."

"I'll take it back with me to the class-room."

"Wait, there's something else. Things are not going to be quite the same now, David. You'll be leaving us." He produced another letter, very old, faded. "When your father left you here as a child he gave me this—told me that if anything ever happened to him before he could come back for you I should send you to your uncle and to tell you to give him this letter."

The letter was addressed to Ebenezer Balfour at Edinburgh.

David was loath to go because Mr. and Mrs. Campbell had been like mother and father to him. Only vaguely could he remember the big man who was his father, and that for that reason the news of his death was not the terrible shock it might have been. But always David had been a dutiful lad and therefore he must obey the commands of this letter. Dominic Campbell knew little about this uncle except that he was reputed to be rich and lived in a castle.

So David's few possessions were put into a bundle. With this fastened to a stout stick the boy set out to trudge the two days journey to Edinburgh. He can be forgiven for having a quiet sniff on parting with the kindly Campbells. He promised to return and see them soon. And before the parting old Dominic prayed for the boy.

"Merciful Lord, let him go forth in righteousness, humble of heart, practical of mind, strict of purse, and let him honour God and King. Amen."

The Killing of Red Fox

IT was late in the afternoon of the second day that David entered a small village near Falkirk. It was his intention to push on for another five miles before seeking shelter in some cottage or a comfortable haystack. The boy inquired from a portly, snuff-taking innkeeper the way to Edinburgh, and had been shown the direction when a horseman dashed down the street vaulted from his horse and ran up to a post in the market square, where there was a large bell. The violent clanking brought everyone running out of their cottages.

"Hide your valuables!" yelled the ringer. "The King's tax collector is coming!" There was a gasp from the villagers. "I saw him come over the hill, the same that was here before, the one we call Red Fox."

The news seemed to strike consternation in everyone because the villagers rushed to their homes and in a few minutes appeared with some of their taxable possessions, such as pigs, fowls, sacks of corn, cloth that had been weaved and even things such as furniture and bedding. David watched all this in amazement. After dumping their possessions in the woods the villagers returned to their homes for more, but it was too late. Down the street came a magnificent coach, with an escort of mounted soldiers riding on both sides. Their scarlet uniforms made a blaze of colour. The coach pulled up in the square and a door was opened. Out stepped the person whom these people called Red Fox, and David thought the same name fitted.

"There's a royal welcome for you." David could hear every word the man spoke. "You'd think a plague had struck the place. Hiding their shillings, that's what they've been up to. Captain Frazer, order your men to rout them out and assemble them in the square. I want every snivelling one."

A tavern keeper emerged from his hostelry with a mug of ale, which Red Fox accepted, and then shouted to the man to fetch out ale for the soldiers. The frightened fellow scuttled back to obey the order. Never had he been so terrified because by ill chance his private parlour housed Alan Breck and a number of his outlaws. Breck was there for a purpose. He had known of the intended visit of the tax-collector, and he was planning a daring coup that would enable him to recover the wealth Red Fox had filched from his victims.

David was herded together with the rest of the villagers and he kept close to the portly minister. He had sworn the oath of allegiance, but the brutal methods of this tax-collector and his soldiers made his blood boil with indignation.

"MacDougall, ten shillings tax." Red Fox leered at the minister when the portly one said he had no money. "Search him," came the order.

"Don't hurt him!" shrilled David. "He's a minister—he's a man of God!" "Get out of the way! Get out of the way!" shouted Captain Frazer, raising his hand to slap the impertinent youth.

At that precise moment a shot rang out and Red Fox slumped to the ground in a heap.

David had been puzzled by the strange behaviour of a horseman whom he had observed watching everything from the shelter of a hedge. A rough, fierce sort of fellow and he had a gun. David had wondered whether he should tell Red Fox, but decided it would be wisest not to interfere. Then before he could do anything the gun had been swung up and Red Fox had fallen.

The bailiff, the tax-collector's assistant, bent over the still form and in horrified accents announced that his master was dead. Captain Frazer ordered his men to surround the village, search everyone for firearms, and shoot any that tried to escape.

"Captain, did you see who fired the shot?" the bailiff questioned.

"No, the boy distracted my attention," answered the captain.

"He was here for that purpose—an accomplice," decided the bailiff. "Get him!"

David had been edging away all this while, but when the soldiers at Frazer's order moved towards him he took to his heels in panic. From a window of the tavern Alan Breck had witnessed the whole incident. He surmised that the soldiers were after the boy because he had seen the face of the man who had killed Red Fox.

The boy was thinking that it was futile to try and escape when hands reached out and seized him. Before he could cry out a hand was clapped over his mouth, but he was able to turn his head. His heart missed a beat for he knew that this was Alan Breck. Things happened fast and furious after that. They whisked him round the back of a building and he was bundled into a saddle, someone held him firmly and then followed a nightmare ride. There were shouts and shots came very close, but Alan Breck and his followers made good their escape. They rode towards high ground, and in the dim light of dusk soon threw off the pursuit. Before a cabin in a quiet dell the rebels drew rein, and inside David saw again the man who had slain Red Fox.

"You blundering idiot, I told you there was to be no bloodshed!" raged Alan Breck.

David gazed curiously at the famous outlaw and had to admit that he was a handsome fellow. He would not understand fear. The killer was a shifty-eyed individual.

"I aimed as you told me," he whined.

"You were told to frighten the horses and start a runaway so I'd have a chance to get the money bag."

"I know, but is it my fault if Red Fox crossed my line of fire. I didn't mean to kill."

"I don't believe you!" blazed Alan Breck. "It was a chance to settle your score with Red Fox and you took it. Well, it's just what the Duke of Argyle has been waiting for—a chance to swing a few of us from the gibbet."

"But they've no proof—not a soul saw me."

"There was one who saw you, Jamie. This boy." The outlaw looked at the youngster curiously. "What is your name?"

"David—David Balfour," the boy said defiantly. "I know who you are

"You blundering idiot, I told you there was to be no bloodshed!" raged Alan Breck.

September 17th, 1933.

—you're Alan Breck, a fugitive from the law. These men are rebels in a lost cause."

"Well, you're no coward, I'll grant you that." Breck seemed impressed.

"Why do you say a lost cause?"

"Dominie Campbell—that's my schoolmaster—says so. He says we'll be better off under English rule. He says we'll have more trade and more food. Order's order, he says, and law's the law."

"You see, Alan, what he is!" harshly interrupted Jamie. "He'd blab, so we must fix him."

"You would have me murder a child?"

"It's him or me."

"There's only one thing to do, and that's to get you clear of the country," decided Breck, looking at the other grim rebels as he spoke. "Take him to Glasgow and put him on the first boat sailing for America."

"No, Alan, you can't send me away to a strange land!" Jamie cried hoarsely. "Everything I have is here—my house and my sheep and the girl I'm going to marry. Scotland's my home."

A shrewd, wiry fellow with a heavy jaw and fiery blue eyes stepped forward. Ian Douglas drew his chief to one side. Jamie was a coward, and if caught would talk. He advised Breck to find this girl and then ship them both out of the country. Other rebels called into the consultation agreed, and so Alan Breck decided to go to Glencoe to fetch Jeannie MacDonald.

"Take Jamie away, and keep close watch over him," Breck said at the end to Douglas. "I'll meet you at Tam Dale's in Glasgow."

All this while David had been moving step at a time towards the door, but it was Alan Breck who went after him when he did a run for it.

"Where do you think you're off to?" he demanded, holding the boy.

"Well, I was going to Edinburgh."

"I'd like to whisk you there on a broomstick, but I've no choice but to take you with me so that law-abiding tongue of yours won't wag," Alan Breck grinned at the lad. "We've got a long, hard ride before us."

Three in Hiding

ON the journey to Glencoe, David learned to admire Alan Breck, though he told the rebel that he did not in any way agree with his ideas. True, the English were being bad task-masters, but rebellion against their rule would not lessen the oppression of the Scots. They had many an argument, but at last they reached Glencoe.

Jean MacDonald was a slim, bright-eyed lass, and she listened gravely to all that Alan had to say. Her parents agreed that it would be best for the girl to go with the rebel leader to Glasgow, though they knew that parting with their daughter would be hard. As the Redcoats were always searching for Alan it was decided that Jean should pretend to be Alan's wife, and David their son. MacDonald had a horse and cart, and Jean was told to keep her shawl round her young features, as soldiers might be suspicious of David being her son. David was enjoying the adventure.

Thus did the MacKenzie family start off for Glasgow. Once or twice they were stopped but they managed to deceive the English patrols. And though David could have betrayed them he aided and abetted, because by now he had a great liking for Alan Breck, though still disagreeing with his views and opinions. There was moisture in David's eyes when his new friends bade him good-bye at the nearest point for Edinburgh.

"We take the high road and you take the low," Alan shook the small hand warmly. "And sorry I am to be parting with you, lad."

"You may be sure, sir, that I'll hold my tongue," the boy said gravely.

"Yes, I know you will," the rebel smiled. "And good luck with your uncle, the laird."

In a little hostelry a drunken man would persist in drinking with the MacKenzies, but when no one was looking he beckoned Alan to bend near to his mouth. It was Douglas.

"They traced you to the MacDonalds. They know about the cart. They'll be searching here before long. When you leave you must try some new disguises. Get away alone. I'll take her to Jamie in Glasgow myself."

"I promised the MacDonalds I'd give her into Jamie's arms myself or they'd not have let her go," answered Alan. "So she goes with me, and with no one else. We'll beat across the west on foot to Invercaig and then take a boat to Glasgow."

That night soldiers came to the inn, but they kept up their pretence of being man and wife and as there was no boy with them managed to bluff the soldiers. In the morning they took to the hills and headed for Invercaig.

The Castle of Balfour

AT last David came in sight of Edinburgh. He was puzzled by the peculiar strange looks and queer remarks passed when he asked for the Castle of Balfour. One old woman quite scared him, for she was like a witch.

"Now you know where it is keep clear of the place!" she shrilled. "Blood built that place, and blood stopped the building of it. If you must go, tell the laird that all the decent folk about here call down a curse on him and his house. Black be their fall."

"The Laird will never see you," another man told him.

"Well, I think he will," retorted David. "He's my uncle."

The track leading to the castle was nothing but stones and boulders. Horses and carriages could not come this way, and it puzzled David. It was well after dark one stormy, thundery night that a flash of lightning revealed the castle perched upon a crag. Dark and sinister it looked, but David was not daunted. It was beginning to rain and that made David hurry because he had no desire to get soaked. He crossed over a bridge, the parapet of which was broken, and up a twisty, weedy path towards the castle, which seemed to tower over him like some sinister giant. He came to a heavy door with a small wicket. There was a rusty chain that he pulled and he thought that a distant tinkle sounded. He waited, and was about to give a second tug when the wicket slid back and he saw a thin, wizened face, a mass of untidy white hair and two staring eyes.

"Go away! Get away from here!" this spectre cried. "Who is it?"

"I've come with a letter for Mr. Ebenezer Balfour."

"A letter!" A hand came through the grill. "Well, hand it to me and be off with you."

"I'll not!" stoutly answered David. "I'll deliver it as I was told—to my uncle."

"Your uncle?" How balefully those eyes gleamed. "Just a minute." The eyes vanished and the grill closed. Then came the sound of chains and bolts being removed. The door swung open. A flash of lightning revealed the bent figure of a man in a shabby dressing-gown. He beckoned David, who stepped into a cold, stone-flagged hall. A candle was raised, and the spectro cackled. "Well, it's plain to see whose son you are. You're the spitting image of Alexander."

"You're Uncle Ebenezer?"

"Aye. Welcome—welcome, David, to Balfour Castle."

"Dominie Campbell sent me here and told me to give you this letter."

Ebenezer peered at the letter.

"So your father's dead then. Do you know what this is about?"

"You can see for yourself, sir, that the seals are unbroken." David was indignant.

"Aye, well, come along, David."

Ebenezer closed the door. "I was just having supper."

Over the worst meal that David had ever tasted he learnt that his uncle lived in this vast castle by himself. There was dust and cobwebs everywhere and much of the furniture was broken. A small fire burnt in an open grate, and the old man protested when David wanted to put some more peat on the fire. Peat was two shillings a cauldron and mighty dear. The porridge for supper was sour and cold and the ale well watered. It was dawning on David that his father's brother was a miser. After a while Ebenezer remembered the letter and perused it.

"If there's anything in it that concerns me I'm anxious to know what it is, sir."

"Oh, no. It's just a letter written by your father many years ago—entrusting you to me."

The prospect of living with a miser in these bare walls made David shiver. It was also very cold in this vast dining-room. His uncle became immersed in the letter and that gave David a chance to walk round and explore. He picked up a dusty Bible from a table and turned to the fly-leaf.

"To Ebenezer Balfour, on his Fifth Birthday, from his elder brother—Alexander Balfour."

David closed the book and came back to warm his cold hands by the fire. Ebenezer put away the letter and got to his feet.

"Well, it's getting late, Davie, and I was forgetting the long journey you've had. So off to bed with you. You must be weary. I've got a fine room for you in the stair tower."

David went with his uncle to a narrow stone stairway. His uncle told him to go to the very top and then turn to the right.

"It's dark up there, sir. I'd be obliged to you for a candle."

"Nonsense, it'd be burning good money. Candles are sixpence a pound. Why, a brave lad like you shouldn't fear the dark. Go ahead with you." He pointed a thin, veined hand. "To the very top, mind you, then to the right. Good-night, David."

"Good night, uncle."

Except for occasional flashes of lightning there was no light in this gloomy tower. The boy gave a cry as something brushed by his face. It was a horrible bat. Up and up he climbed, and it was a testing climb, because there was no rail and if he had slipped might have rolled into a void. He paused for breath, and then as the lightning flashed stepped forward. His foot was on the edge of a void. A stone slithered beneath his foot, but David managed to fling himself backwards. Down those stairs raced David, and Ebenezer gave a cry at sight of him.

"You sent me up there to—kill me!" David accused.

"I said turn to the left."

"You said right. And there was nothing there—I'd have fallen."

"You're crazy, boy!" cried the old miser. "Why should I want to kill you?"

"To keep the estate—to stop me from getting it!" David accused.

"You said right. And there was nothing there—I'd have fallen."

in a manner that made the boy sick. He was ready to give up the castle. He had been a wicked old man, and his only wish was that David would forgive him. After breakfast they set out for the city, and the old rascal drove along the coast as he had some important business at Leith.

David was interested in the shipping. His uncle left him to find a Captain Hoseason regarding a shipment of tobacco. An innocent-looking lad named Ransome invited David to come aboard one of the brigs and see what it was like below. David should not have been so trusting. He was flung into a locker room and the ship at once set sail. When the ship had been some hours at sea the captain, a burly, brutal, demon of a man, dragged David from the evil-smelling place.

"You'll keep your mouth shut, Davie, unless you wish to feed the fishes," threatened the captain. "Behave yourself and you shall be a cabin-boy." He cuffed David's ears. "Stand up and be a man. Better hurry up and get your sea-legs."

Thus was David kidnapped aboard the boat of one of the most rascally skippers of those restless times. A man who smuggled men and women, cut-throats and thieves and those whom the law sought. A pretty penny he charged them for passage money. Uncle Ebenezer had had to dip his hands in his money bags to rid himself of his cursed nephew.

The Escape from the Brig

DAVID BALFOUR was forced to do menial jobs about the brig. It was unwise to disobey because Captain Hoseason was a bully of the worst type and would flog a person on the least provocation. By curious chance this ship was in port when the two fugitives reached Invercraig.

Captain Hoseason tried to charge them sixty pounds for passage money, but this extortionate amount Alan got reduced to sixteen. This angered the rascally captain and he instructed his mate, Riach, to keep a sharp eye on the pair. His suspicions were increased when he entertained Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie to some hot rums in the saloon. It was David who served the drinks, and the rogue did not miss the look of amazement that passed between the boy and the two voyagers.

"I can't believe it of David," Alan said to Jean, when they had gone to their cabin. "Telling us those tall stories about his rich uncle the laird and that castle at Edinburgh, and all the time he's a cabin-boy on this foul brig."

"I'm sure he won't give you away," Jean answered. "He's fond of you, Alan."

"Well, I must be going, Jeannie," Alan said huskily.

"The great adventure is nearly over."

"It's just beginning. Glasgow—Jamie—and America."

"Beginning! To me it's the end," the girl cried. "I never promised Jamie really, and—well, I hadn't met you, Alan."

"Jamie's my clansman and I'm his leader," Alan spoke sternly. "I know I promised to take you to him in Glasgow, and that's what I'm doing. And I wish to heaven you were there now and married to him." Alan hastened out of the cabin.

Jean felt so worried about this tiff with Alan that after a few minutes she left her cabin and was making her way to the deck when she heard the captain's voice.

"Now, Davie lad, let's understand one another—man to man. If you don't tell me who that man is that calls himself MacKenzie I'll whack your head off. His name!" Silence, and then the sound of a blow. "Now you'll tell or you'll get it again."

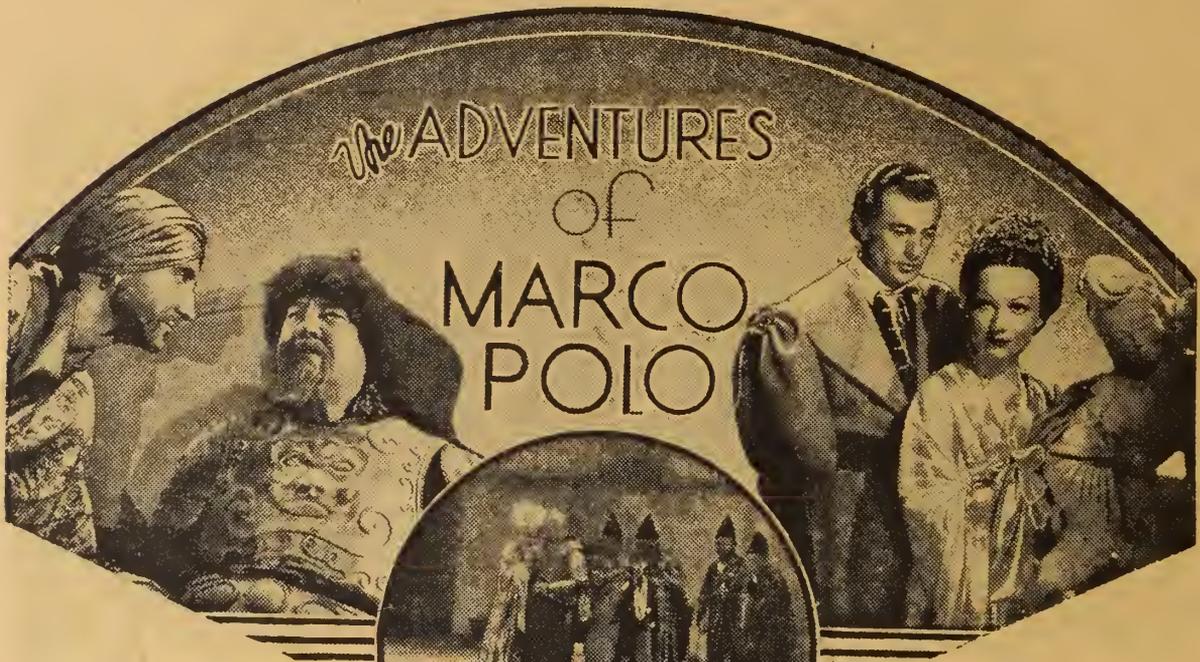

Jean sped up to the deck. When a woman loves she can be unscrupulous.

"We've got to get away, Alan," she cried, when she had found the outlaw. "Can't we take a skiff and make for the mainland? They know who you are."

The Emperor's Daughter

IN the year 1274 the firm of Polo Brothers was the most important in Venice. Other merchants and importers envied their trade, but in this year the Polo Brothers came to a momentous decision. They had secured all the trade of the surrounding countries and realised that unless they opened up new channels the business would begin to go downhill. For this purpose Maffeo and Nicolo Polo detailed Marco, Nicolo's son, to go as an Ambassador to China.

Marco was a tall, handsome young man, whom a great number of people regarded as a gambler and a waster, but he had been responsible for a great deal of the prosperity of his father's and uncle's firm. He had been sent on many such missions before and all had resulted in excellent trade pacts. It was arranged that he should be accompanied by Binguccio, an elderly, portly servant, who held up his hands in despair when he heard they were to travel across the world to China.

"The Orientals are a curious people, they do not trade as we do," Nicolo informed his son. "I want you back with agreements that will enable us to send our ships into the China seas. Now I have two things for you." He held up a sealed envelope. "One, a letter to Kublai Khan, the mightiest emperor on earth. That is where your journey ends—in his incomparable city of Peking. The other is more valuable." This time he held up a small bag. "Once I went away. My father gave this to me. He said—and I say to you—fill it with what you see on your way."

"But it will hold nothing but the smallest things," argued Marco.

"The smallest things have changed the world," Nicolo pointed to a map on an ebony table. "Here is your route. You sail first for the Port of Acre—a fortified city on the coast of Asia, now held by the Crusaders—from Acre, you go overland by caravan across the Arabian Desert into Persia—to September 17th, 1938.

Samarkand—over the boundless plains of Tartary, and so into the great Land of Cathay. To the incomparable city of Peking, where lives Kublai Khan, ruler of the earth and the sun, the moon and the stars." He held out his hands. "Farewell, my son, Marco Polo. God's benison go with you."

Many moons were to pass and many were their adventures before the day came when they sighted in the distance the gleaming walls of Peking. Many hundreds of miles had been travelled on foot and they were footsore and weary. Binguccio so tired that part of the way his master had to carry him on his back. So they drew nearer to Peking and they were quite unaware that from the towers above the gates the approach of the two strangers had been noted.

Marco had keen eyes for the procession of people heading for Peking, and he smiled when he learned that most of them came from the warm south with silks, spices, gold and jade, from India with precious stones, and from the north with furs and ermine. There was a wonderful lot of loot in China. They came to the city wall and paused to rest close to a house that had been built into the outer wall.

A little meek, wise and aged Chinaman sat before the door of this house reading to two small children, a boy and a girl.

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are the merciful—"

"For they shall obtain mercy," Marco spoke in eager tones. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God—"

"You know those words?" questioned the amazed Chinaman.

"Yes, I know them. Are you a Christian?"

"No, but I want my children to learn the truths of all the philosophers."

Thus did Marco meet Chen Tsu and make his first friend. The Chinaman courteously invited the two travellers to step across his threshold and share their inadequate meal. That brought life back to Binguccio, though he found the food and the instruments used to consume it a problem. The food was spaghetti and the instruments chopsticks. They met Chen Tsu's tired wife and his reverend mother. One strand of spaghetti Marco placed in the small bag his father had given him.

Marco explained his mission, and the Chinaman looked grave.

"I advise you to be very careful when you enter the palace, Marco Polo. Kublai Khan is a good man and a just man. But he is surrounded by advisers who have little respect for the sanctity of human life. There have been rumours—" He paused nervously.

"Of what, Chen Tsu?"

"We have a proverb here: 'Too much gossip is the surest form of suicide.' So when you meet the emperor's Minister of State, a Saracen, named Ahmed, make every effort to convince him that you are no more than a friendly gentleman who wishes to see the world without treading on anyone's toes."

Suddenly there was a loud bang, and with a cry Binguccio leapt in the air. The children screamed delightedly. For the first time Marco Polo heard about a fire-cracker. Marco inquired about this strange invention and was taken into a back room that was not unlike a modern laboratory.

Chen Tsu explained that in his humble way he was a chemist. A combination of carbon and saltpetre, when touched with fire, puffed up harmlessly, but when contained in a case so that the vapours could not easily escape, it would burst with great violence. He was able to ek out his humble existence by making these fire-crackers for illumination of holidays and festivals. Often the emperor commissioned him to make thousands of boxes for ceremonial occasions.

"I should think it might be a valuable weapon of war," Marco said thoughtfully.

They bade farewell to the kindly Chinaman and promised to return. At the city gates they were stopped by the guards, but when they heard it was Marco Polo, of Venice, the way was open at once. They had heard of his remarkable progress. Messengers bring immediate news of any stranger who sets foot in China, and Marco was surprised when the guard pointed upwards at an eagle. A canister was attached to the eagle's stomach. An officer appeared and ordered that Marco Polo and Binguccio be conducted to their quarters and their every wish gratified.

A bath, new clothes and a night's rest made a new man of Marco, though Binguccio complained bitterly of his blistered feet. In the morning Marco, eager to see everything, went for a stroll round the palace. Marco noted the splendid uniforms of the soldiers, the marvellous carvings, the marble statues and the general air of wealth. Eventually he found his way into the palace grounds.

In the throne-room the emperor was enjoying a game of soldiers. A huge mosaic map of the Tartar Empire had been built into the floor, and model Chinese soldiers, like hundreds of chessmen, were occupying strategic points. A gold rake helped to move and control pieces. The emperor was very fat and very jovial, and he stroked his chin and his long whiskers as he watched his Minister of State. Ahmed was tall, sleek, dark of skin and his eyes had a strange way of half-closing. He was demonstrating that with ten thousand ships and a million soldiers the conquest of Japan should be finished in a few weeks. But the emperor shook his head. That would mean taking all the armies from the West, and they were necessary there for the rebellion in Kaidu's province.

"We need no army to deal with Kaidu," answered the crafty adviser. "His Tartar barbarians can out-fight our best generals." His eyes half closed and his lips became a thin line. "No! The greatest weapon we can use against him is—deception. Subtle poison!"

Tiring of the game, the emperor asked querulously who wished to see him to-day. A bevy of young and beautiful women to be chosen as attendants at his court; the Persian Ambassador and a stranger from the City of Venice in the Empire of Rome. He decided to see the ambassador first and the young women last. The ambassador, after much bowing and scraping, announced that his royal master wished to know when the emperor would dispatch to him the lady of his choice, his affianced bride, his future queen—the Princess Kukachin, the emperor's beautiful daughter.

Kublai Khan loved his daughter and he looked miserably at his Minister.

"The time has come when she must fulfil the marriage contract negotiated when—"

"Yes, I remember," interrupted the emperor. "But I hadn't noticed the passage of years and that she had ceased to be a child." He turned to the ambassador. "You may send word to your royal master that the Princess Kukachin will embark for Persia at the seventh moon."

But when messengers were sent to find Marco Polo they found that the Venetian was missing. Binguccio was informed that his master must be found at once. His master was talking with Princess Kukachin.

It had happened this way. Marco Polo had rested against a tree to admire the scenery and the beautiful gardens. The princess, with her charming hand-maiden, Visakha, was practising archery. Only such people as the emperor and the Minister were allowed in these grounds, so that Kukachin may be forgiven for shooting off arrows at random. Marco ducked behind a tree, and it was as well he did, for the arrow would have pierced his head. When the Princess tried to pull the arrow out of the tree a strong hand assisted her. She stared into the bold, admiring eyes of the Venetian. He did not grovel at her feet or mumble words of praise, but just held her hand till she snatched it away and demanded to know who he was.

"Marco Polo, from Venice."

"Venice? Is that one of our provinces?" asked the girl, whom Marco thought the loveliest creature he had ever known—and he had known a good many.

"No, it's a long way off. The journey took me years. It was a terrible journey, too: full of perils and hardships that would have defeated any but the bravest, strongest man."

"You think you're rather splendid, don't you?"

"Oh, no, that isn't my thought," he laughed lightly. "It's just what I've been told."

An amazed Chamberlain appeared to stammer out that his presence was sought after by the Great Khan. Marco smiled at the princess and raised his hand in a farewell salutation. He promised to try to see her again. The princess was speechless at this impertinence.

Marco Polo went to the throne and knelt before the emperor and was bade to rise. He explained that he had come to Cathay because he had heard of the wonders of the country. It was merely a trip—for educational purposes. Marco could see that nothing would be gained by mentioning a trade pact with this hawk-eyed Ahmed having the emperor's ear. It was a shock to him when the beautiful girl he had met swept graciously into the throne-room and was introduced by the emperor as his only daughter, the Princess Kukachin.

Maffeo and Nicolo Polo detailed Marco, Nicolo's son, to go as an Ambassador to China

"Marco Polo comes to us from Venice," stated the emperor.

"Yes, I know all about Marco Polo," answered the princess. "He has told me everything about himself."

The eyes of Ahmed narrowed. The emperor asked Marco to help him choose the most beautiful attendants for his court, and Marco did this by asking all the girls, "How many teeth has a snapping turtle?" Those who made wild guesses and those that answered "None" Marco rejected, but those who said they did not know he chose because, to his way of thinking, it proved them both honest and reasonable. The emperor was so grateful that he asked Marco if any lady of his court captured his fancy. Marco could not help glancing at the princess, and Ahmed's hand went to his sword. "Ahmed," haughtily spoke the Daughter of Heaven, "have you any traitors or spies on hand for punishment? If you have, I suggest you take this Venetian and let him see how you dispose of them."

It was a task that gave Ahmed great pleasure. Marco Polo and Binguccio saw sights that day that made them shudder—sights that even the haughty princess knew little about. Ahmed had a portion of the palace set aside for his own use. He conducted them to a door, which, when it swung open, revealed a fifty-foot void. Ahmed struck a gong and immediately a covered drawbridge was lowered from the nearby building. They entered that part of the palace owned by Ahmed. They saw vultures in cages and saw skeletons that had once been prisoners, whom they had stripped of all flesh. They saw wild and ferocious animals, and eventually two of Ahmed's servants, a scared ruffian named Toctai and an ugly fellow named Bayan, brought in a wretched fellow who was an officer in the army of Kaidu, the rebel. He had been caught in the palace as a spy. Marco could not suppress a shudder as the man was thrown to the wild beasts.

"You are very observant, Marco Polo," sneered Ahmed. "That is an admirable quality. It will save you from the danger of casting your eyes in the wrong direction."

"And just what does that refer to?" Marco demanded.

"I leave that to your intelligence," mocked this sinister rogue.

Treachery that Failed

AT a suitable moment Marco Polo discreetly mentioned to the emperor that a trade pact with the firm of Polo Brothers might be a good thing for both countries. The emperor promised to consider the matter, and in the meantime Marco was to make himself at home in the palace. Marco saw the princess one day from his window. She was sitting by an ornamental pond, feeding the carp, and she was rather pleased when the Venetian appeared.

"Strangers are not supposed to come into these gardens uninvited," she informed him.

Marco just smiled and, somehow, the princess smiled back. And so they met every day in the gardens. He learned that when in her cradle she had become engaged to the King of Persia. She was pleased at the idea of marrying such a great man and becoming Queen of Persia. He heard the happy event was to take place at the seventh moon. She showed him a white stone image and told him it was the shrine of the Moon Goddess. All maidens prayed to her that they would find a lover who is faithful, gallant and strong."

"And you're going to marry the King of Persia. You don't love him."

"He will put love in my heart."

Marco decided that he must give up seeing the princess because he was falling in love with her, so one day he explained his feelings as best he could and asked as a favour that he might say farewell to a kiss. But kissing was not an Eastern practice—they rubbed noses. Marco Polo had to teach Kukachin the Western practice of kissing, and after that the princess was quite sure she did not want to be the Queen of Persia.

Ahmed was seated in his quarters discussing with Toctai the rebellion in Kaidu's province. It must be put a stop to before the emperor learnt the truth about the taxes Ahmed had been collecting extortunately. For that purpose Toctai and Bayan must disguise themselves as Tartar tribesmen, join Kaidu's army and spread discontent in the army by making the soldiers believe that Kaidu was the one stealing their tax money. Later they were to kill Kaidu. The rebellion would be broken because his army would break up into warring factions. Bayan entered the room to report that he had seen the princess in the arms of the Venetian, and that made Ahmed draw Marco Polo into this plot.

The Minister told the emperor that Marco Polo was seeing too much of the princess, and that as his Majesty was going on an expedition to Japan it would be as well if Marco Polo were elsewhere. Why not send this clever young man into Kaidu's camp? He would be above suspicion and might even gain Kaidu's friendship. Then he could work with the secret agents and plot Kaidu's downfall. The emperor agreed and sent for Marco Polo. The latter did not at all relish the task.

"It is very possible that, upon your return, you will be very much nearer your coveted trade agreements," hinted the emperor.

"When would I start?" Marco asked.

"At once!" cried Ahmed, his eyes gleaming balefully. "You will be escorted by some of our most reliable men."

Marco returned to his quarters and ordered Binguccio to pack their few possessions, then in the dusk the Venetian wandered into the gardens where he had first met Kukachin. An arrow quivered in the same tree, and there was a silken cord attached to it. He followed that cord and it led to the princess' apartments. She was on the terrace to greet him and she was so frightened.

"You must not go to the West, to Kaidu's province." She clung to him. "Ahmed is trying to get rid of you. He'll never let you come back alive. No one will ever know what became of you."

"He could do it here as easily as anywhere else," answered Marco, and held her close. "But if I go on this expedition, and be of some value to the emperor, then—"

"Then what, Marco?"

"Then perhaps the Moon Goddess might tell you that you don't have to travel all the way to Persia to find a husband."

"She doesn't have to tell me—I know."

"My humblest apologies, daughter of Heaven, for this intrusion," came the smooth tones of Ahmed, as he appeared on the terrace. "But I have come to tell Marco Polo horses are ready and it is advisable for him to start out with all possible speed."

"Your Highness, we may never meet again, so I beg leave to say farewell in the fashion of my native land." Marco pressed his lips gallantly to those of the princess and then said in a whisper that only Kukachin heard: "Send word if you need me."

In the narrow pass of Nung Po the cavalcade halted. There were horsemen in front of Marco and Binguccio and horsemen in the rear. At a signal from the lieutenant in command the horsemen drew their swords and rushed towards the two Venetians. Marco and Binguccio managed to drive their horses up an incline and over a ridge, but the little fat man was flung from his horse as it reared up in the air. The horsemen paid no heed but went after Marco. The Venetian slid down the other side, could not stop, and horse and rider slid over a precipice.

Binguccio had darted among the rocks when the horsemen returned and they did not bother to look for him—the chief man was dead, or so they thought. Marco landed on a ledge, rolled off it, and then over and over down a steep incline. Much battered, he came to rest in a bush by a narrow stream. It took Marco an hour or more to climb the cliff face and get back to the trail. There was no sign of the horsemen or his companion.

While way back in Peking Princess Kukachin said good-bye to her father. Ahmed smiled. The China Sea was a powerful adversary, and one good typhoon might end the glorious reign of Kublai Khan. The princess was afraid because she saw the strange gleam in Ahmed's eyes and wondered if he were plotting treachery against her father.

Kaidu, the Rebel

MARCO bought a horse from a farmer for a gold piece, and after a vain search for Binguccio, went on his way. What luck when he sighted a staggering figure ahead. The servant was so frightened when he heard someone shout that he ran for dear life, toppled over a ledge and landed on his face in a muddy pond.

Very much the worse for wear, the two continued on their way. Marco now decided to return to Peking to have a few words with Ahmed, but this plan was upset some days later by an encounter with a Tartar outpost. These long-haired, bearded men captured the two weary men, who were unable to make any sort of fight, and they were conducted to the camp of Kaidu, the rebel.

Kaidu was a powerfully built man, whose face was not as ruthless as one might have expected, but the big jaw was stubborn. He was a much worried man. There was much discontent among his men, the forces of Kublai Khan seemed to have vanished, so there was no one to fight, and he was cursed with a wife. Nazama was very beautiful, very loving, very jealous and very dictatorial. She was the one person of whom Kaidu was thoroughly scared. An officer had just reported another thousand desertions, a mutiny in the seventh corps, and, worse still, food was falling short.

"Kill the dirty spies! Death to Kublai Khan! Death to Ahmed! Death of a thousand cuts to these spies."

These shouts brought Kaidu out of his tent—Marco and Binguccio, with a

"LAW OF THE UNDERWORLD"

Hold-up

PACING the dark paths of Central Park, completely oblivious to her surroundings, Annabelle Porter squeezed her tall young fiancé's arm. "Mrs. Brown," she murmured happily, "Mrs. Thomas Brown—" Her poorly paid work in a huge department store hadn't taken the freshness and sweetness from Annabelle's face.

Tommy Brown thought she looked particularly beautiful in the dimness, with her eyes shining like stars.

"Eleven hours and twenty-three minutes, then you won't be Annabelle Porter any more."

Suddenly she stopped.

"Tommy, I just thought, maybe when you took out your handkerchief on the subway—"

He grinned, taking a roll of bills from his pocket.

"One hundred and thirty-six dollars. We spent four at Coney—" His voice changed as two dark, menacing figures stood in their path. "What d'you want?"

The older man, with a pale, lined face and glittering, snake-like eyes, said in a harsh voice:

"Could you spare a poor man a hundred and thirty-six bucks for a cup of coffee?"

Tommy looked down. The man's hand was in his overcoat pocket; something jutted significantly. The other man, round of face, similarly menaced the young people.

"Tommy," cried Annabelle, "call a policeman!"

"Good," grated Rocky Mosby, "he can call for your ambulance."

"Oh, give us a break," Tommy pleaded, "we're getting married on that money!"

"Maybe the girl is marrying you for the dough," Rocky sneered. "Now you can find out."

Tommy's face flamed, then whitened. There was something horrible about the glare of the hold-up man—ruthlessness and cold ferocity were in it.

A policeman passed, swinging his stick, eyeing them curiously. Tommy's mouth opened, then shut, as Rocky made a movement with his hidden hand. "I'll be lighting a cigarette in case he looks back," the crook muttered. "Get the dough."

"Say, if the boss ever finds out about this—" grunted his friend Bill.

"He won't," said Rocky coldly.

Bill's hands went to Tommy's pocket. The young man glared helplessly at the evil-faced Rocky.

"Hey, wait a minute, I know you! I've seen you around the apartment house where I work!"

Rocky started, then whispered:

"Listen, kid, maybe you do know me—but you wouldn't want to be a widower before you got married."

"Why don't you fight like a man?" snarled Tommy.

"How?" murmured Bill. "Like this?" His fist came up with shattering force. Tommy, unprepared for the blow, went back, thudding on the hard pathway, and before he could get up the two hold-up men melted away in the darkness.

Gene Fillmore's clean-cut, hawk-like face bore a slight smile as he was let into the apartment where his gang had gathered. He greeted Batsy, the quaint, somewhat dull-witted crook who opened the door, and his eyes shot to the paper they had been reading.

A front-page splash announced the appointment of Warren Rogers as the new District Attorney, who intended to wipe the city clean of racketeers. They had been chortling over it, bandying witticisms about the young lawyer.

Affectionately the gang-leader greeted "Dot" Palmer, the blonde night-club singer to whom he was engaged. He was unconscious of the hate in Rocky Mosby's eyes, for he had no suspicion that Dorothy really loved Rocky and was just playing a double game with him for all she could get out of him.

"What's this I hear about a new D.A.?" demanded Rocky, his heavy lids masking his glittering eyes.

"I just left him," grinned Gene calmly.

"What—what? Say that again," chorused the amazed gangsters round the table.

"I just left Warren Rogers' apartment," said Gene coolly, seating himself at the head of the table. He had just dined with Rogers, for they were friends in the social round, where Gene posed as a good-natured playboy. Over a game of billiards he had heard Warren announcing his plans. Gene had even been asked to give up his polo and chase crooks instead. But since he happened to be one of the hidden men at the top of the gangs whom his unsuspecting friend was out to catch, he had declined politely.

The gang jeered derisively at the simplicity of Warren Rogers.

"Well, you're wrong, boys," said Gene crisply. "He's plenty smart, and plenty tough. But we're going to be just a little tougher. If we make one wrong move—"

"Is that all you wanted to tell us?" drawled a sleek-haired young gangster.

"Why, no, Frankie. As a matter of fact, I asked the boys to meet me here to see if you could dispose of a hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth of jewellery."

Rocky lit a cigarette. "I know a warehouse we can knock over, with a million bucks in furs."

"Rocky, our next job will be Morton's Fifth Avenue jewellery store!" snapped Gene Fillmore.

"But I've got this fur thing all lined up! Get rid of the watchman and the whole place is ours."

"Rocky, we're not doing any jobs requiring butchering. I'm running this like a big business, with a minimum of risk. You're not thugs any more—you're gentlemen."

Everybody sensed the undercurrent of hostility between the pair. Gene believed in planning, pitting his wits against the forces of Law and Order. Rocky, jealous of him both as Dot's fiancé and leader of the gang, was a killer. He believed in force, the rule of the gun. Harshly he sneered: "Gene, you'd look real nice in a scout suit."

"That'll be enough from you!" snapped Gene. "We'll meet day after to-morrow and make all the arrangements."

"All right," Rocky growled. "You're the boss. But why do you have to mix with a cocktail and polo crowd all night long? Ain't we boys good enough for you?"

"Well, I'll tell you what we'll do, Rocky," said Gene sarcastically. "I'll loaf around here all night, and you can mingle in Society and find out where the big money is. The best people will welcome you with open handcuffs."

Rocky's eyes flickered murder as Gene bade them all good-night. He was having a final word with Dot when the door crashed open. Tommy and Annabelle burst in. Tommy's face was tense, frowning; hers slightly apprehensive.

"Stick 'em up, all of you!" he snapped, his hand gripping something in his coat pocket.

"All right, boys," smiled Gene, raising his hands. "Put 'em up—no rough stuff."

"Up on your feet! Line up here!" growled Tommy. "Now turn around." To Annabelle: "Frisk 'em!"

"What's that?" she stammered.

"Go through their rear pockets and look for guns!"

Not knowing whether to laugh or groan, the gangsters allowed Annabelle to take their artillery. She shrank a little when she came to Rocky.

"Side pocket," he grinned.

"All right," growled Tommy. "Take his money and give me a hundred and thirty-six dollars."

Gene's eyebrows rose.

"You'll pardon me for butting into a private affair, but why a hundred and thirty-six dollars?"

"Well, you see," said Annabelle breathlessly, "we were going to be married to-morrow, and these two men held us up and took it all. That's how much it was."

"Stop talking," said Tommy brusquely. "Give me the money."

Then the lights snapped out as Gene took advantage of the lad's temporary slackening of watchfulness. Gene grabbed Annabelle. Rocky pinioned the struggling Tommy, and when the lights went up again the discomfited pair found themselves surrounded by gangsters. Frank exclaimed:

"Why, I know this boy! He works here."

"Call the police," snarled Rocky Mosby.

"Wait a minute, Frankie," snapped Gene.

"You can turn me in," muttered Tommy, "but let her go. She didn't have anything to do with it."

"I did!" Annabelle exclaimed. "If you turn him over to the police, I go, too!"

September 17th, 1938.

"Give me the money, kid," said Gene, not unkindly. "You know, you've both committed a serious offence. Why, you can get fifteen years in prison for this! You'd be old when you got out. Of course, it's my duty to turn you over—" He tailed off thoughtfully, and Annabelle shuddered. Fifteen years in prison!

"We're not criminals," Tommy snapped. "We're just trying to get our own money back!"

Annabelle looked accusingly at the sneering Rocky.

"That man said he'd kill us if we told the police!"

Bill, shuffling his feet, growled uneasily:

"Aw, chief, let's turn 'em over to the cops."

"I'll handle this," grated Gene Fillmore. "Right now, I want to hear more about that stick-up."

"Chief, you ain't gonna believe those kids, are you? We never stuck up nobody!"

Rocky shouldered forward, came close to Gene and stared into his eyes.

"Wait a minute! I'm not afraid of you, Gene. Sure we stuck up the kids. You've got this bunch buffaloed into letting you keep all the dough, and give us coffee and cake money. Well, I needed more, and the kids were handy."

Gene eyed him coldly.

"I keep you all on an allowance so you won't splurge all over town and give yourselves away. How many times have I told you to lay off small fry? Why take the chance for a couple of bucks?"

"Chances are in my line," growled Rocky.

"You're all a lot of crooks!" Tommy burst out.

"He's positively psychic," drawled Dorothy.

"Well, never mind what we are, young fellow," said Gene easily. "You've just stuck up a private apartment."

"Yeah," nodded Batsy wisely, "they got laws against that."

Gene grinned.

"But maybe you can help me. Do you want to do me a little favour, or would you rather go to gaol? It's up to you, kid."

Tommy and Annabelle, now thoroughly seared by the enormity of their act, exchanged glances.

"We'll do anything," muttered Tommy, "if you'll let us go."

Gene looked at the girl; wide-eyed, she nodded miserably.

"All right, it's a deal! We'll talk about the favour later, but remember, if you break your word, it's gaol for both of you."

Miserably they nodded before his stern gaze. Followed by the good-humoured jeers of the mobsmen, Gene took them to his own home to stay. He intended to give them a good time, gain their confidence, for he had an idea they would fit in with his plans.

Gunplay

THOUGH Tommy was still suspicious of Gene's intentions, Annabelle, overwhelmed by the luxury of the gang-leader's apartment, set out to enjoy herself. Despite his antagonism, the young man began to like the racketeer, who was of a different stamp from his gang.

When Gene took them to the Club Sultan, in which he had an interest, Annabelle forgot her troubles, for the night-club life was new and fascinating to her. Gene left them at a privileged table while he went to an inner office for a gang meeting, and got down to business.

"Here is an enlargement of a candid camera shot of Morton's store. I want you to memorise every detail of it. This is Edward Larkin, the salesman. Morton is an old man, you won't have any trouble with him. But keep an eye on Larkin. The store opens at nine in the morning, but they seldom have any customers before nine-ten. If anybody should come in—you know, line them up against the back wall."

That was Gene's way—scientific, with every detail planned out in advance for a minimum of risk—but Rocky was impatient.

"We're wasting time," he sneered. "I can get in, and I can get out."

"Sure you can, Rocky. We all know that. But my way, you see, nobody gets hurt. Personally I prefer gaol for robbery rather than the chair for murder. How about you boys?"

They nodded agreement. Rocky's lips curled as Gene continued.

"Now, you all know what to do, and the exact time. Memorise your instructions and then destroy them."

He told them that at two minutes after nine Johnny and Bill were to start a fight outside the store—a real one. He made them all set their watches by his, so that there would be no hitch in the timetable.

"How about protection?" asked Rocky. "Who's carrying the machine-guns?"

"There won't be any machine-guns. If you pull a trigger on this job, Rocky, you won't rate a cent out of it."

"That's easy to say. Nobody will be shooting at you. I'm the one that's pulling this job. All you do is sit behind a desk."

"And give the orders," smiled Gene. "Maybe to those kids!" snarled Rocky. "But not to me!"

"Rocky, you're getting annoying!" Gene laughed coldly. "Speaking of those kids, go and get them."

Rocky turned to one of the others.

"Call the kids."

"I said you get them!" snapped Gene.

For a moment there was an electric silence as Rocky's pale face glared murder. Then he swaggered to the door. Everybody relaxed. Gene was the coolest man there.

Tommy and the girl were nervous when they came to the office. Gene tried to put them at their ease.

"It's all right, Annabelle, relax. Now I asked you kids to do me a little favour, you remember? That's why I bought you some new clothes so you could go into an expensive jewellery shop to-morrow and not look out of place."

"We're not going to do anything crooked!" declared Tommy.

"Now wait a minute, Tommy, wait a minute. All I want you to do is to ask to see some diamond rings. You won't like anything you see, and the salesman will put several trays on the counter."

"What for?" demanded Tommy suspiciously.

"The two thousand dollars I promised you," said Gene easily.

"Yeah, but we don't—"

Gene's voice hardened.

"And to keep you both from going to gaol for sticking us up at Frank's place." He turned his back on them. Tommy's arm went round Annabelle's slim shoulders. Misery was written on their faces, for despite Gene's friendliness, there was no doubt that they were caught in the toils of gangsterdom.

They had no means of knowing that it was Gene's intention only to use them for this simple job—then they could go their ways, for he didn't want them to get mixed up with the gang. There was no danger to them as he had worked it out. But next morning they were so nervous when they entered the jewellery store at the appointed time—nine o'clock—that they thought Larkin would see something was wrong. However, he put their nervousness down to shyness, and brought out tray after tray of rings, laying them on the counter.

Annabelle was admiring some expensive rings when an uproar started outside. Loud voices quarrelled discordantly, then came the thud of blows. Quickly a crowd collected outside the windows as Billy and Johnny slammed away at each other. The rest of the gang mixed with the spectators.

While Larkin's attention was distracted, Tommy and Annabelle seized the opportunity to hurry out. They edged round the milling crowd as a policeman forced his way through. Larkin was just putting the rings away when a cold voice snapped:

"Reach!"
Covering him was Rocky, with Batsy and Eddie, grim-faced, behind him. Old Morton, standing near his salesman, glared in horror. A hold-up! While the policeman was still struggling to get to the fighters, the crack of a shot sounded from inside. Rocky, Batsy and Eddie dashed out, hurling startled people aside. They leaped into their car. Out rushed Larkin, yelling distractedly:

"Help, stop those men! They shot Mr. Morton!"

Another shot barked as the car screamed away from the sidewalk. Larkin staggered, clasping his shoulder, and collapsed against the doorway as another policeman came running to his assistance.

At nine-seven Gene Fillmore grinned as he looked at his watch. All over by now, and without any trouble. He grinned at Dorothy, who was still recovering from the surprise he had given her when he announced his intention of making this the last job and arranging for their marriage right away. She hadn't expected this, and wondered what the jealous Rocky would have to say.

Then the radio announcer's voice began barking a news flash.

"Armed bandits broke in Morton's Fifth Avenue store and escaped with over a hundred thousand dollars' worth of jewellery. When Mr. Morton lowered his hands slightly one of the bandits shot him in cold blood. Edward Larkin, the salesman, ran out to summon aid and was also shot at by the escaping thugs. His condition is reported critical."

Savagely Gene's voice ripped through the sudden silence.

"Rocky! Wait here for me, Dorothy. We may have to move fast!"

Tommy and Annabelle had been waiting outside the Club Sultan in a panic for a long time when Gene's roadster screeched to a standstill beside them. Annabelle gripped his arm imploringly.

"We never wanted to get mixed up in this robbery and killing."

"All right," Gene snapped. "Come on inside. I'll attend to you later."

He raced into the deserted café, a place of dim shadows, with chairs piled on tables after the cleaners. With the youngsters behind him he came to a full stop as a soft voice drawled:

"Hallo, Gene!"

Sitting at one of the tables in the shadows with a gun resting before him, was Rocky Mosby. The killer had been tipped off by Dorothy that Gene was on the warpath. He had come prepared for a show-down in the only way he understood—with a gun in his hand.

With the bar at their backs they faced him as he rose, smiling mirthlessly.

"Get out of the way, kids! You're in the business now, like the rest of us. So you can watch me elect a new boss."

"Still ambitious, Rocky?" said Gene mockingly.

"Yeah, I like to tell people what to do. I hate to be told. I tried to tell you you needed a gun in this business. People respect you more." All the time he was watching Gene like a snake, ignoring the others.

"All right," grunted Gene. "Go ahead and shoot. Get it over with."

Rocky smiled.

"I like to see you squirm first. I've got something to say that might make you wriggle a little."

Gene grinned offensively.

"Been stealing cheese out of my ice box, Rocky?"

"Funny guy, ain't you? Well, have a good laugh. While you were mixing with the best people I was taking out Dorothy. I suspect she loves me."

Only by a narrowing of his eyes did Gene Fillmore show his amazement.

"You're a liar!"

"You can check on us," snarled Rocky, raising his gun, "when you come back to haunt me!"

His hand contracted on the trigger, but with one amazing leap Tommy came at him, swung a lusty arm and sent the gun flying from the killer's hand. Snarling, Rocky bent swiftly to pick it up. Gene was on him instantly, smashing a blow to the jaw that sent him flying in a heap and picking up the gun himself.

"Thanks, kid," he drawled. "All right, stay where you are, Rocky."

Warily, Rocky began to rise.

"All right, boss, now it's your chance to shoot. But you won't. I ain't afraid of you. You never scared me. That's why I took your girl away. That's why the gang wants me to tell them what to do!"

Unwavering, Gene covered him with his own gun and snapped:

"Tommy, take Annabelle into the back room."

"Stick around, kids," Rocky invited.

"I'm going to take that gun away from him in a minute."

"Rocky," Gene drawled, "you've

"Stick 'em up, all of you!" he snapped, his hand gripping something in his coat pocket.

been getting out of line lately. You're becoming a liability to the gang. I got a letter from Mrs. Winters this morning."

"So what?" grated Rocky, crouching watchfully.

"She called us a bunch of yellow rats," came Gene's cold, measured tones. "When her husband went to prison we promised to keep her going and send her money. She never got a cent. What did you do with the money, Rocky? The boys would like to know about that."

"Yeah?" scowled Rocky. "But you ain't gonna tell them. You ain't gonna tell them nothing. Why don't you shoot, you big shot?" He started towards Gene.

"Stay where you are, Rocky." "You don't know how to fire a gun, do you, Gene?" the killer jeered. "Well, I'll show you."

Like a striking snake his hand flashed to a shoulder-holster. The weapon was half out when Gene's gun crashed. Face contorted, Rocky coughed and crumpled to the floor. A killer even in death, he fired spasmodically as he rolled in agony, his automatic ripping shots at Gene. Bottles smashed to the floor, their contents splashing over Gene as he ducked. In a haze of gun-smoke he stared down at Rocky as the twitching body gradually became still.

Gang Law

"GENE, we're going to give you a fair trial. If the boys decide against you, I guess you know what that means."

A grim gathering faced Gene Fillmore that night. Dorothy Palmer sat alone, her eyes smouldering with hate. It was the singer who had come first on the scene of the shooting, and knelt, sobbing, by the body of Rocky Mosby.

"He was a rat," said Gene coldly when she accused him of shooting the killer in cold blood. "He tried to kill me."

Venomously she stared at him. "The boys will get you for this."

Dazedly he stared at her. "Then everything he said about you was true, huh?"

"Figure it out for yourself!" she snarled, and when the gang came rushing to the scene she accused him point-blank in the face of the evidence of Tommy and Annabelle, whom nobody would believe.

Gene stared round at the grim faces of the men who were to try him. The law of the underworld decreed that a man accused of killing a fellow gang member should himself be the object of gang vengeance. It was obvious that although one or two were trying to be fair-minded, the general opinion was hostile to him. Dorothy had worked well on their minds.

Knowing his life depended on a hair-trigger, Gene had tried to square things with Tommy and Annabelle. They wouldn't accept the two thousand dollars he offered them, wishing only to be free of this atmosphere of robbery and murder. Annabelle, who admired his many good qualities, was still dazed at the discovery that he, too, could be a killer. Uncomfortable before her wonderment, he gave them their hundred and thirty-six dollars.

"Now beat it while you're still carrying it. You don't belong around this place."

As Tommy pulled her away, Annabelle exclaimed:

"But couldn't you run away before they try you?"

Gene laughed grimly. "Sure, I'll tell you what I'll do. September 17th, 1938.

I'll hide in my attic. That'll fool them. Go on, get out, will you, and stop worrying about me."

Now alone—for Batsy, who was on his side, was out on an errand—he faced his accusers and claimed the right to talk.

"What for?" snapped Dorothy. "You killed him, didn't you?"

"Look at yourselves, boys," said Gene. "What were you before I took over? Just a bunch of petty thieves. Do you fellows realise that this past year our receipts were over a million dollars?"

"All I got was fifteen grand," Johnny complained.

"Well, you're not the whole organisation. You're simply a wheel in the machinery."

"Yeah? Well, I'm a pretty big wheel."

"Besides that," said Gene, "I pay out a lot of money for your protection."

"May I inquire, Mr. Fillmore," said Dorothy acidly, "what all this has got to do with your shooting of Rocky?"

"It has this to do with it," he said curtly. "Under my leadership you've all kept out of trouble. If I was right in one thing, I've been right in another. Rocky disobeyed my orders, and he ended up by pulling a gun on me. Fortunately, I beat him to it."

"I was there," said Dorothy implacably. "He shot Rocky down cold. Didn't give him a chance."

Bill glanced at Eddie and rose.

"Well, that's enough for me, boys. Let's get going." And Gene knew that the verdict was against him.

Johnny protested.

"Why can't we just kick him out of the gang and let it go at that?"

"He didn't give Rocky a chance!" snapped Dorothy.

"Well, frankly," grinned Gene, "I'm against it. But I guess I'm outvoted." With a bitter sting in his voice he added: "Well, gentlemen, after looking over this gang, all I can say is that New York is reasonably safe to-night. I'm not going to crawl. It is clear to me that I am the difference here between a well-regulated business organisation and a gang of thugs."

"We got along all right before you came," snarled Bill, and Dorothy Palmer smiled evilly: "And we'll get along all right after you're gone, won't we, boys?"

Johnny, Frankie, Eddie and Larry nodded grimly, and Gene read his doom in their faces. He shrugged, and they were preparing to leave when Batsy burst in cheerfully with the money from the Morton jewels.

"Hi ya, guys, I brought the treasury! Well, what's the matter, did I miss something?"

"Well, you missed all the speeches," drawled Gene, "but you're in time for the fireworks."

"Is that so? I brought along a few friends to see some fun. I didn't have any subpoenas, but I rounded up some witnesses!" And Batsy brought in Annabelle and Tommy, with a pale-faced woman in a dark costume who had once been pretty. Now she looked a very sick woman.

"I thought I told you kids to stay away from here!" Gene growled with more emotion than he had shown hitherto.

"Yeah, but Batsy here said it would help if we told about Rocky trying to shoot you!"

"You coached them swell, Batsy," sneered Dorothy. "Is that Gene's poor old mother?"

"Oh, I forgot to introduce you," said Batsy airily. "Fellows, this is Mrs. Winters."

The gang stared unbelievably.

"Billy's wife?"

"Yeah," said the pale woman drearily. "I'm Mrs. Billy Winters. I guess I look a lot different than when Billy and me was running around together. When you ain't eating regular—" She broke off, coughing spasmodically. "Billy was in the wrong business, but he didn't realise that when he went to prison, I'd be left behind like this!"

"But how could that be?" gasped Bill. "We been sending dough regular!"

"By way of Rocky," drawled Batsy. "He was a nice boy."

"He kept the money for himself?" said Larry incredulously.

"Don't believe her!" snapped Dorothy, her eyes showing her fear that Gene would go free. "It's a frame-up!"

Bill swung on Gene.

"Did you know about this?"

Batsy answered sardonically:

"He showed me a letter from her, but he didn't think you guys would care about a thing like that."

Bill shrugged, staring at Gene.

"The trip's off."

"That's what you think!" screamed Dorothy Palmer, her face twisted with hate, and she suddenly flashed a small automatic out of her handbag. Gene

The fearless Englishman, up against a mysterious enemy, risks his life in a dangerous mission. Starring John Barrymore and John Howard

A Theft and a Murder

IT was quite a merry little party assembled at Phyllis Clavering's villa in Switzerland, and Phyllis was happier than she had been for a long while. For it was on the eve of her marriage to Captain Hugh Drummond, and as he had promised faithfully that he had abandoned all his crime work and was really intending to settle down at last, his fiancée for once was content. For though she loved Drummond dearly and was secretly proud of his many daring exploits she had no fancy for being married to a man who was continually risking his life in the discovery of crime.

The time was just before dinner, and in the lounge-room were Drummond and his fiancée, their Aunt Blanche, and Sir Raymond Blantyre, millionaire, and head of the world famous Metropolitan Diamond Syndicate.

The door opened suddenly and Teuny, Drummond's impassive "man," entered the room. On a salver lay a small package which he presented to Drummond.

"Just arrived, sir."

Drummond glanced at it.

"More loot, darling," he said with a smile in the direction of his fiancée.

"Valuable, too, from the look of it, Hugh. Why, look at all the insurance stamps."

She went on surprisedly as Drummond opened it.

"It's from Gwen and Algy! Why on earth didn't they bring it themselves? They'll be here any moment now."

She opened the letter and read as follows:

"Dear Hugh and Phyllis,—Look what daddy has just made in his lab! This is our wedding gift to you, but don't tell anyone as it's a secret."

She looked up with a smile.

"Don't suppose it matters much," she said, "as we're all friends. But isn't it rather wonderful? It really looks real, doesn't it, Sir Raymond? You're an expert on these things."

It certainly did look real. It was a large diamond about the size of a small nut. As it lay on its velvet bed it winked and glittered at them.

Blantyre took it and studied it with a slight frown on his face.

"You say this lady's father made this?" he asked incredulously.

"Oh, yes," replied the girl readily.

"He's Professor Goodman, the famous chemist. He's been working on this for years—it's his hobby. It's rather a beautiful bit of glass, isn't it, Sir Raymond? For, of course, as it isn't real it can't be of any value, can it?"

He handed it back to her. Drummond was watching him with a slightly perplexed look on his face.

"Oh, no," answered the millionaire carelessly. "It isn't of any value, of course. But it's interesting all the same."

It was not until dinner was over and Blantyre had left that the subject came up again, for Algy and Gwen had turned up, and after the usual greetings had been exchanged Drummond turned to Gwen.

"Thanks for your present, Gwen," he said. "But might I ask the reason of all the insurance stamps?"

"Well, diamonds are worth it, aren't they, Hugh?"

"Diamonds are, old lady—but not manufactured bits of glass."

Her smile was a shade pitying.

"That's a real diamond, Hugh."

He stared at her.

"But you said your old man made it?" he queried.

"So he did. He's been working on the process for nearly twenty years, and this is the first real result. He showed it to an expert, without telling him he'd made it, and the expert offered to give him twenty thousand pounds for it straight off."

Drummond sat up in his chair.

"D'you mean that, Gwen?" he demanded.

"I most certainly do. And he says he can make all he wants to. He's as pleased as a dog with two tails."

"I'll say he is," replied Drummond emphatically. "He can make all the money he wants."

"Oh, that doesn't interest daddy in the slightest," answered the girl. "He won't try and make money out of it. All he's interested in is the fact that he can now do what he's been trying to do for years."

A worried frown came to Drummond's face as he got up from his chair.

"That sounds all good, my dear, but if this gets out—"

As he paused, Gwen broke in.

"It had better not, Hugh. Father doesn't want it known yet."

"H'm! Sorry about that. Sir Raymond Blantyre seemed a bit interested in it. He was here when your letter came, and he examined that diamond at some length."

Aunt Blanche, however, broke in here.

"My dear Hugh, don't be so ridiculous," she said. "Sir Raymond is a gentleman and one of the best known men in the whole of London. I'll tell him when I see him to-morrow that you don't want this thing talked about yet. Now bring Gwen and Algy and let them see your presents."

"Let's hope they're all safe," chimed in Longworth. "If the jolly old burglars were to get to work—"

"Nonsense," interrupted Aunt Blanche, "we've got a special detective guarding them day and night."

They went into the room where all the presents were laid out.

"Hallo?" exclaimed Drummond as he glanced round the room. "Where's our sleuth?"

"Popped out to have one," suggested Longworth facetiously.

"I must talk to him about—" began the other, but he swung round in a moment as a little scream came from his fiancée.

"Hugh, it's gone!"

"What's gone?"

"The diamond—the diamond that Gwen and Algy gave us. The case is here, but it's empty."

They stood together gazing at the empty case. Drummond's face was grave. But they swung round in a moment at a startled cry from Algy Longworth, who had been searching about in a corner of the room.

"And here's your 'tee, Hugh," he said as he pointed grimly to a figure that lay sprawled out inertly on the floor.

Drummond was across the room in a flash. Aunt Blanche had given a scream and collapsed into a chair. Gwen and Phyllis were clutching each other and their faces were white.

Drummond, down on his knees beside the unfortunate detective, spoke at last.

"Ring up the police, Algy," he said.

"This man's been murdered."

A Caller for Professor Goodman

PROFESSOR GOODMAN, elderly, dreamy-eyed, benevolent, was in his library when a maid entered.

"Two gentlemen to see you, sir," she said. "Sir Raymond Blantyre and his secretary."

The professor tapped his head thoughtfully.

"Ah, yes," he murmured, "I remember now. They made an appointment. Show them up, Mrs. Weevens."

Blantyre came into the room, a big, florid-faced man.

"My name is Blantyre, professor," he said. "This is my secretary, Mr. Roberts. As I told you on the phone, being the head of the greatest diamond syndicate in the world I am naturally curious about this new process of yours."

"Naturally, naturally," replied the other with a bland smile. "I suppose you are inclined to look upon me as a serious rival, Sir Raymond, but you needn't worry a lot. My interest is in my experiments. I shan't flood the world with my results for the purpose of making money."

A frown crossed the millionaire's face.

"Forgive me for saying so," he replied, "but you have not yet convinced me that you can make diamonds."

The professor beamed on him.

"No, my friend," he answered, "but I very soon shall. Now watch me closely."

No two people could have watched him more closely than did those two for the next twenty minutes. They saw him busy himself with queer evil smelling liquids which he mixed in front of them with exceeding great care; they saw him empty the result into a empty metal cup, and the cup itself enclosed in a cylinder which in turn was screwed tightly into a complicated machine. Then they saw him pull a switch and the sparks begin to fly.

They stood watching in dead silence. The noise of the machinery was deafening, the sparks were blinding. Presently flames began to shoot out and they stepped back in slight alarm, but the professor merely shook his head as though telling them there was no need for fear.

Finally, he pulled a succession of levers and at last came silence.

"Gentlemen," he said impressively, "you have witnessed the birth of a diamond."

Said Sir Raymond with a frown:

"Let's have a look at the diamond, professor."

The latter, with a pair of tongs, unscrewed the cylinder and removed from it a round black ball which he dropped into a vat of liquid which spurted up a cloud of steam.

Presently he lifted the black ball out.

"There is your diamond, gentlemen," he said.

"That's not a diamond," said Roberts sincerely.

"You don't think so?" asked the professor with a smile. "Let us see."

He picked up a small hammer, gave a few gentle blows to the black ball which shivered and broke. And there lay a glittering diamond!

"I can make those at a cost of a few shillings apiece," he said modestly.

Sir Raymond picked it up, examined it closely; studied it through his glass.

"Perfect," he pronounced. "Small, admittedly, but—"

"Ah, I shall do better later on, Sir Raymond. If I had an equipment like Dr. Botulian's—"

"And who's he?"

"You've never heard of him? Why, he's the great American scientist, now over here. Incidentally"—with a smile—"he is my rival."

Blantyre, who had been listening with the closest attention, now spoke.

"Professor," he said, "I will pay you fifty thousand pounds for this secret of yours."

The professor regarded them coldly.

"I'm afraid I'm not interested, gentlemen," he said.

"Name your figure then. I'll pay you anything in reason."

A slightly angry look appeared on the professor's benevolent face.

"As I have already told you, Sir Raymond, my invention is not for sale."

"But, professor, surely you can see—" began the other when Goodman cut him short.

"You're wasting your time and mine, sir," he said sharply. "I have been pleased to show you my invention. I have now the honour to wish you good-morning."

As Blantyre and Roberts came down the staircase together the millionaire was scowling.

"I wish to goodness you hadn't killed that detective," he said.

One hour later Drummond was interviewing Colonel Neilson, of Scotland Yard, though the latter's opening remark as Drummond entered the room was hardly encouraging.

"I never see you come into this room, Drummond, without wishing you a million miles away," he said crossly.

"Thanks for the kind thought," replied the big man cheerfully. "But you've got to listen to this one."

He proceeded to relate exactly what had taken place in the villa at Switzerland, Blantyre's hurried departure, the theft of the diamond and the murder of the detective.

"I've just come from Professor Goodman's," he went on, "and Blantyre's been there trying to get him to sell his process, and practically threatening him with things if he doesn't do so. Now give me the answer to that one."

Neilson was silent. He was never inclined to encourage Drummond too much because he was always a little nervous of what he would do. But he could see there was something grave at the back of it.

"Sir Raymond is a most respectable man," he said abruptly.

"So's every criminal till he turns crook," retorted Drummond. "But it's pretty plain to me that he murdered that 'tee, and the next murder you'll hear of will be Professor Goodman. And if you won't be around to see it, I shall. Good-morning."

He went out raging. Neilson, with a smile, rang his bell and one of his clerks came in.

"Put a plain-clothes man on to Drummond," he said, "as he may get into trouble, and we've got to be there to help him out. And have two men watching Professor Goodman's house."

Sir Raymond Lays His Plans

BLANTYRE and Roberts called on Dr. Botulian that afternoon, for Professor Goodman's chance remark had put an idea into the millionaire's head.

He began with an encouraging smile after he had stated who he was and the experiment that he had recently witnessed, for he had seen other things than mere interest show in the doctor's eyes during his recital.

"You and the professor are rivals, aren't you, doctor?" he asked blandly.

"We've both of us experimented along similar lines, if that's what you mean," replied the other guardedly.

"And you've failed where Goodman seems to have succeeded?"

The other stroked his small beard. There was a frown on his face which did not escape Blantyre.

"At present—yes."

"We are very interested in the Goodman process," said Roberts smoothly, "and we have made him a very handsome offer, but he declines to sell."

"I have an appointment with him this evening," murmured Botulian thoughtfully. "I'm taking him some of my equipment at nine o'clock."

Blantyre and Roberts exchanged glances. This was news, and interesting news.

"Supposing that—or—we kept your appointment for you?" suggested Blantyre ingratiatingly.

Botulian looked thoughtful, and Blantyre went on.

"We should be charmed to pay you five thousand pounds to keep the appointment."

Botulian's eyes narrowed.

"But I might hit upon the process myself later?" he murmured thoughtfully.

"When we should be delighted to buy you out at a high figure," replied the millionaire.

Botulian sat nodding thoughtfully.

"Exactly what have I got to do?" he demanded at length.

"Receive a cheque for five thousand pounds," answered the millionaire smoothly, "and remain here so that you have a perfect alibi."

"One of you gentlemen, I take it, intends to go as me?"

Sir Raymond rose to his feet with a smile.

"Let's say, doctor," he answered, "that whatever risk we take will be our own."

For some time after they had gone Botulian sat thinking deeply. Then at last he summoned his assistant.

"Well?" demanded the latter.

"You heard the suggestion?"

"I did. So you aren't keeping your appointment to-night?"

A smile spread over the doctor's face.

"That's where you're wrong, my dear fellow," he replied blandly. "I am keeping it—but it will be well before nine o'clock. Poof, I can see their game! They're going to destroy his laboratory. All right—they shall. But we'll be well in front of them and we'll get Goodman away. And I fancy then that Blantyre will be ready to pay fifty thousand pounds instead of a paltry five."

Drummond had already had in the course of years too many rebuffs from the Yard to be inclined to take them seriously, so after his fruitless interview with Colonel Neilson he went straight back to Professor Goodman's house, where he, too, leaped that he had got an appointment that night with Dr. Botulian. Though when later in the day the faithful Tenny who had followed Blantyre and Roberts after they had left Goodman's house, apprised him of the fact that these two had both called upon Dr. Botulian and had come away obviously pleased with themselves, his fears all leaped up again. For he was quite sure that something sinister had been planned, though he was entirely at a loss to understand what it could be.

All the same he had no idea of abandoning his investigations. He was firmly convinced in his own mind that Blantyre was planning something desperate, and he was determined to find out what it could be. So that evening soon after eight o'clock he was loitering round Goodman's house, dodging backwards and forwards about the shrubbery in his efforts to avoid the two constables who were patrolling the house. And it was while he was crouching down behind one of the laurel bushes that the faithful Tenny joined him.

"Dr. Botulian, sir, has just entered the house," he whispered. "The police stopped him, but he said who he was and he was allowed to go in."

"Funny," mused Drummond. "His appointment was for nine, and it's not half-past eight. Tenny, you must slip away from here and try and draw off the police. I've got to get into the house and see what's going on."

He heard his man slip away and waited, listening. He was quite convinced now that something queer was on foot, and in a few minutes' time when no sound came to him he slipped from the shrubbery and was soon busy on one of the lower windows. But he swung round in a flash as a voice came from his elbow.

"Good-evening, Captain Drummond." Drummond cursed him under his breath. Two stalwart constables were standing before him.

"It won't do, sir," went on one of them calmly. "We have special instructions from Colonel Neilson, sir, to take you off if we found you trying to get into this house. It would be wiser to come quietly."

Drummond swore softly but volubly. "You mean you're going to arrest me?"

"Afraid we've got to follow orders, sir. If you won't come quietly—"

But here Drummond interrupted them with a weary shrug of the shoulders.

"Oh, what's the use?" he exclaimed bitterly. "I'll come."

Neilson regarded him sternly as they brought him into his room.

"So you were still at it, were you?" he queried. "I've been looking for an excuse for some time to lock you up, Drummond, and now you've furnished it. You were trying to batter your way into that house—"

"To prevent a murder being committed."

"Oh, I've heard that tale before!"

He turned to the attendant constables. "Take him away and lock him up," he said.

"But, colonel!" exclaimed Drummond desperately. "Even if you do lock me up, will you send someone up immediately to Goodman's house? I tell you—"

"I don't care what you tell me!" stormed the other. "I tell you that there's nothing wrong with Goodman's house and—"

But at that moment the telephone-bell shrilled out, and he picked up the receiver, though even as he listened the expression of his face changed.

"What? There's been an explosion—the house has been wrecked—Goodman's house!"

He banged down the receiver, glared at Drummond, who was whistling softly under his breath.

"My car—quick!" exclaimed Neilson. "And you come along, too, Drummond!"

As they pulled up outside the house where the constable was holding back the crowd they saw only too clearly that there had been a serious explosion, for almost half the house was in ruins.

But even as they alighted from the car a slight, bearded man came forward in an obvious state of agitation.

"I'm Dr. Botulian," he said. "I'm looking for Professor Goodman's house. I have an appointment with him."

Neilson glared at him.

"What time?"

"Nine o'clock. I'm a bit late, I'm afraid, but—"

But at that moment Mrs. Weevens pushed her way forward and threw out an accusing finger at the doctor.

"There he is!" she exclaimed.

"There's the blackguard who called on my master over an hour ago."

"Oh, but that's impossible!" exclaimed the doctor. "I have never even approached this house until now."

"Oh, you did, I saw you!" replied Mrs. Weevens.

"I can prove I didn't."

Neilson was rubbing his chin.

"I'm afraid, doctor, that this is a case for a magistrate to decide," he said.

"But you can't possibly arrest me," answered the other excitedly; but Neilson came in angrily.

"Can't I?" he retorted. "You evidently don't know—"

Drummond stepped back, his sword above his head. . . .

But a quiet voice came from his elbow.

"I shouldn't if I were you," it said. Neilson wheeled round furiously. Drummond was standing there holding out something.

"Take a squint at that which I found just now inside the house, colonel," he suggested, and there was a smile on his face.

The other snatched it from him, glared at it, and then glared back at Drummond, who went on quietly:

"That's why I say you mustn't arrest the doctor," he said. "That's a piece of a false beard or a false wig the same colour as Dr. Botulian's, so it looks very much as though—"

"Someone's been impersonating him? Great heavens!" exclaimed Neilson.

He swung round on one of the constables.

"Did you see anyone like Dr. Botulian arrive?" he flung out.

"Well, sir, a gentleman arrived, like this gentleman, who said he was Dr. Botulian, and he drove up with a big packing-case—"

"Which was probably filled with high-explosives," finished Neilson, now thoroughly angry. "Oh, you make me tired, the whole lot of you!"

The Trapping of Bulldog Drummond

IT was two days later, and Bulldog Drummond sat at his breakfast with the imperturbable Tenny motionless behind him.

"You are not getting on with your breakfast, sir," suggested the latter mildly.

"I'm not, Tenny. Things aren't going right, and I can't make it out. I've got a strong feeling in my bones that Goodman was never killed in that explosion. Yet if he wasn't—"

He left the sentence unfinished as he stared gloomily at his plate. At that moment the electric bell in the hall whirred out.

"Go and see who that is, Tenny," he said.

A few moments later the man appeared, ushering in Dr. Botulian.

"How are you, doctor?" asked Drummond smoothly. "What can I do for you?"

"The late Professor Goodman seems to have had a premonition that something was going to happen to him," replied the doctor as he sat down. "A week ago he sent me a letter requesting me in the event of his death to carry on his diamond experiments."

"I see. But may I ask how this affects me?"

"Merely that Goodman gave his notes to you for their safe keeping."

Drummond frowned.

"On the contrary, doctor, I begged him to do so and he refused."

Dr. Botulian, without a word, produced a letter which he handed to Drummond.

"Read that," he said laconically.

Drummond glanced at it. It read thus:

"Dear Drummond,—In the event of anything happening to me will you please turn over my notes to my old friend and colleague, Dr. Botulian?—
"BERNARD GOODMAN."

Drummond looked up. There was a smile on his face.

"I naturally wanted to be quite sure," he said. "I admit that he did give me the notes. They're at the bank in my safe deposit. Perhaps if you will come back here this afternoon at four—"

"I could come with you now?" broke in the other eagerly; but Drummond merely shook his head.

"I'm not doubting you, doctor," he replied, "but out of fairness to my old friend I must verify his signature. If it's O.K., as no doubt it is, you shall have the notes at four this afternoon."

The other rose from his chair. "Thank you, captain. I'll be here at four," he said.

After he had gone Drummond sat fingering the letter and examining it closely. His eyes were narrowed. Tenny was watching him.

"Now this is highly interesting, Tenny," murmured Drummond. "I want a long envelope and half a dozen sheets of paper. I think I can most certainly say now that Professor Goodman isn't dead, after all."

One hour later he was seated in Colonel Neilson's room, and the latter was studying the letter which Botulian had given him.

"I suppose you're telling me that this letter is a forgery?" he queried at length.

"On the contrary, Gwen has identified it as her father's handwriting."

"Then why can't you give Botulian the notes?"

"Simply because Goodman never gave them to me."

Neilson stared at him.

"Then if Goodman never gave them to you—" he began, and then stopped. Drummond came in with a smile.

"Exactly."

"But that means—what exactly does it mean, Drummond?"

"One of two things, colonel. Now listen."

By the time he rose to go, Neilson was nodding grim approval.

At four o'clock Botulian entered the room and Drummond rose to meet him. But his greeting was strange, for he suddenly grasped the doctor's beard and gave it a violent tug.

"What the devil—what the—" spluttered the other; but Drummond came in with a smile.

"Forgive me, doctor. I must apologise, but a man obviously impersonating you came here this morning with this letter. D'you recognise it?"

He handed the other the letter which the latter himself had brought, and Botulian stared at it for some moments as if undecided as to what to say.

"This letter," he said at length. "was stolen from my house last night. I didn't report it to the police as it would make it public."

"And I merely pulled your beard just now, sir," replied Drummond airily, "to make sure you are the real Dr. Botulian, Tenny, give the doctor those notes."

Drummond stood chuckling after Botulian had left.

"My hat and revolver, quick, Tenny," he said. "I think he'll lead me all right now to Professor Goodman."

It was a long pursuit, but Drummond had been accustomed to long pursuits, and he knew furthermore now that the Yard men were joining in the chase and would follow him wherever he went. And that was quite good enough for him when eventually he tracked Botulian down to a little village in the Midlands. And so sure was he of those whom he believed to be following him that he went boldly up to the house and knocked at the door, which was opened by the doctor himself.

"Ah, come in, Drummond!" he exclaimed genially. "D'you know I had a sort of fancy that you'd be coming along."

Drummond's hand was in his pocket on his gun, and he pushed it forward a shade ostentatiously.

"I shouldn't try any tricks, doctor," he said quietly. "I hold you covered."

"My dear fellow, I can see that. I'll go first and you can follow me if you like. Though I don't understand quite what this means."

"I most certainly should like," answered Drummond grimly. "But don't please let me see your hands go to your pockets. I'm horribly quick on the trigger."

He followed the other into a comfortably furnished hall, but he saw in a glance that it was empty.

"I want to see Professor Goodman," he said briefly.

Botulian smiled. "My dear man, I'm not a medium. I can't bring the dead to life."

"Ah, but Goodman isn't dead, doctor. That letter you gave me was written within the last twenty-four hours. I know; the ink has been tested."

A dangerous light shone for a moment in the other's eyes, but he turned it away with a laugh.

"Well, we all make mistakes sometimes," he said. "Even Captain Drummond. Look out behind you."

But Drummond, smiling, shook his head.

"I'm not falling for that one, thank you, doctor," he answered. "It's a bit too old. I'll trouble you to—"

And then something crashed on his head from behind, and as he slid inertly to the floor he knew that he had fallen into a cleverly laid trap.

The Last Round

WHEN Drummond came to his senses it was to find himself in a small attic the windows of which were closely barred. And Professor Goodman was bending over him. In a few moments Drummond explained all that had occurred, but even while he was talking they heard the sound of bolts being drawn, and in another moment Botulian entered the room.

"Well, gentlemen," he said as he surveyed them with an evil smile. "isn't it time we came to an understanding? I don't want blank sheets of paper, Drummond, such as you put into that envelope—I want the notes."

Said Goodman, after a pause: "They're in my laboratory."

"Unfortunately your laboratory has been blown to bits, professor. But what you've done once you can do again."

"It will take a long time."

Botulian shrugged his shoulders. "With an able assistant like Captain Drummond?" he queried. "Surely not."

Drummond spoke then: "And if we refuse?" he asked grimly.

Botulian smiled. "The consequences, I'm afraid, will be most unpleasant for both of you," he said. "Think it over."

While this was taking place Colonel Neilson was sitting in his room with an exceedingly worried expression on his face. Opposite him was Sir Raymond Blantyre, no less worried; but from an entirely different cause had Neilson but known it.

"And you can't give us any idea of what's been going on?" asked Neilson at length.

Blantyre threw out his hands. His plans had miscarried very badly, and he had a shrewd suspicion that Botulian had in some way double-crossed him. But he wasn't telling Neilson so.

"I know no more than you do," he protested. "I want to find my man

THE PAINTED STALLION

Read This First

Backed by Dupray, a scheming Spaniard who is Governor of Santa Fe, but who has received news that he is to be deposed by the newly established Mexican Republic, a band of renegades led by one, Zamora, is preying on the wagon-trains that ply to and fro across the Western wilds with rich merchandise under their awnings.

The activities of these renegades are hampered by a mystery rider on a painted stallion, who has sworn to defeat outlawry and who again and again warns the bandits' intended victims of their danger by means of whistling arrows.

The year is 1824, and in that year an American frontiersman known as Clark Stuart is detailed by the U.S. Government to negotiate a trade treaty with the Mexican authorities. It is a treaty which Dupray is anxious to prevent from being conceded, and at his instigation Zamora invites the Indians to attack a wagon-train led by a trader named Jamison—a wagon-train with which Clark is travelling and whose personnel also includes Jim Bowie, famous as the inventor of the Bowie knife, and Kit Carson, a boy later to become renowned as a Western scout.

The Rider of the Painted Stallion saves the train by calling off the Redskins, who regard that mysterious figure as a supernatural being, and later the Rider rescues Clark from the clutches of some of Zamora's henchmen.

After learning the Rider is in reality a white girl, Clark and his companions reach Santa Fe, where they discover Dupray's association with the outlaws.

Dupray escapes, and by a trick decoys the Jamison party and Santa Fe's garrison into the hills. Then his men attack the residence of a new governor who has arrived at the citadel.

Together with Kit Carson and Jim Bowie, three of Jamison's men and half a dozen soldiers have been left behind. These rally round the new governor and engage the outlaws, but the residence being set on fire, the heroic defenders rush forth to die fighting.

Kit, attempting to follow, trips and strikes his head against a door, losing consciousness.

To the Rescue

JIM BOWIE, Don Luis Alvarez and their companions were unaware of the accident that had befallen Kit, but even had they known that he was lying insensible in that room which they had evacuated they might well have considered it an act of mercy to leave him there.

The chances were that he would remain mercifully oblivious and that death would steal upon him painlessly. And what alternative could Bowie, Don Luis and their party have offered the boy if they had realised his plight and turned back to revive him? They could only have shepherded him out of the burning residence to meet his end by a bullet, for Zamora and his blood-thirsty satellites were not of the breed to show mercy to anyone—not even to a lovable little fellow like Kit Carson.

As it was Kit seemed destined to die of suffocation, and not by a slug from a six-gun.

Down the stairs that led to the ground floor of the house went Jim Bowie, long-barrelled rifle clutched in his horny, calloused hands, weather-beaten face grim-determined in its expression. After him, revolver in fist, came Don Luis Alvarez, Governor of Santa Fe and representative of the newly-established Mexican Republic, and bunched in the rear of that elderly hidalgo were Bowie's three comrades of the Jamison wagon-train and the half-dozen soldiers who had been detailed to remain at the presidio or fortress when the rest of the garrison had departed.

Through weltering smoke luridly coloured here and there with tongues of fire those eleven men fought their way to the front door of the dwelling. Then they charged out on to the veranda and out into the courtyard of the presidio, and as they appeared there in full view the air seemed to rock with a bellowing volley of gunplay that came from the position occupied by Zamora and the besieging outlaws.

Leadens missiles ripped across the patio, dealing murder. One of Jim Bowie's fellow Americans buckled at the knees and sank riddled to the dust. Three of the Mexican troopers pitched headlong, lifeless. The survivors, unscathed, gave swift response to the missalade—the other three soldiers, the governor and Bowie's remaining compatriots standing in front of the burning residence and shooting at the renegades, who had issued exultantly from cover.

"Ambush"

Jim Bowie on his part was not content to stand still and trade lead with the outlaws across an intervening area that measured some forty or fifty yards. A wild light of battle had kindled in his eyes, vivid as the tongues of flame that were threatening to raze Don Luis' quarters, and his teeth were bared so that they lent an expression of indescribable ferocity and mad courage to his features. Indeed, he might have been likened in that moment to some Viking of old—berserk in the determination to slay before he himself was slain.

Savagely he rushed towards the muster of gangsters, and, rifle held low, firing from the hip as he ran, he accounted for two of his enemies. Then suddenly realising the weapon in his grasp was empty, he clutched it in mid-stride and charged on.

It seemed miraculous that he had not already fallen dead, struck by an outlaw bullet, for the crooks had not been slow to concentrate their gunplay on him when he had dashed forward. Yet perhaps because there was something unnerving in the spectacle of his frenzied figure hurtling to the attack, the aim of the renegades was singularly inaccurate, and he was within twenty paces of them before a bullet tumbled him to the ground.

Even as he fell, Zamora and his accomplices became aware of a commotion outside the fort, and all at once the four gangsters who had been left on the watch beyond the gateway scuttled into the courtyard with loud cries of alarm.

"Beat it, fellers! The Jamison crowd an' the garrison—they're high-tailin' it straight for the fort! They're comin' up at full stretch, and it looks like Clark Stuart is with 'em!"

Such were the shouts raised by the men who had been posted outside the presidio, and Zamora and the other outlaws could scarcely believe their ears on hearing them. Then panic seizing the rogues, a general rush was made for the gateway—a rush which Zamora made no attempt to stem. Indeed, the dago would have led that precipitate flight if he had not been restrained for a moment by Macklin.

"Wait!" the latter jerked. "We ain't got what we came for, but we'll take somethin' away with us."

He pointed to the figure of Jim Bowie. The veteran scout was struggling to his knees in a dazed fashion, and was fumbling vaguely for his rifle, which had slipped from his fingers and was lying a yard or so in front of him. There was blood in his hair, but the bullet that had dropped him had not injured him seriously—had merely creased him.

"That hombre is Bowie," Macklin panted to Zamora, as he indicated the bemused frontiersman, "an' he's about as close to Stuart an' Jamison as a brother. We might find him a useful hostage if we took him along with us. Quick, let's pick him up!"

Anxious as he was to escape from the presidio, Zamora blundered towards Jim Bowie with Macklin, and the pair of them laid hold of the veteran, who made an attempt to resist but who was speedily struck senseless by a blow from the butt of Macklin's forty-five.

In another instant Bowie was being dragged towards the gateway, and though his captors were harried by a burst of shooting from Don Luis and the other survivors of the party which had defended the governor's residence, the smoke that was swirling over the patio tended to spoil the aim of the unconscious scout's friends.

Unharmed, Macklin and Zamora hauled their prisoner out of the fort. Meanwhile, their accomplices were making off at top speed, and the Jamison crowd and the troopers who were riding stirrup to stirrup with the Americans from Independence were approaching the scene rapidly. But the newcomers were still some little distance away when Zamora and Macklin flung Bowie over the back of a spare mount which had belonged to one of the renegades killed in the attack on the presidio, the frontiersman's captors then springing astride their own broncs.

Macklin seized the rein of the pony across which Jim Bowie had been thrown, and, Zamora by his side, struck off at full pelt in the direction which the rest of the gang were taking. As for the cavalcade headed by Jamison, Clark and the captain of the Santa Fe garrison, they separated into two bodies, one giving chase to the bandits and pumping lead at the ruffians' fleeing forms, the other pushing onward for the fortress.

Clark and Jamison were among those who bore down on the presidio, neither of them having recognised the unconscious man who was in the hands of Zamora and Macklin. They had both been under the impression, in fact, that the figure which had been hoisted athwart the spare bronc had been that of a wounded outlaw.

Jamison's horse, carrying Clark as well as the wagon boss, was the first to enter the courtyard of the fort, and a few seconds afterwards the pair of them were confronting Don Luis Alvarez and the remnants of the little party which had held out against the renegades' onslaught.

Dismounting, Clark and Jamison glanced at the huddled bodies of the men who had been shot down by the outlaws. Then the wagon boss addressed himself to the Governor.

"I reckon none of you would 've been left alive, Don Luis," he said, "if Clark Stuart here hadn't met up with us out in the hills. We mighty soon found out from him we'd been tricked into leavin' Santa Fe, an' we turned back pronto. But where's Jim Bowie? I don't see him around."

"Your friend Bowie was carried off by two of those renegades," the Governor answered sombrely, at which piece of news Jamison and Clark looked at each other in dismay.

Then the U.S. Government agent found his voice.

"And Kit Carson?" he rapped out. "Have those coyotes carried him off as well?"

At that one of the two surviving Americans in Don Luis' party gave vent to an exclamation.

"Kit Carson!" he blurted. "Why, no, Clark, the outlaws didn't get him. He must still be inside the Governor's quarters—up in that room there."

He indicated the windows of the apartment which the little group of defenders had been forced to evacuate a short time previously, and Clark waited to hear no more. With a hoarse cry on his lips he bounded to the veranda of the burning building, and, hurling himself across the threshold of the residence, he fought his way through the dense clouds of smoke and ascended the staircase leading to the upper floor, where it did not take him long to find the room in which Kit lay.

Stumbling upon the boy's prone body, Clark gathered the lad in his powerful arms and then retraced his steps down to the hallway and the front door, choking and retching as the fumes of the conflagration assailed his throat and lungs with ever-increasing effect. Indeed, he was almost at the last gasp by the time he gained the courtyard, where Jamison and the Governor took charge of the rescued youngster and set themselves to the task of reviving him.

In the meantime the courtyard had become crowded with those men of the returned cavalcade who had followed Clark and the wagon boss to the presidio, and efforts were being made to quench the fire that had broken out in Don Luis' quarters. Nor were those efforts unsuccessful, although more than an hour elapsed before the flames were completely extinguished.

By then young Kit Carson had been restored to his senses and was more or less himself again, and he was assuring Clark, Jamison and Governor Alvarez that he was none the worse of his experience when the men who had spurred in pursuit of the outlaws were seen cantering towards the fort.

They brought with them the disappointing intelligence that the bandits had made a clean getaway, owing to the fact that their horses had been considerably fresher than the ponies ridden by the supporters of law and order. The crooks, it seemed, had turned east after entering the hill-country to the north, and although the outdistanced pursuers had done their utmost to stick to the fugitives' trail, they had lost the scent utterly amid the barren mountains.

On learning this Don Luis Alvarez looked at Clark Stuart gloomily enough.

"My friend," he said, "the events of this morning have compelled me to make up my mind on the question of your mission to Santa Fe. I know that we have not had a chance to discuss that mission thoroughly as yet, but under the circumstances it is impossible for me to negotiate any trade treaty with your government on behalf of the Mexican Republic while this province remains exposed to the depredations of these outlaws.

"I understand there is a clause in that proposed treaty which refers to a guarantee of adequate protection for American wagon-trains," he said. "And, placed as I am, I cannot take it upon myself to guarantee any such protection in this territory until Dupray and his associates have been stamped out."

Clark nodded gravely.

"I appreciate all that, your Excellency," he rejoined. "On the other hand, it may not be long before the Dupray-Zamora outfit are brought to justice. You see, I know where their hide-out is situated now, and although it's liable to prove a difficult place to storm, I reckon our combined forces ought to be able to take it."

The Governor bit his lip.

"Our combined forces, eh?" he murmured. "Senor, I cannot afford to send my garrison into the hills again. I cannot afford to take that chance, leaving the presidio open to further attack by those outlaws—indeed, leaving the whole town at their mercy. For you can be sure that if the renegades learned Santa Fe had been left practically undefended again they would circle round and repeat the onset they made to-day, and perhaps with more success. No, senor, from now on the troops under my control will be kept close to home."

It was a decision from which he would not budge, not even when Clark reminded him of Bowie's capture and appealed to him to lend aid in attempting the rescue of the veteran scout.

"I deeply regret the kidnapping of your friend," Don Luis said. "But I would be neglecting my duty to an entire community if I allowed myself to be swayed by considerations for the welfare of one man."

They were his final words on the subject—words that boded ill for Jim Bowie, who at that very moment was being conveyed through the mountains by the rogues who had taken him prisoner.

Still lying insensible over the pony across whose back he had been flung, Bowie was oblivious of his surroundings and of the band of ruffians who were galloping eastward with him, Macklin and Zamora having caught up with the rest of the fugitives by now. Nor had the captive recovered consciousness when the crooks reached their destination—that lofty cavern with its inner compartment wherein Escobedo Dupray had now taken up his abode.

Dupray was sitting alone in that inner chamber when his hirelings entered with the prisoner, and when he heard how the attack on the presidio had been frustrated he broke out into a torrent of abuse, concentrating his wrath upon Zamora so that the latter fairly squirmed under the deposed lieutenant governor's venomous upbraiding.

"I send you and your men to Santa Fe to plunder the Jamison wagons and to obtain for me the official seal of the new governor—and what do you bring me? News of failure—news that five of the gang have been killed—news that you have accomplished nothing! Por Dios, are you and your compadres a pack of spineless fools, Zamora? Are you completely without courage and initiative?"

Such was the sum total of Dupray's angry remarks, and in response to them Zamora could only protest that they were unreasonable, and that the ineffectiveness of the attack was due to one factor alone.

"Clark Stuart was responsible for halting us," he declared. "We believed he was dead, but we were wrong, and he must have fallen in with his friends and the troopers of the garrison and turned them back from the hills."

"That may be," snarled Dupray, "but it sounds to me as if you were an unconscionable time in driving the few defenders of the Governor's residence out into the open. You ought to have finished what you set out to do long before Stuart and his crowd showed up with the troopers!"

He paused, then directed an ugly glance at Jim Bowie, who had been thrown unceremoniously on to a rude couch.

"And what's the idea of bringing that fellow here, anyway?" he demanded. "Of what use is he to us?"

Macklin answered him.

"'Twas me as had the notion ter bring him along," the gangster stated. "Either Clark Stuart or Jamison would give their right arms for him, an' I figured he'd make a good hostage. You know, Stuart found out where this hide-away is, an' we might have a little trouble here with the Jamison outfit an' the troopers before long. All right, we can tell Stuart an' the Jamison mob to sheer off or we'll rub out this pal o' theirs. That'll mean we'll only have the troopers ter worry about, an' I reckon we can hold out against them."

Dupray was silent for a while, and, his wrath appearing to abate somewhat, he lapsed into a thoughtful mood. Then all at once he looked at Bowie again, and, noting that he was still insensible, slid his eyes upon Macklin.

"I think I've got a better idea regarding this prisoner of yours," he observed. "Supposing, when he comes round—supposing we let him overhear us talking about the Rider of the Painted Stallion. Supposing I make out I've discovered that the Rider is encamped up in—Lost Canyada, shall we say? And supposing I mention that I intend to send three of you there to deal with that pest?"

"Well?" queried Macklin.

Dupray smiled craftily.

"If this prisoner of yours were then permitted to escape," he remarked, "I'll wager he'd carry word of what he'd heard straight to Clark Stuart, and, considering the friendship between Stuart and the Rider, there isn't much doubt in my mind that the U.S. Government agent would take the trail to Lost Canyada immediately—probably with Jamison and one or two others, but certainly not with the whole personnel of the wagon-train, since he'd only expect to meet three of our gang."

He leaned back in his chair, an evil glint playing in his deep-set eyes.

"Instead," he went on, "all of you would be there, lying in ambush. It would be the end of Stuart, and anyone who happened to be with him—the end, at any rate, of a man who has proved a stumbling-block to us at every turn. Yes, it would be the end of Clark Stuart, and somehow I feel that with him out of the way our luck might change."

"If Jamison were with him it would be so much the better," put in Zamora. "The Americans of the wagon-train would be leaderless then, and it is my belief that if we can get rid of those two men—Stuart and Jamison—things will be a lot healthier for us. We—"

He was interrupted by a movement on the part of Jim Bowie, a movement which the veteran accompanied with a half-stifled groan.

"The prisoner is coming round, Dupray," Zamora hissed then. "Better get ready to pull that bluff about the Rider."

In Lost Canyada

IT was early afternoon, and at the wagon encampment near Santa Fe a conference was in progress, a conference attended by the entire personnel of the Jamison columns, a conference at which Clark had done most of the talking.

"Well, I've put the facts before you, boys," he was saying now. "Don Luis won't take the risk of sending his troops into the hills, and it's not for us to try and tell him how to deal with the situation in his province. But, outside of the fact that Jim Bowie is in the hands of those renegades, every wagon train that tries to get from Independence to Santa Fe an' back is gonna be in constant danger as long as the Dupray-Zamora gang are operatin' in the wilderness."

"Clark's right, men," Jamison interposed. "All of us here know that them outlaws are a bigger menace by far than hostile Redskins, and, unless I'm mistaken, Clark wants us to make a drive against 'em—not only for Jim Bowie's sake, not only for our own sakes, but for the sake of every outfit that uses the trail between here and Independence."

The U.S. Government agent nodded in assent.

"I couldn't put it in clearer words," he stated, "but I want to make it plain to everybody that we'll be up against a tough proposition if we do move in on these renegades. Their hide-out is mighty well situated to withstand attack, and, even if we manage to storm it, the chances are that a lot of us will be put out of action in the process. I'd like all of you to realise that—before you thing of volunteerin' for this enterprise."

Jamison stepped forward and laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Well, Clark," he declared, "whatever my men decide on, you've got one volunteer in me."

"An' here's another," struck in Davy Crockett, renowned frontiersman. "I don't belong in this outfit, but I'd follow you all to Hades, Clark—if Jim Bowie was in trouble there."

A spontaneous chorus now arose from the wagoners and outriders of the Jamison column, every single man pronouncing himself ready and eager to accompany Clark to the mountain lair of the desperadoes, and it was while those voices were resounding about the U.S. Government agent that the big fellow suddenly perceived a diminutive figure struggling towards him through the assemblage.

It was the figure of Kit Carson, and, reaching Clark, the boy spoke to him excitedly:

All prizes have now been despatched, and if you have not been successful, remember there's another prize opportunity in our Latest Collecting Scheme—FOOTER-STAMPS—on page 27. You must be in that, too!

"Jim Bowie's safe!" he panted. "Clark, Jim Bowie's safe! He's a-headin' into the encampment now!"

He was right. Astride a lathered bronc, the veteran frontiersman was bearing down on the scene from an easterly direction, and within another thirty seconds was drawing rein amidst his comrades of the wagon-train, who pressed around him with exclamations of thankfulness and congratulation.

Bowie interrupted them, however, calling for silence. Then he addressed himself to Clark.

"Listen," he rapped out, "the Rider o' the Painted Stallion is in danger. I heard that hombre Dupray tellin' his men that he'd seen her camped up in a gulch called Lost Canyon, an' I heard him say that three o' the gang had better start out and get her. Him an' his pack o' cut-throats seemed so hot-up over the prospect of finishin' her off at last that I managed to make my getaway an' grab myself a bronc, and here I am."

Clark Stuart's features had become tense.

"Lost Canyon!" he reiterated. "Where's that?"

"As far as I could make out from what Dupray said," Bowie rejoined, "it's about four miles north of Red Ridge, on the —"

"I know Lost Canyon," Davy Crockett broke in. "Clark, I'll trail along with you an' Bowie an' show you the way."

"Yeah, an' you can count me in on this, too," said Jamison. "Hey, listen, I reckon this needn't interfere with our drive against the gang's hide-out. While you and I an' Davy an' Bowie are makin' for Lost Canyon, Clark, the rest o' the boys can start for Dupray's headquarters. After we've horned-in on this attempt to wipe out the Rider, we can swing south and join up with 'em somewhere near Tascosa Bend."

Clark acquiesced in this suggestion, and, after bidding Kit Carson remain at the encampment, he and Jamison and Davy Crockett took horse and spurred in a north-easterly direction with Bowie, leaving the other members of the wagon-train to set forth at a more leisurely pace for Tascosa Bend, on the River Los Lunas.

The hoofs of their ponies drumming on the snubbed ground, Clark and his three companions galloped onward into the hills, little dreaming that they were following a course that was to lead them into a death-trap. Not for a moment did any of them suspect that they were the intended victims of a cunning plot whose motive was murder—and least of all did Jim Bowie suspect that he had been made the chief instrument of that plot, the innocent bearer of false tidings.

With Davy Crockett acting as guide, the quartet pressed on through the hills, and an hour after leaving the wagon encampment outside Santa Fe they might have been seen approaching a craggy, rock-strewn ravine that was hemmed in amongst the remote, barren mountains.

"That's Lost Canyon right ahead," announced Davy Crockett.

The four of them eased up, and, their broncs travelling at a walk, moved forward into the gulch, unaware as they passed between the sloping walls of it that sinister eyes were watching them from above—the eyes of gunmen who lurked amid groups of boulders that littered the rims of the two activities.

Zamora and his cronies were in position, and well concealed, and there was not one of the dago's confederates whose trigger-finger was not itching to send a bullet speeding towards the quartet who had entered the canyon. But Zamora had been insistent that the victims should be allowed to proceed well into the ravine before a shot was fired, and the outlaws held themselves in restraint.

Zamora himself would give the signal to rain death upon those four men below, and the signal would take the form of a bullet discharged by him and directed at Clark Stuart. Thus had it been arranged when Clark and his comrades had been seen approaching from afar.

Slowly the U.S. Government agent and his friends advanced along the rock-strewn floor of the canyon, scanning it in anticipation of spying the Rider or her stallion, never casting so much as a glance in the direction of the twin ridges from which their hidden foes were looking down on them. And yet, oddly enough, each one of the four began to feel conscious of a sense of misgiving, a nameless apprehension, a vague uneasiness that stole upon them as they penetrated deeper into the defile.

It has been said that men who live cheek-by-jowl with danger sometimes develop a curious instinct, a sixth sense, which tends to warn them of an enemy's presence before that enemy has revealed himself to the eye. Such might have been the case now as far as Clark, Davy Crockett, Jamison and Bowie were concerned, for there was not one of them whose career had not been fraught with hairbreadth escapes and desperate situations. On the other hand, it may have been the deathly silence which reigned over the gulch that communicated to them a feeling of tension and nervousness.

At any rate, none of them gave any audible indication of foreboding, each trying to dismiss the premonition from his mind as something that was unfounded.

"It's mighty quiet, an' if the Rider's around she ain't keepin' much of a look-out," Bowie said presently, "or she'd have spotted us by now an' showed herself."

Clark fidgeted in his saddle.

"Maybe we got here too late," he muttered anxiously. "Maybe those outlaws have been and gone. Maybe she's —"

He checked all at once, for his keen eyes had detected imprints on the ground ahead—the imprints of hoofs which led from the eastern end of the defile and then split up, one set of tracks turning off up the canyon's left-hand slope, the other swinging across to the slope on the right.

"Say," he ejaculated, "a whole bunch of horsemen seem to have been here pretty recently, unless I'm mistaken. Take a look at these."

He dismounted to examine the imprints more closely, and his companions followed suit. Then, having scrutinised those tracks, Clark raised his glance towards the summits of the activities on each side of the defile, and it was as he was conning the ridge on the right that he espied a man's head lift into view above a craggy boulder.

He recognised the face that was disclosed. It was the face of Macklin, and at sight of that ruffian the big frontiersman gave vent to an exclamation and whipped his six-gun from its holster.

Realising he had been spotted, Macklin ducked. In the same instant Clark's revolver belched flame and lead, the smashing report of the shot splitting the silence of the canyon startlingly, the bullet clipping splinters from the boulder behind which Macklin had crouched down again.

And then pandemonium broke loose in that remote ravine of the northern hills. From all points along the rims of the twin promontories that overlooked the defile the forty-fives of Zamora and his satellites gave grim response to the missile discharged by Clark, puffs of gun-smoke issuing from the gangsters' coverts, deadly slugs zipping viciously around the ambushed quartet in the canyon and kicking up spurts of dust and stones.

The ravine echoed and re-echoed the blatter of the fusillade, and the tumult of the shooting and the ugly whew of lead struck terror into the mounts of Clark Stuart and his friends, the animals plunging and cowering wildly. Indeed, those belonging to Jamison, Crockett and Bowie tore their reins free from their masters' hands, and suddenly the broncs were wheeling to stampede out of the canyon in panic-flight.

Headless of their owners' stentorian cries, the ponies dashed from the defile, leaving Crockett and Jamison and Bowie without the slightest prospect of escaping from the death-trap—for, if there had been some slender chance of each of the four ambuscaded pioneers beating a retreat on horseback and regaining open ground to show the outlaws a clean pair of heels, there was certainly no hope of any of them except Clark accomplishing such a project now.

Clark alone had retained control of his horse. Yet he had no impulse to swing himself astride the creature and seek safety by galloping out of the canyon and abandoning his comrades to their fate. Instead he yelled to the other three men to burrow down amongst a cluster of rocks hard by, and as they made for those rocks he accompanied them in a blundering fashion, dragging his scared sorrel after him.

As on many another occasion, the gun-play of Zamora and his rascally crew was not characterised by any outstanding degree of accuracy, or Clark and his friends would have been struck down by the opening salvo. As it was, they reached the nearby rocks without so much as a scratch being inflicted on them, and from the shelter of these natural breastworks of granite they began to pump retaliatory bullets at their foes.

Clark plied his six-gun resolutely with his right hand, the while he maintained a grip on his bronc's rein with his left. Jamison and Davy Crockett likewise handled revolvers, blazing away at the canyon's rims. As for Bowie, he added the whip-like crack of his long-barrelled rifle to the booming detonations of his pardners' forty-fives and the reverberating volleys of the Zamora gang's "irons," and of the first dozen shots loosed off by the four men on the ravine's bed three hit home.

"I reckon we've got the best vantage-point we could've found on the floor o' this here canyon," Jamison presently vouchsafed, as he was reloading the chambers of his six-shooter. "An' if we can keep pickin' off them coyotes on the slopes we may come outa this ambuscade alive yet."

Davy Crockett glanced at him.

"You're sort of forgettin' that our ammunition may run out long afore all them bandits have emptied their cartridge bolts, Jamison, ain't you?" he rejoined.

There was a brief silence, and then Clark spoke.

"Dat's right, old-timer," he said to the wagon boss. "Their ammunition is liable to outlast ours. In any case, if we're still here at nightfall they'll be able to sneak down on us in the dark an' jump us, and if they come to grips with us it will mean our finish. They're six to one against us."

He paused, and laid a hand on Jamison's arm.

"There's just one chance for us," he stated. "If I can get out of here with my sorrel I can ride south, contact the boys and bring 'em here leather-to-split. I hate to leave you, but none of us will see another sunrise if the four of us stay where we are."

The wagon boss compressed his lips. "If you could get outa here," he breathed, "I reckon Davy an' Bowie an' I could hold these outlaws off until you showed up with the boys. But I doubt if you'd ever win your way clear o' the canyada, Clark."

"I'm goin' to try, anyhow," the younger man declared. "You and Jim Bowie and Davy Crockett do your best to keep me covered while I'm makin' my break."

Without another word he spun round towards his horse and set foot in stirrup. Then, throwing himself lithely into the saddle, he spurred for the western end of the ravine.

Immediately the fire from both sides of the canyada was redoubled, rascally desperadoes starting up from their coverts to concentrate their attention on the U.S. Government agent's flying figure. Yet those ruffians who had shown themselves so spontaneously were soon flinging themselves down again, being subjected in turn to sharp shots from the rocks amid which the departing frontiersman's comrades were ensconced.

Thanks to the gun-play of Jamison, Bowie and Crockett, the gangsters on the rims of the canyada failed to keep up the furious fusillading with which they had challenged Clark's bid to escape, and, though a bullet ripped through a fold in his buckskin tunic and another seared across his left wrist, the big scout swept forth from the ravine at top speed without serious hurt and veered off to the south.

"He made it!" Jamison cried exultantly, as Clark disappeared from sight. "He made it!"

Bowie offered a curt retort. His steel-grey eyes were fastened on the south slope of the defile.

"Yeah, Clark made it all right," he barked. "But unless I miss my guess, there go three or four o' the Zamora gang ter pick up hosses an' set out after him."

He motioned to a group of bandits who had straightened up and who were turning to vacate their posts, and, perceiving all at once that Maeklin was one of them, Bowie fell a prey to the impetuosity which was at times so characteristic of him.

"There's that treacherous varmint what joined your wagon train at Independence, Jamison!" he shouted. "I'll get him—if it's the last thing I do!"

Rifle clutched in his hands, he blundered from the rocks to obtain a better view of Maeklin, but his two companions laid hold of him.

"Don't be a fool, Bowie!" Jamison panted, his fingers locked on the veteran's arm. "Come back under cover!"

With Davy's aid he dragged the old Indian fighter into the shelter of the rocks before any harm could befall him, and, Bowie putting a curb on his own recklessness, the three friends settled down to a prolonged gun duel with the outlaws who still manned the canyada's slopes.

In the meantime Maeklin and those who had detached themselves from the party on the south rim had vanished beyond the scope of the ambuscaded trio's vision. As Bowie had guessed, they were hurrying towards their broncs, which were concealed some little distance away, and soon they had mounted up and were giving chase to Clark Stuart.

By then Clark was a hundred yards from the mouth of the canyada whence he had escaped, and he was travelling at full pelt over the route by which he and his friends had approached the defile. Their gaze riveted on him, Maeklin and his cronies gouged the flanks of their horses with their spurs and swarmed down a long gradient that slanted towards a stretch of level terrain their quarry was crossing, and for a spell it seemed as if they might head him off. But, becoming aware of their headlong rush in his direction, the frontiersman bore away to the right.

Frustrated in their hopes of intercepting him, Maeklin and his confederates reached level ground and pressed after him, blazing at him as they rode—failing, however, to bring him down.

Onward to the tattoo of drumming hoofs sped the U.S. Government agent and his pursuers, and before long it was apparent that Clark's sorrel had the legs of the gangsters' broncs. Yet, even as the frontiersman was congratulating himself on possessing a mount that was more than a match for those of his enemies—even as he was telling himself that he would continue to push westward until he had outstripped the crooks and could safely swerve on to his original course again—he beheld in front of him a dark, ragged cleft that seemed to extend north and south as far as the eye could see.

It was a sinister chasm that cut clear across his path, and as he gained the edge of it he discovered that it was fully two hundred feet in depth and of a width that no pony could have spanned at a jump. His escape, in fact, was completely balked by that fearsome abyss—nor was there any chance of eluding his foes by turning to right or left, for they were bound to head him off if he did so and drive him over the cleft's brink to his doom.

There was nothing for it but to stand his ground and shoot it out with the pursuers, and, wheeling to face them, he raised his six-gun. As he drew trigger, however, the hammer of the weapon fell with a harmless click, and, realising that the revolver was empty, he fumbled at his cartridge belt in desperato haste.

Meanwhile the group of outlaws headed by Maeklin were coming up fast, but all at once the rogue who had once been a member of the Jamison wagon train seemed to divine Clark's plight, and, calling a halt on the instant, he brought up his forty-five and took aim at the frontiersman as the latter was still endeavouring to reload.

Deliberately he sighted his gun on the figure of the U.S. Government agent, assuring himself as he "drew a bead" on Clark that at this close range he could not miss, and deliberately he curled his finger around the trigger.

"KIDNAPPED"

"Who knows?" he demanded. "The captain—I heard them in the roundhouse. I went to look for you and they were saying that they were going to turn you in at Glasgow and get the reward."

"So that's how the wind sets—it's that lad, David. He must have told."

"Quick, Alan, get the skiff!" cried Jean, and she did not tell the truth.

David Balfour gritted his teeth and glared defiantly at his tormentor. What with the bullying of the captain, Ransome, the other cabin-boy, Riach, the mate, and fed on filthy food, he had just about had enough, and when the captain raised his belt for a second time the boy acted. He picked up a heavy ornament from a table and it caught the captain right in the stomach. The boy was out of the roundhouse and racing for the deck—he would rather drown than stay another moment on this brig. He came upon Alan and Jean prepared to launch a skiff.

The rebel half drew his sword. "You little sneak!" he hissed. "I thought I could trust you, but you told who I am."

"No." "You did—you're the only one aboard who knew—you told them that I was Alan Breck."

The mate had been stealthily creeping along the deck to see what was going on, and when he heard the name of Alan Breck he rushed below to tell his master. David saw that flying figure, but there was no time for words now as a number of the crew led by Captain Hoseason had appeared on deck. The boy helped Jean with the boat while Alan Breck kept off the attack with his trusty blade. How the boy's eyes gleamed as he had glimpses of the wonderful swordsmanship of the rebel. He saw the point catch the mate under the heart. At last the boat was lowered and Jean slid down a rope.

The ropes were cast off and a shout from Jean told Alan that the boat was away. He dived from the poop and was helped into the skiff. Vigorous rowing soon brought them to an island, and as there was a thick mist Alan decided to stay there till the dawn. It was then that he learned from Jean that she had made it up about the captain knowing he was Alan Breck. She had done it because she did not want to go with Jamie.

"David, I've misjudged you," the rebel cried. "But if you didn't tell them I was Alan Breck, who did?"

"You did yourself, you big blunderhead," retorted the lad with spirit. "On the deck when you called me a sneak and shouted out your own name."

"I'm sorry, lad," Alan held out his hand. "Shall we be friends from now on? True friends that trust and help each other always?"

"True friends it is, sir, but I still wish you weren't a rebel."

Condemned to Death

EBENEZER BALFOUR was invited to the offices of Mr. Angus Rankellor, the lawyer, and there he met a Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie, who pretended that whilst collecting driftwood by their cottage on a lonely island they had rescued a half-drowned boy. They expected Ebenezer to do right by then for tending him. "Not a shilling,"

September 17th, 1933.

was the miser's answer, but they persisted and asked for the same amount that he had paid Captain Hoseason for the kidnapping.

"The lad claims he's the rightful heir of Balfour," stated Alan Breck, "and you paid Hoseason to get him out of the way. We can keep our mouths shut, but you'll pay us the sum you paid Hoseason—two hundred pounds."

"Twenty pounds was the bargain," screamed the miser.

The door opened and in walked the lawyer, David, and one of the clerks. Ebenezer realised he had been tricked into a betrayal, and he railed and cursed, but when he went he knew that Balfour Castle was his home no longer.

Rankellor had been a willing accessory to this trickery. He had always loathed Ebenezer Balfour, and although a lawyer and not a soldier he had admired the pluck and perseverance of Alan Breck in a lost cause.

Jean was all smiles because, when they had reached Glasgow, it was to find that the cowardly Jamie had taken the first boat to Newfoundland. She stated firmly that she was not going back to Glencoe and that she was never leaving Alan. They were discussing the possibilities of getting married when a commotion in the street took them to the windows.

Of all the bad luck Ebenezer must bump into Captain Hoseason. The rogue had come to Edinburgh because at the docks in Glasgow he had heard something that told him his quarry had flown, and the covetous rogue was after the reward. Ebenezer howled that he had contracted for the captain to take the lad to the Carolinas, and instead he had been flung off near the Isle of Mull. David had escaped drowning, and now he was a pauper. At once Hoseason guessed the identity of the two people who had tricked Ebenezer, and as the result soldiers rushed to surround the lawyer's office. Alan Breck tried to get away down a drain pipe and down an alleyway, but it was too late. They arrested him for the murder of the King's tax collector.

The only satisfaction that David had was that lawyer Rankellor was able to have Ebenezer and Hoseason arrested for kidnapping, which was a crime punishable by hanging.

If only they could have got hold of Jamie a confession might have been secured. Jean would even have married Jamie to save Alan's life. The court sentenced Breck to be hung and his body to swing in chains at a gibbet. The prisoner was asked if he had anything to say.

"You can hang me for hanging's sake, but not for murder," his voice rang through the court-room. "Of that I stand innocent. Nor can you hang me for treason, for how can a man be traitor to King or country that he has never called his own."

The Duke of Argyle was alarmed. The erection of the scaffold seemed to have thrown the whole of Scotland into a ferment. This man Alan Breck was even more of a national hero than his Grace had imagined. Deputations of clansmen called on him and begged him not to hang Alan Breck.

"Grant us his life," one clansman cried, "and we swear to submit to English rule."

"Your offer's absurd. Alan Breck would never be loyal to King George. With that man alive there can never be peace between England and Scotland. Alan Breck must hang."

The duke granted the last request of the condemned man. Jean and Alan were married. They dragged him back to his cell after the ceremony. David Balfour would not despair, and in desperation he resolved to see the duke, and he managed to get into the duke's palace.

The duke was pacing his room. Every hangman selected for the task had either turned tail or had been abducted by the clansmen. He was wondering if he should get another company of Grenadier Guards from Berwick when he realised he was not alone. A slim lad.

"Who the devil are you?"

"Please, your Grace, please let Alan Breck go free. You mustn't hang him. He's innocent. I know the man who killed Red Fox. I saw him—it's a man they call Jamie. I'm no rebel, sir, but Alan Breck is my friend and we're pledged to help each other always. And if you'll be so good as to pardon him, sir, I can keep him out of Scotland. You see, I'm the Laird of Balfour."

"And what makes you think he'll stay there?" chuckled the duke.

"There is a lass who has a way with him, sir. If you'll only spare his life, sir."

"No, his fate's decided," rasped the duke. "I cannot change it."

But the duke was so impressed by young David that he visited the rebel in his cell, and after talking with the rebel knew that this frank-eyed man could never be a murderer. He gulled Alan Breck into talking of the cause for which he fought and his reasons. The duke offered a bargain to the condemned man. He would guarantee to do all the reforms that Alan sought, if Alan for his part would beg the mob gathered together for the hanging to disperse.

"Tell them to return to their homes in peace—for the sake of the country we both love," suggested the duke, and Alan Breck agreed.

There was a vast crowd to see the hanging of Alan Breck, and when the rebel appeared on a balcony of the court house the crowd surged forward shouting his name. It would take but a spark for these dour Scotsmen to charge through the soldiers. Alan raised his arms.

"Scotsmen, my people! The duke and I have bargained. He has promised to lift the burden of our taxes. In return I have pledged you to peace. Let there be no rioting, revolt or bloodshed."

"What about you, Alan Breck?" they cried.

"Alan Breck has asked naught for himself!" The duke stepped forward. "Yet, because of him, we are a people united for the first time—united, God willing, for all time. In the face of such service to the Scotland he loves more than life itself, I feel it my bounden duty to alter the sentence of hanging to exile."

The departure of Alan Breck and his wife was almost in the same category as one given to a prince. The clansmen were there to bid him farewell, and they vied to see that the Duke of Argyll fulfilled his promises.

"Why don't you come along with us, David," Jean said shyly to our young hero.

"I'd like to, but I've business to attend to," was the simple, frank answer. "After all, I am the Laird of Balfour, and I must grow up to be a good Scotsman."

"That's right. David, your place is here," Alan Breck cried as he bade the boy farewell. "Scotland for ever!"

grabbed her before she could fire, wrenching the weapon from her hand.

"No you don't, Dorothy! Give me that. You know how I hate guns. Beat it!"

Her eyes blazing, the woman snarled sneeringly past the group of silent gangsters, and without another word, left the office.

"Sweet kid, that one," grinned Batsy. Late that night, the singer, spurred on by the desire for revenge which filled her whole being, phoned Warren Rogers and gave him the tip that if he raided the Club Sultan he would pick up the whole mob concerned in the Morton Store affair. Surprised as he was, the District Attorney promised to attend to it at once, and come round to her apartment with police protection, for now that she had taken the plunge, Dorothy Palmer was a creature of nerves, fearing the vengeance which would fall on a squealer.

But the only people the squad of twenty police picked up when they raided the club were Annabelle and Tommy. Gene and Batsy, who had been having a late meal with them after the ordinary patrons left, had doused the lights and ducked out the back way when they heard the thunderous knocking on the door that announced the police swoop.

Annabelle and Tommy, hiding under a table, were spotted by the eagle eyes of Captain Gargan and ordered sternly to come out.

"We didn't do anything," panted Tommy, helping the girl to her feet.

"Honest," cried Annabelle, "we were just sitting here, eating, and you burst in and—"

Gargan grinned at her.

"Yes, sure, the place has been closed for an hour, and you're just sitting here eating! We'll take these kids in, anyway!"

Meanwhile, out in the back alley by which they had escaped, Gene turned to Batsy.

"I can't let the kids take the rap for this! We can thank Dorothy."

"Don't you worry about her," said Batsy grimly. "I'll take care of her!"

Third Degree

"YOU'RE sure the raid went off all right?" Dorothy Palmer looked nervously at Warren Rogers and his assistant, Barton, a lean-faced man with pinee-nez glasses. "Then your boys will have a little surprise for you when you get back to the station. An old friend of yours, named Gene Fillmore, will be there!"

Warren Rogers' brow clouded. "Fillmore—Gene Fillmore? What's he got to do with it?"

The woman enjoyed the annoyance in his tone.

"He's what the newspapers mean when they talk about a crime wave. How much protection are you going to give me?"

"All that's necessary." Warren's tone was brusque, for in spite of the fact that she was giving him valuable information, the District Attorney found the whole thing distasteful. He took the phone as the station rang, then turned to her again. "All they picked up in that raid was a couple of kids. Now what's all this about Gene Fillmore?"

"I tell you it's true! He's the man you want. He hired those two kids for the Morton robbery."

"Let's check on that, Warren," suggested Barton.

"We'll see you later," said Rogers to the woman.

They had just shut the door when a shot cracked from the window. Dorothy Palmer gave a little sigh and crumpled. When the lawyers and the two policemen with them dashed back, they caught a glimpse of Batsy's face just disappearing from the window.

Hastily he began clattering down the fire-escape. But a patrolling policeman who had heard the shot spotted him. The cop's revolver roared. Batsy threw up his arms, swayed, and toppled from the escape, to land with a dreadful thud on the concrete fifty feet below. The trail of death started by Rocky Mosby had ended with the shooting of Dorothy Palmer and the death of her executioner.

Warren Rogers could see that the woman had died instantly.

"I can't believe Gene had anything to do with this," he muttered, kneeling by her body. "The more I think of it, the more preposterous it seems. What could I possibly accuse him of?"

"Maybe this is Exhibit A!" Barton had been going through an ornate bureau. He handed Warren Rogers a cheque. It was made out to Dorothy Palmer for one thousand dollars, and signed by Gene Fillmore.

"That's Gene's signature all right," said Rogers grimly. "I want to talk to those two kids. You boys wait for the coroner."

But Annabelle and Tommy, seared as they were, yielded nothing on cross-examination. They denied knowing anybody by the name of Gene Fillmore, and said Dorothy Palmer must have been lying when she linked their names with the crime.

"We never heard of any Gene Fillmore," said Tommy. "If he's the man you're after, why don't you arrest him and leave us alone?"

"Because if we arrest him now, we'll never be able to make it stick. That's why I want you two. I want to build up a case against Fillmore so that no jury on earth will fail to put him in the electric chair."

Warren Rogers' determination hardened when he took the pair to the hospital, and Edward Larkin, still weak and ill, positively identified them as the people who had caused him to lay all the trays on the counter. He couldn't understand the motives of Annabelle and Tommy, but he intended to knock the truth out of them for their own sakes.

Leaving Annabelle in his office, he took Tommy into a grim, darkened room, where the only light was a strong spotlight which shone directly on the prisoner's face. Here Rogers, Barton and Captain Gargan fired questions at Tommy till his brain reeled. Nervously he tore at his collar, his face streaming with sweat. But still he wouldn't admit anything.

"Tommy," said Rogers sternly, "I've given you every chance, but you're making it tougher and tougher for yourself. You have a fine sense of loyalty, but it's misguided. You've got to look to the law to help you now."

"Kid, we call this the singing-room," Gargan grated. "Because sooner or later everybody sings in here."

Warren Rogers allowed Tommy to see Annabelle for a moment in the hope they would say something. Outside, he listened with Gargan.

"They're listening to every word we say," Tommy whispered, holding Annabelle close. "No matter what they do, we can't talk. If we talk, they've got us."

"But Mr. Larkin identified us!"

"They can't prove any connection with the gang unless we talk!"

Rogers came in expectantly. Their expressions decided him.

"You don't leave us any choice," he said. "The rest is up to you."

He gave the sobbing girl a chair in his office. She was racked with anxiety. What was happening to Tommy in the hands of those hard-faced men? Calm-faced, Rogers pretended to read a book while the girl fidgeted. The clock ticked slowly on. No sound came from the inner-room.

It wasn't until Gargan looked in that she broke.

"He hasn't broken yet," he snapped. "But he will."

"All right, don't let up. Keep pounding those questions."

"Don't!" shrieked the girl. "Don't beat him any more, please! I'll tell you! We were hired to go into Morton's and we were part of the gang!"

Warren Rogers smiled with satisfaction as she buried her face in her hands, but when Tommy was brought in they still wouldn't implicate Gene Fillmore.

"I'm asking you to testify that Gene Fillmore hired you!" snapped Rogers.

"We don't know any Gene Fillmore. It was—it was Rocky who hired us!" Tommy glanced round frantically. "Rocky did!"

"Take them back to their cells," said Rogers wearily. To Barton he added: "They've got courage. Too bad it's wasted."

The only thing left was a bluff, and to carry it out the young lawyer went to call on Gene Fillmore, and noted with grim amusement that he was giving a party before sailing for Europe. Smiling aside Gene's chaff, he brought up the subject of Dorothy Palmer.

"You know her pretty well, don't you?"

"I've heard of her," said Gene lightly. "She's a night club singer. Has a good voice."

"You know her better than that," said Warren grimly. "You gave her a cheque for a thousand dollars."

Gene laughed.

"Well, why the mystery, Warren? Of course I gave her a cheque!"

"She was killed last night," said Rogers quietly, "and you're involved."

"Really? Well, what d'you want me to do?"

"I think you'd better come down to my office."

"It won't take long, Warren? Remember, I don't want to miss my boat."

"I hope you don't," said Rogers meaningly as Gene excused himself to his guests.

Captain Gargan met them directly they entered Warren's office.

"Mr. Rogers, Tommy and Annabelle have just signed a confession admitting that Gene Fillmore is the head of the gang!"

Tommy jumped up furiously.

"We did not! We never said a word about you!"

"If you didn't know Gene," put in Rogers swiftly, "how did you pick him out so quickly?"

Disturbed, Tommy turned away. Gene smiled his appreciation of the clever trap.

"Frankly, I don't know what this is all about. Who are these children—yours?"

"Take them into the next room," Warren ordered. "No use stalling, Gene. We've got you."

"Got me? On what grounds?"

"I'm afraid you're headed for the chair. You were back of the Morton job."

"Really? What makes you think so?"

"Perhaps this sounds flattering, but it was such an ingenious job that it would take a mind like yours to conceive it."

"Why, I'm surprised at you, Warren! The courts call that imagination, not evidence."

"Gene, I wasn't even sure myself until those kids picked you out. Dorothy Palmer told us about them and Rocky and the Morton job. It all fits in with your European trip."

"It's the testimony of a dead woman against mine," said Gene coldly. "and you know, Warren, frankly I'm conceited enough to think I'll be believed."

"You're also got this," said Warren sombrely. "a sworn confession from those kids, saying that they were part of the gang."

"You mean those kids confessed to murder?"

"Read it!"

Gene laughed softly as he read. "Well, this doesn't involve me at all. That's a very cheap trick, Warren."

The attorney shook his head. "No, I'm just being honest with you. I'll admit we could have pushed those kids a lot further, but they would never have willingly implicated you. But it's just a question of time."

"Who are you after?"

"You."

"You'll never get me," smiled Gene.

"Gene," said Warren earnestly, "let's forget for a minute which side of the fence we're on. The real tragedy of this is not Dorothy Palmer, or the Morton Store—it's those two youngsters in there. Those two kids are just as guilty of murder as the gunman who did the actual shooting."

Gene's lips curled scornfully. He was convinced a jury would never convict the youngsters, and he held to his belief. When an assistant wanted to speak to Rogers alone, and was asked to go into the next room, Gene found them sitting there in a strained silence.

But Tommy jumped up angrily.

"Look, you got us into this, now get us out of it!"

"I'm sorry, kids," muttered Gene.

"You're sorry. Words don't help any. Get us out of this." Tommy was frantic by now, his nerve breaking.

"D'you want us to die?" Gene shook his head grimly. "Well, then, tell them you sent us. Tell them you made us go!"

"Gene," Annabelle pleaded, "if you'd only tell them you sent us to the jewelry store we could go free."

"Stop it, will you?" rasped the gangster. "Why should I worry about your problems? I've got plenty of my own!"

"You've got to help us out. We don't want to die!" Tommy's voice broke.

"Neither do I. Maybe if I can get out I can hire lawyers to fight for you."

Then Warren came in, carrying some papers.

"Gene, in case you've changed your mind, here's a confession all ready to sign."

"Why should I, Warren? Do you think I'm crazy?"

"I've got these kids," said Warren grimly. "They haven't a chance."

"Well, how would my signing help them?"

"I might go easy," Rogers shrugged, staring into his eyes.

"That isn't enough," snapped Gene Fillmore. "I want the unconditional release of Tommy and Annabelle!"

Tense silence gripped them all as the attorney stared at the gangster. Then he handed a foolscap sheet of Gene.

"Here are the two confessions. Sign yours and you can tear up theirs."

With tears in her eyes, Annabelle stared at Gene. His face had whitened, the jaw muscles standing out like cords. He was fighting an inward battle. The desire for life was strong. But he couldn't see these innocent youngsters suffer for the crime that had really been Rocky's. Firmly he gripped the pen and wrote his signature. Without a word he handed his confession to Warren Rogers, and took the confession of Tommy and Annabelle.

"Gene, it's too bad a man with your brains went wrong. You'd have been a big shot in legitimate business."

When he left the trio alone for a moment there was silence. Then Annabelle said haltingly:

"Is there anything we can do for you?"

"No, thank you, Annabelle," he said with a return of his former grim humour. "Mr. Rogers will make me very comfortable." He tore up the confession and gave the pieces to the girl. "There's a little present from me to you. Now get out of here, both of you, and don't ever come back!"

When they left, after Annabelle had planted a sly kiss on his cheek, Gene Fillmore lit a cigarette with steady fingers and strolled to the window. Warren Rogers gripped his arm.

"Come on, Gene."

"Oh, just a minute!" said Gene, without turning. "I want to watch the kids go out."

number of other prisoners, were the cause of the uproar. Kaidu went to the throne-room in the big tent to pass judgment, and he had scarce sat down when he was joined by Nazama. He scowled fiercely and ordered the first case to be brought before him.

Soon Chung, captain of the second corps, had wilfully and brutally put to death eight of his men without giving them benefit of trial. The witnesses against Soon Chung were the men of his own command, and they demanded the death of this murderer.

"All right, Lord Kaidu, put me to death," cried the officer. "But if you do you'll find that no soldier in this army will obey any command from any officer—including you."

"I'll have to think this over and make a decision later," announced Kaidu. "Next case." He turned to whisper to Nazama. "That Soon Chung is one of the worst brutes in the army, I'd like to kill him with my own hands, but I daren't punish him publicly." He looked up and saw Marco and Binguccio. "Who is this?"

"My troop was camped last night in the Meiji Pass and we caught these two men spying on us," was the report.

"My name is Marco Polo, Lord Kaidu," spoke the prisoner. "I am a representative of Polo Brothers, honourable merchants, and this is my servant. We come from Venice." He decided on a daring experiment. "I could tell you how to settle the case you have just heard."

Kaidu gasped at such effrontery and was going to have the prisoners immersed in boiling oil, but Nazama stayed him. She liked the build of this tall, handsome stranger. Let him first speak. Marco was ordered to step forward, and he spoke his suggestion very softly. Kaidu listened and smiled.

"Soon Chung, I acquit you of the charges against you and set you free," Kaidu called out, and the officer was freed. Then the rebel turned to the soldiers of Chung's command, who were also under arrest. "And I will also set free any man who kills him."

Soon Chung gave a cry and ran with his soldiers chasing after him. His death was not very pleasant. Thus ended the life of one of Ahmed's treacherous agents. Kaidu was so delighted that he set Marco and Binguccio free. He noted the interest in Nazama's eyes and that made him even more happy—this stranger should keep his jealous wife intrigued whilst he flirted with one of her serving wenches.

By his quick wit Marco had saved their lives, but he was very much a prisoner though he was given fine raiment and a special tent. In the days that followed he had to talk much about Venice and his people, and to pay especial attention to Nazama. It was a relief to find that kissing was not known among the Tartars, but he got rather tired of rubbing noses with the rebel's lovely but dangerous wife. In this camp Marco found one more treasure for his little bag—it was a lump of coal. It was found in the valleys and used for fuel. All the while Marco was thinking how to get back to Peking.

Marco feared that all was not well in Peking, and he was right. News came to Ahmed that the emperor's mighty army had been swept away in a typhoon, and only a handful had reached the shore in safety. The same day as this news arrived the Persian ambassador put in another appearance. He brought a jewelled casket, in which was a necklace for Princess Kukachin. Ahmed's eyes glistened. He had the ambassador cast to the vultures, and he took the casket to the princess. She was not pleased to see him in her apartments. She refused to accept the necklace, and said that her father would punish him for daring to come to her unannounced.

"Disaster has overtaken your father and his army!" Ahmed cried, his eyes triumphant. "I have decided, princess, that you will not have to undertake the long and tiresome journey to Persia, for I have decided on the seventh moon you will be my wife. You will share my throne and my glory as sovereign of the greatest empire the world has ever known."

"You inhuman beast!" she cried in horror. "You don't at the moment think me qualified to be your husband," Ahmed smiled mockingly. "But time will convince you of your error. I have had seventy-eight wives already, and I have profited by experience."

When alone the princess summoned her maid Visakha and told her the dire news that her father was probably dead and most of the mighty army destroyed. She must go to the Tower of Eagles and dispatch one of these birds with a message.

"How far would he have gone?"

"He would be in Chingtien by now," thought the maid. "If he travelled fast."

"He would travel fast!" cried the princess. "Send the eagle to Chingtien."

That eagle was sighted by some of Kaidu's men on outpost duty, and it was shot down and the message was brought to Kaidu's tent. The rebel handed the message to his prisoner.

"Tell Marco Polo that I need him," Kukachin had written, and she had drawn a small arrow.

"You're quite a lady's man," mocked Kaidu. "What's your secret?"

"Kaidu! Let me go back!" desperately pleaded Marco. "She is in danger. I must help her."

But Kaidu had found a companion for his wife and he refused. He warned Marco not to try to escape. Marco went off to his tent in a rage. He paced up and down, and then went outside to try to think. It was then that he saw Toctai, and recognised him by the scar.

The rogue had managed to get into the Tartar camp, and Marco soon found out the man had bribed his way to the position of night guard to Kaidu's tent. Now Toctai did not know that his master had planned to destroy Marco, and when the Venetian beckoned him to his tent he thought that Marco had just acted up to Ahmed's instructions. Suspecting nothing, he told Marco much news of importance. He had heard from Ahmed. The princess was a prisoner and would soon be Ahmed's wife. Very soon Ahmed would rule the whole of Cathay—directly Kaidu was dead.

To Binguccio's amazement his master aided and abetted the scheme to kill Kaidu, but when Toctai did rush in to pierce the sleeping Kaidu with his lance it was the shield held by Marco that deflected the blow.

"That is one of Ahmed's men!" Marco cried as the guard rushed in. "Seize him!"

"Traitor! Traitor!" the wretch screamed as they dragged him away.

"You saved my life!" gasped the grateful rebel.

"It was nothing personal, Kaidu," blandly answered Marco. "It's just that I'd do anything to annoy Ahmed."

After that the two men had a heart-to-heart talk, and Kaidu explained why he was in revolt against the emperor.

"Because my people have been taxed to the point of starvation. I don't mind paying proper tax to Kublai Khan, but I won't pay taxes to Ahmed for his private treasury. I and my people would rather die fighting."

"Ahmed!" Marco snapped his fingers. "So he's the cause of your rebellion. I don't blame you. There is one more thing you ought to know."

"What?"

"You must take your army to Pekin, storm the palace—"

"My army against all the forces of Kublai Khan."

"Kublai Khan and his forces have gone to war against Japan, and Ahmed is in command at the palace. That's what the message from the princess meant. Ahmed is going to marry her and make himself emperor."

"Ahmed! Emperor of China!" shouted Kaidu. "Better the Black Plague."

"You're the only one to prevent it. The road to Pekin is open to you. No one can stop you."

September 17th, 1938.

"But the palace walls. I have no siege machinery."

"You'll have to leave it to me to get you through the walls," Marco said with confident assurance.

The Siege of Pekin

AHMED was preparing for his wedding when Bayan appeared to report that the emperor was returning.

"With the whole army?" Ahmed asked in alarm.

"No, only his bodyguard—a few hundred men. We could kill them all before they reach the palace gates."

"Let them come in," decided Ahmed. "Welcome his Majesty with the usual ceremony. Do as I say!" he cried as the man hesitated. "And bring the princess here at once."

A weary, sorrowful Kublai Khan was surprised to find so much gaiety in Pekin. Why all these flags and banners? He found it was in preparation for a wedding. In his own throne-room he learnt from the mocking lips of Ahmed the name of the bridegroom. Ahmed placed a document before the frightened old man.

"It is necessary for you to sign this at once. It is merely formal acknowledgement that when I am married to your daughter and you are dead, I am recognised as the rightful heir to your throne."

"You black-livered traitor!" cried the emperor, and called for his guards in vain. He refused to sign until Ahmed whipped back some curtains to reveal Kukachin gagged and bound tightly to a post close to a cage full of hungry vultures, who were straining at their chains to get at her. The emperor signed the fatal document.

Ahmed clapped his hands.

"Release the princess!" he ordered of his slaves. "And see that she dresses for the marriage ceremony."

It was a surprise to Chen Tsu to see Marco Polo again. The Venetian had no time to waste on philosophies. He wanted all the fire powder that the little chemist possessed, and it was for Ahmed's wedding festival. Also Chen Tsu must help him get into the palace, and the little Chinaman made him strip, then he painted his body a rich brown and garbed him in the scanty attire of a Malay. Finally, Marco wound a turban round his head and gave instructions about the destination of the fire-boxes he had ordered.

Kukachin had been dressed by Visakha for the ceremony, but the unhappy princess was contemplating committing suicide by throwing herself from her balcony when a strange, brown-skinned man appeared. What a cry of delight when she recognised Marco, but he had no time for kissing. He told her to delay the marriage ceremony as long as she could. A cry from the walls brought him out on the balcony. He rushed back to his princess.

"It's Kaidu at last!" he cried. "I must go and open the gates to him. I will return, beloved."

From the citadel tower Ahmed saw Kaidu's approach, and he gave orders that all the gates to the city be closed but the west gate and the gate to the palace. As Kaidu charged into Pekin followed by his soldiers the palace gate closed in his face. Then the west gate closed, and Kaidu's army looked as if it were trapped. Arrows began to pour down from the walls and ramparts on the Tartar soldiers.

But by the palace gate there was an innocent-looking horse and cart. It had bolted up the street, and from one of its numerous boxes gunpowder had streamed. Chen Tsu had done his work well. The horse was freed and the trail of gunpowder fired.

Those gates went up in a sheet of flame, and then the Tartars charged into the palace in a surprise attack.

Meanwhile, in the palace the princess had done everything possible to delay the ceremony, but at last she had been forced to stand before the priest. Yet when she had to make her vows she prolonged them.

"I, Kukachin, of the house and blood of Genghis Khan through my father, Kublai, the Khan of Khans, and my royal mother Tofar, who was the daughter of Ildabar, who was the daughter of Queen Dir-See—" It was at that precise moment that the palace gate went up in the air.

Ahmed shouted to the girl to go on, and she was starting all over again from the beginning when the doors of the chapel burst open and there was a wild-eyed man holding a knife and sword. Then the villainous schemer recognised his enemy and drew his sword.

Ahmed fought with desperate fury, but before this young giant he had to give way. His sword broke. Marco seized the man in his arms, and it was on the edge of the void that separated Ahmed's quarters that they struggled. The emperor held his daughter close as the two men fought like furies. Marco broke his enemy's hold, pushed him over the void, and held him for a moment.

"I shall be going through Damascus soon, Ahmed!" cried Marco. "I'll tell your seventy-eight wives what has happened to you." He shook off the clinging fingers and Ahmed crashed to his doom.

Not many minutes later Marco brought Kaidu into the presence of the emperor. The rebel was surprised because he thought Kublai Khan was away fighting Japan.

"We beg to welcome you, our honoured cousin, Lord Kaidu!" cried the emperor, with something of his old pomp. "We understand that you and your people have been victims of injustice. The cause of that has been removed. It will never be repeated. I have assembled the most beautiful maidens of our court, and I beg leave to present them to you as a slight token of my high regard. You will take them with you, as your wives."

Everybody laughed, and everybody seemed happy. Marco whispered to Binguccio that now was the time to secure the trade agreements. Meanwhile he would go with Princess Kukachin into the gardens and feed the fish. The Oriental moon smiled down upon them. The two young people sighed happily, for it was the seventh moon.

"You should go across the sea to become the Queen of Persia."

"Yes."

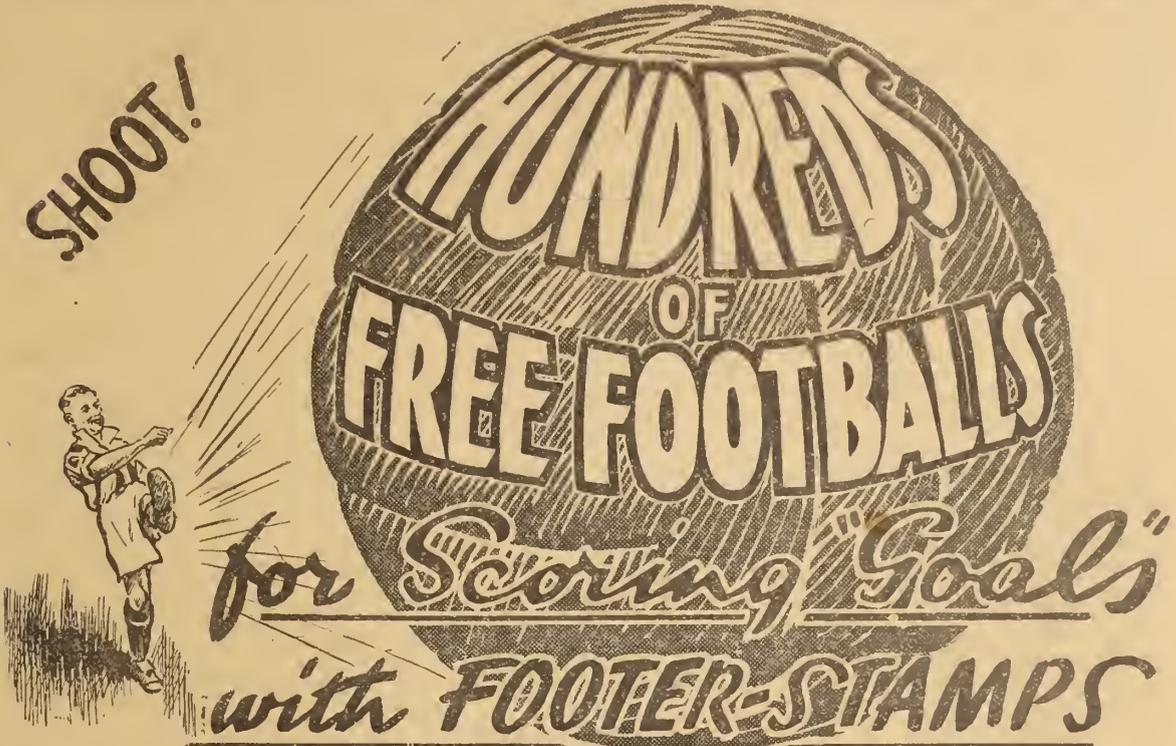

"It's a perilous journey, but we Venetians are the world's best sailors as well as the world's best business men." He put his arm round her slim shoulders. "I think you should ask your father to appoint me as your protector on the voyage."

"I'll ask him, Marco Polo—and he'll agree." She snuggled closer. "How long does it take to get from here to Persia?"

"Oh, years and years." He kissed her. "I might even lose my way and find myself in Venice."

ARE YOU IN OUR GRAND COLLECTING SCHEME ?

ARE you collecting FOOTER-STAMPS? They're all the rage, and you really must be in this wonderful scheme!
 This is what to do: Every week in BOY'S CINEMA we are giving "Footer-Stamps"—pictures of six different actions on the football field. The object of this great stamp-game being to score as many "goals" as possible in time for the second prize-giving next week, when up to 300 footballs are to be awarded.

TO SCORE A "GOAL" you must collect a complete set of six stamps (they're numbered 1 to 6), made up of the following movements: KICK-OFF—DRIBBLE—TACKLE—HEADER—SHOT—GOAL.

Easy, isn't it? The more stamps you collect the more "goals" you can score. (Note that the "goal" stamp by itself does NOT count as a "goal"—you must get a set of the stamps 1 to 6 each time.)

We give ten more stamps this week. Cut them out and try to score a "goal" with them; then keep all your stamps until you get some more in our next issue.

If you want to score some other quick "goals" to swell your total, remember that "Footer-Stamps" are also appearing in "Sports Budget" and "Triumph."

Keep at it, pals, because the September contest will close next week, and we shall then ask you how many "goals" you have scored. Up to 300 of the FREE Footballs are going to be awarded then—for readers scoring the highest number of "goals" with "Footer-Stamps" for the month. More footballs will be given in the next month.

Don't send any stamps until we tell you how and where next week, when the closing date will be announced.
RULES: Up to 300 Footballs will be awarded in the September contest to the readers declaring and sending in the largest number of "goals" scored with "Footer-Stamps." The Editor may extend or amend the prize list in case of too many ties.

Each "goal" must consist of a set of "Footer-Stamps" Nos. 1 to 6, inclusive—all claims for prizes to be made on the proper coupon (to be given next week). No allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence! No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

(N.B.—"Footer-Stamps" may also be collected from the following papers: "GEM," "MAGNET," "MODERN BOY," "DETECTIVE WEEKLY," "TRIUMPH," "WILD WEST WEEKLY," "THRILLER," "SPORTS BUDGET" and "CHAMPION.")

OVERSEAS READERS! You pals who are far away—you're in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best scores from overseas readers. There will be a special closing date for you as well, of course!

Ten More
 "Footer-Stamps"
 To Save!

"BULLDOG DRUMMOND'S PERIL"

Roberts. Why he should disappear is a mystery to me."

"Mystery?" ejaculated Neilson. "It's all a mystery. Goodman blown to bits, Botulian gone, Roberts gone, and now Drummond gone."

"And you've no idea where Drummond can be?"

"They've found his car abandoned in a village called Market Rutherford."

"Not very helpful," replied the millionaire as he got up from his chair. "Well, I hope you'll find him and clear this thing up."

The moment he had gone Neilson picked up the telephone and spoke into it.

"Blantyre's just leaving the building. Have him closely followed. I fancy he knows something," he said.

Actually there were others besides Colonel Neilson who had had the idea of scouring Market Rutherford in search of Drummond, for Longworth, his wife, and Phyllis Clavering having heard from Neilson that Drummond's car had been found in the village had immediately rushed down there post-haste, and the trio were doing a house-to-house visitation in the hope of learning something about the missing man. And chance brought Phyllis after many failures to the house where he had been made prisoner.

Botulian, who opened the door himself to the girl, was only able to repress a start with difficulty when she told him her errand. But his smile was disarming as he invited her into the house, for he was anxious to know exactly what was going on.

She in her turn suspected no trap. He had given his name readily enough to her, and she had recognised it in a moment. And as he expressed surprise at her fiancé's disappearance and she had no idea of the part he had been playing, she told him all she knew readily enough. Finally she rose to go, but here he spoke, and now her heart missed a beat at the expression on his face.

"Sorry to have to disagree with you, my dear young lady," he said, "but I shall have to keep you here for a bit."

She stared at him. Fear had suddenly leaped into her heart.

"What d'you mean?" she managed to get out; but she had already guessed.

"Just what I said, my dear. You see, Captain Drummond happens to be here, and my prisoner; and you know far—"

But she never heard the rest of the sentence. She made a wild rush for the door, but Botulian was on her and another man had appeared suddenly. And despite her frantic struggles her hands were quickly bound behind her and she was flung on to the sofa.

Botulian addressed the man.

"That will do," he said. "She won't give us any more trouble now, I think." The man slouched away, and the girl heard a door slam in the distance. Botulian spoke quietly but venomously.

"If you're thinking of screaming, I shouldn't," he said. "Because you will be gagged then, and it won't be comfortable."

"What d'you want with me?" she demanded.

A pitying smile came to his lips. "Actually I didn't want you at all," he replied. "But as you were silly enough to butt into my affairs I'm sorry to have to say that like your fiancé—"

He shrugged his shoulders. "Seems a pity, I admit, having to kill both of you, but what am I to do? It's your own fault."

Her eyes half closed. A deadly fear was surging over her, but as she opened Drummond leaped into the hall, snatching a sword from the wall as he did so. But Botulian had emerged from his hiding-place, and now the girl saw with horror as he slashed at Drummond with the whip that he evidently was well accustomed to handle. And it seemed to her as he went on slashing at her lover furiously; holding him well at bay, that there could be only one possible end to this dreadful contest.

She was struggling furiously all the time as the two men circled the hall. Botulian was lashing fiercely, savagely, and raw weals were showing on Drummond's arms. Then suddenly an extra savage lash from the whip snapped Drummond's sword in two, but in a flash Drummond had snatched down another from the wall. And this time he hurled himself at Botulian regardless of the whip, pinning his arm against the wall.

It was a scene she never forgot. Botulian's other hand had gone up over his head and his eyes were terror-stricken. Drummond had stepped back and his sword was above his head. He seemed to be gloating over his success.

"Like it, Botulian?" he jeered.

"Don't—don't!" screamed the other. And then a quiet voice came from behind.

"Drop that sword, Drummond, you're covered. By Jove, Roberts, your disguise is perfect!"

Drummond spoke then. "This isn't Roberts, Sir Raymond, it's Botulian himself."

He heard a startled exclamation from Blantyre, but his voice was level when he spoke again.

"Afraid it won't matter a lot to you either way, Drummond," he said. "I've got the whip hand now and—"

But the words died in his throat as another voice broke in, and Drummond realised in a flash that it was Neilson.

"I think not, Blantyre," he said, and in a moment the room was filled with policemen, and both Blantyre and Botulian were in handcuffs and Phyllis was in her lover's arms.

Neilson was studying Botulian closely. "So you're Dr. Botulian, after all?" he queried. "But I'd like to know—"

"Oh, that's easy, colonel," interrupted Drummond. "Sir Raymond here can put you wise if only he'll talk. Eh, Sir Raymond?"

And then as the other merely scowled, Drummond went on easily:

"Goodman wouldn't sell, and Sir Raymond here tried Botulian, and the good doctor agreed to make an appointment with the professor and let Roberts take his place. That was to be his alibi. However, a better idea occurred to him, and he turned up an hour earlier and—oh, well, I'll fill in all the blanks later if you want 'em."

Neilson chuckled grimly. "We'll make a detective of you yet, Hugh," he said.

them again a wild thrill surged across her, for at that moment on the staircase behind Botulian she saw a shirt-sleeved figure creeping stealthily down—a figure that even as she saw him lay a finger on his lips. Drummond!

But Botulian had seen the hope leap into her eyes. And in a flash he had slipped behind the thick curtains.

For a few seconds there was deathly silence. Drummond came creeping stealthily down the stairs, and Phyllis saw that there was a gun in his hand. She guessed that he had failed to see where Botulian was hiding, and she was signalling him frantically with her eyes.

Lower and lower came Drummond, his gun in his hand sweeping circles. He had failed to see Botulian, who now had a whip in his hand. And then suddenly the girl gave a scream as a long, sinuous tongue leaped out swiftly from behind the curtains and Drummond's gun clattered to the floor.

“THE BOY
FROM BARNARDO'S

Men in the Making”

Starring FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW & MICKEY ROONEY

A young snob, posing as a lord, is arrested when a valuable necklace is stolen. The Magistrate finds that he is a foil of clever thieves and decides to give the boy a last chance and he is sent to the famous school for waifs and strays. A gripping story of the making of a man, starring Freddie Bartholomew and Mickey Rooney

The Jewel Robbery

"LORD GEOFFREY BRAEMAR'S car," reported the doorman of the big London hotel.

The clerk in the reception office got through to suit one-twenty to inform his lordship of the fact.

"I ordered it half an hour ago," a voice shrieked at the other end of the 'phone. "The service in this hotel is atrocious."

"Very, very sorry, m'lord. Most unfortunate delay. I'll transmit your complaint to the garage." The clerk hung up and looked at the instrument as if it were going to bite him. Then his quite pleasant face contorted, and he muttered savagely: "Young pup!"

A few minutes later the buzzer at the lift started and went on in stops and starts as if the manipulator were in a hurry.

"That's him all right," muttered the lift operator.

On the second floor the operator slid back the doors. A thin slip of a boy, in an Eton suit and a top hat, stood by the gates. He was a pale, very arrogant young fellow, who looked at the lift operator angrily and contemptuously.

"You kept me waiting!" raged Lord Braemar as he stepped into the lift.

A quiet, middle-aged woman followed. She was obviously some sort of a nurse or companion. Doris Clandon was very quiet, round-shouldered, and seemed almost terrified of her dictatorial young employer. She had the sympathies of the hotel staff, who thought a bath in boiling oil could not be too bad for Lord Braemar.

"The lift operator wisely had kept a still tongue. He closed the doors, and the lift descended slowly.

"Make it go faster!" ordered his lordship. "I'm not going to spend all day in this antiquated lift."

The operator pulled the lift up at the ground floor with a jolt.

"You did that on purpose!"

"I'm sure the young man did not do it intentionally, Lord Geoffrey," said Doris Clandon, in weary, tired accents.

"That's no excuse." His lordship looked at the lift operator, and with biting sarcasm added: "What he needs is fewer brass buttons and more brains."

"Good-morning, your lordship," murmured the reception clerk.

"It would be if the services in this hotel weren't so poor."

"I'm sorry, your lordship. I'll make a note of your complaint."

"Do." Lord Braemar turned to the woman, and said in eager tones: "Thank heaven the mater's coming tomorrow to take me out of this wretched hotel!"

"Thank heaven!" murmured the clerk, when his lordship had passed through the swing doors.

Outside Lord Braemar had a few words to say to the doorman because the latter was not as quick as he might have been.

"More brass buttons and no brains!" contemptuously sneered his lordship.

Accompanied by the woman, this unpleasant young man entered the large limousine. It was the woman who instructed the chauffeur to drive to Morcotts, the jewellers in Bond Street. The doorman's face was ugly.

"Little snob!" he muttered viciously as the car glided away. "Two streets away, and he has to have a blooming car."

The big car pulled up before the swagger West End jewellers. An elderly, frock-coated individual stepped forward, bowed courteously to the two customers.

"Good-morning, madam. What may I show you?"

"His lordship would like to select a simple gift for his mother," the woman explained.

"You see, the mater arrives from India to-morrow," said his lordship. "And I do so want to get her something nice."

He was shown a little something in carved jade and platinum, which cost only eighty guineas.

"Have I that much saved, Miss Clandon?"

"Oh, no, I'm afraid not, dear. Could we see something a little less expensive?"

"But it must be nice," added Geoffrey. "The mater is very particular."

A bearded, spectacled man entered the shop and another assistant hurried forward. A card was extended:

"I believe you have been expecting me," said the new arrival.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Hampstead," murmured the assistant. "We had a wire from your firm in Manchester this morning. Please excuse me a moment."

The head jeweller had just shown Geoffrey a very pretty locket, and the boy seemed pleased with this present, which was only twenty guineas. He was looking round to see if there was anything else that he fancied when Mr. Hampstead moved across the shop.

"Oh, Miss Clandon, how simply lovely. Wouldn't mummy look beautiful in those?" Geoffrey pointed to a necklace in a case. "But I suppose they're much more than eighty guineas?"

The jeweller laughed, opened the case, and very gingerly removed the necklace, which he handed to Lord Braemer.

"I'm afraid so," the jeweller said in apologetic, slightly amused tones. "Those are the 'Zyranine Emeralds.' A mere matter of thirty thousand pounds."

"Oh!" gasped Geoffrey.

"Never mind." It was Mr. Hampstead who spoke. "A bright lad like you will be able one day to buy those for your mother."

Geoffrey nodded, moved towards the case to replace the emeralds, when he gave a slight cry, staggered, clutched at his stomach and half sank to the floor. The jeweller and his assistant were just able to catch the boy before he fainted. Mr. Hampstead picked up the necklace, which had dropped to the floor, and it was Mr. Hampstead who brought the fainting boy a glass of water.

"A terrible pain here—I can't breathe," Lord Geoffrey gasped.

"He's subject to these attacks," Miss Clandon whispered to the jeweller. "He's always been on the delicate side."

Geoffrey sipped at the water.

"Sorry to be such a bother," said Geoffrey, his face all twisted in agony.

"Hadn't I better ring up a doctor?" suggested the jeweller.

"Oh, no, no!" hastily murmured Doris Clandon. "I'm used to these attacks. I know just what to do, but I must get him back to the hotel at once."

"There's a stout fellow." The jeweller helped the boy to his feet. "You'll be all right soon."

Mr. Hampstead had gone by now. They got the boy to the waiting car.

"Please don't sell the mater's locket to anyone," begged Geoffrey. "I shall call for it in the morning."

On getting back to the hotel, Miss Clandon got the doorman and an assistant to help Geoffrey out of the car. She explained that his lordship had had a fainting fit. Would they take him to his room, whilst she went to the chemist to get a special prescription made up.

Once alone, Geoffrey behaved singularly strangely for a sick youth. He helped himself to several chocolates and then switched on a gramophone, and was wandering round the room humming a tune when there came a knock at his door.

"Come!" he said in lordly tones.

A middle-aged, shrewd, thick-set man walked into the room.

"Lord Geoffrey Braemer?"

"Yes. What is it?"

"My name's Scott. Morcotts sent me round to inquire how your lordship feels."

"A bit better, thank you."

"Splendid!" Scott smiled and took out a note-book. "Then perhaps you could answer a few questions—about the incident in the jeweller's shop."

"I'd be glad to, but I'm not feeling quite fit yet. Some other time."

"Time's important, your lordship. I was hoping you'd be able to describe the man who was looking at the emerald necklace."

"How should I be able to describe a total stranger?" haughtily demanded the boy.

"Well, it would be helpful if you could," the detective smiled. "You see, the necklace was stolen."

"Indeed?" exclaimed Lord Braemer, then shook his head. "I'm sorry, but I didn't notice him. Now, if you'll pardon me I'd like to lie down."

"Perhaps the lady who was with you might have noticed him?"

"Oh, my governess. She's gone off to the chemist for my medicine. She may be quite some time."

"I'll wait, if you don't mind." The detective closed the book.

"But I do mind!" haughtily cried the boy. "I feel better, but not quite up to entertaining strangers."

Lord Braemer went and flung himself on a settee and buried himself in a book, whilst the detective seated himself in a chair.

"You've lived in India, I believe."

"Yes, for three—no, four years," Geoffrey replied and looked at the detective as if he wished he would go away.

"Landed at Calcutta, I suppose?"

asked Scott, and Geoffrey nodded. "Dirty place, isn't it?"

"Yes, dreadful people. The intouchables, you know."

"Been to Darjeeling, too?" Scott asked, and there was a curious smile round his hard mouth. "Very hot there eh?"

"Yes—awfully" Geoffrey buried himself in a book.

"Braemer—Braemer," the detective said a moment later. "Could your father have been Lord Thomas Braemer, by any chance?"

"No—no, that's quite another branch of the family."

"Possibly an uncle?"

"Yes—yes, an uncle."

"Splendid man, your uncle. I knew him during the war."

"Yes, Uncle Tom is a jolly old chap," agreed the boy. "Mater and I are going to visit him. At least, I—I think we are."

"I doubt it," the detective said in harsh tones. "Lord Thomas Braemer was killed in 1917." He got up. "You're smart, my lad, but not quite smart enough. When you go to India you don't land at Calcutta, you land at Bombay. And Darjeeling isn't hot—it's in the mountains. And you're not Lord Geoffrey Braemer."

"You're being very impertinent, my man," Geoffrey jumped up. "I shall have to ask you to leave."

"Very well. I shall have to ask your lordship to accompany me. I am an investigator for the insurance underwriters. Come along."

It was at that moment that the 'phone shrilled. The boy snatched up the receiver.

"Hallo, Geoffrey, this is Doris. Everything's all right. Jim got it."

Scott tried to grab the 'phone, but the boy jumped back. "Please, Mr. Detective," he cried loudly, and then slammed the receiver down.

In a quiet room in a back street a man

He was shown a little something in carved jade and platinum, which was only eighty guineas.

was seated before a mirror removing make-up from his face. He had just removed a false moustache and beard. On a stand were a number of beards. It was Mr. Hampstead. The woman—it was Doris Clandon—stood there staring at the receiver. Suddenly she put it down as if it were red hot.

"They've twigged us, Jim," she cried hoarsely. "There's a detective in the room with him."

"That didn't take them long," the man shouted angrily. "We'd better clear out of here—and quick!"

"And what about Geoffrey?"

"He'll have to take care of himself."

"He's the only one that can definitely identify us," the woman cried as she removed a brown wig to reveal raven black locks. "If he talks we're done for."

"You're right. Let's get out of here before they trace the call back," decided her husband. "You take your make-up off, and change your dress. Give me those wigs."

The woman scraped off her make-up to reveal quite a young face, though now it was lined with anxiety. A number of wigs were tossed into the fire and burnt fiercely. The man laughed.

"There go Jim Hampstead and Doris Clandon," he said.

The Sentence of the Court

THE bogus young Lord appeared at the juvenile court some days later. He was now dressed in a grey suit, but he was still very much the haughty young member of the aristocracy. One could see his nose curling as if he found the surroundings distasteful.

The magistrate stated that thorough investigation had not revealed any living relatives. All that Geoffrey knew about his youth he told. His father had told him once that they were the last of the family. He was born in South Africa, at Johannesburg, and came to England four years ago, but he bowed his head when mention was made of the railway accident in which both his parents had been killed.

"Were you hurt?" a kindly woman magistrate of the court asked.

"Just shaken up a bit. They took me to a nursing home, and—when I asked to see mother—they—they told me. I ran away."

"Ran away? Why?" the woman magistrate asked.

"My mother was so wonderful. I couldn't bear it," was the frank admittal.

"Where did you meet this man and woman?" the magistrate asked.

"I was standing in front of a confectioner's shop, sir. I was hungry, and it smelled so good. They took me in and gave me tea." Geoffrey stared round defiantly. "Mr. Hampstead and Miss Clandon were always good to me. They bought me clothes and they travelled a lot on the Continent with me. Miss Clandon made me keep up with my lessons."

"You realise, don't you, that this is a very serious matter?"

"Oh, yes, your worship."

"Show him the photographs."

Inspector Scott handed the boy some pictures. One was a photograph of Hampstead without the beard, and underneath was the name Charles Debtford. Another revealed Hampstead with a moustache, and this time the name was Smith.

Geoffrey studied them closely.

"This man doesn't look like him at all," the boy said in his sharp, frank way. "He had a moustache, but not

October 1st, 1938.

one like this. I know his moustache was real."

Inspector Scott grunted.

"Miss Clandon, did she wear a disguise?" asked the woman magistrate.

"Well, I—I don't want to be disloyal," Geoffrey hesitated. "Well, she was getting on a bit, you know, and—well, she did touch up her hair."

The magistrates began to confer in whispers. Inspector Scott, with a sour look at the culprit, stepped forward.

"May it please the court. It's my observation that the boy has not been fully co-operative."

"It's the court's function to decide that, Mr. Scott," retorted the magistrate. "Mr. Burke."

A clean-shaven, bright-eyed, elderly man stepped forward from among a number of spectators.

"I want to thank you, Mr. Burke, for your assistance to the court in this case," said the magistrate. "Would your organisation be willing to undertake the care of this boy?"

"Dr. Barnardo's Homes are always ready to receive a destitute child, your worship," was the immediate response. "I'm sure we can do a lot for the boy."

"I feel certain you can." The magistrate glanced at his feminine colleague, who nodded, and then round to an elderly clergyman also on the bench. Satisfied, the magistrate drew forward a form and signed it. "Very well, Geoffrey goes to Dr. Barnardo's Home."

"You mean I'm not going free?" sharply cried Geoffrey.

"You're going free for as long as you deserve to be free." The magistrate looked at the boy's flushed face keenly. "But you're a ward of the Crown until you're eighteen. So this court is going to send you among boys, most of whom are orphans, like yourself. This is not a reformatory, but a home where you will have the advantages of sound Christian training, which you have missed so far. Of course, if your conduct is not what it should be, you may be recalled and sent then to a reformatory. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir."

"Geoffrey Braemer." The magistrate stood up. "The court hereby orders that you be committed to the care of Mr. Burke of Dr. Barnardo's Homes."

The boy looked fixedly at Mr. Burke as that gentleman stepped forward to claim him. Mr. Burke smiled, but Geoffrey did not return the smile, nor did he see the extended hand. Mr. Burke pointed to a door.

An enclosed car took them to a large building, over the doorway of which was a bold inscription: "No Destitute Child Ever Refused Admission. Dr. Barnardo's Homes. Founded 1866."

Superintendent Burke then led the boy to a quiet, frugally furnished but business-like private office.

"Geoffrey, we're going to be friends," stated the superintendent. He noted the lad's mutinous look. "Very well, then. But you don't choose to be my friend yet, but I'm yours. That's the spirit of the founder of these homes—Dr. Barnardo. Now, you want to stand on your own feet when you're a man, to earn your own way, and learn a trade, so that you can be self-reliant."

"You teach people to be tradespeople?" questioned Geoffrey with plain disgust.

"Precisely. Now, there are a hundred of our homes—schools, really, and you may select which one you prefer." Mr. Burke smiled in his friendliest fashion. "You can become a farmer or a carpenter, a printer or a baker, or something else."

"I don't want to be any of those things," angrily cried Geoffrey. "I want to be a gentleman."

"The first quality in a gentleman, Geoffrey, is to pull his own weight in the boat. I would rather you made the choice."

"I wish I'd been sent to prison instead," blazed the stubborn lad.

"In time you'll be glad you weren't. Since you won't decide, I must." Superintendent Burke half-closed his eyes, as if trying to measure up and decide the most suitable industry for this difficult youngster. He smiled as he found the answer. "There are no limits to where a man may rise in the Mercantile Marine."

The Nautical School

A SMALL, private motor-bus took Mr. Burke, Geoffrey and three other boys to their new home. Albert was a large-eyed, small youth with a tooth missing in front and a strong Lancashire dialect. Tommy was a big, over-grown stolid youth, whilst Benny was dark, quiet and very reserved. The superintendent seldom glanced at the boys, and if he did it was at Geoffrey, who sat apart and stared out of the window at the country with obvious boredom.

"I've never been this far from London in all my life," cried young Albert. "Must be a hundred bloomin' miles." He noted the suitcase of Geoffrey Braemer. "Hey, look at the labels. He's been a sight of places, ain't thee, lad?"

"Obviously." Geoffrey half glanced round.

"A bit of a swell, 'e is," Tommy whispered to Benny. "I wonder what it'll be like at Russell-Cotes?"

"My cousin Will says it's a wonderful place." Albert's tongue was seldom still. "And thee can become an admirable if thee stays there long enough. Wouldn't thee like to be an admirable?" He turned to Geoffrey.

Geoffrey gazed coldly at the friendly small boy.

"Certainly not!" he answered haughtily. "The one I met was a stuffy old duffer."

"If you know all them swells, what are you going to Russell-Cotes for?" Tommy demanded a shade aggressively.

"I won't stay long," was the answer. "Family reverse—you wouldn't understand."

"Get ready, boys," Mr. Burke called out. "We're coming to it."

The bus passed through some gates, over which was a brass inscription in gilded letters: "Dr. Barnardo's Homes—Russell-Cotes Nautical School."

All the boys were gazing round eagerly—with the exception of Geoffrey. The door was opened and they filed out after the superintendent. Geoffrey touched young Arthur on the shoulder and held out his suitcase.

"Carry that for me, like a good fellow."

"Aye!" agreed Albert.

A portly little man with a heavy growth of side whiskers, a smiling face that ill-fitted eyes that were morose and gloomy, stood waiting to greet them. He was garbed in the uniform of a petty officer. The superintendent held out his hand.

"Hallo, Mr. Jelks."

Mr. Jelks shook the hand and glanced at the new recruits and sniffed.

"Well, in my time we used to throw better overboard to the gulls."

"You say that about every new lot," laughed Superintendent Burke.

"Aye, and every new batch is worse than the one before." Crusty Jelks stepped forward and eyed the new arrivals more closely. "Put down those bags and stand to attention."

Across the wide, gravelly compound a portly and tall officer was seen approaching. A very fine figure of a man. Captain Briggs, the chief of this nautical school, adjusted an eyeglass. He shook hands with the superintendent and then gave his right-hand man a sly grin.

"I suppose you've already decided they're hopeless, Mr. Jelks?"

"Aye, aye, sir. Impossible."

The captain smiled and studied the document Burke handed to him.

"Albert Baker," he called out.

The small lad, still clutching Geoffrey's case, stepped forward. "I'm him, sir," he said, touching his cap.

The captain looked at the boy.

"What happened to your tooth, Albert?" he asked.

"Me cousin's fist come too close, sir."

"Well, we'll have to get that filled up. You can step back." The captain looked again at the list. "Benny Potter."

The shy lad stepped forward smartly and the captain gave him an approving grin. "Tommy Thrums."

The stolid lad shuffled forward. The captain nodded and glanced at the remaining boy.

"You're Geoffrey Braemer?"

"Yes, sir," Geoffrey said in dull tones.

"Boys, this is Bos'n Jelks." The captain indicated his assistant. "He will have immediate charge of you. So pick up your bags and follow him and he'll get you settled."

He noticed Albert struggling with the big suitcase.

"That's a smart piece of luggage, Albert."

"It's his," Albert grinned and jerked a thumb at Geoffrey.

"Why are you carrying it?"

"He asked me to, sir."

"Give it to him," the captain said sharply. "We carry our own kit here, Braemer. Every man jack stands on his own feet."

He glanced at the others.

"Well, boys, I want you to be happy here, and I'll do everything I can to help you. We all will—especially Mr. Jelks. Good luck, my lads."

The captain walked off with Superintendent Burke.

Bos'n Jelks took his small party over to the administration building, where a quartermaster dished them out with uniforms. Albert, Benny and Tommy were keenly interested, but Geoffrey kept yawning. Once or twice the eyes of Crusty Jelks rested upon him speculatively. Then he conducted the boys to an empty dormitory where there were about forty beds. He told them to stand by till he returned.

The bos'n went off to a play-room where a number of boys of all sizes and shapes were reading, talking, writing letters, playing table-tennis and other games. He watched a brisk, fiery lad who had three stripes on the arm of his blue jacket administering a hiding at table-tennis to a bigger boy.

"Terry O'Mulvaney!" he called, but the boy was so engrossed he did not hear. Mr. Jelks raised his voice. "Look alive there, Irish! Can't you hear me?"

A freckled face was turned in his direction. Small bright eyes that were shrewd and far-seeing. The mouth was firm and the chin prominent. The boy put down his bat, and with a grin hastened to the bos'n's side.

"Sorry to interrupt your game," apologized Mr. Jelks. "But I'd like

"This isn't a waste of time when a man's life or a ship's hangs on how fast you can lash a hawser," said Bos'n Jelks.

you to come along with me to the dormitory."

"Aye, aye, sir," agreed the Irish lad.

So Terence met the new arrivals and was ordered by the bos'n to help them into their uniforms and bring them down to the cookhouse when the bugle sounded. He allotted each boy a cot and then left them in Terry's hands.

"Am I supposed to sleep here with all these other people?" asked Geoffrey.

Terry looked at this boy under furrowed brows.

"The master's suite is being used just now, more's the pity," he said with heavy sarcasm.

Albert was delighted with everything.

"A soft mattress, too," he shouted gleefully. "Ee! that's grand. Me cousin and me slept on straw at home."

"And we've got sheets," answered Tommy. "And all clean as a new ha'p'ny, too."

"The last lad that had your cot shipped as seaman on the Loconia. A bit of luck for him," Terry told Geoffrey.

"Shipped as an ordinary seaman," the boy said in disgust. "What an extraordinary achievement."

"Well, there's them that would be thinking so." Terry's jaw was set pugnaciously. "Remember this, me bucko, that England is an island kingdom and her life's blood depends upon the ordinary seaman."

"Yes, yes, I know. McKittrick's History of England," superciliously sneered Geoffrey. "Food for only six weeks is at hand in the United Kingdom. Beyond that our destinies rest in the brave hands of the Royal Navy and the Merchant Marine. Like me to quote some more?"

"How would you be knowing all this?" gasped the amazed Terry.

"I once attended school—with gentlemen!"

"Aye, and put them in their place, no doubt," snapped Terry, and went off to assist Albert, who had got his uniform on backwards. Having got Albert fixed, and after giving a hand to Tommy and Benny, he came back to Geoffrey, who was almost dressed. "I'll be after showing you how to knot that cord," he said in helpful, kindly tones.

"No need to. I've worn sailor suits since I was four, and outgrew them when I was ten."

"Oh, if you're after knowing so much, what are the three stripes on the collar for?" Terry demanded with an air of triumph.

"In memory of Nelson's three great victories—Copenhagen, the Nile and Trafalgar. The kerchief is mourning for Lord Nelson."

Terry stared fixedly at this walking encyclopedia, and with a snort turned away. The other boys were almost ready when Geoffrey touched him on the arm.

"May I speak to you alone?"

"Why not?" Terry opened his eyes and pointed towards the end of the dormitory. "Step into me private office."

"I suppose you know all the ins and out here?"

"I do that. But, then, I've been here this many a year—since I was eight."

"I'd like you to be my friend," Geoffrey held out a coin. "Here, that's for you."

"Half-a-crown!" Terry looked from the coin to Geoffrey. "What would you be giving me this for?"

"You can do me a service. I don't like people reading my letters. I'd like to get hold of them before they go to headquarters."

"Well now I couldn't be doing that if I wanted to. Sure, you'll be getting your letters unopened," Terry laughed. "You've wasted your money, your Highness."

At bugle-call the party of four were marched down for cookhouse. A large, high-roofed, comfortable hall with many tables and benches. Good, wholesome food was placed before every boy by boys doing orderly duty.

"It's grand, Braemer," Albert said to Geoffrey, who was seated next to him.

"That's a matter of taste."

A kindly, buxom woman came round the tables, and she spotted Geoffrey's tin plate was hardly touched.

"No appetite?" asked Mrs. Briggs. The captain's wife was the matron at Russell-Cotes.

"No, madam, I'm not in the least hungry."

"Some of the new boys feel a bit strange for a day or so, but you'll like it here," said the kindly matron. "We're all members of one family, the largest family in the world. If anything bothers you, you come to me, and we'll talk it out."

"Thank you." Grave eyes looked at the matron keenly. "How often does the post come?"

"Every morning. You'll cheer up when you get a letter."

At the head table sat Captain Briggs and Bos'n Jelks. When the meal was almost over the captain rapped on his table for silence.

"Boys, I have some good news from Captain Cartwright." The captain paused and glanced round. "I'm sure the new boys will be interested in knowing that John Cartwright went to school here, and on his own merits has risen to be first officer of the Queen Mary. And he hasn't forgotten the old school."

There was loud cheering, but the captain's upraised hand soon restored silence.

"Through his efforts we will be able to place five Russell-Cotes boys among the crew of the Queen Mary next season. I may as well tell you that O'Mulvaney and Saunders have the windward course for two of the berths. So it's up to all of you to mind your p's and q's if you want to earn the appointment. That's all. Carry on by meses."

Geoffrey yawned, but he did look towards O'Mulvaney at the top of the table. He saw him waving a hand across to another table where a big boy, also the proud possessor of three stripes, waved back. Geoffrey guessed this was Saunders.

After the repast the boys dismissed, but Terry went across to the captain's table. The latter put down his paper and smiled a greeting.

"It's grand news, sir. And I'll be thanking you for the chance."

"You've earned it, Terry."

"Thank you, sir." The boy put the half-crown on the table. "I'll be making a contribution to the Christmas fund."

October 1st, 1938.

"Quite a windfall—you must have come into money."

"That I did, sir," Terry grinned. "One of the new boys wanted to get his letters without being read. And him not knowing that's the way they'd be given to him. He's a rum sort."

"That would be Braemer, I fancy," remarked the astute captain.

"Aye, sir. He'll not be liking it here," Terry looked gloomy. "He's too good for us."

"Well, he'll have to get to like us," the captain answered, and leaned forward. "You see, Terry, he hasn't had your advantages. You've been one of this family for eight years—"

"And proud of it, sir," impulsively interrupted Terry.

"Braemer was brought up wrongly," continued the captain. "He learned the wrong things from the wrong people. If he doesn't make a go of it he'll be sent to a reform school. Now you and I don't want that, so I hope you'll help the lad by showing him the ropes."

"I will that, sir. If he'll let me."

"And, Terry, I'd rather the other boys didn't know," concluded Captain Briggs. "Just you and me. I'm sure you understand. Now you might send Braemer to me, will you?"

Tight-lipped, Geoffrey listened to a brief lecture from the captain of the gravity of trying to bribe one of the other boys. It would be overlooked this time. The captain recommended that Geoffrey forget his old associates and try to make a go of it at this school. When dismissed, Geoffrey sought out Terry O'Mulvaney.

"I always knew the Irish were informers at heart." And as he walked away did not know how close he had been to a sock in the jaw.

Geoffrey Runs Away

CRUSTY JELKS was giving lessons on the making of such knots as the half hitch, clove hitch, and sheepshank. After showing them several times each boy had to make the knot with his own piece of rope. What annoyed Crusty most about Geoffrey Braemer was the fact that the lad looked bored to tears, and yet when one hauled him out in front of the class to make a knot he would do it perfectly. The bowline was a difficult business, and he expected the boys to make a mess of it, and they did, with the exception of Geoffrey.

"Well, well, good enough!" Jelks nodded approvingly. "Why, I didn't do any better myself at your age."

"It's perfectly simple," said Geoffrey in his bland, overheating manner. "But it seems an awful waste of effort."

"Well, it won't be one day when a man's life or a ship's hangs on how fast you can lash a hawser," Jelks spoke sharply.

Geoffrey made some pretence of listening to the rest of the lesson, but all the time he was giving furtive glances round as if expecting someone. The postman came riding across the square on his bicycle, and Geoffrey decided that this was a good time to try out a fainting fit. He uttered a moan, swayed on his feet and collapsed in the arms of Terry. Crusty bent over the boy anxiously.

"You'd better go over to your cot and lie down for a few minutes," he directed. "And if you're not feeling shipshape in about half an hour I'll send you over to the sick bay."

"Thank you, sir." Geoffrey managed to stand upright and hold on to a post. "I'm sure I'll be all right in a short while."

"Maybe I'd better send O'Mulvaney with you."

"Oh, no, sir, don't bother! I can get along."

Crusty Jelks stared after the slim figure.

"I was afraid he didn't have the beam to be a seaman," he commented under his breath.

Once out of sight of the class Geoffrey walked briskly, but he could see no sign of the postman. Then he saw the man's machine reposing against a wall.

"Where did you leave the post?" Geoffrey demanded when the postman appeared.

"In the usual place. On the table in the office."

When the postman had ridden off Geoffrey pushed open the swing doors and entered. He had a plausible excuse ready if there should be anyone there, but for the moment the main office was deserted, though the post was on a large table. Geoffrey rushed forward, and was eagerly looking through it when a door opened and Mrs. Briggs appeared.

"What're you doing, Geoffrey?" "Oh, I thought there might be a letter for me!"

"Probably there is, but you must wait your turn with the rest."

"Could I sort them for you, Mrs. Briggs?" the boy suggested. "I know how to arrange them in alphabetical order."

"Certainly not!" Mrs. Briggs spoke sharply. "You may go back to your class-room."

It was unfortunate that Crusty Jelks should dismiss the class early in order that the boys could collect their post, because it earned several black marks for Geoffrey. The bos'n guessed at once the fainting fit had been a spruce. It did not do Geoffrey a bit of good because there was no letter for him. That they had not written to him seemed incredible, and he asked if any letters had been held back. Mrs. Briggs looked at Geoffrey as if she could slap him.

When the post came that night Geoffrey was first there, but he had no luck. He got through the nights because he was so certain that some morning in the first week a letter would come from the people whom he regarded as his only friends in the world, and that they would get him away from this dull, dreary nautical school. The other boys tried to be friendly, but he ignored them, and there might have been trouble but for the watchful eye of O'Mulvaney. He would not be having anything said against young Braemer. One morning he was hanging round as there was to be a special midday postal delivery when one of the boys invited him to join in a game of football.

"No, thanks, I don't care to." "Couldn't I play?" asked diminutive Albert.

"You're too small," answered Ned Saunders. "Next year, when you've grown a bit."

"Ec, but I must play to-day, Ned. I must."

"You'd only get hurt." Saunders ran off to join the others.

"I'll be hurt more if I don't play," Albert said gloomily.

"Don't let it bother you!" called out Geoffrey. "That sort of game is no fun. Why look so miserable?"

"I'm afraid like."

"Afraid? Of what?"

"Captain Briggs says I must get tooth put in, if I'm not doing anything else," Albert explained with a nervous smile that showed the great gap in his teeth. "And if they let me play I wouldn't have to go to dentist."

"Why, Albert, you'd look grand with a new tooth."

"But they grind with the buzzer. And it hurts like."

"Don't let that scare you. I've had it done," boasted Geoffrey.

"Ye have?" The large eyes stared admiringly at the boy, whom Albert had made his hero.

"Yes, I'll tell you what I'll do," Geoffrey said in dictatorial tones. "I'll go with you and wait till it's done."

"Ee, that would be champion!" cried the admiring Albert.

There were just over a hundred boys at Russell Cotes, and besides being taught all that appertained to the sea they were given ordinary lessons as well. In technical knowledge Geoffrey outshone all the other boys, but his mannerisms did not make him popular. Albert was his one great admirer. When Crusty Jelks informed his class that the four cardinal points on a compass were north, east, south and west he asked if any new boy could tell him how many points there were all told. Only Geoffrey knew the answer was thirty-two.

"East—east by north—east north east—north east by east—north east—north by east—north east by north—" recited Geoffrey.

Jelks interrupted to say he asked the number only.

"Now, when you're steering your course may be east north east"—the bos'n walked on to a miniature bridge—"you put your wheel over until the ship's head swings to that point."

Not liking being prevented from reciting the thirty-two points, Geoffrey at once informed the bos'n that the very latest compasses had degrees on them, and that orders were now given to steer fifty or sixty or whatever degrees was required.

"That's true about the very latest ships, like the Queen Mary," Jelks eyed Braemer as if he were some unpleasant insect. "But there are one or two older ships still afloat, so you'll learn the old way first." He turned to the class. "Well, lads, let's go to the masthead."

A high mast had been erected with a great deal of rigging. There was netting all round the mast to catch any boy who should lose his balance when climbing. Geoffrey went along with the class, but he kept on looking round.

"Never mind the postman, Braemer," sharply spoke Jelks. "There'll be no fainting spell to-day."

Terry O'Mulvaney, who was one of the head boys, was detailed to show the class how to climb the rigging.

"All right, boys, you've seen how it's done—have a go at it," Jelks ordered when Terry had clambered into a cross-tice. "Keep your eyes aloft and you'll have no trouble."

"I love this," Albert whispered to Geoffrey. "Me father was a steeple-jack."

"But it's such a lot of nonsense!" cried Geoffrey, who was rather pale. "There are no sailing ships left, and one doesn't climb rigging any more."

"You should drop a note to the Board of Trade," mocked Jelks, as he nodded to Albert that it was his turn. He watched approvingly as the little lad clambered nimbly up the rigging to join the others. He noted the hesitation of the remaining lad. "Up you go, Braemer!"

"I get awfully dizzy!" cried Geoffrey.

"At the very slightest—"

"Braemer, you can't dodge it all the time," cut in the bos'n. "Hop to it, lad. Why, it's as easy as walking upstairs." He watched Braemer go some way up and then glance down. "Tighten the nets, lad!" he called out to two able-bodied seamen who were on the staff. "When a man knows he's gonna fall—he's gonna fall."

It seemed miles to the ground as Geoffrey tried to climb towards the yard arm. The grinning, pert face of Terry and the supercilious looks of the other boys made him grit his teeth and try to climb higher.

"Look up, lad—look up!" cried Albert eagerly.

Almost to the top and then dizziness got him, and Geoffrey let go. He landed in the net, rolled about helplessly, and then sat up. The two seamen helped him to the ground.

"Are you hurt, lad?"

One could not get Geoffrey down for long.

"No, I'm not!" he cried, eyeing Jelks angrily. "But it's no thanks to you."

"There's worse hurts than a bruise or a broken bone, Braemer," was the quiet reply. "Shirking's one of them. You saved yourself from that." He raised his voice. "Class dismissed."

"Climbing rigging's one thing you can't be learning out of a book," Terry remarked to Geoffrey in conciliatory tones.

"I can see nothing wonderful about climbing," was the disdainful answer. "Monkeys can do it."

That caused some muttering among the other boys, and they did not say very polite things.

"I've been thinking it over, lads," Terry said for all to hear. "It's easy enough for us to be climbing rigging, seeing we don't get light-headed, but it must be a whole lot different when you know you're going to be getting giddy."

"Well spoken, O'Mulvaney," approved Crusty, staring in perplexity after Geoffrey Braemer.

Geoffrey created a scene that day when he had no letter. It was the last straw. If there wasn't a letter for him, then it was being kept back. Mrs. Briggs sent him in disgrace to his room. Albert came into the dormitory in great excitement to say that the boys had all been invited by folks in the town for a feed. Geoffrey said he did not want to go when there would be half a dozen instructors watching. But when he learnt that every boy would be on his own he decided to go. An instructor appeared in the dormitory and squashed that idea by saying that Braemer's liberty had been restricted. Geoffrey set his teeth and sought out Mrs. Briggs. He apologised most humbly, admitted he was a cad, and told such a heartrending tale that soft-hearted Mrs. Briggs let him go to the party.

It was young Albert who saw him sneak out of the house to which they had been invited, and went out after him.

"Braemer, are you running away from school?" he asked sorrowfully.

"Oh, so you're going to be an informer like O'Mulvaney."

"Oh, no. I wouldn't."

"Go on back, Albert!" begged Geoffrey. "I'll send you some tuck from London."

Terry noticed the depressed looks of Albert and came and sat by his side, but when Albert refused cake and ices he looked at the kid closely. Albert sneaked back into the garden, and Terry followed him.

"Albert, what's the matter with you?"

"Oh, nothing. I feel poorly like."

"You're a poor liar, Albert!" fiercely spoke Terry. "What's troubling you, lad?"

"Braemer, he's gone."

"Gone? Run away, did he?" Terry gave a jeering laugh. "Well, they'll be catching him and putting him in a reform school."

"Not gaol?"

"As good as, and serve the insulting beggar right."

"If you hurry, you could bring him back," hopefully murmured Albert.

"I'll not be stirring a foot after him."

"Then I'll be trying."

"No, not a bit will you!" Terry cried. "He's off to London more than likely. If he thinks I'll be bringing him back he's daft. Why, I'd be out of my mind running the risk of losing the Queen Mary." He glowered at Albert. "Oh, will you stop putting such ideas into my head before I lay the back of me hand across your mouth."

O'Mulvaney paced up and down the path, and then with a look of annoyance at the shrinking Albert he vaulted a fence and vanished into the night.

Reduced to the Ranks

TERRY set out on the road to London, and learnt from a friendly lorry-driver that he had sighted a lad in sailor's clothes. Terry went doggedly after him.

About midnight Geoffrey climbed a fence and made himself comfortable among some haystacks, but scarce had he dosed down than a shadow appeared, and that made him scramble to his feet. Terry O'Mulvaney stood over him.

"You'd be more comfortable—back at Russell Cotes."

"Oh, the informer!" sneered Geoffrey.

"You'll be going back there, too!"

"No, I won't, and you can't make me."

"That I can and will," vowed Terry. "You'll have to kill me to take me back!" shouted Geoffrey.

"It'll be a rare treat." Terry clenched his fists.

"After I've whipped you, O'Mulvaney, I'm going to London."

"If the likes of you licks the likes of me, I'll be helping ye to get to London."

"Done!" cried Geoffrey, and rushed into the fray.

Both boys were strong, but Terry was the toughest. Geoffrey fought with the courage of desperation and despair. Several times he floored Terry, but every time the game little Irishman got back on his feet. They rolled over and over on the ground, and once Geoffrey got astride, but with a wriggle and a heave Terry jerked himself free. They punched at each other, but Terry was a determined fighter. Geoffrey went down on his back and lay there panting, but when Terry asked if he had had enough, he sprang up and resumed the fight. Once he tripped Terry and tried to run away, but the other sprang on his back and brought him down. At last Geoffrey had to own defeat, but he still had a card left.

"If you come with me to London, I can get you a lot of money—twenty pounds!" cried the tempter.

"So ye'd be bribing a body again," Terry snapped out viciously. "Wou't you never be learning?" And with all his might he hit Geoffrey on the jaw.

Terry carried Geoffrey some of the way back to Russell-Cotes, but a friendly lorry-driver again came to their assistance and gave them a lift. Geoffrey made no attempt to escape when they got back to the nautical college, and obeyed Terry's orders. They climbed a fence and crept towards their dormitory. By means of a ladder Geoffrey climbed to a secondary window and entered the doritory. Terry replaced the ladder and shinned up a pipe. Only Albert was awake when Geoffrey crept towards his bed.

"Thee come back," he hissed. "Terry fetched thee."

"He did not," answered Geoffrey. "I came back of my own free will."

Suddenly Geoffrey heard a measured tread in the corridor. It was one of the instructors having a stroll round to see that lights were out and all boys were in bed. Geoffrey dived into his bed fully dressed and drew the clothes over his head.

The instructor entered the room and looked round. In the moonlight everything was discernible. He started as a form clambered in through the window.

"O'Mulvaney!"

Terry stiffened and eyed the instructor nervously.

"Yes, sir," he replied huskily.

"You'd better get to bed," was the order.

"Where have you been?" demanded Ned Saunders, who had a bed near the window.

"You'd better be closing your eyes," rapped out the Irish lad, "or you'll be seeing more than is good for you."

In the morning Terry was told to report to Captain Briggs' office.

"O'Mulvaney, you didn't return to the dormitory with the liberty party last night."

"No, sir."

"And you were found climbing in through a window at five o'clock this morning."

"Yes, sir."

"Where were you in the meantime?" Terry held himself very straight.

"I—I can't be saying, sir," was his answer.

"You've been a boy with a fine record for eight years. Don't spoil everything now. If there is an explanation, give it."

"I'm sorry, sir, I—but I just can't be telling."

"Very well, then." Captain Briggs gave a resigned sigh. "I shall have to punish you by taking away your chevrons."

And though Terry O'Mulvaney knew that it would mean finish to his chances of joining the Queen Mary he did not tell the truth, which would have meant Braemer going to a reform school. He ripped off his chevrons and without a word handed them to the captain.

The rest of the nautical school were indignant when they saw that O'Mulvaney, the most popular lad of any, had lost his chevrons. They did not know the whole story, but they did know it was because of Geoffrey Braemer. O'Mulvaney had saved Braemer from being kicked out, and as a result had been reduced to the ranks. Ned Saunders called together a meeting of the boys, and Terry and Geoffrey were not present.

"It's Braemar's fault," Ned Saunders told them his decision, and there was a murmur of agreement. "All those in favour of putting the chill on Braemer."

Every hand was raised in assent. Braemer had been sent to Coventry.

Shortly afterwards a message came round that all boys were to assemble in the play-room. Geoffrey went there, and he looked very little the worse for his adventure. Also he was far from chastened. He asked one boy why everyone had been called, and got no answer. It was little Albert who put him wise.

"They're putting the chill on thee."

"Chill? What sort of nonsense is that?"

"Well, nobody will talk to thee as long as yer here." Albert looked round to see if he was being watched. "And if anybody does talk to you—well, there'll be nobody talking to them."

"Why aro you talking to me?"

"Because I think yer can fix things with Terry and the captain."

"Go away—mind your own business!" cried Geoffrey.

"I'm only friendly like," Albert mumbled, and backed away.

Captain Briggs was accompanied by another officer when he entered the assembly room, and at once there was loud cheering. The captain raised his hands for silence.

"I see you're as glad as I am to have Mr. Cartwright back," stated the captain. "And he knows how proud we are that the first officer of the Queen Mary is an old Russell-Cotes boy. He has a surprise for us. A splendid surprise."

"I'm down here to make a small payment on the debt I owe the old school," announced Mr. Cartwright. "In my day, you know, the greatest honour was to beat Watts Naval School in the annual lifeboat race, and this year I want to make it more tangible by putting up this cup for the winner."

At sight of the beautiful silver cup that he produced from a case the cheering was deafening.

"And you know the name of the school I want to see engraved on it first?"

"Russell-Cotes!" yelled the boys.

Captain Briggs announced that the occasion would be celebrated by a half-holiday. He suggested the idea of boat-race practice to show Mr. Cartwright what the crew could do. The idea was received enthusiastically.

Crusty Jelks had glanced several times across at Braemer, and when the boys hastened out of the assembly room for the river he beckoned Geoffrey across to him. The boy was feeling depressed and angry.

"Braemer, the crew isn't all chosen yet. We could use a smart lad as coxswain."

"I've no doubt you could," Geoffrey spoke with curled lip.

"I thought you might take a try at it," tempted Jelks. "You've done very well at boat drill whilst you've been here."

"Is it compulsory?"

"It is to-day—compulsory!" barked old Crusty.

The job of selecting the crew and aligning their positions was entrusted to Bos'n Jelks. O'Mulvaney was starboard stroke, and Saunders the port. He filled all the places except the most important—coxswain. The boys in the lifeboat at the landing-stago waited expectantly.

"Come here, Braemer!" Jelks called out, and the surprised Geoffrey, who for once had lost much of his confidence, obeyed the order. "Get in there coxswain, and take charge of your crew."

"Did you say take charge?" Geoffrey asked.

"Nothing else."

"Will I be in command?" Now there was a sparkle in Geoffrey's eyes.

"You'll be the Lord High Admiral hisself, as long as you're at that tiller."

Geoffrey jumped aboard, and he knew that every lad in the boat was looking at him. He was quite calm and untroubled. He had regained his confidence. He untied the boat and pushed off. His crew with oars raised waited for his commands.

"Lower oars!" he sang out. "All together now, men. Stroke—stroke—stroke—stroke—"

The boys were savagely angry but for all that they obeyed Geoffrey's orders, and Captain Briggs and Mr. Cartwright had to admit that Bos'n Jelks seemed to have made a fine selection in choosing Braemer as coxswain. Later on in the play-room Mr. Cartwright played billiards and showed how a hundred break could be made, and before he left he gave a short lecture on the Queen Mary. There was a hospital, a ball-room, a florist shop, cafés; in fact, it was like London afloat.

"The lives of thousands of people depend upon the keenness of officers and men. There are people on board whom you may never see, but they trust their very existence willingly in your hands. Sometimes the responsibility is frightening." Mr. Cartwright paused, and smiled at those eager faces. "You lads are following a great calling. Because you, and you only, will keep open the paths of Empire."

"But I thought that was the job of the fleet, sir?" questioned Geoffrey, and all the boys scowled at him.

"It's both our jobs. The fleet keeps the paths of the seas open, and the Mercantile Marine follows them. We're all members of the Royal Naval Reserve, you know. Subject to his Majesty's call whenever we're needed. And we've had our heroes in battle as well as in peace. The sea rewards you more than anything else; in the joy of your work. In the happiness of bringing your ship safely into harbour, especially when you've fought fog or storm to do it. It's a glorious way to live." His keen eyes stared at Geoffrey critically. "Well, what about the race with Watts? You're the coxswain, aren't you?"

"Yes, sir—I am."
"What do you think of our chances? Shall we win?"

"I don't know how good the Watts crew is, sir, but I know everyone will do their best."

Ned Saunders glanced across at Terry O'Mulvaney. He must have understood the slight nod of the Irish lad.

"We'll break our backs, sir," Saunders promised.

Geoffrey thought that this was a sign that the Coventry was over, but when Mr. Cartwright had gone he found out his error. At first he was angry, but after a while he began to think differently. He had been the cause of O'Mulvaney losing his stripes—perhaps Coventry was the right place for him.

That night Bos'n Jelks strolled out into the compound for a quiet smoke, and stopped dead still as he saw a figure by the masthead. He tiptoed nearer, and from the shadows watched Geoffrey Braemer climb alone and unaided up the rigging.

"There's good stuff in that lad if he'll only show it," he muttered. "And I think he may."

The Nocklace

IN the days that followed Geoffrey Braemer wisely avoided trouble with the other boys. Knowing that Albert would get into trouble if seen talking to him he told the small lad to give him a wide berth. He did not use his superior knowledge to make the others look small, and only on the river did he become a different person. Here he made it plain that he was in command, and he expected orders to be obeyed. There was a pleased gleam in Bos'n Jelks' eyes.

At last came the day of the great race, and there was quite a crowd on the towpath. Captain Wilson of the Royal Navy was the starter. Captain Briggs read out the rules of the race.

"Go to your posts," ordered Captain Wilson, and when the coxswain of each boat had reported everything ready he fired the gun as a signal.

"Up oars! One—two—three—four five—lower oars!" commanded Geoffrey, "Lower oars! All together now, lads! One—two—one—two—"

The Watts' boat had the better of the start, and soon had a lead of several lengths. The Russell-Cotes' supporters looked gloomy.

"Give it to me, lads!" Geoffrey cried. "I'm cutting inside of them."

The Watts boat was making rather a wide turn, and that enabled Braemer to go straight for the turning buoy, and it looked as if the two boats might collide.

"Up oars on the starboard!" came Geoffrey's prompt command. "Down oars starboard. All together now, lads!"

It was a clever move, and Geoffrey timed it splendidly. Not only did he not foul the other boat but he slithered round the buoy so that when the two boats headed for the finish he had regained all the lost distance. Terry O'Mulvaney put all he knew into his rowing, and so did the others. Fifty yards from the finish the two boats were level, and then Geoffrey yelled himself hoarse. Slowly the Russell-Cotes' boat forged ahead to win by a length.

"You didn't have to cut inside their boat," lectured Crusty after the race.

"Oh, I know it wasn't compulsory, sir!" laughed Geoffrey. "But it was fun. Thank you for letting me be coxswain."

That evening Braemer went to the private study of Captain Briggs.

"Good work, Braemer. I'm proud of you."

"Thank you, sir."

"The disapproval of your fellows is hard to bear, Geoffrey," said the wise captain, who knew all that went on. "But I admire you for the way you are standing up to it."

"Do you know why I'm getting the chill, sir?"

"No, and I'd rather not."

"But I must tell you, sir. I should have—a long time ago."

"Very well, but I warn you, Braemer, if you tell anything to your discredit, you're doing it voluntarily. I might have to report you, and that would mean reform school."

"I want to steer the straight course, sir, if you don't mind," answered Geoffrey.

"The morning that Terry was caught climbing into the dormitory it wasn't his fault. He went after me because I was running away. And he brought me back."

"I see."

"He sort of felt responsible for me, sir. You'll let him go on the Queen Mary, won't you, sir?"

"I'll reconsider his case, Braemer," promised the captain.

"And please, sir, don't tell any of the fellows how you found out about it. Please don't."

"I'll respect your wishes," agreed the captain, and smiled kindly. "Now return to your quarters."

All the next day Geoffrey expected orders to report to the Administration Building, and when an instructor informed the lads that there was a liberty party that night he was amazed that his liberty had not been curtailed. He would not have gone but for the persuasion of Mrs. Briggs. The hero of the day must go. It would not be good taste if he did not go. All the boys were expected back by six bells.

The party given in their honour was at a big house. A smart maid collected all their coats, and they were shown into the dining-room, where there was a terrific spread on the table. Geoffrey, the last to enter, was shown by the maid into a study, and he got a surprise when a door opened and a woman stood there with open arms.

"Geoffrey!"

The arms of Douis, the companion of those days when he had been Lord Braemer, went round him. He allowed her to kiss him, but his eyes were watchful and worried.

"Oh, I've missed you, Geoffrey!" cried the woman. "But now we're together again, and we'll never be separated. The first thing—we'll get rid of these." She stood back and pointed to his uniform. "We'll get you something more like what you've been used to."

"They're good clothes."

She looked at his hands.

"Callouses!" she exclaimed in horror.

"Oh, what have they made you do, Geoffrey?"

"Pull an oar, splice ropes, climb rigging—the things a seaman does."

"Why, it's criminal to treat you like a common seaman!"

"No, it's not!" he said fiercely.

"Seaman are responsible for hundreds of thousands of lives to-day."

"Oh, well, let them be. Come and sit down, darling. You're not resentful because we had to lie doggo."

"I waited for a letter—every day—for months."

"We were afraid they'd open your letters. And that insurance detective was so close behind us. It made me positively ill to think of you in a horrid place like that school."

"They treated me very kindly."

"I'm glad they did. At any rate it's over now." She drew him close to her. "We've got a sale for the necklace, and you'll enjoy your share."

"I don't want any share," Geoffrey told her. "I wish I've never had anything to do with it."

Shortly afterwards Doris went up to the benevolent gentleman who was the host. It was Jim in another of his disguises. She indicated that she wished to speak with him.

"So he won't join up with us, huh?" Jim remarked after a while.

"No, he was very sweet about it, but it seems, Jim, he's been saved."

"Saved? From what?"

"From evil ways, I think they call it," Doris said with grim humour. "He wants nothing to do with us."

"He's sulking because we ran off without him."

"No, he's really changed. But I don't think we have anything to fear from Geoffrey." Her mouth twisted.

"The little fool's really proud of becoming a common seaman and wearing those clothes. He says he's going to join the crew of the Queen Mary."

"The crew of the Queen Mary?" demanded Jim. "When?"

"He hopes on the next voyage."

"Well, if he can sail on the Queen Mary, so can we. Fetch me his coat."

"What are you going to do, Jim?"

Jim showed the necklace.

"If he won't carry this to his own advantage, he will to ours." He laughed. "Get me his coat quickly and fetch your sewing-basket."

A fortnight later there was a parade of the whole nautical school for the commandant to read out the names of the boys selected.

"As I read the names, the five boys will come forward," Captain Briggs announced, and turned to a paper. "Philip Grasham." A tall boy stepped forward. "Edward Saunders." There came a faint murmur of approval, which died as Captain Briggs frowned his disapproval. "Roger Roantree." The name made O'Mulvaney blink—he had been senior to Roantree not so long ago. "Terry O'Mulvaney!" He had to have a dig in the ribs from a comrade before he realised it was his name. He staggered forward, his mouth agape. Captain Briggs looked down to hide his smiles. He folded the paper and looked at the boys, because the next name was going to be a shock for all of them.

"Geoffrey Braemer." When the rustle of excitement had died down. "I want to extend my sincere congratulations to the boys chosen, and to remind the rest of the school that their chances will come later. Parade, dis-miss!"

Captain Briggs was walking off the parade ground when Geoffrey approached him.

"I can't believe I'm really going, sir," Geoffrey blurted out.

"Well, you are, my lad."

"But the black marks for running away—aren't I going to reform school?"

"Reform school is for boys that need reforming, Geoffrey."

Geoffrey went to the play-room treading on air. The other boys glanced covertly at him. They did not know quite what to do with this Coventry boy who had won the Cartwright Cup and now had been chosen for the Queen Mary. Terry was there, and strutting about because he had got his cherished chevrons back. Impulsively Geoffrey went up to the Irish lad.

"We're going to be shipmates, after all," spoke O'Mulvaney.

"I hope you won't hold it too much against me."

O'Mulvaney stuck out his hand.

"Will you put it there?" he said, for all to hear. There was a cheer as the two gripped hands.

The Queen Mary

TWO days later when Captain Briggs, his wife and Bos'n Jelks were going over the kit of the five boys appointed to the Queen Mary it was the nimble fingers of Mrs. Briggs who felt the lump in Braemer's coat. Geoffrey couldn't explain it, and Mrs. Briggs suggested that it was marbles or something that had worked through a hole in a pocket into the lining. She would soon put that right and got her work-basket. What a gasp went up when the diamond necklace was revealed.

"Where did you get this?" demanded Captain Briggs, and Geoffrey could not explain.

When the motor-bus departed twenty minutes later it contained four gloomy boys. Geoffrey had been detained, and was at that moment being questioned by the captain.

"You say you don't know how it got there. All you can tell me is that you think it is the necklace that was stolen from Moreotts. That means you have had contact with your former associates. Is that so?"

"I can't say, sir!" cried the unhappy Geoffrey.

"You've told us you never felt the necklace in your coat before the night of the party, so that it is easy to deduce where you obtained the necklace. Geoffrey, you remember when you ran away?"

"Yes, sir."

"And for such a transgression I could have returned you to the Court for probable sentence to a reformatory. You knew that, and yet you confessed. Why?" There was a pause. "Perhaps I can help you with an answer. Out of loyalty, wasn't it?"

"Yes, sir, it was."

"Loyalty to Russell-Cotes?" questioned the captain.

"Yes, sir."

"Loyalty is a splendid quality, and I admire you for yours. But you have now to choose between two loyalties. Loyalty to the people who led you on the wrong path, or to Russell-Cotes. Which loyalty do you choose?"

"To Russell-Cotes, sir."

"That's the ticket," approved Jelks.

"I knew you wouldn't let us down."

"Tell me." The captain looked intently at Geoffrey. "Who was the lady who entertained the boat crew on the night of the race?"

Geoffrey told them the whole story of that evening. How they had wanted him to go back with them and that he had refused. He had told them that he was finished with that sort of life. But why they had hidden the necklace in his coat he could not explain.

Captain Briggs and Crusty Jelks took a car and went down to the house, and were not surprised to find that Doris Claudon and Jim Hampstead had departed. Captain Briggs was gloomy. Naturally, he had handed over the necklace, and he wondered what the Court would do about Geoffrey Braemer. They might think the hoy was bluffing and had been going to smuggle the necklace out of the country.

It was midday, and the Queen Mary was sailing with the afternoon tide. The four boys were on board, and First Officer Cartwright had detailed them to their duties. Bos'n Jelks had come to see them off, and naturally he told the boys all about Geoffrey. Braemer had been detained by the authorities.

A bos'n appeared and detailed Saunders to roll some canvas on one of the passenger decks.

"Why, it's one of those nice boys from Russell-Cotes."

Ned Saunders just gaped at Doris Claudon and Jim Hampstead as if he were seeing things.

"You are from Russell-Cotes, aren't you?" demanded Hampstead.

"I'm from Russell-Cotes right enough." Saunders found his voice.

"How is that nice boy who was coxswain of the boat?" casually inquired the crook. "He hoped to make the Queen Mary. I imagine that as you're here, so is he. A nice lad. Ask him to come and see us."

"You know he can't come to see you!" shouted Saunders. "He's been sent to a reformatory, and it's all your fault." He dropped the canvas and bolted down a corridor.

Hampstead knew that it was no good sailing without the necklace, and told Doris they must get off the Queen Mary at once. Moreover, this Russell-Cotes boy might make trouble. He guessed rightly. Ned rushed up to Bos'n Jelks and gasped out who he had seen on B deck.

The two passengers were about to go down a gangway when Crusty and the four boys showed up.

"Just a minute, Mr. Hampstead." Crusty barred the way. "I arrest you in the name of the law."

Hampstead sprang forward, pushed the bos'n violently and charged down the gangway. It was Terry O'Mulvaney who ran after him and hurled himself through the air in a flying tackle.

"What's the meaning of this? Assaulting a passenger?" cried Cartwright in amazement.

"I charge them with the theft of some jewellery," explained Jelks. "They're wanted by Scotland Yard."

"Quite correct," said another voice, and Inspector Scott stepped forward. "I had an idea that if the boy's coat was sailing these two would follow the cargo."

Cartwright at once got through to London, and he managed to get in touch with a power at the Admiralty. As a result Captain Briggs was informed that if Geoffrey Braemer could get to Southampton in time he could sail on the Queen Mary. A special plane was chartered, and Braemer got aboard as the last gangplank was being removed. "Seaman Braemer, reporting aboard for duty, sir!" gasped Geoffrey.

"Join the deck, Braemer." Cartwright gave him an approving and friendly grin. "And good luck to you!"

Geoffrey fairly tore up to the deck, and there were his four comrades hauling in a hawser. How they cheered him!

"Glad to see you aboard!" cried Terry, and he meant it. "Lend us a hand, lad. Heave-ho, me hearties!"

The famous Konjer diamonds are stolen and Police-Commissioner Theron is sure that it is the work of 'The Gentleman,' a notorious and mysterious crook. He narrows the search down to two people, invites both to his home for the week-end, and lays a trap to catch the crook—with startling results. Starring Preston Foster and Whitney Bourne

"DOUBLE DANGER"

The Konjer Diamonds

ONE thing Police Commissioner Theron wanted to do before retiring to his rose garden—catch the gay, impudent jewel thief who styled himself the Gentleman. He believed the means was within his grasp as he admired the sparkling Konjer diamonds which had just been handed to him by Gordon Ainsley, most famous of jewellers.

"Our friend the Gentleman won't be able to resist stealing them—or, rather, their duplicates, and when he does his brilliant career will be over."

Bald-headed Ainsley snorted. "You have set enough traps, Commissioner, to retire every jewel thief in America, but he's still as free as air."

"Well, he won't get away this time," said Theron grimly. He took a white case which had just been brought in by an assistant, and gasped slightly as he examined the contents. "Why, that's unbelievable! I can't tell them apart!"

Ainsley nodded, rubbing his hands. "They're perfect. If it weren't that the real ones are in the black case, I couldn't tell them apart myself at first glance."

Theron put down the white case. "Well, I must be going. You know your part?"

"Perfectly. But, tell me, why are you so sure the Gentleman will be at your home?"

"Because," said Theron softly, "I'm going to invite him for the week-end."

"You know who he is?"

"Well, not exactly. But I've narrowed my suspects down to two, and they'll both be there."

"Then why don't you arrest them?"

"Because I haven't any evidence. But I will have before the week-end is over."

"David," said Ainsley earnestly, "you've just got to catch him this time. He has cost me a fortune, and it's getting so that every time I receive a new piece of jewellery, I might just as well have it delivered straight to him and save myself a lot of nervous indigestion and insomnia!"

Theron turned at the door. "He hasn't made my life very pleasant, either. But don't worry. The Gentleman is going out of circulation."

Ainsley was informed by an assistant that Mr. Jerome Cortland's secretary was on the telephone. He immediately became the salesman. Cortland was a rich and valuable customer.

"Hallo, Mr. Ainsley," said a girl's voice. "Mr. Cortland would like you to send over your finest diamonds. He wants to choose a wedding present for his daughter."

"It'll be a pleasure," crowed Ainsley. "I'll see to it right away." He called an assistant and gave him the Konjer diamonds. "Lawley, see that these are delivered to Mr. Jerome Cortland's home, and take the usual precautions."

The smartly uniformed messenger in the imposing delivery van with the Ainsley arms on its panels insisted on being taken direct to Mrs. Cortland, so that he could get a responsible signature for the valuable stones. She was sharp with the butler for disturbing her.

"Jewels?" she snapped.

"They must be for Miss Iris," suggested the maid who had been reading to her.

"Madam," said the messenger, "may I suggest you keep these in a safe place? They're the Konjer diamonds."

"Konjer diamonds?" said Mrs. Cortland without interest. "What a horrid name! Oh, just put them anywhere, Agnes."

She waved the man away and ordered the girl to continue reading. Outside, the departure of the Ainsley van was the signal for some curious action. A girl in a saloon drove slowly up to the drive, signing to a pale-faced man in uniform who came along in a van resembling Ainsley's. He got out and marched up to the Cortland home while the girl waited, and once more the butler interrupted Mrs. Cortland.

"I'm sorry, Mrs. Cortland. It seems there was a mistake. A Mr. Courtney ordered the jewels, not Mr. Cortland. They've sent another man to pick them up."

"Well, give them to him! I don't like the name, anyway!"

Nonehalantly, Taylor, the fake messenger, walked down the drive to the waiting car. Carolyn Morgan hid her excitement behind a calm expression as he swiftly changed his jacket behind the delivery van, donning an ordinary chauffeur's uniform. Things seemed to be going well, but, unawares, they were being watched by two men in a black saloon parked in a side street.

Robert Crane, in lounge suit and soft hat, said dryly to the man in a policeman's uniform nervously tapping the wheel beside him:

"Relax, Gilbooley."

"Sure, and I'll do me best, sor."

said the other man in an Irish accent too good to be true. "But I'm afraid me nerves won't permit it. You see, it is me first case."

When the girl drove away, with Taylor at the wheel, the black saloon followed, and it was right behind when the crook drew up outside a block of flats. Not until they were inside, and the girl was taking off her coat, was a word spoken.

"Well, everything went off just as you said it would," grunted Taylor, handing her the jewel-case.

"You did a good job," she said calmly. "You ought to make a pretty penny out of this."

"About five grand," Taylor grinned. "Not bad for just driving a car and carrying out your instructions. You know, I never thought I'd like working for a woman, but I've got to hand it to you. Getting in with that Society crowd was a great idea!"

Carolyn's admirable eyes were studying the jewels when a tap sounded on the door. They both turned, startled.

"Don't be so jittery," she said. "It's probably the maid." Calmly she sat on the sofa while Taylor opened the door, and grated as Robert Crane and the policeman burst in:

"What's the big idea?"

"Search him, Gilhooley!" snapped the tall, blue-eyed man in the lounge suit.

"What d'you mean by this?" said Carolyn sharply.

"It's a good act, sister," he grinned. "But it won't work. Where are they?"

"I don't know what you mean, and if you don't get out of here immediately I'll report you both!"

Though he thought she looked very beautiful in her anger, he snapped:

"You'll have a chance to tell the chief about it personally. You're under arrest!"

"You're making a mistake!"

"You made one," he drawled. "We followed your boy friend from the Cortland home. Come on!"

She thought swiftly.

"Could I get my hat?"

He shrugged. She bent and picked up her bag, slipping the case into it while Crane strolled to Gilhooley and the sullen chauffeur.

"Find anything, Gilhooley?"

"Just a gun, sor." Then Crane whirled suddenly and went to Carolyn.

"I thought you'd lead us to them. It's so nice of you to save us the trouble of a search. Come, come!"

Sulkily she handed him the case.

"You're very welcome. I hope all your children are ugly and flat-footed policemen!"

"And I hope all yours are as beautiful as you are," he said gallantly, adding, when she smiled with pleasure: "But not as dumb." He walked to the door. "Keep your eyes on them, Gilhooley. I'll see if the wagon has arrived."

Gilhooley made his prisoners sit on the sofa, politely handing the girl a case when she searched for a cigarette. Her eyebrows rose.

"You're pretty polite for a cop!"

"Thank you, miss," he smiled. "I'm trying to be a credit to the Force. I only just joined to-day."

Taylor scowled.

"Well, you don't have to make a speech about it."

"Now, if it's trouble you're wanting—," began Gilhooley grimly, and was interrupted by the phone. "All right, I'll see to it." He went into the next room. "Hallo! No, this is not the Elite Café. This number is Crestwood 9098. Don't I talk English?"

October 1st, 1938.

"Don't you call me a foreigner! I was born in County Clare!" Slyly he turned and glanced into the other room, adding in a different voice. "They've gone, sir."

"All right," said Cranc, down in the hallway. "Come on down." Chuckling over the success of their ruse, Crane and his valet met in the black saloon outside. They saw Carolyn and Taylor come running down a side alley and hail a taxi. "Well, if it isn't our old friend," Cranc grinned. "Drive close to them, Fentriss!"

The fake policeman with the fake name and the faked Irish accent accelerated. The black saloon swept up as the taxi moved away. Leaning out, Crane called cheerily to the astounded occupants:

"Thanks for the Christmas present!"

Taylor's eyes bulged as the saloon tore away and disappeared round a corner.

"Imagine us falling for a trick like that!"

Angrily the girl slumped back in the seat.

"We should have known when Gilhooley was so polite!"

"Well, what do we do now?" he snarled.

"Nothing," she said icily. "Just hope we meet some time."

Neither realised at that moment that they had had the pleasure of meeting the Gentleman.

Into the Trap

CORDON AINSLEY raged up and down his office.

"Well, of all the stupid idiots!"

"Now, now, you don't have to rub it in," protested Theron. "I'm no crystal-gazer."

"No, no, no!" snapped Ainsley. "I mean my employes and the Cortlands!"

"Well, don't be too hard on them. The Gentleman was very clever, as usual."

Ainsley laughed bitterly.

"So the Gentleman won't bother us any more, eh? You were going to put him out of circulation, huh? You might just as well retire to your rose garden now! We'll never recover those diamonds!"

"I'm sure you'll have them back soon. We're going ahead with our plans."

"Aren't you afraid he'll back a van up to your house and steal all the furniture?"

Theron smiled aside the sarcasm.

"He'll be too busy opening my safe."

"He'll never do it, now that he has the diamonds!"

"I have an idea he will," said Theron, picking up his hat. "There is no reason for him to leave. He knows he left no evidence, and I know he'll be there."

"If he is," snapped Ainsley, "it will be because he had a mental relapse!"

"He'll be there," said Theron confidently. "There's just two things I want you to do. See to it that your employes keep quiet about the robbery, and don't inform the newspapers."

"Very well," said Ainsley testily.

"Very well, very well."

That evening Robert Crane was sitting at a typewriter in his flat, just beginning another story. Bob Crane's stories featuring the Gentleman had made him a popular writer, and given the thief something of a Robin Hood quality. Nobody knew that Crane was really the crook he wrote about. Commissioner Theron only suspected it, and not for the first time he wondered whether he was wrong when his ring on the bell was answered by the handsome, powerfully built writer.

"Glad you dropped in," smiled Bob Crane. "I was just thinking I'd have to ask you to come over."

"Want the old master to help you out again?" asked the Commissioner, accepting a drink.

"I certainly would appreciate it. I don't seem able to get started on my new novel."

Theron glanced at the bookcase.

"What, after scribbling all these? 'The Gentleman,' 'The Gentleman at Large,' 'The Adventures of the Gentleman'—I should think you could write them in your sleep!"

"My publisher often infers that I do," Bob grinned. "But, honestly, I'm stuck. You know, they're all based on robberies that you've told me about, and I was hoping—"

"Well, I'm sorry I haven't got a new story for you. Your old friend, the Gentleman, seems to be letting you down."

"If he doesn't get busy pretty soon," sighed Bob, "I'll have to find a new super-cracksman."

"Well, you'll never find as good a subject. He's the last of a vanishing race."

Bob looked sharply at the Commissioner.

"You sound almost sorry!"

Theron shrugged.

"Well, I shouldn't. For the last five years he's been a headache to me. But if I ever get my hands on him, I'll see that he's put away for good!" Bob's eyebrows lifted as he drank. He wondered whether his visitor was fencing, as he was. Theron shook his thoughts from him. "By the way, we're expecting you over the week-end. Now, now, I won't take no for an answer. Babs is back from school, and she's just crazy to see you again."

The writer accepted smilingly, and Theron left. Swiftly Bob flung the door of his bed-room open. The room was in darkness. He clicked on the light as a dim figure ducked behind a chair. The masked man jumped as Bob walked over and said sternly:

"Fentriss, I'm ashamed of you! You've bungled again!"

Crestfallen, Fentriss pulled off his mask.

"What errors did I commit this time, sir?"

Bob filled his pipe.

"When you opened the door, the draught rustled my papers."

The valet sighed.

"I'm afraid I'll never make an adequate cracksman, sir, even with your coaching."

"Come, come, Fentriss! You will, if you practise every chance you get."

"I'm rather tired of trying to open your safe, sir. And it will be quite difficult to practise on others, without the danger of landing in—er—clink, sir."

Bob grinned.

"Begins to look like your career has ended before it got started, doesn't it? Cheer up, you're still a good valet!"

Fentriss' sad features relaxed.

"Thank you, sir. I couldn't help but overhear your conversation with Commissioner Theron, sir. Are we really going to spend the week-end with him, sir?" Bob nodded. "Has it occurred to you, sir, that we might be emulating the rodent going after the cheese?"

"A trap?"

"Exactly, sir. Commissioner Theron is no dummy, if I may say so, and I believe he suspects that you are the Gentleman."

"You think so?"

"Yes, sir. Hadn't I better ring your excuses, sir?"

"No, no," chuckled Bob Crane. "In the words of Confucius, the safest place for a mouse is in the bed of the man who builds mouse-traps."

So the Gentleman went to the house of the man who was trying to trap him. Theron's daughter, Babs, a pretty girl still in her teens, gave him a slight shock when he met her.

"Hallo," he cried, "is this the little freckle-faced roughneck I saw four years ago? She's lovely!"

"I think you're wonderful," cried Babs excitedly. "I've read all your books. All the girls at Miss Eaton's are simply wild about the Gentleman, and when I told them that I knew him—"

Theron glanced sharply at Bob when he started.

"Hub?"

"I mean the author," said Babs. Relieved, Bob was introduced to Roy West, a tall, curly headed youth who obviously had eyes only for Babs, and couldn't restrain his jealousy at her interest in Bob.

"Isn't he simply divine?" she sighed as they stood watching Bob go up to his room.

Roy scowled.

"He looks like a turnip to me."

Upstairs Theron watched his guest dressing for dinner.

"I can give you a start for your novel now, Bob. The Gentleman got the Konjer diamonds."

Bob refused to be rattled. He turned to his quaking valet.

"Fentriss, let's have my waistcoat." To Theron: "I'm glad he did. Only for the benefit of my novel, of course!"

"You'll have to figure on giving him a partner now," drawled Theron. "A woman."

"A woman? I thought you said he worked alone."

Theron smiled.

"Well, it seems he didn't this time."

"Well, if what you say is true," Bob grunted, "he's made his first mistake."

"Bob, have you ever thought," said Theron, "that the Gentleman might not be a gentleman?"

"What kind of pun is that?" grinned Bob.

"No pun intended. It just occurred to me that the Gentleman might be a woman."

"Well, it sounds pretty wild," the Gentleman drawled.

"Let's have a handkerchief, Fentriss."

Baffled, Theron stared at Fentriss as he suddenly sat down on the bed, as white as one of its sheets.

"What's the matter?"

Bob went to his man.

"What's happened, Fentriss?"

"Nothing, sir," Fentriss gulped.

"Just a dizzy spell, sir."

"Well, don't sit there," rapped Theron.

"Come over by the window."

Wildly Fentriss glanced around

"No, thank you, sir. I'd rather sit here if you don't mind." Crane rescued him, putting off Theron, who went downstairs, rather puzzled. Trembling, Fentriss rose and pointed down to the jewel-case which had fallen out when he went for the handkerchief.

"Oh, Fentriss, I'm ashamed of you! After all I've taught you!"

"I'm sorry, sir. It won't happen again, sir."

The Gentleman laughed.

"Well, it had better not, or we'll be crossing the days out on a calendar. Put them in a safe place."

Downstairs, it was Bob, not his valet, who got a shock. Theron led him to a girl who was sitting on the sofa.

"Bob, I want you to meet a very charming young lady—Carolyn, this is Bob Crane."

Electric tension seemed to pass between the pair, for Carolyn was the girl from whom the Gentleman had bluffed the Konjer diamonds.

The Police Chief's Plot

BOB was the first to recover, greeting Carolyn easily. Theron, he learned, had met her at a charity bazaar, and he wondered grimly whether the Police Commissioner knew he was entertaining a female counterpart of the Gentleman. It was lucky the cracksmen was able to assume a poker face. During dinner, the girl, still rankling after her defeat over the Konjer diamonds, steered the conversation into uncomfortable channels when she learned he was famous for his stories about the Gentleman.

"Oh, Mr. Crane," she said sweetly, "wherever do you get the material for your stories?"

"From the Commissioner," he said coolly. "He tells me about people who are foolish enough to go about picking up things that don't belong to them."

His thrust got home. She reddened slightly.

"Oh, I'm disappointed. I thought you might get them from the Gentleman himself."

Bob felt everybody's eyes on him. Was there a glint of mockery in those of Theron?

"It would be great publicity for my books," he said easily, and joined heartily in the toast that Babs called for the Gentleman.

Fentriss was having his uncomfortable moments, too. The butler was showing Crane's valet his room in the servant's quarters when Taylor, still in chauffeur's uniform, came along and stopped dead at sight of him.

"Oh, Taylor, this is Fentriss."

Taylor grinned nastily.

"When you played your little joke on us, your name was Gilhooley."

"You must have met my twin brother," said Fentriss sweetly. "He's a policeman."

"An Irishman and an Englishman twins!"

Fentriss smiled.

"It's true, though. My mother married twice."

"You and your brother ought to join a sideshow," snarled Taylor, and disappeared into his room.

"Quite an unpleasant person," said Theron's butler distastefully.

"You should have said worm," muttered Fentriss.

Bob was saved awkward questions during the after-dinner chat by a startling development. There sounded outside the high-pitched scream of brakes, followed by a dull crash, then silence. Roy ran to the window.

"Looks like a car smashed against a tree!"

"We'll go out and see," snapped Theron. "Come on, Bob!"

Outside in the darkness Gordon Ainsley hurried towards his car, which was

"I thought you'd lead us to them," said Crane. "It's so nice of you to save us the trouble of a search."

tilted against a tree, as his chauffeur scrambled out. "Good work, Charles!"

Charles disappeared in the darkness, while the jeweller climbed into the driving seat, placed a white jewel-case beside him and slumped back with closed eyes. Thus Theron and his two guests found him.

"It looks like he's badly hurt!" gasped Roy.

"Yeh, Bob, give me a hand here. We've got to get him into the house and get a doctor."

Finding the white case, Bob handed it to Theron.

"You'd better take care of this, David."

Silently the party stood round a divan while Mrs. Theron held a bottle of smelling salts under the nose of the supposedly unconscious man. Coughing, Ainsley opened his eyes, and Bob Crane started.

"What happened?" he moaned. "What happened?"

"Your car went off the road," said Theron quietly.

Frantically Ainsley sat up and felt through his pockets.

"My case, my case, where is it?" Silently the Commissioner handed it to him and he leaned back with a sigh of relief, though his face was twisted in a well-assumed expression of pain. "There seems to be something wrong with my leg."

"Yes, yes," said Theron soothingly. "We've sent for the doctor."

"My name is Robertson," said Gordon Ainsley without a quiver. "Henry Robertson."

"Of the Central Bank?" asked Theron, equally stolid.

"Yes," panted Ainsley. "I'm terribly sorry to have made a nuisance of myself about these! They're very valuable. You see, I bought them as a surprise for my wife. They're the Konjer diamonds."

Carolyn Morgan and Bob Crane stared unbelievably at the little baldheaded man. Theron exclaimed:

"The Konjer diamonds? But they can't be! The Konjer diamonds were stolen from the Cortland home!"

"Oh, no," said Ainsley decisively. "There's some mistake. Why, it's preposterous! Mr. Ainsley himself delivered them to my office at six o'clock this evening. Here, see for yourself!"

"Well, then," snarled Theron, gazing at the marvellous imitations of the Konjer diamonds, "what was stolen?"

"I wish I could answer that for you, Commissioner."

The Gentleman drawled calmly:

"Mr. Ainsley must have had a duplicate set that he used for exhibiting."

"You may be right, Bob," muttered Theron angrily, striding to the 'phone, his face dark as thunderclouds. "He must have been out of his mind, withholding it from me." He dialed a number, and only he heard the voice of an officer in the Seventeenth Street police station. "Hallo, Mr. Ainsley," he snapped for the edification of his hearers. "This is Commissioner Theron. I've just found out that those diamonds you reported stolen were duplicates. Why didn't you tell me about it?"

O'Reilly the cop gaped to a pal:

"The chief's gone batty!"

Theron went on snappishly:

"Oh, you thought that you'd recover them sooner if I thought they were the real ones? Well, of all the stupid, crazy dunderheads I've done business with, you're the worst, Ainsley!" He rang off, leaving a very puzzled policeman scratching his head, and turned to his party, none of whom saw the grin on October 1st, 1939.

Ainsley's face. "Ainsley is a stupid man!"

"He isn't dumb," muttered "Henry Robertson." "He probably figured he was smarter than the police. It's silly, of course, Commissioner."

"That is silly, all right," Theron hit back, "sending out those diamonds without checking that 'phone call! Suppose they'd been the real ones?"

Carolyn, believing all this by-play, grinned triumphantly at the man who had taken from her what she thought were the fake jewels. But Bob Crane was suspicious. Theron's plot didn't work so well with him. When Dr. Hillard arrived, the Gentleman went upstairs and caught Fentriss peering at the diamonds.

"Put them away, Fentriss!"

The valet jumped.

"As a matter of fact, I was looking to see if—"

"Yes, I know," said Bob, "but don't worry. They are the real diamonds all right. Theron and Robertson are just trying to put something over on us. Did you notice how he choked the minute they put the smelling salts under his nose?"

"Yes, sir, but—"

"Well, unconscious people don't do that. They come out of it gradually."

Fentriss gulped.

"Yes, sir, but don't you think we had better take it on the lam, sir?"

"A good general never retreats under fire, Fentriss."

"No, sir, but supposing Commissioner Theron were to see these?"

The Gentleman grinned.

"That's the last thing he'll think of—that we brought them with us!"

"I hope you're right, sir. But I wonder what they're up to?"

"We'll know before the week-end is over. And in the meantime, if you have any idea about practising on Mr. Theron's safe, forget it!"

Fentriss laughed guiltily.

"Yes, sir. I must admit, sir, that I was looking forward to it—" He stopped suddenly, his laugh dying away as his chief's frown froze him.

Gordon Ainsley, alone with Theron and the doctor in a bed-room, was in a towering rage. "First you talked me into wrecking my ear," he snarled. "Then your wife almost choked me to death with smelling salts, and now you truss me up like a mummy! It's insane, ridiculous—ouch! Stop it, stop it, you're pulling my leg off!"

Theron hid a smile. Gordon Ainsley certainly looked a comical sight, his little body stretched on a huge bed, his right leg braced up in a huge case of plaster. He tried to quieten the jeweller.

"But we've got to make it real."

"It feels real to me! I won't go through with it. Get me out of this!"

"Now, now! You want to get your diamonds back, don't you?"

"Don't be absurd," grunted Ainsley. "Of course I do!"

"All right, then, you've got to do as I say. The Gentleman is sure to check up on you, and we've got to make him believe that this accident was real."

"I think he'll live, Commissioner," the doctor grinned.

"Thanks for helping us out, doctor."

"Oh, glad to do it. I hope you catch him."

Ainsley snorted.

"If he doesn't, he'll be sorry he talked me into this crazy scheme. I'll give him a dose of his own medicine. I'll have him put in a strait-jacket. I'll swear out an insanity warrant!"

He lay back, fuming, as Theron, laughing heartlessly, went downstairs and told his guests the so-called banker was suffering from a broken leg. Everybody watched him as he put the case of imitation diamonds into a wall-safe. Bob Crane, standing near the doorway, heard a cool voice beside him.

"Interested in safes, Mr. Crane?"

"Miss Morgan," he retorted mockingly, "with your imagination, you should be a novelist." The Gentleman was feeling very amused. Theron's action in putting the diamonds away before his guests seemed very obvious. There was no doubt in the cracksman's mind now that they were duplicates, and that Theron thought he had been fooled into attempting to steal them.

The Safe Breakers

CAROLYN, meeting Taylor in the garden, found him in a bad temper. "Say," he snarled,

"you're not falling for him, are you?"

"Don't be silly! I have no more use for him than you have."

"Well, if you really feel that way," suggested Taylor, "how about beating him to the safe?"

"You'll only be wasting your time," a cool voice interposed, and they swung round to find Crane behind them.

"If you don't mind your own business," snarled Taylor, "your friend will be saying what a nice fellow you were!"

"I'm only trying to help," said the Gentleman lightly. "Those diamonds in Theron's safe are the duplicates."

"Yes, we know all about that," snapped Taylor. "Now tell us the one about the three bears."

Bob shrugged.

"Carolyn, I have the real diamonds. Don't go near the safe. It's a trap."

"Why this sudden interest in my welfare, Mr. Crane?"

"It isn't sudden. It dates way back to yesterday."

"I'd like to believe you," she said dryly, "but I did yesterday—and look what happened to me!"

"Carolyn, I assure you—" The Gentleman was interrupted by the high-pitched voice of Babs, who had dropped a squabble with Roy to come and seek him.

Groaning, Bob allowed the girl to drag him away as Carolyn joined Taylor and said coolly:

"What was that you were saying about the safe?"

"You know," he muttered uneasily, "I've been thinking it over. Maybe we'd better forget about it. It's too risky."

"Why the sudden change of mind?"

"Well, after all, a cop's house is no place to go fooling around with a safe."

"You never let the cops bother you before."

"Well, I never mixed with them socially, either. It makes me nervous."

"Those diamonds might soothe your nerves," said Carolyn.

"Listen," he urged. "We've been getting away with it for a long time now. There's no sense in pressing our luck."

She looked at him queerly in the moonlight.

"You wouldn't by any chance be thinking of getting those diamonds yourself and leaving me out in the cold?"

"Now, that's a fine thing to say," he grumbled. "If I'd wanted to double-cross you, I could have done it long ago."

"Sorry, Taylor. We'll play the game your way. We'll forget about the safe."

Taylor grinned.

The DEVIL'S PARTY

Death Avenue Cowboys

A SMALL girl came creeping towards the back entrance of a warehouse in a side street off Eleventh Avenue in New York City. It was a hot summer's night and the street was dusky quiet; no one was about as she moved, with infinite caution, into a side alley that led to the coal chute of the store. Here she felt along the iron shielding until she found what she sought—a loose nut in the bolted iron sheets.

She twiddled this nut knowingly, loosening the catch of the chute until she was able to pull the chute flap open. Then, heedless of coal dust and dirt, she sat herself squarely into the chute and slid down it into the cellar below.

A pull at a hanging chain and the flap closed. She now moved stealthily through the darkness to a shelf in the cellar, found a box of matches and lighted the stump of a candle on the shelf. She crossed the cellar to some boxes and lighted a second candle stuck upon them in its own congealed grease.

Sounds from above warned her to run back to the shelf and crouch down behind some piled up empty crates.

The chute opened and, one by one, a party of boys came sliding down. First, there was a tall boy with a shock of unkempt hair; then two boys of about nine or ten, evidently brothers by their fair curls. Then a sturdy little fellow who sported a cap. He stared at the lighted candles as he muttered:

"Someone's muscling in on our territory!"

One of the two brothers, the shorter one, offered:

"Maybe it's that Tenth Avenue gang?"

The tall boy spoke fiercely:

"Come on—we can take 'em!"

They stood still, listening. A faint tell-tale sound was heard and the tall boy darted into the hiding-place behind the crates where the small girl was calmly adding her name to a list scratched on a rough piece of hanging wood.

On the board was already lettered: "Death Avenue Cowboys. Mike O'Mara, Jerry Donovan, Joe O'Mara, Marty Malone." The small girl was scratching in a last name with the aid of a rusty nail: "Helen McCoy."

She turned to give them defiant looks. "I'm here, see? And I'm in the gang. It says so right on this board!"

Mike O'Mara, the elder brother, called briefly:

"Scram!" To which the girl answered with spirit:

"Nix! I'm staying!"

"Listen, McCoy," put in Joe O'Mara, coming to her. "Dames aren't allowed."

Jerry Donovan scratched his head under his cap.

"This place is for men, Helen," he argued. "I've told you this before."

Marty Malone, tall and saturnine, now gave his vote. "This ain't a Ladies' Aide Society. Hlop it!"

They hustled her up the chute and shot her out ruthlessly.

"Now let's get down to business," said Marty. "Here's the set-up—there's a big warehouse on Tenth where a consignment of fruit has just come in. Bananas and apples is good for us—to say nothing of oranges and grapefruit. How about it?"

The others held up their right hands, thumb and forefinger touching and making a little circle. It was their secret "okay" sign. The candles were put out and the four conspirators left the cellar in sinister silence. They went separately to the rendezvous, meeting there as if casually when they saw that the hands had not yet left work.

At last, lights were extinguished and the workmen came out. The boys scattered into corners, shadows in the night. The warehouse yard doors were closed and the place became desolate and dark, save for the glimmer of a solitary street lamp. Marty Malone came out of hiding and shinned up the fence and over it.

Presently the yard doors were opened a very little. The other boys appeared and slid in, one after the other. A policeman, coming down the street, increased his stride; but when he reached the doors, they were firmly closed against him.

He rapped on them, and, after a bit, the night watchman came out grumbly. He shook his head.

"Boys in here? Why, we only jest closed up. There can't be any one. Come on in, if you like."

Stealthily creeping between alleys of piled sweet heavy smelling crates, Marty led the gang to where he guessed they might work in safety. They found the crates difficult to open. A small voice sounded through the gloom:

"I got a screwdriver."

Marty turned. He spoke disgustedly: "So it's you again, huh? How did you get in?"

"I sneaked in afore they closed and hid up," whispered the girl McCoy. "I heard all about your plan and I'll sure squeal if you don't let me in."

Marty's quick ears heard sounds of approach

"Gimme that screwdriver! Scatter, boys—here's a cop. Hear his flat feet?"

The three other boys fled into the October 1st, 1933.

darkness, and, finding retreat cut off for the moment, crouched down behind some full sacks. The policeman, after a few minutes' search, came quietly upon them; but Donovan sensed him and gave the alarm. They shot out like three bats and, although the cop grabbed at them, they managed to make the fence and swarm over it.

The policeman, baffled, ran into the depths of the warehouse. A smell of burning had come to him. Marty Malone had accidentally fired some straw whilst lighting his stump of candle. The straw blazed up and the policeman's whistle shrilled and shrilled again as it echoed through the big inflammable place.

The next ten minutes seemed nightmare. The store was well on fire when the brigade got to it, but luckily the firemen were able to overcome and subdue the flames. There was no chance for Marty and the small girl to get out and mix with the crowd which had sprung up like magic. They ran deeper still into the recesses of the store and hid, very frightened, Helen's hand on Malone's shoulder.

The policeman came in search of them; he knew that four boys had gone in and that three only had escaped. There was still one to be found—so when the fire had been got under, he marched along in purposeful search.

"Ringleader," he told the watchman. "I know him—had me eye on him for some time. Tall for his age—regular young scallywag."

Marty whispered to Helen: "I'll run for it and he'll come after me. Then you slide out."

"Okay, Marty," she whispered. The plan succeeded, and Marty Malone was the only one of the "Death Avenue Cowboys" captured. He was brought into court next morning, and he steadfastly refused to admit that he had had anyone with him. Threats and pleadings had no effect—he persisted in his story that he alone had entered the store and had set fire to it.

He was sent to a reformatory until sixteen.

Annual Round-up

TWENTY years later, at the fashionable "Cigarette Club," a dinner and dance hall off Broadway, a table was being finally decorated in a private room for an expected party. In the centre of the table, against a vase of pink roses, a tall, heavy man was placing a rough and dirty piece of board on which was scratched: "Death Avenue Cowboys. Mike O'Mara, Jerry Donovan, Joe O'Mara, Marty Malone, Helen McCoy."

The tall, heavy man was surveying the table with pride. He turned to the head waiter.

"Father Donovan will sit on my right, and Joe O'Mara will sit on his right. And Miss McCoy will sit on my left."

"Yes, Mr. Malone. And Mr. Mike O'Mara?"

"He'll sit next to Miss McCoy. I want everything the very best. These are my real pals—we grew up together. We come together every year—an annual round-up. This is the first time we've met at this club, and I want everything perfect."

"Yes, sir. It shall be so." An oldish man with a nervous manner came to them.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, Mr. Malone. I—er—Miss McCoy is ready to go on downstairs."

Malone turned "Right!" He gave final instructions to the head waiter. "Tell the doorman to admit my friends by the private door."

October 1st, 1933.

He followed the nervous man towards the dance hall, smiling all over his broad, ugly, likeable face.

"Gee, Webster, this is a great night for me!" he cried. "I feel eighteen years!"

"I'm glad, sir. Oh, while I think of it—Mr. Brewster is on the line in your private office."

Malone's smile gave way. "Okay—tell Miss McCoy to carry on. I'll be down in a minute."

He turned off the staircase into an office, lettered on the door "Private" and strode across to where the telephone receiver lay on the desk beside its stand. He spoke into it gruffly.

"That you, Brewster? Malone this end. I want that cheque for thirteen hundred and seventy-five made good. You've stopped it."

The receiver crackled and Malone's expression hardened.

"That's a lie, Brewster! My roulette wheel's dead true—the bank's percentage pays me. No, I won't sue you—I can't. It's a gambling debt—and you know I can't sue. But I have other ways of collecting—and you'd better think again!"

He slapped down the receiver to ask Webster, who had returned and was standing just inside the office door:

"Is Jim Diamond here?"

"Yes, Mr. Malone."

"Send him along to me."

Malone strode about the room, frowning and snapping his fingers impatiently. Presently two men entered, one a thin-lipped, pale fellow with eyes set too closely together; the other had a darkish, comical, frog-like face and at once seated himself at Malone's desk.

"Anything I can do?" he grinned.

The thin-lipped one, hat back of his head, snapped:

"Quiet, Sam!"

"Mr. James Brewster don't believe in paying his debts," said Malone. "I got his cheque for thirteen seventy-five, which he has had the nerve to stop. I want you boys to salt him down a bit—he's too fresh. You know, Diamond—just learn him how to write a good cheque."

Thin lips moved in a kind of snarl.

"Okay. Where does he live?"

"Circle House, top terrace."

Diamond, hands in his pockets, turned his cold eyes towards his fellow thug.

"Come on, Sam—we'll give Master What's-his-name the once over. So long, Malone. Consider it done."

Malone watched them out of his room, nodding to himself. He went light-heartedly down to the dance hall where a tall, dark, pretty girl was smiling her thanks for the applause still sounding from the crowded tables. She caught at Malone's arm.

"A fine thing! Didn't come to listen to my new number!"

"Duty, Helen. Duty first." Malone gave her a fond glance. "Come over here." He drew her aside. "There's something I got to settle with you. Will you be my wife?"

She still held on to his arm. "Listen, Marty, I've told you how I feel."

"I know. But it's how I feel, see? Do you like Mike O'Mara better than me?"

"Let's dance," she said. "I like this time, anyways."

"I'll never give up wanting you, Helen, till I'm counted out," Malone told her as they jiggled along the crowded dance floor. He suddenly glanced down at his clothes. "I must get changed—you being all dressed up so grand."

She shook her head.

"Stay as you are. The others won't sport glad rags. How can they—Mike and Joe being policemen, and Jerry a priest?"

Malone gave a great laugh. "Ain't it funny—Jerry Donovan a sky pilot! And Mike and Joe turned cops—and you a great cabaret artist! I'm the only one who's still a scallywag!"

Webster came to them, stopping their foxtrot.

"Mr. Michael O'Mara on the 'phone, sir, to say they'll be held up awhile. They've had an emergency call." He added apologetically: "And it's raining and blowing terribly, sir."

Malone laughed. "Not your fault, Webster, that it's raining, huh? Did Mike say where they've gone?"

"Yes, sir—a call to the Circle House. It seems that the big electric sign on the roof broke loose in the wind and fell on a gentleman."

Malone's smile lessened a trifle.

"Some feller passing by—that's just too bad!" He went on with their dance, holding his partner as if she were almost too precious to touch. "I wish you could make up your mind, Helen," he muttered. "I'm sure fond of you. I'd always do my best."

Two well-set-up young men in dark lounge suits drove up to the Cigarette Club an hour later. The porter came to their taxi with a large umbrella widely spread.

"Private entrance, gents. Horrible night—follow me, please."

He hurried them through the streaming rain to what seemed a solid foundation stone in the great building. He pressed a hidden spring and the stone, merely a painted wooden surface, rolled inwards, revealing a low square gap in the wall through which they entered to a small stairway. They ran up the stairs and came to the back of Malone's office, where, almost at once, they heard his big voice at the main door:

"Hi, yah! What ho, gang!"

The door burst open to let in Malone and Helen. The four friends stood still, grinning as they raised their right arms—thumb and forefinger touching to make a round "O" sign.

"Well, well!" cried Malone. "Ain't it good, meeting you again, cops!"

The two young policemen lowered their arms and came forward to grasp hands with him and the girl. The elder one whispered to her:

"The real McCoy. And prettier than ever!"

"You wanted to turn me out of the gang, Mike," Helen laughed.

"Where's Jerry Donovan?" Joe O'Mara asked.

"Expecting him every minute," answered Malone. "What's this about a feller being hurt outside Circle House?"

Joe O'Mara spoke darkly.

"Murdered, you mean! I went up to look at the gear which ought to have held up the electric sign. One of the stanchions had been part cut through. The sign was waiting for a puff of wind to blow it down and kill the man beneath just as he was going out."

"Going out?" Malone echoed. "You mean he lived there?"

"Yeah. Playboy guy named Brewster," said Joe, while his brother cried:

"Oh, can all shop! This is a party—and we don't want any budding Sherlock Holmeses around. Joe's got a snoping fit on—drop it, Joe!"

The younger O'Mara muttered: "Okay. But I'm going back later to have another look at that stanchion."

Malone's smiles had gone. He stood there awkwardly, his big frame hunched up. He suddenly pulled himself together.

"Say, I'm forgetting! How about a little drink?"

"Lead me to it!" Mike laughed.

Glasses were filled and raised on high.

"Cheers," said Malone in a rather subdued way. They were drinking to each other when the head waiter opened the door to announce:

"The Reverend Jeremiah Donovan!"

An upstanding, pleasant, clean-shaven young man in clerical attire entered. He was greeted with great enthusiasm.

"How's everybody?" he inquired cheerily. "No need to ask! No, thanks, Marty—no cocktail for me. Half-glass of sherry."

The head waiter at the door reappeared.

"Dinner is served, Miss McCoy and gentlemen."

After dinner they adjourned to Malone's parlour. They stood around the piano, and, when Mike had seated himself beside Helen at the instrument, they sang in fairly good style "Auld lang syne."

"I've got to be hurrying along, Helen and pals all," Jerry excused himself. "A sermon to prepare."

Joe O'Mara moved across to Malone.

"And I must be going. I've a little business to attend to."

Malone walked with them to the main entrance of the club. When Joe had gone the big fellow thrust a folded paper into Jerry's hand.

"What's this, Marty?"

"Look, Jerry, it's about that West Side Boys' Club of yours. I've had a good year and I thought the kids could do with a gymnasium."

The priest glanced at the cheque.

"Five thousand dollars! Why, Marty—"

He hesitated, a cloud on his pleasant face. "I'm afraid I can't accept it, Marty. You see—"

"Don't say that!" Malone broke in. "It's honest money—I'm not a gaolbird, Jerry. You don't approve of this place, I know; but don't turn down what'll keep the kids off the streets. Think of it, old man—punching-bags, hot and cold shower-baths, boxing gloves, bars—not the sort I have here. Lockers and dressing-rooms. Oh, Jerry, take it, my dear pal of old!"

Donovan nodded as he put the cheque in his pocket.

"I guess you're speaking from the heart, Marty. And I don't forget you saved us all. You showed us that boys' mischief might easily lead to—something else. I'll take it and use it to the best of my ability. I'll call it the 'Martin Malone Gym.' Good-night, old friend."

Joe Goes on an Adventure

MALONE went back to his other guests. Downstairs, the little orchestra was discoursing jazz music and many couples were dancing. In a very private side room the roulette wheel was in full swing, much money being staked and won—and lost. It was a lively, prosperous place, this Cigarette Club.

Malone told Webster on his way up: "Get Diamond over here right away. And let me know when he arrives."

Back in his offices, he asked Helen and Mike:

"Like to dance, wouldn't you? Get going, then—make a night of it."

He was just his old self; confident, strong and full of life. But, left alone, his smile faded and a worried look was in his dark eyes. Presently Webster came up.

"That—er—gentleman is here, sir—with his friend."

"Show 'em up," Malone ordered. Diamond, thin-lipped and cold as ice, walked in with Sam at his heels.

"Don't get in a lather, Marty!" Diamond said at once. "It just happened. Maybe we were a little rough, but you didn't say he had a weak ticker."

Sam, with a smirk, added:

"And we covered it all up. Made it look as if the sign had fallen and couked him out."

"Murder isn't in my line," Malone said fiercely. "I never told you to go and kill him."

"I'm sorry," Diamond shrugged.

"You're sorry, huh?" Malone stormed.

"Yeah, because you won't collect that cheque. See here, Marty," Diamond went on. "The wind was blowing a gale—and that sign was creaking a lot just outside his window. To make it look good I got him down to the door and Sam helped the sign to tumble. Personally, it seemed a good gag."

Malone snapped his fingers.

"It was marvellous. You would pick out a way to involve the Emergency Squad, with two of my best pals in it. Let me tell you one of 'em's on to it—found the cut staunchion."

Diamond glared at his fellow-thug.

"Cut? I told you to spread the wire strands. You fool!"

Sam, unmoved, only grinned.

"Let's go back and fuse the cut with a blowpipe. Then who's to know?"

"Get to it, you dumb idiots!" Malone growled. "By the way, where's that cheque?"

"Brewster's?" queried Diamond.

"Oh, I burned it. No use keeping it. Dangerous for all of us." He gave Malone a dirty look. "Okay—we'll get it right this time."

Joe O'Mara had gone to Circle House, after signing off at H.Q. of the Emergency Squad. Sergeant Enders told him that no further reports had come in and that he was to forget all about that electric sign fall.

"Stop playing detective, Joe. Leave

"Now listen, Mike," began Marty, "you've got it all wrong—" detecting to the precinct boys. They've been and are satisfied Brewster met his death by accident."

Joe said nothing, but thought a lot. He was sure the stanchion had been cut or sawn. He was going to have another look, despite the rain. The doorman at Circle House passed him through—merely remarking that two Press men had gone up to Brewster's flat.

"But they can't get in," he added smirkingly. "Door is locked and sealed."

Joe went up the stairs, frowning. These newspaper boys were every sort of trouble to the police. He thought so all the more when he found the door seal broken.

He tried the handle—yes, they were in all right. He crossed the dark hall, entered the parlour and could tell, by the current of cold air, that the window was open. He stepped out on the leads cautiously into the streaming rain and wind.

Two men were at the broken sign gear, bending over it. Although in deep shadow they were revealed to him by the upfling of the street lights. Joe stood very still, trying to see what they were at.

One man had a blowpipe, the other a short-handled hammer. They were not members of the Press, nor could they be plumbers mending the sign. No one may touch anything after a door has been sealed by the police.

Joe drew his gun and crept behind them—one of the pair muttered:

"That's got it. I guess we're all serene now."

"That's what you think," said Joe quietly. He covered them with his gun as they turned startled, rain-swept faces towards him. One of them suddenly ducked as Joe moved forward over the slipperly leads—a swift grab at his foot by the fellow who had ducked brought Joe down with a crash, and the gun flew out of his hands.

The pair made a dash for the open window, but Joe was up and at them like a flash. A three-handed desperate fight began, in which Diamond was knocked down sideways.

Sam got Joe by the throat; they struggled in a fierce silence, Joe gradually working free. He raised his fist for a smashing punch in that frog-like face when Diamond came back at him, and Sam got the young policeman again—this time around the middle. With surprising strength he lifted and flung Joe clear of the gear right over the leads to fall headlong into the street, five floors below.

Malone had stepped out into the rain, after seeing off the last of his guests and had hailed a taxi. He planned to go to Circle House, but the taxi was stopped just short of it by a policeman. There was a crowd gathered round the doorway of Circle House, and, as Malone elbowed his way through it, he met a squad of ambulance men carrying a stretcher on which lay a covered-up shape. The officer in charge, recognising Malone, saluted.

"Horrible thing happened just now—one of our boys killed. He fell right off the roof leads up there. Decent young fellow named O'Mara."

Marty recoiled as if struck.
"O'Mara? You don't mean—"
"Joe O'Mara, sir, the younger of two brothers in the Emergency. Make way, please, folks—make way!"

When Rogues Fall Out

MIKE O'MARA had it out with the inspector; but got nowhere. His chief told him:

October 1st, 1933.

"We have checked and double-checked every angle in regard to your brother's death. There is no evidence whatever that he met with foul play."

"I've told the precinct what Joe found at Circle House," put in Mike heatedly. "The stanchion was clean cut."

The inspector rose from his desk. "There was no cut stanchion. It was just a break with frayed wires rusted in the rain." He gave O'Mara a nod of dismissal. "The case is closed."

Mike came down to the court entrance hall where Helen was waiting. He told her:

"Stone-walled. The case is closed." Helen spoke with feeling.

"Mike, you ought to drop it—don't let this become an obsession. Come out into the air and let's be reasonable."

Mike answered through set teeth: "I'm going to see this thing through."

They walked in silence awhile; then Mike pulled himself together.

"Forgive me, Helen, for being so lumpy. I'll drive you to the Cigarette Club and try to forget things."

While they were getting out of his police car a shattering explosion sounded, followed by a tinkling smash of glass. One of Malone's windows had been blown out by a bomb.

At once there was a scattering of people on the side walk; then, alarm past, a crowd gathered round. Malone came out, very annoyed.

"Get inside, Helen—I'll come to you presently," he told her, then went in with Mike to where the house detective was examining some charred objects held gingerly in his hands.

"What's left of a time bomb, sir," he stated.

Marty looked for himself, growled and grunted.

"Tell 'em to clear up." He strode along to the dance floor, calling out:

"Carry on, ladies and gentlemen! No one's hurt—nothing is wrong!" Then turned to Mike. "See you later."

He went to Helen's dressing-room and rapped:

"Carry on, Helen. Give 'em your song and dance."

Presently Webster came to him, nervously apologetic.

"Excuse me, sir—I must tell you that when I came along the corridor this early morning I saw Mr. Diamond and that other person talking to the painters. And, although there's no harm done here that isn't covered by insurance, sir—the jeweller's shop down street has just been cleaned out from the back. It seems they ran out to see what had happened here—"

Malone's smashed a great fist into the open palm of his other hand.

"Jim Diamond, huh? Mightier guessed it!"

He dashed for his hat and went along to Diamond's hide-out; waiting there in a white heat of rage.

Friends Fall Out

A DAY later Father Donovan came to O'Mara's apartment in reply to a telephone-call. Mike was dressed in plain clothes and greeted him with:

"Sorry I rang you, Jerry. I've got to go out."

Donovan glanced at the gun in Mike's hand.

"Is that necessary?"

"Yeah." O'Mara's mouth was set in hard lines. "I got to see Malone. What would you say if I told you he was a thief?"

"I'd say you were crazy."

"Crazy? Think back, Jerry—a bunch of kids raiding a warehouse. Remember what he did to distract attention? Started a fire. Well, he's pulling the same gag—yesterday had a bomb thrown in his windows, so as to cover up a robbery down the street."

"I don't believe it," Donovan told him. "Nor do you."

O'Mara thrust the gun into his pocket and pulled out a letter. He gave the ill-scrawled thing to Donovan, who read it aloud:

"You know what happens to welschers. Brewster wouldn't pay, stopped his cheque. So Malone had him put on the spot. Your brother found out—so he was knocked off, too.—A FRIEND."

Donovan put the letter down. "A friend? An enemy, Mike."

"No!" cried O'Mara fiercely. "I believe it—I know it. Marty knew that Joe suspected—and it's right that Brewster lost a pile at the Cigarette Club—I've got the cheque he stopped. What was Marty doing out in the rain that night? Right at the moment Joe was killed? Who knew that Joe was bound to be going to the Circle House to verify the cut stanchion? Malone, of course!"

Donovan spoke quietly. "Give me that gun, Mike."

"I will not! Get out of my way, Jerry."

"You're not going there. Give me that gun."

They faced each other, O'Mara flushed with anger, Donovan very pale. Mike spoke hoarsely:

"You're asking for it, Jerry—"

And struck out at his friend. The priest parried the blow and shot out a clenched fist that caught O'Mara on the chin, knocking him backwards flat on his back; then, without hesitation, Donovan stooped and took the pistol from Mike's pocket.

"Sorry, Mike," he muttered, and left O'Mara to get back his scattered senses by himself.

Donovan hurried off to the Cigarette Club. The doorman told him that Malone was in his office.

"Don't let in O'Mara if he comes along," Donovan ordered.

Five minutes later Mike drove up. He threatened the doorman with a gun—he had managed to get another—and the doorman had to let him in. He rushed up to Malone's room, where he found Donovan with Marty.

"Stand aside, Jerry!" came the sharp command, but the priest remained between the two men, steady and cool. He said, over his shoulder:

"Put that gun away, Mike."

"Now, listen, Mike," began Marty. "You've got it all wrong—"

"I've got it straight," Mike checked him. "And this is Joe's gun. It's going to avenge him."

Donovan turned about, still between them.

"I said—put that gun away!"

An official voice sounded from the back door.

"Turn around, mister, and turn slow. And gimme that gun."

It was the policeman on point duty. Beside him was the almost frantic doorman, shouting:

"He forced his way in! He was going to kill the boss!"

Malone stepped forward.

"It's all right, officer. O'Mara's an old friend. It's just a bit of fun."

But Mike at the door, gunless now, wouldn't have it.

The Concluding Chapters Of:

Prisoners

AT Dupray's instructions the outlaws set their shoulders against the massive crag that was balanced so precariously on the edge of the terrace-like trail, and in an instant the huge rock was tumbling into space.

Below, in the very mouth of the box-canyon, little Kit Carson was seated in the saddle of his diminutive pony and was watching Jamison, Bowie, Davy Crockett and their fellow pioneers struggling up that part of the ravine wall which was possible of ascent. His attention was wholly confined, indeed, to that swarm of resolute men who were bent on reaching the ledge occupied by the Dupray gang, and for an instant it seemed as if he and his horse must be crushed to pulp under the impact of the falling crag that the renegades had dislodged.

In the nick of time, however, Kit chanced to switch his eyes towards that portion of the trail on which the crag had stood, and he saw the enormous stone hurtling from aloft. Next moment he gave vent to a sharp cry of alarm, and, digging his heels into his mount's flanks in the same moment, he sent the animal bounding forward into the depths of the canyon.

He was scarcely clear of the ravine's narrow entrance when the crag smashed down on the spot where he had been located, completely blocking the elf.

Meanwhile two of the Jamison party had almost gained the summit of the slope which gave access to the position held by the outlaws. These two were Jim Bowie and Davy Crockett, and, more agile than their comrades and more lightly clad, they were well ahead of the rest of the attacking force when they scrambled between the smaller boulders that dotted the rim of the terrace trail.

Hardly had they reached the broad, rock-strewn ledge when they saw Clark Stuart lying half-stunned there, with Topek, Dupray's Indian servitor, standing over him in hostile attitude.

Clark's felt sombrero had spared him the full force of the blow that had stretched him on the ground, but his hat had rolled aside and Topek was preparing to strike again with the chunk of stone he was clutching in his bronze fist. But before the Indian could bring down his uplifted arm Davy Crockett shot him through the body, and next second the Redskin was keeling over in a lifeless heap.

Immediately after Davy's gun had spoken Escobedo Dupray and his surviving accomplices were upon him and Jim Bowie, and, though the two friends battled like Titans, they were borne to the dust by weight of numbers and were quickly made secure. Then, at a sharp command from Santa Fe's deposed lieutenant governor, the renegades opened fire on the rest of the Jamison band, who were now only thirty or forty paces from the terrace that fronted the outlaw hide-away.

Crouching amongst the boulders, the bandits held a positional advantage that off-set the numerical superiority of the attackers, and under the withering blasts of gunfire directed at them, the men on the slope gave way—despite the exhortations of Jamison. Nevertheless, the wagon boss succeeded in rallying them near the foot of the declivity, and, although they had suffered heavy casualties, he inspired them with a determination to stage a fresh onset in the hope of carrying the renegades' line of defence by storm.

It was an onset that might have proved effective, but it was not destined to take place there and then, for up on the terrace Dupray resorted to a device that balked it.

Turning to his henchman Zamora and two or three other members of the outlaw band, he spoke to them crisply. "Get hold of Clark Stuart," he ordered. "Tie his hands behind his back and set him up in full view of the Jamison crowd, together with those two men Bowie and Crockett. Hurry now—there is no time to lose."

His instructions were speedily obeyed, and within a few seconds Clark, Davy Crockett and Jim Bowie were being forced towards the very rim of the terrace, the first-named still dazed as a result of the blow that the ill-fated Topek had dealt him.

Exposed to the gaze of their friends below, they were compelled to stand there with the guns of the renegades trained upon them. Then, in the silence that now settled upon the box-canyon and its barren walls, Dupray raised his voice and called to Jamison, keeping under cover as he did so.

"Jamison," he sang out, "I am advising you and your companions down there to hold your fire and remain where you are. Let one of you discharge a single shot or make the slightest attempt to climb to this trail, and we will retaliate by slaying Stuart, Bowie and Crockett in cold blood."

The encompassing slopes and cliff-faces of the ravine took up the echoes of his voice, and as those echoes subsided a deathly quiet settled upon the locality—a quiet broken only by a scuffle of feet as a boyish figure suddenly hastened across the bed of the canyon.

EPISODE 12:—

"Human Targets"

It was the figure of Kit Carson. He had dismounted and left his pony beside the bunch of horses from which Jamison and the other pioneers had alighted some time previously, and with an expression of acute anxiety on his youthful countenance he ran forward to join the wagon boss and his men.

"Mr. Jamison," Kit panted, as he came up, "Mr. Jamison, don't let them outlaws kill Davy an' Clark and Jim Bowie! Don't let 'em do it, Mr. Jamison!"

The lad was almost in tears, his agitation testifying to his deep affection for those three frontiersmen up there whose lives were in jeopardy, and it was with an involuntary movement of sympathy and understanding that Jamison drew the little fellow close to him with his free arm.

"Son," the wagon boss declared huskily, "Clark an' Davy Crockett and Jim Bowie ain't gonna come to no harm if we can help it. They mean just as much to me as they mean to you, and you can depend on it that we'll make no move that's calculated to cost 'em their lives."

He glanced around amongst his men, and addressed them collectively—in a tone that was intended for the outlaws' ears as well as theirs.

"You heard Dupray, boys," he announced loudly, "and we're callin' a truce. We stay where we are, and we hold our fire. Is that clear?"

There was a mutter of assent from his companions. As for Dupray and the rogues on the terrace away above, they exchanged glances of smug satisfaction. Then the leader of the bandits called out to the party on the canyon's bed once more.

"Senor Jamison," he hailed, "we are collecting our loot and departing from here, and I warn you not to interfere with us, or it will be just too bad for these three prisoners whom we are holding as hostages."

"I hear you, Dupray," was Jamison's answer, "an' we'll make no play against you so long as Clark Stuart and Bowie and Crockett don't meet with any hurt at the hands o' you or your side-kickers. But get this, an' get it straight—if you harm a hair o' their heads we'll hound you down mercilessly and wipe out every mother's son of you."

Dupray offered no response to that threat. He merely turned to Zamora and his cronies and spoke to them complacently.

"Make your way to the cache and start moving the loot," he said. "Take it through the cave and out via the tunnel that leads to the north side of the ridge."

The cache to which he had referred was situated at a point about a hundred yards along the terrace. It was a black, yawning aperture in a rock-face that rose abruptly from the trail, and in approaching it Zamora and the gangsters had to expose themselves to the view of the Jamison party—a circumstance which they did not relish.

Seeing them hesitate, Dupray made a gesture of impatience.

"Come, do as I say," he snapped. "You have nothing to dread from those fellows down there in the canyon. They won't try to pick you off for fear of what would happen to their three friends if they did."

"I hope you're right," Zamora breathed. "But if they double-crossed us—"

"They won't dare to double-cross us," Dupray interrupted viciously. "Go on, get busy. In the meantime, I'll look after Stuart, Bowie and Crockett."

Tentatively Zamora began to proceed along the terrace, and the remainder of Dupray's hirelings edged after him in single file, passing the cave that was the gang's lair and wending their way onward in the direction of the fissure where the spoils of many a raid and hold-up were stored. Nor was it long before the line of crooks were within the scope of the Jamison party's vision, as a section of the trail between cave and cache was devoid of cover.

No shot challenged the gangsters, however, and without incident they reached their objective and vanished from sight. Then after an interval they reappeared and began to retrace their steps, each rogue being heavily laden with plunder.

They made tracks for the cave with that first consignment of spoil, and at the mouth of the hide-out Zamora directed a glance at Dupray. A revolver grasped in one fist, the latter was covering Bowie, Crockett and Clark Stuart—the three captives being visible to their friends below, though the Spaniard was not, for he was taking no chances and was standing well back.

"Do you think it wise that we should leave you alone with the hostages, Dupray?" Zamora queried.

"I shall be all right, amigo," was the response. "You and your compadres attend to the loot. Tell me, have you got all of it there?"

Zamora shook his head. "No," he said, "but one more trip will see the cache emptied."

A moment later he and his associates were trooping into the cavern, and in a body they marched past the lamp-lit compartment which had served the gang as living quarters. They passed, too, the bunch of horses that belonged to them, and pushed on through the sombre tunnel that had its outlet at the far side of the ridge.

Marching forward along that passage through the strata of the mountain, they had travelled a distance of several hundred yards when they saw daylight ahead of them, and then all at once Zamora halted abruptly, uttering a terse exclamation that brought his accomplices to a standstill behind him. "Stop!" he jerked.

He was peering towards the tunnel's exit, and, staring in the same direction, his cronies espied a familiar figure limned there—a figure attired in buckskin and wearing the plumed head-dress of a Red Indian.

It was the figure of the Painted Stallion the Rider, that mysterious personality who had frustrated the outlaws' plans on so many occasions in the past—that girl who had befriended the men of the Jamison wagon train, and who had to-day revealed to Clark Stuart this rear entrance to the Dupray gang's hide-away.

When Clark had left her she had been mounted on the powerful black and white steed which was her constant companion, and before separating from her he had urged her to remain where she was, out of harm's way, while he investigated the tunnel and satisfied himself that it actually did communicate with the renegades' lair. But the strain and suspense of awaiting his return had proved too irksome for her, and, having slid from her horse, she was now advancing alone into the tunnel.

The stallion could be seen hovering outside the tunnel-mouth, and so far as Zamora and his confederates were concerned its presence was a betrayal of the buckskin clad interloper's identity. "The Rider!" whispered the Dago.

One of the other ruffians laid a hand on his arm.

"Yeah, the Rider sure enough, Zamora! An' unless I'm mistaken that self-same Rider is a girl! Can yuh beat that? It's a dame that's been makin' things tough for us all this long time past."

Zamora's eyes narrowed as he scrutinised the oncoming figure more keenly, and a malicious expression dawned on his swarthy face.

"Por dios!" he muttered. "You are right! A girl it is!"

There was no doubting it. Never had the outlaws been in such close proximity to their inveterate and hitherto mysterious foe, and, though they themselves were at present invisible to the Rider by reason of the gloom that reigned within the tunnel's depths, she was clearly portrayed to their sinister gaze.

"Si," Zamora went on in a low tone, "it is a girl whom we have to deal with, but if I know Escobedo Dupray that fact will not prevail on him to show any mercy. Come on, let's get her and take her to him."

With one accord the bandits let fall the plunder they were carrying, and next second they were bearing down on the Rider, who checked as she heard the swift scuffle of their feet in the darkness before her. Then she saw them loom up out of the shadows, and, recognising them, she uttered a half-stifled cry of alarm and wheeled in an attempt to make her escape.

Ere she could take to her heels the outlaws were upon her, and rough hands seized her, holding her in spite of her frantic efforts to wrench free. Then her arms were forced behind her back, and, her wrists having been lashed together by a kerchief, Zamora rapped out a harsh command.

"Back to the terrace with her, amigos," he ordered. "Dupray is going to enjoy meeting her."

Surrounded by the pack of desperadoes, the Rider was hustled along the tunnel unceremoniously, and after a hurried journey through that inky passage-way she was thrust out on to the ledge where Dupray stood covering Clark Stuart, Bowie and Davy Crockett.

Clark was the first of the quartet to set eyes on the captive girl, and a dismayed ejaculation broke from him as he did so. It was an ejaculation that was echoed by Davy Crockett and Jim Bowie as they, too, recognised her, and then Dupray turned his head.

He looked hard at the young woman who had been propelled forth on to the terrace, and after staring at her piercingly he glanced at the men around her, singling out Zamora.

"Who is this?" he demanded.

His chief henchman answered him grimly:

"The Rider, Dupray," he said. "The Rider of the Painted Stallion. The accursed meddler who has been such a stumbling block to us for the last two or three years."

"The Rider?" Escobedo Dupray reiterated the name in an amazed fashion. "A girl—and a white girl at that?"

"Si, a girl," Zamora rejoined. "We found her skulking in the tunnel-mouth, and the Painted Stallion was not far away. What do we do with her, hein?"

Dupray focused his evil gaze on the Rider and studied her malevolently for a brief space. Then he transferred his attention to Zamora again and indicated Clark, Bowie and Crockett with a nod of his head.

"Line her up with the other prisoners," he instructed.

Zamora caught the girl by the shoulder and sent her reclining across the terrace. She finished up beside Clark, and Dupray juggled significantly with the revolver he was clutching in his fist.

"Now, Zamora," he observed, "you and the men fetch the rest of our loot from the cache."

The gangsters moved off along the trail, filing once more into the view of Jamison and his party, who had seen the Rider totter to the rim of the slope, and within another five minutes Dupray's satellites had brought the remainder of the spoil to the cavern by which they and their leader planned to retreat.

"We've cleaned out the cache, Dupray," Zamora announced. "What now? Do we take the prisoners with us as a guarantee against Jamison and those hombres down there trying to catch up with us?"

Dupray's sallow features seemed to tighten.

"Jamison and his men will not be able to follow us," he stated. "There is gunpowder in our quarters back there in the cave. Plant it in the middle of the cavern and attach a fuse to one of the casks. Don't light that fuse yet, but report to me as soon as you have fixed it."

Zamora set down a strong-box he was carrying, and disappeared into the cave. He was gone for fully a quarter of an hour, at the end of which time he showed up on the terrace again.

"Everything is set, amigo," he told Dupray.

"Good!" the other Spaniard rejoined. "Now we can make ourselves scarce. We'll put a match to that fuse, mount our horses and ride for the north outlet with the last of our spoil. We should be close to the far end of the tunnel by the time the blast takes place. We'll be well out of the danger zone, at any rate."

He paused, and smiled a twisted smile. "Now that the entrance to the box-canyon has been blocked," he drawled,

"there will be no question of Jamison and his party pursuing us when we blow up the cave-mouth. They can climb over the crag that we dislodged, but they will not be able to take their horses with them, and can only regain open ground on foot. That means we need have no fear of them circling round the ridge in time to intercept us, and we can make a clear getaway and seek fresh headquarters at our leisure."

Over on the rim of the terrace, Clark Stuart looked bitterly at Crockett and Bowie, who, like himself and the Rider, were standing with their hands tied securely behind their backs.

"Dupray and those rats will make a clear getaway all right," he said in an undertone. "Gee, if I only had myself to think about I'd give Jamison and the boys a hail an' tell 'em to come on up, regardless of what happened to me."

"If I only had myself to think about I'd feel like doin' the same," breathed Davy Crockett.

"Me, too," put in Bowie. "But Jamison an' the boys would stay where they was. You can lay to that. They'd never consent to sacrifice us by tryin' to rush the gang."

It was at this juncture that Dupray interrupted the brief discussion of the three frontiersmen. He had not heard what had passed between them, but the mutter of their voices had reached his ears, and he was eyeing them through contracted lids.

"My friends," he drawled in mocking accents, "it is indeed gratifying to me to see you lined up there. Clark Stuart, Bowie, Crockett and the Rider of the Painted Stallion—in one way or another all four of you have caused me and my men a vast amount of trouble. But I fancy that you realise now you were playing a losing game when you matched wits with Esecobedo Dupray, hein?"

Clark answered the Spaniard. The expression on the big scout's handsome features was one of defiance, and he spoke in a strain that was grimly prophetic.

"Dupray," he said, "right now you're congratlatin' yourself on havin' worned your way out of a tight spot, and I'll grant you that it looks as if you're on the winning end of the deal. But you're gonna fall in the finish, and fall hard—like enough with a noose around your neck and a gallows trap-door under your feet. You, Esecobedo Dupray, some day Law and Order will catch up with you, and the Trade Treaty between the Mexican Republic and the United States' Government will go through over the wreck of this bandit organisation of yours."

The Spaniard's upper lip curled in an ugly sneer, and he addressed the younger man scoffingly.

"You think so?" he taunted. "Well, I have an idea that whatever happens in the future I shall never bid farewell to this world with a hangman's rope against my throat. In any event, I am certain of one thing, Clark Stuart. Neither you nor your two compatriots who are standing there with you will live to see my finish, whether I die by violence or otherwise."

With a sudden change of mien he brought up the revolver he was holding, and, his face assuming a look of savage hostility, he took a step nearer to the prisoners, still being careful however to avoid exposing himself to the view of Jamison and the latter's followers.

"Stuart," he added viciously, "you and Bowie and Crockett have served your purpose as far as I am concerned. I have used you to keep Jamison and his crowd at bay, but now I have no further need of you, and your hour is at hand. Yes, amigos, your hour is at hand, and it will be a pleasure to blast each one of you out of existence with this gun of mine!"

"Señor Stuart," Don Luis told Clark, "I am very happy that circumstances have permitted me to sign this much-deserved trade agreement between your country and mine."

Nemesis

THE heavy revolver grasped tightly in his fingers, Escobedo Dupray ran his evil gaze over the countenances of his intended victims, scrutinising the three men intently and watching perhaps for some dawning hint of apprehension. But if he expected to see any sign of fear he was disappointed, for not one of the trio flinched, and the eyes that met his were steadfastly impassive.

Clark Stuart spoke:

"Go ahead, Dupray," he said. "Get it over with. But let me tell you something before you cut loose with that 'iron.' Jamison warned you a while back that he and the boys would hound you and your gang down and wipe out every mother's son of you if any harm came to us at your hands, and if I know anything of Jamison he'll make good that threat."

The Spaniard favoured Clark with a sneer once more.

"Jamison, eh?" he remarked. "Carai, do you think I am scared of Jamison? I only hope I have the opportunity of meeting him at some future date so that I can serve him as I am about to serve you—for he, too, has been a thorn in my side. Indeed, it is my one regret that he is absent from this little farewell party we are staging up here—although the presence of the Rider of the Painted Stallion more than compensates for the fact that he is not included in it. It will be good to know that she will never interfere with my plans again."

Clark stiffened at that, and the colour seemed to drain from his cheeks.

"You mean—you're condemning her to share the same fate as Bowie and Crockett and me?"

"And why not, Senor Stuart?" Clark gritted his teeth.

"Dupray," he lunged at the black-guard, "I knew you for a low-down coyote, but I figured there were some things that even a man of your calibre wouldn't set your hand to—and shooting a girl in cold blood was one of them."

A look of devilish amusement crossed the sallow features of Santa Fe's one-time Lieutenant Governor, and in that moment Clark wished desperately that his hands were free so that he could have driven his bunched knuckles into the scoundrel's grinning mouth.

"You have a deep regard for the Rider, eh, Stuart?" the Spaniard said softly. "Well, amigo, do not misjudge me. I am not altogether blind to the charms of a pretty face myself, and because of that I will spare her the distress of watching me make an end of you and Crockett and Bowie. In short, I will let her take first place."

The Rider was staring at him in horror, and as he deliberately levelled the revolver at her she closed her eyes and waited for the smash of the shot, believing that she was doomed. Nor was Dupray trifling. The man was in deadly earnest, and was fully resolved to take vengeance upon her for the campaign she had waged against his outlaw organisation, and in another instant she must have fallen under a bullet from the six-gun he was clutching.

But even as Escobedo Dupray's right forefinger was curling around the trigger of the weapon Clark Stuart jerked himself towards the Rider of the Painted Stallion to thrust her out of the line of fire.

It was a forlorn impulse on his part—an impulse which seemed destined at best to achieve nothing except some brief delay in the carrying out of the Spaniard's infamous purpose. And certainly it brought about such a delay, for Clark's shoulder came into contact with the girl a split second before Dupray discharged the gun, and she went reeling along the terrace for a distance of several yards as the forty-five belched flame from its muzzle.

Clark himself was almost drilled by the leaden slug that had been meant for her, and had he been drawn up to his full height he would assuredly have been struck by it. But he was in a lunging posture, and, ripping through the crown of his sombrero and grazing his scalp, the bullet merely snatched the hat from his head and cast it down the slope behind him.

Almost simultaneously a chorus of shouts arose from the canyon below, where Kit Carson and the men of the wagon train had heard the report of Dupray's revolver, and the stentorian voice of Jamison rang out above that medley of cries.

"Those skunks up there are gonna massacre Clark an' the others!" the leader of the pioneer freighters roared. "Come on, fellers, up the slope! The Dupray gang are goin' back on their bargain, but they'll answer to us for it!"

On the terrace aloft the former Lieutenant Governor of Santa Fe heard those words as clearly as did Clark and the latter's companions in misfortune, and the Spaniard quickly trained his forty-five on the U.S. agent from Washington.

"You don't want to see the Rider shot down, eh?" he snarled. "All right, Stuart, have it your own way. You'll be the first to go. But, believe me, when the Jamison crowd arrive here they'll find Bowie, Crockett and the Rider lying dead as well!"

It was as he uttered that terse speech that a movement in the nearby cave-mouth attracted the attention of the girl whose execution Clark had deferred, and all at once she made out a familiar form. It was the form of the Painted Stallion—the half-tamed horse that had borne her so faithfully over the trackless wilds of the West in her strange career—and as she clapped eyes on the animal she realised that it must have wandered into the tunnel from the north side of the ridge and found its way to the renegade hide-out, perhaps sensing that she was in danger.

Dupray and his hirelings did not observe the creature, and neither did Clark, Bowie and Davy Crockett. The Rider alone perceived the stallion, and on a sudden a gleam of hope appeared in her eyes.

Next moment she was calling out to the bronc in the Comanche Indian dialect—calling out in a tone of imperative command—and at the sound of her voice the horse immediately bounded forward from the mouth of the cavern.

The scuffle of its feet caused Dupray's accomplices to whip round them, but in the very instant that they turned they were scattered by the Painted Stallion's onrush and were thrown to the ground with the plunder they were carrying. Meanwhile Escobedo Dupray had likewise wheeled, and, planted in the path of the horse, he let out a frightened exclamation and tried to bring his gun to bear on it.

He fired the revolver, but his shot went wide—whistled past the stallion's left flank and served only to enrage the creature and to mark out the gang-leader as a foe who must be stamped down. And then, rearing up on its hind-legs, the bronc lashed at the Spaniard with its forefeet.

A flying hoof struck Dupray's wrist and snapped it, so that the revolver lie had been gripping fell to the dust from nerveless fingers. At the same time the luckless man rent the air with a scream of pain—a scream that ended in a blood-curdling gasp as a second blow from the stallion caught him in the chest and stove in his breastbone.

Dupray measured his length, his body rigid with agony, his face distorted and ghastly, and as he lay there the Painted Stallion bestrode him, trampling, trampling, battering the prone wretch till the crook was smothered in dirt and blood, and his carcass a mangled, unrecognisable thing that bobbed and recoiled with grotesque motions under every impact of those relentless hoofs.

As for Dupray's confederates, they were scrambling up in an alarmed fashion, but so great was their disorder that they scarcely seemed to know which way to turn once they had gained their feet, and, colliding with one another, they presented to the eyes of Clark, Bowie, Davy Crockett and the Rider a spectacle that portrayed tempestuous indecision.

Several had a mind to pump lead at the stallion; others, seeing at a glance that Santa Fe's deposed Lieutenant Governor was already beyond human aid, were bent on making off through the cave; Zamora, with shrill tongue, called upon every man to open fire on the Jamison party, who were swarming up to the terrace. But Zamora's cries failed to rally the gangsters, and merely had the effect of adding to their confusion, and the rogues were still in a state of disorganisation when the Painted Stallion took it into its head to abandon Dupray's shattered remains and launch itself at the milling band of outlaws.

Once more they were scattered by the bronc's onslaught, and they were dodging to and fro in a panic when Jamison and the men of the wagon train surged on to the terrace.

The renegades made a belated attempt to show fight now, but the attacking pioneers poured a volley into them at close range, and all but three of the bandits were annihilated by that crashing blast of gunplay, Zamora being among those who dropped lifeless before the storm of lead.

The three survivors took to their heels and tried to dash for the cave, but were shot down ere they could reach the darkness of it and the horses that were waiting there. In the meantime the Painted Stallion appeared to have gone berserk, and looked as if it were ready to assail Jamison and his men, but at a word from the girl who was known as the Rider it became docile, and it was standing motionless on the trail when she and her fellow-prisoners were released.

Their hands free, the rescued captives moved over to the trampled body of Dupray with Jamison and the rest of the freighters, and they were looking down on the dead gang-leader when little Kit Carson arrived on the scene.

"Well," Clark Stuart was saying as the boy joined the group, "you can call it Nemesis, retribution or any other term that suits your fancy, men, but this coyote has met his just deserts."

Jim Bowie spoke solemnly.

"Yeah, you're right, Clark," he stated. "He had a mighty cruel end—worse than he would've had if he'd finished up with a noose around his neck, I guess. But nobody's gonna feel sorry he's handed in his checks, along with the rest of his cut-throat crew."

The country between here and Independence is well rid o' varmints such as Escobedo Dupray."

Seated at his desk, quill pen in hand, Mexico's new representative in Santa Fe, Don Luis Alvarez, was attaching his signature to a document that embraced the clauses of the Trade Treaty which Clark Stuart had been authorised to negotiate on behalf of the U.S. Government.

The stalwart frontiersman was present in Don Luis' study. So were Jamison, Bowie, Davy Crockett and Kit Carson, and, the Treaty having been ratified, Clark's companions directed congratulatory glances at the frontiersman as he received the document from the Mexican official.

"Senor Stuart," Don Luis told Clark, "I am very happy that circumstances have permitted me to sign this much-desired trade agreement between your country and mine, and I might add that I am immensely grateful to you and your friends for having stamped out the Dupray gang, whose presence was a barrier to our negotiations."

He paused, and turned towards Jamison.

"And you, senor," he proceeded, "you can rest assured that you and all other lawful American traders will receive adequate protection against the Indians while you are in Mexican territory. The Indians I can guarantee to hold in check with the troops under my control, now that Escobedo Dupray and his renegades have been removed."

Jamison smiled, and toyed with an arrow that he was holding in his hand. It was a whistling arrow from the quiver of the girl known as the Rider of the Painted Stallion.

"I reckon we won't have much to fear from the Indians, your Excellency," the wagon boss stated. "I understand from Clark Stuart here that a certain little lady who exercises a heap of influence over the Redskins in this section has made it pretty clear to the headmen of the tribes that they're to lay off all Palefaces."

"You mean the Rider," Don Luis murmured. "H'm, I have been hearing about her. The story goes that she was the daughter of an American couple who migrated to this country years ago and who were murdered by Indians during her childhood. It seems that she herself was spared and brought up by the savages, but the memory of her parents' fate persisted in her mind, and when she grew up she resolved to do her utmost to bring peace to the wilds and dispel the hatred between Paleface and Red Man in this frontier province."

Clark broke in on the conversation. "That's right, your Excellency," he mentioned. "She told me she cut adrift from the Indians, took to living alone and gradually built up a reputation for herself among the tribes as a supernatural figure whose word it would be well to obey. Then she started a campaign against the Dupray gang, realising that those renegades were a whole lot worse than the Indians, whom they often incited to massacre and bloodshed."

Don Luis eyed him inquiringly. "You are in her confidence, eh?" he observed. "And what of her murdered father and mother? Does she know who they were? All record of their name and origin seems to have been lost so far as the people of Santa Fe are concerned—except that they were definitely Americans."

Clark leaned forward on the Mexican official's desk.

"The Rider doesn't know her name, your Excellency," he answered. "But I've a rendezvous with her to-morrow and she's takin' me up into the mountains to a spot where she has some trinkets that belonged to her mother—includin' what sounds to me like a miniature in a locket. I'm aimin' to carry those trinkets back to Independence, and once in U.S. territory there's just a chance they'll help me to find out the Rider's identity. She may have relatives that would be willin' to look after her."

Jamison looked at him quickly. "Clark, we're pullin' up stakes for Independence to-morrow mornin'," he ejaculated. "Does this mean you ain't goin' back with us?"

"I've got to deliver this Trade Treaty to Washington, haven't I?" the younger man rejoined. "Sure I'm goin' back with you, Jamison, but I won't be leavin' Santa Fe with the column. I'll catch up with you on the trail. And, by the way, Bowie and Kit Carson tell me they won't be leavin' with the wagon train, either. In fact, they won't be goin' back with you at all."

Davy Crockett grinned sheepishly at Jamison.

"That's right," he said. "I kinda persuaded 'em to stay out here with me. Kit was all for it, and Bowie and me intend ter take the young 'un under our wing. We sorta figure that Kit Carson might make a pretty good scout one o' these days."

Sure enough the Jamison column moved eastward from Santa Fe the following morning without Clark, Kit or Bowie riding in attendance—though, in company with Davy Crockett, Kit and Bowie watched its departure.

Not so Clark Stuart. He was spurring in a northerly direction to keep his rendezvous with the Rider of the Painted Stallion, and when the Jamison wagon train had passed out of view the thoughts of little Kit Carson and his two companions turned upon the project that the U.S. Government agent had elected to undertake.

"I wonder if Clark will trace where the Rider came from and find out her name," Kit mused.

Jim Bowie glanced at the boy in a knowing fashion.

"There's no tellin', son," he drawled, chewing on a wad of tobacco. "But I got a hunch that whether he ever finds out her name or not he'll make it Mrs. Clark Stuart some day or other, for a scen the look in his eyes when he thought Dupray was gonna put a bullet through her."

"DOUBLE DANGER"

"Now I think you're being smart. If you don't mind, I'll turn in. Good night."

Carolyn watched him go. Her mind was made up. She'd have a show at that safe herself. She didn't believe Bob Crane when he said it contained duplicates, and she didn't believe Taylor when he announced his intention of leaving it alone. She might as well do a bit of double-crossing herself.

The Gentleman, having shaken off the adoring Babs and bidden his host good-night, went to his room and switched on the light. Then he stood still in amazement. Sitting on his bed, holding a large revolver, was Roy West, looking very fierce.

"Hallo, Roy," he said easily, "why the pop-gun? Don't tell me the mosquitoes are that bad up here."

Roy approached him angrily. "You can't fool me, even if you have the others! I know what you really are."

Bob frowned.

"You do?"

"I know your kind," snarled Roy accusingly. "You think it's smart to play with the affections of a sweet, innocent girl!"

Bob relaxed and the wary expression went out of his eyes as he tried hard not to smile.

"You mean Babs? Well, I can assure you there's absolutely nothing between us."

"Don't try to lie out of it! I saw you kiss her."

"Well, it doesn't sound very chivalrous," said Bob dryly, "but you saw her kissing me."

"You can't talk like that about her! Why, she's the sweetest, most wonderful girl in the world!"

"And a very idealistic and romantic one, to boot," said Bob. "Roy, she's not in love with me."

"Then why did she kiss you?" Roy scowled.

"Because she thinks she's in love with the Gentleman," said Bob gently, "and she hero-worships anything connected with him. I just happen to write about him, that's all."

"Well, she is kinda batty about those books," muttered Roy indelicately, "and she's always talking about suave, clever burglars—"

"Look," said Bob suddenly, "why don't you be one?"

Roy gaped.

"I don't know anything about being a crook!"

"Neither does Babs, so it shouldn't be difficult to fool her."

Roy waved his gun dangerously.

"Well—hey, that does sound like a pretty swell idea! Thanks, Mr. Crane, you're a regular guy, and any time I can do anything for you—"

Bob grinned, wincing.

"You can put that thing away, if you don't mind."

"I'm sorry. I guess I got you wrong," growled Roy, flushing.

"Don't worry about it," said the Gentleman, ducking as the gun swung in his direction, and Roy, awkwardly apologising, bade him good-night and left. Sighing with relief at the departure of the lethal weapon, Bob Crane sat down on his bed. Just as well he had got Roy out of the way. He expected some excitement during the night.

The first to attack the safe was Taylor. Creeping cautiously into the room, he started as he trod on a loose board just outside the door. By the light of a flashlamp he started on the dial—but he was still fingering it when the board creaked again. With a muttered imprecation he flicked off his light, dashed to the french windows and crouched outside.

He couldn't see the new intruder. It was Carolyn, breathing fast with excitement. She was more successful than Taylor, being on the point of opening the safe when she, too, was interrupted by the creak of the board. Stamping her foot angrily, she tiptoed across the room and crawled under the knee-hole of a desk. In this cramped position she saw Fentriss come in clumsily, knocking into tables and chairs, with a lighted candle in his hand. It was soon obvious the valet was no expert cracksmen.

Carolyn began to yawn as he fiddled interminably with the dial and his candle began to burn low. To her horror she woke with a start and found that she had been asleep. Fentriss was jumping with pain. He had dozed against the safe and the candle had burned down to his hand.

Cursing him, the girl stifled an exclamation of joy when he gave it up as a bad job and crept out of the room.

Swiftly she went to the safe, opened it expertly and took out the jewels. Her eyes gleaming with triumph, she crept out of the room while Taylor still crouched outside.

Bob Crane, dozing on his bed, was awakened by a slight noise. He sat up suddenly.

"Wait a minute! You ought to be careful, walking around like that in your sleep. You're liable to hurt yourself!"

"It's an awful habit," came Carolyn's cool voice. "Even as a tiny baby I used to crawl all over the house in my sleep."

Crane put on his dressing-gown and followed her out on to the balcony.

"I'll bet you were a beautiful baby, and you haven't changed."

"By the way," she drawled, ignoring him, "you were right about those diamonds being the duplicates."

Gravely he shook his head. "You shouldn't have tried to open the safe. You should have believed me."

"Don't Bob," she said with a catch in her voice. "You'll make me feel sorry I—"

"Sorry for what?"

"Well, I hid the duplicates in your room, and I'll see that Theron finds them unless you give me the real diamonds."

She gazed at him wide-eyed, expecting anger; but he only smiled.

"No you won't, because I hid the real ones in your room!"

"You're bluffing!" Carolyn gasped.

"No I'm not."

"You're contemptible!" Furiously she flung the words at him and darted back to her own room. The Gentleman swung back into his room and began a swift search for the duplicates she had planted. Each drawer of the dressing-table came out. Working fast, he found the jewel-case, jammed behind the top one. No sooner had he done so than knocks sounded on his door. He started, put the case into his dressing-gown pocket, and drawled sleepily:

"Yeh?"

"Bob! Open up! The safe's been robbed!"

It was Theron, who had gone to the safe and noted with satisfaction that his trap had been sprung. Taking off his dressing-gown, Bob, rubbing his eyes, let him in.

October 1st, 1933.

"Come on," said Theron, "we've got to rouse the others."

"I'll get some clothes on," said Bob. Theron gave him no chance to get rid of the duplicates.

"Just put on your robe." Shrugging, Bob followed him as he knocked thunderously and went into Roy's room.

"Wake up, Roy!" "G'way," mumbled Roy. "Lemme 'lone."

"Come on, get up," snapped Theron. "Someone has stolen the Konjer diamonds!"

Roy sat up. "What? How did you discover it?" "Never mind that. I want everybody downstairs."

Roy, all excitement now, huddled into his dressing-gown and dashed out after his host. Bob, grinning, seized his chance. Under Roy's bedclothes went the embarrassing case.

The Gentleman Wins

"DAVID, it's preposterous!" said Mrs. Theron, speaking for the rudely awakened group in the library. "Why, Carolyn, Bob, and Roy are our friends, and I'm sure that the servants—"

"I'm sorry, dear," said Theron firmly, "but I'm right. Whichever of you opened the safe left evidence that will convict you. I had a camera focused on the safe from over here." He walked to a bookcase facing it. Carolyn paled slightly, Fentriss gulped, and Taylor frowned as he placed a camera on the table.

"David, how could you take a picture in the dark?"

"Infra-red rays. They're invisible to the human eye, but not to the film. The camera and the rays operated whenever the safe was touched. The rays came from between the books. Now, the guilty party might just as well confess."

Sternly he looked around. Bob caught his valet's eye. Fentriss nodded, winked, and edged to the light-switch near by.

"Come on," snapped Theron. "I have the picture right here. Which one of you—"

Then the women screamed as the lights went out. There was a general mix-up in the darkness. When Theron had snapped on the lights again he swiftly eyed everybody. Babs was clinging to Bob Crane. Roy was sprawling on an overturned chair. Angriely the Commissioner picked up the plate in his handkerchief. It had been wrenched out of the camera.

"Exposed!" he snarled disgustedly. And added wearily: "Well, you can all go back to your rooms."

Bob Crane grinned. Babs looked up at him adoringly.

"Isn't it exciting?"

"You'd better watch Roy," he suggested.

Her eyes widened.

"Why, he couldn't have!"

"You never can tell," said the Gentleman portentously.

Handling the plate carefully, Theron went up to Ainsley's room and told him the events of the night.

"And I didn't have a picture after all."

Ainsley jerked upright.

"You didn't!"

"No," grinned Theron. "It isn't practical. Even with infra-red you have to take a time exposure. Besides, all I wanted was finger-prints, and I got them."

"David, I owe you an apology."

said the jeweller admiringly. "Your plan was sheer genius! You're a brilliant man."

While the Commissioner was dusting the plate with grey powder, Roy West was having the shock of his life. Something hard in his bed soon made itself evident. With amazement he pulled out the jewel-case, and Babs, outside on the terrace, following up the idea put into her head by the Gentleman, saw him in the act. Roy guiltily hid the case as she stepped into the room.

"Roy West, how could you deceive me all this time?"

The youth laughed self-consciously. "Oh, you mean this! I just found it."

"Don't make it worse by lying," said Babs dramatically. "I know you're the Gentleman!"

Roy swallowed hard. "The Gentleman? Are you out of your mind?"

"And to think," she said tragically, "that I'm in love with a crook!"

"Are you in love with me?" gulped Roy, jumping up.

"Don't touch me," she whispered intensely, "not until you've told me about your life of crime."

Roy grinned, then assumed a vicious scowl.

"Well, it seems I started when I was but a mere boy, robbing my little baby brother's bank, and—"

"How dreadful!" gasped Babs, fascinated.

"And stealing pennies from poor old blind men, and— Should I go on?"

Babs shuddered delightedly.

"Oh, go on, please!"

Roy gulped, frowning grimly.

"And then it was a road of crime from one end to the other. I was about sixteen years old when I blew up my first bank. Then I was only Public Enemy No. 18, and in about three years I was Public Enemy No. 13—"

While Babs was drinking in this terrible tale of crime, her father, his face tragic, was handing the plate and a magnifying-glass to Gordon Ainsley.

"Why, there are four different kinds of prints here!"

"What?" roared Ainsley. "Let me congratulate you on being the world's worst jackass!"

"But I didn't think four people would make a grab for it!" protested Theron miserably.

Ainsley stumped to and fro on his plaster cast.

"Think! Ha, if you think you can think, you're labouring under a delusion! If you had any brains you'd have—"

"Now, now, don't get all wrought up. We can still catch him."

"You couldn't catch a pickpocket stealing your own wallet! What you need is a correspondence course on how to become a detective! I'm going back to town. Here, help me to get this anchor off!"

Slumping furiously on the bed, he wrestled with the huge cast. Theron, full of disappointment, helped him.

In the Gentleman's room, Fentriss was urging his boss to make a run for it. Crane smiled.

"I wouldn't think of leaving here. I'm having a very good time."

"I'd hardly call it that, sir," muttered Fentriss. "This place will be overrun with police in an hour."

"Relax, Fentriss. Think of the laughs we'll have. What are you worrying about? We're in the clear."

"I—I—oh, nothing, sir. It's just my nerves, I suppose—"

He broke off with a slight yelp and ducked behind the bed as the door opened. Grim-faced, Taylor came in and glared at the nonchalant Gentleman.

"I want those diamonds,"
 "What diamonds?" said Bob.
 "The ones you took from the safe."
 "You sound very confident," drawled Bob.

"I am," grinned Taylor. "If I don't get them, I'm going to have a little talk with Theron."

"You'll talk yourself right into gaol."

"That's right," Taylor scowled. "But I'll take Carolyn with me."

That got home. Bob's eyes narrowed. Then Taylor swung round as Fentriss popped into sight, covering him with a gun.

"Stiek 'em up, dogface!"
 "Put that away, Fentriss," said Bob quietly.

"It's our only chance, sir," protested the valet.

"Do as I tell you!" Crane turned to Taylor. "All right, but you'll have to give me time to get them."

"Why, where are they?" demanded Taylor, eyes gleaming.

"In Theron's room," said Bob, "under his mattress."

Taylor sauntered to the door.

"I have to hand it to you—you have a lot of nerve. But get them! I'll be back in fifteen minutes."

Fentriss gaped at his master.
 "Couldn't we pull a fast one on him, sir?"

"We are," Bob grunted. "We'll give him exactly what he asked for—the duplicates, if I can find them."

He was thinking about looking for the fakes when Babs came in, pulling the sheepish Roy with her.

"Bob, something awful has happened, and we need your help!"

"What's wrong?" The girl glanced at Fentriss. Taking the hint, Bob said:

"That will be all, Fentriss."

"Bob, it's dreadful," Babs whispered. "It just breaks my heart to tell you this—but Roy is the Gentleman!"

"The Gentleman?" gasped Bob, while Roy smirked and winked at him. "I can't believe it!"

"Yes, it's true," said Roy manfully. "Here are the diamonds." And he handed the delighted crackman the case containing the duplicates.

"Bob, please be brave," said Babs earnestly. "I love Roy, not you."

The Gentleman sighed gustily.

"Well, I guess I shall have to bear it for your sake, but it won't be easy. Are you sure you are in love with this—this thief?"

Ardently Babs replied:

"Oh, yes, and he's promised to reform, all for me."

"And we're going to be married right away!" exclaimed Roy.

"Congratulations to you both."

Roy shuffled his feet.

"Thanks for everything, Mr. Crane."

"Thank you," said Bob with deep meaning, glancing down at the duplicates. When he had got rid of the young love-birds, having promised to return the diamonds to Theron, to divert suspicion from Roy, Fentriss came in, smiling dreamily. "Isn't love a wonderful thing, sir?"

"What do you know about it?"

"I listened at the keyhole, sir," said Fentriss shamelessly. "Everything is hotsy-totsy now, sir, isn't it?"

"Meaning what?" asked Bob.

"Well, sir, we give Commissioner Theron the duplicates, make him think Mr. West is guilty, and retain the real ones."

"You forget," said Bob dryly, "that we have only two sets of diamonds. If we don't give Taylor one he'll talk, and if we don't give Theron one Roy and Babs will make a fuss."

"But, sir," groaned the valet, "that leaves us without any diamonds!"

Crane nodded.

"That's nice headwork, Fentriss! And may I suggest that you look about for a new instructor? You see, I've about decided to retire the Gentleman and just be Robert Crane."

Fentriss swayed against the wall.

"But you've done very well in your profession, sir. The police haven't

"I'm not thinking of the police. I'm thinking about Miss Morgan."

A knock sounded at the door. "Taylor must be worried. He's ahead of time."

It was not Taylor, but Carolyn who came in agitatedly.

"Bob, the Commissioner is coming to pay you a visit!"

"It's getting to be a habit with him," Bob grumbled.

"He just came to my room," she said, "and told me he had my fingerprints on the plate-holder."

"You didn't admit anything!"

She smiled at him.

"No, I thought he was bluffing, because he would have yours, too, when you pulled it out of the camera. I want to thank you," she said, lowering her eyes, "for ruining that negative."

"Oh, I had a selfish motive," Bob grinned. "I've always imagined it would be rather boring spending my honeymoon alone."

Flushing, Carolyn laughed gaily. Then Taylor came in, shutting the door carefully behind him.

"So I was right about you two love-birds! Well, it doesn't matter. Did you get them?"

"I did," said the Gentleman.

Carolyn stared icily at Taylor.

"What is the meaning of this?"

Fentriss blurted: "This crook threatened to expose you unless Mr. Crane gives up the real diamonds."

Carolyn smiled.

"It's a pretty big price to pay, Bob."

"It might be worth it," he said lightly.

"Come on, break it up!" interrupted Taylor. "Where are they?"

Bob handed him the duplicates. Taylor turned to the door, opening the box.

Then a thought struck him. Grinning, he swung round. "If you don't mind, I'll take the other set, too."

Bob sat on the edge of the table.

"Oh, you think you will, do you? I haven't got them."

"I'm ashamed of you, professor," grated Taylor. "You wouldn't want to see this little girl slaving in a laundry, washing socks for a warden?"

Crane shrugged.

"Get them, Fentriss."

Grumbling, the valet went to a picture of Theron hanging on the wall and took the case containing the Konjer diamonds from behind it.

"Not bad," said Bob. "I would never have thought of hiding them right under the Commissioner's nose!"

Taylor scowled.

"Come on, Gilhooley. Give! Thanks—and I hope she can't cook!"

"It doesn't matter," Bob grinned. "I can." He grinned more widely when Taylor opened the door and was confronted by Commissioner Theron. The police chief's eyes narrowed. He snapped to the crook: "Let me have them!"

With that, the room exploded into action. Taylor lashed out, smashing Theron back with a blow on the jaw. Bob, with one leap, grabbed Taylor and flung him right across the room. As the crook went over with the table, Bob went after him. Fighting madly, they rolled over and over on the floor. Taylor fought like a wild cat, but when the doorway filled with startled servants Bob had got him pinned down.

"What is it, Mr. Theron?" gasped the butler.

Holding his jaw, Theron snapped:

"We've caught the Gentleman, that's all!"

"You can't pin that on me!" screamed Taylor. "He's the Gentleman!"

"That's right, David," said Bob quietly, releasing Taylor. "I'm the Gentleman."

"He's trying to get publicity for his books," cried Carolyn. "I'm the Gentleman!"

"Nothing of the sort, sir," said Fentriss stoutly. "She's in love with him, sir. She's trying to protect him. I'm the Gentleman, sir!"

Babs cut in shrilly:

"Oh, you're all lying! Roy is the Gentleman, aren't you, dearest?"

Roy looked brave.

"Yes, sure I am!"

"That's ridiculous!" growled Bob Crane. "I'm the one you want."

The babel of confessions started again. Theron grasped his forehead.

"Stop it! Stop it! You're driving me crazy!"

Ainsley pushed his way in.

"Here, give me those diamonds before I find out you're the Gentleman!"

"Your confessions aren't worth a nickel," said Theron grimly, nodding to Taylor. "I caught him with the diamonds."

"You can't convict me!" howled Taylor. "That's circumstantial evidence!"

"Well, that's good enough for me!" snarled the harassed commissioner. "And you'd better shut up, or you'll get life! Now, take him downstairs. I want to talk to Carolyn and Bob alone." When Taylor, protesting loudly, had been dragged away, Theron turned to the silent pair meaningly. "Did I hear you say you were going to settle down on the Riviera?"

"Yes," said Bob swiftly, "and I'm going to write a book entitled, 'The End of The Gentleman.'"

"Yes? Well, I want to suggest you take Fentriss along and that you leave immediately." Theron turned at the door. "And, oh, yes—send me a copy of the book, will you? I'll be interested to know how the Gentleman comes to his end."

When the smiling Commissioner had gone, Fentriss growled:

"Are you really going to the Riviera, sir?"

Bob turned to Carolyn.

"Are we?"

"What d'you think?" she said softly.

Bob clasped her in his arms.

"I think we're practically there, as soon as I straighten things out with the Commissioner!"

"THE DEVIL'S PARTY"

"I'm going, Malone," he said, "but we'll meet again."

Alone with Marty, Donovan said sadly:

"I wish we could make him see what a great wrong he's doing you, old friend."

Malone shook his big head like some puzzled dog.

"He isn't wrong, really. If it hadn't been for me, Joe would be here right now. I didn't kill him, Jerry—but my hired hoodlums did. Joe caught them covering up dirty work I was responsible for— He snapped his fingers in that way he had when vexed or impatient. "What am I going to do, Jerry?"

Donovan received the confession in his usual quiet way. He had half guessed at it. He spoke unhurriedly:

"Bad, Marty—bad. But maybe I can help you both. I'll try." He thought of Helen—perhaps she might become peacemaker?

But Mike laid a formal charge against Malone at H.Q., and the newspapers got hold of it.

Marty was glaring at his copy of the paper. Great block headlines:

"BROTHER DECLARES JOE O'MARA KILLED TO COVER MURDER OF PLAYBOY BREWSTER."

Below in block print was the rest of it.

"Martin Malone, big-shot night-club owner, is to be charged by Michael O'Mara with the murders of Joseph

Traps—and Trapped

LATE that evening a call came for Helen and she went to the phone, thinking and hoping it might be from Mike to say he would withdraw the charges. A friendly voice sounded:

"Is that Miss McCoy, who knows Mike O'Mara?"

Helen answered eagerly.

"Yes, Helen McCoy speaking.

What is it?"

The friendly voice continued:

"O'Mara's over at my place in pretty bad shape. Went sick on duty and seems kinder delirious. He's calling for you, Miss McCoy, to leave the Cigarette Club and come right along. It's Hotel Emerald, room one-seven-one."

"I'll come right away," Helen answered.

She waited for the line to clear, then rang up Donovan.

"Jerry—Mike's ill. He's at Hotel Emerald—room one-seven-one. I'm going right away, and want you to meet me there. Thanks, Jerry!"

Soon after this call, Diamond and his fellow thugs walked in on Malone. There were four of them; but they were tidily dressed and well behaved. One was carrying a suitcase—Diamond asked for Malone, who came down to them in the lounge. He gave them a comprehensive glance.

"I was just going to bed," he said. "Tiring sort of day. Have a drink, anybody?"

"No, thanks," Diamond replied for all. "We alone here, Marty? Right! We've got a soft touch lined up and want to cut you in on it. We want to make friends again."

"Always thinking of my welfare," said Malone, sitting down.

Diamond took no notice.

"Listen, Marty—they're holding a big Ice Carnival for charity at the Polar Gardens to-night."

"I know it. What's that to me?"

"At midnight they transfer the box-office take to an armoured car for the bank," spoke Diamond in purring tones. "Well, here's the idea. They freeze their ice at the Polar, and there's a big ammonia plant in the basement. Sam's got something here in the bag"—he jerked a hand towards Sam—"gas masks, see? Those in the armoured car can't take the fumes when we open up the plant. But we can."

Malone chuckled throatily.

"You must think me a sap! First, you frame O'Mara to bump me off—then you think up a erude idea like this to finish me. Nothing doing!"

Diamond smiled thinly.

"Then I've got to play Miss McCoy. She dropped in for a chat at a friend's place. Like to call her?"

Malone got up.

"What's all this?"

"Ring up Hotel Emerald—Hank Andrews, room one-seven-one," Diamond told him. "We won't listen."

Malone hurried to the call-box, got the number and rang through. He shouted:

"I'm Martin Malone! Miss McCoy there?"

At once he heard Helen.

"Marty, that you? They're holding me here—"

The line went dead, someone had stopped the call. Diamond's cold eyes were fixed on Malone's as he came back to them.

"We've nothing against McCoy.

ARE YOU IN THE GREAT STAMP GAME ?

500 FREE FOOTBALLS

for Scoring "Goals" with FOOTER-STAMPS

LOOK! GREAT NEWS! The October "Footer-Stamps" competition starts this week, and you should start with it, because the number of Free Footballs to be won this month has been increased to FIVE HUNDRED!

"Footer-Stamps" are being given every week in "BOY'S CINEMA"—they're just pictures of six different actions on the football field, and as in previous months, the object of this great competition stamp-game is to score as many "goals" as possible—and by the end of October for this month's prizes.

TO SCORE A "GOAL" you must collect a complete set of six stamps (they're numbered 1 to 6), made up of the following movements: KICK-OFF—DRIBBLE—TACKLE—HEADER—SHOT—GOAL. (Note that the "goal" stamp by itself does NOT count as a "goal," you must get a set of the stamps 1 to 6 each time.)

The more stamps you collect the more "goals" you can score, and there are ten more stamps here to start you off for this month's competition. Cut them out—there's one good "goal" among them straight away, and the other stamps may fit in with some you had already: or you can swap them with pals, and so on!—then keep your collection until you get some more goal-scoring stamps in next week's issue. If you have any odd stamps left over from the two previous competitions they can be included, too.

If you want to score some other quick "goals," remember that "Footer-Stamps" are also appearing in such papers as SPORTS BUDGET and TRIUMPH each week. There are more "goals" waiting in those papers this very week!

"Footer-Stamps" are being collected all over the country—see that you're in it. 500 Footballs are going to be awarded in the October competition for the readers scoring the highest number of "goals" with "Footer-Stamps" for the month. So don't send any stamps yet, wait until we tell you how and where at the end of the month. There's nothing to pay remember

RULES: 500 Footballs will be awarded in the October contest to the readers declaring and sending in the largest number of "goals" scored with "Footer-Stamps." The Editor may extend or amend the prize list in case of too many ties, and no reader may win more than one prize in "Footer-Stamps."

Each "goal" must consist of a set of "Footer-Stamps" Nos. 1 to 6, inclusive—all claims for prizes to be made on the proper coupon (to be given later). No allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence! No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

(N.B. "Footer-Stamps" may also be collected from the following papers: "GEM," "MAGNET," "MODERN BOY," "DETECTIVE WEEKLY," "TRIUMPH," "WILD WEST WEEKLY," "THRILLER," "SPORTS BUDGET" and "CHAMPION.")

OVERSEAS READERS! Your pals who are far away—you're in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best scores from overseas readers. There will be a special closing date for you as well, of course!

TEN MORE "FOOTER-STAMPS!"

And More Free Footer-Stamps Coming in Next Week's "Boy's Cinema"!

"THE DEVIL'S PARTY"

She'll be let go—soon as the job's done, Marty."

Malone thought for a moment, glancing at the clock.

"You win. Let's go."

At H.Q. Emergency Squad a call came for O'Mara. A cheery voice asked him:

"You O'Mara? Good! I'm the guy who sent you that letter and Brewster's stopped cheque. Hot news for you, pal—your friend Malone is going to stick up Polar Gardens to-night at just after twelve. There's going to be fun."

"I'll check up on that," Mike said. "Okay, pal," laughed the cheery voice. "Be seeing you!"

Just at this moment Jerry Donovan was tapping at the door of room one-seven-one at Hotel Emerald. A round-face gentleman answered him.

"I'm looking for Miss McCoy," said Jerry.

"Not here, sir. This is my room—Hank Andrews, traveller in silks."

"Oh, sorry!" said Jerry. "I must have made a mistake." He smiled at Mr. Andrews and moved away. He walked down a flight to the next floor, went quietly to the wall telephone and rang up.

"Operator, give me the house detective quickly. That the house detective? Right! There's a little trouble in room one-seven-one, a Mister Andrews, whom I recognise as a convict just out of prison. I'm Father Donovan. Yes, bring someone up with you."

A few minutes later Mr. Hank Andrews, travelling in silk, was being escorted with another prisoner to the police car called to the hotel door. Jerry was in "one-seven-one" hearing Helen's frantic story.

"They've set a trap for Mike and Marty at the Polar Gardens! It's a pay-off for the gang. They plan to get them both killed in a hold-up. They're going to open the ammonia plant—"

"Tell me as we go," said Jerry, always calm and unhurried.

Inside the back yard of the ice rink, Diamond and his four thugs were standing at an iron shed-like building lettered "Danger. Ammonia Plant. Keep out!" Malone stood a little apart, watchful and wary. Diamond knocked at the closed door of the shed.

"Can I see you a moment?" he called. "It's from the management." The engineer, in leather jacket and overalls, came out. At once one of the thugs had an arm about his neck and a grip of his right hand. Another caught and wrenched his left arm; then, choking in agony, he was knocked on the head by the waiting Sam and flung down unconscious. The gang ran into the plant-room, and Diamond spoke hissing to the fourth man.

"Listen, Sullivan—that door there leads to the back corridor. When I give the word open it. When the fumes get good and thick, you yell and start the panic. Then we'll rush the armoured car—" He checked himself. "There it is, just come into the yard. Run back for your mask."

"Okay, I got it," came the surly answer. "Don't talk so much."

Diamond turned to Sam. "Sam, when I give the word—burst the pipes open. Put on your mask." He spoke low: "Here comes O'Mara—now we've got 'em both!"

He gave the signal—a wave of his hand and a low whistle. Sullivan opened the corridor door, waiting for the first puff of gas. Sam, spanner fixed, wrenched the feed pipes apart, and a pungent smell was followed by dusky clouds of vapour. The fourth man crept up behind the watching Malone and lifted a thick rubber stick.

But Malone had eyes in the back of his head seemingly—he turned swiftly and smashed his great fist in the fellow's face, felling him like a log. The fumes surged upwards, and Malone, maskless, felt his eyes fill with water; he plucked out his handkerchief and held it over nose and mouth just as Mike O'Hara, beside the armoured car, spotted him and drew his gun. He stepped up close, speaking gruffly.

"Okay, Marty. I got you this time."

The fumes were rising now and enveloping all in a kind of dense, stinging fog. Mike aimed at Malone's breast, point blank; then felt a quick grip on his wrist from someone behind him. He guessed at once.

"Let go, Jerry!"

"No!"

They struggled in the increasing mist, while Diamond, aware that his plans had gone wrong, drew his gun and fired at random. His chance shot caught Malone, who was descending upon him, a great fist clenched ready to smash in that white sneering mouth. The bullet did nothing to save Diamond, who was battered down, just as Sam, mask away, ran out of the shed to fall flat at their feet.

Through the mist came shouts and cries—the guard at the armoured car tried to see and understand what was going on; then, when the fumes reached them, they stood back, guns drawn. Jerry twisted the pistol out of Mike's hand, and it fell with a clatter near Diamond's pawing hand as he strove to free himself from Malone.

Snake-like fingers closed on the gun, got it, and held it. The shot at close range went right through Malone's body, bringing him down with a gurgling, dreadful groan.

"Mike!" came Jerry's agonised cry. "Get to him—help me pull him away!"

Their enmity forgotten, they gaspingly stooped to pull Malone out of the fumes, thinning now since someone had managed to turn off the main tap of the great container. The two friends drew Malone out of the poisonous vapours into the clean night air at the far end of the yard.

"Gently," whispered Jerry. "He's badly hurt."

They heard Helen calling to the guard; then calling them all three in quick, terrified accents:

"Marty! Marty! Mike—Jerry!"

Donovan whispered, as Malone's eyes opened a little.

"How are you, Marty?"

Helen found them; she knelt by Malone—his dying glances took them in one by one. He couldn't speak; his breath was failing; his heart pounding in his breast towards its last beating throb. But his unflinching courage remained—his right hand twitched upward, thumb tip to the tip of his forefinger—the old "okay" sign of long, long ago.

The others, grouped on their knees around him, gave the sign in response, trying to smile down on the flickering soul still manifest in those slowly dimming eyes.

Jerry's lips moved in prayer as Marty Malone, hard living yet soft-hearted, passed to the other life.

A throng of happy boys in a big gymnasium; jumping, playing ball, swinging on parallel bars, boxing, and laughing as they punched and missed, or punched and got home. Donovan smiling at them from the door as he comes in. He raises his right hand, thumb tip to tip of forefinger.

"How's that, boys?"

Comes a chorus of young, happy voices:

"Okay, Father!"

Over the door is a bronze plaque on which is lettered:

N° 997
JAN. 21st 1939

A LONG
COMPLETE STORY

Starring WALLACE BEERY & MICKEY ROONEY

Stablemates

A young stable boy becomes the owner of a horse that always goes lame when racing. One night a drunken old hobo insists upon dossing in the stall, and he tells the boy what is wrong with the animal—he was once a famous veterinary surgeon—and thus began the strange and exciting friendship of a man, a boy and a horse. Starring Wallace Beery and Mickey Rooney

A Final Try-out

YOUNG MICKEY, the stable lad, was busy bandaging a horse's front legs. His freckle-face was very serious and intent, because he was a hard working youngster with a passion for horses.

The racing for the second day of the Spring Meeting at a famous track was not due to start for some hours, and the place, except for a few owners, trainers and those employed as cleaners and clearers-up, was deserted. Amazing the amount of paper, orange-peel and other debris that spectators leave around after a meeting. A thick-set, stooping figure was shuffling through the stands with a sack. A battered old felt hat was pulled anyhow over his mass of tousled sandy hair; his shirt was patched, and his dirty calico trousers had seen better days; whilst the dusty old boots were all hursting out at the toes.

The stooping figure straightened for a moment, and one saw a large red face, heavy, bloodshot eyes, an immense nose and bushy eyebrows. The old fellow gave a furtive look round because he was not one of the regular staff of cleaners and was expecting any minute to get chucked out. He was scrounging round for cigarette-ends, bits of food and anything that he could find. Any thing of use he dropped into a very dirty looking sack.

Young Mickey appeared from the stables, and he was proudly leading a horse. He was met near the rails by the owner and the latter's chief jockey. Mickey was helped to the saddle and at a given signal was told to run the course. The apprentice—he had never been allowed to ride in a real race—touched the animal and was off to a good start. Gale, the thin-faced man with the furtive manner sniffed as he glanced at his stop watch.

"She was the best two-year-old I'd ever seen," he announced. "Then she started stopping and it cost me my shirt." The jockey gave an understanding nod, but wisely made no comment.

"Come on, honey!" Mickey was shouting to the horse. "Show the boss how good you are."

"She's moving along this morning, Mr. Gale." Cliff, the jockey, dared to remark when the horse had travelled three-quarters of the track.

"She'd better show something this morning," viciously said Gale, his face ugly, "or she'll be in the glue factory this afternoon."

"Don't stop, honey don't stop this morning." Young Mickey sobbed as he felt the horse falter and weaken in her stride. "Make another effort, baby." The horse seemed to understand and began striding out once more. "That's the girl—keep it going!"

The horse seemed to come down the straight at a terrific pace. The owner and the jockey were amazed at this burst of speed, which was due mainly to the seductive tongue of the clever young apprentice. When Mickey pulled up he patted the sweating neck.

"You did it, baby—you did it!" he chucked. "I'll bet the boss' eyes are popping out of his head this morning."

The old wastrel had ceased scrounging among the litter to watch the try-out, and once or twice he nodded his head as if he understood a lot more about this trial than anybody else. He sniffed, scratched his head, muttered something to himself when the try-out was finished and went back to his foraging.

Gale was enthusiastic. One-thirty-eight! It was marvellous time. It looked as if the horse after that treatment by the vet had regained her old form. Gale had lost a small fortune at this meeting, and here was a chance to get it all back and plenty more besides. Both the owner and the jockey were amazed when Mickey asked for the ride.

"She knows me, and she likes me." "We can't take any chances on you," gruffly retorted Gale, and turned to the jockey. "Do you think you can keep her moving?"

"I'll keep her moving if I have to tear her apart."

"Don't use a whip on her, Cliff," Mickey cried, his eyes blazing. "She'll give you everything."

"You trying to tell me how to ride a horse?" snarled Cliff.

"I'm not trying to tell you how to ride her, but I know Lady Q."

"All right all right!" Gale cried testily, pushing the jockey and the apprentice apart. "I won't have all this arguing. Of course Cliff gets the ride, but you won't be overlooked if you keep your mouth shut about this time to-day. Don't feed her much to night, and nothing at all to-morrow. Give her a little water every hour or so, and check her plates."

The owner and the jockey walked away, and the boy's small face was screwed up into a vicious scowl as he stared after them.

"If he uses a whip on you, Lady Q," was his vow, "I'll punch him right in the nose."

Gale left his jockey near one of the dressing-rooms and made his way through one of the stands towards the car park. At the gate, Terry, the wastrel, was lounging.

"Mr. Gale, excuse me." His voice was thick. "Can I speak to you a minute?"

"What about?" Gale asked, turning up his nose in disgust.

"Your horse." Terry grinned from ear to ear. "She ran that mile in pretty good time, didn't she?"

"Yes—if you call one-forty-five good."

"About one-thirty-nine or thereabouts." Terry shook his head. "But that's no guarantee that she'll repeat. You gonna run her to-morrow?"

"What if I am?"

"I can ensure her winning."

"How could you?"

Again that grin.

"Well, I've got a little service I render horse-owners now and then." A quiet chuckle. "Works like magic."

"I'm afraid my plans for the future don't include going to gaol," sneered Gale.

"Oh, there ain't a chance of that happening," Terry answered, with several decisive shakes of his big head. "It don't even show in the saliva. It's a special formula all my own. The only cost to you is that you put ten bucks on her nose for me, that's all."

"I'll think it over." Gale was partly convinced by the man's tone and assurance. "Where could I find you in the morning?"

"I'll meet you over at—" Terry glanced furtively sideways as he heard footfalls, and saw a clean-shaven, elderly man approaching. "Thanks ever so ranch for the information," he said loudly. "I'll get a bet down, Mr. Gale. Thank you!" He shuffled away.

The owner glanced round, and his furtive face was creased with an assumed smile.

"Hallo, Barney!" he called out to the race-track detective.

"Morning, Mr. Gale!" answered Barney Donovan. "Who is that fellow?"

"I don't know. Is there anything wrong?"

"No—just haven't seen him around here before. Something familiar about him."

"He stopped me and wanted the usual thing—a tip."

"Did you give it to him?"

"I could use one myself," laughed Gale, and hastened away, thankful that Barney Donovan had not overheard all the conversation.

The Also-ran

MICKEY got Lady Q to bed early. He was a young enthusiast where this horse was concerned. He regarded her as the pick of all horse-flesh, and he was going to do his level best to see that she won on the morrow.

"You get yourself a good night's sleep," the boy was saying. "There'll be a lot of people looking at you to-morrow. When we prance into the winner's circle we don't want any circles under your eyes."

"Does she sleep any better if you tell her a bed-time story?" a lazy voice drawled.

"What do you want?" Mickey whipped round and gazed angrily at the big fellow lounging over the lower flap of the stable door.

"Where can I find Mr. Gale?"

"Well, I couldn't say. He's liable to be around here most any time. What do you want with him?"

"Oh, me and him's got a little business together."

"He'll be around in the morning." Mickey moved forward to close up the stable. "You can see him then."

But Terry anticipated such a move, and reaching over opened the lower flap. Calmly he walked in and slung a heavy bundle on the straw.

"Okay—I'll wait."

"Not in here, you won't!" stormed Mickey. "You can come round at seven in the morning."

"Hey, listen—I'm busted!" Terry argued in his mild yet determined manner. "Do you want me to sleep out there in the cold? Would you mind giving a guy a flop?"

"To-night I do. She's going to run to-morrow, and strangers make her nervous."

"Well, she won't mind me, I don't snore," Terry studied the horse speculatively. "Besides, I'm here to help her win."

"She don't need no help."

Terry grinned.

"She don't?" he asked, and then laughed in a manner that irritated the stable-lad. "The only way she could win would be for all the other horses to drop dead."

"Now, look here!" Mickey made a futile effort to push the big fellow out of the stall. "You get out of here, or I'll call a stable cop."

"Yeah?" Terry glanced towards the rough hammock slung against the wall. "Does the cop know that you and the lady are keeping house here? Now, listen, buddy, if Mr. Gale knew that you were rude to me he'd be pretty sore. You just calm down and I'll promise not to tell him. Also I'll promise not to break every bone in your body." His tone had become aggressive. "Now come on, Shrimp, and make up that straw."

Terry dragged off another old boot to reveal an even more offensive sock.

Realising that the tramp had the better of him, Mickey could do nothing, so he told his unwelcome visitor to make up his own bed. Terry just grinned, and, picking up his old sack, slung it on to the hammock. He announced that as the youngster was so inhospitable he would sleep in his bed. Mickey argued and threatened, but in vain, and at last Terry grew tired.

"Oh, go pound your ear before I pound it for you."

Terry then climbed into the hammock and proceeded to divest himself of his boots. Mickey glowered his disgust at the sight of the socks with the toes bulging through.

"You dirty, rotten old tramp!"

"Now ain't that nice coming from a little fellow like you!" Terry dragged off another old boot to reveal an even more offensive sock. "You're looking at yourself thirty years from now. That's what comes of following the race-horses."

"Oh, yeah?" Mickey said with a sneer. "Well, the best thing that ever happened to me since I left school was getting that horse to take care of."

"Cut out the cracks and hit the hay," growled Terry, as he flopped back in the hammock. "Nighty-nighty, little boy!"

But the hammock was not made for vast bulks like Terry, and the rotten old rope gave with a snap and the tramp crashed down on the floor. Mickey laughed derisively, but his hope that the tramp would now depart was short-lived because Terry proceeded to gather a lot of straw together and make himself a bed on the floor.

Mickey made himself comfortable as far away from the tramp as possible, and just before he switched out the lights he saw his companion take out a bottle and take a hearty swig. The boy snorted his disgust, and a few minutes later was fast asleep.

The boy was the first to wake, and with a look of loathing at the tramp grabbed up his coat and tiptoed to the door. He was going to have a wash. In his haste to be gone he did not notice the dollar note and the few odd coins that slid from his coat-pocket. Some minutes later Terry woke, rubbed his big face and sat up, and the first thing he saw was the dollar note. His fingers went out towards the money, hesitated, and then slowly closed round the bill. He was gone by the time the boy got back to the stall.

Gale was pleased to hear that his horse had passed a good night, and when Cliff reported that the animal seemed in fine fettle decided to have a final gamble against his losing streak. When the tote was opened he lunged around and watched the figures. Nobody was backing Lady Q, so at the last minute he took out his note-case and put every cent he had managed to raise on his horse. A thousand bucks and the tote ought to pay about a hundred to one. At the same moment Terry was investing the dollar he had lifted. There was a horse in the same race as Lady Q named Yellow Jack, and a darkie bookie gave him twenty to one. With a satisfied grin Terry ambled down to the rails to watch the race.

The big fellow was lounging there with his old hat over his eyes when small elbows heat a tattoo on his ribs, and he grinned when he saw it was Mickey. The youngster stuck out his lower lip in his vicious way.

"Now you're gonna see how wrong a guy can be. Lady Q's gonna romp home alone."

"Yeah. Alone—last!"

The horses got away to a good start, and at once Mickey began yelling encouragement.

"Come on, Lady Q—come on, Lady Q!"

Almost as if he were bored Terry watched the race and showed no excitement that Lady Q should be in the lead several lengths ahead of all the other horses. Yellow Jack was lying fourth. The announcer boomed forth that at the first turn Lady Q was leading by four lengths. Mr. Gale in the stand was yelling himself hoarse as he saw wealth within his grasp.

"Lady Q is still in front," stated the announcer.

Terry nudged the small stable-lad.

"She's stopping," was his comment.

And from that very moment Lady Q began to falter. Cliff gave the horse the whip most unmercifully, but Lady Q seemed run out, and, coming into the straight, only held the lead from Blue Coat by a nose.

"Yellow Jack is just getting ready to make his move," Terry shouted in Mickey's ear. "Your sweetheart is beginning to wobble."

Mickey glared at the tramp as if he would like to kill him, and then he was bellowing hysterically at Lady Q to make another effort. But the horse was done. The whole field seemed to flash past her, with Blue Coat and Yellow Jack struggling for the lead, and it was the last-named that flashed past the post a winner by two clear lengths.

"Trouble with that horse is that she's sick." Terry laid a hand not unkindly on the crestfallen youngster's shoulder.

Terry walked away and sought out the bookie.

"Yellow Jack was my baby," he said gleefully to the bookie, when he had collected his winnings.

Mickey took over the horse from the disgruntled Cliff, and was taking the animal off to the stables when he encountered the owner. The latter was looking as if he had just taken a bad dose of physic.

"I won't need you any more, kid."

"You won't need me any more?"

Mickey reiterated as if this meant the end of the world. "But Mr. Gale, Lady Q can't get along without me."

"She'll get along all right where she's going," Gale cried, his thin lips twisted into an ugly grin. "She won't need any attention in the boneyard."

"You mean you're gonna destroy her?" gasped Mickey, and a mocking laugh from Cliff, who had come into the scene, made him realise that it was only too true.

"I am certainly not going to feed her another meal!" Gale shouted angrily. "She's cost me a fortune."

"Oh, gee, that's murder!" Mickey was sobbing now. "Why, it's almost like killing a human, Mr. Gale. You couldn't do that. She's only a horse; she doesn't understand. What did she ever do to you?"

"Nothing but rob me of my bank-roll."

"Mr. Gale, I've saved up eighty-six dollars and you owe me six weeks' pay—that's thirty dollars more," the boy cried. "I'll give you all that if you'll let me take her."

Even the hardened race-horse owner was touched.

"What would you do with her?" he asked. "How do you expect to feed her? Or are you going to eat her yourself?"

"Well, you don't care what happens to her?" demanded Mickey, his eyes bright and his mop of hair almost standing on end.

"No!" Gale muttered as he fingered his chin. He did not want the horse, and he did owe this stable-lad thirty dollars; this was one way of settling that debt. "All right, take her."

"Gee, thanks!" gasped Mickey, scarcely daring to believe his good fortune.

"And I don't want to see either of you again," Gale called out as he walked away with his jockey. "You're jinks, both of you!"

But Mickey was not listening. His arms were round the horse's neck.

"Gee, girl, you're mine." He stroked the glossy neck, and the lady shot out a pink tongue. "Come on, honey, let's get going before the boss changes his mind."

A keen lover of horses might have noticed that though Lady Q went willingly enough she walked with a slight limp.

The Tumour in the Hoof

BEING young and of a contented disposition, Mickey soon forgot about the tragic failure of Lady Q that afternoon. Probably the joy of ownership wiped out everything. In fact, the boy was so happy that same evening that he sat outside the stall and played quietly on his mouth organ. A big white board proclaimed in black letters that stables must be vacated not later than midnight. How this was going to be done certainly had not occurred to Mickey, but he was not worrying—something would turn up. Something did turn up.

There was shouting in the distance and what seemed like a crash. Mickey went on playing, but when he heard some of the stable lads yelling he scrambled to his feet to see what was happening. Lady Q poked her head out of the stall for she was of an enquiring frame of mind.

A rickety car came rattling towards the many lines of stables. It was going much too fast, steam was spurting from the radiator, and the course of that car was definitely erratic. It lurched across a path, went on to a piece of lawn, demolished a small tree, knocked down some railing and lurched back again. It headed straight for some stalls, and the stable hands callously left their charges to their fate to save their own hides, but the driver managed to swing the wheel, for the car skidded round, charged through some more railings and continued on its dangerous way.

A big fellow clutched at the wheel, and did a lot of fumbling under the dash-board. It was this fumbling for the handbrake, and trying to steer when in an intoxicated condition that was causing the erratic course of the car. Needless to say, sheer panic and inability to stop this chariot was clearing Terry's head more rapidly than anything else could have done. It was not so much his own safety that he was concerned with as the horses. If he knocked over a few stable lads it did not matter much, but the horses must not be hurt. A slight gradient, a fence, a shallow pond that was ornamental until Terry went through it, and a water butt finally brought the car to a stop. The engine was racing wide open, and frantically Terry moved spark and throttle levers until he thought finally of switching off the ignition.

Mickey, who had been standing guard over his stall, prepared to let this atrocity of a car charge him before it could get at Lady Q, stalked forward, and with hands on hips surveyed the man who hopped his brow with a large bandanna handkerchief.

"Oh boy, oh boy, oh boy!" croaked the exhausted Terry. "Why didn't they tell me that the brakes were loose?"

"Where did you steal it?"

Terry removed the handkerchief to stare at his accuser.

"Oh, so it's you, is it? Well, this car cost heavy sugar—heavy sugar. She's only gone 86,000 miles, and her engine's as tight as a drum."

Terry got out of the old car, waved a hand at Mickey, and staggered towards the stall.

"Where you going?" the boy demanded.

"I'm going to change my shirt and then I'm going to hit the road."

"I oughta throw your kit on the rubbish heap," cried the boy as he accompanied Terry to the stall. "I suppose you pinched that buck outa my pocket this morning."

"Oh!" Terry looked at Mickey with almost childish surprise. "Was that your buck? Now, ain't that funny—just as I was leaving there's that buck laying right there in the straw on the doorstep and I wasn't sure whether it was your dough blowing out or somebody else's dough blowing in." He beamed at Mickey, who was eyeing him balefully.

"So I says, I says, I'll look after this till I finds the owner."

"Yeah, I know." Mickey stuck out his hand. "Come on—give it over!"

Terry fumbled in his shirt and brought out a greasy roll of notes. The velocipede had cost him five bucks, booze had cost him five more, so that he still had quite a fortune left. He handed a dollar note to Mickey, who examined it suspiciously.

"If Mr. Gale had done what I told him to do—why, he'd be in the money like I am." Terry laughed as he pushed the money back into a pocket. "Anyway, if he comes around here asking for me—you just tell him I got other plans now."

"Well, he won't be around," Mickey answered, and his tough little face became quite smug as he added: "She don't belong to him no more."

Terry had been fumbling with his kit, kneeling on the floor, and feeling inside an old leather hold-all as if he expected the boy had been at his belongings. He looked up now in surprise.

"Who's stuck with her now?"

"She's mine. Mr. Gale owed me money and so he paid the debt that way."

"Give me half of what she earns and I'll fix her so she'll win a race," huskily suggested the old rascal.

"I don't care if she races or not." Mickey put an affectionate arm round his pet. "He was gonna send her to the glue factory." He looked intently at Terry. "How could you fix her up?"

"Give her a little shot of ginger juice in the leg—make her faster than lightning."

"You mean that you'd dope her?" Mickey was incredulous, and then indignant. "You'd do a dirty thing like that to an animal. Pack up yer stuff and get outa here, so that me and Lady Q can breathe."

"Okay, okay." Terry took it all with unruffled good temper. "I was only trying to help you out."

"She's champion material." Mickey patted Lady Q. "Look at that rangy neck and that short back and straight clean legs. She's a champ, I tell you."

"And I'll tell you something—she's sick." Terry approached the horse, who seemed quite docile—a fact that quite annoyed Mickey—and gently raised a hoof. He prodded the pad and immediately the animal's leg seemed to jerk back as if the touch had hurt her. Terry got to his feet. "Just as I thought. You heard of Skee-ball, ain't cha?"

"Who ain't heard of him. Holds the all time record for the mile and a quarter."

"Yeah, that's right. Well, I figure that she's got the same thing that he had."

"What same thing?"

"Well, when Skee-ball was a two-year-old he had a tumour as big as a marble right under his left front hoof—and every time he put his hoof down it hurt him. Just like I think it hurts her."

"But how did he win so many stakes?" questioned Mickey.

"Oh, there was a—" The big fellow rubbed his cheeks with his large hand. A habit when uncertain of an answer. "There was a vet around there—young fella and smart as a whip—till he got in with a lot of gamblers and they got him in a jam."

"Yeah, but what happened?"

"This young vet, he operated on Skee-ball. It was a tough operation, too. First he had to remove a section from the wall of the hoof." With his hands, Terry gestured as if demonstrating an operation. "And then there was that growth. Now the trick was slicing that off without injuring the nerve, you see. If he cut the thousandth part of an inch too much they'da had to send a hundred thousand dollar horse to the glue factory."

"Did he do it?"

"Sure he did it," Terry chuckled. "Then he nursed that old horse through the fever that follows an operation like that, and the next year they won more money with Skee-ball than you and me could even count."

Mickey went and stood by the hoof that Terry thought contained a tumour. He looked at the foot as if he wished his eyes had X-ray powers. The old tramp had fished a grubby towel out of his kit.

"Do you think it hurts Lady Q just to walk on it?"

"Well, how does it feel when you got a pebble in your shoe?"

"Where is that vet now?"

Terry fingered his face and licked his lips.

"Hum!" he mumbled, and cleared his throat. "Oh—yes, he's dead." He waved the towel. "Well, I gotta get washed up."

When the tramp had gone for his wash the boy walked to the open door of the stall. It was unkind to tag a horse around that couldn't walk—what could he do about it? He felt more kindly disposed towards the old wreck of a tramp, and somehow he knew that this diagnosis of Lady Q was correct. On the straw lay the old fellow's kit, and Mickey decided that he would move it away from Lady Q's hoofs. The kit bag opened and Mickey found his gaze riveted on some instruments. He stooped down and looked more closely—this was a veterinary's instrument set. The youngster covered them up and was stroking his horse when Terry got back. Out of the corner of his eye Mickey watched the big fellow packing his kit.

At last Terry was done, and getting to his feet slung the pack over his shoulder. He nodded to Mickey.

"Thanks for the Southern hospitality." He pointed to Lady Q. "Keep her feet off the ground."

Mickey made no answer, but watched Terry go out to the old car, and the brakeless vehicle had a self-starter that worked. The youngster hastened forward.

"I'm going to celebrate," Terry called out. "And then hey-ho for the open road."

"Wait a minute, I'm going with you."

"Not where I'm going." Terry shook

"Come on, Lady Q—come on, Lady gal!" Mickey yelled encouragement.

his head decisively. "They don't sell to minors."

"I could drink lemonade."

Terry shuddered from head to foot.

"That sounds to me worse than water." He shooped the boy from the car. "Go away—go away."

It chanced that Donovan was prowling round the stables, and seeing the old tramp in the car he came forward to investigate. Also, he wanted a closer look because he had been searching his memory to think where he had seen the old fellow before.

"Good-evening."

Terry gave Donovan a furtive glance, and kept his hand over his chin so that some of his face was hidden.

"Hallo?" Terry muttered.

"Haven't been around the track long, have you?"

"No, and I ain't gonna be here much longer either," Terry called out, revving the engine. "Well, so long, kid."

The old car rattled and roared as Terry managed to get into gear, then Terry fairly shot off in spite of having no brakes.

"I know that guy," the race track detective said to Mickey. "I must be getting old—I can't remember who he is—or when—or where? What's his name, kid?"

"Search me, Barney," Mickey answered, staring after the departing car. "I never did bother to ask him. Say, excuse me, will you? I'm gonna see somebody about something."

Mickey ran to the stall, closed the flaps and then went pelting through the stables towards the main road. He guessed it would be easy enough to find the old tramp in the town, which only possessed about thirty saloons, and he intended to start with the cheaper ones and work upwards.

A Touch-and-go Operation

IT was in the second low dive that Mickey found Terry. The tramp was squatting on a stool with his elbows on a counter. For some reason the gin did not taste so good this evening, and when he ordered a third drink a shrill voice clipped in with a demand for a lemonade.

"How you doing, doe?"

"What did you call me?" Terry demanded.

"Oh, you can't kid me." Mickey drew a stool close to the man. "That vet you were talking about—you're him."

"Where'd you get that idea?"

"Well, you got a set of vet's tools."

"Who—who has?"

"You have!" retorted the boy. "I saw 'em—I went through your bundle."

"Don't you know it's against the law to go through a man's private possessions?" rasped Terry, his eyes bulging and the veins on his neck sticking out like roots.

"All right, we'll put it this way."

Mickey grinned back defiantly. "They were on the doorstep, and they started to blow in or out—I don't know which so—"

Terry gulped at his drink.

"I won 'em shooting craps," he lied. "I was just going to pawn 'em if things got real tough."

"That's a lot of baloney. They're yours. You know too much about horses to be one of them ordinary gavs. You knew what was the matter with Lady Q the first time you saw her."

"I was kidding you." Terry had hunched up now against the counter. He was rather like a cowed big dog, who is in a corner and trying hard to get out of it.

"You even said she had a tumour under her hoof like Skeeball."

January 21st, 1939.

"I was lying," Terry shouted.

"You weren't lying."

"I was lying," contended Terry even louder in his desperation. "Skeeball didn't have nothing under her hoof."

The bartender interposed.

"Hey, you guys!" he called their attention. "If you want to argue, go hire a hall."

"You keep away from me," hissed Terry, when the bartender had gone. "Go jump in that lemonade and drown."

But Mickey stuck like a limpet. He apologised for thinking that Terry was a vet and that those tools were his. He hoped they had belonged because he had a great respect for vets. All vets were right guys—they loved animals. Old Terry kept on giving the boy suspicious looks and telling him to go back to Lady Q, but it had no effect, and so he ordered another gin and another lemonade. They tried another saloon, and by this time Terry did not mind if a hundred Mickeys were with him.

"I'm going to be a great vet when I grow up," Mickey informed him.

"Does it take much studying?"

"It certainly does," answered Terry. "You've got to study and study, then you've got practical exams—"

He paused as he saw the triumph gleam in the boy's eyes. "Oh, how do I know?"

In one place Terry would decide to play pool. He would show Mickey some fancy shots. He did—he swayed on to the table, and with his cue removed a nice portion of cloth. That sobered Terry and scared Mickey. Like criminals they worked their way towards the exit, and when they heard a bellow of rage from a marker they charged through the door and just ran.

"Gee, that was a narrow squeak," chuckled Mickey, when they were in the car and driving away.

"He didn't scare me at all." Terry lay back at peace, for this young imp was now at the wheel.

"Say, how did you cure that fever of Skeeball's after the operation?"

"Oh, how did I cure him?" Terry yawned and decided it was not a bit of good trying to bluff this kid. "I sat up with him nights and put cold-water packs on him, that's how." He yawned.

"Take me some place where we can get a drink."

"Okay!" agreed Mickey, and noted that Terry had closed his eyes. The boy set his jaw and drove the old car back to the stables, and Terry slept the whole way.

Terry was lugged out of the car and he allowed Mickey to guide him. Then he blinked his eyes and demanded loudly to know why he had been brought back here.

"Will you do it, doe—will you, please?"

"Do what?"

"Will you operate on Lady Q—please, doe?"

Terry pushed the boy away.

"What are you talking about?" he demanded. "You're crazy!"

"I'll pay you, doe. How much do you want?"

"Two thousand dollars."

"I'll get it—I'll steal it!" cried the boy. "I swear I'll get it somehow."

"Well, you'd better steal a lot more while you're at it, because my price has just gone up to five thousand dollars."

Mickey was cunning, and he tried fresh tactics.

"Why, that operation probably wouldn't be worth five cents," he cried, with a sneer. "I wouldn't let you do it if you wanted to." He made a really ugly grimace. "An old gin-soaked has-been like you—you'd probably kill her if you got close enough to breathe on her."

"Say, I got a mind to—" Terry raged.

"Ah, you ain't got a mind. The only mind you got is swimming around in alcohol. Why, your hands are slaking like jelly. You couldn't even operate on a slot machine. You're through—you're washed up—you're a has-been!"

"Who's a has-been?" demanded the tramp, a glint in his eye. "I can do just as good now as I did then. I'm no has—" He grinned suddenly. "You're a pretty smart kid, ain't you? You think you'll get me mad and then I'll do the operation. Well, I got more sense. I won't do it."

"Oh, why won't you help us, doe?" pleaded Mickey, his face all wistful and his attitude one of despair.

"Because that horse don't mean nothing to me, and you mean less—that's why."

"Doe, you got a chance to do something great. She was good once, and you can make her good again. It—it—it's like a big shot riding on top of the world. And all of a sudden gets a tough break and goes down. Along comes a good guy like yourself, doe, and pulls this fellow up and puts him back on his feet again. You know, if you've ever had a tough break in your life, doe, you might realise what a tough break she's having now. I'll bet this growth is killing her with pain. But she'd run her heart out for me if I only asked. I guess that's what you call a thoroughbred—only thoroughbreds got hearts like that. And if we don't help her—we ain't got any at all. I'm not asking you for myself, doe; you can even have her if you'll only do something for her."

Terry wiped his big face with his hands and then stared at the boy solemnly, then he dived into his pockets and fished out all the money he had left.

"You go and get some chloroform and some bandages and some cotton and some of that there canned heat, and stop on your way back and pick up a feed bag."

"All right, I'll go."

"I'll cure your horse, but I ain't forgotten how disrespectful you spoke to me." Terry took off his coat. "And after it's all over I'm going to give you a beating you'll remember the rest of your life." He dragged out a bottle of gin. "Now you hurry."

"Don't you think you'd better lay off that?"

"All right." Reluctantly Terry put the bottle back in his pocket. "Scram!"

Mickey soon got back with all the required things, and found Terry cleaning his instruments. The old fellow sent him out for a pail of drinking water, and when the boy did as ordered he made him shut the door because they did not want anybody peering in and seeing what was going on. When the boy's back was turned Terry emptied his bottle of gin into the pail of drinking water.

Terry used a nosebag to administer the chloroform, and soon Lady Q was surrendering to his will. When the chloroform had taken effect, Terry started his operation. It was terribly hot in the stall and perspiration streamed down their faces. Several times Terry glanced at the pail, and after a while the temptation was too much. He put a dipper into the pail and drank deeply. At last he paused and beckoned the boy to look at the hoof.

"There it is—the growth—and just like I said it was."

"You got to hurry, doc. The chloroform's getting low."

Another drink and back to work, and when everything was going well they heard a loud voice:

"Everybody out!"

It was the watchman, and the only thing to do was to turn out the lights. Mickey wanted to turn them on again when the man had gone.

"Do you want me to land in gaol?" whined Terry. "That guy will come back."

"But you ain't doing nothing wrong," sobbed Mickey. "You can't leave her like this."

Mickey had a toreh, and once more Terry went back to his operation. Once he sank back on his heels and said he had lost the touch. Then he asked for a drink, and the stimulant of the gin seemed to lend him strength.

"Now hand me that seidel," whispered Terry. "And keep that light still."

Several times Terry's eyes closed as if dead weary. The gin was having the opposite effect now, but the insistent urging of Mickey kept the older man going, and at last he laid down the knife.

"It's done!" he cried. "Don't think I touched the nerve at all."

"Gee, doc."

"Got that bandage ready?"

"I think she's coming out of it," cried Mickey.

"That's all right—all right—she's all right now," Terry mumbled. "We gotta watch out for fever. Get that blanket and those gunny sacks and put 'em all over her and keep her warm." Mechanically he drew the pail of gin water towards him. He drank deeply, but the fiery spirit did not revive him. He flopped back on the straw—out!

Mickey shook him violently, but nothing could wake Terry, and after a while the boy tried to attend to the horse as the old man had instructed. He fussed round and piled straw so that the horse should be comfortable, and every hour or so he dressed the hoof. The horse seemed content, for she slept quite calmly, and about four in the morning Mickey fell asleep from sheer exhaustion.

The boy was the first awake in the morning, and he was going out to get some fresh water when his nostrils twitched and he raised the pail. Now he knew why the doc had passed out. Terry awoke about seven and seemed little the worse, though it was some time before he could realise what had happened in the night. He examined the hoof and grinned like a schoolboy—it was a neat job. He made the boy take a rest for a while, and when the boy was asleep, placed his own coat over him. Satisfied the lad was dead off, Terry sneaked out and got into his old car. He drove into town, and at the only pawnshop he raised money on his tools—he wouldn't need them any more. When he got back to the stables he had an old horse trailer in tow and plenty of good feed.

"Gee, doc, I thought you'd run out on me!" gasped Mickey.

"I got that beating to give you," was the answer. "Now you get busy, because we gotta get going."

"Ought we to move her?"

"She's gonna have salt-water treatment, the same as we gave Skee-ball," Terry grinned. "We'll have her right in no time, and then I'm going to beat the hide off you for saying my hands shook like jelly. Get going!"

And so a few hours later the old car was on the road, and in the trailer behind Lady Q placidly surveyed the countryside. There was a grin on the lady's face, for though her hoof felt very sore, the dull ache and throbb had gone.

Terry picked out a quiet piece of rocky coast, with sandy beaches, near Monterey. With bits of old sacking, waterproofs and part of a tent, they made a camp near a cave. The weather was glorious, and most of the day Mickey had to exercise Lady Q in the shallows, whilst Terry sat on the rocks, watching with a grin of approval.

"Look at her, doc!" Mickey shouted one day, as he sat bare-backed across the horse. "She's raring to go."

"Then let her go."

Lady Q went down that stretch of beach like a flash, and there was no sign of a limp when she came back.

"She'll be the death of more book-makers than you can bury in an afternoon," was Terry's gloating, jubilant prophecy.

Mickey was wearing short bathing trunks, and now he turned his back.

"Okay, doc. I'm ready."

"What's the idea?"

"Well, that harking you were gonna give me. I guess I deserve it now."

Whereupon Terry removed his leather belt, fingered it, gave the boy a scowl and then turned towards their tent.

"I guess I'll go and change my clothes." Old Terry was smiling. "I've got a bit wet from this sea spray."

The old chap seemed very quiet the rest of that day, and Mickey asked what was on his mind. Terry announced that on the morrow he was moving off on his own. Naturally, the boy wanted to know why, and Terry was very evasive in his answers. He would only be in the way.

"But you and me are partners," argued Mickey. "You gotta come to Burlington and help me race Lady Q."

"I don't hook up with nobody," groused Terry. "I'll go with you as far as the next big town and then I'll blow."

"But what shall I do without you?"

cried Mickey. "How about t. dy Q?"

"Oh, she'll be all right. All she needs is racing, and you'll sure see that she gets that. We'd only get in each other's hair, like a lot of dandruff."

"Maybe we wouldn't," contended the boy. "Maybe it's natural for us to be together, like like ham and eggs, and pork and beans."

"And frankfurters and sauerkraut." The sudden smile vanished. "No, I couldn't get hooked up with a kid like you. I ain't dependable, and then—then I'm liable to bring you a lot of grief."

"You can't run out on us," decided Mickey. "Why, you and me—we're gonna make a lot of dough, see? Well, if Lady Q wins a race—why, maybe I could go to school and be a vet."

"Are you serious about that?"

Mickey was so serious that Terry decided to give the experiment a trial.

They were packing up to leave when Mickey, instead of calling Terry by the name of "doc," changed this to "pop," and the old vet asked if he were being disrespectful again.

"It wouldn't be a bad idea if we kinda made it legal," suggested this astute youngster. "I ain't got no folks, and you ain't got no kids."

"And where would that get us?"

"Well, it would make our partnership all the closer."

"You figure that if we adopted each other then I wouldn't be able to run out on you if I wanted to—that's the way you think, huh?"

"No, that ain't it," quietly answered Mickey. "Okay, let's drop it."

"Do you really mean that you'd like to have me be your old man?" Terry asked in wonderment.

"Yeah—I'd like that."

"All right—give me your mitt."

Terry gripped the boy's hand. "I, Tom Terry, do legally adopt you as my legal son till death do us part. Now you say it."

And so these two, over clasped hands,

From the direction of the paddock appeared a horse and rider going like the wind.

adopted each other. Terry told his new son that they would run Lady Q, win some dough, and the dough would be used to send Mickey to school.

"Can I ride her, pop?"

"Well, now—yeah, I guess you can." He shook a big hand at Mickey. "But listen. When that is over you're gonna quit fooling around race-tracks and get yourself an education, so you can be a vet."

The bond between the two was linked all the closer by the unkind action of the sea. It chose that evening for a very high tide, and the two were arguing about what they were going to do at Burlington when a large wave came right over their encampment. They were struggling out of the folds of the tent when several waves pounded down on them in rapid succession. The sea did its best to drag them into the depths, but they managed to cling to the rocks, and eventually struggle up the beach to safety. It was a relief to hear a whinny and find Lady Q anxiously waiting for them. The sea gathered into its coils the motor-car, the horse trailer, and all their bits and pieces.

"We're sunk!" cried Mickey in despair. "How we gonna get to Burlington now, pop?"

"Did you ever hear about walking?"

And so a man, a boy and a horse set out to trudge towards Burlington. Terry made Mickey have an occasional ride, but the boy would only stay up for a short while, as he was scared of injuring that hoof. And then, to make matters worse, it began to rain.

On the Land

It seemed to rain incessantly that night and the next day. And when darkness descended on the second day they trudged on in a vain endeavour of getting to Burlington before morning. They lost their way and wasted a lot of time before they got back to the main road, and then they came to a signpost which announced that Burlington was still twenty-three miles distant.

"Son, we can't get there to-night," Terry decided. "What's more, we oughta get Lady Q in the dry."

"I'll ask them in there." The shivering lad pointed to a gate and some buildings beyond. "Maybe they'll let us use the barn."

"They might say no." Terry pushed open the gate. "Nobody's likely to be snooping around on a night like this."

They found a comfortable barn and there was a lantern. Lady Q had a rub down, and after that they thought about their own attire. The water they rung out of their clothing. They found some old horse blankets and were able to fix up the horse and themselves. Terry was fixing his son a bed in the hay when the door of the barn was flung open and a thin, hawk-like female stalked in with a gun.

It needed a certain amount of persuasion to prevent the lady from shooting and, then sending for the sheriff. Finally she decided only to get the sheriff, until Mickey called out that they weren't afraid to work and earn their night's lodging that way.

"Very well, you harrow a field for me to-morrow morning," snapped the owner of the farm. "All three of you. I shouldn't be doing this. I certainly don't like the looks of you."

"Well, we've been out in the rain," explained Terry in his most conciliatory manner. "I bet you look a hundred per cent when you're all spruced up?"

Mrs. Beulah Flanders did not look her best in oilskins, a sou'-wester from beneath which strayed bits of hair in curlers, a long nightgown that protruded beneath the oilskins and gumboots. Never at any time could one call Beulah beautiful as her nose was like a beak, and her eyes were dark and fierce. One might describe her as a woman of great personality and much determination. Terry's honeyed words had no effect on her.

"I look just the same—wet or dry," was her sharp retort. "I'll call you to-morrow morning at five o'clock and expect you to be ready."

Directly she had gone the rain ceased like magic, but Beulah was there to call them at five. They did harness Lady Q to a harrow, but when out of sight of the farmhouse they put Lady Q in a grassy meadow whilst they raked that field. It was a whale of a task, but Terry and Mickey were tough and strong. Now and again they would rest and watch Lady Q gambolling about in the meadow.

"I bet this country air is sure doing her a lot of good," opined Mickey.

"You know what I think we ought to do?" answered his new father. "We ought to enter her right away in a stakes race, such as the Brewster Handicap on the opening day."

"Do you think she's good enough, pop?"

"Sure she's good enough." Then Terry rubbed his face. "The entry fee is seventy-five bucks."

"What are we going to do—rob a bank?"

"No." Terry pointed towards the distant farmhouse. "I think maybe I can talk that old mummy into giving us a job around here. This farm certainly needs some attention. Look at these fences, this old plough, and did you see those outhouses? With a pail of white-wash we could make the barn look a bit brighter. We oughta get ten bucks for a job like that."

Beulah was a hard task-master. She told them the farm was heavily mortgaged and that she was a very poor woman. Among other things she told them that she had had five husbands. They had all died a natural death, poor fellows. By this time Terry was not so sure he was going to twist this dame round his finger as he had promised Mickey he could do. She offered them five dollars for the barn and two for the fences—take it or leave it. As her cooking was good they took it.

Some weeks later they counted out their wealth. In a month they had earned sixty-two dollars and forty cents, but they were still twelve dollars and sixty cents short of the stake money, and it was only a few days before the meeting opened.

"I'll get that money some way or other," decided Terry, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. "The widow ain't so poor as she makes out. I'll find a way. What I want you to do is to hitch hike right up to Burlington and get an entry blank right away."

"Starting this minute. It'll be a great day, pop, when she wins her first race for us." The boy sighed. "And it'll be an even greater day when they hand out those vet's diplomas and you'll be sitting there—"

"Right in the front," chuckled his adopted father.

"And then the guy with a square piece of cardboard on his bean says: 'Doctor Michael Terry, come up here and get yours. And if you try real hard you might be half the vet. that your old man is.'"

"Go easy on the boloney," Terry said in husky accents, and then grinned proudly at his son. "I'll give you that beating if you don't get going."

"Well, what are you making me hang around here for?" retorted Mickey. "I could have been half-way to Burlington by now."

When the boy had gone Terry went over to the stall which housed Lady Q. She made a playful snap at him.

"Jealous, uh?" Terry chuckled. "You kinda like him, don't you? So do I. He's a great kid." He noticed one hoof off the ground. "Hallo, what's the matter with that foot of yours?" He knelt and lifted it, then touched it gently. "A little tender, huh, baby? Well, a bar shoe will fix that up all right."

His opportunity for getting the rest of the entry money came that very night. Benlah, who had taken a great fancy to this ill-assorted pair, came down to seek Terry's services. She was a member of a glee society and it was her turn to entertain. She needed a bass voice. If he helped her out he could have a suit of her last husband's clothes. Terry did not like the idea, nor did he like the gleam in Benlah's eyes as she smiled at him, but he thought it wisest to go to this sing-song.

Donovan Re-appears

MICKEY made short work of that walk because he was able with his engaging smile to get several useful lifts from lorry drivers. He had started soon after breakfast and at midday he walked into the offices of the Burlington Jockey Club. Mr. Gale had done the right thing by the boy and legally transferred the ownership, so that there was no trouble about obtaining an entry form.

Mickey sauntered out of the offices. "Hi yah, Mickey?" hailed a voice. "Well, if it ain't Sherlock Holmes," Mickey jeered, as he recognised Detective Donovan of the racing association. "How's the snoopy business?" "Good enough," was the laughing answer. "How's the stable-boy racket?"

"Oh, I wouldn't know. You see, I'm an owner now." Mickey stuck out his chest proudly. "Say, remember Gale's horse, Lady Q?"

"Sure—the short stop," Donovan retorted with a nod.

"Well, she quit stopping. She belongs to me now, and we're going to enter her in the Brewster Handicap and walk away with it."

"Great stuff!" The detective patted the boy on the shoulder. "Who is 'We'?"

"Me and my old man."

"Why, I didn't know you had a father."

The detective suddenly remembered something that had been worrying him for a long time.

"Say, did you ever run into that fellow again? You know, the one I talked to at the other track?"

"Well, that's my—" began Mickey, but Donovan interrupted him.

"I finally remembered who he was. I looked him up in the wanted file at headquarters—it was Doc. Terry all right."

"What?" Mickey said in amazed accents.

"Thomas Terry is his full name, and he used to be a vet." The detective shrugged his shoulders and laughed. "He owes the State about eight years. You haven't bumped into him, have you?"

"No, what's he wanted for?"

"There was a horse called Grand Sheik which was one of the finest horses that the track has ever known. Well, booze had got Terry, and he fell into the hands of a bunch of rascals who wanted Grand Sheik to lose, so they got Terry to do the old sponge act."

"Booze will make a guy do a lot of funny things," Mickey answered, looking round for a way to escape.

"This wasn't funny," was the serious reply. "The horse dropped dead in the middle of the race, and the jock riding him went to hospital with a broken leg. We nabbed Terry all right."

"Then he served his term?" eagerly questioned Mickey.

"No, he skipped bail." Donovan snapped his fingers impatiently. "I think I had him right in my hand, and let him get away."

"Guess I gotta be goin'."

"See you opening day?"

"Maybe not, Barney. Maybe her hoof ain't right yet. Maybe it's too soon after the operation."

"Operation on her hoof?" Donovan was interested at once. "Who did it?"

"A vet," stammered Mickey. "A young fellow I found."

"Terry did a marvellous operation on a horse once," Donovan remarked, his eyes watching the boy closely. "Also cured him of stopping."

"Oh, this was nothing like the Skee-ball operation," the boy answered, and regretted his foolish tongue directly he'd said it.

"I didn't mention the horse's name," Donovan rapped out. "How do you know about it?"

"I read about it."

"Thought you told me you didn't have any folks. Where'd you find your father?"

"I bumped into him accidentally."

"Hadn't seen each other for years, had you?" was the next question.

"Not since I was a baby."

"Then how'd you recognise each other? Why are you lying to me, Mickey."

"I ain't lying to you," the boy rapped out sharply.

"I know you love horses. You wouldn't deliberately shield a man who Pete the trainer was very dubious when he examined Lady Q's hoof.

"doped" a horse and injured a jockey for life, would you?"

"Quit putting the needles on me," Mickey wrenched himself free of the detective's restraining grip. "I don't know anything; why don't you do your own snooping?" The boy turned and sprang away.

The detective ran a few steps after the youngster, and then hesitated. Perhaps it would not be wise to take any action now, but he would most certainly be on the look-out for Mickey if he dared to show up at the racecourse. It would be odds on that this so-called father would accompany his son.

Mickey's Strange Behaviour

At the sing-song Terry felt rather out of place amongst all these country folks, and the fact that whenever he looked round Beulah Flanders always seemed to be watching him, did not make him feel any happier. When she went out at the interval to get some ice cream for the other glee singers she ordered Terry to pass the plates round.

That gave Terry an idea. He informed the singers that Mrs. Flanders had asked him to make a collection for the church steeple which needed a new spire and he started off the collection by tossing a dollar note into the plate. Like sheep they all followed suit, and by the time Beulah returned with the ice cream he had collected the required sum that made it possible for Lady Q to be entered at the Burlington racecourse.

Meanwhile, Mickey had returned to the farm. The sound of singing drew him to the house, and he saw his adopted father surrounded by a number of rather dreadful-looking singers. At any other time the boy would have been amused, but now it did not bring a smile. Warily he made his way to the barn, where for consolation he went into the stall of Lady Q.

"Lady, what am I going to do?" he murmured in dejected tones. "If pop goes near the track they'll nab him for sure. I gotta keep him away from Burlington, but how am I goin' to do that? He's all set on going. I can't tell him that I know all that he's done—if he'd wanted me to know he'd have told me. Maybe he's ashamed of me knowing it. I gotta find some way to keep him away from Burlington."

When Terry managed to get away from the house he ran towards the barn and gave a grunt of relief at seeing Mickey. He was so worried that he did not notice the strained look on the boy's face.

"We gotta get away," Terry blurted out. "That widow wants me to marry her whether I like it or not, and she wants the ceremony to-morrow afternoon. So we're getting out while the going's good."

"Don't do anything hasty, pop," Mickey said. "It's beautiful out here in the country, she's a good sort, and we could be awfully happy."

"What's the matter with you?" Terry demanded in amazement.

"What about racing Lady Q and getting the dough for your schooling?"

"Oh, we don't have to race her," argued the boy. "We don't need the dough; you could teach me. Why, I bet you know more than all the vet schools put together."

"Two things I ain't—a teacher and a husband," Terry announced definitely. "We're moving on. We can make Burlington by morning."

Realising that he had failed to shake his adopted father's decision about leaving the farm, he adopted the only method that he thought would keep January 21st, 1939.

him away from Burlington. He announced without daring to look at his father, that he had changed his mind about going to Burlington and racing Lady Q. He did not think the horse was ready, and he reckoned his father was right in warning him to stay away from race tracks. He would much prefer to stick around on the farm.

Terry retorted that he wasn't sticking around this farm or any other farm, and ordered Mickey to start packing.

"I ain't going to Burlington," stubbornly replied the boy.

"Why not?"

"You're liable to start drinking again."

"I ain't had a drink in months." "That's because it's hard to get around here. There's a lot of booze around the track." And the boy hesitated, at a loss for words. "Guess I'd better come clean with you—I've been thinking over this father and son business, and I reckon you and me are a lot different."

"Have you gone out of your head?" Terry demanded.

"We don't belong together," Mickey shouted, hating the part he was playing. "You said at the beach we'd try it. Well, we've tried it and I don't think it works out."

When Terry tried to argue, Mickey became almost hysterical and sobbed out that he didn't want to see his adopted father any more, and all he wanted was to get away from the farm and take his horse with him.

So Mickey left the farm that night taking Lady Q with him, and he hoped that Terry would stay and work for Mrs. Flanders; but when that good lady came down in the morning to the barn both the hired man and his son had vanished.

The next morning Mickey walked into the Burlington Jockey Club, where the steward and his assistant were busy accepting entries and discussing arrangements with owners and other people connected with the race-track. Patiently the boy waited his turn, and at last the steward beckoned him forward.

"What is it, young man?"

"Is there any chance of a fellow getting any credit around here?"

"Credit?" questioned the steward.

"Why not?" demanded Mickey truculently. "Suppose a fellow had a great horse that should be in the handicap, but he didn't have enough money to enter it, why not let him run her, and then you guys can take the money out of her winnings?"

The steward was amused. "There's always a small possibility of the animal losing, you know," he said kindly.

"There ain't a chance of this horse ever losing."

The steward was paying little attention as a beautifully dressed woman had come through the swing doors. She was accompanied by a thin, horsey-looking individual who was her trainer.

"Good-morning, Mrs. Shephard!" the steward beamed. "Very happy to see you again."

"Thank you," murmured the lady, with a charming smile.

"What can we do for you?"

"Let me have your condition book," answered Mrs. Shephard, with a gay laugh, "and please point out the soft spots in it, so my horses can pick up a lot of worth-while stakes; I'm a poor woman this year."

"What?" questioned the steward, shaking his head disbelievingly. "After all the money Miracle Lad has made for you? When will we see Miracle Lad?"

"We're going to work him in a little while," was the guarded reply.

"I suppose the horse is still running true to form?" the assistant steward remarked to the trainer.

"He's the finest piece of horseflesh you'll ever see around here," boasted the trainer. "And one of the fastest."

The impetuous Mickey stepped forward.

"I'll race my horse against him any time, any place," he stated.

"Here, here, young man!" rebuked the steward. "You run along—we're busy."

But Mrs. Shephard was intrigued by the determined manner of this very poorly garbed youngster.

"Wait, wait," she said to the steward, with a disarming smile.

The official gave a little bow, and then the woman looked at Mickey.

"Are you an owner?" she asked.

"Yes, ma'am," the boy said boastfully. "My horse is as good as any on the track. Bring on your Miracle Lad and we'll show you what racing is."

"Well, we might do that some time, but not right now," Mrs. Shephard answered in her pleasant way. "He's just been shipped down from a farm and has had a long, tiring journey."

"I had to walk Lady Q twenty-three miles last night to get here. I guess that just about makes us even."

"Suppose you give her a rest?" suggested Mrs. Shephard. "And then soon we'll have a private race all our own."

"And in the meantime, young man, you'd better get back to her," decided the steward, with an obvious air of command. "She probably misses you by now."

The Try-out

THAT afternoon Mrs. Shephard arranged for Miracle Lad to have a try-out, and Mickey expecting this had hung around the stables with Lady Q. Mrs. Shephard went with the steward and her trainer to the judge's stand in order to get a good view. An assistant trainer timed the start, but Miracle Lad had not gone more than a furlong when from the direction of the paddock appeared a horse and rider going like the wind. Everybody in the judge's stand gaped as this unknown rider drew up alongside Miracle Lad with the obvious intention of giving the champion horse a race.

Needless to say, the jockey riding Miracle Lad was astounded when there was a thunder of hoofs and the filly flashed alongside.

"Hey, you!" he shouted. "What's the idea?"

"Go on, let that hothouse flower out!" jeered Mickey.

"Get out of here, you mug!" ordered the jockey. "This is Miracle Lad."

"And this is Lady Q," was the retort.

Naturally, this challenge was more than the jockey of Miracle Lad could stand, and, urging his mount to a faster pace, swept ahead. But if he imagined he was going to throw off Lady Q and leave the filly standing he was doomed to disappointment. At the half-mile post Lady Q lay a half a length behind Miracle Lad, but coming into the straight the horses were running neck and neck.

The steward was most indignant. He would have the impertinent person barred from the race-track and even sent to prison, but Mrs. Shephard was a woman with a keen sense of humour and a great understanding. She could not recognise the rider, yet she had a

With his dying breath Pete Haley tells his brother Ted—a stranger to the district—that a man named Rothert knifed him. Ted sets out to avenge his brother's murder, but it is not till there have been sensational attempts on his own life that the killer is unmasked. An action-packed story of the West, starring Charles Starrett

In the Moonlight

DARKNESS had enveloped the hills and valleys of the Texan Panhandle before Ted Haley deserted the coach road at Pointed Rocks for the rough trail that led downwards to his brother's ranch-house; but a full moon was high in the starry sky, and the quiet night gave no hint of the tragedy that lay ahead.

Pete Haley's letter, asking Ted to join him as a partner, was in his pocket, but he had memorised the directions it contained. At the foot of a long, steep slope he turned into a tree-fringed lane along which he rode for half a mile and so came to a rail fence, enclosing sheds, stables, yard, and rather a neglected garden in which the house itself stood.

Outside the fence, on its southern side, but in a direct line with the porch of the house, an ugly fellow named Cal Hinks was hiding in the heart of a bush. He had a nose like the beak of some bird of prey, and a long, lean and unshaven face. As Ted stopped his white horse just inside a gateway, Cal Hinks parted some branches to peer out at him.

There was no light in any window of the ranch-house, and this seemed strange to the tall and handsome young cowboy who had travelled the better part of two hundred miles in response to a pressing invitation.

He shouted his brother's name, but only his own voice disturbed the silence of the place. He dismounted wonderingly, hitched the horse to a rail and unsaddled it, hung the saddle over another rail, and walked towards the porch.

"Pete!" he shouted, as he reached the steps. "You there, Pete?"

Still the ominous silence persisted, and he drew his six-gun before he mounted the steps, and it was with his left hand that he raised the latch of the front door.

The door opened easily enough, and he looked into a living-room full of shadows. Just at first he thought the room was untenanted, but as he entered it and moved cautiously round a table he stopped short and caught at his breath; for there lay his brother in a pool of moonlight on the floor, and in the pool of moonlight was another pool that looked black although it was red.

"Pete!" he gasped. And then he put away his gun and dropped on one knee to raise a dying man's head and shoulders in strong arms.

"Pete," he said brokenly. "Pete, it's your brother, Ted. Look at me."

Slowly a pair of glazing eyes were opened, and there was a struggle for breath. Ted knew the end was near.

"Who did this?" he asked. Bloodless lips moved, trying to shape words.

"It—was—"

"Who?" Ted put an ear close to the lips.

"Sol—" The name was barely audible. "Sol—"

"Yes?" urged Ted. "Yes?"

"Roth—Roth-ert. Sol—"

Pete Haley's head fell back and his dreadful breathing ceased. "Sol Rothert." Still holding his brother, Ted put the two names together, uttering them aloud in a voice that boded ill for their owner; and for a few minutes the ticking of a clock was the only sound in the room.

A wooden bunk was set against one of the walls, and it was upon this bunk that Ted presently laid dead Pete, covering him with a blanket. He stood bare-headed, gazing sorrowfully down at the shrouded figure, then went to the door.

It was not till he was out on the porch that he put his ten-gallon sombrero back on his head. Cal Hinks watched him do it, from the bush that concealed him, and saw him go to the rail and unfasten the horse.

A girl in riding-breeches and a shirt-like blouse had ridden along the lane from the south-west, on the broad back of a sorrel, while Ted was in the ranch-house. She had dismounted under a tree near a little gate in the fence, and she was in the shadows at the back of the ranch-house when Ted emerged from the front of it. Entirely unaware of her presence, he was re-saddling his horse when she reached the porch and went in at the door.

In the living-room she lit an oil-lamp that was standing on the table, and it was the light of the lamp that he noticed in the act of fastening a girth. Instantly his gun was out, and he went racing across an untidy lawn to the porch. But as he raised the latch of the door the light was blown out, and as he looked into the living-room a door on the far side of it was being opened by a dark figure he took to be that of a man.

"Stop, or I'll shoot!" he threatened harshly.

Across the room a six-gun spat flame, and a bullet sang past his head and buried itself in the top panel of the door behind him. He fired twice; but his bullets were wasted, too, for the girl had got out at the other door, and he reached it to find it bolted.

He put his shoulder to the door, and the bolt gave way. He dived across a moonlit kitchen and out at the back of the house in time to see a boyish figure making for the little gate near the tree under which the sorrel had been left.

He fired, and as he did so the girl stumbled and fell.

She was lying on a gravel path when he reached her, and he looked down at her in utter consternation.

"Holy mackerel, a girl!" he exclaimed.

Her eyes were closed; she was motionless on her side, and there was blood upon her forehead above her left eyebrow. Ted decided that water was the first essential, and he hastened back to a well he had noticed not far from the back door.

A bucket was standing there, and he lowered it on a rope. But while he was filling the bucket and hauling it up the girl got to her feet and made for her horse, and she was galloping off along the lane when he turned towards the spot where she had fallen.

Down went the bucket, spilling its contents, and Ted whipped out his gun. But as he was about to shoot he remembered that it was a girl who had played a trick on him, and he thrust the gun back into its holster and walked away to the fence to finish saddling his own horse.

A signboard at the side of the coach road at Pointed Rocks had informed him that the town of Shanley was seven miles south of the spot where it stood. He judged that the town would be about ten miles across country from the ranch-house, and from the lane he set off through a patch of woodland.

As soon as he had disappeared from sight Cal Hinks deserted his hiding-place and mounted a horse he had tethered to a tree at some distance from the bush. He galloped along the lane in the direction taken by the girl, but turned out from it on to rising grassland after he had covered a couple of miles, and from the top of a hill swept down to a big ranch-house.

A letter-box on a post near the open gateway of a yard bore the name "Sol Rothert" upon its metal front. He rode in at the gateway, hitched his horse to the rail of a corral, and went along a path to the front of the house.

The man who opened the door to him looked more like a clerk than a servant. He was dressed in a dark lounge suit, and his thin brown hair was brushed well back from his forehead. As Cal Hinks had not knocked it was obvious that the man had witnessed his arrival.

"Mr. Sol wants to see you right away," he said.

"Sure," nodded Cal Hinks, stepping into a hall of considerable size out of which stairs ascended. "Where is he, John?"

John Shend pointed to a door, and was leading the way to it, when Cal thrust him aside and stalked into a room furnished partly as a sitting-room and partly as an office.

A grey-haired man of fifty or so, heavy of build, was sitting at a flat-topped desk in a wheel-chair with a rug over his knees, and he glared at the intruder, his mouth an ugly line beneath a clipped brown moustache.

"Oh, it's you!" he rasped. "How many times have I told you to knock?"

Cal advanced to the desk and perched himself on a corner of it with all the assurance in the world.

January 21st, 1939.

"You're gonna have to get rid of that little wild-cat in some better way," he said gruffly. "She don't scare none too easy."

"Did you do what I told you?" demanded Sol Rothert.

"Oh, sure! Put on masks and—"

"Well?"

"She lit out like a jack-rabbit. Made a bee-line for the very place we didn't want her to go."

Rothert's piercing brown eyes narrowed.

"Did she see anything?"

"Everything! And some jasper I never seen before poked his nose in, too!"

Rothert gripped the arms of his wheel-chair.

"What happened?"

"Sol, she ups and shoots at him, and he shoots at her!"

"Anything else?"

"Nope." Cal shook his head. "So I loped on home."

"I'll pack her off to-morrow—or wring her little neck!"

"Might be a good idea," drawled Cal, "and, again, it might've been a better idea if you hadn't let her come here."

"You know I didn't have anything to do with that," snapped Rothert. "She came on her own account. I couldn't stop her."

Cal grinned, and the grin did not improve his appearance.

"Sorta upsets things, don't it?" he suggested.

Rothert looked down at the barrel of a .45 projecting from some papers on the desk.

"Which way did the man go?" he asked abruptly.

"I couldn't tell," was the reply, "but if he's got any sense he'll line out for town."

Unnoticed by either of them the door of the room had been opened again, and the girl who had escaped from Ted was standing there.

"Who's going to town?" she inquired.

"Anyone I know?"

Rothert had started visibly at the sound of her voice, but he summoned a smile for her.

"No, nobody you know, honey," he said smoothly.

She ran over to him and sat on an arm of his wheel-chair. Her hazel eyes were large and luminous; her golden-brown hair, parted on the left, had been combed and brushed since her tumble.

"How are you, Uncle Sol?" she said, putting a hand on his shoulder. "Feeling better to-night?"

"Much better now that you're back safe and sound," he replied, patting the hand.

Cal had walked round the desk to the other side of the chair and he was leaning at her. Rothert looked round and he said:

"Oh, I don't believe you've met Cal. He's an old codger squats back in the hills, but comes down sometimes when I need extra help. This is Adele Rothert, Cal, my brother's daughter. Came out to pay her old uncle a visit. Just lost her father."

"Pleased to meet you," said Cal. But she turned her head away because she saw evil in his screwed-up eyes, and Rothert caught sight of a scratch over her left eyebrow.

"Why, what's the matter, honey?" he asked, pointing a finger. "Did you have an accident?"

"No, I just slipped over a stone and took a little tumble," she explained.

"That's why I asked you not to ride around at night," he rebuked. "This country's too rough for you, Adele. I think you'd better go back home."

"Oh, please, Uncle Sol, don't send me away!" she cried. "I like it here!"

Cal shifted from one side of his jaw to the other a wad of tobacco he was chewing. Rothert glanced sideways at him.

"I'd feel much better if you were safe back East," he said. "Don't you think so, Cal?"

"Sure do," confirmed the chewer.

"But, Uncle Sol, you know I have no place to go," protested Adele.

"We'll talk about it in the morning," decided Rothert. "Now, you run along to bed like a good girl. I've got a little business I want to discuss with Cal."

She rose meekly and went out from the room, closing the door behind her.

"The sooner she's gone," began Cal viciously, "the better I—"

"I'll take care of her," snarled Rothert, in a fashion that would have astonished his niece. "Now let's get back to this fellow. D'you think he'll report it to the sheriff?"

"Yeah. He'll probably start talkin' his head off."

"Then why don't you ride?"

Cal shrugged.

"Just waitin' for orders," he said. And he tilted the cow-hat that had been on his head all the time and went to the door.

Trouble in Town

THE town of Shanley was situated in a valley, and in the daytime it presented quite an attractive appearance to the eye of a stranger, with verdant hills rising to the sky on every side of it. But Ted found it larger than he had anticipated and its thoroughfares ill-lit.

Oil lamps in brackets that projected from the wooden walls of buildings provided less illumination at night than the moon, now sinking towards the south, and in the main street the Pioneer Saloon was conspicuous because of the light that streamed through its numerous windows.

Ted decided that he might obtain information in the saloon that would save a search in the town, and he left his horse at a hitching-rail below the veranda of the establishment, crossed the veranda, and went in at an open door.

A reek of smoke assailed his nostrils as he entered a long and fairly crowded bar-room. Just inside the door a nickelodeon was in full blast because someone had put a coin in its slot. He made his way past several tables at which men were seated, and he reached the bar.

"Good-evenin'," said the shirt-sleeved man behind the bar.

Ted touched the brim of his ten-gallon hat with a gloved hand.

"Who's the law in this town?" he inquired.

"Bill Ashley's the sheriff," was the reply. "What'll you have to drink?"

Ted ignored the question.

"Who's Sol Rothert?" he asked.

"Rancher up country." The bartender seemed to be getting impatient.

"What'll you have?"

Ted glanced about the long room, and many pairs of eyes were turned in his direction. Two heavyweights at a table between the bar and the door were well within earshot and were staring.

"Is he around town to-night?" asked Ted.

"You're a stranger here, ain't you?" rapped the bartender; and then, as the questioner nodded: "Thought so, else you wouldn't be askin' if he was in town."

"Well," persisted Ted, "is he?"

"No. Are you drinkin' or ain't you?"

"No!" snapped Ted in a voice to match; and he was making for the door when one of the heavyweights shouted after him:

"Hi, wait a minute!"

He stopped and turned, and both men rose from their table and slouched over to him. They might almost have been twins, for they were of the same height and breadth; burly fellows, dressed as cow-punchers, and both had heavy features and each had a small moustache. But one was swarthier than the other, and it was he who had spoken.

"Stranger hereabouts, ain't you?" he demanded, looking Ted up and down.

"That's right."

"Your face looks sorta familiar. Ain't I seen you somewhere before?"

"I don't think so," said Ted, "but lots of people think I look like my brother, Pete Haley."

"Sure," nodded the swarthy one; "now I get it."

"Yeah, me, too," said his companion.

"My name's Britt—Ike Britt. This is Moose Nelson." Britt extended a hand. "Just a couple o' cowpokes wantin' to be friendly."

Ted looked at the hand, but did not accept it.

"I'm Ted Haley," he said; "but what of it?"

"How come you inquired for the sheriff?" Britt's voice was eager.

"Anything happened?"

"What would be likely to happen?" challenged Ted.

"Don't ask me." The rejected hand was dropped. "How come you to ask about Sol Rothert?"

Ted frowned.

"For total strangers," he said sharply, "you're about the nosiest pair I ever ran across."

"Wait a minute!" Britt caught at his left arm. "You're just like your brother, ain't you?" he sneered.

"Always lookin' for trouble! Well, let me tell you somethin', young fellow—me and Peto Haley has been on the edge of a show-down for a long time, and I'd jest as soon take it out on you, if you've got the nerve—"

Ted's right fist blotted out whatever else Britt had intended to say, and though the fist was gloved the strength of the blow to the mouth sent the traducer of a dead man stumbling sideways against a table. Moose Nelson instantly reached for his gun, but before he could draw it Ted was out and Ted rapped at him:

"I wouldn't try it, partner! Stay where you are!"

In at the door from the street came a round-faced and bull-necked man, clean-shaven and fierce of aspect. In his right hand was a six-shooter, and on the front of his shirt was a metal star. He was Bill Ashley, Sheriff of Shanley County, and in a voice of authority he roared:

"Put up your irons!"

The bar-tender, who had snatched up a hammer, replaced the thing in haste. Britt and Nelson looked a trifle sheepish. Ted put away his six-shooter and said:

"It's all-over, sheriff. Nobody hurt. Take me to your office, will you? I want to talk to you private."

"Come on!" said the sheriff grimly; and Ted went out from the saloon with him, crossed the street, proceeded some little way down it on the opposite boardwalk, and came to a building of brick and stone.

The sheriff's office faced the street, and at the back of the oddly shaped room were iron-barred cells. Bill Ashley motioned to a chair at the end of a roll-top desk and lowered himself into a swivel-chair which creaked as he leaned back in it, to eye his visitor in the light of an oil lamp on the top of the desk.

Ted described what had happened in the saloon.

"That's all there was to it, sheriff," he wound up. "They started trouble and I finished it. Now, what I want to know is who are these two hombres? Where do they come from?"

"I can't say," replied the sheriff, rubbing his chin, "and it ain't healthy to ask too many questions in this district. Just consider yourself lucky, son. That's a dangerous pair. Britt's got the brains and Moose throws lead like a whirlwind."

"If they're that bad," said Ted, "why don't you pick 'em up?"

"They ain't done nuthin' yet. They get drunk and ugly sometimes, but say, why are you askin' me all this?"

"Because my brother was murdered to-night."

The sheriff swung round in the chair and his blue eyes bulged.

"Pete Haley murdered?" he exclaimed.

"Yes," replied Ted gravely, "I got there just before he died."

"Did he say who done it?"

"Yes."

Ted was sitting opposite a window, and at that moment he saw to his amazement a six-gun almost touching one of its panes and a cow hat and a pair of beady eyes behind the gun. With a bound he was on his feet, and his left arm swept the lamp flying from the top of the desk to the floor as he whipped out his own gun and fired.

Two shots rang out almost simultaneously and two panes of the window were broken. The glass container of the lamp had been smashed by its fall, and in the darkness the sheriff pitched headlong from his swivel-chair.

A Surprise for Ted

IKE BRITT and Moose Nelson were on the veranda of the saloon when they heard the shot. They were talking to Tom Haggard, the ban and lanky deputy-sheriff, who had just mounted the steps.

"That was the sheriff's office!" exclaimed Britt.

With one accord the three ran, and another man in the street ran with them. Cal Hinks, who had crouched below the window-sill of the office to shoot at Ted, had made his escape through an alleyway at the side of the building. Ted had just opened the door, gun in hand, when Britt and the others reached it, and Britt grabbed hold of him and the deputy-sheriff snatched at his gun.

"Let me go!" cried Ted. "He'll get away!"

"Shut up!" commanded the deputy harshly, and Ted was bundled back into the room, and Britt stooped over the body on the floor.

"He got Ashley!" he announced.

"Fetch a light!" barked the deputy.

"Call a doctor!"

Slim Brinley, the man who had joined the others in the roadway, rushed off to get a doctor. Moose Nelson struck a match, found another lamp on a shelf and lit it.

"Help me get him on the couch," said Britt, who had ascertained that the sheriff was still breathing, though unconscious.

"Watch him, Moose!"

Moose Nelson stood guard over Ted while the wounded man was carried to an old-fashioned couch set against a brick wall close to one of the cells.

"Looks like his chest," remarked Britt, pointing to a crimson stain on the sheriff's shirt, and the deputy unfastened the neck of the shirt, exposing a patch of ploughed-up flesh, and discovered a bullet that had been stopped by the back of the metal star.

"Creased by a forty-five," he commented, studying the bullet.

"Yeah," said Britt, with a jerk of his head in Ted's direction, "and that is a forty-five."

"What about it, fellow?" demanded the deputy harshly.

"It wasn't me," Ted responded.

"That shot was fired from the outside." He walked across the room. "Here, take a look at this window. That shot was meant for me, not Ashley!"

The others gathered round to look at the jagged hole in one of the panes.

"How can you tell which way a bullet comes?" challenged Britt.

"Take a look at the glass on the floor!"

Broken fragments of the pane were mostly in a line with the chair Ted had occupied at the end of the desk; but Tom Haggard, the deputy, stared at the hole in the adjoining pane.

"How about that?" he snapped.

"That's the shot I fired" replied Ted.

"You'll find most of the glass on the sill outside."

The door swung de and Slim

January 21st, 1939.

Brinley crossed the threshold with a portly white-haired man, full-faced and full-lipped, who was carrying a black bag. Nearly a dozen other men—mostly from the saloon—surged into the room behind these two.

"Here's the doctor!" shouted Brinley.

The deputy ejected the crowd and conducted the doctor over to the couch. Harrington was the old doctor's name, and he was very well acquainted with gunshot wounds. He proceeded to deal expertly with the sheriff's chest.

"What d'you say, doc?" asked Britt, with seeming anxiety.

Dr. Harrington did not hear the question, or else he ignored it, and Britt turned to Tom Haggard.

"You'd better stick him in the cooler, Tom," he said, "unless you want a necktie party on your hands!"

The men who had been ejected were peering in at the windows, and quite a crowd had congregated round the building.

"How do we know you didn't do it?" challenged Ted, facing his accuser stormily.

"Take it easy!" rasped the deputy, taking hold of his arm.

"I tell you I didn't do it!"

"Come on!"

Ted was being marched towards a cell when Bill Ashley opened his eyes and saw what was happening. He had recovered consciousness a minute or two before, and the voices had just become intelligible to him.

"Stop," he said feebly, and raised a hand. "The cowboy didn't do it. The shot came from outside."

"All right, Bill."

The deputy let go of his prisoner and handed back the gun he had confiscated.

The flesh wound in the sheriff's chest was dressed and bandaged and his shirt refastened; but the doctor still sat on the edge of the couch, nursing his bag.

"Well," said Britt, "I guess you don't need me any more. I'll jest nosey along."

Nobody tried to stop him, and he went off with Moose Nelson. Slim Brinley followed, and the deputy closed the door. The crowd, on hearing that some person unknown had shot the sheriff from outside the building, drifted back to the saloon.

"Feeling any better, Bill?" inquired the doctor, as the sheriff moved his head and drew a long breath.

"Good enough to hear the rest o' what this cowboy was tryin' to tell me," was the reply. "Go ahead, son. Who was the man? You haven't told me."

Ted shifted a chair to the head of the couch and sat down on it.

"Sol Rothert?" he said.

"Sol Rothert?" echoed the sheriff incredulously. "Your brother said that Sol Rothert knifed him?"

"Those were his last words."

"Impossible!" exploded the doctor.

"There must be some mistake," said the sheriff. "because Sol Rothert is a helpless cripple."

"What?" Ted could hardly believe his ears.

"Paralysed from the waist down. Never gets out of a wheel-chair."

"Oh!"

"Your brother must've been tryin' to tell you something else, and couldn't make it. Pete and Sol were good friends. Forget it, son."

Ted looked at the old doctor, but his mind was grappling with the problem. His brother had said that Sol Rothert "did it."

"If he's paralysed," he asked abruptly, "how does he run his ranch?"

"He's got some pretty good boys up there," the sheriff replied.

January 21st, 1939.

"I suppose his daughter helps him?"

"His daughter?" It was the sheriff's turn to be astonished. "Sol hasn't got any daughter!"

"Wife, then?"

"What're you gettin' at?"

"Oh, nothing—nothing."

"You must have something on your mind. Come clean, Haley."

"Well," said Ted slowly, "I saw a girl up at Pete's ranch-house."

"A girl?" The sheriff blinked at him. "What'd she look like?"

"Blonde. About twenty. City bred, I'd say."

"I don't know anybody like that."

The sheriff looked at Harrington. "Do you, doc?"

"Not in this country," was the emphatic reply. "unless she came from the North in the past few days."

Tom Haggard walked in at the door. "The wagon's ready," he said.

"You'd better come along, doc. And you, too, Haley. We're goin' up to your brother's place."

The deputy had harnessed horses to a wagon with a view to bringing the body of Pete Haley to the town mortuary, and he wanted the doctor to make a post-mortem examination. The three men set off on the vehicle, the deputy driving, and it was after midnight when the ranch-house was reached.

Ike Britt and Moose Nelson were in the living-room, bending over the bunk on which the dead man lay, when the rumble of wheels in the lane reached their ears.

"What's that?" asked Moose, straightening his back to listen.

Britt ran to a window.

"They're comin'!" he said. "Douse that light!"

Moose blew out the lamp that was standing on the table, and Britt whisked a similar lamp from a shelf in the light of a match.

"Put that lamp on the shelf," he directed, "and I'll leave this cool one in its place."

The exchange was effected, and the two heavyweights crept out through the kitchen to the back door.

They were behind the bush Cal Hinks had used, some hours earlier, when Ted opened the front door and the deputy and the doctor followed him into the living-room. The deputy lit the lamp that was on the table, the doctor went to the bunk. Ted gazed about the room, and then he joined the doctor.

"Have you touched anything, doc?" he questioned.

"No," was the reply.

"Then someone's been here!"

"What d'you mean?" asked the deputy.

Ted pointed to the blanket, which was in a heap at the bottom of the bunk.

"I'm positive I covered Pete before I left," he declared. "Was that lamp hot when you lit it?"

"No, stone cold," said the deputy.

Ted went to the lamp that was on the shelf, stripped off a glove, and put a hand on the glass chimney.

"This one isn't!" he cried. "That murderer's been back here! We've gotta find him!"

He drew his gun and darted out at the door. But there was not a sound in the moonlight, except his own foot falls, and after he had circled the building he re-entered the living-room and thrust his gun back into its holster.

"Nobody around," he growled, "but we've gotta find him!"

"I'll do everything I can to help," promised the deputy, "but it's gonna be a lot tougher than you think."

"What Tom means," expounded the doctor gravely, "is that they've knocked off your brother and they'll get you. This isn't the first murder we've had. They've been goin' on steady for a year past. And cattle thievin', too, and banks. It's got so that nobody's life is safe now—let alone property!"

Ted turned to the deputy with frowning eyes.

"Hasn't anybody been able to buck this gang?" he demanded.

"Well, we'd know how to handle 'em all right if we could only find out who they are," said the deputy defensively.

"Here's one man who's goin' to find out!" raged Ted.

"You can see by what Tom says," warned the doctor, "that it might be smart to get out while you can."

But Ted shook his head.

"Can't you understand, doc?" he asked passionately. "I've got to find the man who killed my brother!"

"That's fine, son, but I was only thinkin' about you." The old doctor shrugged his shoulders. "Well, you know what you're doing."

"I think so," gritted Ted.

Ted Pays a Call

DEAD Pete Haley needed little examination to determine the cause of his end; the knife with which he had been stabbed in the back had penetrated the left lung. But the knife itself could not be found, though a thorough search was made for it.

Ted rode back in the wagon to Shanley, with his brother's body beside him, and after it had been deposited in the mortuary he stabled his horse at the rear of the local hotel and spent none too restful a night in a strange bed on the first floor of that very unpretentious establishment.

Next morning he interviewed an undertaker, then paid a visit to the sheriff's office to see how Bill Ashley was progressing. Dr. Harrington was with his patient, and he stated that Bill very soon would be up and about again as usual.

Ted and the doctor parted company on the boardwalk outside the office, and Ted was crossing the roadway to get his horse when Ike Britt hailed him from the veranda of the saloon. Moose Nelson was squatting on the top step of the veranda, whittling a piece of wood, but he rose and walked with Britt to Ted, who stopped short.

"Howdy, Haley?" greeted the swarthy one.

He held out his hand, but the hand was scorned.

"Take it easy, cowboy," he said gruffly. "I come to apologise. Last night, when I made that crack about your brother, I didn't know that he was dead."

"Well?" barked Ted.

"I don't blame you for bein' mad. Besides, I was a bit drunk and ornery."

"Go on."

"Me and Moose come in peace. Want to be friends and I want to tell you we'll do everything we can to help you catch the skunk that knifed your brother."

"Buy you a drink?" suggested Moose.

"No, thanks."

"I understand you inherit that little spread of your brother's," said Britt. "Want to sell it?"

"Oh, I don't know." Ted rubbed his chin. "Haven't had time to think about such matters. Why do you know anybody who wants to buy it?"

"Nobody I know of—unless you could interest Sol Rothert. His land joins yours on the west."

That interested Ted.

"You acquainted with Rothert?" he asked.

"Nope, never met him," Britt replied. "But one o' the boys was guessin', last night, that maybe he'd buy a little place for his gal, in case she got married."

Ted's eyes narrowed. "Has Sol got a daughter, then?" "No, not exactly—just some relative, came in about a week ago. He's kept her pretty close to home, and not many people know she's here."

"Well, thanks, boys," Ted flipped a hand. "I might drop in and see Rothert some time."

He sauntered on to the hotel, farther down the street, and Cal Hinks stepped out from the open door of the saloon behind which he had been straining his ears to catch some of the conversation. He leaned over the rail of the veranda, and he heard Moose say:

"D'you think he fell for it?" "Didn't you see his eyes?" exclaimed Britt. "He's goin' to Sol right now, and that'll give us plenty of time to finish our little business."

Ted came riding out from the stable-yard of the hotel, and three pairs of eyes watched him as he entered up the street and turned west at the top of it. Cal Hinks promptly descended from the veranda to the hitching-rail, mounted his horse there, and set off to trail the man he had tried to shoot the night before.

Rothert's ranch-house was twelve miles away from the town, and on the road that led uphill and downhill to the distant village of Blue Creek Cal kept well behind his quarry. But after Ted had turned into a private lane on the rancher's property, and his destination became assured, the unshaven crook spurred his horse to greater effort, and he passed Ted half-way along the lane.

Sol Rothert, that morning, had summoned all the members of his outfit to the room that was his office, and they were gathered round the desk at which he sat in his wheel-chair, a rough-looking crew numbering about a dozen.

One of them, a fellow with a ragged moustache and the beginnings of a chin-beard, evidently did not like a scheme Rothert had outlined, for he growled:

"I ain't sayin' I won't do it. All I'm sayin' is that it seems to me like we oughta go kind of easy. Folks around here are gettin' nervous, and you can't ever tell what a nervous man's gonna do. He might bust loose any minute."

"I've already explained that this is our last job," rasped Rothert. "We're going to make one big clean-up, and then scatter to some other place. Now, Troope, do you still want to quit?"

"I don't feel like stickin' my head out when it ain't necessary," grumbled the man.

Rothert swung the wheel-chair round so that he faced him.

"One more crack like that," he threatened, "and I'll turn you over to Kansas City. There's a rope waitin' for you up there that'll just about fit that thick neck o' yours!"

Troope flinched, and a grumpy hand went to his throat as though he could feel the rope there already. Rothert swung the chair to address the others.

"And that goes for the rest of you, too," he said, his fierce eyes ranging the group. "There ain't a man here that ain't wanted, and I've got what it takes to put you away. Now what about it? Are you with me?"

A half-breed at the end of the desk—named Boyle—answered because the eyes rested on him as the alleged foreman of the outfit.

"Oh, of course we are, boss," he muttered. "B-but it's still sort o' bad havin' that gal around."

"Forget it!" snapped Rothert. "She's leavin' to-morrow. Now it doesn't matter what happens to any of you—I want that money!"

Adele, in riding-breeches and a plaid blouse, had descended the stairs, and she was about to open the door of the room when John Shend dived across the hall to intercept her.

"Mr. Sol is busy," he cried, "you can't go in!"

"Uncle Sol won't mind," she retorted, and before the servant could stop her the door was open and she was in the room.

Hands that had reached for guns were dropped, and Sol Rothert became an entirely different person.

"All right, boys," he said cheerfully, "go back to your work, and don't forget to mend that fence on the upper sixty."

The men trooped out past the girl, and she advanced to the desk.

"Hallo, Uncle Sol!" she said. "Am I interrupting?"

"Not at all, honey," he assured her. "I was just givin' the boys a goin' over. Some of them need it."

Cal Hinks burst into the room, stopped to scowl at Adele, then went to Rothert and whispered in his ear.

"Is tha, so?" said Rothert. "Well, pick up that coat and get out of here."

Cal went off with a coat one of the members of the outfit had dropped in a chair, and Adele asked what had happened.

"A stranger, Ted Haley, is coming to talk about some land," her uncle replied. "We don't want him to think we live like pigs in a pen. Straighten things up, honey, will you?"

The room was being tidied when Ted rode into the yard from the lane, dismounted, and made his way to the porch. The watchful John saw him from a window and sped to his employer.

"He's coming," he reported. "Show him in," Rothert said to his niece as there came a knock at the front door, and she ran out and opened the front door.

She and Ted looked at one another, and recognition was mutual.

"I'm Adele Rothert," she said. "Won't you come in? Uncle Sol is expecting you. This way, please."

Ted was surprised to hear that he was expected, but he followed her without comment. Rothert had wheeled his chair round the desk and an ordinary chair had been placed near it.

"You're Ted Haley?" he asked, studying the tall, lithe and handsome young man who stood before him.

"That's right," nodded Ted. "And you're Sol Rothert?"

Rothert inclined his head.

"You've met my niece?" It was more of a statement than a question, but Ted merely murmured a "How d'you do?" to the girl, and she responded with equal formality.

"Perhaps Mr. Haley would like a drink?" suggested Rothert.

"No, thanks," said Ted.

"Then tell John to bring me one," Rothert motioned to the chair. "Sit down, Mr. Haley."

John Shend was listening at the door, but he skipped aside as Adele opened it.

"A bottle of wine and two glasses for Uncle Sol," she said, and went back into the room.

Rothert was saying:

"Much as I'd like to have it, I can't pay anything like that."

"I didn't think you would," Ted quietly informed him.

"Then why did you come?"

"To get a look at you." Ted's gaze was steady, but Rothert's did not waver.

"In connection with something my brother said before he died."

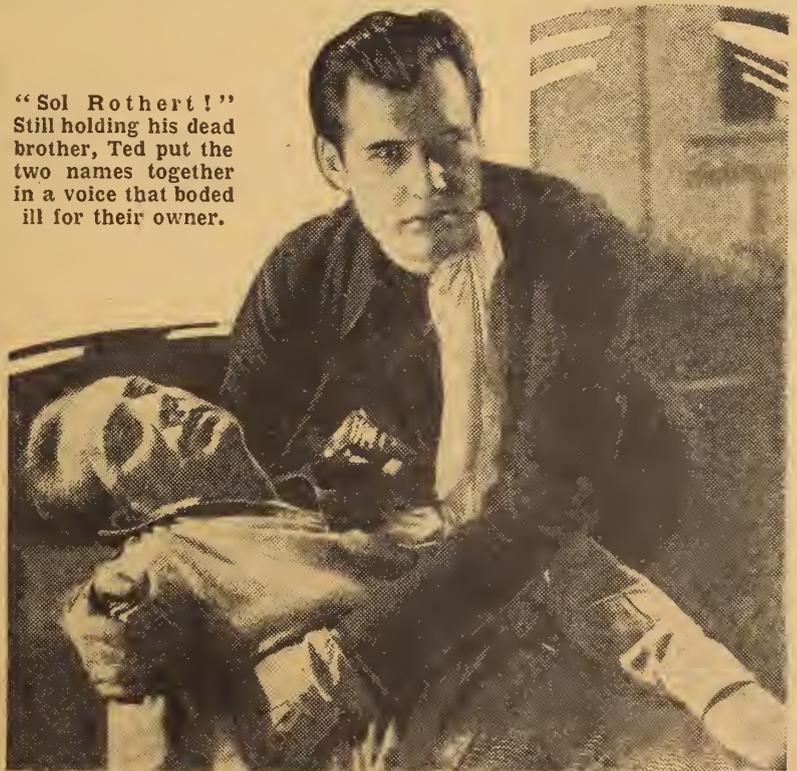

Adele leaned against the desk, watching their two faces.

"Oh, then you got there before he passed away?"

"Yes."

John entered with a bottle and two wine-glasses on a tray.

"Sol Rothert!"
Still holding his dead brother, Ted put the two names together in a voice that boded ill for their owner.

"Excuse me," he said, and he put the tray on the desk and went out again.

"What did your brother say?" It was Adele who asked the question.

"He told me who killed him," replied Ted, without shifting his gaze.

"Yes?" said Rothert. "Who?"

"You, Mr. Rothert."

The rancher drew back his head as though astounded.

"Did I hear you right?" he demanded.

"You certainly did. He told me Sol Rothert knifed him."

Adele put a hand on her uncle's shoulder.

"But that's ridiculous!" she cried. "Uncle Sol's a cripple. He can't move out of this chair."

"Quiet honey," said Rothert. "Don't let's get excited."

He pushed the rug off his knees, and slowly but significantly he lifted one leg with both hands and let it fall like a dead weight, then he lifted the other and let that drop. He lay back in his wheel chair as though exhausted by the effort, and Ted bit his lip.

"I'm afraid I owe you an apology, Mr. Rothert," he said with honest regret.

"Why, Pete was one of the best friends I ever had," declared Rothert, still breathing heavily.

"Maybe that's what he had in mind," said Ted; and he rose and offered his hand.

Rothert gripped it in seeming friendliness.

"I hope we'll see more of you," he said.

"You bet you will!"

Adele escorted the visitor to the door and went with him down the steps from the porch to the post where his horse was tethered. In the distance the members of Rothert's outfit were riding across a vast meadow.

"So you're the man who almost scared me to death," said Adele. "I hope you don't think I act like that all the time."

Her beauty had made a deep impression on Ted, a deeper one than he realised. But he was curious, and he asked point-blank:

"Just why were you snooping around my brother's ranch last night?"

"I wasn't snooping," she told him without any sign of indignation. "I went to get help. You see, I'd been for a ride. Uncle Sol didn't want me to, but I went, anyway. It got dark, and some men almost grabbed me. I had to fly for help, and your brother's house was the nearest."

Ted raised his brows.

"Who were these men?" he questioned. "Ever see them before?"

"I don't know," she replied. "They wore masks."

"Masks? People don't wear masks these days."

"Well, these men did. And then I—I found your brother. And when you came along into the dark house naturally I was ready to fight."

"Well I don't blame you for taking a shot at me. What did your uncle say about it?"

"I didn't tell him," she confessed. "I was afraid to. I thought if he knew he might really send me away. He's been talking about it."

Suspicion was reborn in Ted's mind. "Why should he want to do that?" he asked quickly.

"I'm not quite sure, but—well, he says it's because the country's too wild."

"I certainly hope he doesn't."

While these two were talking by the post, Cal Hinks had returned to Sol Rothert's room with Boyle and Troope, who had not ridden with the Troope.

January 21st, 1939.

"I don't care how you handle it," Rothert said masterfully to them, "but I want that pay-roll. When it's all over we'll meet here for the pay-off and then scatter. You understand? And by the way, don't forget to attend to that other little matter first. We'll leave at midnight."

Ted was about to swing himself up into the saddle of his horse when Adele asked him, with quite a note of anxiety in her voice, where he was going to stay that night.

"At my brother's ranch-house," he replied without the slightest hesitation.

"Are you staying there permanently?"

"At least until I get this mystery cleared up."

"But after what happened to your brother don't you think that place is dangerous? They might attack you."

"Don't worry about me," he laughed. "I'll be all right."

He mounted his horse and rode out on it into the lane, and she stood waving to him till he had disappeared from sight under the trees.

The Bank Robbery

THAT afternoon Ted attended the funeral of his brother, who was laid to rest in a little wind-swept graveyard on the side of a hill to the south of the town; and afterwards he rode out to the ranch-house which now had become his, and went through all the papers he could find in the hope of discovering some clue to the mystery of his brother's murder.

Adele went to bed early that night, but she wakened with a start to hear a champing of bits and the sound of hoofs down in the yard below the open window of her room. She struck a match and looked at a clock on a little table beside her bed. It was midnight, and down in the hall another clock was chiming.

She crept to the window and peered over the sill. There were riders in the yard, a full dozen of them, evidently ready to start off somewhere, and she believed they were her uncle's men. But a cloud was over the moon, and she could not be certain.

She put on a dressing-gown and slippers, and she crept out to the stairs and down them. The door of the room her uncle used for an office was wide open and a light was burning in there. She stole towards it. The wheel-chair was near the desk, but it was empty, and in her surprise she uttered an involuntary "Oh!"

John Shend came ruzzing from a room across the hall.

"What do you want, miss?" he asked sharply.

"A glass of water," she replied on the spur of the moment.

"I'll get you a pitcher," he said, but he did not budge, because she was trying to look into the office.

"Where's Uncle Sol?" she inquired in a voice as natural as she could make it.

"Mr. Sol is sleepin' in bed to-night. You go to your room, miss. I'll bring you a pitcher of water."

He was only a servant, but he spoke peremptorily, and she went back up the stairs to her room. But in her room, after the pitcher had been delivered, she dressed herself in her riding clothes.

The horsemen, by this time, had reached the mouth of the lane where it joined the road that led from Shanley to Blue Creek. There the whole party halted, and Cal Hinks called Boyle and Troope aside.

"As soon as we've settled with Haley," he confided to them, "we'll high-tail it to the bank. Come on."

The three turned in a north-easterly direction and rode through a gap on to the open range, headed for the ranch-house that had been Pete Haley's home. The gateway in the fence was reached, but Cal remained outside it on his horse while Boyle and Troope dismounted and flitted away to the building, their guns in their hands.

The whole place was in darkness, but the moon was shining brightly again, and at a window of the living-room they had a fair, clear view of the bunk against the wall inside.

"He's there," whispered Boyle; and then they both fired through the glass at what they assumed to be a figure in the bunk, and raced back to their horses.

"Everything's all right, Cal." Troope reported callously, and he and Boyle scrambled into their saddles and all three went speeding through the woodland.

They believed that they had made an end of Ted; but they were mistaken. Ted was fast asleep on a couch, covered with a blanket, when the shots rang out, mingling with the noise of shattered glass. He had screened the exposed side of the couch with a table and some chairs, and he was fully dressed.

He bounded to his feet, looked at the window, and ran to the back door. But he could see nothing of his would-be murderers, and he returned to the living-room. Flinging aside a blanket in the bunk he exposed pillows and cushions which had sufficed to suggest a sleeping figure. Two bullet-holes in the second pillow he examined.

He threw the pillow down, and he went out to saddle his horse; and he was riding the range when Cal and his two companions reached a spot from which they could see the rest of the gang, waiting for them down in a gap, and Rothert's ranch-house away to the right. Cal looked towards the lane and he saw Adele flying along it.

"You go on!" he shouted, and he turned his own horse and went streaking across the turf to reach the lane ahead of the girl. Ted caught sight of him and gave chase, and Ted was behind a hedge when Adele was intercepted.

"Your uncle told you not to ride at night!" Cal reprimanded.

"I know," she began rebelliously, "but—"

"Where are you goin'?"

"To Ted Haley's."

"Why?"

"Something's happened. There were a lot of men around the house, and Uncle Sol isn't in his chair."

Cal smothered an imprecation.

"Well maybe he's sleepin' in bed to-night," he said as though it were a matter of no particular importance.

"That's what John said, but I didn't believe him."

"Your uncle's gonna be all right." Cal caught hold of her bridle. "And you're gonna be all right, too, miss. But come on, we've gotta go back."

He turned her horse and rode with her back to the ranch-house. Ted watched them till they had entered the yard, and then he went on down to the road and trailed Rothert's gang into the town.

Except for the moonlight the town was in darkness when the main street was reached and the gang proceeded to surround the Shanley National Bank, a brick building which occupied an island site at a corner. Ike Britt and Moose Nelson were on their horses in a wide alleyway diagonally opposite the bank, on its northern side, when Ted dismounted at the other end of it and crept forward to see what was going to happen.

Gunfire broke out up the street, to cover the efforts of one of the crooks to open the door of the bank. Members of the gang rode around the building, discharging their firearms into the air after the manner of old-time cowboys filled with liquor. Britt and Moose were off their horses, and lurking on either side of the alleyway when Ted emerged cautiously from it.

Instantly the two pounced and seized him.

"Stand still and keep quiet!" hissed Britt. "Take his gun."

"So you're in on this," said Ted scathingly.

"Shut up!" snapped Britt. "Take a look, Moose."

Moose ventured out into the street. All along both sides of it upstairs windows had been raised and heads thrust forth.

"What's goin' on down there?" asked an anxious voice from a window above a hardware store right opposite the bank. And Boyle, who was on watch beneath the window, looked up to reply:

"Oh, just some cowpokes celebratin'."

"Well, get it over!" shouted a man at another window angrily. "We want to sleep."

The din became louder than ever. Britt craned his neck round the corner of the alleyway, and Ted sprang at Moose, recovered his gun, then whirled about on Britt.

Britt would have fired, but his gun was sent spinning, and at that moment there was an explosion inside the bank that blew all its windows out of their frames.

"They're robbing the bank!" screamed a woman.

Britt and Moose, evading Ted, went rushing up the street. Tom Haggard, the deputy sheriff, had appeared with a number of law-abiding townsmen, and a battle had broken out in the immediate vicinity of the bank. Ted, in hot pursuit of Britt and Moose, saw the latter go down in the roadway from a blow aimed at him by an enormous fellow who leapt on to a horse and sent men scattering to right and left as he plunged into a side turning, and then he saw Britt stooping over his fallen companion.

The two were some little way off, but Ted covered the ground in seconds, and he flung himself bodily upon Britt and bore him to the ground. They rose together, fighting furiously, and Moose got to his feet and would have joined issue, but a sweep of Ted's arm sent him staggering backwards. A straight left to Britt's jaw sent him down again, and then Ted snatched up a gun and a cow-hat from the roadway and said fiercely:

"Hoist 'em, quick!"

Obediently Britt and Moose raised their hands. The bank-robbers had disappeared on their horses, with the deputy and a posse after them, but an excited crowd was congregating round the bank.

"All right," said Ted, "cross the street. You, too, Britt! Keep your hands up!"

His two captives walked before him to the boardwalk.

"Now down to the sheriff's office!" he commanded. "Go on!"

The sheriff's office was reached, and Bill Ashley stared in astonishment from the couch on which he was lying as Britt and Moose entered it with their hands above their heads, and Ted brought up the rear with a cow-hat under his arm and a six-gun in each hand.

Dr. Harrington rose from the end of the couch with a pipe in his mouth.

"All right, sheriff," said Ted, kicking the door shut behind him. "I'll take charge o' this if you'll let me handle things in my own way."

"Go right ahead," said the sheriff. "What do you want me to do with this pair?"

"First, I'd like to ask a couple o' questions." Ted made the two sit down on chairs against a wall, and then he held out the cow-hat, through the crown of which a bullet had passed. "Is this your hat?"

Moose, who was bareheaded, confessed that it was.

"I picked it up in the street, sheriff," said Ted, and he pointed to the bullet-holes.

"One o' the bandits did that when I took after them," growled Moose.

"Oh!" said Ted, and he threw the hat on to the sheriff's desk. "You couldn't have been tryin' to get away with them?" He held out the gun by its barrel. "This iron—is it yours?"

"No," declared Moose. "A fellow dropped that when I winged him."

"What kind of a man was he?"

"He was a big fellow, almost a giant."

Ted looked across at the sheriff. "Know any giants around here?"

"There's a big fellow named Boyle, or Hoyle, or something like that, workin' for Rothert," was the reply.

"We know Boyle," put in Britt.

"Was it him?"

"Aw," said Moose, "you couldn't tell nuthin' at night. Besides, the fellow I winged looked bigger."

Ted turned to the sheriff again. "Know anybody bigger than Boyle?"

The sheriff scratched his chin, which he had shaved with some difficulty a few hours before.

"Sol Rothert," he said. "Never saw him standu' up, but I'll bet he's over six feet. Still, we know Sol can't ride."

The deputy sheriff entered the office. The bank robbers had got away in a dozen different directions, and he had come to the conclusion that pursuit was hopeless.

"But the people are shontin' their heads off for somebody's blood," he stated.

"Then you boys won't mind stayin' locked up until I get a line on things?" Ted suggested to his captives.

"Not if that's the way the crowd outside are feelin'," responded Britt.

"All right, lock 'em up, Tom."

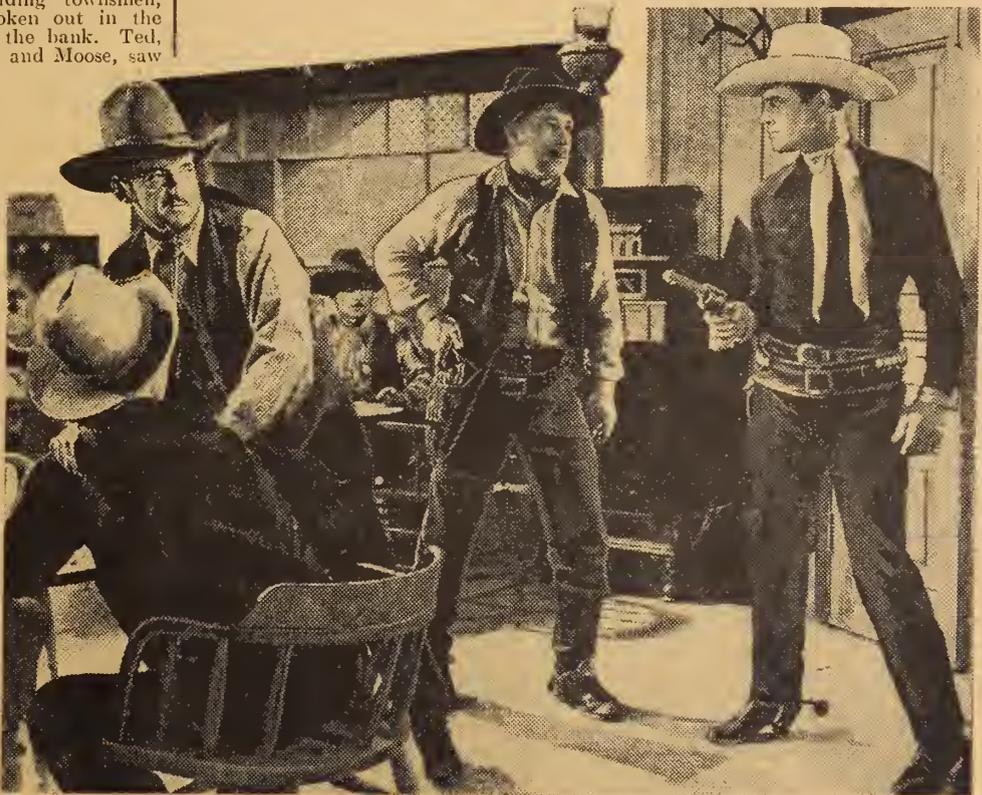

Britt and Moose were shut away in one of the cells and stood looking out between the bars.

"Now what I want, sheriff," said Ted, "is a posse. Where will I find about fifteen reliable men?"

"Any of the ranchers around here are all right," Bill Ashley told him.

"How about Sol Rothert? Will he furnish any men?"

"Sol's always been willin' to help every time I've asked him."

Moose Nelson instantly reached for his gun, but before he could draw it Ted's was out, and Ted rapped at him: "I wouldn't try it, partner!"

"Good. Then I'll go along there first."

"How about goin' with you?" offered the deputy; but Ted shook his head.

"No," he said, "you go out and round up as many ranchers as you can trust. We'll need everybody we can get."

"Be careful," warned Ashley. "You've got a big job on your hands."

"Come on, Tom." Ted moved towards the door. "I'm goin' to call at my place after I leave Sol Rothert's—then I'll come back here."

He and the deputy went out, and Dr. Harrington rose and put on his hat.

"Well, I'm glad all that commotion's over," he remarked. "Now you can take a little snooze, Bill."

"I guess it wouldn't do me any harm," said the sheriff, and he stretched his legs on the couch and rested his head upon a cushion.

But the doctor had been gone no more than a couple of minutes when Britt called to him and he raised his head.

"Yeah?"

"Can you trust him?" asked Britt.

"Why, yes," said the sheriff. "Why?"

"Take a look at that!"

Slowly the sheriff got up from the couch and walked over to the cell. Britt was exhibiting, in the palm of his hand, a metal badge which proclaimed him to be an authorised agent of the Cattle-men's Protective Association. Moose was displaying a similar badge.

"Well, I'll be danged!" exclaimed the sheriff. "Association men! What d'you want me to do?"

"Open up here before somebody comes," replied Britt.

Tom Haggard had given the sheriff the key of the cell, and it was in his pocket. He unlocked and opened the door of bars, and the two men stepped forth.

"Been on this case for months," said Moose. "Had to keep under cover, or they'd have knocked us off."

The sheriff asked if Ted Haley knew anything about it.

"Not yet," Britt replied. "Didn't trust him until to-day. Come on, Moose—we're headin' for Haley's. That kid may get into a mess o' trouble!"

A Timely Warning

DAYLIGHT had come, but the sun had not yet risen over the hills when Adele was awakened from uneasy slumber by a banging on the door of her bed-room and was told by John Shend that her uncle wanted to see her at once.

She dressed and descended to find Rothert in his wheel-chair, behind his desk, and she was told curtly that she was to pack her things forthwith because she was going to leave the ranch within an hour.

"But, Uncle Sol," she protested, "I like it here. I don't want—"

"I'm not goin' to have any argument!" he thundered at her. "You're leavin' the ranch—go and pack! John will help you, if you need any help."

She went up to her room, and a suitcase was open upon her bed, and she was taking some garments from a drawer of a dressing-table when she chanced to look out at the window between the dressing-table and the bed and saw Ted cantering along the lane.

She sped to the door and opened it; but John Shend was on guard outside, and she knew it would be useless to try to pass him.

"Oh, John," she said in haste, "ask Uncle Sol if—if I'm to take my trunk."

John descended, but he moved slowly, and Ted was fastening his horse to the post out in the yard by the time he entered Rothert's presence.

"Miss Adele," he began, "she said —" He reached the wheel-chair, and he whispered: "He's back!"

"Let him in," directed Rothert.

Adele was listening just inside her room when Ted knocked at the front door of the house and was conducted by the servant across the hall into the office.

Rothert looked up with a friendly gesture, but Ted uttered no greeting.

"Mr. Rothert," he said crisply, "the bank at Shanley has been robbed."

"The bank robbed?" Rothert sounded incredulous.

"Cleaned out last night!"

"Was anybody killed?"

"Quite a few, I understand."

"I can't believe it. There's been a lot of crime in the district, and this is a wild country, but— Are there any clues?"

"This!" From the front of his shirt Ted produced the six-gun Moose had disowned, and Rothert shrank back in his chair as it was pointed in his direction.

"It isn't loaded," Ted reassured him. "I found it in the street. One of the bandits must have dropped it. Ever seen it before?"

Rothert looked at the long-barrelled .45, but he did not touch it.

"No, I don't believe I have," he said. "Still, all guns look alike to me. It's been years since I used one."

Ted put the gun back inside his shirt.

"I'm sorry," he said. "I should have realised that. Well, Mr. Rothert, the sheriff sent me up to see if you would loan some of your men to form a posse."

"I'll do better than that, Mr. Haley," declared Rothert. "I'll send all of them! It's a terrible thing, the crimes that are bein' committed around here. Something must be done."

He sounded sincere enough, but Ted was not wholly convinced that he had had no hand in the affair.

"It will!" he gritted.

Rothert frowned.

"The only difficulty," he said, "is that one of my herds stampeded last night, and the men are all off to the upper range. But I'll send for them. Where will you be?"

"Over at my place," Ted replied.

"Good. They'll be over for you sooner than you think."

It seemed to Ted that two very different interpretations might be derived from that statement.

"I'll be waitin' for them," he returned.

"I'll see you to the door."

That made Ted blink, but with a dexterity born of long practice Rothert propelled his wheel-chair out through the doorway and across to the front door.

Adele was leaning over the banisters on the floor above, but she ran back into her room as Ted went out from the house to the yard, and from the window she watched him ride out at the gate.

Rothert, in his wheel-chair, remained at the open front door till Ted had gone, and the expression on his face was murderous when John Shend hurried forward to close the door and wheel him back into his room.

"Shut that door!" he snapped; and the door of the room was closed. "Now, listen—go get the men down at the line camp and send them after Haley. And tell them that this time they're not to miss. You'll find a horse in the corral. Be on your way!"

Up in her room, Adele had flung on her riding clothes, and she had put on a belt with a holster, and in the holster was a loaded .38. But she was down in the hallway and listening at the key-hole when Rothert issued his cold-blooded instructions. She slipped out from the house, and she was behind a shed when John entered the corral and mounted a saddled horse that was in it. She watched him ride away to the south, and then she made for the stables.

In frantic haste she saddled the sorrel, and not very long afterwards she was out in the lane on it and making for the Haley ranch.

Moose Nelson and Ike Britt had ridden straight from the sheriff's office to that ranch, and they had invaded the living-room of the house and were waiting there.

"No sign of Haley yet," Moose reported from a window that commanded a view of the lane and trees and hill.

Britt, sprawling on the couch, was rolling himself a cigarette.

"You know, he's a smart guy," he said. "He won't be as easy to fool as the sheriff. Maybe we should have gone on to Rothert's, after all."

"Wouldn't make any difference," growled Moose. "If Sol's ready to show his hand we'd simply be two more dead 'uns."

Britt lit the cigarette and rose to his feet. Moose had turned away from the window, but over his shoulder Britt saw a rider approaching the fence.

"There's Haley now!" he exclaimed. Moose swung round to a pane.

"Yeah," he said, "and he's alone."

Ted was alone, on his white horse, but Adele was travelling as fast as the sorrel could carry her, and she was not far behind when Ted turned in at the gateway.

"Ted!" she cried.

"Who's that comin' across the yard?" questioned Moose.

"Sol's niece," Britt replied; and at that moment Ted heard the girl's voice, swung his horse about, and met her opposite the porch.

"Ted," she burst out frantically. "Something terrible has happened!"

"Now, wait a minute," he enjoined. "It can't be as bad as all that."

His words failed to allay her agitation.

"Listen. I've always known there was something strange about Uncle Sol—he's been too pleasant. And now he's done something that proves I was right."

Ted's eyes narrowed.

"What was it?" he asked.

"He sent John for the cowboys and told him to tell them to kill you on sight!"

Ted hadn't the slightest doubt that she was speaking the truth.

"They're on the upper range," he said, remembering what Rothert had told him. "That'll give us a little time."

"Oh, but they're not up there!" she cried. "They're hiding out down at the line camp, and that's only twelve miles down Black Canyon—I know, because I rode that way once. Oh, Ted, I'm frightened! They may be here any minute! What'll we do?"

"Come on," said Ted, and they rode out together into the lane and along it over the ground they had just covered.

In the living-room of the ranch-house Moose looked rather blankly at Britt. "Hope we don't have any trouble in trailin' him," he said.

"Only place he can go is back to Rothert's," Britt decided. "Come on!"

Where the lane twisted off to the right, Ted said urgently to Adele:

"I'm going to your uncle's. He'll be alone, and that's what I want. You head for town and bring the posse." She was still frightened for him, but she nodded bravely, and she set off across the range to reach the road that led to the town while he went on to Rotherth's.

Unmasked:

JOHN SHEND had delivered Rotherth's message to the members of the gang in their hideaway in Black Canyon, and he was riding with them up from the depths of that rock-bound valley when Cal Hinks, descending from his own retreat in the hills, caught sight of Ted and started to follow him.

He was out on the open range, in long grass, when a cloud of dust in the road at the foot of the hill engaged his attention and he reined his horse. At first he thought a posse from the town was causing the dust, but he decided to investigate and he rode cautiously downwards.

The dust settled, and he saw that the horsemen had crossed the road from the gulch that led up from the canyon, and he knew then that they were Rotherth's men. He increased his speed, and he met the gang as they were ascending in the direction of the Haley ranch.

"Where're you headin'?" he inquired. John Shend, who had been about to leave the others and return to his employer, explained matters.

"No use headin' that way, boys," said Cal. "Haley's headed back to the boss. Come on, we'd better get over there!"

Alone in his room at the ranch-house, Sol Rotherth had wheeled his chair to a cupboard, and from the cupboard had fished out a brown leather bag. With the bag on his knees he propelled himself to the fireplace, and there he reached up to a framed picture that was flat with the wall above the mantelpiece.

He put a thumb under the bottom of the frame, and the picture swung away from the wall like a little door because it was hinged on one side.

In the portion of the wall it had concealed there was a circular safe, and this he opened. The bag also he opened, and he was transferring banknotes from the safe to the bag when the door behind him crashed back against a chair, and he looked round with a start to see Ted close beside him with a six-gun ready for use.

With a stifled exclamation he let the bag fall to the floor, reached down as though to pick it up, and was about to slip his left hand under the rug that was upon his knees when Ted rapped at him:

"It's too late for that, Rotherth, unless you can move that chair faster than I think you can!"

Still covering the crook with his gun, he looked down into the bag.

"What d'you mean by breakin' in on me this way?" blared Rotherth.

"We'll get to that in a minute. Keep your hands from under that rug!"

With his left hand Ted caught hold of the rug and threw it across the room—and then he took possession of a long-barrelled .45 that had been hidden very carefully beneath it. Rotherth gritted his teeth and his eyes were evil.

"Why do you come here?" he snarled. "To put you under arrest for implication in the bank robbery," Ted grimly replied, "and maybe my brother's murder as well."

"You're a fool, Haley, and I won't forget this!"

Without in any way relaxing his vigilance, Ted swept over to the safe in the wall, and from it brought out a packet of banknotes that never had been unfastened.

"Maybe this will explain something," he said; and Rotherth's face told its own story. "I thought so! This will be enough evidence to hold you until the posse comes. Where's the rest of it?"

Believing that he had only a disarmed cripple to deal with, Ted dropped on one knee to examine the contents of the bag. But Rotherth's paralysis was a mere pretence—a fiction he had created to cover his criminal activities. His legs were as sound as any man's, and with a bound he was on them and his right arm swept round at Ted's throat while his left hand imprisoned Ted's right wrist.

It was then that the cowboy realised the enormous strength of his enemy. He himself was strong, but it was only with a superhuman effort that he managed to break away from that choking grip, and the gun was wrested from him as he did it.

On his feet, however, he was far more agile than the older man, and before the gun could be used it was sent spinning across the room. Rotherth rushed at him like a bull, but received an uppercut to the jaw that sent him thudding against the wall, and before he had recovered from that blow Ted was at him with a thump between the eyes that caused him to fall across the desk.

A dagger-like paper-knife was on the desk, and Rotherth's hand closed round its haft as he sprawled, panting, across the blotting pad. Then, suddenly, he was upright again, and a Ted rushed at him the knife was raised above his head to strike.

The hand that held the knife was seized in a vice-like grip, but Rotherth strove with all his might to bring it down and plunge the blade into Ted's heart.

For minutes the issue remained uncertain, while with their free hands the two clawed and struck at one another. Then Rotherth stumbled against the wheel-chair, and as it rolled away from him fell upon his knees.

The paper-knife clattered into the hearth, and Ted flung himself upon his brother's murderer. But Rotherth caught him round the knees and threw him, and he was straddling his chest, and choking the life out of him, when Ike Britt appeared in the doorway with a gun in his hand and the trigger cocked.

At a glance he took in the situation, and his gun spat venomously. The hands at Ted's throat relaxed, and Sol Rotherth fell sideways upon the carpet with a bullet in his heart.

Ted, gasping noisily for breath, struggled to his knees and saw Britt standing there with the smoking gun. His right hand went to his holster, but the holster was empty, and Britt cried out:

"Take it easy, Haley, take it easy, boy! I'm an officer!"

He put away his gun and he exhibited his badge, and Ted gaped at it as he got shakily to his feet, gulping breath into his tortured lungs.

"Huh," he panted. "Well—I'll—So—so that's what—you two—were doin' around—the—bank."

"That's right," nodded Britt.

"Where's—your—pardner?"

"I sent him for help."

"I've already—sent—for a posse."

Ted was breathing more easily when

Rotherth looked round with a start to see Ted close beside him with a six-gun ready for use.

a thudding of hoofs sent him and Britt to a window.

"Guess that's them now," said Ted. But Britt had his doubts, and as a party of horsemen drew nearer he recognised several of them.

"They're Rother's gunmen!" he exclaimed.

The riders reached the gateway of the yard.

"Looks like we're in for a fight," said Ted. "Throw a shot at 'em. Keep 'em back."

Britt opened the window a little way, dropped on his knees at the sill, and fired a shot. Cal Hinks fired back, and then he and the gang scattered about the yard, dismounted, and took cover behind trees and bushes, outhouses, wagons, and a water-trough. Their guns blazed, the two windows of the room sprayed broken glass, and bullet-holes appeared in the walls.

On one of the walls there was a shield-shaped board to which five shooting-irons of various patterns and a couple of shot-guns were clipped. While Britt was firing at the window Ted collected all these weapons, and in a drawer of the desk he found boxes of cartridges. Having provided Britt with a veritable armory he pushed the heavy desk against the door of the room and piled chairs upon it to form a barricade against the attackers, and then he crouched below the second window to pick off any ruffian fool enough to expose himself.

A Fight to the Finish

TOM HAGGARD, with the help of men he could trust, had rounded up a number of ranchers and had arranged for them to meet him at the sheriff's office with members of their outfits.

He was in the office with the sheriff, and a score of mounted men were already outside it, when Adele came galloping along the street.

Hardly conscious of the questions that were shouted at her by a crowd of men and women as she pulled up in front of the building of brick and stone, she slid from the saddle and rushed in over the doorstep.

"I've come for help!" she cried. "Sheriff, come quickly! Ted Haley sent me!"

The sheriff was sitting up on the couch, feeling more or less himself again. His deputy said exultingly:

"We got 'em, Bill! See you later!"

Out to his own horse he ran, and Adele scrambled up on to hers.

"Ready to ride?" he shouted. "Follow me, boys!"

Off went the posse, and the sheriff stood in the doorway watching their departure.

"What's it all about?" asked a woman.

"Doggone it if they're gonna leave me behind!" howled the sheriff; and he turned back into the office to struggle into a coat, and then flew out from it to heave himself up on a horse that belonged to one of the gaping bystanders.

He had caught up with the posse, and was riding in front with Tom Haggard and Adele, when Ted was saved from strangulation by the timely appearance of Britt. But the posse was still a good way from the ranch-house when Cal Hinks, from behind the water-trough, bellowed to Troope, who was firing round a corner of a shed at the window guarded by Ted:

"We ain't gettin' nowhere, Troope!"

A bullet from Ted's gun pierced the cow-hat on his head, and John Shend fell wounded beside him.

Cal emptied a gun at the window with more fury than aim, and then he yelled to Boyle, who, with three other men, was using a wagon as a shield:

"Boyle, you and the boys use that thing to bust in the back door!"

The wagon was pushed across the yard towards the rear of the house, and Britt fired again and again at the men it screened till it was out of sight.

"They're makin' a break for the house!" he cried.

"Keep firing!" returned Ted.

Above the din of firearms came the sound of a door being battered. Suddenly there was quiet in the yard, and Ted's attention became concentrated on the door of the room as it shook from the blows that were aimed at it.

Cal had sneaked from the water-trough to a tree and from the tree to the porch. Others joined him, one at a time, and he directed operations.

The blade of an axe pierced a panel of the door, and the door itself gave way; but the table and the piled-up chairs held it. The axe was withdrawn, struck again, and a gaping hole appeared in the panel. The barrel of a gun was projected through the gap, and behind it Ted saw an ugly face.

The gun jetted flame, and a bullet grazed his left shoulder; but he himself had fired at the same instant, and his aim was true. Cal Hinks collapsed, on the other side of the door, with a bullet in his brain.

But chairs were falling from the desk, and the desk itself was moving. The attackers were firing round both sides of the falling door. Ted made for a window, jumped its sill, and raced round to the front door with a gun in each hand to make a flank attack from the porch.

The bandits were going down like nincpins when Moose Nelson arrived on the scene with half a dozen cowpunchers he had brought from the nearest ranch. Britt was lying on the floor of Rother's room, wounded in the shoulder, but he heard a shout of warning from a ruffian who had taken shelter in a tool-shed, and the broken door became deserted.

Two of the cowpunchers climbed into the room through the windows and went out at that door. Moose joined Ted on the porch, and the rest raced round the house to cover the back of it.

The crooks were at bay, fighting desperately, when the posse swept into the yard.

Adele, at a harsh command from the sheriff, remained in the lane while the house was surrounded by the posse, with the sheriff and his deputy directing operations; and after that there was very little more shooting.

The only member of Rother's gang who had not been wounded was the coward who had hidden in the tool-shed, and his associates knew better than to prolong a battle against hopeless odds, and surrendered.

They were taken off to the town gaol, some of them on their own horses, the more badly wounded and the dead in wagons and on buckboards; but the sheriff remained at the ranch-house because he was feeling the effects of too much exertion, and Britt was in no shape to travel. Moose stayed with his colleague, Ted elected to stay with Adele, and the deputy promised to send Dr. Harrington along as soon as he reached Shanley.

Moose tied up Britt's wound; Adele prepared a meal.

In course of time the doctor arrived, and Ted and Adele went out to a seat on the porch while Britt's shoulder was examined, dressed, and properly bandaged. The doctor then insisted upon taking the sheriff's temperature; and his face became so grave as he studied the thermometer that his patient asked in alarm:

"What's it read?"

"Very bad," said the doctor, with a shake of his head. "Don't look like you're going to pull through."

"Let me see that thing!" The sheriff snatched at the thermometer, but it was pocketed before he could get his hand on it, and from another pocket a well-seasoned pipe was produced in company with a pouch of tobacco.

"You're doin' all right, Bill," said the doctor, filling the pipe from the pouch and bestowing a wink on Moose. "But Britt's in a bad way."

"Aw, go on," scoffed Britt. "I'll be runnin' around in two days!"

"The fact is you fellows just can't take it," drawled Moose. "Look at me—I eat lead and like it."

The doctor turned to him.

"Want me to take your temperature?" he inquired.

"Not me!" said Moose; and then he jerked a thumb towards the porch. "But I'd like to know about them," he chuckled.

Ted was very close to Adele, on the seat out there, and he was saying wistfully:

"Sort o' nice round here, now it's peaceful, isn't it? Wish I could stay."

"Why don't you?" Adele murmured.

"Lonely," he replied. "I like lots of people."

She put her face very close to his, and she said softly:

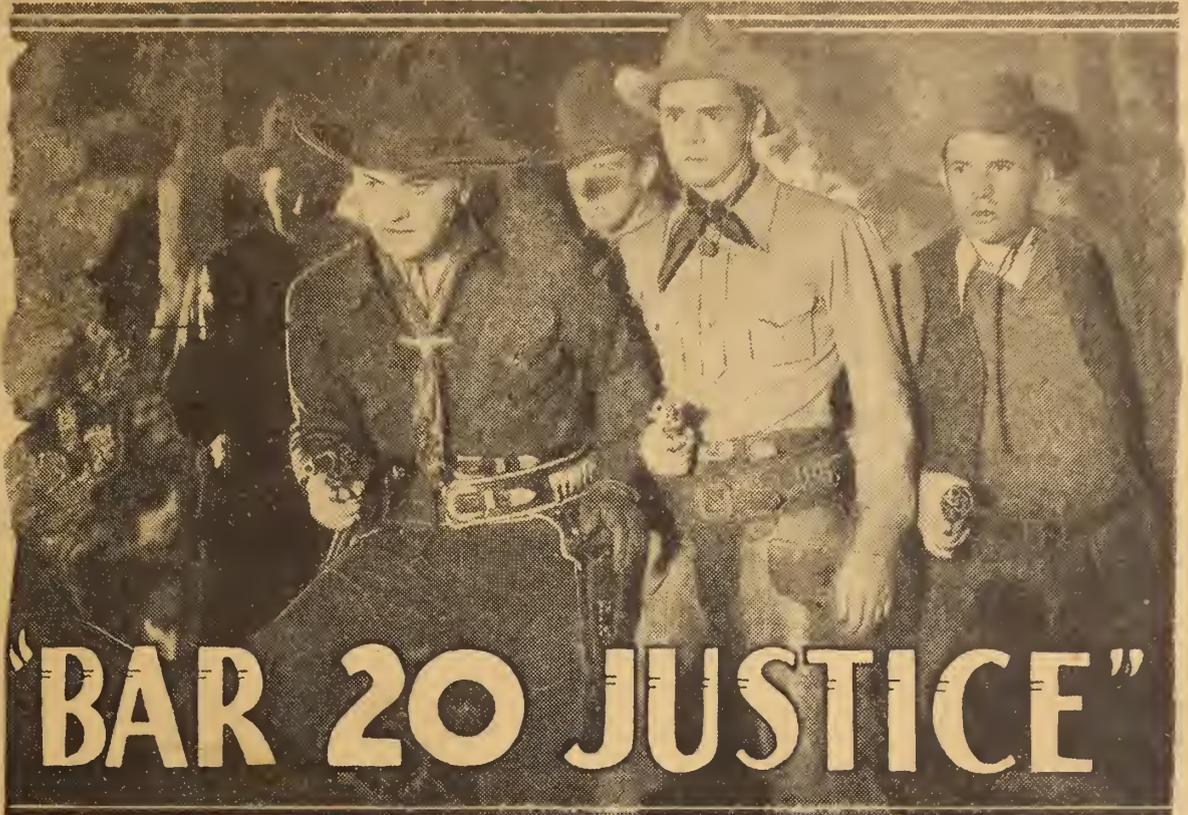

"But I can be lots of people. You wouldn't be lonely with me."

Ted, thus encouraged, slipped an arm round her shoulder and kissed her. Whereupon the doctor remarked:

"Well, things are goin' to be different from now on!"

The "Accident" at the Freeze-Out Mine
IN an assay office in a small mining town of Arizona a man sat at a table examining samples of ore. He was an elderly man with greying hair, a hard mouth and rather shifty eyes. As he sorted and studied the samples a rather grim smile came to his lips.

As the door opened he looked up to see a man enter, a tall, clean-shaven, dark man who dropped into a chair with the air of an old acquaintance.

"Hallo, Frazier," exclaimed the man in the chair whose name was Perkins. "I reckon this is pretty good stuff. It runs over six hundred dollars to the ton."

"I had an idea it was pretty high grade," replied Frazier. "This seems to be my lucky day. I'm getting all the breaks."

"What now?" asked the other curiously.

"Cassidy pulled out this morning." Perkins whistled. He knew that for months past Frazier had been doing his best to gain possession of the Freeze Out mine which adjoined his own, the Devil-May-Care. But Dennis, the owner, and Ann, his wife, had persistently refused to sell. Certainly this was indeed a lucky break. With Hopalong Cassidy out of the way for some months it would be a strange thing if he and Frazier couldn't now get hold of the Freeze Out mine for good and all.

"I'll bet ten to one," he chuckled, "that the Freeze Out has a new owner in a month."

Frazier laughed carelessly.

"Well, maybe you wouldn't lose," he rejoined.

He leaned over the table, lowering his voice as he went on.

"Tell Slade," he said, "that I'm expecting to see an unfortunate accident happen to Dennis—and the sooner the better."

For a moment or two their eyes met in silence. Then Perkins nodded.

"O.K.," he replied laconically.

A man stood at the little railway-station waiting for the New York train to come in. He was a well-built, thick-set man of medium size. Whitening hair showed under his slouch hat, and it was easy to see that he had reached the prime of life. But there was that about the clean-shaven face, the firm jaw and those keen blue eyes that suggested a man who could never really grow old in heart. You had the impression as you looked at him that his sense of humour lay very close to the surface. If you could visualise him as a very formidable foe you could most certainly imagine him to be an exceedingly staunch friend.

And indeed it was so with Hopalong Cassidy. Wherever men drank in saloons in those wild parts, wherever they sat yarning round camp fires, the name of Hopalong Cassidy would bring an appreciative gleam into the eyes of those who ranged themselves on the side of law and order, and an angry frown to the foreheads of those who held to the shady paths. A hundred tales were told of this quiet, cool man who risked his life as readily as he roped a steer; of his strength, his contempt of danger, his complete indifference to women, yet his unflinching courtesy to them at all times and under all conditions. A hundred of them had tried to throw a rope over him but without success. It had become a by-word now in that wild country that no woman could ever capture Hopalong Cassidy, and no man could beat him on the "draw."

He stood at the little station office now taking his ticket and exchanging pleasantries with the old man who handed it to him.

"Not often you take a holiday, Mr. Cassidy."

"Well, it's all the nicer now it comes," said Hopalong with a smile. "I've been promising myself this trip for quite a while."

"And Windy and Lucky?" queried the old man, for Cassidy had been almost inseparable from these two friends of his for years past. "How did they come to let you go all alone?"

Cassidy grinned. He would have liked to have had them both with him and he knew it.

"Mother's got to go away sometimes and leave her kids," he retorted. "I know Windy ain't old enough yet to be left—"

But the rest of the speech was drowned in the old man's delighted laughter. For Windy was a hard-bitten old-timer who would never see seventy again.

He sobered up, however, for Cassidy had suddenly swung round and a worried look had come to his eyes.

"Why, darned if it ain't Lucky!" he murmured. "Why, Lucky what's the trouble?"

The young man had flung himself from his horse.

"Sure glad I caught you in time, Hoppy," he said. He drew him to one side, lowering his voice when next he spoke.

"Dennis has been killed," he said.

January 21st, 1929.

"Dennis? How?" he demanded, his eyes narrowing to mere pinpoints.

"Working in the mine. A timber fell on him. Slade calls it an accident. But it strikes me as a mighty funny thing that it's the third accident that's happened in the same way. The men have stopped work—they're scared."

"H'm!" Cassidy was reflecting.

"What about Ann?"

Lucky Jenkins shrugged.

"Hit her pretty hard, though she's takin' it swell," he answered. "Frazier's been up to see her and offered to buy the mine, but she's stubborn and refuses to sell. She told Windy and me that she's sure Dennis' death wasn't accidental."

"Mebbe she's right," replied the other slowly. "I guess New York's off this trip."

"I rather fancied you'd see it that way, Hoppy. It's tough on you havin' to cancel your holiday."

"But it's tougher on Ann," interrupted Cassidy. "Come on, let's get goin'."

Hopalong Gets Busy

FRAZIER, owner of the Devil-May-Care Mine, and Slade, manager of the Freeze Out, were just coming out of the assay office followed by Perkins when Cassidy and Lucky came riding swiftly through the town. The three drew back in a moment. Frazier swore viciously under his breath.

"Now what in hades has brought Cassidy back?" he exclaimed.

"Jenkins was with him and that looks as if he'd fetched him back," said Slade. "But I'll lay six to four it isn't to help us."

Frazier scowled.

"It's too late to back out now," he snapped. "We're in too deep. But if Mr. Cassidy thinks he's ruinin' this town he'll find himself mistaken. We'll let him make the first move and think he's got things his own way. Then when the time comes—"

He broke off and laughed contemptuously.

"I'll take care of Mr. Cassidy when the time comes," he finished.

In the meanwhile Cassidy had reached Ann Dennis' house and was climbing the steps when she came out.

"Hoppy! I told them they weren't to—"

"My lads have a way of breakin' orders once in a while, Ann," he smiled; "but I shouldn't hold it up against 'em. Now can you spare me a minute or two and let's hear just what's been goin' on? You know we'll do anything we can to help you."

"But I haven't any right in the world to ask you to get mixed up in my troubles," she protested.

"You ain't askin' me. I'm doin' it of my own accord. Now let's hear exactly what happened."

In her little sitting-room she told them how both she and her husband had struck a new pay streak. How under Slade's advice they had cut a new tunnel. Her husband had been there alone and had been found dead with a timber across him.

"The pay streak had petered out in some strange way," she concluded, "and Dennis had gone down alone trying to locate it in the new tunnel they had cut. I can't believe it was just an accident. It's the third death that's happened since they started the new tunnel—and all of them the same way."

"The Devil-May-Care mine is right next to yours, isn't it?" asked Hopalong after a brief pause.

She nodded.

"That's right. It's Frazier's."

January 21st, 1939.

"He's offered to buy you out, hasn't he?" queried Hopalong.

"That's right, too. He was very nice and sympathetic about it. He said it wasn't worth anything, but he had known my husband well, and if a few hundred dollars would help—"

She stopped suddenly. Hopalong's eyes had narrowed rather ominously.

"Hoppy, you don't think that Frazier—"

His face was grave as her voice trailed away. His reply came slowly.

"I don't know what to think, Ann. The first thing we've got to do is to find what happened to that pay streak. If that's still there it might tell us things."

"But you're not goin' to try to work the Freeze Out yourself?"

He shrugged.

"It's the only way I can see of findin' out anythin'."

"But more men might get killed?" she urged. "Perhaps—you!"

His old lazy smile came up then.

"I guess no one goes till his time comes, Ann," he answered. "Besides, folks say I don't kill easy. I'm goin' to ride over and see Buck Peters."

"May I ride with you?" she asked eagerly.

"I don't know any better company," he replied with a smile.

An hour or so later the two of them were with Buck Peters the owner of the Bar 20 ranch.

"And so, Buck," concluded Cassidy. "I've made up my mind that instead of takin' a holiday I'm goin' to look into this business. The only thing I'm asking of you is that you and the boys will back me up if I need you."

But the old man frowned. He had been close friends with Hopalong for years, but he fancied he could see trouble ahead and he wasn't too eager to be in it.

"Hoppy," he answered, "I'm a cattle man—always have been, and I don't want nothin' to do with miners or mines. 'Sides, I'm aimin' at livin' in this town and to stay clear of any trouble that don't concern me."

Hopalong nodded, though obviously a shade disappointed.

"Well, I reckon you've got a right to do as you like, Buck," he replied. "Thanks for listeuin' to me."

But as he and Ann got to the door Peters spoke again.

"Are you goin' through with this thing by yourself, Hoppy?" he queried.

"Dennis was a pal of mine," said Hopalong simply.

He opened the door for the girl, but Peters stayed them both.

"Oh, all right," he said. "I'm a dauged soft-hearted idiot for givin' in to you, but you always did have a way of makin' me see things your way."

Hopalong chuckled broadly.

"Never tried to make you in my life," he retorted. "I just shoves down things in front of you and your common sense does the rest. Thanks a lot, Buck, though. Now I'm off, Ann, to get a bunch of boys who'll work the mine for you. We'll soon get to the bottom of this."

Hopalong Makes a Discovery

SLADE walked into the assay office to find Perkins and Frazier sitting there. Both men looked up as he came in.

"Well, what's goin' on?" demanded Frazier.

"Plenty," replied the other. "Cassidy's up at the Freeze Out gettin' a bunch of miners together. He's figurin' on openin' up the mine again."

Frazier swore fiercely.

"Get up there quick then, and keep an eye on him. Get him to sign you on even if you have to dig rock yourself. We must have someone inside."

"I thought of offerin' myself as foreman again," rejoined the other with a grin. "I naturally quit, same as all the others did, when that unfortunate accident happened to the boss. But I reckon it would be a real treat to help the little lady and work under a fine guy like Cassidy."

While he had been speaking a smile had come to Frazier's face. Perkins, too, was grinning.

"Not a bad idea," replied Frazier.

"Cassidy's likely to fall for that sort of stuff if you hand it to him properly. Get goin', Slade, and keep in touch with me."

Slade arrived at the mine just in time to see Hopalong haranguing a group of men; but a group of men who were obviously not too keen to resume work after what had happened.

"Well, I've had my say," Slade heard him say. "If none of you guys have got the nerve to go in with me I guess I'll have to work the mine myself."

Up spoke a grizzled old miner.

"Say, mister, if you're willin' to go, I am, too—so long as I get paid for it."

It only needed that. To have their courage called into question was a thing that these rough men would have none of. A dozen hands shot up in a flash.

"So am I!"

"And I!"

"And I!"

Slade stepped forward with an ingratiating smile on his face.

"Count me in, too, Mr. Cassidy," he said, "if I can be of any use. The name's Slade, and I was foreman here, but I couldn't go on for nothin'." All the same, if there's anythin' now that I can do for you and the little lady who owns the outfit I'll be glad to do it."

"Fine!" replied Hopalong. "I'll be right glad to have you as foreman. Get the boys started."

Later on he strolled through the mine, stood watching the men at work. Slade came up.

"I reckon you'd be wise, Mr. Cassidy, to keep 'em here," he said. "There's some likely looking rock around here."

Cassidy nodded approval and passed on. He addressed one of the men.

"I can see you know your work all right," he said.

"Sure ought to. Been workin' mines all my life."

"I'm lucky to have men like you and Slade around," was the reply. "Guess he knows his job, too. Was he foreman here when they struck that rich streak?"

"Yeah."

"You, too?"

"Nope. Slade had another bunch. Had trouble with them and fired 'em."

Hopalong strolled on, rubbing his chin. It struck him as curious that Slade insisted on keeping the men at work several hundred yards from where the pay streak had been struck. As he came to the deserted spot he stopped and stood frowning at the timbered walls around him.

"They look strong enough," he mused.

Suddenly he stooped and picked up a sample of ore that lay at his feet. But even as he studied it suspicion leaped into his eyes.

"That's mighty queer," he murmured.

Once more he glanced round. Ahead of him lay the spot where Dennis had met his death. He could see where the timber had fallen and had been replaced.

For the next ten minutes he walked to and from pressing against the timbers and tapping them and listening intently.

When he eventually started to retrace his steps his face was grave. But he was his old careless self when he reached Slade.

"Slade," he said, "it occurs to me that we ought to have a night watchman about here. I'm goin' into town to get one."

It was only the most fleeting look of annoyance that flashed into the other's eyes, but Cassidy saw it because he was looking for it. Yet it passed as quickly as it had come, and when Slade spoke his voice was quite normal.

"Oh, don't trouble, Mr. Cassidy. I've got just the man for you."

"Trust him?"

"Sure. I wouldn't have him around if I didn't."

"O.K.," answered Hopalong carelessly. "Hire him, and keep the boys busy. I'll be seein' you."

But he sought out Lucky and Windy all the same half an hour later and detailed to them his suspicions of Slade.

To Lucky he said: "There's gonna be a watchman at the Freeze Out mine to-night, and I want you to invite him out to the ranch for a little visit. You may have to invite him real hard."

Lucky grinned, but Windy broke in. "What about me? Ain't I in this, too?"

"Not on your life, old-timer," replied Cassidy. "You're goin' to take the night watchman's place presently."

"Me?" queried the old man incredulously.

"Sure," replied Cassidy cheerfully. "You're goin' to offer yourself for the job to-morrow, and as you're goin' to be very deaf, I'll reckon they're goin' to jump at you. Incidentally, old-timer, you and I are strangers when we meet."

Actually the whole affair was so neatly done that even Slade had no idea of what was going forward. The night watchman was missing the next morning and there was not one single sign to suggest that he had left except of his own accord. Old Windy hobbled up to the entrance of the mine when Cassidy was actually discussing the whole thing with Slade.

"Any jobs goin', mister?" he squeaked.

His pretended deafness got him the vacant post. Slade had to bellow every question at him half a dozen times, but Windy ignored Cassidy, and Cassidy made sarcastic remarks about the "old fool"; and Slade knew that a deaf old man would be eminently suitable for such a post. A keen-eared stranger might hear suspicious noises during the night, but this old man, he was sure, would never hear one sound.

"I should give the poor old mutt a job," said Hopalong carelessly. "It don't matter a lot if he is a bit deaf."

Slade thought it mattered a great deal to himself and his partners. But he didn't say so. And Windy was promptly engaged.

Windy Makes a Bigger Discovery

It was the middle of the night and Hopalong was fast asleep when Windy burst into his room.

"Hoppy," he exclaimed excitedly, "I've found out everything."

Hopalong was awake in a flash and listening intently as the old man went on.

"Thought I'd do a bit of prospectin'," he said. "Went into the mine; thought I heard funny noises, and, by jabbers, I did! A dozen miners from the Devil-May-Care workin' away in our mine! What d'you think of that?"

"And they never came in past you?"

"No, sir. Not even a cat passed me after I went on duty."

"Where did you find 'em workin'?"

"In the tunnel on the right—where Dennis met his death."

Hopalong whistled softly.

"Windy," he said, "I'm makin' a guess. It is that there's another tunnel still behind all them timbers leading from the Devil-May-Care mine to ours; and that Slade's hand-in-glove with Frazier."

The old man's eyes bulged. "Are we roundin' the dirty skunks up to-night?" he asked.

Hopalong shook his head.

"No, we're first goin' to make sure. Now you'd better get back to the mine, quick. I'll be seein' you."

Hopalong strolled into the mine the next day as though nothing had happened. After a few words with Slade and the men he pursued his way along to the tunnel on the right. After a few quick glances round and some very close examination of the timbering, he knocked boldly and loudly on the wood.

Breathlessly he waited. His quick ear, glued to the wood, had caught a sound on the other side. Then suddenly, to his amazement, the heavy timbers seemed to slide open and a gun came through.

"That you, Slade?" whispered a voice.

In a flash Hopalong sprang, caught the gun in his hand, and as he slipped round the timber had a quick vision of a fist flying towards his head. But, even as he ducked he loosed a vicious uppercut with all the force in his body, and the man slid to the floor.

Hopalong stood panting. The other man's gun had fallen to the floor, but he was making no attempt to get it, for Hopalong's was in his hand. Slade came running up and gave a sharp exclamation.

"What's—what's the meanin' of this?" he managed to get out. But it seemed to Hopalong that there was something more than surprise underlying his voice.

"I want to know—" began the man on the ground, but Hopalong snapped in roughly.

"Shut up! I'm askin' the questions."

"Well, I ain't talkin'."

Frazier was gazing at Hopalong Cassidy in a dazed fashion.

Hopalong addressed Slade.

"There's no more mystery now about the Freeze Out mine, Slade," he said steadily. "Our neighbour here lets him self in through this door, steals our gold and kills anyone who gets in his way."

Slade swallowed.

"Nice work," he said. "We'll take our prisoner down to the assay office and explain things to Perkins. If the gold from the Devil-May-Care matches the gold in the vein we lost, then we trap the whole outfit."

Possibly at any other time Hopalong might have been impressed by the glibness of the answer. But he had seen the quick glances that had passed between the two men, and he realised that Slade was accepting an awkward situation without question and was playing for time.

"Good idea, Slade," he replied. "We'll get 'em."

His suspicions were confirmed when they reached Perkins' office with their prisoner. The swift fear that sprang into Perkins' eyes told Hopalong all he wanted to know, and though Perkins endeavoured to show merely surprise and concern as he examined the two samples of ore, Cassidy was satisfied that the assayer's brain was busy.

Perkins leaned back in his chair a length.

"I'll take an oath that those two rocks are from the same place," he said.

"O.K.," replied Cassidy. "I'll have that in writing, please, Perkins."

"You can trust me, Cassidy—"

"Sure I can, but I like to have things on paper—in case of accidents. I figure on turnin' this guy over to the sheriff until we round up the others. Got any better ideas?"

Perkins spoke slowly and thoughtfully.

"I shouldn't do that, Cassidy," he said. "The rest of the gang will see you're on to 'em then, and they'll stay away from the Freeze Out."

"Quite right," urged Slade. "We ought to hide this guy some place. There's a deserted shack out in Sandstone Gulch. We could hold him safely there."

"And loose him the moment my back's turned," mused Hopalong. "I wonder what they're after?"

Aloud he said:

"Fine. Let's get 'em."

Perkins handed him the paper that he signed and Hopalong accepted it without comment.

But he was more sure than ever now that the pair of them were laying a trap for him.

A Fight in the Shack

DURING the ride to the shack Hopalong did some hard thinking, for it was coming to him very forcibly now that the paper which he held signed by Perkins was—if his suspicions were correct—a very definite danger to both the assayer and Slade.

"However, we'll very soon see," he reflected, as they approached the shack.

Slade hustled his prisoner into the place.

"Sit down," he commanded roughly.

The man sat down. Hopalong sat down, too—but he was taking good care to keep Slade in front of him.

"If you were to talk, Pierce," he said, "we might get a court to go a little easier on you for turnin' State's evidence."

"Evidence against who?" retorted the other sullenly.

"Evidence against your boss—the one who planned this whole thing," said Hopalong quietly.

January 21st, 1933.

"I'm not talkin', snapped the man. "Better tie him up, Cassidy," suggested Slade. "We want to make sure of him."

Instinct warned Hopalong then. He knew.

"I'm goin' to let you tie him up, Slade," he said.

A fractional pause. Once more Hopalong saw the swift suspicion leap into Slade's eyes.

"What d'you mean?"

"Just this," replied Hopalong. "Unless I'm mighty mistaken, you're as deep in this as anyone, and—"

But as Slade's hand dived to his gun, his fist crashed out, hurling him to the ground.

"And don't you move, either," he went on, addressing Pierce, who had sprung to his feet, but stopped as he found himself looking into Hopalong's gun. "Now line up, the pair of you, and—"

"Drop that gun, Cassidy, and drop it quick!"

Hopalong's heart missed a beat. He knew that cool voice, and he felt the gun in his back. His own clattered to the floor.

Frazier, for it was he, came round and surveyed him with a contemptuous smile. But he still held his gun in his hand, and Hopalong knew that if he moved that gun would speak.

"I had an idea I might be wanted," he went on coolly, "when Perkins told me a quarter of an hour ago what was goin' forward here. Tie him up, boys."

"And I had an idea that you were at the head of this outfit," retorted Hopalong, as Slade and Pierce fastened the ropes tightly round him.

"Afraid you're too late to tell it to anyone," retorted the other with a brutal laugh.

"Give me that gun and I'll finish him, boss," urged Pierce. But Frazier hook his head.

"Don't be a fool," he replied. "If he was found with lead in him his pals would never rest until they'd tracked us down. No! I reckon I know a far better way than that."

With a laugh he took a box of matches from his pocket and, having struck one, deliberately applied it to the dirty curtains that hung before the window. As they flamed up he turned.

"Come on, boys!" he said.

At the door he turned and waved his hand pleasantly.

"You've always reckoned yourself a mighty clever guy, Cassidy," he said with a bitter sneer. "Think your way out of this one. But"—he glanced at the flames, which had now reached the roof and were burning hungrily—"I reckon you'll have to think mighty quick. S'long!"

Hopalong's indomitable pluck nearly vanished altogether, then, as he heard them ride away. The flames had caught the roof and were already licking round the room. Billows of smoke were eddying round him, sending him coughing and spluttering. But though he writhed and fought and struggled with the cords that bound him, all he could do was just to roll over nearer to the flames. Yet even as he felt them and tried to roll back out of their reach, he paused. For in a flash he had realised that his only hope to get free was to stay within reach of those flames in the vain hope that they might catch the cords that bound him and set him free that way. Though even as the idea came to him he hesitated at what he might have to endure with only a sliver's chance of success.

He felt the flames scorching his wrists, bit deeply into his lip to prevent himself from screaming at the pain. The perspiration was pouring down his forehead, the smoke was suffocating him. The flames were burning his wrists, he felt them at his legs. He writhed and struggled as he felt his bonds weakening. With a supreme effort he felt them at last give way, got to his knees, caught at a table and staggered to his feet. As in a dream he heard his name called, tried to answer but without avail.

"This is the end," he thought, and the floor seemed to rise up at him.

He opened his eyes; blinked dazedly. The sun was shining above him, and Windy was bending over him.

"Are you all right, Hoppy?" asked the old man anxiously.

"A little—singed. How—did you—get here? No, let me stay here a bit."

"Saw Frazier leave Perkins' office ridin' like hell. When I saw him headin' this way I wondered what was up, and followed him. Why in hades do you do these darn fool things, Hoppy?"

"Worth it, Windy," he replied with a smile. "I've got the whole gang now where I want 'em."

"And what's the next move?"

Hopalong struggled into a sitting position.

"They reckon I'm dead," he replied after a few moments of thought, "so I'll stay dead, and maybe they'll go ahead just as usual to-night. First of all, you've got to get hold of Buck and the boys and tell 'em we want 'em for to-night. Tell 'em to meet me on the hill north of the Devil-May-Care mine. From there we can see the entrance to both of the mines. As soon as Frazier's lot go in at their entrance we'll slip down and have a chat with the night watchman there. But the moment you give us the signal from your end that Slade has gone in I'll send some of the boys along from the hill to guard your entrance. We shall go in, of course, from the other end, and when we come through to the Freeze Out they may try to make a bolt for it out at your end."

Old Windy chuckled broadly.

"They won't get far," he rejoined. "What signal do I give you, Hoppy, to show you when Slade's gone in?"

"Strike a match and light your pipe, old timer. We'll have the glasses trained on you."

Hopalong Makes His Move

HOPALONG slipped stealthily down the hill in the direction of the entrance to the Devil-May-Care mine. For they had seen the men go in, and at the other end they had seen old Windy light his pipe.

Hopalong worked his way noiselessly towards the mine entrance. He could just see the night watchman sitting reading.

Hopalong crept nearer, but as he did so he dislodged a pebble which clattered noisily down. He saw the watchman pick up his gun from the table, saw him come out and glance right and left. He himself was crouching behind a boulder, but as he saw the other turn he sprang, and the next minute had him by the throat forcing him backwards.

The fight didn't last very long, and it was only a matter of seconds before Hopalong had him helpless on the ground.

There were few, if any, men in those parts who could hold their own with Hopalong either with gun play or fist-cuffs. Holding the watchman down he had a rope round him in a few moments, and in a few more moments Buck and the boys joined him in response to his whistle.

"Lucky, you and the others stay here and guard this guy," said Hopalong. "Buck, you and two more come with me."

Frazier and Perkins were sitting in the latter's office. A bottle and glasses were on the table. Frazier had been relating once again with considerable relish his episode with Hopalong at the shack.

"If they find bits of him," he finished with a grim chuckle. "I reckon those bits can't talk. Slade's prepared to swear that he rode out with Cassidy and Pierce in the direction of the shack and left 'em there because Cassidy said he could do the job alone and wanted a little heart to heart talk with Pierce. And as Pierce will be mis-sin'—I'll pack him off if there's trouble—any jury's likely to return an open verdict."

"Fine," retorted Perkins, rubbing his hands. "With Cassidy out of the way we ought to have clear sailin' from now onward."

Frazier picked up the bottle and filled two glasses. "Here's to a good clean-up," he said. Both lifted their glasses. But they never reached their mouths. They stayed arrested half-way, for a voice spoke from the open door sharply. And Perkins could only stare.

"Maybe I should let you two finish your drinks, because they'll be the last ones you'll have for a long time. Put your hands on the table and keep 'em there."

Frazier's eyes were on Hopalong, for he it was. He was gazing at him in an almost dazed condition. He had left him not many hours ago tightly bound in a locked and burning shack. Yet here he was once more as cool and nonchalant as ever, a gun in his hand and three armed men with him.

And Frazier realised with dull fury that the game was up at last.

He moistened his dry lips. He wanted to speak, but no words would come. He wanted to leap up and hurl himself at those four stern-looking men. But swift death lay that way and he was afraid.

Almost as if reading his thoughts, Hopalong spoke. "I take quite a lot of killin', Frazier," he said. "It was not a bad idea of yours to tunnel a way through from your mine to the Freeze Out. It may interest you to know that my boys are holding both entrances at the moment. When I go back to them we're goin' in to see just what's goin' on. Sorry you won't be there to see the fun."

Frazier didn't say a word. Hope died within him. He knew that Hopalong never boasted and that every word he had spoken was true. They would creep into the mine, they would find all the men at work in the Freeze Out, Slade among them. To save their miserable skins they would confess everything. A rope was waiting for him—Frazier—and only a miracle could save him from it now. He clenched his hands in impotent rage, but Hopalong seemed to sense what was in his mind.

"Better not try any funny stuff, Frazier," he said. "I'm shootin' to kill this time. I'm not forgettin' Dennis."

And then he went on. "Buck, you three wait here and look after these guys. I want to get back to the boys and finish this little round-up."

For nearly two hours after he had gone deathly silence reigned in the room. Perkins was sitting gazing blankly in front of him, rage and despair in his face. Frazier, with his hands in his lap, was lying back in his chair. But three pairs of eyes were watching both of those two men intently, and three hands were holding their guns tightly.

Frazier spoke at last, addressing Buck: "Mind if I smoke, Peters? Haven't had one all night and I'm just dying for a cigar."

The other answered him quietly. "You can take one of those I see on the table, Frazier," he replied. "But if I see your hand go near your belt you may never live to regret it."

"O.K. by me," retorted the other with a hard laugh. "With three guns trained on me I'm not likely to attempt any funny stuff."

Nonchalantly he bent forward to pick up the cigar in front of him, but even as he did so his hand swept the lamp from the table, hurling the room into darkness. As three guns spoke simultaneously he flung himself at the window.

The rest was confusion inside the room. Glass was breaking, flames licking upwards, men tumbling over each other unable to distinguish between friend and foe. Buck had seen Frazier as he flung himself through the window and had fired simultaneously. But in the darkness he realised that his shot had gone wide. He rushed to the window. But even as he peered out into the darkness he saw a figure rise up from the veranda and push into the street, and his gun spoke twice.

He saw the man stagger and fall. "Come on, boys," he shouted. "I've got one of 'em."

Meanwhile, Hopalong had reached the entrance to the Devil-May-Care mine.

"STABLEMATES"

very good idea that this was the young man who had spoken to her that morning. Moreover, it was obvious that this unknown horse had a very fine turn of speed, and that not only was she running level with a horse that had cost Mrs. Shephard many thousands of dollars, but seemed to have a fair chance of gaining the victory.

Actually, the horses flashed by the winning-post, and only a photograph could have given the verdict as to which had won, but Mrs. Shephard knew from her own stop-watch that both horses had almost beaten the track record.

When Mickey trotted back to the grand stand he found a steward, almost red in the face with rage, and a smiling Mrs. Shephard waiting for him.

"Young man, get down off that horse!" shouted the steward.

"So it was you?" laughed Mrs. Shephard.

"Yes, ma'am."

"So this is your wonder horse?"

"Yes, ma'am," answered the boy, "I thought we better have that little race right away. I hope you ain't angry?"

"Not after a performance like that," replied the just woman, with a glance at the steward that signified she wished to deal with the young man.

"Then will you do something for me?" begged Mickey. "Will you race her under your colours?"

The steward and the trainer nearly expired at such brazen impertinence.

"I ain't got the fee," hastily continued Mickey. "And there's a guy I owe a lot of dough to for an operation. I gotta feeling he'll be needing the dough pretty badly."

"I'll enter her on one condition."

"What's that?"

"That none of my horses has to run against her."

"How about the Brewster Handicap to-morrow?" Mickey dared to suggest.

Mrs. Shephard agreed, not only to the horse being entered in the Brewster Handicap, but gave Mickey permission to ride. Also, she instructed her trainer to house the horse in one of their loose boxes.

Noticing that the steward was dying to say a few words on this unconventional incident, Mrs. Shephard linked her arm in his and said she'd be so grateful for a cup of coffee.

Mickey was accommodated in a luxurious stall, and he was grooming down his horse when Barney Donovan appeared on the scene.

"Hallo, Mickey!" he called out. "I thought you weren't going to run her?"

"Well, I put it up to her, and she started cryin' and carryin' on something awful!" mocked the young rascal. "So I thought I ought to bring her up here so she could at least watch the race."

"Now there's no use being sore just because we had a little misunderstanding," said Donovan, trying to be tactful. "How's your father?"

"Well, didn't you hear?" Mickey cried with a loud laugh. "That guy wasn't my father at all. He was a third cousin or something on my grandmother's side, through a marriage of an aunt. We finally had to shoot him."

"Sounds only fair enough," agreed Donovan, and then added: "I'm still your friend, kid."

"Sorry, Barney, but we've got nothing to be friendly about any more."

January 21st, 1939

There was no laughter now on the boy's face. "We don't like the same things."

In the excitement of his new surroundings Mickey was able for a little while to forget about his father. But the boy had little sleep that night, because he dreaded that Terry might go back on the booze.

If only he could win this race then he would seek out the old man and explain why he'd had to behave so strangely.

Lady Q Goes Lame

IT was a glorious day that greeted Mickey when he did wake from a troubled sleep. The morning seemed to drag, but at last there came the afternoon, and within a short while he would be out on the race-track. A little nigger boy brought him his racing silks, and though there was no need to change he got dressed at once.

Everything seemed grand until Mickey noticed that Lady Q had the treated hoof off the ground. With a cry of alarm he went down on his knees to examine the hoof, and to his horror Lady Q gave a whinny of pain when he pressed the pad.

"Does it hurt you much, Lady?" he asked in distressed tones. He looked at the soulful eyes. "Yes, I see it does. Well, you can't run like that. If you can't run, what's pop goin' to do?"

The horse seemed to understand, for she gave a shrill whinny, and shook her head as if to say there was nothing the matter with her, but Pete the trainer was very dubious when he made his examination. After a consultation with Mrs. Shephard he decided to go over to the stewards and take her out of the race.

For the first time in his life Mickey really gave way to tears, and he flung himself in his glorious silks into a corner. It was Mrs. Shephard who found him in this dejected attitude. She was most kind, and did her best to cheer him up. The horse should be treated and run at some other time.

"She should be running to-day," sobbed Mickey. "Some other time will be too late. To-day's when she should be running."

"She'll run to-day," said a husky voice.

Mrs. Shephard was amazed when a thick-set elderly man walked into the stalls and stooped down to lift up the hoof of Lady Q. She glanced at the boy, and his expression puzzled her even more. It was fear, and there was yearning in the youngster's eyes.

"Her hoof's a little bit tender to-day," Terry pronounced, and from his pocket produced an object. "I brought along a bar shoe that'll protect it. With that on she'll run over anything on the track."

"Who are you, please?" asked Mrs. Shephard.

A whimsical smile.

"I used to take care of her," Terry nodded towards the speechless youngster. "For him, ma'am."

"If you're sure she's going to be all right I'll ston Pete from taking her out of the race."

"She'll be all right, lady," Terry promised. "You can have no hesitation about running her."

"I'm glad," Mrs. Shephard turned eagerly to the boy. "Your worries are all over."

"Yes, ma'am," answered Mickey; but when the good lady had gone he turned fiercely on his adopted father. "Get out of here—beat it before that cop nabs you."

Old Terry had just finished fixing the shoe, and he straightened his back to look at the boy.

"What are you talking about?" he asked in surprise.

"That Detective Donovan," Mickey blurted out. "He told me all about you when I went there to get the entry form. He's probably watching me now to see if he can nab you."

"So Donovan told you." The drawn expression on Terry's face vanished as if by magic. "So now I understand why you acted so strangely, and why you didn't want me to come to Burlington."

"What other reason would I have?" demanded Mickey. "I had to keep you away from here. Gee, I'd rather lose my right arm than lose you."

"Gee-whizz!" Terry's voice was husky with emotion. "And I thought you were through with me."

Mickey feverishly begged Terry to get out of the stalls at once, and to keep his hat over his eyes and his collar well turned up. He was to go back to the widow's, pretend that he couldn't get married until his boy was at the ceremony, and Mickey reckoned that he could get down to the farm within two or three days. He even suggested that Terry let his beard grow. When Terry hinted that he would like to stop and watch the race Mickey became quite angry. If his father didn't get going he wouldn't race Lady Q at all. Naturally, Doc Terry had no intention of leaving the race track without seeing the boy ride, but he did heed the advice about keeping his collar turned up and his hat pulled down. He found a quiet spot on the rails. Now Mickey, knowing his old man, gazed anxiously along the packed crowds, and his fears were realised when he noted that familiar figure. He made violent signals with his hands for Doc Terry to go away, but the old fellow paid no heed, and as a result when the starting-gate went up Lady Q was very badly left.

Lady Q was seven or eight lengths behind the field, and it seemed perfectly hopeless for her to have a chance. Doc Terry was upset, and, forgetting his need for precaution, began to shout for Lady Q.

A moment later a hand fell on his shoulder, and he turned to find Detective Donovan by his side.

"Hallo, Doc?"

"Mind waiting until the race is over?" quietly requested Terry.

"O.K.," the detective agreed. "I'd like to watch the race myself."

"At the far turn Duke Arthur, still leading by four lengths," boomed the voice of the announcer. "Bondi is second. The pace is a cracker. Bondi is creeping up, and is now half a length behind Duke Arthur. Blonde Betty's third, with Mad Power fourth."

And out there on the rack track Mickey was shouting encouragingly to Lady Q.

"We can't let pop down, Lady," he was crying. "So let's go!"

The horse that seemed out of the race seemed to leap forward, and flushed by a number of the stragglers to reach the rear of the pack leaders. Duke Arthur still had the lead with Bondi close up, whilst a length behind were four horses bunched together. And this was the barrier that was shutting out Lady Q.

"You're making it, honey!" Mickey cried to the horse. "Keep going, keep going, baby!"

Mickey got past those four horses on the outside, to get into third place. It was now the straight with the winning-post but a furlong away. Duke Arthur and Bondi were running level, but when Lady Q tried to break through the gap between the two leaders, the jockey on Boudi at once closed in.

"Oh, no, you don't!" the jockey cried viciously.

"I'm coming through!" defiantly answered Mickey.

This dirty-riding jockey tried to check Mickey by putting his foot in front of Mickey's stirrup, and only once during that race did the boy use his whip, and then it was to crack it across the crooked jockey's ankles.

"Lady Q has got through!" excitedly shouted the announcer. "Duke Arthur holds a slight lead. Lady Q has caught the leader. Now it's Duke Arthur. Now Lady Q. They're neck and neck and nose to nose." But it was Lady Q who possessed that extra ounce of stamina that told, and she forged ahead to win by a neck.

Terry, directly the race was won, asked Donovan to take him away, so that Mickey, when he trotted back towards the weighing-in room, should see that he had gone and think that he had made good his escape.

Back in the stall with Lady Q the triumphant young jockey was planning what he should do with the 3,500 dollars at his disposal when Donovan turned up, and as gently as possible told the boy that Terry was under arrest. He regretted that he'd had to carry out his duty, for it was obvious that Terry was a reformed character. Moreover, it was due entirely to Doc Terry that Lady Q had managed to win the race. Then Mrs. Shephard appeared and put her arms round the heartbroken boy and begged him to be brave. Mickey called Donovan a sneaking cop, and would not be comforted.

Lurking all this time was Terry, and the boy's distress was more than he could bear. When he showed up at the open door of the stall Mickey flung himself into his adopted father's arms, and eventually Terry prevailed on the boy to listen to him.

"It's only a little bit that's coming to me. It won't last long—a couple of years, and then it'll be all over, and there won't be nothing hanging over our heads."

"If you're going away, I'm going with you."

"Stop that foolish talk," Terry managed a laugh. "You aren't even invited."

"I'll get myself invited. I'll do something. I'll steal so they'll have to send me up there," cried Mickey. "You can't leave me behind, pop."

"Stop that foolish talk. You're only making it the tougher for both of us," rebuked Doc Terry. "Keep your chin up. Ain't you proud to have me as your old man?"

"What else have I got?"

"Well, then keep that chin up so I'll know you're proud of me. And take that glum look off your face. Come on—get a grin on your face. And when you say good-bye—why smile!" He lagged his son. "Before you have a chance to wipe that smile off, I'll be right back again."

And when Donovan led away his prisoner, who went with a happy smile on his face, a boy waved farewell and did his best to smile.

"We'll work for him, Mickey!" soothed Mrs. Shephard. "Donovan is certain it'll only be a few months, perhaps a year at the most."

Mickey straightened his shoulders.

"Gee, that ain't such a long time, after all, for Lady Q and me to wait for pop."

"BAR 20 JUSTICE"

"We've got Frazier and Perkins," he said laconically. "This lot should be pretty simple now, for if we go quietly we can surprise 'em at work. But Slade will be the trouble. He knows he's deep in it and State's evidence won't save him. Come on, boys, but go steady."

With their guns in their hands they set out along the tunnel.

They needed no telling that work was in full progress in the mine. Lights were on everywhere in the tunnel as they crept noiselessly along. But as they came towards the spot where they knew the Devil-May-Care mine ended and the Freeze Out began, Hopalong held up his hand in warning. Faintly the sound of picks and shovels at work came to their ears. Hopalong crept softly forward, but even as he rounded the corner they saw him duck swiftly as a gun spoke and a bullet flattened itself against a rock at his side. Then they heard his gun flash out twice.

"Come on, boys!" he shouted. "I missed him and he's rushed through to warn the others. But careful how you go."

All the same, he scarcely seemed to be careful himself as he slipped quickly forward.

They followed close on his heels. In the distance they could hear the sounds of swiftly retreating steps. Then silence once more.

They halted. Hopalong was holding them back. Lucky was just behind him. Hopalong's eyes were intent on the tunnel, for they had now passed through the entrance and were in the Freeze Out mine.

"With any luck," he said quietly, "they've run straight into the trap at the other end. But take it easy. I'm suspicious of Slade."

With scarcely a sound they crept forward. Hopalong was listening intently. Every step he took was measured. Then suddenly he halted. For a moment or two they all stood rigid flattening themselves against the rocks as they saw him do. And then suddenly Lucky caught his breath.

From behind a big rock that lay ahead almost in the middle of their path he saw something slowly lifting. But even as it did so Hopalong's gun rang out and they heard a thud and then stillness once more.

They ran forward after Hopalong. As they reached the rock they stopped gazing down on the figure that lay there with all the stillness of death on him. Slade!

And then from ahead they heard old Windy's excited voice.

"Hoppy, Hoppy, are you there? I've got 'em all."

Hopalong and Lucky rode back into the town at easy speed. They had left a bunch of sullen men all safely guarded. Now, all that remained was to put Perkins and Frazier into safe custody and their troubles were at an end.

Hopalong was humming softly to himself as he rode along. He felt that at last Dennis' death was avenged and happiness and wealth awaiting Ann.

But even as he and Lucky swept into the town street Hopalong gave a sharp exclamation as he reined in his horse. And at that moment Peters rushed up to him.

"What happened, Buck?" asked Hopalong.

"Perkins is dead, but Frazier got away. I'm sorry, Hoppy, but—"

Hopalong broke in swiftly. Bitter disappointment was his, for with Frazier still free all his work remained to be done over again.

"Which way did he ride?" he demanded.

Buck pointed and Hopalong swung his horse round.

"Wait a moment, Hoppy. I'm coming with—"

"You're not. This is a personal matter, and I'm ridin' alone. How long's he been gone?"

"Barely three minutes. He turned our horses adrift."

Hopalong waited for no more. He was off like a streak. Frazier he guessed, would be making for the border, and his only hope was to catch him before he crossed it.

It was nearly a quarter of an hour before he caught sight of his quarry in the distance, but his heart went up with a bound as he did so. For though he could see that the man ahead was riding for his life he knew in a flash that his own horse was far faster for him to have caught up with him.

"Come on, old lady!" he murmured as he patted his horse's neck. "There's big work for both of us ahead."

He was smiling now as he felt his horse respond. They were decreasing the distance between them. And presently he saw Frazier whip out his gun and fire. But the bullet sang by him and he laughed.

"Have to shoot better'n that, Frazier, to get me," he ejaculated as he swept on.

Then suddenly he saw the man throw himself from his horse and start to climb swiftly the rocky slope that lay at his side.

"If you want it that way you shall have it," he said grimly as he urged his horse onwards.

He was off his horse in a flash as he reached the spot where Frazier stood. He saw Frazier fire as he ran towards the slope, and ducked as he drew his gun and clicked the trigger.

But he swore softly as he realised that his gun was empty, and tossed it aside as he rushed upwards to the shelter of the next rock. He was unarmed against a desperate armed man, but his fierce determination was blinding him to all sense of danger.

"I've come out to get him," he muttered. "And I'm not goin' back without him."

But his brain was working busily now. Frazier he could see was making his way round the slope, firing as he went. But each time his shots were going wild, and Hopalong realised that he was getting to the end of his tether.

"I'll have to get above him," he ejaculated between his clenched teeth. "It's my only chance."

It was nearly half an hour before Hopalong could gain the higher ground, but it seemed to him to be half a lifetime. Frazier he could see was puzzled. He had taken shelter behind a huge boulder. But Hopalong lying behind another one was smiling. For he had flung a stone down to a spot forty yards away, and in a flash Frazier's gun had spoken, the bullet striking the earth just by the spot where the stone had fallen.

"He's lost me—thinks I'm down there. Well, we're not going so badly."

But it took him nearly a quarter of an hour of slow, painful and laborious climbing to reach the spot that his eye had marked down. And when he had reached it it was a few minutes before he could summon up his courage to peer over the edge of the ledge on which he lay. For he knew that if Frazier was expecting him there the bullet that would follow swiftly was hardly likely to miss him at that short distance.

He peered over. But even as he did so his heart gave a leap. Fifteen feet below lay Frazier lying on the ground, his gun in his hand, his eyes ranging backwards and forwards over the ground below.

Stealthily Hopalong picked up a stone, flinging it to a spot fifty yards ahead of Frazier. Then as Frazier's gun moved in a flash to the spot, Hopalong leaped.

He wasn't entirely sure of those next few minutes except that he was finding Frazier very far from an exhausted man. He landed on top of him, and it was with some relief that he saw Frazier's gun slip from his hand and roll down the slope.

For some minutes, that seemed like hours to Hopalong, they fought. Twice Frazier had him on the ground with his hands at his throat, but twice Hopalong with a supreme effort swerved, and with all the strength he could muster his fist crashed out.

It caught Frazier on the point of the jaw almost lifting him from the ground. Then Hopalong saw him stagger and collapse as a tree falls, and lie very still.

Hopalong stood there breathing heavily. Down below him among the rocks he saw Frazier's gun. He managed somehow to get down to it. But as his hand closed over it and he began to climb wearily back there was a grim smile on his face.

He sat down on the ground opposite the still unconscious man. His strength was spent, but now he had a gun in his hand once more.

Down below in the valley he saw horsemen spurring towards him, and saw it was the boys from the Bar 20.

As Frazier stirred and opened his eyes Hopalong spoke in his old lazy tones:

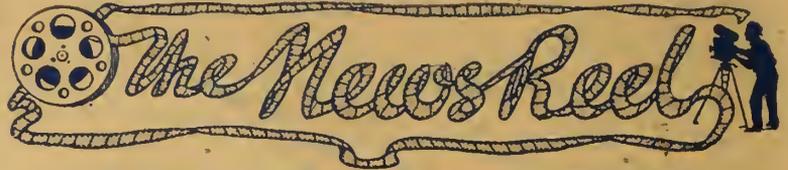

"Shouldn't bother to move, Frazier," he said. "There's a special guard of honour callin' for you. I can see 'em comin'."

The crowd of horsemen, lead by Lucky, swept up and soon had Frazier on a horse and heading back for town.

"Nice work, Hoppy," said Lucky. "What now?"

Hopalong smiled. "New York—and a little excitement. I guess!" he drawled.

The New Chan's New Son

Sidney Toler, the new Charlie Chan, has solved his first case.

He has found his No. 1 son, Lee Chan, in the person of Sen Yew Cheung, twenty-three, a Chinese born in San Francisco.

The quest for a Lee Chan was almost as arduous as the search for a successor to the late Warner Oland, which ended with the selection of Toler.

Scouts from 20th Century-Fox sifted the Chinatowns of San Francisco and Los Angeles, as well as Californian colleges. Scores of young Chinese were interviewed and dozens tested. Since the part is almost of equal importance with the title rôle, no effort was spared to find the youth best qualified to fit it.

Sen, a salesman for a chemical company, heard of the search during a business trip to Los Angeles, came out to 20th Century-Fox and applied for the job. He was given a test with Toler, who apparently sensed the young man's possibilities, and personally coached him. Toler showed some real Charlie Chan intuition, because Production Chief Darryl F. Zanuck took one look at the test and exclaimed: "That's Lee Chan."

Loretta K.O.'s Baxter

Knocked out by a terrific blow to the jaw which Loretta Young delivered, Warner Baxter finished a perfect scene for his current 20th Century-Fox picture, "Wife, Husband and Friend," in a state of unconsciousness.

The person responsible for this semi-accidental knockout was Director Gregory Ratoff who thought he would achieve more realism by avoiding too much rehearsal. The fact of the matter was that he wanted no rehearsal at all, and his instructions to Loretta Young were to make the blow look as real as possible when she was to come from behind a door and sock Baxter in the face.

Loretta's blow, given with full force, was aimed at a safe place above the shoulder, but landed squarely on the point of the jaw. The rest of the scene went according to the script, without anyone being aware that it was more real than was ordered.

Warner Baxter went out cold, knocking over a lamp as he fell to the floor. Loretta jumped on him and pummelled him still further while she went through the rest of the dialogue she had to do in the scene.

When it was over, Baxter remained prone of the floor. He was still out when he was carried to his dressing-room and revived there. He did not know what had happened after the beginning of the scene when Loretta socked him, and his only consolation was that the rest of the scene had gone off perfectly while he was there in body only.

Due to his groggy condition and the welt Loretta had raised on his jaw he had to be driven home by his stand-in, Frank McGrath, and discontinued work until the following day.

Do You Know That

Donald O'Connor and Billy Cook, the Huck Finn and Tom Sawyer in Paramount's "Tom Sawyer, Detective," had over twenty pounds of dirt daubed on them while working in one sequence of the picture? The dirt was for make-up.

Anna May Wong bobbed her hair just before she was due to start work in "King of Chinatown?" Paramount told her to let it grow and never cut it again.

Two hundred railroad men who never worked for the movies before, now have screen assignments? One crew is laying six miles of track at Iron Springs, Utah, for Cecil B. DeMille's New Paramount spectacle, "Union Pacific." The other is laying five spur tracks of about a mile each in Hollywood for the same picture.

"I am
THE LAW"

Instead of going abroad with his wife for his first holiday in seven years, John Lindsay, a mild-mannered law professor, becomes Special Prosecutor to wage war against organised crime—and the man who persuades him to take the post is himself a clever crook. A powerful drama, starring Edward G. Robinson

In the Way

IT was the last day of term, and in the lecture hall of the College of Law, at Burlington University, Professor John Lindsay was addressing a few parting words to his pupils.

Students filled the body of the hall; former students occupied chairs on the platform to right and left of the black-haired and middle-aged teacher of law who gave one the impression of being a little man, although, in point of fact, he stood five feet eight inches in his shoes.

"My friends," he said in his soft and well-modulated voice, "the shortest distance between two points is a straight line, so I'll come directly to the point." A smile flickered across his very wide mouth and his brown eyes twinkled.

"Some of you will end up by being ambulance chasers," he informed those in front of him. "Some of you may wind up in the Supreme Court of the United States. But whatever you do, I warn you, don't become a law professor. If you do, the same terrible thing will happen to you that's happened to me!"

He spread his hands, and a sudden gravity of expression on his sensitive, clean-shaven face banished the smile.

"At the end of every six years," he lamented, "just when you're beginning to get into your stride and are enjoying your work, you are handed a reward—a vacation with pay for a whole year. They call it a Sabbatical Year."

He paused, and it was with a note of wistfulness in his voice that he went on:

"In leaving you I leave not only my students but my friends. I'll miss you."

He turned to the young men on his right and to the young men on his left.

February 11th, 1939.

all of whom had been pupils of his in the past.

"And I shall miss you most of all," he declared. "In the years since you've graduated I've kept in touch with you. It has been a great joy to me to visit you in your offices, to help you with your first cases, to sit with you occasionally in court."

He sighed.

"And now," he added regretfully, "for a whole year I shall be out of it. I suppose you will survive—I'm not so sure that I will. Good-bye, my friends. Good-bye to you all."

With one accord the students rose and sang the song of their University; and ten minutes afterwards John Lindsay walked out from the building into the brilliant sunshine of a June day, a briar pipe in one hand, a leather portfolio in the other.

Beside him walked Paul Ferguson, a tallish and rather handsome young man who had been a very promising student and now was a budding attorney, and the two descended wide, stone steps in silence to a roadway of the campus. There they stopped as though about to part company, and John Lindsay said:

"My boy, the only time a man should start on a leave of absence is right after rigor mortis has set in."

Paul Ferguson laughed.

"Well, you won't mind it once you get on the boat," he remarked.

"That's what I dread the most!" John Lindsay gave a little shiver.

"Paul, come home with me, will you? Perhaps you can help me persuade my wife that we can have a wonderful vacation right here in town."

"I'd love to, John," Paul responded, "but I've got a court hearing at eleven."

"I'll go with you. Perhaps I could be of some assistance."

But Paul shook his head.

"No, thanks," he said firmly. "Your wife would never forgive me for taking you away on the last day. I'll see you off at the boat, though. So-long, professor."

"Good-bye," said John bleakly.

Paul got into an open two-seater at the kerb and drove off in the general direction of the city of Burlington, and John took a path across a lawn and turned into another road that led past halls and cultivated grounds to the house in which he lived.

His wife Geraldine—who had been known as "Jerry" from her childhood—was busy packing for the projected trip to Europe, and trunks were in the large and attractively furnished sitting-room as well as in the hall. Those in the hall were ready for dispatch, but those in the sitting-room were being filled—under the watchful eyes of an Irish terrier.

Jerry had been a pupil of John's before she had become his wife, and she was a full ten years his junior. The trip that did not appeal to him at all appealed to her intensely. She had suggested it; she had insisted upon it; she had made all the arrangements for it; and she was immersed in the details of packing when he entered the house.

After several ineffectual attempts at conversation, he discarded the jacket of his suit in favour of an old tweed coat and wandered about the sitting-room smoking his pipe.

A wardrobe trunk was closed and locked, and the terrier was induced to lick a label for it. John turned away from a window, where he had been gazing wistfully out upon a familiar and pleasing prospect, to inquire plaintively:

"Jerry, why are people continually trapesing around? Why is some other part of the world more interesting than the part you're in?"

Jerry did not reply to either question, but she said:

"You haven't had a day off in seven years. You've got to renew yourself."

He walked over to her, and he put his arms round her shoulders.

"Now, look, Jerry," he pleaded, "why couldn't I renew myself without going away?"

"No!" She shook her head.

"We could have a wonderful time together, you and I, right here in town."

"Oh, no, John! If we stayed here, you'd be over at school every day telling the dean how to run things."

"No, I wouldn't," he protested.

"Oh, yes, you would! Or else you'd be at the offices of all your graduates telling them how to run their practices!"

"I wouldn't!" He tried to coax her with a kiss. "I'd stay home with you, darling, all day long, and renew myself till I was blue in the face."

His entreaties had no effect upon ears steeled against them.

"Oh, John, please!" Jerry cried. "Let go of me so that I can finish packing!"

She broke away from him and went down on her knees at an open trunk, but he straightway went down on his knees beside her and put his arms round her again.

"I will, if you'll let me help you," he said.

"Oh, please go away and let me pack!"

It sounded as though she had reached the end of her patience, and he released her and got to his feet.

"Well, where shall I go?" he inquired, putting his pipe in his pocket.

"Go to a movie," she suggested. "They're playing 'Snow White' down the street."

"But I saw that Monday," he objected.

"Oh, see it again!"

He took out his watch and found that the time was five minutes to eleven.

"Well," he complained, "the theatre doesn't open until noon. Where can I go until then?"

"Take a walk." She glanced up at him from the trunk. "Window shop."

Smoke was issuing from the side of his coat and she viewed it with alarm.

"Your pocket!" she exclaimed.

He snatched forth his pipe, which was still alight, and he patted the pocket till its lining ceased to smoulder.

"Oh, John, you've burned the pockets out of almost every coat you own!" she chided. "Now, please get out of here before you set the house on fire!"

"Yes, dear," he murmured meekly, and was gone.

The Intruder

MANY people find "window-shopping" a pleasant way of spending an odd half-hour without expense, but John Lindsay tired of it very quickly. There were a number of excellent bookshops in Lincoln Avenue, only a little way from the colleges, and into one of these he drifted.

Like other possible customers, he took volumes from the shelves, examined them, and put them back in their places; but a law book interested him so much that he lost all count of time while browsing amongst its pages, and it was considerably after noon when he went out from the shop without having made a purchase.

The cinema to which his wife had referred was in Lincoln Avenue, and he hurried towards it. But as he reached its ornate entrance he was swept aside by a crowd of people who came rushing out as in a panic.

When the crowd had gone he entered the foyer and made straight for the ticket-office. The girl behind the little window lookèd terrified; the bald-hended proprietor of the place was beside her, dialing a number on a telephone. Smoke was billowing out from the doorways of the auditorium, and the smoke stunk.

"What's the matter?" asked John in astonishment. "What is it, Mr. Roberts?"

Mr. Roberts spoke frantically into the telephone.

"Hallo, Police Department! Somebody just threw a stench-bomb in my theatre! Send over— You'd better send over a lot of police right away!"

A quarter of an hour afterwards, John invaded the private office of the managing editor of the "Burlington Daily Press," and Mr. Roberts was with him—though none too willingly. The two had travelled in a taxicab from the cinema to the newspaper building.

The managing editor, a man of substantial build, with a full and rather florid face and a pair of prominent blue eyes, was in his shirt-sleeves at a littered desk, and he was blaring into a dictograph.

John waited till the storm had subsided and the blue eyes were staring at him, then effected introductions.

"This is my brother-in-law, Mr. Tom Ross," he said to Roberts. "He's the managing editor. He'll do something for you. This is Mr. Roberts, Tom."

"How d'you do, Mr. Roberts?" The blue eyes enveloped the shrinking form of the cinema proprietor. "What seems to be the trouble?"

"Well," hesitated the man, "I—"

"Mr. Roberts runs the University Theatre," John interposed. "He's the victim of a vicious conspiracy. Outrageous!"

"What happened, Mr. Roberts?" questioned the managing editor.

"Mr. Ross, I—I—"

"You know, you made a mistake when you signed up with the Theatre Owners' Protective Association," said John; and then, to his brother-in-law: "The moment he did sign up, Tom, the other outfit started to make trouble."

"'Murder at Café as Special Prosecutor dances the Big Apple!' " roared Leander, stabbing a finger at headlines on the front page of the newspaper.

"What other outfit?"

The question was addressed to Roberts, but it was John who replied:

"The Theatre Owners' Mutual Aid Association," he stated. "They started to throw stench-bombs, too, but the first outfit objected. So, threatened by the second outfit—"

"Now, wait a minute, John!" rapped Tom Ross. "Suppose you let Mr. Roberts tell me the story."

"But I don't want to talk," quavered Roberts.

"Then what's the idea of coming here?"

"Because he insisted," Roberts pointed to John. "I haven't anything to say. I'd rather have stench-bombs thrown in my cinema than dynamite-bombs in my home!"

John became quite indignant.

"If Mr. Roberts won't give you the facts," he said, "then I will. I'm going to see this thing through!"

"Oh, for heaven's sake, John!" exploded his brother-in-law. "You act as if this was the first stench-bomb that was ever thrown!"

"How can you talk like that, Tom?" stormed John. "There was a panic in the theatre. People might have been hurt—maybe killed!"

"Well, what do you expect me to do about it?"

"Headline it! Get some action!"

"Be your age, John." The editor flipped a hand with scorn. "There's nothing we can do about it. This town is infested with every conceivable racket. No attention is paid to the law. What'll one headline, more or less, mean to them?"

Mr. Roberts had taken advantage of this altercation to sneak out from the room, and neither editor nor professor had noticed his departure.

"Well, something ought to be done about it by somebody," contended John. "This poor man— Why, he's gone!"

"That's fine," drawled Tom Ross.

"Now, if you get out of here, maybe I can get some work done. Go tell your story to the governor's civic committee. If you drop in there, you'll hear about rackets that will make stench-bombs smell like violets!"

"Where do they meet?"

John sounded quite eager.

"State House. Hi, wait a minute! You're not really going there?"

"You bet I am!"

"But I was only kidding. It's a private meeting."

"I don't care about that," retorted John; and off he went.

State House, a stone-faced public building of considerable size, was situated in a tree-lined avenue to the south of the business centre of the city. John knew it well by sight, and after he had entered it he experienced little difficulty in finding the room—on the first floor—in which the members of the civic committee were in session.

A card attached to one of the double doors provided him with the information, but the card also stated (in large letters): "No Admittance." A police officer was on guard outside, but John paid as little attention to him as to the warning, and he opened one of the doors and stepped into a big, half-panelled room without being challenged.

Nine men were seated at a very long table, four at each side and one at the top, and they were so busy discussing the organised crime racket from which the city was suffering that not one of them noticed the intruder, who made himself comfortable on a hide-covered couch set against one of the walls.

For a full hour he listened to things that amazed him; things that filled him with righteous anger; and then the spectacled chairman rose from his seat at the top of the table. He was a lean-faced man with an aggressive jaw and a bald patch on the top of his head across which a few long strands of hair were carefully plastered. His name was George Leander.

February 11th, 1939.

"Intimidation of witnesses," he said bitterly, "has made it impossible for the grand jury to get anybody to testify. Corruption and bribery have sabotaged this investigation from the start. The governor has threatened to call out the Militia, and I have information that the Federal Government intends to take a hand unless we show some results. It's up to you, Mr. District Attorney!"

Herbert Berry, the District Attorney, was on Leander's right, a man of heavy build with a fat face and a thick neck. His hair was going grey, his clipped moustache had gone that colour completely.

"It's always up to the District Attorney," he growled.

"What have you done?" challenged a fair-haired and distinguished-looking man next to him. "The governor has authorised the appointment of a Special Prosecutor. Why hasn't one been appointed?"

"For the simple reason," replied the District Attorney, "that I can't find anyone to take the job."

"Can you blame them?" demanded another member of the committee.

"What man in his right senses would step into a spot like that, when the District Attorney himself admits that he can't cope with the situation?"

John rose from the hide-covered couch and walked over to the table.

"Gentlemen," he said, depositing his hat on the table between the District Attorney and the fair-haired man, "the shortest distance between two points is a straight line. I've been listening to you now for over an hour, and really aren't you making a mountain out of a molehill?"

Nine pairs of startled eyes stared at him.

"How did you get in here?" snapped the chairman.

"I walked in," he replied.

"Who are you?"

"My name is Lindsay. I'm a Professor of Law. I think I have a good grasp of the situation. I'm sure you don't need any State Militia, Federal men, or outside help of any kind."

"I quite agree with you," said Leander stiffly; "but since this is a private meeting—"

"Oh, I don't mind that at all." John moved round the table much as though he were dealing with one of his own classes at the College of Law. "New York had trouble like this," he said, "and cleaned it up. Now, I'm sure we can do the same thing. After all, who are these racketeers that you've been talking about?"

George Leander went out from the room, but the others listened in silence, the fair-haired man with obvious interest.

"They're a very low order of people, from all I can gather," John went on, "while you gentlemen have everything in your favour—the forces of law, money, and public opinion."

George Leander re-entered the room, and with him was the officer who had been on guard. But John's back was turned towards the double doors, and he was engrossed in his subject.

"Now, I'm sure that if you tackle this problem in a scientific way—"

"Sergeant," interrupted Leander loudly, "will you kindly inform this gentleman that this is a private meeting?"

The sergeant clamped a hand upon

John's right shoulder and, without any loss of dignity, John accepted the inevitable.

"All right," he said, and he picked up his hat and went out with the officer. "Well, I'm afraid I was in the wrong," he commented drily in the corridor. "I had no business intruding. After all, I'm only a taxpayer, and everybody knows taxpayers have no rights."

The fair-haired man emerged from the room.

"Oh, professor, I'd like a word with you," he said pleasantly, and he walked beside John to the stairs. "My name is Eugene Ferguson. My son was one of your law students—graduated a couple of years ago."

"Not Paul Ferguson?" exclaimed John.

"Yes."

"Well, I'm delighted to meet you. He's spoken to me about you a great many times."

"Not half as many times as he's spoken to me about you," Ferguson asserted. "He thinks you're the greatest authority on law in the country."

"And I think he's the best student I ever had," declared John. "I predict a brilliant future for him in the law."

"Well, that rates a drink."

"Oh, I rarely indulge in the afternoon," demurred John. "Besides, your meeting—"

"Aw," laughed Ferguson, "they can get along without me. If they won't listen to you I will."

The Ardmore Hotel was only a few hundred yards away from State House, and its cocktail bar was highly popular with business men. The two sauntered along to it, chatting together, and they became perched on stools at a horse-shoe of mahogany and were served with cocktails.

"You know," said John, lighting his pipe and puffing at it, "the right man could step in and clean out the whole nest of these racketeers in thirty days."

Eugene Ferguson emptied his glass and lit a cigarette.

"I know just the man," he confided with a smile, "but unfortunately he's going away on a Sabbatical leave."

John's brown eyes widened.

"You mean me?"

"Why not? But, of course, if you've made all your plans to leave—"

"Mr. Ferguson, I'll make a confession to you. I'd consider it no hardship to postpone my trip for a few weeks."

"A few weeks?" Ferguson looked amused. "Now come, professor, it may take longer than that!"

"No," John shook his head. "No, it wouldn't."

"Oh, it wouldn't be fair. You've probably looked forward to your vacation for a long time."

"Mr. Ferguson, I have an awful fear of an ocean trip."

Ferguson ordered two more cocktails, and absent-mindedly John pocketed his pipe.

"Of course, I don't know how much the job will pay," Ferguson remarked.

"But that doesn't interest me in the least," John assured him. "The University pays my salary. You know, the mere sight of a steamer funnel makes me ill."

Ferguson stroked the little moustache that decorated his upper lip.

"I'm sure I could sell the committee," he said. "They've got to find somebody pretty soon."

"I get seasick just thinking of a steamer," encouraged John. He “Now it's my intention to beat your head off,” John stated grimly. “Perhaps it will be the other way round. Anyway, we're going to find out!”

screwed up his face and he sniffed. “Do you smell anything burning?” Out came his pipe, and the lining of his pocket proved to be on fire.

John Takes Office

WHEN Eugene Ferguson went back to the meeting of the Civic Committee he was accompanied by John as far as the corridor on the first floor, and after an interval of a quarter of an hour John was invited into the room from which he had been ejected.

At seven o'clock in the evening both men were in the Ardmore Hotel once more, John at a table in the grill-room, Ferguson in a telephone-box in the lounge. John had been appointed Special Prosecutor to deal with the racketeers, and Ferguson had rung up a man named Moss Kitchell to inform him of the circumstance.

“We don't have to worry about the State Militia or the G-men,” he stated gleefully. “I've just landed a fish that will swim down-stream.”

Moss Kitchell, a massive middle-aged man with beady brown eyes and a nose like the beak of a hawk, was in the sitting-room of his own elaborate flat in Sheridan Avenue, and a fellow with a pock-marked face was with him. He said that he was glad to hear it.

“Because,” he added, “even we can't cope with G-men.”

“Kitchell,” exulted Ferguson, “I've got a Special Prosecutor that'll fit right into my vest pocket. Call the boys together and tell them we have nothing else to worry about.”

The boat for Europe was due to leave Burlington Harbour at ten o'clock that night, and long before sailing time Jerry Lindsay was on Pier 6 with the Irish terrier in her arms, waiting for her husband. Her brother, Tom Ross, was with her; Paul Ferguson arrived, with flowers, at twenty minutes to ten.

Students accumulated in considerable force to see their professor off, but at ten minutes to ten there was still no sign of him, and Jerry was beginning to show her agitation.

“Don't get excited,” urged her brother. “You've got plenty of time.” “Yes, plenty of time,” she said dolefully. “Ten minutes!”

“No,” she responded, “he telephoned me at seven and told me he'd meet me at the pier. He was with your father, Paul—said he was having dinner with him. Will you 'phone your father?”

Paul rushed off to do so, and while he was gone there came a warning blast from the siren of the ship and voices on deck were heard shouting:

“All ashore that's going ashore!” Jerry almost dropped the dog; Tom Ross took charge of it.

“Now, now, Jerry,” he enjoined, “don't be worried.”

“Oh, I'm too worried to be worried,” she cried. “If he isn't dead already I'll kill him when I see him!”

Paul returned to announce that his father had not as yet arrived home; and then, quite jauntily, John himself came hurrying on to the pier.

“Hallo!” he boomed. “Hallo, everybody! Well, my dear, I have a great deal to tell you.”

“Yes,” retorted Jerry, with an air of long-suffering, “and I've a great deal to tell you, too!”

“Most curious chain of events, this morning. You know when I left to see ‘Snow White’?”

“I know,” she derided, “the wicked queen! Now you come on before they pull up the gangplank. You can tell me all about it on the boat.”

“No, wait a minute!” John raised a hand. “That's just what I wanted to tell you. We're not taking the boat. I'm afraid we're going to have to postpone the trip.”

“Wh-wh-what?” gasped Jerry. “I've been appointed Special Prosecutor.”

That was the last straw. Jerry fell fainting into the ready arms of her brother.

Next morning John took office as Special Prosecutor in a suite of rooms at the Criminal Courts building, provided for him by the District Attorney, who provided him with a staff as well. Paul Ferguson had insisted on dropping his own practice to join forces with John, and he was given a room to himself.

Paul was in the long general office, however, when a clerk informed him that his father had called to see him, and he returned to his newly acquired room to find Eugene Ferguson doing his best to wear out its carpet.

“Hallo, dad,” he greeted. “They just told me you were in here.”

Ferguson stopped his restless pacing.

“Paul,” he said reproachfully, “I wish you'd consulted me before you accepted this position.”

“I wanted to spring it on you as a surprise,” said Paul. “I thought you'd be tickled to death.”

“I'm not keen about your going into politics.”

“Well, this isn't politics, dad. It's a job—a swell job.”

“It's a dangerous job!” Ferguson looked very grave. “If you fail, it's a mark against you; if you succeed, you're a target for trouble.”

Paul frowned at his parent.

“Well, if you feel that way about it,” he challenged, “why did you recommend Lindsay?”

“Lindsay isn't my son! You're all I have, Paul. You've got a nice law practice and I can help you a lot. I think I can fix it with Lindsay to let you out.”

He moved towards the door, but Paul caught at his arm.

"No, dad," he said in a voice of quiet determination. "No, you're not going to try to do that. Listen, dad, I've enlisted for the duration of this war. We're going to clean out the rackets—all of them—from the top to the bottom!"

Special editions of the newspaper next morning announced that the new Special Prosecutor would broadcast a message to the public at eight o'clock in the evening, and just before that hour John and the members of the Civic Committee entered a studio of the Associated Broadcasting Company in Madison Street.

Paul was there as a matter of course, but he did not sit with his father. Newspaper men were present in considerable numbers, and flashlamps blazed and camera shutters clicked as John stood before a microphone.

Herbert Berry, the District Attorney, introduced the newly appointed Special Prosecutor to his unseen audience, and then John began to speak.

"This is the first time I have ever addressed you," he said, "and I hope it will be the last. The motto of this country used to be 'Millions for defence and not a cent for tribute,' but something alien and Un-American has come along and tried to change that motto to 'Millions for tribute and not a cent for defence.'"

It seemed that the racketeers of the city had chosen the hour of the broadcast for a demonstration of their power. In a cigar store only a very little way from the broadcasting company's premises a number of people were clustered round a radio set, when a car stopped opposite the open doorway and a brick was hurled through one of the plate-glass windows.

The crowd scattered, but the voice of John went on:

"I am addressing myself not only to the victims and potential victims of rackets, but to the organised mob of criminals who have knocked over your ballot-boxes and taken over your government. I hope that some of them are tuning in, because I think we should all understand each other."

There were three men in the car that had stopped outside the cigar store, and one of them was Eddie Girard, the peck-marked fellow who had been with Moss Kitchell when Ferguson had telephoned the news of John's appointment. John's voice issued from a loud-speaker under the dashboard of the car as they sped on to a fresh scene of destruction:

"The rackets started as petty larceny, but they're big business now. They have their friends and servants in the police department and in the city government—everybody knows that without such a tie-up they couldn't exist for a minute! We've got to break up that alliance! The racketeers pay their political hirelings bigger salaries than the city does. They can afford to! It is estimated that the tribute exacted by this invisible government last year alone—"

Eddie Girard switched off the set, and a few minutes later he and one of his companions invaded a little snack bar whose customers were listening to the broadcast.

"What's the idea of refusing to install our slot machines?" he demanded harshly of the proprietor, who was busy cutting sandwiches behind a counter.

"I told your man why," the proprietor replied. "We have a high school across the street. It's no place for gambling."

"Quit stallin'!" gasped Girard. "I want an order to install some machines right now."

February 11th, 1939.

"Well, you won't get it!"

Girard grabbed up a chair, and with it swept urns and glass-covered cases from the counter. His companion riddled mirrors with bullets, and the frightened customers fled out into the street.

In all parts of the city, and its suburbs, similar acts of violence were committed that night, and worse things happened during the first three weeks of John's appointment. Motor-trucks, loaded with produce, were blown up or set on fire. Milk-cans were overturned in the streets; milk-bottles were shot from women's hands at the doors of their own homes. Poultry was ruined with paraffin; and men who tried to protect their own property were shot down in cold blood.

So many plate-glass windows were smashed that reputable insurance companies became alarmed at the drain on their resources and increased their premiums.

John realised that he had undertaken a formidable task, but he still believed that he could clean out the rackets; and one of the first things he did was to have brought to his office thirty men who had suffered at the hands of the racketeers.

"You refused to testify before the Grand Jury," he said to them, "because you've been threatened and intimidated. Now if you, who are the victims of these rackets, won't co-operate by offering frank and complete statements, how am I going to make any headway? I'm sure you want to help."

Twenty-nine of the men sat obstinately silent in the chairs that had been placed for them round John's desk, but the thirtieth rose to his feet.

"Maybe we're not thinking of ourselves," he said gruffly. "Maybe some of us are thinking of our families. I've got a wife and two children. Last week I tried to take out some life insurance. I was asked if I intended to testify, and I was told that if I did I couldn't get a policy."

He was a superior type of man, with a fine, clean-shaven face and a lofty brow. John admired him for having even a measure of courage.

"What's the name of that company?" he inquired.

"The Acme Insurance Company."

John made a note of the name.

"We'll see about that, Mr.—"

"Butler," the man supplied. "James William Butler."

John thanked him, jotted down the name, and went over to a door which he opened.

"Brophy!" he called. "Mallin!"

Two stalwart men appeared. They might have been prizefighters.

"Gentlemen," said John, "these men are detailed as my bodyguards. Now, I'll be glad to assign them to the first one of you who will agree to testify. They'll act as your bodyguards night and day. I'll assign two men to anybody else who testifies. Now surely that should remove your fears? That'll do, boys!"

Brophy and Mallins vanished; not one of the thirty had spoken, Paul—who had been present all the time—tried to rally them.

"Are you going to knuckle down to those crooks, or will you help us fight them?" he cried.

Still the thirty were mute.

"All right, gentlemen," said John. "you're excused."

Ferguson's Emissary

AFTER the thirty had departed John re-seated himself at his desk and summoned one of his assistants from the general office.

"Simpson," he said, "you have the names of those men who were in here just now, haven't you?"

"Yes, sir, I have," was the reply.

"You must have dug them up from under a stone," commented Paul, who was standing beside John's chair.

"They were the men on the list given us by the Grand Jury," said Simpson.

"Well, I want you to get me a complete set of their books," John informed him.

The clerk looked horrified.

"But how am I going to do that?"

"Mr. Simpson," rapped John, "how long were you employed in the District Attorney's office?"

"Six years."

"Well, didn't you learn anything? Every time I ask you to do something you ask me how."

"You're supposed to be an assistant around here," added Paul sharply. "You know what an assistant is? One who assists. To assist means to help."

Simpson blinked.

"I know," he mumbled, "but under the law—"

"Are you trying to teach the law to Professor Lindsay?" thundered Paul.

"No, sir, b-but in order to get the books—"

"I'll show you how to get them! I'll have them here inside of twenty-four hours."

Simpson, thus dismissed, went down to the room he had occupied when he was working for the District Attorney and from it he rang up Moss Kitchell.

"Oh, Mr. Kitchell," he said, "they're going to grab the books of those witnesses!"

"All right, Simpson," returned Kitchell calmly. "I'll 'phone you back."

Late in the afternoon of the next day, Eugene Ferguson was playing one of Chopin's nocturnes on a piano in the sitting-room of an expensively furnished flat when a telephone-bell rang.

He left off playing, but he did not move from the piano-stool. It was a beautiful, but very self-possessed girl who rose from a chesterfield and went to a bureau on which the telephone stood, and he watched her appreciatively while she answered the call.

Her blue eyes widened.

"What?" she exclaimed. "Oh, well, thanks!"

"Who was it?" asked Ferguson, as she dropped the instrument back into its cradle.

"Simpson," she replied sourly. "He says a couple of Lindsay's men are out looking for me. What goes on here?"

Ferguson laughed.

"Oh, yes, I took care of that," he said. "I thought somebody ought to tip Lindsay off to get in touch with you."

She stared at him and returned to the chesterfield.

"Why?" she demanded, leaning back against the cushions.

"We got him his job—it's time we were using him to help us clean out some of the riff-raff—boys like Con Cronin and his bunch. All the undesirable elements."

He walked round to the back of the chesterfield and stooped to kiss her on the lips.

"You know something?" he said.

"When we get this thing organised it'll be a recognised industry. You mark my words, some day we'll be listed on the Stock Exchange."

About an hour after this conversation, John's two bodyguards followed one another into his room at the Criminal Courts Building with a somewhat sheepish expression upon their respective faces.

"Well?" John barked at them. "Where's Miss Ballou?"

"Disappeared," said Brophy.

"She must have left town," said Mallin.

"Left town?" John frowned at the pair. "I can't understand it. Whenever I send for people they always leave town! How do you explain that? Do they know when I'm going to send for them?"

"I don't know, Mr. Lindsay," grunted Mallin, "but we looked high and low for her."

"Searched every inch of the town," declared Brophy.

The telephone-bell rang.

"Yes?" said John into the instrument on his desk.

"Miss Frankie Ballou," announced the voice of a girl in the outer office.

"Send her in."

It was Eugene Ferguson's beautiful companion who sailed serenely into the room. Her name was Frances, but she preferred to be known as "Frankie."

"Hallo!" she said with all the assurance in the world. "Looking for me?"

"Yes," said John, "have a seat, Miss Ballou." He turned to the crestfallen bodyguards. "All right, boys, you can have the rest of the week off. Next time I want you to find somebody, look behind you to see if they're following you."

The two went out, and Frankie Ballou sat down in a chair at the side of the desk and loosened the furs round her neck.

"The next time you want to see me," she said, "just 'phone, and I'll come right down."

"Oh, thanks for the tip," bowed John. "You know, I'm sort of a greenhorn in this business."

"Oh, that's all right," she returned complacently. "You won't be in it long."

"What's that?"

"I said you won't be in it long. Unless, of course, you start to get busy and prosecute some of those nasty racketeers."

"Well, I'd really like to prosecute a few—if I could find any to prosecute."

"Intend to go after me?" she inquired archly.

"Oh, no, not at all, Miss Ballou." He opened a drawer of the desk and took out a box tied with ribbon. "Have some candy."

"Candy?" She looked at the box and she looked at him. "Oh, now that's no way to get finger-prints. Wait a minute—let me see."

She reached across the desk to a rubber-stamp pad and a sheet of paper, and she provided him with perfect impressions of her thumbs and forefingers.

"There," she said, "if you want something, just ask for it."

"Well, thank you. I'll try to remember." John put the sheet of paper away in a drawer together with the box of chocolates she had scorned. "I suspect you're a very intelligent young woman."

"Oh, I know my way around," she admitted.

"I don't," he sighed. "I'm afraid that's the trouble."

"You'll never get anywhere chained to a desk." She took a cigarette from her handbag and lit it. "You know, if you're going to throw people in gaol, the least you can do is to meet them."

"I call that invincible logic."

She accepted the compliment as though she deserved it.

"I know where quite a few of the bodies are buried," she informed him. "How would you like a personally conducted tour?"

"I'd like nothing better, if you could spare the time one evening."

"How about to-night?"

"To-night?" he exclaimed. "You mean it?"

"Uh-h."

Through a dictograph he asked the girl in the outer office to get him Mrs. Lindsay on the telephone.

"Tell me, do we dress?" he asked.

"Oh, no," she replied. "Most of the joints are informal."

The telephone-bell rang, and Jerry was on the other end of the line.

"Hallo, darling!" he said to her.

"I'm afraid I'll have to beg out of dinner to-night. Yes, yes, I know I've worked late every night this week, but you must remember I only have thirty days. This is something that must be done to-night. Well, I'll call you later."

He put down the telephone.

"The best wife in the world," he confided to Frankie Ballou.

Murder at the Café Martin

IT was to the Café Martin that Frankie Ballou took John that evening; a sumptuous resort, in Columbus Square, with a domed ceiling over its circular dining-room and a pool of polished mahogany for dancers on a level slightly lower than that of the surrounding tables.

A band was playing, and couples were dancing, as the two were conducted to a table by a waiter Frankie addressed as "Jimmy." The place was fairly crowded.

"Who—er—who protects this place?" asked John, after he had gazed about him for a while.

"Con Cronin," Frankie replied. "He owns several places. In fact, he's got the café racket pretty well sewed up."

Martin Morgan, proprietor of the café, was sitting at one of the tables with a girl, and while John was ordering food and wine, Eddie Girard entered the place and went over to that table. Morgan, who was quite a handsome man and in evening clothes, eyed the pock-marked fellow with disfavour.

"You want to see me, Girard?" he asked curtly.

Girard pulled up a chair and sat down between him and the girl.

"Is it all right if I buy the proprietor of the place a drink?" he drawled.

"I don't drink," snapped Morgan, and started to rise.

"Well, sit down—I want to talk to you." Girard pushed him back into his chair and turned to the girl. "Baby your nose needs powdering."

"I get you," said the girl with a nod, and she left them together.

At almost the same moment John said to Frankie:

"By the way, I promised to 'phone my wife. Will you excuse me?"

There were telephone-boxes in the vestibule, and he went off to one of them. Girard said to Martin Morgan:

"You've got a nice place here, Marty. I hear you make two grand a week profit."

"I don't want any trouble with you, Girard," retorted the proprietor frigidly. "I don't need protection. I made a deal with Con Cronin."

"Oh, that's too bad—too bad, Marty," drawled Girard. "You've got a nice place here. You know, I'm in the wreckin' business."

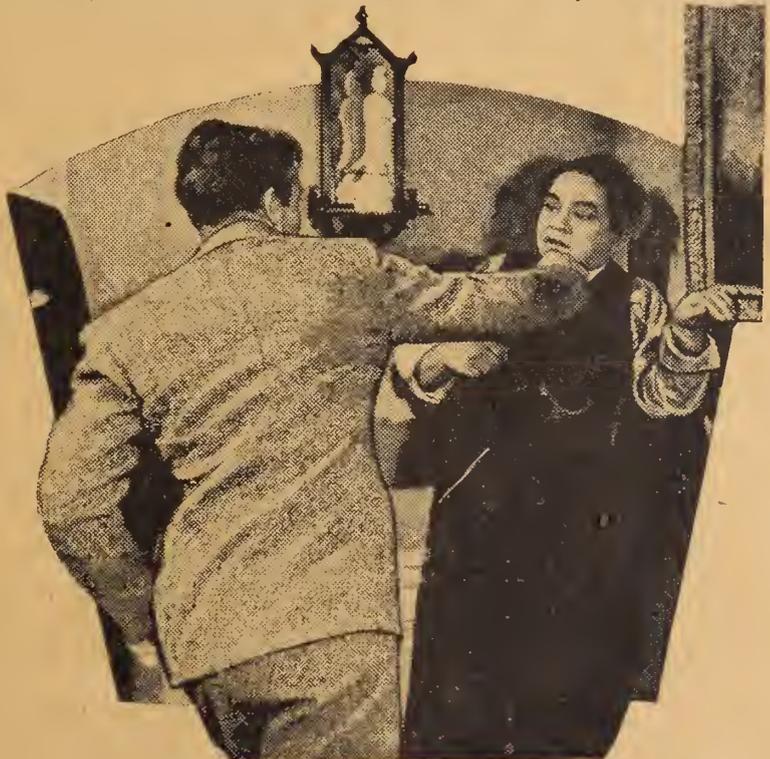

He caught sight of Frankie, and he made his way towards her across the dance floor.

"H'ya, Frankie?" he greeted over the rail that divided the pool of polished mahogany from the carpeted floor on which the tables were ranged.

"What's the idea of patronising one of Con Cronin's places?" she asked, with a little flip of her hand.

"What about you?" he countered. "I'm here on business."

"So am I." He ducked under the rail and sat down in the chair John had vacated. "I was just talkin' to Martin."

John was knocked into a corner by a terrific right to the point of the jaw.

You know, I think we're workin' this thing all wrong. Instead of takin' these places away from Cronin we oughta take Cronin away from these places. I—I think I'll hang around here to-night, and if Cronin drops in, I'll—"

"You'll do nothing of the kind!" Frankie interrupted in a tone of authority. "We don't want any rough stuff here to-night. Did you see the man I came in with?"

"Uhuh."

"That's the Honourable John Lindsay. The man who's going to clean up this town."

Girard made a scornful noise in his throat.

"With what?"

"With our help. Orders, Eddie!"

He made a grimace, and then he got to his feet because John had just re-entered the dining-room.

"Here he comes now," he said, and drifted away.

John reached the table and resumed his seat.

"Well, there's no answer," he stated. "I suppose Mrs. Lindsay has retired."

"That means you won't have to hurry home, eh?" suggested Frankie. "You might even have time to learn the Big Apple."

"Oh, yes," said John, "the Big Apple. You know, that's always been my secret ambition, but I don't believe I'll ever get the hang of it."

"Sure you will," she declared. "No time like the present. Come on!"

The band was playing the music of the Big Apple, and other people were dancing it. She matched him off to the floor, and though he made several false steps in the early stages of the dance he proved a particularly apt pupil, and he was thoroughly enjoying himself when Jerry entered the vestibule from the street with Paul.

"This place ought to be fun," Jerry said, after Paul had deposited his hat and stick with the girl behind the counter of the cloak-room.

"Yes," he agreed, "but, you know, I feel sort of guilty, with John at the office up to his ears in work."

"I don't," she declared. "I'm sorry you're the goat, but this is going to happen every time he misses dinner at home!"

They entered the dining-room, and Jerry stood as one transfixed at the spectacle of her spouse prancing about with a beautiful stranger.

"Research!" she exclaimed, when she had recovered the power of speech.

Paul could not get her away from the rail till the dance was over, and by then John had seen her. He led his partner towards the two, and he said:

"Oh, Miss Ballou, this can be none other than my wife. And this is my assistant—very much my assistant—Mr. Paul Ferguson."

Jerry was quite gracious, and when a waiter would have escorted her and Paul to a table she asked John, quite politely, if he would mind their joining him and his fair companion.

John assured her that he didn't mind at all, and all four became seated at his table.

"Paul," said Jerry, "I didn't know the professor could dance so well, did you?"

"No," said Paul, who was feeling considerably embarrassed, "it's as much of a surprise to me as it is to you."

"Well, I'll give you my word of honour I've never danced the Big Apple before in all my life," said John.

"Oh, he learns quickly, Mrs. Lindsay," stated Frankie. "He took to February 11th, 1839."

it like a duck to water. Your husband's just full of rhythm."

"So you've noticed?" purred Jerry. Dishes were served, and the coffee stage had been reached, when a hook-nosed man of about forty approached the table and greeted Frankie.

"Oh, hallo, Con," said the girl. "I want you to meet my friend, Mr. Lindsay." She smiled at John. "This is Con Cronin."

"Glad to meet you, Mr. Prosecutor," said Con Cronin, with a curious expression on his ugly face.

John declared that the pleasure was mutual.

"We were discussing you earlier in the evening," he added, and introduced his wife and Paul.

"Ferguson?" Cronin eyed the young man narrowly as he repeated the name. "Any relation to Eugene Ferguson?"

"My father," Paul replied.

"Well, well." The expression on Cronin's face became more curious than ever. "You know, I'm glad I ran into you to-night, Mr. Lindsay."

John invited him to sit down, and an attentive waiter brought a chair.

"I've been very anxious to get in touch with you."

"Yes?" questioned John.

"Yes," Cronin nodded. "You see, I run a legitimate business. All my clients will tell you so. But I've been having a little trouble lately with some imported hoodlums who have been trying to move in, and they're not going to get away with it. Make a note of that, Frankie."

"I certainly will, Con," returned Frankie silkily. "Does anyone here happen to have a piece of paper?"

Paul produced a notebook, and she wrote on one of its pages with a pencil from her handbag, tore out the page, and folded it several times.

While she was doing this Cronin said:

"You'd be surprised to know the set-up in this town, Mr. Prosecutor. And you'd be surprised, too, Mr. Ferguson. I'd like to make an appointment with you in your office to-morrow."

"Well, I keep open house at my office," John assured him. "Anybody who wants may walk in."

Frankie tucked the note she had written into the neck of her frock and pushed back her chair.

"Con, let's dance," she said.

Cronin declared that he would love to do so, and he rose.

"I'll see you in your office to-morrow, Mr. Prosecutor."

John said that he would expect him, and then Cronin went off with Frankie on his arm. The band was playing a waltz, and they mingled with the other couples on the floor. Eddie Girard was sitting at a table close to the rail and he watched them with narrowed eyes.

"Want to take a tip from me, Cronin?" murmured Frankie, her red-gold head against the racketeer's shoulder as they danced together. "Leave town to-night!"

"How can I do that," objected her partner, "when I have a date in the Criminal Courts Building to-morrow?"

"It will be a mistake for you to call on Lindsay."

"Oh, I'm not going to see Lindsay. I'm going to see his assistant, Paul Ferguson."

"Why Paul?" she challenged.

"I think maybe I can get him to see the situation a little clearer than Lindsay." He smiled down at her from his superior height. "Understand?"

"Yes," she said quietly, "I understand."

She retrieved the note from the neck of her frock, and as they danced past Eddie Girard's table she threw it from behind her back to the watchful crook.

Jerry, smoking a cigarette and studying her husband's face, said softly:

"I'm wondering where you dug up Miss Ballou. She looks like a Greek goddess."

"She is a Greek goddess," John averred, "and she came bearing gifts."

"Beware!"

"You beware." John grinned broadly. "I've been playing baby-face all right."

Cronin and Frankie danced into view again. They had circled the pool of polished mahogany and were drawing near to Girard's table again.

"You know, I can't understand the sudden burst of co-operation," John confessed to Paul. "First the young lady, and now Mr. Cronin. But I'll know more about them before another day is over."

All the lights in the dining-room were extinguished abruptly, and only a spotlight streaked across the dance floor. A jet of flame pierced the darkness beyond the rail, but nobody heard the sound of a shot because a silencer was attached to the barrel of Eddie Girard's gun.

Con Cronin thudded to the floor, bringing down several other dancers as he fell, and women screamed.

The spotlight shone upon the face of a dead man.

The Newspaper Clipping

AT nine o'clock next morning John was in his office when George Leander burst in upon him with Eugene Ferguson and the District Attorney. He was in his shirt-sleeves at his desk, studying a big loose-leaf ledger, but he pushed back his chair as Leander swept over to him with a newspaper in his hands and rage disfiguring his lean face.

The District Attorney sat, Ferguson leaned against a table near a window, and then the storm broke.

"Murder at Café as Special Prosecutor dances Big Apple," roared Leander, stabbing a finger at headlines on the front page of the newspaper. "Big Apple! A murder is committed right under your nose, and you're dancing! No wonder we've had complaints!"

"Well," said John mildly, "I assure you, Mr. Leander, it was all in the line of duty."

"I think it would be more in the line of duty if you made some arrests and got a few indictments!" blazed the irate chairman of the civic committee.

"Arrests and indictments will come when I'm ready."

"When you're ready?"

John nodded. "I couldn't get anything out of the witnesses I sent for, and so we seized their books. But every one of them has erasures."

"The very people we're trying to help are the least inclined to cooperate," complained the District Attorney.

"Yes, and we're not getting any help from the board of supervisors," said John. "We need more funds to carry on the work. Why aren't we getting any?"

"Lindsay," snapped Leander, "the reason they're holding up appropriations is because you're not getting results!"

Eugene Ferguson put a hand on John's shoulder.

"I think it's an outrage," he declared, with every appearance of sincerity, "to give a man a job like this and expect miracles. We owe Mr. Lindsay all our confidence and support, and as far as I'm concerned he's got it."

John thanked him.

"And now, if you don't mind, gentlemen," he said, "I have a lot of work to do."

They took their departure, Leander in no way mollified, and in the outer office they passed Frankie Ballou, who had just entered it. She and Ferguson exchanged glances, and the girl at the inquiry desk said:

"Go right in, Miss Ballou. Mr. Lindsay is expecting you."

Frankie went right in, and John rose to greet her.

"You know you're the only man in the world who could get me up at this time in the morning," she said; and she tucked her handbag under her arm to straighten his tie because it was hanging over the top of his waistcoat.

"Pardon my appearance, Frankie," he murmured. "I've been here all night, working."

"That's what I call keeping your nose to the grindstone," she laughed.

"Well, it's one way of keeping your nose clean! Sit down, Frankie. Did you notice those three men who just left here?"

She took the chair the District Attorney had occupied, and she nodded.

"Acquainted with any of them?"

"No," she lied.

"All right. You know Eddie Girard?"

She repeated the name as though it were strange to her, but John was not deceived.

"Yes," he said, "think hard—I'm sure you'll remember. He was close to the dance floor last night when Cronin was killed. You must have seen him."

"Well," she shrugged, "as I told the police, I was dancing at the time, and I always dance with my eyes closed."

He put a hand on the back of her chair, and he pointed a finger at her.

"Eddie Girard came over to our table last night, when I went out to 'phone. Now what did he want?"

"He thought I was a movie star, and he wanted my autograph."

It was very glib, but it was not in the least convincing.

"Is that why you borrowed that notebook from Paul Ferguson—to write your autograph?"

"Yes." She was a trifle too eager.

"Yes, that's it."

"Eddie Girard killed Cronin, didn't he? Now you know he did, and I know it, too!"

"Well, if you know it," said she, "why don't you pinch Eddie?"

"Because I can't prove it. As a matter of fact, I'm not interested in who killed Cronin, but I would like to know why he was killed. And I've got a hunch you know."

He looked her straight in the eyes, but he could read nothing there.

"I think, myself," she said, "that Cronin died of softening of the arteries. How that slug ever got into him I couldn't tell you. Of course, when it happened I was dancing—"

"Yes, I know—with your eyes closed. Tell me this: who's taken over Mr. Cronin's business?"

"What business?" She followed him with her eyes as he moved round the desk, and noticed a litter of newspaper cuttings on the blotting-pad. "Oh, I see you've been raiding the 'Daily Press' morgue!"

John rushed to the window with the automatic in his hand and peered round one of the curtains, and Jerry crouched behind him.

"H'm." John had picked up one of the cuttings. "Oh yes, yes. I spent many hours, after I left you last night, going over these clippings. And I was interested to find that you were in several of them."

"Those were the days when I was a little girl reporter."

"Yes." He held up the cutting. "I see you had a by-line, 'By Frances Ballou—an interview.' And whom do you suppose it's with?"

"Oh, might be anyone from Einstein to Babe Ruth," she said lightly.

"It was with Eugene Ferguson."

That brought her to her feet, and for a moment he saw beneath her mask of beauty. Then she snatched the cutting from him, tore it to shreds, tossed the shreds into the air and stalked out from the room.

Eugene Ferguson was waiting for her in a dark grey saloon round the corner from the Criminal Courts Building. She got in beside him, and he motioned to the chauffeur, who drove off.

"Well?" he questioned.

"He wanted to find out if I knew you or not," she said, "and he found out. He's been reading newspaper clippings, and he dug up that old interview."

Ferguson did not seem as disturbed as she had expected him to be.

"What does that prove?" he shrugged.

"It proves he has a hunch—and so have I, Gene. He's a whole lot smarter than you think he is!"

"He's so smart," scoffed Ferguson, "that he can't get the board of supervisors to give him another nickel. He's on his way out, Frankie!"

The End of a Witness

JERRY had decided overnight that it was time she provided her husband with active help. She knew of his disappointment with the witnesses he had called before him, and she set off to try her powers of persuasion on the wife of James William Butler.

Mrs. Butler proved to be a homely little woman, and she was quite sympathetic about the postponed trip to Europe, but she was not very willing to try to sway her husband to give evidence. She said that he had received death-threats.

"So has my husband," said Jerry, "but he's not paying the slightest attention to them. Why should your husband?"

"He has two good reasons," Mrs. Butler replied. "I'll show them to you." And she took Jerry into a sunny room where a little boy and a little girl were at play.

The interview was over, and Jerry was on her way to the Criminal Courts Building when John rang up her brother at the "Daily Press" office.

"Now, Tom, I've got the books of the Aeme Insurance Company right here," he said, "and I'm convinced that they make a business of breaking windows in order to sell insurance. You promised to find out for me who controls that company."

"I've got it for you," Tom Ross responded in his gruff way, "and you won't like it. Ninety per cent of the stock of the Aeme Company is owned by Eugene Ferguson under a fictitious name!"

"Eugene?" exclaimed John in dismay. "You mean Paul's father? Are you sure of that?"

Simpson was listening to the conversation at the switchboard in the outer office, the girl being out at luncheon, but he lost the end of it because Paul rang from his own room.

"Oh, Simpson," he said, "will you call up my father and tell him I won't be able to have dinner with him tonight? Thank you."

John was immersed in the books of the Acme Insurance Company when Paul looked in on him.

"Want me to go over those with you?" asked the young man.

"No," said John, very curtly for him, "I'm quite able to go over these myself."

"You've been up all night, John. You'd better go home and get some sleep." Paul helped himself to one of the books, but it was immediately snatched away from him.

"You'd better get out and let me work!" John snapped at him. "When I need your advice I'll ask for it!"

Paul went out, and he was so upset that he had barely a word for Jerry, who was about to enter the room. She gazed after him in surprise, and then she closed the door and walked over to a chair beside her husband's desk.

"Well, and what have you done to your chief assistant?" she asked. "What's happened, John?"

John sighed. "I've just gone over the books of the Acme Insurance Company," he said. "They've done a terrific business lately in plate-glass insurance; and every plate-glass policy on their books was applied for right after the applicant had had his shop window smashed."

"Well, what's that got to do with Paul?"

"Nothing," he replied bitterly, "except that Eugene Ferguson happens to be the principal stockholder of Acme."

"No?" she gasped.

"Yes, and he's in deeper than that! He knows Frankie Ballou. I believe she works for him." John leaned back in his chair, biting his lip. "This is the trail I've been looking for, but how can I follow it? Maybe I ought to ask Paul to resign. Maybe I ought to resign myself." He threw out his hands. "Oh, I was a fool to take this job in the first place!"

"You were not!" she maintained. "Well, haven't you been nagging me ever since to chuck it?"

"Not chuck it," she corrected, "finish it!"

"But how can I finish it now?" He deserted his chair to stride about the room. "The cards are stacked. If I go after Ferguson it'll wreck Paul. And I can't do that, Jerry. Why, he's like a son to me."

The telephone-bell rang, and she answered the call.

"John," she said delightedly, "it's Mr. Butler."

"Well, tell him I'm not in!"

"Don't you think you'd better talk to him?"

John declared that it would be a waste of time.

"I broke my back to get those people to open up," he growled, "and not one of them offered to help."

"Perhaps Mr. Butler will," she persisted, and he accepted the telephone receiver from her.

"Yes? What is it?" he said ungraciously; and to his utter surprise the voice of Butler responded:

"I've just had a talk with my wife. If you can assure me protection, I'm willing to come to your office and testify."

"Assure you?" said John. "Why, Mr. Butler, I'll guarantee you protection. Just hold on a minute." He spoke into the dictograph. "Ask Mr. Paul Ferguson to come to my office right away."

"The things I'm going to tell you, Mr. Lindsay," said Butler, "will open your eyes."

"Well, that's fine, Mr. Butler," said John, "and I'm sure you won't regret it. Look, I'll send a man—the best man I have. He'll be right over to February 11th, 1933.

pick you up and see you get safely to my office."

Paul entered the room as he was replacing the instrument.

"Oh, Paul, I've just heard from Butler," he said. "He's ready to testify. Now you go right along to his house and bring him down here before he changes his mind."

Paul turned apologetically to Jerry, but John gave him no time for speech. "Come on, come on!" he said imperiously, and bundled him over to the door.

A quarter of an hour afterwards a saloon car drew up outside the Butlers' home in a northern suburb of Burlington—but it was Eddie Girard who got out from it and rang the door-bell.

Butler opened the door in person, and his wife was with him.

"I'm from Mr. Lindsay's office," stated Girard.

"Oh, he phoned me you were coming," said the unsuspecting tradesman. "I'll be right with you."

He kissed his wife, who handed him his hat, and he walked with Girard to the car.

"Now that I've made up my mind," he confided, "it's a kind of relief. There's a lot I've got to tell Mr. Lindsay."

"I know just how you feel," nodded the gunman.

Five minutes after the saloon had gone off with Butler and Girard in the back of it, and another ruffian at the wheel, Paul arrived at the house in a taxicab, and he informed Mrs. Butler that he had come to take her husband to Mr. Lindsay's office.

"Oh, but he's just left with someone from Mr. Lindsay's office!" she exclaimed.

As fast as the taxicab could take him, Paul returned to the Criminal Courts Building, and he rushed into John's room.

"Butler wasn't there!" he cried.

"What's that?" John stared at him blankly.

"He'd already gone! Some man, who said he was from your office, had come for him before I got there!"

"From my office? But we're the only ones who knew anything—" He broke off to pick up the telephone because its bell had begun to ring. "Yes?"

Tom Ross was on the other end of the line, speaking from his den at the "Daily Press" office.

"Say, John, one of those witnesses who refused to testify has just been killed!" he said. "Butler. He was shot and thrown from a car. They just found him."

John slammed down the telephone and stood up, clenching his fists.

"Paul," he said in a strained voice, "they've killed Butler! How could they have known? Why, only you and I and Jerry knew he was coming here! Nobody could possibly have known, unless— Yes, unless— My staff!"

He strode out into the general office, followed by Paul, and in a very few minutes he had every member of the staff lined up in it. His fierceness amazed them; he was no longer a mild professor, but a human volcano.

"Now listen to me!" he roared. "I sent Paul Ferguson to bring Butler to my office. Somebody got to Butler's house before he did, and now Butler's dead! He was coming here to testify, and nobody knew but my wife, Paul, and me—until some stool-pigeon in this office sent out the information!"

He moved along from one man to another, his brown eyes blazing.

"The grapevine started right here! One of my staff killed Butler! Staff! Why, before I started this investigation I should have sent for the street-cleaning department to clean up the whole pack of you!"

He stopped in front of Simpson. "You! You've got shifty eyes. I don't like your face—never did like it!" Simpson shrank away from him, and he turned to Brophy and Mallin.

"And you two flat-footed morons!" he said scathingly. "I'd have done a whole lot better to get myself a couple of poodles!"

He flung out his hands. "You're all a bunch of blithering, double-crossing incompetents!" he blazed. "I don't know which one of you sent out the tip that killed Butler, but I'm going to find out! And in the meantime you're fired—the pack of you! Come on, Paul!"

The New Staff

THE discharged men—and two girls—were out of the building within an hour, though some of them protested that they could not be fired because they were Civil Servants; and during that hour, and the hour that followed it, Paul was tremendously busy on a telephone.

At four o'clock in the afternoon the general office became thronged with former pupils of the professor, and the District Attorney gaped at them as he stepped in from the corridor with a newspaper in his hand.

He squeezed past them to John's room, and John immediately closed a book and rose from his desk.

"Hallo, Bert!" he said cheerfully. "You're just the man I want to see!"

"Who are those fellows out there?" asked the District Attorney.

"They don't know it yet, but they're my new staff. Fine youngsters, with no strings attached, no political tie-up—people I can trust. I've cleaned house, Bert, thrown out the rotten bunch that passed for servants of the people, kit and boodle! From now on, things are going to be different."

"John," said the District Attorney regretfully, "there isn't going to be any 'from now on.'"

"What do you mean?"

"I've just come from the Board of Supervisors." The District Attorney held out the newspaper, with its flaming headlines concerning the crime that had been committed. "They blame you for Butler's death. They've clamped down on you. No more money!"

"They want me to quit?"

"Listen, John, a man's a fool to butt his head against a stone wall. You know I want to help you, but my hands are tied."

"All right, Bert," said John grimly. "You have my resignation."

The District Attorney said that he was sorry, and he meant it.

"I know just how you feel," he added.

"No, you don't," John informed him. "You don't know the half of it!"

He went out to the men who had been his students and now were lawyers, and they greeted him with real affection.

"I've dreamed of holding another reunion with my graduates," he said, "but I never thought it was going to be like this. Well, thank you all for coming along. Sit down, please—sit down."

They sat on chairs and desks and tables, and he stood behind one of the desks.

"Gentlemen," he began, "the shortest distance between two points is sometimes a very rocky road. You know what I've been up against since I've taken on this job. Well, I haven't been able to lick it; I've failed."

He held up the newspapers the District Attorney had brought, and he told them about Butler.

"I promised him protection," he said, "but I couldn't keep that promise because my office was infested with stool-pigeons. So I fired them and I sent for you. You were the best students I had—honour graduates. I brought you here to offer you their jobs; but since then, gentlemen, I myself have been fired."

There were murmurs of surprise at that statement.

"Yes," said John. "but I'm not quitting! I'm going to keep right on going as a private citizen. I'm going to fight these racketeers with all the weapons I can find—their own, if necessary, fair or foul, above or below the belt! I'm going to lick them, or else I'm going to wind up on a slab like Butler!"

"But I need help to do that—I need you! I want you to come into this fight. Now there won't be much money in it, there may be times when you won't be getting any. You'll have to be on the job twenty-four hours a day and every day. I'm not hiring a staff; I'm recruiting a regiment. And if you enlist, it's for the duration of the war."

A young fellow named Sloane voiced an objection shared by at least a dozen others.

"Wait a minute, professor!" he exclaimed. "We—some of us—can't—Well, we're working."

"What are you working at?" asked John.

The question astounded all of them.

"Why, you ought to know, professor!" cried one.

"Law," chorused several. "We're practising law."

"What law?" John stabbed the air with his hands. "The law is dead! I taught it to you, but it was all a waste of time! You won't be practising any law until we bring the law back to this city! I, for one, would rather be dead and out of it than go crawling through life taking orders from the lowest and filthiest elements in our social strata! I'm going to fight! How many of you are going to fight with me?"

Twenty volunteered without a moment's hesitation; the rest hesitated only for a few moments. John had acquired a new and loyal staff of twenty-five enthusiasts.

"That's fine!" he said. "Now let's get organised. Paul, have you that list of the loan sharks with you?"

"Right here," Paul handed over a folded sheet of paper, and John opened it out.

"Now, gentlemen," he said, "we're going to need money to carry on this investigation." He smiled at a corpulent young man whose hands immediately went to his trousers-pockets. "Don't worry, Tubby, this isn't a touch—I'm going to raise the money by borrowing it from the loan sharks!"

That statement caused a good deal of chatter, but he silenced it with a gesture.

"I'm going to make the loan sharks finance their own destruction," he went on. "They did a business of twenty million dollars last year, so they must have plenty of money. I want you men to go out and get all you can out of them. Rig up your own references."

"But how are we going to pay them back?" inquired a young attorney named Carter.

"Don't worry about that, Joe. When it's time for them to collect, they can come and see me."

He waved the list of loan sharks, prepared by Paul.

"Now, gentlemen, the shortest distance between two points is to have you all help me pack up my files and records and get them out of this mildewed dump. (Come on!)"

The budding lawyers began to gather up files and books and papers. Three of them would have taken a desk to pieces, but John stopped them from doing that.

"Wait a minute, boys," he enjoined, "that desk belongs to the city. I think we shall have to get new typewriters, too."

A removal van was ordered, and arrived. Over the telephone, John broke the news to Jerry that he was—in effect—transferring his office to his home; and by seven o'clock in the evening the sitting-room of the house looked less like a sitting-room than an office, and there were even newly acquired desks in the hall. Out of confusion order was established, and Jerry managed to provide some sort of a meal for the workers.

"HIDDEN TREASURE"

A ruthless tyrant held sway on Treasure Island, a man who was prepared to go to any lengths to accomplish his life's ambition. It was against this malign scoundrel that a young man and girl pitted their courage and resourcefulness. Read how they fared in this thrill-packed serial of high adventure and stark drama

"THE RANGERS STEP IN"

For his own crooked purpose, Tom Martin revives a feud between the Warrens and the Allens, and the Marshall of Vernon calls in the Texas Rangers. One of the Rangers is Bob Allen, but Bob resigns to try to settle the feud himself, and is framed with the murder of a Warren. A gun-roaring thriller of the West, starring Bob Allen

"CRACKERJACK"

England is thrilled by the exploits of a modern Robin Hood, a "man with a hundred faces," who robs the rich and gives to the poor. At a Society party, Crackerjack steals some valuable pearls, and next day learns that there has been a hold-up at the party and a man killed. As the police consider him the leader of this killer gang, he realises that someone is using his name to cover their own exploits. Starring Tom Walls with Lilli Palmer

"KING OF ALCATRAZ"

Two quarrelsome young radio operators are assigned to duty on the same freighter, where they meet a delightful nurse, eleven male passengers, an invalid old lady and a blonde attendant. The old lady is in reality a notorious public enemy who is escaping from Alcatraz Island, and when he is discovered the thrills come fast and furious. Starring Gail Patrick and Lloyd Nolan

Four days afterwards, at ten o'clock in the morning, the District Attorney arrived at the house with a tall, grey-haired, and sharp featured police-inspector.

Paul was sitting at a desk in the hall, receiving from members of the new staff sums of money they had "borrowed" from loan sharks. The sums ranged from one hundred to two hundred dollars, but they totalled nearly five thousand dollars, and Paul said elatedly:

"I don't know what we'd do without those dear little loan sharks!"

The District Attorney and his companion were ushered into the sitting-room, and John sprang up from his new desk there.

"Hallo, Bert!" he said warmly. "Thank you for coming."

"I went to work the minute you 'phoned me," boomed the District Attorney. "You know, I told you that you could count on me for anything except money."

John gazed appraisingly at the inspector.

"Is he my man?" he asked.

"Yes." The District Attorney introduced them to one another.

"Tell me something about Inspector Gleason," said John.

"He's one of the men who didn't toe the line with certain people, so he was transferred to the marshes with the goats."

"Good enough," approved John. "A man after my own heart."

Jerry had sped to the front door because the bell had rung. She found Mrs. Butler on the porch, and she asked her into the hall.

"I just came over to tell you," said the unhappy woman, "that I'm moving out of the district."

"Moving?" echoed Jerry. "But the business?"

"There isn't any business. Those men haven't given me a minute's peace since my husband was killed."

Jerry took Mrs. Butler into the sitting-room. John was saying to the inspector:

"I want rookies—youngsters who are just starting in. I want you to pick them, check up on them, organise them, and hold them ready for me until I need them."

"John, please!" said Jerry loudly; and then John became aware of Mrs. Butler.

"Oh, good morning," he said.

"She was followed here by three men in a car," said Jerry excitedly. "They're waiting outside now. I just saw them."

"What?" John ran to a window and looked out through a muslin curtain. Beyond the front garden stood a closed car, and three men were discernible inside it.

John called Paul into the room.

"Jerry," he said, "ring up Tom, and ask him to send a reporter and a photographer down here right away."

"What for?" she asked in astonishment.

"Do as I tell you! Inspector, would you mind stepping out and asking those three men to come in here? Paul, you go with the inspector."

Jerry used the telephone in the hall while the Inspector and Paul went out to the car. John watched at a window.

"Tell Tom it's a scoop," he directed. Jerry did so.

"No, I don't know what it is," she said, "but it's a scoop."

"Make it two photographers," directed John. "Wait a minute!" He sped to Jerry's side, and he said into the telephone: "Come yourself, Tom, and be as quick as you can!"

The man at the wheel of the car had set the self-starter buzzing at sight of February 11th, 1929.

the Inspector, but Paul yanked the door open, and the Inspector said sternly:

"What's your hurry?"

The engine was stopped again, and Paul cooed:

"Come on in, gentlemen. You're just in time for a cup of tea."

Inspector Gleason produced a gun.

"Get going!" he commanded.

A Little Experiment

TWENTY minutes afterwards, the three crooks were standing in a row in the sitting-room, holding their hats and looking distinctly sheepish. Their guns had been taken from them by Paul and laid upon the desk; the inspector was covering them with his own weapon.

Tom Ross had arrived with two press photographers and a reporter. Mrs. Butler had gone, but Jerry was looking on in bewilderment.

"Now I want a picture of these three men," said John.

"Why, that's a waste of time," scoffed Tom. "You can get their pictures out of the Rogues Gallery."

"Yes, but I want a nice group picture."

The photographers used their cameras upon the three hoodlums, and John thanked them.

"Now, we'll call that one 'Before,'" he said. "Later on we'll take another picture, and we'll call that one 'After.'"

He took off his jacket, draped it over the back of a chair, and rolled up his sleeves.

"Now, gentlemen, there's been a lot of bosh printed in the newspapers and pulp magazines which has tended to create a false impression concerning the psychology of the hoodlum. Such skunks have been represented as men of desperate courage—exceedingly tough hombres. Well, I've always held an opposite point of view. Observe that they always come armed with guns and other assorted weapons. Take note of the fact that it took three of these alleged gorillas to terrify and intimidate one small unarmed woman. I am sure that—unarmed and alone—their courage is on a par with their intelligence—nil!"

The three captives glared at him murderously, but he viewed them with contempt.

"Now, with the permission of the District Attorney," he said, "I'd like to prove this with a little experiment."

"It's all right with me," responded Bert Berry.

"Thank you." John turned to the photographers. "I'd like to have this experiment photographed in detail."

The photographers nodded, and he advanced upon one of the three and seized him by the front of his jacket.

"Now it's my intention to heat your head off," he stated grimly. "Perhaps it will be the other way round. Anyway, we're going to find out!"

"You can't!" cried Jerry in a panic, and members of the staff who had crowded into the room uttered protests.

"Nobody's going to interfere," insisted John. "Now, if some of you will be good enough to move this furniture back I think we'll have a little more room."

"Stand back!" the Inspector shouted; but he spoke too late. The tallest of the three crooks, an ugly fellow in a tweed suit, struck out at John, caught him on the side of the jaw, and sent him staggering backwards on to a chesterfield.

There was a general move to grab the opportunist, but John would not have it that way.

"Just a moment, boys," he said, "it February 11th, 1929.

was my fault—my fault. I shouldn't have turned my back on him. All right, come on!"

The fellow rushed at him; but he was ready, this time, and with a sudden trick of ju-jitsu he sent his antagonist clean over the chesterfield.

Up rose the hoodlum, but almost immediately he was sent sprawling against a desk.

Recovering his balance in spite of a rain of blows, he struck out in a fury, and John was knocked into a corner by a terrific right to the point of the jaw.

"Stop it!" screamed Jerry. "Stop it!"

Paul caught hold of her, and then John adopted a fighting attitude again, landed a feeble punch that missed, and received another thump—this time between the eyes.

He floundered against several of his former students, but he was by no means beaten. With a sudden divo he was at the crook again, sent him thudding against a french window, then swung him round and administered an uppercut that lifted him half over another desk.

"Give it to him, Professor!" cried Paul; and the Professor did give it to him. He was on him like a wild man, and they both went over the desk to the floor.

"Finish him, John!" shrilled Jerry. "Finish him!"

The third crook, a man in a striped suit, reached out a hand to the desk on which the guns were lying, but Inspector Gleason was swift to put an end to that manoeuvre. The smallest crook tried to escape into the hall, but was jerked back again.

John and his antagonist were fighting on the floor, and the antagonist had managed to roll uppermost. Tom Ross, who had been describing the battle to a re-write man in his office by means of a telephone on a table, was afraid that his brother-in-law would be beaten. But suddenly John was on top again—and Tom boomed into the telephone:

"Right on the button of the hoodlum—and he's out like a light!"

John rose to his feet and brushed one hand against the other.

"Q.E.D.," he said rather breathlessly. "Which was to be proved."

"Professor, can I take this one?" asked the District Attorney.

"Oh, no," said John, pouncing on the little crook, "this is my lecture!"

The little crook was knocked out in next to no time; the one in the striped suit did not even attempt to defend himself. Three battered ruffians were set at liberty, and Tom Ross raced back to his office with his reporter and photographers to get out a special edition of the "Daily Press."

The special edition was on the streets within an hour, its front page nearly all headlines and pictures; and not very long afterwards Moss Kitchell set out for Frankio Ballon's flat with a copy because he had ascertained that Eugene Ferguson was there.

Ferguson studied the pictures and read the story of the "experiment," then handed the paper to Frankie. He seemed to be quite amused.

"You've got to hand it to the Professor," he said. "I've a good mind to make him a proposition—get him into the organisation."

"Be a whole lot better to get your son out of Lindsay's organisation," raged Kitchell. "or else wise him up and get some good out of it."

Ferguson's smile vanished.

"I'd rather throw the whole thing overboard than do that!" he rapped.

"Sure," snorted Kitchell, "your chin isn't out like mine! I'm the one Lind-say's gunning for, and he's using your son as a sharpshooter. Why should I be the patsy? He's sweated Barrett, and he's got Mrs. Butler to talk! Now, if I were running things—"

"You're not!"

"He's lined up an organisation, and he's found a way to borrow money—and you know where."

"By the way, Gene," said Frankie, who was pouring drinks for the three of them, "the Acme books haven't come back yet, have they?"

Ferguson gnawed his lip.

"I want to see Eddie Girard," he said to Kitchell.

In the Night

BETWEEN midnight and one o'clock the next morning, Eddie Girard stole across the garden of John's house to the french windows of the sitting-room, and it took him a very little while to get the french windows unfastened.

The moon was obscured by clouds, but there was sufficient light in the sitting-room for him to see his way about, and he was making for the archway to the hall, a six-gun in his hand, when the Irish terrier ran into the room and barked at him.

"S-s-sh!" hissed Girard; but the dog was not particularly interested in him. It was playing with an india-rubber mouse which squeaked quite realistically whenever it was bitten. Girard shrank back to the french windows, and the dog sat up on its hind legs with the mouse in its mouth.

In their bed-room on the floor above, John and Jerry were sitting up in their respective beds, an electric reading-lamp on a little table between them, and John was smoking a pipe and Jerry was taking down notes on a scribbling-pad.

"Memorandum to Paul Ferguson," dictated John. "Advertise in newspapers asking all people who borrowed from loan sharks to communicate with me here." Memorandum to Crane: "Check the list of the Kitchell costing system."

Jerry made a face at him.

"Memorandum to John Lindsay," she mocked, "reminding him that the shortest distance between two points is a straight line. You know, I've been trying to decide what racket I'll take up to attract a little attention."

John looked at her, and then he put his pipe on the table and got out of his own bed to sit on the side of hers and take hold of the hand that had pointed a pencil at him.

"I have been neglecting you, haven't I?" he said.

"Being neglected's all right," she returned plaintively, "but you haven't even been seeing me!"

"Oh, nonsense!" He stooped to kiss her. "I haven't taken my eyes off you since the day I flunked you in that law course."

"Yes, I'll never forgive you for that." She heaved a sigh. "Oh, dear, if only I hadn't sent you out that day to see 'Snow White'!" She sighed again. "John, I went and bought you a present to-day—it's in the top drawer of that bureau."

"Way over there?" He glanced across the room and grimaced. "Why didn't you put it in the drawer of this table?"

"Go and see what it is," she commanded. "Go on!"

He put on a dressing-gown, went over to the bureau, and returned to the bed with a cardboard box.

"Feels heavy," he commented; and then he broke the string that was round the box and removed the lid—to gape

"The LAST of the CAVALRY"

Unpleasant News for the Colonel

FORT LAWSON was situated on the rocky boundaries of the Mojave Desert. Over the fort floated the flag of the 31st Regiment of United States Cavalry.

Before the gates lay a great open space of desert, which made a grand parade ground, whilst behind and away to the west lay great mountain ranges.

There was a large wooden grand stand, which could be used for regimental races, and for viewing the numerous reviews, sports meetings and parades.

It was on a fine spring day that General Matthews came to Fort Lawson to inspect the cavalry, who were under the able command of Colonel Armstrong. The colonel was a tall, rather gaunt man, who held himself very stiffly—a kindly man, but every inch a soldier.

Special manoeuvres had been arranged for the visit of the general. The grand stand was full of the wives of the officers, their daughters and their sons, many friends and relations. Out in front were the general, the colonel, and their staff officers. At a given signal a line of troopers, who had been sitting their horses like statues, were on the move. A great number of difficult and intricate drill movements were carried out, and afterwards the regiment demonstrated what they could do in action. Toy villages, supposed to house rebels, were charged in spite of the hidden snipers. The general saw the horses jump all kinds of obstructions, and a small hill was charged, watched through binoculars.

"Magnificent, Colonel Armstrong."

"Thank you, sir."

"That's as fine a body of men and mounts as I've ever seen."

"Coming from you, General Matthews, that is praise indeed, sir," cried the gratified colonel.

The general inspected the regiment at the end, and was amazed at the spick-and-span condition of horses and men after the testing manoeuvres through which they had gone. The second-in-command, Major Kennett, then took over the regiment, marched them back into the fort and dismissed the parade. The general took light refreshments with the ladies of the garrison, and in the cool of the evening departed.

In the morning the colonel went to his orderly-room, and the Adjutant-Captain Joe Schuyler placed some letters before him. The colonel read through the first, which had come from headquarters, and then sat back in his chair. The adjutant watched him closely.

"I think all my officers should know about this at once," the colonel said at last. "Curtailed all morning parades so that there can be a full assembly here at noon."

"Very well, sir."

All the officers, captains and subalterns, wondered what the old man wanted to see them about so urgently. None of them had anything on their conscience, there had been no disorder or drunkenness among the men, and it could not be anything to do with the inspection, because the general had told them about the splendid spectacle that he had witnessed. One look at their colonel's face as they came into the orderly-room told them that the matter was serious.

"Gentlemen"—the colonel picked up the document that was the cause of this meeting—"I have here an order signed by Brigadier-General Conover. I will read it to you: 'Please be advised of headquarters' decision to conduct a series of mechanisation trials. Captain Conger, in charge of the motorised unit, has been ordered to your post to conduct the experiments.'" The colonel frowned as one or two of the officers began to whisper excitedly at this news. "No comments, gentlemen, please."

The colonel then dismissed the junior officers with orders to say nothing to their men—a notice would appear in regimental orders that evening. When alone with his senior officers the colonel said that those remaining could speak freely.

Most of them were of the opinion that the mechanisation trials were doomed to failure. Only horses could get through the difficult passes and over the foothills, whilst they saw endless trouble for tanks on the sandy desert.

"I've been informed that this new tank has been specially designed for this particular territory," explained the colonel. "It is small, compact, and peculiarly adapted for desert manoeuvres. Unfortunately, gentlemen, the horse is still struggling along with the same old chassis."

"I shall always maintain, sir," argued Major Kennett, "that only the horse can hold country like ours." He turned to a tall officer. "What do you think, Captain Schuyler?"

A somewhat cynical smile appeared on that officer's face. "Well, I'm looking forward to the experiments,

"THE LAST OF THE CAVALRY"

“sir,” was his answer. “There’s something very funny about a tank sunk in the sand.”

“I beg your pardon, sir.” Captain Bob Marvin, the regiment’s most cheerful officer, stepped forward. “But will the Captain Conger, mentioned in your dispatch, sir, be Captain Dike Conger?”

“I believe it is,” nodded the colonel.

“I’m glad of that, sir. We were young subs together at West Point—a great fellow.”

“And a great engineer,” added Major Kennett. “With a string of successful trials to prove it. I know him, too.”

“Speaking for myself, sir, I’d rather have a team of mules than a whole battalion of tanks.” Schuyler spoke with contempt.

“Gentlemen, we will keep an open mind,” decided the colonel with his usual generosity, “and lend Captain Conger every possible assistance. Naturally, we shall treat Captain Conger as a soldier and a gentleman at all times. Captain Schuyler, you will meet him and see that he gets settled in his quarters.”

“Certainly, sir.”

“Gentlemen, let us try to make him and his tank very welcome.” The colonel rose as a signal that the discussion was at an end.

Dike Conger and Three Star

ON a platform at the goods station reposed a bulky object covered with a large tarpaulin. The railroad was just a small place, but most of the station staff and its usual loungers were staring with their eyes popping out of their heads. Standing on the platform were two men, an officer and a sergeant. The officer was tall, broad of shoulder, and a small moustache added a touch to the laughing mouth.

There was a merry twinkle in the brown eyes. The sergeant was shorter and a real tough card. His moustache was a bristly affair, and the mouth had that same laughing touch, though there was a twist at the corners that made the sergeant’s expression cynical. Captain Dike Conger was a clever and capable engineer, and Sergeant “Three Star” Hennessy was almost as capable.

“All right, Three Star.”

The sergeant, assisted by the station-master and one of his staff, then removed the tarpaulin, whereupon the onlookers looked at each other, and one of them muttered rudely:

“What a funny-looking contraption!”

Dike removed wooden blocks from in front of the caterpillar wheels and raised his hand as a signal, whereupon Three Star clambered up the tank and vanished through a steel turret in the roof.

The machine jerked forward and then crawled down some stout timber planks into the yard. Three Star bobbed out again.

“From a quick look round, I don’t think this territory is gonna be quite the cinch the others were,” commented his chief, staring at the sand dunes and the distant hills.

“Is that so, sir.”

“And I don’t want every trooper on the post sore at us before we even get started. So please show a little diplomacy on this post.”

February 11th, 1939.

“Don’t I always, sir?” Three Star seemed quite huffed.

“No, you don’t,” grunted the officer. “At Fort Meyer you had everybody from the colonel on down foaming at the mouth.”

“Oh, no, sir, that was the horses.”

“Quiet!” snapped Dike Conger, as three cavalry officers trotted their horses into the goods yard.

The officers dismounted and walked towards the tank.

“Dike!”

Captain Conger’s face lit up with a glad smile.

“Well, if it isn’t old Bobby Marvin, the Pride of West Point.” He held out a large hand. “How are you, son?”

“Swell—you’re looking great.”

Major Kennett and Captain Schuyler were staring at the tank. Dike watched them with an amused grin.

“Pardon my not rushing up to shake you by the hand,” Major Kennett turned round. “But this—er—tank made me forget my manners. How are you?”

“Fine, Hal.” Dike shook the proffered hand. “How’s Leila and the kids?”

“All flourishing.” Kennett looked again at the tank. “Say, the old man’s glad you brought this thing along—make a handy receptacle for old razor-blades.”

All three men laughed heartily, until Bob Marvin noticed the unsmiling countenance of Captain Schuyler.

“Captain Conger.” He touched his old friend on the shoulder. “I should like you to meet Captain Schuyler.”

“Colonel Armstrong’s compliments, sir, and welcome to the post,” the captain said stiffly.

“Thank you. Please convey my thanks to Colonel Armstrong.” Dike’s eyes twinkled suddenly. “Would you boys like a lift back—horses and all?”

“A lift?” queried Bob and laughed.

“We’ll probably have to tow you in.”

“How far is it to the post?” Dike asked, after the laughter had subsided.

“For you, first left turn on the highway, then seven miles,” answered Major Kennett.

“Now if you were with the cavalry, it would only be a two-and-a-half-mile jaunt,” Bob pointed. “As the crow flies.”

Sergeant Hennessy had been listening from his turret, and there was a glint in his eyes. So these officers thought his lovely tank was a receptacle for safety-razor blades. But for the warning look of his chief he might have been tempted to have spoken out of turn—Three Star often got into trouble because of that quick tongue.

After getting a map showing the exact location of the fort, the tank officer bade the other officers good-morning. He warned them that, provided he did not lose his way, he had every intention of arriving at the fort before the three horsemen.

“So long, Dike,” Bob Marvin called as he walked towards the horses.

“Yell if you get stuck.”

“All right, go get ‘em,” Dike muttered to his sergeant.

The three mounted officers went down the road at a sharp canter, veered on to the sand, and were off at a gallop towards some low sand hills. The tank lumbered after them. Dike could have gone faster, but the tank was heavy, and he had not forgotten one time Three Star charged down a highway leaving great marks and cracks in the concrete. They left the road and walked over the sand, and it was surprising what a grip it seemed to get. There was no slipping back.

The three officers paused, and Joe Schuyler indicated a number of boulders. The tank would have to go round them. They got a shock because the tank charged the rocks and then slowly climbed up them, with the snub nose pointing in the air, then it crashed down on the other side.

“That must have buckled all the machinery!” cried Major Kennett.

But he was wrong, because the tank proceeded to amble forward none the worse. Without any further argument the officers put spurs to their horses, and did not pull up till the three of them had neatly jumped a stout fence. They thought Conger would have to get out and open the gate, which had been erected to keep cattle from straying. Dike Conger just went straight at that gate, and it was lifted off its hinges and flung to one side. The tank then charged a dried-up stream, vanished down one bank and bobbed up the next, and then at a considerable speed was heading for a valley.

“I guess we’ll have to patch that fence up,” muttered Major Kennett. “Confound the fellow!”

The tank reached the flat desert parade ground with the officers nowhere in sight, and proceeded to race over the sand towards the fort. A wagon and its team of horses near the fort bolted, and a troop of cavalry returning from watering had their animals up in the air, prancing round like mad things.

The sentries at the gates had heard that the tank was expected, and stood at the “present.” The tank chugged between the gates and swung towards the stables, causing one or two horses picketed outside the regiment’s headquarters to show signs of great restlessness. Dike ordered Three Star to stop so that he could go and report to the colonel. Three Star to take the tank on to the stables and await orders.

That was the sort of job Three Star Hennessy enjoyed. He steered a somewhat erratic course, after his master had vanished—Three Star loved to do a bit of swanking. Eventually he pulled up the tank, and from various barracks and stables appeared a great number of troopers to view this extraordinary-looking pill box. Three Star bobbed out of his turret like a jack-in-the-box.

“Ladies and gents, here she is!” he cried in shrill nasal accents. “The eighth, ninth, and tenth wonder of the world. A grin, gargantuan Goliath of Gravel, Grit and Gullies!” He beamed at the scowling faces. “All you got to do is push a little button and things begin to happen.”

Three Star disappeared inside the tank, which proceeded to do a circus act outside the stables. The tank went backwards and it went forwards, it spun round, it stood up on end, its one gun menaced the troopers, and it made an awful noise over the stones of the yard.

“Hey, what’s the idea?” a trooper demanded hotly when the tank had stopped and Three Star had bobbed back into view. “Don’t you know better’n to make that kind of racket around horses?”

“Get this thing out of here, will you?” someone shouted, and there was a chorus of agreement.

“Relax, boys—relax!” cried Three Star. “Here’s your new mount. No saddle, no bridle, no spurs, no hay, no nothing.”

A big fellow elbowed his way through the troopers.

“What’s going on around here?”

“Well, if it ain’t Horse Face Harry from the Marines!” sneered Three Star.

"What wet rock did you crawl out from?" retorted the dark, sullen-faced Harry as he recognised an old and bitter enemy.

"Now, is that any way for a mule's chambermaid to talk?"

"Chambermaid?"

"Yeah, we're moving in."

"Not in my stables, you ain't!" shouted Sergeant Ross. "It's the last run around that smelly steam-roller's giving me."

"Seems to me I heard you say that on other occasions."

"When this territory gets through with that portable garbage can of yours, you can slice it up and sell it for paper-weights."

"Aw, you're bitter, Harry—you're bitter," Three Star derided. "The horse is all right with a buggy behind it, but these modern times—"

"Well, this place is different," interrupted the trooper. "It was like this a thousand years ago, and it won't change. And don't forget, Mister Hennessy, this is the desert, and the desert means sand—sand that you can't get a grip on and you stiek and you slide." A raucous, scoffing laugh. "Why, the horses'll be towing that thing out of here with its tail tucked between its legs before it even gets started!"

"You don't know what you're talking about, Horse-face," blazed Three Star. "You ain't got a hope once we get started. Horses is—" Out of the corner of his eye he had seen his captain, and he stood very much to attention. "All present and correct, sir!" he shouted.

Captain Dike Conger noted the looks on the men's faces as they stiffened to attention, and he wondered if Three Star had been up to his old bear-baiting tricks again.

Dike Meets a Girl

AFTER reporting to the colonel the new officer went in search of his servant. He told Three Star that though he was one of the best mechanics in the world, he would go back to his unit if he started any trouble.

"You're a good chap, Three Star," he stated. "But you just love a spot of trouble. Well, I don't want any spots."

Dike was delighted to find that he had to share a bungalow with Bob Marvin. It amused Dike very much when Bob rang up the few young ladies living at Fort Lawson and in the surrounding district, and every one of them was out, unable to come out, or indisposed. Bob had been a lad for the girls in college days.

Joe Schuyler called the morning after his arrival to say that Mrs. Kennett was making up some tables for bridge, and she wanted Dike to come along and play. Dike assured Captain Schuyler that he was flattered by the invitation, but he was too busy with experiments with the tank, but he would endeavour in the very near future to come across to the Kennett bungalow to see Leila and the children.

"I shy clear of army mothers and their daughters," Dike explained. "The mothers are a bunch of schemers with the supreme idea of marrying you off to one of their children. The girls are in most cases dull, very haughty and extremely plain. No, sirree, you find I avoid army girls like one would the plague."

When Schuyler had gone Bob Marvin informed his friend that he had not been very wise to talk in that manner. Schuyler was crazy about the colonel's daughter.

"I know the type. She makes every-one jump around because her old man happens to be the C.O."

"Not Julie Armstrong." Bob shook his head. "She's really dress parade with the colours flying and the band playing Dixie."

"I know the type," scoffed Dike. "She'll change Dixie into the Wedding March so fast it'll make you dizzy."

Some time later it was Mrs. Leila Kennett on the phone. Captain Joe Schuyler had reported his failure, and she had not been altogether surprised.

"But won't you say 'Yes' to me?"

"I wish I could, Leila, honest I do."

"There's some very charming ladies simply dying to meet you," tempted Mrs. Kennett. "We've got a blonde, a brunette, a red-head, and there's me. Red-head's the colonel's daughter."

"Leila, on the level, I'd like nothing better," lied Dike. "But I've got a stack of reports to get out a mile high."

At a tea-party that afternoon Mrs. Kennett informed her friends that she had failed.

"It's about time the vagabond settled down."

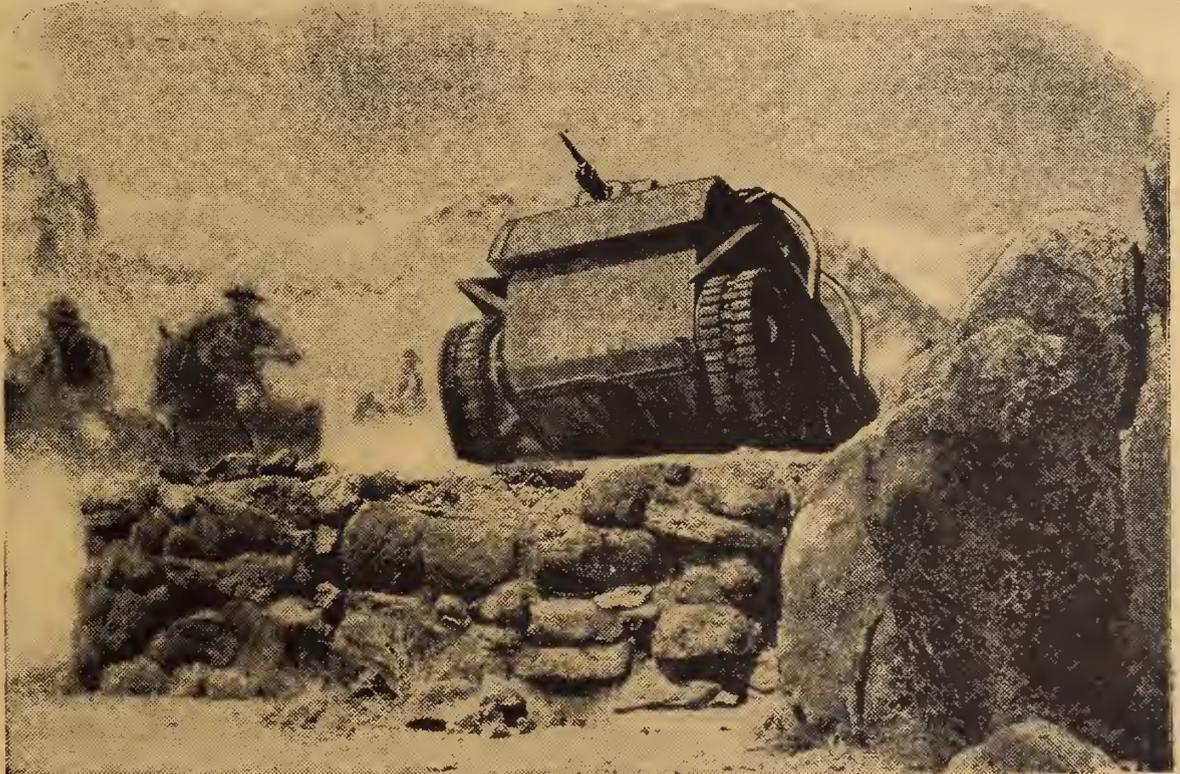

"What's he like?" asked the colonel's daughter.

"Dike Conger is the most unmanageable cog in Uncle Sam's motorised units. He hasn't a nickel but his pay, and I don't suppose he saves a cent. When my husband was on a special gunnery course Dike was there at the same time. One of those reckless, swashbuckling types that appeal to our romantic hearts. Avoids social functions, especially army ones, because he thinks that he may lose his bachelorhood."

"How long is he staying?" asked Julie.

"Nobody ever knows," said Leila. "He parades his little tank during the day, prowls the hills during the night, then he's gone, leaving behind him a trail of gasoline and broken hearts."

Leila Kennett considered herself the most important lady at the fort. The colonel was a widower, and her husband was second in command. Of course, the colonel's daughter was a very important person, but the younger woman was often away visiting friends in New York and abroad.

The tank seemed to claw at the boulders for a moment before getting a grip, and then up it went.

Julie was even then contemplating a visit to New York, because she was bored with life at the post. She loved her father dearly, but he was so involved with his officers and his soldiers, whilst the other officers' wives and daughters did not interest Julie in the least. Leila was a sweet soul, but so much older. Also, Leila was in her bad books, because she was scheming to get her engaged to Captain Joe Schuyler. These awful bridge evenings gave her the shudders. She wanted to go and dance and have a gay time, but as she was part-hostess with Mrs. Kennett, she had to do her duty. The party was one man short, and so Julie was asked to ring up Bob Marvin, who was the world's worst at cards.

Now it chanced that Captain Marvin had had to go out, and he had instructed Sergeant Hennessy that if any of the ladies whom he had rung and found out should ring up and find him out, he was to make a note of their names. As Three Star considered himself indispensable to Captain Conger he had a room in the bungalow, and it was the sergeant who took Julie's call.

"You're Miss Nancy, if I ain't mistaken," the sergeant said, after consulting a list of ladies likely to ring the captain.

"No, I'm not Nancy," cried the colonel's daughter.

"Then you're Millicent."

The bored Julie began to waken up. This was rather amusing. She informed the speaker that she had no idea who he was, but she was not Millicent. Whereupon Three Star tried all the other names.

"I'm not Ellen—try again."

"There's only one left—you're Lucy May Praxton," spoke the tactful Three Star. "Captain Marvin's on duty, but Captain Conger's here. Maybe you'd like to talk to him."

"Sounds rather nice over the 'phone, sir," Three Star confided to his master. "I thought you might like to have a chat with her. Captain Marvin might be pleased."

"And he might not," chuckled Dike, and picked up the 'phone. "Hallo, Lucy May. You've rung up Bob in answer to his call during the day. I'm afraid he's had to go out on unexpected night duty." He laughed cheerfully.

"Here was I, looking forward to a long, lonely evening and suddenly I'm talking to you. Now I don't feel a bit like the fireside, the old pipe and my bed-room slippers. And like rain from heaven you come along. Lucy May—Lucy May—that's the prettiest name. Has magnolias in it and darkies singing in the moonlight. Talk to me, Lucy May."

"What can Ah say—Ah don't even know you," came a southern drawl.

"Well, you must have heard of me."

"Ah, sure have, sugar."

And when he asked her to meet him, Julie, in the same southern drawl, said she would have to get Mistah Bob's permission. Whereupon Dike assured her that he would get that permission from Captain Marvin, and he would meet her in half an hour near the old Mexican church. Rather to her surprise, Julie found herself answering that she would be there.

Dike got hold of Marvin on the phone. Dike wanted to know if he minded him meeting Lucy May, and might he have the car. Marvin said it was okay by him, though he was not quite sure which one Lucy May could be. Dike told him not to worry, and rang off.

February 11th, 1939.

Captain Conger got out the car and dashed off to the little native church. Dike had put on his smartest mufti suit, with a very natty old school tie and a panama hat. He got out of the car and wondered whether he was being an idiot—still Bob's taste in the old days had been pretty good. At any rate, she'd be far more amusing than these stiff army dames. This girl was probably a girl with Spanish or Mexican blood in her veins. A touch on his arm startled him. He jumped and found himself staring at a most attractive girl. Her hair was a deep auburn, not the fiery kind, but a rich colour. Her features were good, the skin pale but very clear, and very long-fringed eyelashes did not hide the dark eyes. In a flash Dike decided that Lucy May was Spanish and a beauty. She was almost hugging a tree.

"You Captain Conger?"

"Yes."

"If you're Captain Conger, then Ah'm Lucy May."

"Well, what are you doing behind that tree?"

"Oh, Captain Conger, Ah had the most awful time getting away from my maw and pa. Ah sorta kinda sneaked out."

Now Dike Conger considered himself a master of the art of flattery. He had been known to boast that he could make any girl he wished fall for him. Just a look and a smile, and she was hooked. After a certain amount of argument she consented to come for a ride.

"I bet you're the prettiest girl around the post," Dike told her, some considerable time later.

"Prettier than the colonel's daughter?"

"Paugh!" Dike gave a scoffing laugh. "A skinny trollop. Round-shouldered, dull featured, and thinks she looks like an empress."

"You know her?"

"Never seen her, but I bet my guess is a good one."

"All the men folk seem crazy about her."

"Politics—that's all—just politics," cried Dike. "Her old man is the C.O., but why talk about her? Me and the night are young—and you're so lovely."

Julie laughed and suggested that they turn the car round, the desert air was a little trying to her throat, and that they partake of food and wine at Cantina Pete's. Pete was a fat, talkative and excitable Mexican who said he would put them at his best table and charge ten cents cover charge so that he could keep out the "rough raff." Dike asked Pete to instruct the band to play one of his favourite jazz tunes, "La Paloma."

Julie and Dike, over coffee and cream, talked and gazed at each other. The girl could understand now why her sex were so attracted to this man—not that he appealed to her. The man wondered what such an attractive girl could be doing in this outlandish part of the world—she was a raving beauty—he would find himself raving if he weren't careful. The girl encouraged the man to talk about himself.

"Do you know the first thing I do when I get to a new post?"

"Tell me about it."

"I take a piece of string a mile long. On one end I tie a piece of chalk. I tie the other end on a flag pole. I draw a circle two miles wide. I never have anything to do with any woman inside that boundary."

Now it chanced that Three Star decided he would like to see the sights of the town, and he came to Cantina Pete's. He found a comfortable bar and banged on it.

"What'll you have?" cried the bartender.

"Three Star's my name, and that's what I'll drink."

"Walker's my name," answered the bartender. "But I never touch it."

"Wise-cracker, huh?" snarled Three Star, quick to rouse.

"Yeah, and we just run out of Three Star."

"All right, then make it beer."

Three Star leaned against the bar and sipped his beer. The band began to play, and idly he watched the couples. He grinned as he saw Dike and whistled his appreciation of his partner.

"That's my skipper out there," he informed the bartender. "That's some doll with him, ain't it?"

"Sure is—it's the colonel's daughter."

"The colonel's daughter! Great rattlesnakes!"

The dance finished and Dike took his partner back to their quiet corner. Julie said it was time she went home, and Dike thought a good method of stopping her was to kiss her. The colonel's daughter jumped to her feet, and Dike was about to grab her again when Three Star appeared.

When Three Star grabbed his chief by the arm the girl darted through the tables.

"Boss! Boss! Do you know who that is?"

"You thick-headed baboon!" raved his master. "Don't you know better than to interrupt when I'm with a lady? Beat it!"

And then Dike found to his chagrin that Lucy May had beaten it, or in other words, vanished.

The next day Dike Conger went down to the polo ground to watch a game. It was a shock when Colonel Armstrong presented his daughter Julie to the tank officer.

The Test

THAT night there was a dance in the large drill hall by special invitation of Colonel Armstrong. Major Kennett informed Dike that the colonel was a great stickler for etiquette, and though there was nothing billed, the dance was really a sort of welcome to Captain Conger. So Dike went, and for once that calm officer was grievously troubled. One moment he was in a mad rage at the way he had been tricked, and the next he felt all forgiving.

He was received by the colonel.

"Sorry to talk business, Captain Conger," the colonel said after a hearty handshake. "But would Munday be too early to take part in test manoeuvres?"

"No, sir."

"My men and I are very curious to see your tank in action."

By great bad luck the band would be playing "La Paloma" when Dike entered the ball-room. He saw the laughing, teasing expression on Julie Armstrong's face, and thought she had asked the band for the number. Now he was most indignant. He was so angry that he went out into a garden to cool down. He decided to go back to his quarters, and he would have done if Julie Armstrong had not sought him out.

"Still angry, captain?"

"You've had your laugh—why not drop it?"

"You weren't quite so anxious to get away from me last night."

"Last night you were Lucy May

"Captain Conger, I give you the Thirty-first Cavalry of Gettysburg, the Indian Wars, Cuba, the Philippines and France!" said Colonel Armstrong.

Praxton," was his terse answer. "Tonight you're the colonel's daughter."

"Oh yes, I remember." She laughed up at him. "You did say something about a chalked circle, Captain Conger."

"And it still goes."

But Julie was such a nice, pretty girl, and she had a most persuasive way with men. She did not apologise, but she made Dike feel somehow that it was all his fault, and then like a lamb she led him back into the ballroom. They promised to be true friends to each other.

In fact, Dike came so much under her spell that towards the end of the evening he asked her if she would like a ride in the tank. And they had a good ride around in the desert, with Julie doing the steering—fortunately the desert was very wide. And when Dike did get back to his quarters he stood at a window gazing in a queer fashion at the moon. Three Star saw and shook his head gloomily.

The manoeuvres were to consist of an obstacle test. On the Monday morning all officers were on parade, including Dike Conger, and the colonel stated the nature of the contest or ordeal. He pointed towards the hills. A marked course had been planned, and all manner of barricades, ditches, barb-wire entanglements, gun emplacements and trenches had been constructed. The cavalry and tank would start at a given signal. There would be observers stationed at various points, to make notes on how the obstructions were overcome, and the finish would be the starting point. It was a circular course and most of it through the mountains, and it would be the objective of the tank to finish the course first to prove the superiority of mechanised warfare.

"Get set." Dike clambered into the tank and addressed his sergeant, who was at the controls.

"We oughta brought sandwiches along for this picnic."

"There won't be any picnic on this course what I've seen of it," Dike laughed grimly.

Captain Bob Marvin fired the starting gun and a thousand cavalymen raced away in almost one straight line. There was an ironical cheer as the tank was left far behind.

But Dike Conger was not worried. He was not going to get the tank overheated right at the start. The mountain tests would be trying enough, and this gallop of the cavalymen was in his mind an unwise move. Junior officers were in charge, the colonel, Major Kennett, Captain Schnyler, and Captain Jack Bradley, assistant adjutant, watched in the capacity of judges. They were able to ride along rough roads that ran through the hills and watch this amazing struggle for supremacy.

The first obstruction after leaving the desert sand was a barrier of rocks. These great boulders must at some time have come rolling down the mountains in an avalanche. Fearlessly the cavalymen rode at these boulders and jumped without thinking of what might be lurking on the other side. Several cavalymen were unseated.

Knowing the vigorous nature of this test, which meant so much to the cavalry, the colonel had ambulance men at various points. They removed several stunned men from either one or the other side of these boulders. From the grand stand the spectators watched the tank lumber forward, and many thought it would fail at the first obstacle.

Dike was now at the controls, and Three Star snuffed as he noted his master was charging the largest boulder of all. There was a special contraption for surmounting such obstacles, and at a shout from the captain the sergeant jerked back a lever and the nose of the tank went up in the air. It seemed to claw at the boulders for a moment before getting a grip, and then up it went.

"Here she goes!" shouted Dike, as the tank reached the top of the great boulder.

"And where we land nobody knows!" muttered Three Star, and jerked back the lever.

The tank crashed down, hit a small rock, seemed to bounce, rolled sideways, crashed against some more great stones, but always went on relentlessly. The two men inside would have been slung against the sides but for the straps buckling them to their seats.

The people in the grand stand were informed by means of loud speakers how the contest was going, and there was also a television set to show some stages through the hills. All witnessed the tank survive the first obstacle, and many expressed an opinion that every bolt must have been jarred out of place.

"Here they come!" the loud speaker informed them. "They are approaching the barbed wire entanglements."

A series of land mines went up and several of the seasoned and trained horses got scared and threw their riders, but hundreds swept on and down into the craters formed by the explosions. Then came a cold mass of barbed wire. The order came to dismount, get out pliers and start cutting. Sergeant Henry Ross yelled hoarse encouragement, and several times glanced back, and when he did sight the tank became almost like a madman.

"Hurry up, men!" he yelled. "Do you want that beer can to make monkeys out of us?"

The troopers had just finished cutting the last of the wire and were mounting when the tank charged at the wire. Dike did not choose the path cut by the cavalrymen, but went straight at the worst of the wire. Those watching from the hills saw staples tossed to one side, the wire burst apart and the tank forge forward. Once the nose of the tank was one mass of accumulated wire and Major Kennett thought it would bring the tank to a stop. The tank went on and gradually the wire was broken or flung aside. The tank was now past a great many cavalrymen, but several hundreds still held a good lead.

The colonel certainly had done everything thoroughly. Mountain batteries now opened fire with a small calibre shell that contained high-explosive. The noise was deafening and visibility difficult because of the black smoke from the explosions of shells and land mines. Naturally, these shells were not aimed at the actual course, but to right and left and the foreground. On several occasions they came unpleasantly close. Many cavalrymen came to grief, but the spectators were astounded at the amazing recklessness of these men, who were fighting to stem the relentless tide of progress that meant mechanisation.

Several times Dike winced as he saw the mad way in which some of the cavalrymen were charging the obstructions—the ambulance workers were being kept busy.

A steep hill proved a nasty obstacle to the tank because it was a loose surface of a composition similar to limestone. An apparently hard surface cracked and slid away causing the tank to topple over on its side. Spectators watching the television version gasped as the tank rolled over and over like a great black slug, hit a large boulder half way down, slithered round it, hounded on some more rocks, righted itself and proceeded on its way.

"That was tough going, sir," gasped Three Star.

"And we haven't got half way yet," chuckled Dike.

The next big difficulty was a hedge-like obstruction with beyond a wide, muddy stream. The banks were soft and easily crumbled—and the stream was weedy and full of rushes. The horses carried the obstacle and flopped into the water, through which they waded to the bank. Many horses landed badly and tossed their riders into the water. Sergeant Harry Ross was shouting and cursing at those men who had conquered the water—they must keep going—when the tank crashed straight through the fence, hurled a wall of water to right and left as it flopped into the stream and then proceeded to go lower and lower in the stream. Sergeant Ross hoped it would vanish from sight, and the blighters inside he drowned. But like a submarine the tank slushed through the mud, the rushes and the mud and clambered up the bank. Sergeant Ross rushed after his men.

Naturally, they could not have people killed by bullets and explosions, so that there was no direct fire, but Captain Conger had stated to the colonel that his tank was bullet proof and that on one given sector this could be tested. They could shell him and even try to blow him up. And without any vindictiveness or malice the colonel had a good try. Machine-guns beat a tattoo on the tank's side, one or two shells got glaucing blows and did no harm—the tank dodged about so that it was not an easy target—and one land mine exploded almost underneath the tank. One great burst of red, then black clouds blotting out everything, and after a few seconds the tank wallowed out of the mire unscathed.

February 11th, 1939.

"This must be one of them undeclared wars," Three Star cried, as he mopped his brow. "This is warm work."

"We're on our way home, soldier!"

"Yeah, and running a very pretty last," Three Star looked through an observation opening. "There are a good hundred of them pesky troopers out ahead and being urged on by old Horse-face Harry."

"Don't forget the horses are tired, and we ain't showed 'em our speed, yet," retorted his chief.

"They're on their way home," the announcer boomed in jubilant tones. "The cavalry in the lead."

The spectators turned their glasses towards the edge of the desert. They could see a compact body of riders, and then on the slight slope behind a squat shape. The tank was close behind. The cavalry certainly started the race across the desert with a slight lead, but not for long. Dike Conger had speeded up his craft.

Sportingly the cavalrymen opened their ranks as they heard the roar behind them, and then the tank had whipped through that opening into the lead. It was careering over the sand as if it were an asphalt track, and leaving the tired horses standing.

The tank finished a winner by a quarter of a mile. Colonel Armstrong had ridden out of the hills to be in time for the finish. Major Kennett and the other officers had often looked at their superior officer with questioning expression, but the C.O. kept a poker face.

When the tank stopped, one of the first people to ride out was the colonel. Captain Dike Conger crumbled out, and stood rigidly to attention.

"Congratulations, Conger, a good show."

"Thank you, sir."

Gloom and Glory

IN the weeks that followed, Dike Conger was at times full of good cheer and others irritable and depressed. Three Star, who was a privileged person, tackled his officer on the subject.

"What are you nervous about, sir?"

"Nothing."

"Well, for a guy that ain't nervous about nothing, you certainly are nervous. Washington'll get around to your report all right."

"It's never taken this long—four weeks," Dike scowled. "This hanging around's getting me."

"Well, from what I've seen you didn't look as if you minded much," dryly commented the sergeant. "A nice bit of a canter in the morning with a nice-looking gal, and a hunk a rumba at night."

"That'll do, sergeant."

"I never meant no harm, sir. I was glad you was enjoying yourself. Kinda makes the time pass quick."

"That's the trouble—it doesn't."

"Say, you ain't worried about this report, are you? Why, we're a cinch."

"That's what bothers me," Dike said with a gloomy smile. "For the first time in my life I haven't been too sure I wanted to win. There happens to be a pretty decent fellow on this post who has given thirty years of his life to the work he loves. Horses—cavalry."

"Yeah—so what?"

"So I come along. Compared to him I'm a rookie. I take everything he's done and throw it right in the ash can."

"Are you sure it's him you're thinking about and not the daughter?" questioned Three Star.

"How many times do I have to tell you that—that we're but friends? Pals—playmates. The same as you and I."

Three Star raised an eyebrow, but made no comment. The 'phone rang in the next room, and when he returned after answering the call there was a slight curl at the corners of his mouth.

"It's the stables, sir," he reported. "Your horse is all saddled, and Miss Armstrong is waiting to take you for a canter through the woodlands."

With the test manoeuvres concluded there were very few duties for Captain Conger and his sergeant, except to see that the tank was spotlessly clean and in perfect running order. Therefore, Dike was able to go out riding any time.

On this day he had a race with Julie and, as on previous occasions, he lost by several lengths.

In between the hills was a valley of waving trees and green verdure. A grand place for a ride and a picnic, and the colonel's daughter and her latest conquest sat down on the bank of a little stream. It was Julie's idea that they catch some trout and grill them. She had even brought a three-piece split cane rod, a reel, a line and some fly traces. But she was not very experienced at throwing the fly, and it was Dike who showed her how it should be done.

"What's the matter, Dike?" Julie noticed his moodiness.

"I'll miss this."

"Why? Aren't there any fish where you're going?"

"Who knows where I'll go?" Dike shook his head. "When the report comes back from Washington they'll pack me off to some place. Honolulu, Manila—I don't know. Remember what I said about a chalk circle?" The girl nodded. "Well, this is one time where I was wrong."

And when Julie and Dike rode slowly back to Fort Lawson they had become engaged to be married. Dike was elated, but as he neared the fort this elation waned—because he had to face the colonel.

"Not frightened, are you, Captain Conger?" teased Julie.

"No—no—but I'd just as soon drive the tank up the side of an iceberg."

"Ha, ha!" laughed the girl. "Well, don't weaken."

Hand in hand they went up the stairs, but when they came to the colonel's special lounge they were sedately apart. They entered and found that the colonel was not alone, for several of his officers were with him. Julie gave Dike an encouraging smile, and after a friendly wave of her hand to her father and the officers Julie betook herself up some stairs to the sleeping rooms above, but on the first landing she paused. She was eager to see if Dike would get rid of the other officers and broach the subject of their engagement.

"Captain, I have some news that will interest you." The colonel held up a document.

"The report, sir?" Dike's heart missed a beat. "There was something tense and strained in this atmosphere."

"Naturally, sir, I am anxious—"

"You may set your fears at rest, captain," interrupted the colonel. "General headquarters has ordered the immediate mechanisation of this post."

"Thank you, sir," Dike grinned his pleasure, and added, glancing at the other officers, "and with your permission I should like to express my gratitude to you and your men for your co-operation."

"On behalf of my men and myself, I thank you." The colonel gave a little bow, and glanced at the document he held. "Now, there's one thing more. Headquarters has decided, and with justice perhaps, that to carry out this specialised work requires someone more familiar with the problems than I am." He looked up. "I am in receipt of an order placing you in charge of the work."

"Do you mean I am to command this post?" Dike asked in hoarse surprise.

"Yes."

"But that's impossible, sir."

"I notice in orders you will soon be a major."

"I couldn't do this to—" Dike began and stopped in confusion. "But I'm an engineer, sir, and—"

"You're a soldier."

"Yes, sir," agreed Dike, stiffening to attention before the eagle glance of this old martinet.

"The notice has been posted and the regiment will be turned over to you officially to-morrow morning." The colonel looked at his officers. "Gentlemen, your regiment has been selected for a duty which will call for all the training and devotion for which it has always been known." He walked round his desk. "Captain Conger, I give you the Thirty-first Cavalry of Gettysburg, the Indian Wars, Cuba, the Philippines and France." He held out his hand. "I congratulate you, sir!"

"Thank you, sir."

"Gentlemen—good-night." The colonel walked towards the stairs, and his shoulders seemed to bow.

Julie, his daughter, was not there, for she had fled to the sanctuary of her room.

"Congratulations, Dike." Captain Bob Marvin was the first and the warmest greeting. "I think it's wonderful."

"Congratulations, old man." Major Kennett was a little pompous. He tried to look as if he were pleased—he hated this change. "Good luck and all that."

"Might I add my congratulations—in a major." Captain Schuyler's face expressed nothing but disgust. "Congratulations for the finest double-cross I've ever seen put over."

Captain Schuyler wisely retired, the other two officers looked uncomfortable and they vanished. Dike Conger, still in a daze, stood by the desk. He turned and saw Julie coming down the stairs.

"Julie! Something has happened!"

"I know—I heard!" Her face was pale.

"Isn't going to change things for us, is it?"

"How can you stand there and think of yourself?" Her eyes suddenly blazed their contempt.

"When you've just taken a man's life away."

"Oh, Julie, please don't feel like that—"

Dike's voice trailed away because the colonel's daughter had fled from him.

Late that night

there came an urgent knocking on the front door. Julie, still dressed in the same clothes, lay motionless on her bed. She stirred and sat up, her hands going to her unruly hair, and then the knocking became more insistent and urgent. She went downstairs and opened the front door to find Three Star standing on the doorstep.

"I'm awful sorry to come busting in and waking you, Miss Armstrong, but I need your help."

"What's wrong, sergeant?"

"It's Captain Conger, miss. He's down at Cantina Pete's—been there all night drinking his head off. For the first time in ten years I can't do nothing with him."

"I'm sorry." Julie stiffened and drew away.

"And you know why he's doing it, too," the sergeant went on viciously. "It's because everybody's against him—the colonel and every man on this post."

"That's too bad."

"And you're the only one he'd listen to, Miss Armstrong. You know the way he feels about you. We gotta get him straightened out by ten o'clock—he's taking over the post."

"I am aware of that."

"Won't you please help me straighten him out?" begged Three Star. "Miss Armstrong, if ever a guy needed a friend he does now."

"Captain Conger doesn't need anyone," haughtily and coldly came her answer. "He's thoroughly capable of taking care of himself. I'm sorry I can do nothing for you. Good-night sergeant!"

Julie went out on to a balcony. Her brain was a turmoil. A gentle touch on her shoulder made her turn, and she gasped to see her father. Then his arm drew her close.

"Julie," the colonel spoke softly and so kindly. "how long have you and Dike been in love with each other?"

And for the first time since her mother had died many years ago Julie burst into tears.

Three Star did not give up. He went back to Cantina Pete's. Dike Conger was in a private room, and sitting with eyes half closed in a chair with one hand clutching a glass.

"Come on, skipper—come on, snap out of it!"

"Go away—I wanna sleep."

Three Star's chin stuck out aggressively. He put his arm round the captain and got the dazed man to his feet. Dike tried to struggle free but had no strength. Three Star got his master home and got him to bed, and he locked the door so there was no chance of going back to Cantina Pete's.

The Tank Runs Amok

IN the morning Three Star was again in action. His master was sleeping like a log, but the sergeant got the half-drunken man out of bed in spite of protests and into the bath-room. Then Three Star turned on the cold shower, and that brought back some life.

"I'm freezing to death!" cried Dike, after he had been kept there some minutes.

"You're gonna feel much better after a while," answered Three Star.

Then he led the frozen Dike back into the bed-room, flung him on the bed, and proceeded to rub him with hard towels.

"That's enough," protested Dike.

"I'm burning up."

And thus did the faithful Three Star restore Dike Conger almost to his senses. Dike had a terrible head, and mumbled that everything was whirling round, and had a glass put into his hands. It was a horrible-looking mixture—a kill-or-else pick-me-up.

"Do I have to?"

"It'll do you a world of good."

And Dike had just swallowed the last drop when there came the sound of a bugle.

"I'm okay now, sergeant. Thanks a lot." Dike Conger spoke clearly. "I'll get dressed if you'll see to the tank. You needn't worry any more."

Three Star hurried over to the special stall in the stables where the tank was kept. He was surprised to find Sergeant Ross coming out.

"Aw, a Peeping Tom, huh?"

"I just figured as long as we gotta handle these things, I might as well look it over and see what makes it tick."

"Well, I never thought I'd ever win you over."

"Neither did I," grinned Sergeant Ross, and walked off roaring with laughter.

Three Star looked after the burly figure and shrugged his shoulders as if human nature was a puzzler. It was with a great sense of relief that he noted the presence of his chief—looking none the worse for his folly.

Colonel Armstrong had ordered a full parade of his regiment, and he tried to remain calm and unmoved as he watched them for the last time.

"It isn't easy for the men to give up their mounts," he said to Major Kennett. "It's the first time I've ever seen a trooper's face longer than his horse's."

"A certain amount of resentment is natural, sir, but they'll come round."

"I hope so for Conger's sake—this being torn between two loyalties isn't any good." The colonel smiled as Dike approached him. He acknowledged the salute. "Ah, good-morning, captain."

"Good-morning, sir."

"We'll hold the official ceremonies in front of headquarters," stated the colonel. "Have I your permission to make a gesture which might lead to a better understanding between the men of the post and yourself?"

"Certainly, sir."

"I should like to exchange mounts with you."

"Delighted, sir. I will inform Sergeant Hennessy."

Though the men were rigid beside their horses they noted with mixed feelings the gesture of their colonel, and they understood what he was trying to tell them by this action. They saw Captain Conger and Sergeant Hennessy assist the colonel into the tank. Sergeant Hennessy followed, whilst a groom brought forward the colonel's horse for Captain Conger.

The next part of the ceremony was the assembly near the stables and a march towards headquarters for the installation ceremony. The tank would be in the lead.

Sergeant Harry Ross watched the action of his colonel with deep concern, and so far forgot his position to call out: "Don't, sir—don't—"

"Attention!" bellowed Captain Schuyler. "Get back into line!"

The tank proceeded for a short distance in orderly fashion, and then it shot forward with a roar. It hit a post and demolished it, swung round and went straight through a small wall, ploughed through a garden. It was completely out of control.

The wives and families of the officers and many friends had come to witness the installation, and they gasped with horror. The tank charged a shed, and some men on duty there had just time to get to safety as it smashed the wooden structure to matchwood. Completely out of control, the tank smashed through one of the walls of the fort. On this side of Fort Lawson there was a steep cliff that ran down to a river, which, like the Grand Canyon, had eaten its way through the land to a considerable depth. Over and over the tank rolled to crash into some boulders just short of the water.

February 11th, 1939.

Julie had run to her car and drove furiously out of the fort along the road that wound down to the river.

Captain Schuyler shouted an order to an officer to take charge of his squadron and galloped his horse through the breach in the walls, and slid his mount down the cliff.

The turret cover had not been shut down, and near the now silent tank he found the body of Sergeant Three Star Hennessy. The man was obviously dying—blood was running from a terrible gash in his forehead. His eyes stared up eagerly at the captain, and he croaked out two words:

"Harry—Ross—"

In spite of the fact that he was not an expert rider, Dike was about the next person to arrive, and then most of the regiment showed up. The officers had rushed to see what had happened and the men had followed. Of course, safety-belts had not been worn, but they found that Colonel Armstrong had one under his body. Three Star, thinking only of the colonel's safety, had tried to strap the superior officer to his seat but had failed. The bodies had been flung about inside the tank—the colonel had nearly every bone in his body broken.

They laid the body on the ground, and everyone stood back as Julie appeared and took the limp hand in her own warm grasp. Captain Conger knelt by her side and tried to comfort her.

"Don't touch me!" she cried hoarsely.

"Don't touch me!"

Three days later Colonel Armstrong and Three Star Hennessy were buried with full military honours. And after the ceremony authority came from the department of the Secretary of War at Washington that Captain Dike Conger was under arrest pending his trial by court-martial. He would remain in his quarters.

Schuyler Calls a Witness

THE charge against Captain Conger was that of causing the death of the colonel and Three Star through gross negligence in the care and inspection of the tank. Major Kennett was appointed judge advocate of the court-martial, whilst Bob Marvin was detailed to the defence of the prisoner. The chairman of the proceedings was General Matthews.

After a week under arrest the court-martial was convened at Regimental Headquarters. All officers were present. The general, the judge advocate, Captain Bradley and two officers from Washington composed the bench. The first witness called was Major Thorndike, staff tank expert.

"A cursory inspection would have shown that the clutch controls were in a very dangerous condition," was his report.

"Then you absolutely attribute the cause of death to negligent maintenance?"

"I regret to say, sir, I must draw that conclusion."

Captain Marvin made an objection to this statement, which in his opinion carried sufficient weight to affect the entire case. The Court must not forget that the career of a fine soldier was at stake. The objection was sustained.

Sergeant Harry Ross was called to the stand, and took the oath to speak the truth and nothing but the truth.

"You are in charge of the stables where the tank is kept?"

"Yes, sir."

The judge advocate walked up to the stand, showed him a document.

"Is that the maintenance record covering the comings, goings and inspections of the tank?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did Captain Conger sign an inspection okay on the morning of the accident?"

"He did, sir."

"Your witness, Captain Marvin." The judge advocate signified that he was finished for the moment.

"Did you see Captain Conger or Sergeant Hennessy inspect the tank that morning?"

"I wouldn't know about that, sir. About an hour before the accident Captain Conger and Sergeant Hennessy came up to the tank. The captain was looking kinda white round the gills—"

"We're not interested in your opinion of Captain Conger's appearance," harshly interrupted Captain Marvin. "Continue with your evidence."

"Sorry, sir." Ross grinned unpleasantly. "I handed the captain the maintenance records just like I always done, and he signed 'em."

"Did you notice whether he went through an inspection?"

"I never noticed nothing about that tank, and I didn't care—" shouted the sergeant.

The witness was dismissed and Captain Conger called by the judge advocate.

"Captain Conger, is that your signature on the maintenance record?"

"It is."

"Do you wish to offer anything to contradict the testimony given?"

"No, sir."

"I must warn you—it is fairly conclusive," stated General Matthews.

"I am aware of that, sir," Dike answered frankly. "I would like, however, to clear the name of my deceased sergeant."

"Permission granted."

"Sergeant Hennessy's last act was to attempt to save Colonel Armstrong at the risk of his own life. It was proven by the fact that he made no effort to jump from the tank. He was always scrupulously careful with the equipment. Any fault that may have existed was solely mine."

"The record welcomes this tribute to an old soldier," answered the general. "The court directs that Sergeant Hennessy's bravery be recorded on his final papers to be sent to his family."

Soon afterwards the court closed for consideration of the verdict. Dike Conger was sent back under escort to his quarters.

Meanwhile, Julie was packing to leave. She was going right away from everything in an attempt to forget. She had promised Leila Kennett that she would forget all about Dike Conger, and when she had got over her tragic loss she would be nicer to Captain Joe Schuyler than she had been in the past. Leila was helping her with the packing when Joe Schuyler came across to the house to say he had secured her tickets, and Leila discreetly left them alone.

But before Joe Schuyler could get in a word in his own cause Julie was gripping his arm with both hands and asking what was going to happen to Dike Conger. The tragic expression on the girl's face told Captain Schuyler more than words could have done. He told her as gently as possible that the verdict was now under consideration, and that it looked very grim for Captain Conger. Her distress affected him deeply, and after telling her that perhaps there was still a chance to save the captain left hurriedly.

When Leila fluttered back hoping to hear that Julie had at last at a formidable automatic of blue steel. "What's this?"

"Well," said Jerry, "the next time you might not get a chance to disarm them."

He took out the gun with a gesture of repugnance.

"You know, this is the nearest I've ever been to one of these things," he commented. "How does it work?"

She showed him how to release the safety-catch.

"It's fully loaded," she said, "so all you have to do now is to take aim and pull the trigger."

Eddie Girard had crept up the stairs, in spite of the fact that the Irish terrier was at his heels. He needed no better guide than the thin line of light under the bed-room door, and abruptly he flung the door wide.

John saw him, framed in the opening, and he saw the gun in his hand.

"Look out!" he yelled, and in the same instant he pulled the trigger of the automatic.

Two shots rang out almost simultaneously, a bullet buried itself in the wall above John's head—and then Girard reached an open window and jumped clean out of it over the sill to a flower-border down below.

John rushed to the window with the automatic in his hand and peered round one of the curtains, and Jerry deserted her bed to crouch behind him. Girard had scrambled to his feet and was disappearing round a corner of the house.

"Got away!" gritted John. "Jerry, get Gleason on the 'phone—I'll need a couple of his rookies."

The Irish terrier leapt up at him as Jerry made for a telephone on the table between the beds.

"Habeas," said John sternly, "you're fired!"

In less than an hour, John and two brand-new police officers were in the living-room of Girard's flat, and Girard was scowling at them. He was wearing an extravagantly patterned dressing-gown over sky-blue pyjamas.

"You chums oughta know better than to bust in a guy's place without a warrant!" he stormed.

"Well," said John, "you'll have to excuse the boys. They were only recently sworn in, and they don't know the ropes yet."

"I guess you don't, either!" rasped Girard. "What's the pinch for?"

"Parking your car near a hydrant."

"Mister, my car's in the garage. Come on, what's the charge against me?"

"Mr. Lindsay," said one of the policemen. "I think this guy's got a gun on him."

"Well, take a look," directed John.

The highly decorated dressing-gown was ripped open, a shoulder-holster was disclosed beneath it, and from the holster a six-gun was extracted.

"Oh, carrying a gun without a licence," said John.

Girard retorted that he had a licence, and he went to a little desk and opened a drawer. John saw that his right-hand was bandaged.

"What's the matter with your hand?" he demanded. "I suppose you shot it while cleaning this gun?"

"Yeah, that's it," drawled Girard.

"What's the name of the doctor who treated your hand?"

"There wasn't any doctor. I fixed it myself."

"Oh," said John, "practising medicine without a licence, eh? Take him along, boys!"

Girard was taken off to gaol, and it was not until the following afternoon that Tom Ross knew anything of the arrest. John called upon him, then, and mentioned it.

Tom was full of professional indignation.

"You promised me an exclusive on everything, and now you say I can't print this!" he exploded. "When do we open up?"

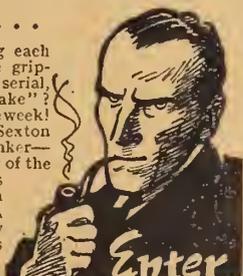

"When we close in," John replied. "My new staff is doing marvellous work, and we're accumulating plenty of evidence, but we're out for more. Now get away from that wailing wall—I've got work for you to do."

"Work? You've got most of my reporters working for you already!"

"Well, then, hire some more." John began to unroll a big plan he had brought with him. "Now Paul Ferguson has been checking up on Moss Kitchell. Kitchell's office is a mere front; he gets together with his boys at his apartment. They hold a meeting several days a week."

"What's that?" asked Tom, as the plan was spread out over his desk and held down at the corners with a paper-knife, an inkpot, a paste-pot, and an ash-tray.

"Floor plan of two apartments," John replied. "Kitchell's and an unoccupied one that adjoins it. Now, look, the wall of this cupboard is the wall of Kitchell's living-room. I was just wondering if it were possible to plant a motion camera in that cupboard."

Tom's prominent blue eyes sparkled. "I get it," he said. "I'll assign one of my best burglars to plant the camera for you. Not only a camera, but a microphone, too! We'll not only see 'em, but we'll hear 'em!"

The best "burglar" was summoned—an expert photographer, named Austin, who had had experience of movie camera work—and John was introduced to him. The flat next-door to Kitchell's, on the top floor of a big apartment-house in Sheridan Avenue, was rented by one of Tom's nominees with all speed, and Tom and Austin paid a visit to it.

Before the day was out, the "burglar" had installed a microphone behind a statuette on a shelf in Kitchell's elegantly furnished living room, an inconspicuous hole had been made in the party wall, and a movie camera was in the cupboard.

"How does it look, Austin?" inquired Tom, when everything was complete.

"Swell," Austin declared. "I can pan all over the room and see everything. That skylight's just right for day-time, and the concealed lighting will be quite strong enough at night."

"That's fine," Tom rubbed his hands together. "Now I want someone here twenty-four hours a day."

"Well, but how about food?"

"Don't worry, I'll see that you get plenty of food. And all the film you get is to be turned over to Mr. Lindsay in person."

John Makes a Will

MONTHS passed, during which the rackets continued, and on the surface it appeared that nothing was being done to put an end to them. The people of Burlington held mass meetings at which the District Attorney and the Special Prosecutor were reviled, demonstrators paraded the streets; and finally a petition signed by thousands was delivered to the Governor of the State.

The Governor called John and Bert Berry before him at State House, and he did not mince matters.

"Gentlemen," he said, "the situation is becoming dangerous. If the people aren't protected by the law they'll take the law into their own hands. I must ask for your resignation."

Berry refused to resign his post as District Attorney, and John declared that he needed Berry's help more than ever at that moment.

"Mr. Lindsay," barked the Governor, "you've tried to do this job, but it's been too big for you. You've failed!"

"We haven't failed," asserted John. "We're all ready for the final push. We've tracked the racketeers down, every one of them. We know who they are and how they operate. We're ready to clean them out—if you'll only give us a little more time."

"How much time?" questioned the harassed Governor.

"Twenty-four hours," was the unexpected reply.

"All right, Lindsay, go to it."

Down in the hall of the building, the District Attorney spoke for the first time after leaving the Governor's room.

"John, that was a good bluff," he said glumly.

"But it wasn't a bluff," John informed him. "I do know who they are and just how they operate. I'm going to arrest every one of them! I want them all brought directly to my house—I don't want any of them booked, or taken to a police station."

Berry stared at him.

"But you can't pull people in without bringing charges against them and having some proof!" he expostulated.

"Are you going to help me round them up?"

"John, I've strung along with you all the way, but this is suicide! If you cause wholesale arrests and then can't back them up—well, we're not only washed up, but we're in line for criminal prosecution."

"I don't care," said John stubbornly. "I'm going to take that risk. It'll be a pleasure to rot in gaol, if I can drag a few of the swine in with me!"

The District Attorney yielded; and precisely at noon a concerted drive began which continued throughout the day. All over the city gangsters and gunmen were arrested, informed that they were to be Mr. Lindsay's guests, February 11th, 1939.

not his prisoners, and were taken to John's house.

There they were handed over to John's staff, but policemen helped to guard them, and as the day wore on the kitchen became full of loan sharks, the sitting-room crowded with members of the other rackets. Tom Ross was early on the scene with reporters and photographers, and Tom rejoiced at the prospect of a sensational scoop.

Towards evening, Paul was dealing with some fresh captives when Jerry told him that he was wanted on the telephone, and he spoke into the instrument on the desk at which she had been helping to check off the names of the latest batch of crooks.

"Paul Ferguson?" said a voice in his ear. "This is Moss Kitchell. I know there's an order to pull me in, but if I'm pinched you'll be the one that will suffer most. If you want to know why, come round to my apartment and I'll tell you."

"I'll be there in ten minutes," said Paul.

Several squad cars were parked in the roadway beyond the garden of the house, and in one of them he was driven to Sheridan Avenue. A lift conveyed him to the top floor, and he sped to the flat; but there was no response to his ringing of the door-bell, and as the front door was not shut he ventured into the flat, after a while, crossed the hallway to a curtained arch, and looked into the living-room.

Three shallow stairs led down into the living-room, and at the foot of them Moss Kitchell lay dead upon his back, his arms flung wide, and it looked as though a six-gun on the carpet had fallen from his right hand.

Paul was stooping beside the body when a telephone-bell began to ring. He looked at the instrument, which was on a low table, hesitated for nearly half a minute, then took out a handkerchief and with it held the receiver to his ear.

"Yes?" he said in a voice utterly unlike his normal voice.

"Hallo, Moss," responded the voice of his own father. "You don't have to worry about Lindsay. As I told you, no matter what he has on you, he'll never have a chance to use it. I'm taking care of that to-night, and after Lindsay's out of the way I'll see to it that Paul leaves town."

Horror was stark in Paul's brown eyes as he dropped the telephone back on its plunger. He stood there, trying to realise what it all meant, till the telephone-bell began to ring again. Then, slowly, he put the handkerchief back in his pocket and went up the stairs and out from the flat.

In less than a quarter of an hour he was back at the house and in John's study, wild-eyed and almost hysterical.

"It was fixed to look like suicide," he blurted, "but it wasn't! Kitchell was killed because somebody knew I was coming to see him! He was killed because he was going to tell me something! That's why Cronin was killed! That's why my father didn't want me to work for you! That's why you wouldn't let me look at those Acme books—you wanted to protect me! You said this was a war. All right, everybody gets hurt in a war."

John grabbed him just as he was making for the door that opened into the crowded sitting-room.

"Wait a minute!" he urged. "Where are you going?"

"Tom Ross is in there," Paul replied hoarsely. "I'm going to tell the world how my father's mixed up in this thing—how he's posed as a civic-minded citizen, when all the time he's been double-crossing me and the rest of the February 11th, 1939.

people! My own father the head of this slimy outfit! I'll give Ross a story! I'll—"

"Wait!" John held on to him. "I'm still in charge of this job. If you're working for me, you're going to take orders from me. You've got to trust me, Paul. You're not going to say a word about this to your father, or anybody else."

"You're wrong, John!" raged Paul. "I've got to get this out in the open!"

"Yes, yes, but not now," John insisted. "We're not ready for it yet. If those arrests we've caused to-day can be made to stick, yes. Otherwise it's we who'll be behind bars! Now go out there and work those hoodlums over—break them down!"

He was about to open the door when Austin dashed in upon them from the hall, a circular tin box in his hand and excitement in his eyes.

"Mr. Lindsay," he cried, "we've got it! It's just what we've been praying for! Why, to-day's film will blow the lid right off this town! And the record, too!"

"Well, let's run it," said John. "You get busy, Paul."

Paul went out into the sitting-room, where members of the staff were trying to bully the crooks into confession.

"What a story we're getting to-night, Paul," Tom Ross said exultingly to him.

"Yes," said Paul with fierce bitterness, "what a story!"

A man concerned in the plate-glass racket had just been marched into the hall from the porch and was shouting that he wanted a lawyer. Paul swept out to him.

"I'll get you a lawyer!" he roared. "The place is full of lawyers! Take him in there, Cranc, will you? I'm going to make those loan sharks talk!"

Jerry and a maid were dispensing sandwiches and cups of coffee, but Paul would neither eat nor drink. Jerry carried a tray to the study and set it down on the desk in front of John.

"Here's some coffee," she said; and then, as he looked up at her with a haggard face: "Why, what's the matter, John?"

"Sit down, Jerry, and take some dictation."

Wonderingly she took the book and the pencil he offered her, and she sat down at the desk.

"Go ahead," he said. "This is the last Will and Testament of Eugene Ferguson. I, Eugene Ferguson, being of sound mind and memory, and not acting under duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence of any person whatsoever, do make, publish, and declare—"

The dictation had only just been finished when Paul entered the room.

"That's all, Jerry," said John. "Get it out as quickly as possible."

She went out with the book and ascended to a bed-room which had been converted into an office.

"John," lamented Paul, "it's hopeless—we can't break them down. We've got to get those witnesses to identify them."

"Where are the witnesses?" asked John.

"They're in the patio—every man who refused to testify before the grand jury."

"Everyone except Butler," corrected John grimly.

The Pictures on the Screen

THE house was built in the Spanish style, round a central paved courtyard, and in the courtyard were the twenty-nine men who had refused to give evidence against their oppressors. John went out to them, and he told them that he was glad to see them again.

"The last time I talked to you," he said, "you all had lockjaw. You refused to identify the racketeers who were robbing you and ruining your businesses. I'm giving you another chance now to prove that you're men who will stand up for your rights."

It seemed, at first, that he was going to be no more successful on this occasion than on the previous one, though he lashed them with his tongue and told them of the twenty-five young lawyers who had given up their careers just to help them.

A spectacled man named Higgins cried out that he was not ashamed to confess that he was afraid.

"I'm a peaceful man," he declared. "Violence terrifies me. I'd rather pay than be beaten up."

"There's nothing to be afraid of," John assured them. "We have the head man, and Moss Kitchell—his assistant—was killed to-night. We can't let any of them slip through our fingers. They're all in there. I know they're guilty, but I need your help to prove it. All I want you to do is to identify them. Now will you help me?"

He won them over in the end, and he led them to an open french window of the sitting-room. Inspector Gleason and his officers marshalled the crooks in rows the whole length of the room while their victims waited, and then John said:

"Gleason, as these men are identified have them put in the dining-room." He turned to the waiting witnesses. "Gentlemen, I've turned my home into a rat-trap for your convenience. Now do any of these rodents look familiar to you?"

The twenty-nine moved slowly into the room and along the rows of crooks, scrutinising their faces, and almost immediately several of the crooks were identified. Higgins, the peaceful man whom violence terrified, pounced on an ugly fellow in a tweed suit.

"This one is in the poultry racket!" he cried. "He held me and hit me like this!"

He smashed a fist into the fellow's jaw, and would have struck him again and again, but John clung to him while flashlamps blazed and expired.

"Now take it easy, Mr. Higgins!" he enjoined.

After that it was not very long before all the hoodlums had been transferred to the dining-room and were in handcuffs.

At half-past eleven, Frankie Ballou alighted from a squad car outside the house, a vision of beauty in an evening gown and a white fur cloak. A young policeman took her arm and led her along the brick path to the porch, and two of Tom Ross' photographers took pictures of her and her escort.

John was waiting for her on the porch, and Tom was standing beside him.

"Good-evening, Miss Ballou," said the editor mockingly. "Statement for the Press?"

"Not to-night," she replied quite serenely. "How are you, Professor? What's going on here, a revolution?"

"Something like that," John replied. "The way they're bringing them in now, we'll have to get a football park for the overflow."

He escorted her to his study. "I must apologise for asking you to come here at such a late hour," he said.

"Sit down, Frankie."

"You said you wanted me to meet somebody," she reminded him, as she took the indicated chair.

"Yes," John pressed the button of an electric bell, and Ferguson was brought in from the sitting-room by two young fellows who left him there. He was in evening clothes. "Miss Ballou, I want you to meet Mr. Eugene Ferguson."

Ferguson bowed as to a stranger; Frankie caught at her breath.

"Sit down, Gene," said John. "Oh, by the way, when I introduced you to Miss Ballou I neglected to tell you who she is. Among other things, she's the lady who killed Moss Kitchell."

Ferguson raised his brows. "It isn't polite to contradict," said the girl in a voice that was completely under control, "but according to the extras they're yelling on the streets, Moss Kitchell committed suicide."

"Yes, yes, of course," purred John, "but we know better, don't we?" "What did you want to see me about, John?" asked Ferguson stiffly.

"Oh, yes, we'd better get down to business," John wheeled a portable projector behind the desk, then crossed the room and unrolled a miniature screen upon the opposite wall. "The shortest distance between two points is a straight line. I have some very interesting film which I'd like to show you. There, I think everything is in order."

He switched off the lights in the room and set the projector in action, and on to the screen came a picture of Moss Kitchell's living-room.

Frankie started violently as she saw herself in the room, looking at Kitchell, who was striding about it, and heard her own voice:

"Stop pacing, Moss. You make me nervous."

A bell rang, and Kitchell went out from the room, presently to return with Eugene Ferguson, who said:

"You know I don't like to come here. What's all the excitement, Moss?"

"You've heard about this round-up, haven't you?" asked Kitchell.

"What of it?" snapped Ferguson.

"They're not going to get me in it! I'm serving notice right now that I'm not holding the bag for anybody!"

"You won't have to," Ferguson retorted. "I don't care what Lindsay has got on Girard, he'll never be able to use it."

"You said that before," snorted Kitchell, "and he's still around. Even if you got Lindsay out of the way, what about your son? He probably knows as much as Lindsay does! Why didn't you get him out of there when I told you to? Are you going to knock him off, too? What kind of a rat is he?"

Ferguson gave one swift look at Frankie, and then he walked straight up the stairs and out from the picture.

"You shouldn't have said anything about Paul," Frankie said to Kitchell. "It's dynamite!"

"Well, maybe it's time to use a little dynamite," snarled Kitchell, and he went to the little table and began to dial a number on the telephone there.

"What are you going to do?" she cried.

"Call up Paul Ferguson. Hallo, I want to speak to Mr. Paul Ferguson, please."

"Cronin had the same idea," warned Frankie. "You know what happened to him."

Kitchell did not appear to hear her. "Paul Ferguson?" he said into the telephone. "This is Moss Kitchell. I know there's an order to pull me in, but if I'm pinched you'll be the one that will suffer most. If you want to know why, come round to my apartment and I'll tell you."

While he was talking, Frankie had taken a gun from her handbag, and he was in the act of replacing the telephone when she fired at his back, and he staggered and fell.

The real Frankie suppressed a scream in the dark; her pictured self dropped the gun on the floor, close to the dead man's right hand, then flitted up the stairs.

The screen became a blank, the room was flooded with light, and the projector was stopped. Frankie was ghastly beneath her make-up; Ferguson's hands were clenched.

"Frankie," said John gravely, "you're going to end up on the hot seat unless I get what I want."

"What do you want?" she asked tremblingly.

"I want you to write me a story—just the same as if you were still working for the Press. The story of your life, beginning six years ago, when you left the paper and became involved in these rackets. Now if I like your story, there's a bonus in it for you."

"What's the bonus?" "Your life! Of course, you'll have to stand trial for the killing of Moss Kitchell, but I'll see to it that the District Attorney bears down easily. I'll guarantee to save you from the chair if you'll give me a signed story that will help bring convictions."

"H-how about him?" She looked miserably at Ferguson. "I won't write a line if it'll send him to the chair."

"I promise you it won't." "You'll give him a break, too?" "Yes, but not on your account. I'm thinking of somebody else."

"I know," she nodded; and then he opened the door of the now comparatively deserted sitting-room. "There's a typewriter in here and plenty of copy paper."

She looked questioningly at Ferguson. "It's all right, kid," he nodded. "Go ahead."

Slowly she went out past John, and he closed the door and went and rolled up the miniature screen.

"The story she's writing in there is for to-morrow's paper?" questioned Ferguson.

"Well, that depends," John sat down on the arm of the chair Frankie had occupied. "You know, Gene, some of the best stories never get printed. I want to talk to you about Paul. He's a fine boy, Gene. He's on the threshold of great things. My leave of absence will be over soon, and I want to go back to my classes—I miss them. I'll be glad to have somebody like Paul take my place, so I'm going to arrange with Berry to let Paul handle all the prosecutions. He can be the next District Attorney. From then on he has only one handicap."

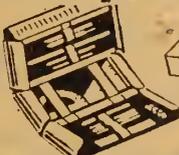

"Me?" murmured Ferguson. "Yes—and your money. You know, you've got an awful lot of it, Gene—too much for Paul to inherit. Have you ever made a will?"

"No," Ferguson shook his head. "I've never got around to it."

February 11th, 1939.

"Well, I've made one out for you." John reached over to the desk and picked up the document Jerry had typed. "Read it!"

Ferguson blinked, but he took the document and began to read it.

"You'll see," said John, "that you've left only a fraction of your estate to Paul."

"What's this?" exclaimed Ferguson. "A trust fund for a family of the name of Butler?"

"Yes, I don't know whether you remember him or not, but he was one of my witnesses. He was killed before he could testify, but I suppose he, more than anybody else, was responsible for the success of this investigation. He left a wife and a couple of kids. I've been sending them money, but I think a trust fund would be more proper, don't you? The rest of the estate will go to a fund to carry on the work of this investigation. I can think of no better use to which your money could be put."

"This will," said Ferguson, "is dated a month ago."

"Yes, I dictated it to-night, but I dated it back. It'll look better that way."

"I see I've appointed you executor." "Would you rather have somebody else?"

Ferguson looked up, and their eyes met.

"No, I think not," he said. "I'll arrange about witnesses later." John held out a fountain-pen. "I think you'd better sign it now."

"You talk as though I were going to die pretty soon."

"We all die pretty soon." The pen was still extended.

"Yes, we do." Ferguson took the pen, and with a perfectly steady hand he signed the will at the desk. The pen was returned to its owner and he rose.

"Well, there are some things I'd like to attend to before the fun begins," he said. "I'll be around when you want me—the way you'd want me."

"I'll trust you to do the right thing," John assured him.

He put on his hat and a scarf, and he moved towards the door; but at the door he turned.

"It's getting pretty late," he said, "and I sent my chauffeur back. I wonder if you'd let me borrow your car?"

"Why, yes, certainly," responded John. "Here are the keys."

Ferguson took the proffered keys. "I hope Frankie's story will prove helpful," he said, and with a sudden impulse offered his hand. "Good-night."

"Good-night," said John, and he gripped the hand.

"The End of It"

FERGUSON went out through the crowded hall into the garden and round the side of the house to an open garage where John's modest saloon was standing. He had lit a cigarette, and was getting in behind the wheel, when a newly arrived prisoner in the hall caught hold of Paul's arm.

"I've got to see Lindsay!" he blurted. "It's on the level, I tell you. They've got the finger on Lindsay, and all the cops in the world can't stop it!"

Paul rushed the fellow into the study. "John," he shouted, "this man says there's a plot to kill you before the night's over!"

"What?" John was incredulous. But the prisoner cried:

"It's true, Mr. Lindsay! I don't want no part of it. They rigged up your car with a bomb. It's set to go off the minute you touch the starter!"

February 11th, 1932.

"A bomb in my car?" gasped John.

At that moment the sound of a violent explosion reached their ears. Ferguson had stretched out a hand to the self-starter of the car, and he and the car were blown to pieces.

"That's it!" screamed the prisoner. "That's your car! Somebody's been killed! They'll blame me for this, but I didn't do it! Please, Mr. Lindsay, I tipped you off—gimme a break!"

Inspector Gleason burst into the room, and John bundled the fellow over to him.

"Take charge of this man," he said hoarsely. "I'll talk to him later."

Frankie dashed in from the sitting-room as Gleason swept his captive out into the hall.

"What was that?" she shrilled. "Somebody placed a bomb in Professor Lindsay's car," Paul replied.

John walked slowly over to him.

"Paul," he said, "it was your father. He just borrowed the keys to my car."

"You sent him out there to be killed!" accused Frankie, beside herself with grief. "You killed Eugene Ferguson!"

Paul was standing as though stunned. John looked from him to the half-crazed girl, and he said:

"I didn't know anything about the car. Not a thing! But he did, and he had courage enough to choose that way. He had to die some way—we both knew that. I left it to him. What could I do? Hound him to the chair? Put him in gaol for the rest of his life, and let Paul—"

He broke off and put a hand upon Paul's bowed shoulders.

"He did have courage, Paul," he said gently. "He just took the wrong direction. You'll keep on going, and you'll go a long way."

Paul squared his shoulders. "Thank you, Professor," he said bravely. "I've got work to do."

And he went out past Jerry, who had entered unnoticed.

Frankie drifted back to her task with tears streaming down her cheeks, and Jerry shivered.

"Oh, John, it's all so horrible!" she exclaimed.

John took her into his arms.

"It's all right, honey," he soothed. "This is the end of it."

On the first day of the new term at Burlington University, John walked arm-in-arm with Jerry across the campus to the College of Law, smoking a pipe and at peace with the world.

"The old school!" he said, with a wave of the hand, as they reached the foot of the wide stone steps. "You know, it's great to be back, Jerry."

"Yes," said she wryly, "after a nice, long, restful vacation. Yes, there's nothing like it!"

"Now don't you worry." He wagged a finger at her. "We'll have that second honeymoon yet. You just keep packed and ready. We're going!"

"Yes?" she doubted. "When?"

"Well, my next Sabbatical Year—"

"That's six years off—oh, John!"

"What's the matter?" he asked blankly. "Oh!"

He had put the pipe in his pocket, and the lining of the pocket was on fire.

"THE LAST OF THE CAVALRY"

said "Yes" to Joe Schuyler she found an empty room. The colonel's daughter had left her packing to say good-bye to Dike, whom she knew she loved in spite of everything.

Captain Schuyler appeared in the court-room just as General Matthews was about to announce the verdict. The prisoner held himself very erect. He had said good-bye to Julie, but he felt he could face an unkind world and its criticisms knowing that she still loved him.

Then, to everybody's surprise, Captain Schuyler strode forward and asked permission of the court to produce some new evidence that had a great bearing on the case. The general said it was most irregular, but gave him permission to proceed. Captain Schuyler asked that Sergeant Harry Ross be recalled to the witness stand.

There was now a tense air in the hushed room as the sergeant, looking worried and perplexed, took the stand.

"Sergeant Ross, how long have you served the cavalry?"

"Fourteen years, sir."

Captain Schuyler then proceeded by questions to obtain the information that Sergeant Ross had been with four cavalry units to which the tank, under the charge of Captain Conger and Sergeant Hennessy, had been posted.

He asked for these transfers because he had a personal dislike of the motorized unit and a grudge against Sergeant Hennessy. Ross admitted that Three Star was always ribbing him, and that once they had had a fight. On parade Sergeant Ross had attempted to speak to Colonel Armstrong, and the reason was because he feared for the colonel's life if he entered the tank.

Captain Schuyler faced the general.

"I accuse Sergeant Ross of tampering with the tank controls," he stated clearly. "And being primarily responsible for the deaths of Colonel Armstrong and Sergeant Hennessy."

Captain Schuyler went on to inform the court that when Three Star had died in his arms he had mentioned two words—the name of Harry Ross. He had been to the quarters of Sergeant Ross and found a steel saw. There were markings on it that were exactly like those made on the connecting rod.

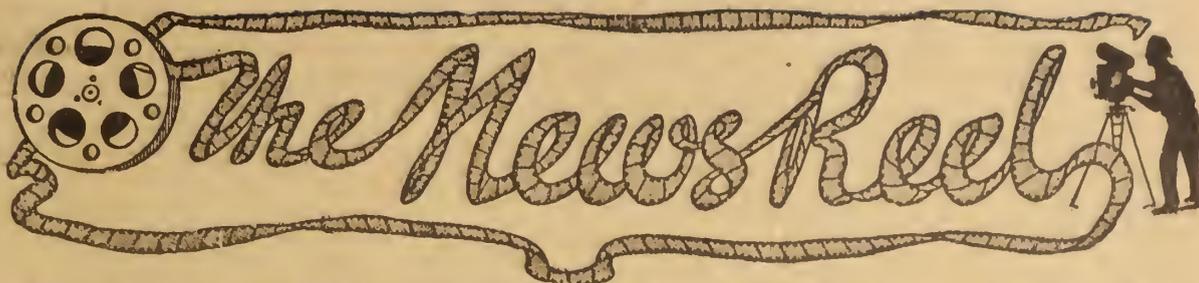

Sergeant Ross broke down and confessed. He had not meant to kill anyone, but just to damage the tank so that it would be discredited and the cavalry saved from extinction.

General Matthews ordered the sergeant to be taken to the guard house, and brought in a verdict there and then of "Not guilty of negligence" against Captain Dike Conger.

The general did consider taking action against Captain Schuyler for not coming forward before, but he agreed after a consultation with Major Kennett that the best thing would be a transfer of Captain Schuyler to another unit.

And when Captain Conger went into an ante-room he found Julie Armstrong waiting for him. She held out her arms to him.

Chester Morris Teaching Vic McLaglen to be a Magician

McLaglen and Morris, Magicians Extraordinary.

That will be the calling card of film stars Victor McLaglen and Chester Morris, if plans being formulated now materialise as expected.

Morris is a magician of considerable fame, having just recently returned from a two-month theatrical tour of America, performing amazing feats of legerdemain. His interest in the "magic" art is such that even on the set of his current picture, "Pacific Liner," he thrills the cast with remarkable exhibitions of his skill.

McLaglen became so enthused when he discovered he could perform certain bits of magic that he asked Morris if the latter would act as his instructor. Morris agreed, and progress has been so rapid, according to Chester, that McLaglen is now qualified to mystify any audience.

Right Man, Wrong Film

- John Carradine is one busy villain. He often works in as many as three pictures simultaneously and keeps his dates with movie companies in a small notebook so that he can keep his hectic schedule straight. In three years he has never got an appointment twisted up.

A few days ago, though, he reported promptly at 9 o'clock on Stage 6 at 20th Century-Fox, as per instructions from the casting office.

Director Allan Dwan spotted him from a distance and shouted that the company was ready to shoot. Carradine hurried on the set, and gasped when he met Miles Mander dressed as Cardinal Richelieu and Gloria Stuart as Queen Anne.

"Where in the world did you get that costume?" asked Dwan.

Carradine looked nonplussed. "I guess I made a slight mistake," he said. "I thought I was to kill Jesse James to-day."

"No," said Dwan, "you're to kiss the Cardinal's hand and choke Gloria Stuart. This is the 'Three Musketeers' set, not 'Jesse James.'"

Carradine did a quick change of clothing and expressions, and proceeded to choke the beautiful Miss Stuart. He killed Jesse James on the following day.

Names May Hurt

If you were named Jonathan Apple-twitch how would you like it if you went to a cinema and saw a despicable character named Jonathan Appletwitch leering at you from the screen?

You would not like it at all. And neither would the company that made the picture. Because at any time you, as Mr. Appletwitch, might work up such a resentment that you would sue the studio, and would stand a good chance of getting substantial damages.

That's the reason, nowadays, why so many pictures are preceded by the announcement:

"The events and characters depicted in this photoplay are entirely fictional, and any similarity with actual persons, either living or dead, is not intentional, but purely coincidental."

The studios hope, with this, that anyone who might be inclined to resentment over a similarity of names to their own, will realise it is all in good fun, and that certainly nothing personal was intended.

For the most, nobody is inclined to resent a duplication of names when the picture which employs it is just out-and-out fiction. It's the movies with historical basis or background, or woven around contemporary facts that cause producers to get the jitters.

In the former category is Samuel Goldwyn's latest film, "The Cowboy and the Lady." About the only fact involved in this presentation is that there are cowboys, and there are ladies. But instead of having his research department spend weeks thumbing telephone directories so as to develop a spurious name, he simply called Gary Cooper, the Cowboy, "Stretch," and Merle Oberon, the Lady, "Mary Smith." Mr. Goldwyn is of the theory that there are so many real Mary Smiths that any one of them would have some difficulty proving that she was the Mary Smith referred to.

Ever since a company was successfully sued for an enormous sum because a character still alive was represented on the screen, the studios have been very shy of anything smacking of history for their films.

Even though a person is not labelled in a screen play he can still make things difficult for the film company. The person may charge invasion of privacy or embarrassment, and if he can prove either of these it makes no difference that the producer did it unwittingly.

Having exercised all the precautions that are now part of the regular studio routine, Goldwyn does not anticipate any trouble with "The Cowboy and the Lady"—unless all the Mary Smith's of the world unite.

"He's Just Bing"

The old adage that a "prophet is not without honour save in his own country" is either true in Hollywood or else it applies in one particular case.

That particular case is Bing Crosby, who is in the news just now for two reasons. Firstly, "Sing You Sinners," the film in which he co-stars with Fred MacMurray, was generally released, and secondly, his latest Paramount picture, "Paris Honeymoon," had its West End premiere at the same time.

In Hollywood an aura of glamour surrounds such stars as Claudette Colbert, Carole Lombard, Gary Cooper, etc., because they are stars.

But Bing Crosby serenely goes his placid way. Few people in Hollywood realise that Crosby, at the box-office, ranks high among the top ten stars of Hollywood. About the only people who fully appreciate it are studio executives and producers who cast covetous eyes at the receipts of the latest Crosby picture and indulge in a mad scramble for his services.

Crosby's contract with Paramount provides that he has the right to make one picture a year for any other studio or independent producer he may choose. So great is his value as a box-office lure that every studio competes for that extra picture.

But to newspapermen, sportsmen, fellow actors and other Hollywoodites, a mention of Bing as a star is almost an afterthought.

"He's just Bing," is the general attitude.

Bing himself insists that any story is more important to the public than the actors portraying that story on the screen. Because of this, it was several years before Paramount could get him to include in his contract a provision whereby the studio could give him star billing—that is, to announce his name above the title of a picture.

When Crosby finally consented to such a clause, he inserted the proviso that such billing could only be given with his express permission. Now the studio finds it is as hard to get the permission as it was to get the clause into the contract!

So in Hollywood Crosby is accepted as an easy-going, friendly, sports-loving chap with a penchant for wearing old clothes and letting his beard grow if he feels like it. He would much rather watch one of his racehorses work out than attend a business conference involving a million pounds.

This "can't be bothered" attitude of Crosby has won him the reputation in Hollywood of being lazy. The reputation is not deserved. There are few actors—not excepting stars—who work harder than Crosby.

One day a week is spent in making gramophone records. He has his radio programme, which means editing material, rehearsing, and a lot of other work. He has his film work. And to crown everything, he is the head of several business enterprises, ranging from hotels and flats to gold mines and managing actors, singers and prize fighters.

Despite his high rank as a motion picture player, Crosby is honestly convinced he is "just another guy" on the screen. When the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences asked Crosby to present one of its major trophies at its annual banquet—the recipient was to be a close friend of the crooner—Crosby said:

"I can't do that. I appreciate the request, but it ought to go to someone who has some real standing on the screen."

And he named several stars, and all of whom rated far below him as a box-office draw.

So in Hollywood, Crosby is "just Bing." But in all parts of the world the fans flock to the theatres to see the latest picture of this "groaner," as he is affectionately called by some of his intimate friends.

Amateur Rugby League Launched in Hollywood

Sponsored by Victor McLaglen and supported by most of the English actors in Hollywood, a twelve-team amateur Rugby league composed of graduates of California colleges and universities will make its debut this month. Games will be played each Sunday at the McLaglen Stadium in Los Angeles.

The idea of the league, according to McLaglen, is to give football players an opportunity to continue playing as amateurs after they leave college.

Among the film stars who have promised their support to the league are Ronald Colman, Herbert Marshall, Errol Flynn, David Niven, and Lionel Barrymore, now teamed with McLaglen in "Song of the West," at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. McLaglen played Rugby as a youngster attending school in London.

Meek, But Not Mild

Although Meek by name, Donald Meek, the well-known Hollywood character actor, is certainly not meek by nature.

Seven men in the Walter Wanger "Stagecoach" cast are nursing sore right hands because each thought Meek's muscles matched the type of roles he plays.

The bone bruising began when Thomas Mitchell challenged Meek to a hand-squeezing duel. After a few seconds, Mitchell's face reddened and suddenly his knees buckled. Bertou Churchill next tried Meek's grip and the result was similarly painful. Others, being half sceptical and half curious tried to "out-grip" the smallest member of the cast and walked away chagrined and flexing their bruised fingers.

When it was over, Meek explained that early in his career he had been an acrobat and had learned the trick of applying pressure at the points where another's muscles couldn't counteract it. Not even husky John Wayne or George Bancroft or 270 pound Andy Devine could free themselves from timid-looking Mr. Meek's iron grip.

Now the five-foot-six-inch actor, who invariably plays roles that match his name and appearance, is known to his studio associates as "Killer Meek."

"Son of Frankenstein"

Streamlined horror, 1939-model, stalks before the cameras at Universal Studios. It is "Son of Frankenstein," presenting three of the world's master horror personalities—Basil Rathbone, Boris Karloff and Bela Lugosi. The thrilliest, chilliest, most terrorising cinema conception ever to spring from the brain of a scenarist is a sequel to the two former Universal shockers, which since their first presentation have been revived again and again with ever increasing success. "Frankenstein," made in 1931, and "The Bride of Frankenstein," which came to the screen in 1935.

The whole "Frankenstein" business first started in 1816. Lord Byron, Polidori, Percy Bysshe Shelley, and his wife, Mary Shelley, agreed that each should try to write a ghost-story. They were spending the summer as neighbours in Switzerland and certain volumes of that class of literature, translated from the French and German, had fallen into their hands. Byron began a tale, a fragment of which was afterwards printed at the end of his "Mazeppa," and Shelley began one founded on his early life. Polidori's also, was never completed. Mrs. Shelley's endeavour alone saw the light, and in a shape that bids fair to live as one of the weirdest conceptions in our language.

"Frankenstein" proved fertile material for the screen. James Whale directed the film version with a cast which included Colin Clive, as the original Dr. Frankenstein, Mac Clark as his wife, Boris Karloff in his famous make-up as the Monster and John Boles in an important supporting rôle. James Whale also directed the successor, "The Bride of Frankenstein" with Colin Clive again as Henry Frankenstein and Boris Karloff once more spreading death, destruction and terror through the picture.

Valerie Hobson had the rôle of Frankenstein's wife, and Elsa Lanchester played one of her most famous rôles in the film as the bride of the monster.

The new "Son of Frankenstein" cast boasts, in addition to Basil Rathbone, Boris Karloff and Bela Lugosi such well-known screen personalities as Lionel Atwill, Josephine Hutchinson, Donnie Dunagan, Edgar Norton and Emma Dunne in its principal rôles. The locale is Hungary, and the time the present. Every art of the modern cinema has been used to create weird and wonderful horror effects never before seen on any screen. For instance, the sets are an integral part of the dramatic element of the story. Created by Jack Otterson, they are designed for their psychological effect upon the observer. Following no recognised architectural scheme, they present an array of planes and masses, disproportionate and eerie, contributing to the ominous air which hangs over the locale, the ancient castle of the Frankenstein. Lighting and photography will take advantage of every angle of these sets. Long and ghostly shadows will stalk across walls and floors and menace from high positions on the walls. Lightning will flash, thunder roar, and flesh-tingling screams will echo through cavernous halls and down tortuous underground passages.

The busiest man on the set is Jack Pierce, head make-up man of Universal studios. He it is whose imagination and artistry produced the original monster. He gets to the studio at 5 a.m., and for the ensuing four hours is busy applying the make-up to Boris Karloff—and he needs another hour in the evening to take the make-up off the monster-man. But it is Boris Karloff who bears the brunt, for the completed make-up and costume weighs him down with sixty-four unyielding pounds.

SERGEANT MADDEN

A stirring drama of a policeman-father and his crook son

"SERGEANT MADDEN"

Patrolman

IN whatever town or city your home may be, there is an unsung hero on your street to whom you owe your security, sometimes your very life. Yet seldom do you know his name. Seldom do you know him other than as "the cop on the beat."

This is the story of such a hero—a policeman who was destined to choose between love for his son and devotion to duty—a policeman who lived by the watchword of the New York Force, "Faithful Unto Death."

Shaun Madden was his name—Patrolman Shaun Madden, two hundred pounds of burly Irish-American, six feet and a half inch from the crown of his bullet head to the heels of his outsize boots—a man not blessed with a handsome countenance, but with a face that radiated geniality and kindness, and possessed of a heart that was proportionately as big as his hulking frame.

It was on a certain summer's day in the tenth year of his service as a member of the Force that Patrolman Madden attended a simple but impressive ceremony at the flower-bedecked grave of a friend and comrade who had answered to the name of Albert Boylan.

Present with Shaun Madden at that ceremony were his wife Mary, his twelve-year-old boy, Dennis, and the ten-year-old son of the late Patrolman Boylan. Also assembled there, and drawn up in ranks, were a considerable number of police officers, representative of the city's far-flung precincts, and close to the grave itself was the Commissioner of the Force, chief of the Department responsible for the maintenance of law and order in New York.

"We are here to-day," the Commissioner was saying solemnly, "to pay our final tribute to Albert Boylan, who died from gunshot wounds received in a riot at Battery Park. He died on duty—in the service of human safety. To this same service each man who wears a police shield is dedicated—by day, by night, through all emergencies and all weathers."

He ran his gaze over the faces of the stalwart officers who constituted the bulk of his listeners.

"God grant that none of you may ever be required to face death as Albert Boylan did," he added in a fervent tone. "But should you be—God grant you Albert Boylan's courage."

With that he moved towards the spot where the Maddens and the late Patrolman Boylan's little son were standing, and, leaning down, he addressed himself to the latter—a forlorn and diminutive little figure who had lost his mother some months before and who, orphaned now by the slaying of his father, was the picture of grief and misery.

"Albert Boylan, junior," the Commissioner murmured, producing a gleaming medal, "you are the late Patrolman Boylan's only living kin, and, in recognition of your father's courage in the face of death, I hereby award him, posthumously, the highest honour that can be bestowed by the city he served."

August 5th, 1939.

Sergeant Madden

The medal was pinned on the boy's coat, and the youngster, eyeing it tearfully, yet with pride, when Shaun Madden lifted him fondly in his arms and held him close to his barrel chest. Then the Commissioner bent a glance on the big Irish-American cop.

"Patrolman Madden," he said, "if you'll bring the lad to my office after the ceremony, I'll arrange for payment of his father's pension money and see that he's entered into a suitable institution."

Shaun Madden shuffled his large feet awkwardly.

"If ye don't mind, sir," he proposed in a deep-toned, husky voice wherein the brogue of the "Ould Country" was still detectable, "if ye don't mind, sir, Mary an' me—that is, me, wife an' me—we'd like to keep the little fellow."

"To adopt him, sir—if we may," interposed Mary Madden, a pretty little woman with an expression of infinite sweetness on her pink-and-white features.

The Commissioner looked at the two of them approvingly, appreciatively.

"Bless you both," he said.

Thus it was that little Al Boylan took up his abode with the Maddens in their humble Brooklyn home, and he had been "one of the family" for about six months when one rainy evening his adopted father came in off his beat with a bundle hidden under his waterproof cape.

Shaun Madden's son Dennis and young Al were not in the house when the beefy patrolman put in an appearance. They were out playing together somewhere or other, having become inseparable, bosom companions. As for Mrs. Madden, she was in the living-room laying the table for supper, and looked round in mild reproach as Shaun's soaking-wet police cap dropped on the table, having been pitched thither by the incoming officer of the Law.

"Shaun Madden," she protested,

"how many times must I tell you not to throw your hat on the table? With a couple of boys to look after, I've got enough to do without going around picking up things that you—"

She stopped, noting the bulge of the object that was hidden under his cape, and a suspicious frown gathered on her forehead.

"Shaun, what's that you've got there?" she demanded, knowing how soft-hearted he was. "If it's one of those stray animals you're always finding on your beat and bringing in here, filthy with fleas—I'll—"

Shaun did not let her finish. Throwing open his cape, he revealed that self-same object which the waterproof garment had concealed, and Mary Madden at once perceived that it was no stray animal, but an infant child that was smuggling comfortably in the crook of her husband's left arm.

Mary Madden gave vent to an exclamation and hurried across to him, her expression becoming tender as she peeped at that small bundle of humanity.

"Oh, Shaun!" she said pityingly. "Someone left it deserted at your post."

The patrolman nodded. His ugly but likeable face was illuminated by a look of benign compassion.

"Yes, Mary," he answered. "Some poor soul that had come to the end of her tether. She left a note in the basket where the little darlin' was lyin'. 'I cannot buy food. I yield my child to the kindness of man and the mercy of God.' That was what the note said, Mary. And I—I was thinkin', Mary—couldn't we just keep the little creature? I took it to the station house, intendin' to turn it over to the matron there, but I got to thinkin' that 'twas always four boys an' two girls that we wanted—and this hein' a girl, Mary—well, that makes half the family, you know."

"Shaun, are you crazy?" his wife expostulated. "What are we doing here—running an orphans' home?"

Shaun Madden assumed a mournful and regretful air.

"Well," he reflected sadly, "I can—I can take it back so it'll go to the Foundling Home, of course—where it won't have the love of any parents or anything like that. Mind ye, I'm not sayin' anything agin the Foundling Home. 'Tis a fine institution. But at Christmas time, for instance, the little ones there don't have much of a celebration. Nobody brings them any toys or anything, ye know, and—"

He knew how to play upon the heart-strings of his wife and arouse in her the same sentimental emotions to which he himself was so prone.

"Oh, now don't say I'd be condemnin' the child to a Christmas like that," Mary Madden interrupted in a pained voice.

"Well, I wouldn't say 'condemnin',' Mary," he rejoined, a beam spreading across his features. "But the child would be happy with us—"

Again he was cut short—not by his wife this time, but by an urgent knocking on the front door of the house—and as he opened that door a young woman stumbled across the threshold, a poorly-dressed but respectable-looking young woman whose pallid face wore an expression of mingled desperation and distress.

"Let me see my baby!" she cried wildly. "Let me see my baby!"

She reached for the infant that Shaun was holding, but the burly Irishman recoiled.

"Your baby?" he reiterated. "What do ye mean?"

"Ye watched you pick her up," the woman jerked out, and now he noticed that her accent was as reminiscent of the Emerald Isle as his own. "Then I followed you."

"Ye did?" he countered. "And why—after you desertin' it? How do I know it's your baby, anyway? Listen to me, woman. There was a note pinned to her little woollen jacket here. Now you tell me just what was written on that note, and then I'll be after believin' she's yours."

The woman swiftly quoted the contents of the missive to which he had referred.

"I cannot buy food. I yield my child to the kindness of man and the mercy of God." That's what I wrote.

"They are the identical words," Shaun muttered. "She is yours, sure enough. But have ye no heart, woman—deserting a little baby like this?"

"I looked for a job," the woman responded hopelessly. "But no luck. And her father's dead."

Mary Madden came forward.

"Have you no folks?" she asked the mother of the child.

"Yes—an uncle in Ireland," was the reply. "I tried to beg the ninety dollars to get myself on a boat with my little Eileen and go back to the Old Country. My uncle is poor, but he has a roof for us if nothing else. And maybe I could find work in Ireland when I get stronger. I—I—"

Her voice failed her, and suddenly she swayed forward—would have fallen to the floor if Shaun had not caught her with his right arm.

"Mary," he ejaculated to his wife in a tone of concern, "Mary, help me to get her to bed in the spare room. The woman's ill. Like enough she's been without food for days. And us keepin' her standin' here talkin'. Here, take the child, Mary, and I'll carry the little one's mother through."

A few seconds later the woman had been laid on the bed in the spare room and her baby placed beside her. Then, leaving his wife to make the exhausted stranger comfortable, Shaun Madden returned to the living-room to set some food on a tray.

It was not only food that he set on that tray, however. When Mary Madden presently rejoined him she found ninety dollars in U.S. currency notes stuffed in a sugar bowl which Shaun had placed on the tray—notes he had impulsively taken from a little store of savings he and his wife kept in the house.

"Shaun!" Mary Madden breathed.

"Aw, Mary," he said apologetically, "it's the price of a ticket to Ireland for the lady and the little one. I know it's most of our savin's. But we can spare it, can't we?"

His wife was silent for a moment. Then she slipped an arm about his broad shoulders.

"Why not?" she answered with a smile. "You've a safe, sure job, and 'tis promotion you'll be getting sooner or later. And if we were saving this money for a rainy day—well, it's just pouring down rain for little Eileen and Mrs. Daly—for that's the fine-sounding Irish name of the poor soul, Shaun. Mrs. Daly is the name of her, she says."

Without another word she picked up the tray and retraced her steps to the spare room with it, and it was shortly after she had passed into that room and closed the door behind her that young Dennis Madden and the diminutive Al Boylan came into the house.

They were not alone. They were accompanied by another youngster who was sporting a black eye—and by a formidable-looking woman of wrathful aspect.

The woman was a Mrs. McGillivray, a neighbour of the Maddens; the lad with the black eye was her son Diou; and Mrs. McGillivray confronted Shaun indignantly.

"Mr. Madden," she announced, "I wonder you can hold your head up with this boy Dennis of yours almost killin' others, and Albert Boylan here helpin' him in the work."

Shaun drew down his brows and eyed Dennis and Al severely, observing as he did so that both of them were equipped with toy pistols.

"What's this ye've been up to?" he demanded.

It was Dennis who responded. Tall for his years, black of hair, with blue-grey eyes that held a wilful expression and a chin that had an obstinate and belligerent thrust to it, Dennis Madden was a constant source of worry to his father because of his unruliness, which sometimes bordered on ferocity.

"We was playin' cops an' robbers," the policeman's son proclaimed hotly. "An' do you know what that rat Dion did? He tried to kill little Al—one o' my cops! When Al fought back, Dion got his rod away an' tried to hammer him on the head with it, so I moved in and gave Dion the works!"

"Two to one," Mrs. McGillivray put in scornfully. "Two to one, Mr. Madden. And Dennis there two years older than Dion and half as big again—yes, and the bully of ev'ry boy in the block!"

Shaun was prompt to come to a decision and mete out justice. Despite protests on their part, Dennis and Al were compelled to bend over and touch their toes; and without being permitted to return the "compliment," each received a lusty kick in the seat of the pants from the foot of the scion of the clan McGillivray, after which that youngster and his mother departed in a more or less satisfied manner.

Mary Madden reappearing in the living-room a little while later, Shaun told her of the complaint that had been lodged against Dennis and Al. Then, the four of them sitting down to supper and Dennis behaving in a truculent fashion, Shaun ordered him to leave the table half-way through the meal.

"'Tis off to bed ye can go," he declared, "without eatin' the fine custard your mother has made for ye. And see that ye don't make too much noise gettin' up in the mornin', for we've guests in the house this night, and I don't want them scared out of their wits by your carryings-on. Albert, you can stay and have your custard."

But Al had risen immediately after Dennis had slid sullenly off his chair.

"I'm not hungry any more, Pop," he said meekly, yet with a kind of quiet resolution, and, as Dennis went off to his bed-room, so little Al retired to his.

Shaun and Mary Madden exchanged a glance.

"Albert just worships our Dennis," Mary observed in a meditative tone. "He wanted that custard badly, but he denied himself out of some queer sense of loyalty. Have you noticed, too, how he imitates Dennis in everything he does?"

"Yes," Shaun grunted, "and I don't know that Dennis is a very good example, either."

A frown wrinkled Mrs. Madden's forehead.

"Dennis isn't really a bad boy, of course," she said in a voice that challenged argument on that score. "But he's so impetuous and quick-tempered that there are times when I feel uneasy about him. He does things without thinking—whether he hurts himself or others."

"He does that," Shaun assented. "But don't you be worryin', Mary. He's got a great training ahead of him. He'll learn his discipline in a Police Academy. They've taken many an ill-tempered young loafer and made a man out of him."

He heaved himself out of his chair all at once, and made his way to his son's bed-room, and, finding the boy already in his pyjamas, but not yet between the sheets, he sat down on the edge of the bed and lifted Dennis on to his knee.

"So 'tis cops and robbers ye've been playin' to-day, is it?" the patrolman said, with no trace of his former austerity. "Well, me boy, playin' at cops is a fine game. 'Tis something you'll be proud to be playin' all your life."

"But since ye're startin' in kind of young," he added, "why, I think that probably I'd better give ye some of the rules of the game."

Dennis partially stifled a yawn—not a yawn of mere drowsiness, but a yawn that implied disinterest. He knew what his father was going to say. He had heard it all before.

"Now there's all kinds of cops," Patrolman Madden proceeded. "There's wild cops—and there's tame cops—and there's cops that are all stomach and no brains. But mostly all of 'em are good cops."

Perched on his father's knee, Dennis began to swing one leg.

"Sure, mostly all of 'em are good cops," Shaun Madden repeated. "And here's the first rule of the game that every cop has to master if he wants to be a good one. He must learn to hold his temper—always."

Dennis continued to swing his leg, in a style that indicated he found the topic of conversation wearisome.

The New Cop

THE years had passed, and, grown to handsome, self-assured manhood, Dennis Madden was still listening to advice on how to become a good policeman—and was still swinging his leg in a bored fashion as he listened.

The scene was a lecture room in the New York Police Academy, and six-foot-three-inch Dennis Madden was one of a class of students who were being addressed by an officer known as Lieutenant Niles.

"One of the most important things a probationary patrolman must learn in this academy," Niles was saying, "is how to enforce the law. A policeman's mission is to find the suspected criminal and arrest him. Nine out of every ten men in prison are there because another thief talked to a police officer. Making friends on your beat is very important. A successful policeman is wary, shrewd—above all, friendly—"

He paused. The session was almost at an end, and Niles had been employing the last few minutes of it to deliver a homily which was likely to profit the students if they bore it in mind after they had ultimately graduated.

Most of the young men in the class were hanging on his every word. Niles had noticed, however, that Dennis Madden was paying little or no attention. The latter was reclining in his chair with an expression of ironic tedium on his good-looking face, an expression which the lieutenant had seen there on many occasions since Dennis had entered the police college, and which never failed to nettles the officer.

"The class is dismissed," Niles suddenly snapped out with an abruptness that took the students by surprise. "But you, Madden, will stay here and copy five pages of rules and regulations."

Dennis Madden stared at him.

"Why, sir?"

"Because you haven't been listening to a word I've said," was the curt reply.

Young Madden's temper, so noticeable in him when he had been a boy, revealed itself in a flicker that appeared momentarily in his eyes. When he spoke his voice carried a hint of that temper, and a touch of impudence as well.

"Why should I listen?" he retorted. "I've heard it all before."

"Fifteen pages" Niles announced tersely.

"Lieutenant Niles," Dennis Madden said, suppressing his ire, "my father and adopted brother are waiting for me downstairs. We've got to meet someone coming in on a boat. Can I copy the fifteen pages to-morrow?"

"You can not!"

The other students were filing out. Gritting his teeth Dennis turned to one of them.

"Pete," he requested savagely, "will you tell my father and Al to go ahead to the boat? Tell them I've been detained—for being bored by Lieutenant Niles."

Niles clenched his hands at that.

"Insolence, is it?" he ground out. "I'll report that to the inspector, Madden!"

Dennis glowered defiance. He was in an ugly mood now. He had wanted particularly to meet that incoming boat with his father and Al, for it was a liner which was bringing from Ireland that same Eileen Daly whom Shaun Madden had found on his beat that rainy night years before—Eileen Daly, now a winsomely beautiful young woman, as had been evident from a snapshot she had recently sent to Shaun.

Her mother had never forgotten the kindness of Shaun and Mary Madden. Following her return to Ireland, Mrs. Daly, and Eileen as well when she had learned to write, had kept up a regular correspondence with the Maddens. And Shaun had treasured the affectionate letters that had been received from them—especially two of those letters—one a letter penned some years before by Mrs. Daly and congratulating him on his promotion to the rank of sergeant—the other a letter of condolence, written by Eileen when she had learned of Mary Madden's death, which had occurred shortly after her own mother had passed away.

Eileen's uncle had survived her mother by a year or two. Then, just recently, Shaun Madden had learned from Eileen that her uncle had died as well, and he had promptly sent the girl her fare to New York, insisting that she should come out there to keep house for himself and "the boys."

It was a proposition that the boys had thoroughly approved—Dennis with particular enthusiasm, for he had an eye for a pretty face, and if her picture did not lie Eileen Daly was what he was pleased to call a "winner." And possessing a streak of vanity in his character he had been anxious to figure prominently in her eyes and to monopolize her attention when she disembarked.

Now, thanks to Lieutenant Niles, or August 5th, 1939.

rather to his own intractable nature, he was denied the chance of being present at the quayside when her boat docked. Instead, he was fated to receive a severe reprimand from the inspector to whom Niles had referred, and to copy out those accursed fifteen pages of rules and regulations.

Dennis Madden's meeting with Eileen Daly was therefore delayed, and happy to the point of dissolving into tears as a girl will when overwhelmed with feelings of joy and gratitude, she had been installed under Shaun's roof for more than an hour by the time Dennis came home from the academy.

Her picture had not lied, unless the failure of a snapshot to do a person justice might be termed a lie. Eileen Daly was beautiful. From the crown of her blonde head to the toes of her trim little feet she was bewitching femininity, and in the days that succeeded her arrival in New York the two Maddens and Albert Boylan speedily learned that she was as lovable in manner as she was lovely to look at.

It was small wonder that Sergeant Shaun Madden bragged to the boys down at the station-house of the "colleen" who had come to grace his menage. It was small wonder that Al Boylan, who had developed into a fine, clean-looking young fellow and who was eagerly looking forward to entering the Police Academy, acquired a habit of gazing at Eileen with mute adoration whenever he thought her eyes weren't on him.

And it was small wonder that Dennis, devoid of the shyness that distinguished Al, paid court to Eileen with a fervour and a persistence that he had never deigned to display for any other girl who had ever interested him.

Meanwhile, despite his unpopularity with lecturers and instructors, despite his inattentiveness in class and his frank air of being bored by the curriculum, Dennis Madden was making reasonable enough progress as a student at the Police Academy. In point of fact, they could teach him little there that he had not already learned long since from his father, parrot-fashion.

Marksmanship was the one feature that was new to him in the course, and he proved to have a natural aptitude for shooting. Indeed, on the night he and a batch of other students graduated at Madison Square Garden in the presence of applauding friends and relatives he received a trophy pistol in a case bearing the following inscription:

Awarded by the Police Department
New York City to Dennis Madden for Marksmanship.

It was a memorable night. But less memorable were the days that ensued when Dennis Madden was assigned to a precinct wherein his father had once tramped a beat. Those days were spent by Dennis in ignoring the first lesson he should have learned—the lesson of keeping his temper and maintaining a friendly attitude towards the people with whom he came in contact while on patrol.

One part of his beat took him into one of the poorer localities of the city. Here he pestered the residents, losing no opportunity of "booking" them for trivial breaches of New York's by-laws. His object was to gain quick promotion, as he thought, by securing as many charges to his credit as he could; and one afternoon there occurred an incident which led him to contemplate the prospect of effecting a really worth-while coup.

He had just ascertained that a child playing on the side-walk with a mongrel pup possessed no licence for the animal, and as a result of this discovery had called up his station to request that a dog-catcher's truck should be sent down to pick up that animal and several others which he believed to be unlicensed. And he was turning from the police telephone post from which he had made the call when he heard someone close at hand volunteer a derisive comment.

"Lovely work if you can get it. A dog detective, huh?"

Dennis Madden swung round angrily, and saw that the speaker was an insolent-looking youth of seventeen whom he knew as Punchy—an unwashed product of the slums who seemed to have a "down" on cops and who was suspected of being a petty sneak-thief.

Punchy was with another youth of his own ilk, a kid who answered to the name of Milt. It was to the latter that Punchy had addressed his jeering remark concerning Dennis, and the pair of them were now grinning offensively.

It was not the first time the new cop had been annoyed by Punchy, and he saw red. In an instant he had clutched him.

"I've had enough from you!" he barked. "You and your wisecracks! How'd you like to have one shoved right back down your throat—like this!"

Lifting one hand, he planted it on Punchy's mouth and sent him reeling with a thrust of his arm. Back went Punchy to a distance of several yards, but recovering himself and revealing a temper as hot as the stalwart patrolman's, he rushed at Dennis like a terrier.

Full-grown man as he was, and towering head and shoulders above the slum-bred youth, Dennis easily checked the onset.

"Oh, cop fighter, are you?" he bit out, gripping Punchy by the front of his tattered shirt. "All right, you asked for it."

With that he swung him round and gave him another push—one considerably more violent than the first, and one that laid Punchy flat on his back in a pool of mire in the roadway.

Snarling like the vicious little gutter-snipe that he was, Punchy attempted to scramble up with the idea of launching a fresh attack, but a man suddenly appeared beside him and set his foot on the youth's chest—a lean, flashily-dressed man with a sallow face, a slit of a mouth and a pair of eyes that resembled those of a ferret.

"Beat it, stupid," that individual said in a thin voice that was as incisive as a rapier. "Beat it."

Punchy took one look at him, then rose to his feet in a slinking fashion and made himself scarce, being accompanied by his crony Milt. As for the flashily-dressed man who had so summarily ordered Punchy to depart, he strolled over to where Dennis Madden was standing.

"The dumb kid," he observed, nodding in the direction Punchy had taken. "He don't know he's alive. But say, Madden, he's my girl-friend's brother, so go a little easy on him, will you?"

"I went easy on him," Dennis answered grimly. "I was just petting him. Wait until he cracks loose next time."

The other man's ferret eyes narrowed a trifle.

"D'you know who I am?" he queried significantly.

Dennis Madden knew who he was all right—knew him as a racketeer who rented a luxury apartment in a district adjoining the slum area amid whose squalor the two of them now stood—knew him as a man who would have been behind prison bars long ago but for the services of a smart lawyer.

"Yeah," the young cop drawled. "You're Piggy Ceders."

"Correct. And listen, your father and I were pretty good friends when he was on this beat."

"My old man's choosy about his friends," Dennis retorted.

An ugly flush momentarily suffused Piggy Ceders' sallow face, but when he spoke again his voice was controlled.

"Take it easy, copper," he said. "You're new on this beat, and I might be able to help you—"

"The only help I'll need from you is one wrong move," Dennis interrupted harshly. "An excuse to run you in."

Ceders directed a queer glance at him, then went on his way, but that evening when Dennis came off duty and returned home he found the racketeer talking to his father on the front porch of the trim little house.

"Get out of here!" Dennis rasped at Piggy, as he ascended the steps of the porch.

"Now take it easy, boy," Shaun Madden counselled his son. "Piggy's all right."

"He's all rat, you mean!" Dennis parried in wrathful accents. "And if he comes squealing to you again he's going to get his teeth picked with a night-stick."

Piggy eyed the young fellow wickedly for a moment, and then bidding Shaun a civil "good-night," he took himself off, whereupon Dennis addressed his father again.

"Sitting on your own front porch and gabbin' with one of the grimmest guys out of jail!" he declared, his voice carrying a stinging rebuke and a note of high scorn. "Nice going, sergeant."

"See here, Dennis, I know what Piggy is. But there's some good points about him. Long ago I once happened to do him a favour, an' he's never forgot it. The man's not as bad as he's painted—"

"He's bright yellow!" his son cut in, and with that slammed into the house.

He found Al in the living-room and inquired whether Eileen was at home, and Al had just informed him that the girl had gone out to post a letter to a friend in Ireland when Shaun lumbered in from the porch.

"Look, Dennis," the sergeant began, taking up the subject of Ceders' call. "Piggy was only tryin' to be helpful. Ye're gettin' a bad name on the beat, and he figures ye're liable to make trouble for yerself the way ye're carryin' on."

"Yeah? Well, it's trouble I'm looking for. How is a cop going to get any place making love to the city of New York?"

"Well, he can get some place by doing his duty and passing his post-graduate examinations," Shaun pointed out.

"And taking thirty years to make the grade," Dennis said contemptuously.

"Listen, I want a captain's pay before I'm too old to enjoy it. Yeah, and if I could break the back of one top mucker like Ceders I'd be a hero—right away."

A reflective, anticipant expression gathered on his handsome features as he uttered those words. Regarding him sombrely, Shaun noticed that expression.

"Oh, 'tis a hero ye want to be," he commented. "Fresh from the academy, ye're already seein' medals pinned on the chest of ye."

"Well, I want people to know I'm Dennis Madden—not just another blue suit walking by."

Into Shaun's eyes there came an ominous glint.

"Starting trouble!" he said. "Insulting your superiors, so I've heard. And now I learn of ye fightin' with young boys. 'Tis a blue suit ridin' by in a hearse—that's what ye'll be."

"Starting trouble—yeah, and finishing it!" Dennis flung at him. "You know your trouble, don't you? You're working for the Police Department. Well, the Police Department's going to work for me, see? It's going to do twenty-four hour duty—getting me some place."

The sergeant's big hands clenched spasmodically.

"Dennis!" he said in a sharp tone. "Don't be settin' yourself up above the department. The Police Department is the finest thing in this city. 'New York's Finest' is what they call the boys on the Force, and that's what they are. And 'tis yerself that should be on your knees thankin' your stars that ye're one of them."

"'New York's Finest'!" his son scoffed. "Finest what? Finest mob of chumps that ever fell for a flash line of sob stuff. Huh, duty—loyalty—faithful unto death! For what?"

Shaun Madden answered that mocking outburst—not with weight of argument, but with weight of hand. Enraged by the utterance of such sentiments by one who was his own kith and kin, he lunged forward and lashed Dennis across the cheek.

Al Boylan quickly intervened. He had listened to the discussion with feelings of growing uneasiness. Now he jumped between father and son, a look of intense consternation on his fresh, young face.

"Pop!" he cried. "Pop, don't! Take it easy now—take it easy!"

Shaun seemed to master his emotions. The expression of fierce resentment that had distorted his countenance was dispelled—was succeeded by one of remorse.

"I'm—sorry, Dennis!" he muttered huskily.

Dennis Madden's features were white, except where the red imprint of the sergeant's palm lay upon his cheek. His teeth were tightly clenched and his eyes were hard.

"Sorry?" he echoed in a bitter voice. "Yeah, so am I!"

Next moment he was striding from the house, and, his mood as black as the encroaching night, he directed his steps towards a car that was standing in front of the Madden home. It was his father's car, but Dennis did not scruple to commandeering it without permission; and he was about to drive off, with some notion of heading for Central Park and brooding over the quarrel in the dusky tranquillity of that enclosure, when suddenly he saw Eileen Daly approaching.

He hailed her, and it was in a tone bordering on the imperative that he told her to climb in. Then he started up the car, and, during a somewhat random tour around through the city streets, he gave her a glum account of the altercation that had occurred between himself and his father.

He did not finish up in Central Park

It was not the first time the new cop had been annoyed by Punchy, and he saw red. In an instant he had clutched him after all, but on a ferry-boat that was making the crossing between New York and New Jersey; and, leaning against the rail of that ferry-boat with Eileen after having left the car on the waterfront, he made a blunt proposal of marriage that took the girl's breath away.

Under normal circumstances she would have accepted that proposal unhesitatingly, for in the weeks she had known him she had fallen under the spell of his head-strong, wilful yet nonetheless magnetic personality. But he had declared his intention of cutting completely adrift from his father, and for that reason she would not give him a direct answer.

"Now, what's the point in stalling around?" he finally demanded of her in an impatient voice. "Listen, Eileen, if you won't say 'Yes,' I don't know but what I'll jump overboard into the river."

She smiled at the absurdity of the threat, and then, becoming earnest, laid a hand on his sleeve.

"Look Dennis," she said, "you're leaving your father's house and you're asking me to go with you. And it's a strange marriage, Dennis, that starts with desertion."

He was silent for a spell. Then he shrugged his shoulders.

"Okay, sweetheart," he assented grudgingly, "I'll make it up with dad. I'll even agree to boarding at the Madden household—if you want it that way."

She threw her arms around him as he spoke those words, and the light in her eyes put the bright-twinkling radiance of the stars overhead to shame. "Oh, Dennis," she cried in ecstasy, "if you hadn't said that it would be I who'd be jumping in the river."

The Break

THE months had passed, and life in the Madden household had been humdrum enough except for an anticipative excitement which had latterly become noticeable in that menage—the reason for which excitement was featured in a paragraph that appeared in the "Police Magazine" one day.

"The Dennis Madden, married last August, will be increasing the population next summer," that paragraph proclaimed.

It was during the afternoon of the day on which this announcement was published that young Dennis Madden was involved in an incident that was destined to change the whole course of his life. He was on duty at the time, and was patrolling that section of his beat on which he had first come into contact with Piggy Ceders; and he was walking along the edge of the kerb with measured gait when a sudden commotion fell upon his ears.

He turned sharply, and saw a familiar figure sprinting along the street in his direction. It was the figure of Punchy, the sneak-thief brother of Piggy Ceders' girl friend, and Punchy was clutching a fur that he had obviously stolen from a nearby establishment that traded in cheap skins. For the owner of the shop was pursuing the youth and hellowing out that he had been robbed.

Dennis started towards Punchy, and they were fifty yards apart when the latter caught sight of him and ducked down an alley-way. Into that alley Dennis charged a few seconds later, to glimpse the fugitive diving into the side doorway of an empty warehouse, and on entering the untenanted repository himself the policeman espied the youth scrambling amongst a clutter of abandoned crates and bales that bestrewed the ground floor of the premises.

He was heading for a staircase that led up to a doorway which communicated with the flat roof of an adjacent single-storeyed workshop. Dennis bounded after him, and was only ten paces behind his quarry when the thief gained the flight of steps.

Punchy raced up those stairs as hard as he could go, but realised from the swift-pounding footfalls in his rear that he was no match for Dennis in agility, and, his glance lighting on an iron bar that lay on the top step of the flight, he snatched it up and turned at bay.

"Drop that!" Dennis barked. Punchy snarled defiance, and, desperate to elude capture, struck at the young Irish-American as the police officer lunged upward and attempted to close with him.

The iron bar caught Dennis a violent blow on the left side of his neck, bruising him cruelly and drawing blood. He lost his balance and fell to the bottom of the staircase, but was quickly on his feet, and, his eyes ablaze with rage, he whipped out his Service revolver as he beheld Punchy framed in the upper doorway that communicated with the neighbouring workshop's roof.

"Stop, you dirty little crook!" the policeman roared.

Punchy did not obey the command. He made the mistake of pausing, however, to hurl a challenge over his shoulder.

"You'll never get me, copper!" he shrilled.

Next instant he was making as if to dash forth on to the adjoining roof, but he had yet to vanish beyond the doorway when the blast of Dennis Madden's gun awoke the echoes below him and behind him. And all at once Punchy was reeling in a stricken fashion, a slug lodged in his ill-nourished body—a slug that had smacked home between his shoulder-blades.

He tottered backwards, sobbing, swung around with his vicious little face horribly distorted, then plunged down the stairs to finish up in an inert heap at the bottom of the flight.

Punchy was dead, and, in all truth, was little loss to the community. He had been brought up in an environment that had made of him an enemy of the Law. He had learned to steal, and there was scant likelihood that he would ever have amounted to anything worth while. But a bullet in the back was harsh penalty for resisting arrest in connection with a theft that was trifling enough, after all. For the fur which he had "lifted," and which was still clenched in his lifeless fingers, would have fetched a couple of dollars at an outside estimate.

At the station-house to which he was attached, and where he afterwards gave a full report of the occurrence, Dennis Madden received no congratulations from comrades or superiors. On the contrary, his colleagues looked at him askance, reflecting that the slaying of a seventeen-year-old sneak-thief was not the kind of affair that would resound to the credit of "New York's Finest," reflecting also that young Madden seemed callously phlegmatic for a man who had a killing on his conscience—and a killing which savoured of the unjustifiable at that.

In point of fact, the conscience of Dennis Madden was not troubling him in the slightest. To his way of thinking, Punchy had got what was coming to him, and, apparently oblivious of the unfavourable impression he had made, Dennis left the station in a self-satisfied frame of mind after he had written out a detailed report, received treatment for his neck injury, and changed into civilian attire.

On his arrival home he found Al and Eileen in the living-room, and as they noticed that he was wearing a patch of medicated plaster on his neck they expressed concern. But he waved aside their exclamations of anxiety with a carefree gesture.

"It's nothing," he stated. "Huh, you ought to see the other fellow! Listen while I tell you what happened—"

He was not destined to launch into his story just then, however, for at that moment the front door opened and Shaun Madden entered.

He was in uniform, and, removing his cap without a word, he flung it on to the living-room table. Then, as if recalling the protests his wife had been wont to utter over that foible of his, he retrieved the cap and hung it on a peg.

Still he spoke no word. There was a sombre look on his big face, and it was in an involuntary manner that he took a pipe from his pocket and thrust it between his teeth, making no attempt to fill it or light it, merely biting on the stem in a way he had when he was in a troubled mood.

Dennis addressed him now.

"You seem as if you've something on your mind, dad," he remarked. "But whatever it is that's bothering you, snap out of it. You're just in time to hear how I scored one to-day for the Maddens."

Shaun bent his gaze on his son. There was a trace of grimness in the timbre of his voice when he answered the younger man, but Dennis failed to detect it.

"Did you, now?" the sergeant breathed.

"Yep. That kid Punchy—the one Piggy Ceders has been patron saint for. I caught him with some hot fur. He tried to brain me, and I had to plug him."

Eileen gave vent to an exclamation. "Plug him?" she echoed. "Is he badly hurt?"

Shaun glanced at her, and in three words made it plain to his son that pews of the occurrence had reached him.

"The boy's dead," he announced, then turned to Dennis again as both Eileen and Al recoiled with a shocked air.

"So you scored one to-day for the Maddens, did you?" the sergeant said bitterly. "'Tis a black minus score you've marked up for the Maddens."

"Minus score?" Dennis reiterated with sudden heat. "Minus score, my eye! Ceders himself will be doing something about this, and that's all I want. Give me the chance to clamp down on Mister Piggy Ceders and I'll grab every front page in the borough. That's the way to promotion!"

Shaun Madden took a step towards him.

"So it was promotion ye were thinkin' about when ye let go at that lad?"

"It was not," Dennis retorted. "He had it coming to him, anyway."

The sergeant's teeth clenched harder on the stem of his pipe.

"What you've got comin' is a transfer," he said. "A transfer to some other beat where ye'll have naught to do but make eyes at nursemaids. For I went to the Commissioner as soon as I heard what had happened to Punchy—"

His son broke in on him. The young fellow's countenance had grown livid.

"You went to the Commissioner?" he cried out furiously. "You went to the Commissioner and got me transferred because you're afraid of Piggy

Shaun made as if to lash out at his son, but Eileen caught hold of him, while at the same time Al seized Dennis Ceders? You did that to me? You fool! Don't you realise Ceders was my one chance to show what I could do?"

"Ye showed what you could do today," his father grated. "Ay, and ye're lucky 'tis only a transfer ye're gettin'. Ye showed that ye're a cop with a taste for killin' in his mouth. And killing's a raw taste that poisons. It doesn't promote."

Dennis glared at him.

"And what have your old-fashioned, old woman ideas ever gotten you?" he stormed. "You're a sergeant after twenty-odd years. A dumb harness-cop with nothing ahead but his pension. Why, you old fool—"

Shaun made as if to lash out at his son, as he had done once before, but Eileen caught hold of him restrainingly, while at the same time Al seized Dennis.

"Take it easy, Denny!" Al begged. "That's no way to talk to pop. And, pop, don't let yourself get rattled! Pipe down, the both of you, and let's all sit down to dinner, and—"

Dennis interrupted him.

"Take it easy, eh?" he snapped. "And sit around at dinner while this flatfoot serves second helpings of sob-stuff."

"Why, Dennis, that's shameful of you!" Eileen cried vehemently.

"What's shameful about it? What's wrong with wanting to get ahead? Eileen, get your things packed. We're going out!"

Al gripped the young police officer's arm.

"Dennis, you can't walk out on pop."

"Why not?" the other bit out. "He went to the Commissioner and put in a word against me, didn't he? As from to-night, I pay my own rent!"

Eileen stumbled towards him, tried to expostulate, but he would not listen.

"I'm leaving," he told her bluntly. "Whatever you choose to do, I'm leaving."

With that he strode from the living-room, and as the door slammed behind him Eileen turned to Shaun. The latter had calmed down to some extent, and was standing in a forlorn attitude—looked at the girl sadly as she laid a trembling hand on his sleeve.

"Oh, pop, what shall I do?" she wept.

Shaun clasped her slim fingers and spoke with an effort.

"You go with him, of course," he said in a husky tone. "You can always come back—alone—or together—when-ever you like."

Framed

ON the evening after Punchy's funeral, a conference was held in the luxury apartment of Piggy Ceders, the racketeer.

It was a conference attended by four men and a girl. The four men were Piggy himself, a tough-looking associate known as Stenuny who acted as Piggy's bodyguard, a shyster lawyer in the racketeer's employ, and a gangster who answered to the nickname of "Philadelphia," and who hailed from that town. The girl was Piggy's betrothed, Charlotte, the sister of the ill-fated Punchy—a flaxen-haired, high-rouged "moll" who had scarcely given her brother a thought when he had been alive, but who was now draped in mourning and who was positively hysterical with grief.

Piggy did most of the talking at that conference, and the one who did most of the listening was the man who went by the pseudonym of Philadelphia.

"Now, look," Piggy said to that worthy. "I got you out of a couple of hot jams a year or two back, didn't I?"

"Not me," Philadelphia rejoined, inferring that he had a short memory.

Ceders eyed him wickedly. "Yeah, you," he declared. "What's more your number's still up any time I care to call it. I could get you a life stretch, and you know it."

Philadelphia frowned and shuffled his feet.

"Say, what is this?" he demanded, whereupon Piggy leaned close to him.

"How'd you like to spend two to four years in Sing Sing?" he suggested slyly, "and get twenty-five grand when you come out?"

The gangster from the city on the Delaware River betrayed interest.

"Two to four for twenty-five?" he mused. "Hnh, I'd say that was good pay for doin' time. What I gotta do to earn that twenty-five thousand?"

"You gotta slap a fresh cop on the wrist," Piggy replied, and then proceeded to outline a scheme he had in mind.

It was a scheme that concerned Dennis Madden, and late that night, while moodily patrolling the new beat to which he had been transferred, Dennis Madden was struck down by a blackjack that was handled so deftly it scattered his wits without leaving any mark of violence.

Stenuny was the man who wielded that blackjack, and the only witness of the blow was Philadelphia, who promptly produced a whisky bottle, uncorked it, poured half its contents down the unconscious police officer's throat, then stuffed a wad of currency into the young cop's hip pocket.

This done, he parted company with Stemmy, who lost no time in making himself scarce. As for Philadelphia, he sauntered to a side-street not far away, turned into that side-street to halt beside a jewellery store situated thirty yards from the corner, and, an expert in such matters, had soon obtained burglarious entry to the establishment in question.

In doing so, however, he deliberately set off an alarm bell, which, as he well knew, would bring a squad of "New York's Finest" from the nearest station house. Moreover, he deliberately spent an unconscionable time in opening a safe that should have yielded its contents readily enough to a man of his talents, and a car-load of policemen was at the very door of the jewellery store before he essayed a belated attempt at escape.

He was caught, of course, and, naturally enough, the officers who arrested him made it their business to find out why Patrolman Madden had not arrived on the scene—with that alarm bell resounding far and wide all over the precinct. Nor was it long before they located Dennis, with the smell of strong liquor on his breath—and with five hundred dollars in notes tucked inside his hip-pocket, as was afterwards ascertained when he and Philadelphia were brought to the station house.

There at the station house, in the privacy of a room to which he was taken, Philadelphia was rigorously "grilled" by a group of detectives, and after feigning reticence for a while he affected to break down under the har- rage of questions that were directed at him.

"All right," he panted, "I'll talk. Madden, the cop on the beat—he was in with me. I got him drunk an' I gave him that five hundred bucks to stay away from that jewellery store. Now leave me alone. I know what's comin' to me. Two to four years in Sing Sing. The beak can't give me more for a first offence in this State."

It was thus that Piggy Ceders avenged the shooting of Punchy, thereby displaying his adoration for that wretched youth's sister; and it was in vain that Dennis Madden, on his recovery, argued that he had been framed. In all New York there were but three people who believed in his plea of innocence—his wife Eileen, young Al Boylan and Shaun.

As far as Shaun was concerned, the high words Dennis had spoken on the night of Punchy's death were forgotten and forgiven, and, with no thought in his mind other than a determination to stand by his son and vindicate him, the veteran police-officer tried to seek out Piggy Ceders—realising that if Dennis had been framed, Ceders was, beyond a doubt, the culprit.

But Piggy was not in town—was apparently vacationing "somewhere in the South." And Piggy was still far removed from New York on the day that Shaun Madden's son entrained for Ossining in the custody of a plain-clothes man—Ossining, site of Sing Sing; whither Dennis was being conveyed to serve a term of imprisonment on a charge of bribery.

Savage and embittered were the reflections of Dennis Madden as he sat in a coach of the Ossining train, with his right wrist manacled to the left wrist of his escort. Up to the last, until the close of his trial, when the jury had brought in a verdict of guilty, he had fondly hoped that he might be acquitted of the indictment that had been made against him. Now he was faced with the prospect of spending long months in the company of jail-birds who would gloat over his plight, and who could be counted upon to take every opportunity of making his lot even harder to bear than it would normally have been.

He was an ex-cop—and an ex-cop who had shot a seventeen-year-old kid. And as such he had an unenviable future awaiting him amid the dregs of humanity lodged within Sing Sing's bleak walls.

He was provided with a sample of what was in store for him when the train was only a few miles north of New York. Another prisoner—an old "lag" who was sitting close to Dennis and who was handcuffed, like Dennis, to a plain-clothes officer—suddenly produced a cigarette and leaned towards the former patrolman.

"Gimme a light from that butt, will yuh?" he requested, indicating a stub at which Dennis had been moodily pulling.

Automatically, vacantly, the younger man handed him the cigarette-end, and the old lag lit his own cigarette with it. Then he leered at Dennis.

"I understand you've been dishin' it out as a cop," he said. "Killin' kids, so I'm told. Huh, I guess the 'cons' up at the Big House will want to see whether you can take it like you dished it out. Here, thanks for the light."

With that he stuck the glowing end of the borrowed cigarette-butt hard against the ex-patrolman's neck, and with a shout of mingled pain and rage Dennis hurled himself on the fellow. Next second a violent scuffle was in progress—a scuffle that was terminated with difficulty by the respective plain-clothes officers to whom the prisoners were linked.

The two combatants having been separated, but both of them still glaring at each other murderously, the detective who was in charge of Dennis spoke in a curt voice.

"Come on, Madden," he said laconically. "We'll ride on the platform. It's cooler there."

He escorted Dennis to the rear of the coach, and, standing with him on the railed platform at the back of it, he volunteered a few words of advice.

"Look, Madden," he announced above the clamour of the train's wheels, "there's four thousand convicts up in Sing Sing, and you won't have a friend among 'em. But it's not going to do you any good trying to fight them any time they get your dander up. I'm thinking they'll go easier on you if you hold your horses."

Dennis was staring over the rail at a belt of woodland that stretched westward from an embankment along which the train was thundering. A queer glint had come into his eyes, and that glint was still in his eyes when he turned them on the detective. But the shadows of night had fallen and the plain-clothes man did not see the captive's expression.

"Yeah, I guess you're right," Dennis murmured. "I never got any place fighting. I'll settle down in Sing Sing, though. I'll be okay up there. Here, give me another cigarette, will you?"

The detective nodded and reached into a pocket of his coat. It was then that Dennis Madden brought his left fist across in an unexpected punch that landed with the force of a sledge-hammer and jolted the plain-clothes man into oblivion.

The detective went down, and, falling atop of his insensible form, the prisoner searched him eagerly for the key to the handcuffs. He secured that key, also took possession of a gun the plain-clothes man was carrying and hurriedly unlocked the "hraelet" that fastened him to the unconscious officer. Then, scrambling on to the rail of the platform, Dennis Madden jumped from the speeding train, rolled down the embankment in a smother of dust, picked himself up at the foot of the declivity, and, bruised and shaken, plunged into the blackness of the woods hard by.

Fugitive

BACK home from his vacation in the South, Piggy Ceders was reclining on a chesterfield in the lounge of his Manhattan apartment and was studying a newspaper which was one of several that his satellite Stemmy had handed him on his return.

Those newspapers covered a period of several days, and their front page headlines summarised the known adventures of Dennis Madden from the time of his escape to the last glimpse that had been obtained of him.

The oldest of the publications in question retailed the manner in which he had secured his liberty. Another referred to the disappearance of Mrs. Eileen Madden, who had apparently set out one evening on a shopping expedition in her father-in-law's car and who had failed to return home, the automobile afterwards having been found abandoned.

A third newspaper carried a report that Dennis Madden and a woman answering to the description of his wife had been sighted and pursued by officers in a police car, but had made their getaway. And yet another related how they had eluded a second mobile patrol, who had exchanged shots with young Madden and who believed the ex-policeman had been wounded.

It was this last newspaper which Piggy Ceders was now scrutinising, and he had just finished reading its front-page story concerning Dennis Madden and his wife when he heard a combination of tuneful sounds reminiscent of a snatch of melody played on a musical box.

Actually those sounds indicated the presence of a caller. A touch on a bell-button attached to the front door was responsible for the quaint summons, and, answering that summons, Piggy found himself confronted by no less a personage than Shaun Madden.

The latter was in plain clothes, but Piggy did not conclude from this circumstance that the ponderous Irish-American was off duty. He had learned since his return that Shaun had been promoted to the rank of detective.

"Hallo, Madden," the racketeer greeted complacently. "I hear you've been tryin' to contact me for the last few weeks. As a matter of fact, I've been down in Florida—playin' golf. Was it anything important you wanted to see me about?"

Shaun closed the front door of the apartment behind him. There was a hard glint in his eyes.

"My boy's in a jam," he said, "because you framed him."

Piggy affected a look of bewilderment.

"I framed your boy?" he echoed. "What are you talkin' about?"

"You framed him because he shot your girl's thieving brother," Shaun told him deliberately. "I know you framed him—and so does he. You framed him because you're daffy about that blonde."

Piggy's face tightened.

"Listen, Madden," he snapped, "you keep my girl out of this. I don't go around framin' cops, and, if I did, she wouldn't know anything about it. In any case, I don't want you grillin' her. She's been sick while I've been away, see? She's been laid up—"

"Oh, she's been laid up, has she?" Shaun cut in. "Well, accordin' to this report she's been seein' a lot of that lawyer of yours—while you've been down in Florida."

He produced a folded sheet of paper and handed it to Piggy, but without so much as scanning it the racketeer tore it in half and flung the two pieces contemptuously on to a nearby chair.

"My girl don't consult no lawyer," he said. "She don't consult nobody but me. And that's what I think of cop reports."

Shaun stepped close to him, his great hands clenched.

"You tell me how my boy was framed!" he ground out. "Come on, I'm givin' ye a chance to talk, and if ye don't talk I'll kill ye for what ye've done to my son!"

Piggy had recoiled.

"Yeah?" he countered, not without a trace of alarm in his voice. "That would fix your boy up fine, wouldn't it?"

Shaun Madden hesitated, then drew in a long breath.

"You're right," he muttered. "Ye're no good to me dead."

There was a silence, and in that silence Piggy Ceders recovered his composure. He seated himself in a more or less nonchalant fashion on the arm of the chair on to which he had tossed the fragments of the detective's report, and it was as he did so that his glance chanced to light on something which was written on one of those torn scraps of paper.

A frown gathered on his brow, and he leaned nearer to that portion of the document. A moment later he had snatched up both pieces of the report, and, placing them together, he read with mounting fury the statements inscribed on them.

Watching him, Shaun suddenly saw him jerk himself to his feet. Next instant the racketeer was striding to the door of an adjacent room. It was a room in which Stenny was sitting alone at a table, playing solitaire, and, bursting in upon his associate, Piggy Ceders scattered the cards that were set on that table and thrust the torn report in front of his minion's face.

"You drove my girl Charlotte and that rat mouthpiece to the Club Bagdad four nights last week!" he snarled.

Stenny's eyes dilated in an expression that was meant to convey innocence.

"Me," he faltered. "Why, no—"

"Look at this, curse you!" Piggy raged. "It's a detective's report! You drove 'em in my car! You ran 'em to the Club Bagdad four nights last week, and took 'em back each time to that mouthpiece's flat. Yeah, and on the first night you sent off a wire that she gave you—this wire!"

He snatched a telegram from his pocket and quoted its contents savagely.

"Doctor says I mustn't join you in Florida on account of I'm sick with the flu. Love to my wonderful honey man.—CHARLOTTE."

He glared at Stenny.

"Why didn't you tell me she was consultin' that mouthpiece in my time?" he shouted. "In my car? Why didn't you tell me he was makin' a play for her? And why did you send this telegram? Why?"

Stenny fidgeted uncomfortably. His blunt face, utterly devoid of intelligence, portrayed a look of genuine pain.

"I hired out as your bodyguard to keep you from getting hurt, didn't I?" he appealed. "Well, when a guy's dame two-times him it's liable to hurt his feelin's somethin' awful."

Piggy ripped out an oath, and, crushing the telegram and the fragments of the report into a ball, crammed them viciously into Stenny's thick-lipped mouth. Then he swung round and stamped back into the lounge, where Shaun Madden was still standing.

"Dirty, double-crossing dame!" Piggy grated. "Huh, that sap skirt fallin' for that lawyer's two-dollar words!"

Shaun approached him.

"Get your hat, Piggy," he said quietly.

"What for?" the racketeer demanded, glowering at him.

"Ye're goin' to the station house for pullin' a gun on me."

Piggy's upper lip curled in a sneer.

"That won't do no good," he retorted. "You can swear me dead on any charge you care to fake, and I still won't know nothin' about your boy."

"Ye didn't pull that gun on me," Shaun observed, eyeing a significant bulge near Ceders' left armpit.

"But it would be my word agin yours, and they'd take mine. I can pin three years on ye, Piggy, an' that's plenty of nights for that girl of yours and that mouthpiece. While you're lyin' on a cold shelf in a cell, they'll be out heatin' up some dance joint, and everybody in town will be talkin' about Piggy Ceders' girl goin' around with a cheap lawyer."

The racketeer bunched his fists.

"She won't be goin' round with him. I'll see her dead first—"

"Oh, no, ye won't," Shaun interposed. "Ye won't see her at all, for we're practically on our way down to the station house."

"No, Piggy," he went on with purposeful persistence, "ye won't see her at all—for three years. She'll be too husy with him to be ever comin' down to the jail to look ye up, I'm thinkin'. And that's the kind of female that ye sent my boy up for, eh?"

Piggy's features tightened. When he spoke again he did not actually admit that the accusation expressed in Shaun's last sentence was true, but neither did he make any denial.

"Dirty two-timing blonde!" he said thickly. "Bawlin' about her dead brother. He was a lovely boy. He was her lovely brother. And me—I was her lovely honey man."

"Piggy," Shaun mused in a reflective tone, "I've a mind to make ye a bargain. Ye don't know anything about how my boy got into that jam, but if ye can think of any way to get him out—well, I'll lay off ye."

Piggy Ceders did not answer him at once, but it became obvious from the pensive look on his thin countenance that he was debating the proposition the Irish-American had volunteered. Then suddenly he launched a direct glance at Shaun.

"Madden," he announced, "I'll take you up on that. Gimme three days to clear up my affairs, and I'll fix it so your boy is cleared an' that blonde and my mouthpiece take the rap for framin' him."

When Shaun Madden left the racketeer's apartment a little while afterwards his step was almost light. His manner certainly suggested a calmness that was in contrast to the agitation he had displayed ever since his son's indictment, though when he arrived home he received a shock that temporarily jarred him out of his comparative tranquillity.

For there in the living-room of his trim Brooklyn house was Eileen—a wretched, distracted shadow of her former self, weeping pitifully in the arms of Al Boylan.

She had put in an appearance at the dwelling only a moment before, and had not yet begun to tell her story to the astounded yet fervently sympathetic Al. Nor was she able to give any account of herself for several minutes following Shaun's arrival. But at last, fragmentarily and in broken accents, she managed to relate her experiences of the last few days.

It seemed she had found Dennis skulking in Shaun's car on the night she had set out on that shopping excursion. He had been desperate to see her, and she had been with him constantly from that night onward, sharing his existence as a fugitive, begging him again and again to give himself up, though he had been fiercely adamant in his refusals to do so.

"Oh, it's been horrible!" she moaned. "Horrible! And Dennis—he's so different. He's not Dennis Madden any more. He's a stranger. His hands, they've—they've turned cold, cold as that gun he's carryin'. The touch of him that once thrilled me so much makes me tremble now."

"Dennis isn't any different," Al murmured soothingly. "Just think what he's been through—on the run like a fox with a pack of dogs at his heels."

"I know," the girl sobbed. "I know. And he's hurt, too—where a bullet tore a gash in his shoulder. That's why I slipped out to-night to go to a drug store for lint and bandages. Then suddenly I got frightened because I thought the man behind the counter in the drug store was looking at me strangely, as if he connected me with the Eileen Madden whose description has been circulated all over the city. That's why I came here instead of going back to Dennis. I was scared to go back."

It was then that Shaun laid a gentle, reassuring hand on her arm.

"Darlin'," he said, "ye don't have to worry any more. Ceders has promised to clear Dennis in three days, so ye don't have to worry any more. The Police Department don't know it yet, but in three days' time my boy's good name will be vindicated. Meanwhile, I've got to see him. Where is he hidin', Eileen?"

Just thirty seconds later Shaun Madden was setting out for an address with which Eileen had provided him. It was the address of a one-room flat in a dismal apartment-house situated in the Bowery; and arriving there in due course, Shaun had paused on the sidewalk to direct a cursory glance over the building's sombre frontage when he was seen by a couple of plain-clothes' men.

They were talking to a white-coated chemist in the doorway of a drug-store across the way. That drug-store was the one at which Eileen had called, and the girl had not been mistaken when she had suspected that the man behind the counter had identified her. He had recognised her sure enough and had communicated with the nearest police-station—was being interrogated by those two plain-clothes' officers, who had been detailed to investigate his story, when the pair of them observed Shaun Madden.

The detectives knew Shaun, and as he entered the apartment-house opposite they jumped to the conclusion that his son was somewhere in that building and that Shaun was aware of the fugitive's hiding place but had no intention of revealing it to the police.

"Old man Madden!" one of them rapped out. "Come on, we're 'phonin' for a squad of the boys!"

Ignorant of the stir he had created Shaun was at that moment ascending a dingy stairway, and he continued to mount until he gained the top floor of the apartment-house, on which floor he located a door which bore the number "519."

According to Eileen, that was the number of the flat in which Dennis was hiding, and the veteran police-officer raised his hand and tapped on the door.

"Dennis," he called out in a low voice.

There was no immediate response, but he heard the scrape of a chair within.

"Dennis," he called again. "Open the door. It's your dad, and I'm all alone. And listen, Dennis, I've got news for ye—good news."

On the other side of the door stood Dennis Madden. In his fist was a revolver which he had seized at the first alarm. His face was drawn and wore an expression that was at once hunted and malign.

"You wouldn't double-cross your own son, would you?" he demanded suspiciously.

"No, Dennis," Shaun answered in an urgent tone. "Dennis, 'tis the truth I'm tellin' ye when I say I'm here with good news. I saw Ceders, and he's goin' to clear ye. You'll be free in a few days."

"Yeah? I'm free now."

"No, you're not, Dennis. You're up to your neck in trouble. Aw, ye've got to believe me, Dennis. I'll come in with me hands up, but ye've got to believe me."

Still Dennis Madden made no move to unfasten the door and admit his father. Warped in mind, he seemed to doubt Shaun's word—to meditate upon the possibility that Shaun, having discovered his hide-away, had come here with the idea of snaring him into surrender. And Shaun had yet to allay the younger man's suspicions when all at once there arose a sound that convinced Dennis his father had tried to play him false.

That sound was the piercing wail of a police car's siren down in the street that fronted the apartment-house, and as he heard it Dennis Madden cried out in venomous denunciation.

"You filthy, crooked, lying cop!" he shouted, his voice climbing to a high note. "You'd two-time your own son, would you? But it won't work! I learned all your tricks in that rat college for cops, and I'll teach 'New York's Finest' some more! Yeah, and I'll use a gun the way they taught me to shoot, too!"

Shaun yelled at him through the door-panels, imploringly but in vain. The swift patter of feet reached his ears from beyond those panels—the scrape of a window-sash that was violently up-raised. Then he began to hurl himself at the locked door, and breaking it open at the fourth attempt, reeled into the flat that had been his son's refuge.

There on his left was a gaping window which gave on to a fire-escape. Shaun Madden stumbled across to the aperture, and looking downwards saw Dennis crouching, gun in hand, away below him—on the roof of an adjacent two-storey building to which he had jumped from the emergency staircase. And Shaun Madden saw someone else—an armed police-officer who had run into an alley to cover the rear of the apartment-house.

The officer's face was uplifted, but he had not espied Dennis. Dennis had spotted him, however, and rabid-murderous with fury and desperation, he was preparing to draw a bead on the patrolman.

"Dennis!" Shaun roared. "Drop that gun!"

His son threw a glance aloft, and even at the distance Shaun gained an impression of his mouth twisting into a snarl. Then the younger man fixed his attention anew on the police-officer in the alley and deliberately sighted his six-shooter on him.

Involuntarily Shaun whipped out his own revolver. Involuntarily he pointed the weapon at Dennis. But though he had plucked the gun forth with a promptitude that might have saved a comrade's life, he flinched as his forefinger touched the trigger—flinched in that fateful instant from the thought of drilling the hounded and ruthless creature down there who was of his own flesh and blood.

Shaun Madden's was not the gun that spoke. It was the .45 in his son's fist that belched flame and lead, and in the alley below a blue-uniformed figure pitched forward lifelessly.

A sob broke from Shaun's lips and a mist seemed to swim before his eyes. Through that mist he saw Dennis scramble from his vantage point and slide rapidly down a drainpipe to fetch up in the alley—saw him bestride the prone form of the officer he had slain and run like a stag, to vanish presently beyond a turn in the passage.

"You wouldn't double-cross your own son, would you?"

Cornered

THAT evening Shaun Madden handed over his badge and revolver to the Commissioner of Police, together with a letter of resignation which he refused to retract in spite of his chief's request that he should reconsider his decision.

"I put a gun in the hands of a killer, sir," he told the Commissioner, "when I proposed my son for enlistment in the Force. And to-day I took the life of an officer just as surely as he did. For when Dennis Madden was on that roof I could have shot him—and saved that officer from death."

He bit his lip.

"Only my finger froze on the trigger, sir," he added miserably. "For the boy was my son, Commissioner."

The Police Chief laid a kindly hand on his shoulder.

"There are two million fathers in this city," he said. "They pay our salaries. But they wouldn't want you earning yours—that way."

And so, of his own volition, Shaun Madden left the service to which he had belonged for so many years, and in the days that followed it was as a private citizen that he read of the misdeeds perpetrated by the young man who bore his name.

For Dennis Madden was still at large, and Dennis Madden had given free rein to the unruly instincts that had always been existent in his character. No longer was he merely a luckless youngster trying to "beat an unjust rap." He had been "framed" in the beginning, a fact that had yet to be established in the eyes of the law, but the brutal slaying of a police-officer was inexcusable. And equally inexcusable was the life of crime on which he embarked following the shooting of that patrolman.

Banks were raided, cashiers wounded—these latter testifying in every instance that the thief had answered to the description of Dennis Madden. Piggy Ceders was shot dead by the wanted ex-policeman whom he had prepared to clear—if clearing Dennis of that bribery charge could have done the fugitive any good now. A week after the killing of the racketeer two mobile patrolmen who tried to hold up a stolen car were "winged" by its occupant, whom they recognised as young Madden. Yet another officer was drilled by him the succeeding day and later succumbed to the injury.

And still Dennis Madden remained at liberty.

On the night of that second patrolman's death Shaun Madden and Al Boylan attended the Lexington Hospital, whither Eileen had been taken a few hours previously. They were present there when a nurse announced to them that a baby boy had been born to Mrs. Dennis Madden, and it was within twenty minutes of receiving this news that Shaun put in an appearance at police headquarters and made his way to the broadcasting room, where an officer by the name of Casey was on duty.

"Casey," the burly ex-sergeant said slowly, "my son is the father of a seven pound boy."

"Yeah?" Casey murmured. "Well, that's some good he's done, Shaun."

Shaun Madden nodded, then went on speaking.

"I was thinkin', Casey," he stated. "I was thinkin' that if he knew about that boy, there's a wild, crazy streak in him that would dare him to see the child. He was lookin' forward to the little one's arrival. 'Twas one decent sentiment that son o' mine always had—a fondness for very small children, Casey."

And, Casey, every car they've found that Dennis Madden has stolen since he's been on the run has been wired for radio. He's got that much cunning."

"What's on your mind, Shaun?" Casey asked him with a puzzled air. Shaun bent towards him.

"Casey," he rejoined in a steadfast tone, "I want ye to broadcast a call every hour. I want ye to broadcast a call for ex-Sergeant Shaun Madden to come to the Lexington Hospital, Room 322, where his grandchild has just been born."

A look of mingled comprehension and awe spread across the face of Casey.

"Shaun! Are you mad? It would be less than human to take him that way."

"He's killed three men already, Casey. And if he's allowed to run loose there's no tellin' how many more he'll kill."

"But he's your son—"
"Sure he's my son," Shaun Madden interrupted. "And two of the men he's killed were officers. Officers are all that stand between decent people and killers, Casey. Listen, 'tis a war my son has declared, and all men who want war should be wiped from the face of the earth. Broadcast that call, Casey. Ye owe it to them that may be Dennis Madden's next victims."

Casey seemed to waver for a few seconds, then inclined his head in assent, and, leaving him, Shaun departed from police headquarters and returned to the Lexington Hospital—not to make his way to Room 322, but to post himself in a yard adjacent to the institution.

There in the shadows he waited, keeping an eye on a broad thoroughfare that the hospital faced, and he had been there for something over an hour when he saw a grey car turn into the yard, a car from which the unmistakable figure of his son alighted.

Shaun's ruse had succeeded, Dennis had picked up the call that Casey had agreed to broadcast, and, as Shaun had imagined, Dennis had taken the risk of visiting the hospital.

Shaun did not accost him there and then. He resolved to grant him the opportunity of fulfilling the desire that had prompted him to come here, and, lurking out of sight, watched his son duck into the hospital by a side door reserved for the use of the staff.

It was Shaun's intention to confront him on his reappearance—to grapple with him if necessary and to force him to surrender to the Law. But he was never destined to effect his purpose, for a quarter of an hour after his son had disappeared into the hospital a sudden commotion arose within the building and down in the yard the ex-sergeant heard voices shrilling the name of Dennis Madden.

He was to learn afterwards how a nurse had recognised the fugitive from Justice, and how his son had doubled back and forth confusedly through the hospital corridors—obviously losing all sense of direction so that by the time he ultimately found his way back to the yard the police had been telephoned and the siren of an approaching squad car was audible above the traffic hum in the street hard by.

It was with the note of that siren swelling in his ears that Dennis Madden charged out of the hospital's side door to see his father standing between him and the stolen automobile in the yard, and as he clapped eyes on the ex-sergeant his hand went to his coat-pocket and whipped out the revolver that had killed three men.

"Get out of my way!" he panted. "Get out of my way, or I'll give it to you!"

Unarmed, Shaun moved towards him.

"You drop that gun," he said evenly, "'cause I'm takin' you, anyway."

"Stop!" Dennis Madden shouted. "Stop, or I'll blow you apart!"

Still Shaun came on, and, low as he had sunk, vicious as he had become, Dennis Madden could not bring himself to discharge that revolver at his father. He backed from the older man, then spun round all at once even as the approaching police car swept into the yard, and, before the ex-sergeant could close with him, he had bounded to an iron ladder that was clamped to the flanking wall of the hospital.

It was a ladder that communicated with a fire-escape which led from the first floor of the institution to the roof, and Dennis Madden doubtless had some forlorn hope of effecting a get-away across that roof. But he had scarcely reached the lowermost platform of the fire-escape when a spot-light from the police car limned him clearly.

That car was at a standstill now, and three or four armed officers had piled out of it—were starting forward when Shaun called out to them.

"Wait!" he appealed. "Keep back! I'll take him!"

The officers remained by the squad car, and determinedly Shaun began to climb the ladder that his son had ascended. He was bent on doing all in his power to prevent further bloodshed. He was bent on reasoning with Dennis and persuading him to submit. He was bent on convincing him that it was the only course to take.

But another course had suggested itself to Dennis Madden. He knew that he could never make a get-away now. He knew that he was cornered—cornered like an animal that had been brought to bay, though as he looked down on his father from the first-floor platform of that fire-escape his face was serene enough.

The evilness had faded from his countenance. The old expression of wilfulness was not even apparent on it. Rather, there was something of regret visible on it as he contemplated the man who was clambering up the ladder.

For a brief interval Dennis Madden continued to regard his father. Then abruptly he turned his head towards the spot-light focused upon his own half-crouching form, and, drawing himself to his full height, he lifted his revolver.

"Hey, coppers!" he sang out, and put a shot above the heads of the police officers who were standing by the car.

It was a shot they interpreted as a signal that he meant to give battle, and they answered it promptly, as their quarry had anticipated they would, answered it with a volley that riddled him—so that as the echoes of the fusillade rolled about the yard below Dennis Madden slumped to the iron platform on which he was located and breathed his last.

Months had passed, and once more Madison Square Garden had become the scene of a graduation ceremony attended by a batch of Police Academy students and their applauding friends and relatives.

Al Boylan was one of the students who were awarded patrolmen's badges that night, and among the onlookers were three people who were near and dear to him. They were Mrs. Eileen Madden, her tiny infant son, and Shaun Madden—Sergeant Shaun Madden once more, for he had been pressed by the Commissioner to accept reinstatement in the Force. And, holding his grandchild on his knee as the graduation ceremony was being enacted, Sergeant Shaun Madden nudged Eileen with a large elbow and indicated the baby with a jerk of his big thumb.

"Sure," he declared prophetically. "Sure, and when this little fellow grows up, Eileen, he'll make the finest policeman that ever pounded a beat."

Pretty Shootin'!

HOPALONG CASSIDY and Lucky Jenkins reined their horses for a moment when they reached the ridge overlooking Cactus Springs.

The township was about a mile up the valley. Immediately below them was a huge herd of cattle, grazing peacefully.

It was hot. Lucky pushed back his sombrero and wiped the sweat from his forehead.

"Well, I reckon we ought to have a medal," he said. "We've ridden across two states just because old Windy Halliday has got himself elected town marshal."

Hopalong laughed.

"I've been wantin' to see that old cuss ever since he left the Bar 20," he said. "And since we've got so far, we may as well keep movin'. I'm kinda hungry."

They rode on.

They reached the main street of Cactus Springs at high noon, just when things were busiest. Hopalong looked at the township with interest, and found himself liking it.

"I reckon Windy's got himself the kind of job he always wanted," he said. "A quiet cattle town, decent folks—"

"Did you say quiet?" Lucky broke in. "Look what's happening over there."

A buckboard was standing in front of the general store, and in it was a kid and his dog. The dog suddenly jumped down and ran, barking, at a man who had just come out of the saloon on the other side of the street.

"Get out of here, you tyke!" the man roared, and lunged at the dog with his heavy riding boot.

The boot caught the dog in the ribs, and the dog let out a howl. The kid promptly got off the buckboard and ran across the street.

"Quit kicking my dog, you!" he shouted, and went for the man with his fists.

The man swung his hand in anger, and gave the kid a hard slap that sent him staggering backwards.

Hopalong's voice cut clear through the din.

"Don't do that!" He dismounted and walked slowly across to the man, Lucky close behind him. "Where I come from, men don't go around slapping little boys."

The man looked Hopalong up and down, and didn't see much to get scared about. To him, Hopalong just looked like another cowpuncher—young, lean, and hard-bitten. Lucky didn't look any great shakes, either.

The man grinned.

"I didn't mean any harm, mister," he said, pretending to be scared. Then his tone suddenly changed. "But, of course, if you're asking for it—"

And he went for his six-gun.

Nobody saw Hopalong's hand move. One moment it was empty, and the next it was bucking as his shooter roared. A bullet tore across the man's knuckles, sending his gun yards away.

Hopalong didn't even look at him again. He holstered his shooter and turned to the kid.

"Get back on your wagon, son," he said. "And take the pooch with you."

"Yes, sir!" said the kid admiringly, and hastened to obey.

The man stooped to pick up his fallen weapon. If he had any ideas of starting anything, he changed his mind when he saw Lucky's level eyes on him.

"You ain't seen the last of me yet, mister," he growled at Hopalong.

Hopalong did not even bother to turn round.

"Any time you say," he replied. "I won't be hard to find."

The man slouched away, Lucky staring hard after him. Hopalong went across the street with the kid and helped him back on to the buckboard. Just then a woman came out of the store. She was young and pretty, but her face was white with anger.

She stood three feet from Hopalong, her hands on her hips, and glared at him.

"It's a pretty state of affairs when decent citizens can't ride into town without being shot at by you would-be bad men," she snapped.

Hopalong was so startled he was speechless for a moment or two. He blinked at her in amazement.

"Meanin' me?" he managed to say at last.

"Yes, you. I heard the shooting. Are you hurt, Joey?"

The kid was grinning, but he didn't intend to say much. He was enjoying himself.

"No, I'm all right," he answered.

The woman went to the buckboard and raised her hands hopelessly. A jar of molasses had been overturned—probably by Joey when he had jumped down after his dog.

"Look at it!" she said fiercely. "Look at the state my buckboard's in. You're not going to get away with this." She snatched a rifle from the buckboard and put the muzzle against Hopalong's chest. "Put up your hands!"

Chuckling, Hopalong obeyed.

"Want 'em any higher?" he asked politely.

"Don't try to be funny. You're going to pay for my molasses and for the cleaning of the buckboard, or there'll be one less good-for-nothing bandit in this town."

Joey decided that it was time he spoke up.

"But, ma,—," he began.

Hopalong cut him short quickly.

"Better not get your ma too irritated, son," he said. "She's a mighty dangerous woman when she's aroused." He looked at her admiringly. "Mighty dangerous when she ain't aroused, too, I reckon. I'll pay for the damage, ma'am. How much is it?"

"The molasses cost sixty cents—if you've got that much."

Hopalong jerked his head in the direction of one of his pockets.

"You'll find it right there," he said.

She reached out to take it, then realised that the rifle was in her way. She fumbled, and Hopalong decided to be obliging.

"Can I hold the artillery for you?" he asked.

He said it so innocently that she let him take it from her. Then she went to work on his pocket again.

A guffaw from Joey made her realise what she had done, and she snatched the rifle back.

"Oh, keep your money!" she said. "It's probably stolen, anyway."

Crossly she threw the rifle on to the buckboard and climbed up herself. "You just wait until I tell Marshal Halliday about this. He'll have you run out of town." She picked up the reins. "Get up!" she said to the horse.

The horse tried to move off, but didn't get far. He had been tied to a hitch-post by a short halter.

"Sometimes, ma'am, you have to untie 'em," said Hopalong gently, and did the job for her.

Joey was holding his sides with mirth. The woman glared at him, two red spots burning on her cheeks. Then she jerked on the reins, and the buckboard rolled away down the street.

Hopalong watched her go. Then he heard laughter from across the way, and turned to see what it was about.

Lucky had just come out of the town marshal's office with old Windy Halliday. Windy was about sixty, and had a white beard and no teeth. But that didn't stop him enjoying life.

"I don't like the looks of things, Lucky," he said in a voice loud enough for Hopalong to hear.

"What are you talking about?" Lucky asked.

"Well, it's this ways," Windy said. "Every woman that starts out by fightin' with Hoppy usually ends up by tryin' to hook him. Did you notice the way he smiled at her?"

"Gosh!" Lucky exclaimed. "Wouldn't it be terrible if, after all these years, Hoppy got married?"

"Awful?" Windy said. "Why, it'd be a calam—calam—well, terrible."

"Quiet!" said Lucky loudly. "Here he comes."

Hopalong strode up, grinning and holding out his hand to Windy. Windy grabbed it and worked it up and down as though it was a pump-handle.

"The same old Hoppy!" Windy chuckled. "In town for two minutes and lookin' for trouble. Why, say, I thought for a minute I'd have to come right across and resene you."

Hopalong laughed.

"The same old Windy!" he said. "Always ready to back me up. Say, I got into a jam over the little lady, didn't I? Who is she?"

"Her name's Mary Joyce," Windy replied. "and she's a widow. She's got a ranch away to the west of the town—a pretty good sort of spread it is."

"And that hombre you had the gunplay with is called Bailey—Stiff-Hat Bailey," broke in Lucky. "He's a stranger around town, and Windy thinks maybe he's plannin' to do some rustlin' if he gets the chance."

"Huh!" Windy's voice was full of scorn. He spat on his marshal's badge and polished it briskly with the sleeve of his shirt. "He ain't goin' to get no chance of doin' anything while I'm around here."

Hopalong took in a notch of his belt. "Say, Windy, have you got any ham and eggs in this part of the country?" he asked.

"Ham and eggs, huh?" Windy rolled his eyes expressively. "The best in the West, although I say it myself. Right this way, gentlemen."

He turned and led the way into his office. The others followed eagerly.

Smoky is Warned

HOPALONG and Lucky rode out with Windy Halliday the following morning to make the daily round of inspection. As they approached Mary Joyce's ranch, the foreman came out to meet them.

"Say, marshal, I'm kinda worried," he said. "I saw Stiff-Hat Bailey ridin' hard to the Blue Hills this mornin'. He has a pretty bad reputation, and I reckon he's up to something."

Hopalong saw Joey come out of the ranch-house with his dog, and rode to meet him, leaving the others to talk. He dismounted and picked the dog up.

"Good-morning, Joey," he said. "What do you call this pooch?"

"Hoppy," Joe replied.

Hopalong started and looked puzzled. "Now, where would you be getting a name like that from?" he asked.

"It's short for Hopalong Cassidy," Joey explained. "You've heard of him, haven't you?"

Hopalong hid a grin and pretended to think hard.

"Well, come to think of it, I seem to have heard of him some place," he said.

"I wanted to give my dog a name he'd be proud of," Joey went on. "Next to my dad, Hopalong Cassidy is the greatest guy in the world. Marshal Halliday is a great friend of his, and he says he's the best gun-fighter ever, and he's fair and square and always helping folks when somebody's pickin' on them. That's what I'm goin' to be like when I grow up."

Hopalong couldn't think of anything to say to that. He was silent for a moment, then said:

"Is your mother at home?"

"She sure is," Joey replied.

"Fine! I guess I ought to call on her. You run along and talk to the marshal. I'll see you later."

Joey nodded and ran off. Hopalong went to the ranch-house door and knocked. Getting no reply, he pushed it open and went inside.

Mary had a man with her, and, judging from the looks of them both, they had been having a few words. The man was small and mean-faced. He looked like a crook—and a pretty dirty crook at that.

"Oh, hallo!" Mary said. She looked almost glad to see Hopalong, in spite of what had occurred the day before. "This is my—my brother, Dan Beunett."

Hopalong nodded shortly. He wondered who the man really was. He didn't look much like Mary's brother, and he had noticed Mary's hesitation.

"Howdy, Bennett!" Hopalong said. "My name's Cassidy."

"My brother just returned from Mexico a few days ago," Mary said nervously.

Hopalong smelt trouble. He was like that. He always knew in advance when things were going to blow up.

"Is that so?" he said casually. "That's my old stamping ground. Was you down there long?"

The brother tried to be equally casual.

"For the past five years," he said.

"As long as that?" Hopalong eyed him steadily. "Negacio de ganda?"

The brother looked puzzled, but did his best to pass things off easily.

"You'll have to come again on that, mister," he said.

"It was Spanish," Hopalong explained. "I just asked you what business you were in."

"Oh, I did a little mining down around Santa Rosalia."

Hopalong nodded.

"It's a great mining country," he said. "A great ranching country, too. A friend of mine owns the Gonzales Rancho down there. Did you ever hear of it?"

"Sure." The brother smiled. "I know Gonzales well. As a matter of fact, I talked to him just the day before I left."

Hopalong had been waiting for something like that.

"That's funny," he said slowly.

"Gonzales has been dead for more than a year. His daughter's running the place now."

The brother scowled, realising that Hopalong had deliberately led him into a trap.

"Listen, mister," he said. "I don't like your attitude. What right have you to cross-examine me?"

"Well, I wasn't aimin' to," Hopalong replied, "but since you're getting so hot up over nothing, I'll make you a bet you've never been in Mexico."

"Are you calling me a liar?"

Mary broke in hurriedly. She was badly scared about something, and Hopalong could see that she didn't want any trouble.

"I'm sure he isn't lying, Mr. Cassidy," she said.

"And I'm sure he is," said Hopalong quietly. "He's crossed himself up twice, and I'm just beginning to wonder what he's doing wearing a dead man's clothes."

"What are you talking about?" the man demanded fiercely.

Hopalong pointed to his shirt.

"Those are bullet holes," he explained. "Whoever had that shirt on last was dead when he hit the ground."

He saw the man reaching for his gun, and his own bored into the man's stomach in the twinkling of an eye. "Just a minute! I'll take care of that little trinket." He yanked the gun out of the man's hand and looked at it.

"This is a police special. State property, eh?"

The man shrugged.

"All right, Cassidy," he said. "You're holding the aces. What next?"

"I don't quite know," Hopalong looked at him steadily. "I don't like you, and I don't believe you're Mrs. Joyce's brother. I think you've got some hold over her. What's more, there are some rustlers around, and I'm thinkin' you might be mixed up with them. I guess I'll turn you over to the marshal for safe keepin'!"

Mary got between them quickly, suddenly alarmed.

"But you can't do that!" she cried. "He'll be recognised. He'll be sent back to prison!"

The man gripped her arm.

"Shut up!" he snapped.

Cassidy frowned. The trouble was evidently worse than he thought, and he intended to get to the bottom of it.

"Say, I don't like to be inquisitive," he said, "but I don't like workin' in the dark, either. Maybe you'd better go ahead and talk, Mary." He used her first name unconsciously. "What's the answer to all this?"

Mary looked at him doubtfully, then appeared to make up her mind. In spite of a warning scowl from the man, she led Hopalong outside.

"I lied to you," she said quickly. "He isn't my brother. He's my husband. And he's just escaped from jail after being there for five years." She looked unhappy. "Joey was too young to remember his father much, and as it was a life sentence, I told him his father was dead."

"You told me his name was Dan Bennett," Hopalong said. "What's his real name? Joyce?"

She shook her head.

"He's always been known as Smoky Joslin," she said. "When he—went away, I changed my name to Joyce and moved to Cactus Springs." She turned to Hopalong anxiously. "He's threatened to tell Joey who he is if I don't give him money. And I can't let Joey know the truth. It would destroy everything I've built up all these years. Joey would lose his faith in everything and everybody."

Hopalong stood there thinking for a few minutes. Then he turned to the man.

"All right, Joslin," he said. "I've got the story. You're an escaped jail-bird, and I ought to hand you to the marshal, but I'm going to trade you your liberty on condition that you keep away from Joey."

Joslin's face went ugly.

"And who's going to keep me away from him?" he wanted to know.

Hopalong did his best to be patient.

"Listen, Joslin," he said, "just now I told you that my name is Cassidy. I didn't tell you that I'm known generally as Hopalong Cassidy. Does that mean anything to you?"

August 5th, 1939.

"Hopalong Cassidy!" exclaimed Mary in a low voice.

Joslin started. Evidently he had heard of Hopalong, because his manner changed pretty quickly.

"Okay," he said. "I'll do what you say."

"That's fine," said Hopalong dryly.

"I'll give him some money," said Mary quickly. "Enough to make a fresh start somewhere."

Hopalong nodded and turned again to Joslin.

"Remember, Joslin," he said, "this is a bargain between the two of us, and men who make bargains with me don't go back on them. So long as you stay away from here and Joey never gets to hear anything of you, everything is going to be all right. But you start something, and I'll finish it."

Joslin's face was expressionless. He watched Mary go to her safe and produce a small roll of bills. In silence he took them and shambled to the door. As he went he heard Mary say:

"I'll never forget what you've done for me, Mr. Cassidy."

Joslin stopped and turned. There was a twisted smile on his face.

"And I'll never forget what you've done for me, either," he said cryptically, and the next moment he had gone.

Hopalong went to the window and watched him mount his horse. Calmly Joslin turned and rode towards the Blue Hills.

Hopalong said nothing to Mary about that. But he knew in that moment that he had made a bad mistake. Bailey was in those hills, and Hopalong knew that sooner or later Bailey was going to make trouble.

Rustlers!

MARY was up at dawn the following morning—long before her cowhands rode in from Cactus Springs. She had a busy day in front of her, because a part of her herd was to be driven down to the railroad and sent away to be sold.

She began getting some breakfast. Then she looked out of the window and saw a man walking stealthily towards the ranch-house from the corral.

Quickly she got a gun and went outside.

"Who are you and what are you doing here?" she demanded.

The man stopped and eyed the gun uneasily.

"The name's Trayner, lady," he said. "I ain't meanin' no harm. I just wanted to see if I could borrow some tools to fix my stirrups."

He started to walk towards her. Quickly she levelled the gun.

"Stay where you are!" she warned.

"If you come— Oh!"

Somebody had stolen up behind her and had jerked the gun from her hand. Trayner said:

"Nice work, Smoky! You still know how to think fast."

Mary turned round and faced Smoky Joslin, the man who was her husband.

"You beast!" she said. "You're even rottener than I thought you were."

"I ain't interested in what you think of me," Joslin snapped. "And as you ain't got Mr. Hopalong Cassidy around to help you, I'm doin' all the talkin'."

"Come on!"

He took her by the arm and tried to drag her away. She struggled and got free. So he picked her up and carried her to a shed nearby, pushed her inside, and locked her in.

"Stick around, Trayner," he said.

"Keep her where she is, and if anyone comes around, see that she doesn't have a chance to talk. I'll go back to Bailey and tell him we're all set."

August 5th, 1939.

"Okay," Trayner replied, and Joslin hurried away.

Meanwhile, down at Cactus Springs, Mary's foreman had called in at the marshal's office.

"Listen, Windy," he said, "I've seen some fresh tracks of horses up on the ridge above the Joyce Ranch, and I don't like the look of things. That Bailey outfit is plannin' something."

Windy scratched his beard. He had only just got up, and the idea of going out looking for tracks didn't appeal to him.

Just then Lucky came in, accompanied by a cowhand named Red who also worked on Mary's ranch. Windy turned to them eagerly.

"There's some work for you two boys," he said. "Slin here tells me he's seen tracks on the ridge above the Joyce Ranch, and reckons it might be Bailey's gang. How about going to take a look?"

Lucky nodded eagerly.

"You can count me in," he said.

"When Hopalong shows up, tell him where I've gone, will you?"

And he and Red hurried away.

They found the tracks where the foreman had said, and decided to follow them. They led for some way along the top of the ridge towards the Blue Hills.

It was rocky up there, and huge boulders and hard ground made the trail difficult to follow.

Suddenly a rifle cracked from somewhere, and Lucky, riding ahead, swayed in his saddle and slid to the ground. Barely a second later a second shot rang out, but this time it was not Red who fell. It was a man who had been lying behind a boulder, taking aim with a rifle.

Hopalong rode up and dismounted. He dropped on one knee by Lucky's side.

"I got to the marshal's office a bare minute after you left," he said quickly, "and came on after you." He pulled back Lucky's shirt. "He's got a bad one here."

"Shall I go back and get help, Mr. Cassidy?" Red asked.

"No. We'd better get him down ourselves. I'll fix him so that he doesn't bleed."

He dug some bandages and lint from one of his saddle-bags, and bound Lucky's wound tightly. When he had finished, Lucky opened his eyes.

"Hallo, Hopper!" he said. "I ain't dead yet."

"You will be if you don't keep quiet," Hopalong said. "We're going to get you down to the camp and send you to the ranch-house in the chuck wagon."

Lucky tried to sit up. The effort was too much for him, and he sank back.

"Now, listen, Hopper," he said, "I'll be all right in a little while. And from the way things are shaping, you're going to need every gun up here that you can raise."

"Windy is seeing to that," said Hopalong. "He's raising a posse right now—just in case of trouble. And you're still going back to the ranch."

Lucky protested, but it didn't make any difference. Hopalong lifted him on to his horse, and they rode to the camp. From there Lucky went down the valley propped up against bags of beans and flour.

The chuck wagon reached the ranch twenty minutes later, and it was met by Trayner. The driver of the wagon took no notice of him, but called out:

"Mrs. Joyce!"

"Mrs. Joyce ain't home," Trayner said. "She went into town."

"Okay," said the driver. "But who are you, anyway?"

"I started work for her this morning."

She left me here to take care of the place."

The driver stared hard at Trayner, then said softly to Lucky behind him: "It sounds kinda fishy to me, Lucky. I don't like the fellow's looks."

Lucky looked out from under the wagon covers.

"Watch your step!" he warned. "That's one of the men who was with Bailey when Hoppy tangled with Bailey the day he hit town. There's something wrong here."

"I'll soon find out," the driver said, and spoke to Trayner again. "Stand right where you are, mister." He pulled a gun. "We want to find out a few things."

Trayner whipped out his own weapon and thumbed back the hammer. Before the driver could do anything about it, a lead slug hit him in the shoulder and toppled him off his seat. Lucky dragged out his own gun and squeezed the trigger, and Trayner threw up his hands and collapsed, his gun flying wide.

Mary heard the shooting, and looked through the cracks in the boarding of the shack. She saw what had happened, and looked round for something to break her way out.

She found a spade under a pile of sacking, and shattered the window with it. A minute later she was over at the wagon. She saw Lucky.

"Lucky, are you all right?" she asked.

"Sure I'm all right," Lucky replied.

"But what's it all about?"

"I'll tell you as soon as I get Joey. We've got to get out of here."

She ran into the ranch-house, and presently appeared again carrying Joey in her arms. She bundled him into the chuck wagon, and jumped on to the driving-box.

"Hold tight!" she cried, and got the horses moving.

She took the trail for the cowhands' camp, Lucky having told her that she would find Hopalong there. But before she had gone very far, Lucky let out a shout.

"Here's Bailey's men!" he cried.

She looked round and saw half a dozen horsemen not far behind her. She used the whip, and made her horses give every ounce of speed they had, but she knew it was hopeless. A wagon couldn't go as fast as free riders.

They surrounded the wagon in the end and brought it to a standstill. Joslin was with Bailey, and took charge.

"All right—get down!" he said to Mary.

Mary obeyed. Joslin went to the back of the wagon and looked in.

"You, too," he said to Lucky. "And drop that gun." He watched Lucky obey, then turned to Bailey. "Take the boys and get that herd on the move. I'll stay here and take care of the family until you're clear."

"Right," said Bailey. "Come on, boys—let's go!"

The others rode off. Joslin dismounted and strutted up to Mary.

"Make yourself at home, Mrs. Joyce," he said, sneering. "Sit down!"

Joey looked out of the back of the wagon. He was frightened, but was doing his best not to show it.

"What are you going to do, Uncle Dan?" he asked.

"Uncle Dan's going to tell you some fairy tales," Joslin replied. "And they ain't the kind your mamma told you, either."

Mary ran to him pleadingly.

"No, no, please!" she begged.

Joslin pushed her away roughly.

"Why not?" he said. "It wasn't nice of you to tell lies to little boys."

Joslin held his gun low on his hip. "This story I'm goin' to tell you is about a man you know quite well—a man who got around a good bit and—"

Mary, desperate, threw herself at him. The suddenness of her attack took him by surprise, and he went over backwards, his gun flying wide. Lucky jumped in and grappled with him, trying to prevent him from getting up.

"Get on that wagon and make a break for it!" he shouted to Mary. "I can hold him for a while. Hurry!"

Mary nodded and lifted Joey into the wagon. Then she climbed up herself and went to pick up the reins.

Joslin fought with Lucky, and Lucky was so weak from his wound there wasn't much he could do. Joslin rolled over and managed to regain possession of his gun. He levelled it at Mary.

Lucky made one last desperate effort. His fingers closed on Joslin's wrist just as the other pulled the trigger, and the shot went wide.

But the roar startled the horses, and before Mary could get hold of the reins, the animals bolted.

Joslin wrenched himself free, but by then the wagon was out of range. He laughed.

"Well, if those runaways don't smash her to pieces," he said, "the boys will get her."

Lucky fell backwards, exhausted. "I've never had much respect for snakes and skunks," he said, "but after knowing you they'll seem like real folks."

Joslin laughed again.

"Talk all you want to," he said. "You ain't got much more of it to do."

And he stood up, thumbed back the trigger, and took aim at Lucky's heart.

Hopalong Gets Busy

HOPALONG rounded up all the boys he could from the camp, and set out with them along the trail leading to the Joyce Ranch. Not knowing what had happened, his plan was to make sure Mary and Joey were all right, send them into Cactus Springs, and then lay in wait for Bailey and his gang.

Windy, his marshal's badge freshly polished, joined him with a few more men after a quarter of a mile, and they rode on. Windy was breathing fire.

"I reckon that there Bailey is ridin' for a fall," he said. "I've just had word that he's wanted in the next county for horse stealin', so maybe we can get to him and pinch him before he does any harm. He—"

He stopped speaking suddenly, and stared ahead. "For the love of Mike," he exclaimed, "what's going on there?"

Hopalong looked ahead, too. He saw Joslin standing over Lucky, gun in hand. It looked as though Lucky's last hour had come.

Hopalong whipped out his shooter and snapped back the hammer. Windy took a quick breath.

"You'll never get him at this distance," he muttered.

Hopalong's shooter roared and kicked, and for a moment nothing seemed to happen. Then Joslin started to crumple.

"Got him, by gosh!" roared Windy. "Pretty shootin', Hoppy, pretty shootin'."

They rode on, and found Lucky trying to get to his feet. Windy got down from his horse.

"Take it easy, son!" he said. "What's happened?"

"Mrs. Joyce is in the chuck wagon," Lucky said. "The horses have bolted. And she's heading right for where Bailey and his men are rounding up the herd."

Hopalong had been examining Joslin. "He's dead," he said briefly. "Windy, you'd better leave a man with Lucky, then get after Bailey. I'll go on ahead."

And before anyone could say anything more, he had taken a flying leap into his saddle, and was galloping hard down the trail.

He saw the wagon after a couple of minutes. The horses had gone mad, yet some instinct made them keep to the trail instead of going over broken ground.

The trail made a wide sweep a short distance on, and Hopalong cut across the grassland to head the wagon off.

He rejoined the trail again just behind it, and urged his animal on. Slowly, foot by foot, he drew level with the horses.

Timing his movements to a second, he stood up on his saddle, and jumped. He landed squarely on the back of the near-side horse, and leaned forward to gather in the reins. The next moment he was throwing his whole weight backward, the leathers securely locked in his fingers.

The horses stopped quickly enough then. The bits dragged at their tender mouths, bringing them up short.

Then Hopalong turned to see how Mary was getting on. The first thing he heard was Joey's voice.

"Gee!" Joey said. "That was some ride."

Hopalong laughed.

"That's just the kind of thing I would expect you to say, young feller," he said. "How are you, Mary? All right?"

"Yes, I'm all right," Mary said quickly. "But you must go back. My—my brother is holding Lucky some distance away. If you don't get to him quickly—"

"It's all right. Everything's been taken care of." Hopalong pulled one of his six-guns out and gave it to her. "Take this and go back the way you came. You'll find Lucky and one of the marshal's men somewhere. I have to go ahead. There's still work for me to do. Think you can manage those horses now?"

She nodded.

"They'll be all right," she said. "They only bolted because I didn't get to the reins in time."

Hopalong swung himself into his saddle.

Just as Joslin was pulling the trigger Lucky snatched at his wrist

"About that brother of yours," he said quietly. "He's—well, he's dead. I reckon he won't trouble you no more now."

Then he turned and galloped towards that part of the valley where Windy and the boys would be dealing with Bailey.

He did not take long to find them. Bailey and his men had driven part of the herd into a short ravine, and Windy had led his men in after them. In doing so, he had walked clean into a trap.

When Hopalong came to where he could see them, he found that every one of Windy's men had their hands above their heads. Bailey was strutting about in front of Windy, talking a lot.

Hopalong slipped from the saddle. He knew it was no good riding in on Bailey—he had far too many men with him. The only thing was to try getting them some other way.

He hurried forward, taking advantage of all the cover he could. At last he gained the herd itself, and started to creep through it, bent almost double.

He was coming up behind Bailey and his men, and as he got nearer, he heard Bailey ask:

"Well, where's the great Hopalong Cassidy?"

It was one of the cowpunchers who answered.

"He rode off a short while back. We don't know where he is."

Bailey laughed sourly.

"So that's the kind of a guy he is!" he said. "Yellow when it comes to an even chance. Well, I'll have the pleasure of meeting up with him again some time, sooner or later."

"It's sooner," said Hopalong quietly from behind him. "Get your hands up!"

A couple of the men started to turn. Hopalong's voice cut through the silence like a knife.

"Get them up, I say—before I let Bailey have it."

Bailey's bombast left him quickly. He started to whine.

"Don't shoot, Cassidy," he cried. "Give me a chance."

One man tried to bring his six-gun to bear. Hopalong twisted his shooter quickly, and the man changed his mind.

"Up!" Hopalong roared. "Up, I tell you!" They obeyed then. They had heard about the accuracy of Hopalong's gunplay. "That's better. All right, Windy—get their guns!"

Windy and the others obeyed gleefully. When they were disarmed, Hopalong relaxed.

"If you haven't anything further to say to me, Bailey," he said, "I'll just get the marshal and his men to tie you all and take you into town."

Mary's foreman, who had been part of the posse, blew out his breath explosively.

"Gosh, Mr. Cassidy," he said, "you took a long chance, tackling this bunch the way you did. Supposin' they'd shown fight?"

Hopalong laughed.

"Folks who go around kicking dogs and slapping little boys don't usually put up much of a fight when it comes to a showdown," he said. "Bailey can talk big, but that's about all there is to it." He stood back and saw that Windy's men had the upper hand now. "Well, boys, I'll be seeing you later. I'd better get back to the Joyce Ranch."

Windy nodded sagely as he dropped a noose over Bailey's arms.

"I thought there was something like that in the wind," he said.

But he was wrong. Hoppy returned to where Mary was waiting with the wagon, and then took Lucky back to the ranch. On the way there, Mary said:

"I don't know how to thank you, Hoppy, for all you've done for me."

"I guess you don't need to," Hopalong said. "Just forget it."

"I'll never do that." She was silent for a minute, then she went on: "Would you do something for me? Would you stay on at the ranch until I've got all my cattle shipped?"

Hopalong avoided her eyes.

"I reckon I'd like to stay until Lucky is well enough to travel," he answered.

"No longer?" She sounded disappointed.

"Well, I guess not." He scratched his head, trying to think of some way of not hurting her feelings. He knew that she wanted him to stay at the ranch for ever. "I don't take kindly to settlin' down. So when Lucky can ride again, I guess I'll just be hoppin' along."

And she knew that he would never change his mind.

In Praise of the P.C.

In placing the detective on a celluloid pedestal the cinema has been criticised in the past for ignoring that "forgotten man," the policeman on the beat. This injustice, however, has now been corrected. Assigned recently to see that the old-fashioned "cop" gets his share of the glory on the screen was Val O'Toole, an Irishman from Brooklyn and a veteran of the New York Police Department.

Hired as technical adviser on Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "Sergeant Madden" to do right by the police, O'Toole handed the story, squinted at it with one good eye—the other having been knocked out by a burglar—and snorted. O'Toole does not pretend to know anything about actors. But he does know cops. Frankly and bluntly he stated that no actor he ever saw even looked like a cop, much less gave the slightest impression of being one.

Several items favoured his argument. The first was O'Toole himself. Dramatically he pointed to the scars of wounds he had received in the line of duty. More than that, he related scores of blood-curdling yarns about cops and robbers, all in the records of the New York Police Department, which baffled the writers. For once their fiction couldn't outdo the facts.

Following numerous conferences with J. Walter Ruben, who produced "Sergeant Madden," and with Director Joseph von Sternberg, O'Toole was given authority to glorify the policeman in his own way. For settings and characterisation of Sergeant Madden, as portrayed by Wallace Beery, he drew largely from his own experience. Beery's Sergeant Madden is O'Toole's idea of the model cop, one of New York's finest. Beery being himself the August 6th, 1939.

son of a Kansas City cop and Scotch-Irish, was decidedly pleasing to O'Toole's good eye. He commented that Beery was a born "bobby," adding it was a shame for such fine police material to be wasted as an actor—a sentiment with which I cannot agree.

In a Jam

Here is an amusing little story that happened during the filming of "Sergeant Madden." Wallace Beery, regarded as one star who could never dodge recognition by his fans, found it was possible to be caught in the centre of a Hollywood crowd and not be recognised.

In response to a business call over the 'phone, he left the set without bothering to change his police uniform. Driving to Hollywood he ran smack into a noon traffic jam. One motorist signalled to Wallace; he yelled:

"Why don't you assert your authority and straighten out this tangle?"

"Why don't you call a policeman?" retorted Wallace.

When a policeman did come up, the motorist pointed to Wallace's car with a look of disgust, but the officer exclaimed:

"Wally Beery, I haven't seen you since I worked as an extra in 'China Seas,' four years ago!"

Ultimately the traffic situation cleared up, and Wallace thanked the cop for recognising him and "getting him out of a jam."

Buster Has Not Lost His Skill

When Buster Keaton let loose with a custard pie in the direction of Alice Faye, in an important scene in 20th Century-Fox's "Hollywood Cavalcade," a technician's history of Hollywood's silent days, there was an audible sigh of relief from Director Irving Cummings.

Although the script called for Keaton to pitch the pie at Miss Faye, it was suggested that an expert sharpshooter be employed, to eliminate the risk of missing.

"Nonsense," was Cummings' reply. "When it comes to experience at tossing custards, you can't beat a veteran like Buster. I don't care how long ago he tossed one, he's still good enough for me."

So Keaton got the job. Without so much as a warm-up, he wound up, took careful aim and let loose from fifteen feet away. There was no doubt of his excellent marksmanship, for Alice's lovely features were no longer visible. They had been replaced by the entire pie!

Paulette Goddard Will Play Opposite Chaplin Again

Paulette Goddard will be Charlie Chaplin's leading lady in the comedian's first all-talking production, now tentatively titled, "The Great Dictator." It is officially announced by Alfred Reeves, general manager of the Chaplin organisation.

Mr. Reeves reveals that the first sets for the picture are now under construction at the Chaplin Studio. A crew of carpenters and artisans have been engaged, and the lot is humming with the first real activity in three years.

The initial set to go up is one of the largest ever erected in the studio grounds, and will take a week or ten days to complete, using day-and-night shifts of workers.

In line with Chaplin's traditional policy, no information on the story is as yet available.

NIGHT CLUB HOSTESS

Starring
BUCK JONES

All Washed Up!

IT was a big night at the Arena Stadium, and the place was packed from ringside to roof.

Outside there was still a crowd struggling to get in. They had come to see something, attracted by the huge posters which glared from a hundred hoardings throughout the city. The posters read:

"MAIN EVENT—10 ROUNDS.
SLAG BAILEY v.
BUZZ KENTON."

It was to be the fight of the year. Inside the dressing-room at the back of the building, Slag Bailey himself was getting ready. He was a thick-set man, with a good-humoured face and a wide grin—the kind of man who liked to take life easily.

He had arrived at the Arena Stadium late, and his manager, perky little Pins Streaver, was stamping up and down. Pins had got the jitters.

"What the heck's the matter with you, Slag?" he said plaintively. "You ain't like what you used to be. You ain't been keeping up your training, and you're nearly always late."

Slag just grinned and went on getting ready.

"This is the fight of your life," Pins went on. "If you win, we're in the money. If you lose—bloody!"

"I shall win," said Slag, and thereafter paid no more attention to him until he had finished getting ready. Then someone came to the door and bawled:

"This is it, Slag!" Slag put on his dressing-gown and went along the corridor that led to the ring. Pins Streaver trotting along beside him. Just before they got inside the arena itself, Slag asked:

"Is Pat out in front?"

"Sure—she's there," Pins replied. "She's taken the night off specially to come and see you. I reckon you ought to have made some effort, seeing that—"

"Shut up!" said Slag genially, and Pins knew it was no good saying anything more.

While the crowd was cheering itself hoarse and the announcements were being made, Slag managed to locate Pat. She was sitting three rows back, and she was looking worried.

Her full name was Pat Rogers, and she worked at a night spot in the heart of the city. She was fair and had the kind of face that made a fellow's heart turn over. Slag got a lot of amusement out of the fact that she pretended to be hard-boiled. She wasn't really. She was a darned nice girl.

And Slag liked her a whole lot! He grinned cheerfully at her just before the bell rang, and then looked across at his opponent, Buzz Kenton. Buzz was slim and wiry, and looked as though he had trained to the last ounce.

Slag grinned again as he quickly made his plans. Buzz would depend upon speed—upon trying for a swift knock-out. That was all right. Slag liked them that way. He was a slow, plodding fighter, and his tactics were to tire his opponent out and then crush him with sheer weight. It was easy!

The bell rang. Slag came out of his corner, still grinning. He didn't hurry. He left all the hurrying to Buzz.

And Buzz met him two-thirds of the way across the ring, his gloves moving fast. Slag stopped him with a sledgehammer left to the body, then gave ground. Buzz went after him.

Slag fought stolidly, but as the round progressed he found that something was happening to him. He was being just a bit too slow and stolid. Buzz was getting hard, strength-taking blows past his guard.

That was all right up to a point. Slag reckoned to take something of a hammering early in a fight. But this was more severe than he was used to.

And Buzz could slam them in, too! Slag reckoned there was something in what Pins had said about neglecting training. Taking things easy made a fellow just a bit too slow.

But Slag wasn't worrying. He could warm up after a while, he told himself. Down by the timekeeper's desk a radio announcer was giving a running commentary.

"Slag hasn't really got going yet, folks! He's letting Buzz Kenton do all the fighting, and every now and then pulls Buzz up with a hard smack. But Buzz is doing well, all the same. He's fighting hard, and isn't getting rattled."

He paused a second, then went on: "Phew! I wish you had been here to see that one, folks! Slag tried to put a hard one over Buzz's heart. Buzz smothered it, and sent a left to Slag's face and a right to his body. Beautiful timing, Buzz—beautiful timing!"

"Come on, Slag!" Pins roared. "Don't waste time over him. Knock him out!"

Slag tried. He gave ground suddenly, then stopped, trying to trick Buzz into walking clean into him. He swung up a hard one, but it never connected. Instead, Buzz's glove landed clean between Slag's eyes, and Slag lost balance and went down.

Clang! It was the end of the round. When Slag got to his corner, Pins said urgently:

"Listen, Slag—stay away from him, will you? Keep him running after you."

"Shut up!" said Slag genially. "I ain't going to shut up." Pins sounded unhappy. "We've got to win, Slag. We've got to. All our dough's up with the bookies. You can see how it is."

The bell went again, and once more Buzz met Slag two-thirds of the way across the ring. The thud of his blows could be heard even above the din of the yelling.

Slag didn't heed the advice that Pins had given him. He knew he had weight, and he knew that once he hit Buzz really hard, Buzz would fold up. So he kept in close this time.

It was what Buzz wanted. Buzz had superior speed. He countered and parried, fast footwork keeping him out of serious trouble.

Slag kept right on after him, grinning all the time.

Suddenly Slag thought he saw his chance. Buzz opened his guard for a fraction of a second.

The situation called for speed as well as weight, and speed was something that Slag hadn't got just then. But he tried. He saw the point of Buzz's chin just asking to be slammed into a pulp, and he went after it.

Yet again his blow never connected. Yet again he found himself momentarily off-balance.

And Buzz leapt in. He gave Slag a clout on the side of the head that made Slag's senses reel. Before Slag could recover, Buzz drove a couple of hard ones to the body.

They left Slag wide open for what was coming to him. And it came a split second later. Buzz whizzed in a hay-maker that started from the region of his knees and lifted Slag clean off his feet.

"Gosh!" muttered Pins. "Get me a drink, somebody!"

Nobody took any notice of him. They were listening to the referee counting.

"One—two—three—"
Slag heard the referee's voice only vaguely. Every nerve in his body was urging him to get up and knock Buzz clean into the middle of the yelling crowd.

"—Four—five—six—seven—eight—"

Slag's brain was clear enough to know that only two more seconds were left. He had to get up. But somehow he couldn't. He didn't seem to have any strength left.

"—Nine—out!"
The yell increased to a roar. But Slag wasn't interested any more. He just let go and went off to sleep.

When he came to he found himself lying in the dressing-room. The tang of powerful smelling-salts was in his nose.

He shook his head and looked up. Pins was bending over him anxiously, and by his side was Pat herself. Standing a short distance away was Cash Enright, the boxing promoter who had backed Slag against Buzz.

Slag grinned at them all.
"Gosh, he socked me, didn't he?" he said. "But I should worry. The next time I meet him I'm going to turn him into soup."

Cash Enright came forward. He was a slick-looking man with wavy hair and a hard face.

"There isn't going to be any next time," he said harshly. "I've lost plenty of dough on you to-night, Slag."

"I've lost plenty of dough on myself," Slag replied ruefully. "But why worry. Give me a return match with him for a month's time, and we'll get it all back."

Enright frowned. There was a cigarette in the corner of his mouth, but he had forgotten to light it.

"Slag," he said, "you've had your chance, and you've thrown it away. You've neglected training, and I hear you've been hanging around a night-spot these fast few weeks. That isn't any good to me. I can't afford to back fighters who play that kind of game. You're finished."

Slag sat up. He had just realised that things were serious.

"But, Mr. Enright—" he began.

Enright cut in with:

"I'm sorry, Slag, but you're all washed up!"

The next minute the door had slammed behind him, and that was that.

The Kid

AN hour later Slag and Pat sat at a table in the night club where Pat worked. Pat was looking tired and disappointed.

"What's your alibi, Slag?" she asked.

August 5th, 1939.

Slag hunched his shoulders.

"I reckon I ain't got no alibi, Pat," he answered. "Buzz Kenton was just too much for me, that's all. And it was my fault. The worst of it is, Pins says we're broke."

"Broke?" Pat spoke scornfully. "Of course you're broke. Have you ever checked up on the amount of money Pins ought to have for you?"

"Well, no." Slag looked at her in a puzzled way. "But Pins is all right."

"So you say." Pat sounded impatient. "Listen to me, Slag. You've earned big money in your time, and you've never been a big spender. You ought to have loads of dough. Yet Pins says you're broke. You make me tired!"

Slag began to look troubled. All his life had been devoted to fighting, and he had never bothered about money.

"I reckon you must be wrong, Pat," he said. "Pins wouldn't—"

He broke off as a man approached the table. He had a flat nose, and was one of Slag's old sparring partners.

"Hallo, Joe!" Slag said.

Joe kept his voice low and spoke fast.

"I'm come about Pins, Slag," he said. "I think he's gone daffy." "What's the matter with him?" Slag asked.

"Well, a few minutes ago I tried to get some dough off him, and he says 'Sure—come on!' So he walks me round to the back door of the Arena."

Pat made a weary gesture. "What do you think he was going to do—knock over the safe?" she asked, meaning to be sarcastic.

"That's right, lady," Joe replied. "He wanted to cut me in on it, but I beat it. I don't want any of that stuff."

Slag jumped to his feet. He saw what Pat had been getting at then. Pins, when in a tight corner, turned crooked. And if he would knock over a safe he would rob Slag himself.

All the same, Slag and Pins had been pals a long time, and Slag wasn't the kind of guy to go back on a man.

"Come on, Pat," he said. "We've got to get him out of that place."

The Arena was only a block away, and they went there as fast as they could run. They found the back door open, the lock having been forced.

As they rushed in, a shot echoed somewhere in the building. They knew where it came from—Cash Enright's office.

As they turned a corner they saw Pins staggering towards them. He slumped against a wall, trying to keep on his feet.

"Gosh!" muttered Slag, and grabbed hold of him.

He and Pat got him into Slag's old dressing-room and sat him in a chair. Slag told Pat to sit on the arm and hold him up.

Running footsteps could be heard outside. Slag started to talk hard.

"I see what you mean, Pins," he said loudly. "I drop suddenly on my left knee, and then come up again with all I've got. Okay. The next time I'm matched, I'll try that and see—"

The door suddenly opened, and the night watchman and a cop looked in. Slag turned.

"Hiya, Jimmy!" he said to the night watchman. "Pins is giving me what's coming to me for losing to-night."

"Someone tried to crack Mr. Enright's safe," the watchman said. "Did you hear the shooting?"

"No." Slag frowned, pretending to think. "But I did hear someone going towards the hall. He was running, too."

"When?" the cop asked.

"I dunno. About a minute ago, maybe." He grinned. "I thought it was you, Jimmy, so didn't pay any attention."

The cop nodded to the watchman, and the two hurried away. Slag turned to Pat.

"We've got to get him out of here," he said. "Give me a hand."

She shook her head. She was standing up, looking down at Pins.

"I reckon there's nothing more to be done," she said. "He's—dead."

Slag blinked, speechless for the moment. Then he pulled himself together.

"We've still got to get him out of here," he said. "We'll take him along to his rooms. If the cops find him shot, there's going to be trouble for both of us. Get a taxi—I'll make some stall about pretending he's drunk."

Pat hurried away, and Slag dragged Pins' body to the back door, holding him upright as though Pins couldn't walk. He piled him into a taxi only just in time. As they got clear the sound of police sirens could be heard from farther up the street.

Safely in Pins' room, Pat looked at Slag angrily.

"Well, you've got me in a nice jam!" she said. "Why I have anything to do with you, I don't know. What do we do with him now?"

"I'll find somebody to take care of things," Slag answered. "He'll never be found. Meanwhile, we'd better empty his pockets of papers."

They got to work. Slag pulled out a long envelope and withdrew the document from inside. Pat, looking over his shoulder, gave an exclamation of surprise.

"So that's why you were both broke!" he said. "The deeds of a house! He's been buying property!"

"Some place in a joint called Hilldale," said Slag. "So that's why he used to scam out of town every Saturday without leaving any address. He kept this place secret—all ready to walk out on me the minute I was through with the fight game."

There were other papers. One was a telegram. It said:

"EEEEEE GGGG stop Arrive Hilldale to-morrow. Will meet you at the house."

It was signed "Ted."

"What do all them E's and G's mean?" Slag asked.

"You can search me about the E's," Pat answered, "but I know what the G's stand for. Four grand—four thousand dollars. And somebody named Ted is going to pay that to Pins—maybe a debt or something. What's more, you're going to be there to take it off him. It's your dough."

Slag shook his head. "I ain't going to no Hilldale," he said.

"You booh!" Pat raved. "If you hadn't got me to look after you, where would you be? And you're the guy who pesters me to marry you! You are going to Hilldale."

"I ain't."

"You are!"

And early the next morning they caught a train to Hilldale!

The house that Pins had bought was a grand little place, set in its own garden, and bright with fresh paint. Slag and Pat let themselves in with the keys they had taken from Pins' pockets, and looked about.

"Cute little joint, ain't it?" said Slag.

"Glad you like it!" Pat answered dryly. "Don't forget it was your money that bought it."

They went out into the kitchen, and found a larder stocked with food. Then they went into a living-room, and saw a photograph standing on a small table.

"Look!" Slag said. "That's Pins. I wonder who the girl is he was took with."

"I don't know," Pat replied. "Did you ever see him with her?"

"Nope."
"Then she's the one that counted with him." Pat turned abruptly at the sound of the street door opening. She and Slag hurried out into the hall.

"It'll be that Ted person," Pat said briskly.

Standing before them, looking at them doubtfully, was a small boy. He was about twelve—no more. He was carrying a suitcase, and wore a school cap.

"Hallo, son!" Slag said. "What do you want?"

The boy looked at him in a scared way.

"Please, isn't this where Mr. Streaver lives?" he asked.

"Eh? Streaver?" Slag blinked at him. "Sure, sure!" He looked at the boy curiously. "Who are you, anyway?"

"I'm Ted," the boy answered.

Pat held her hand to her head and closed her eyes. Then she remembered something, and opened her handbag. She took from it the telegram that they had found in Pins' pockets.

"Did you send this?" she asked.

Ted looked at the telegram, and nodded. He was not so scared now. He rather liked these two grown-ups he had met so unexpectedly.

"Yes, ma'am. I sent it," he said. "I sent it to Dad yesterday."

"Dad!" Ideas began to filter slowly into Slag's brain. "Say, are you Pins' boy?"

"Pins, sir?" Ted shook his head. "No, I'm—that is, James Streaver is my father."

"Well," said Slag, "what do you know about that?"

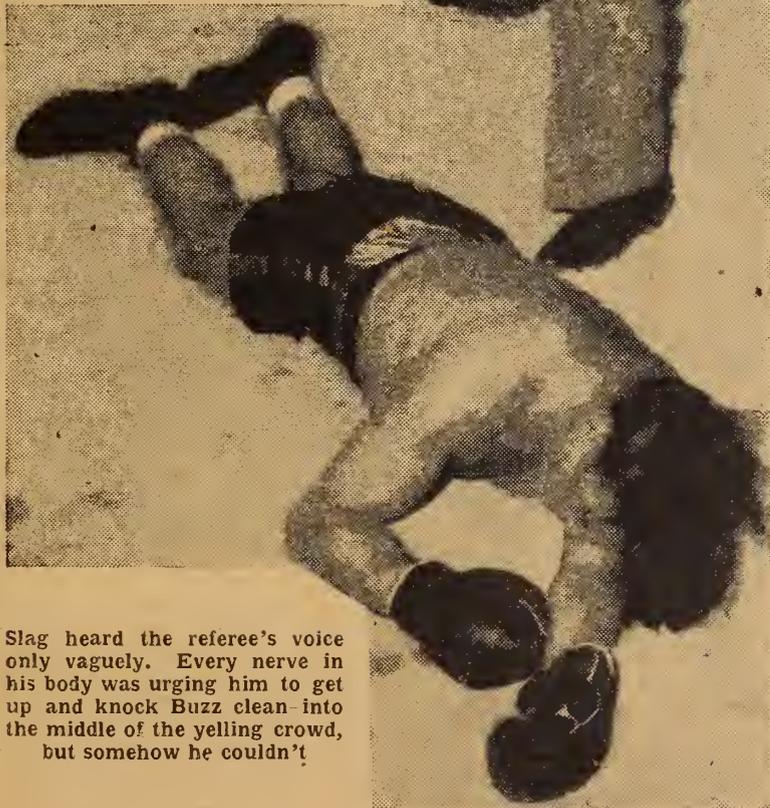

Pat waved him aside. She was still thinking about that telegram.

"What do all these E's and G's mean?" she asked.

"Excellent and Good, ma'am. They're the marks I got at school. The G's are for arithmetic, and the E's are for history." Ted smiled modestly. "I'm rather good at history."

Slag was past speech. Pat looked at Ted, and went on trying to be hard-boiled.

"I—er—well, I reckon I'd better try

Slag heard the referee's voice only vaguely. Every nerve in his body was urging him to get up and knock Buzz clean into the middle of the yelling crowd, but somehow he couldn't to fix us all something to eat," she said, and moved towards the kitchen. "Slag, you'd better have a talk with Ted while I'm gone."

Leaving Slag with the dirty work to do, she vanished. Slag muttered things about her that wouldn't have done her any good to hear, and cleared his throat noisily.

The next quarter of an hour was the worst he had ever spent in his life. Telling that kid what had happened to Pins was no easy job, especially when the kid told him that his mother had died a couple of years previously.

Slag and Pat had an orphan on their hands!

Thrown Out!

HAVING Ted to look after did strange things to Slag and Pat. They thought of the pleasant little house in Hilldale, and they thought of the noisy life of the big city—and found that they liked Hilldale best.

There was nobody to claim Pins' house, so they got married and stayed on. Pat said that the place had been bought with Slag's money, so why shouldn't they have it? Slag said that the house belonged to Ted really, but Ted wouldn't mind them living in it.

As for Ted himself—well, he thought Slag and Pat were fun. Once he had got over the shock of his father's death, he was quite ready to leave himself entirely in Slag's hands.

So Slag got busy and found himself a job. He didn't have much difficulty over that. He was well-known, and everybody liked him. The foreman at the oilfield close to Hilldale had been one of Slag's fans when Slag had been a top-line boxer, and promptly signed him on.

The money was not big, but Slag added to it by giving exhibition bouts at the local boxing booth. He made enough in those fights to pay Ted's school bills.

And so the years passed. Ted grew up, and Slag went on fighting. He got enough out of it to send Ted to college, and by the time Ted was twenty he was showing promise of doing great things.

He was in the college football team, and his professors gave him good reports. Slag and Pat felt that they had done a good job of work on him.

At last came Ted's graduation—the time for him to leave college and go out into the world.

Pat gave the house a good clean up on the day he was due home. He had told her in a letter that he was bringing a friend along, and Pat wanted to make things really nice for them.

Pat was upstairs when Ted arrived. Slag was out in the garden. He heard Ted below:

"Hey, folks! Where are you? We've arrived!"

"Coming, Ted." Slag bellowed back, and ran into the house. Then he stopped dead.

"Hallo, Dad!" Ted said. "I want you to meet—"

"Cash Enright!" said Slag grimly.

Cash Enright smiled and held out his hand. He was greyer about the temples, but he still had that hard, shifty look of old.

"Hallo, Slag!" he said.

Slag ignored the outstretched hand. Ted looked from one to the other curiously.

"Do you know, Mr. Enright, Dad?" he asked.

"Yeah, I know him." Slag's voice was low and expressionless. He turned to Cash. "What are you doing here?"

Cash laughed easily.

"Say, if this isn't a coincidence!" he said. "Young man, this is going to be easy. We won't have any difficulty selling your father our proposition."

Ted nodded eagerly.

"Mr. Enright is going to help me make a lot of money in the next two or three years," he said quickly. "He's going to put me into the fight game. He's been watching me play football, and thinks he can train me for the ring."

"Sure," Cash broke in. "It'll be a cinch to build him up for a slot at the title."

"And with all that money," Ted added, "think of the things I could do for you and Mom."

At that moment Pat walked in. She stared at Cash coldly. She had never liked him in the old days, and liked him still less now.

"I heard what you said," she told him. "So you want to get your hands on another poor kid and hammer the heart and sense out of him, like you did to all the others—just to make a few more rotten dollars."

Cash grinned at her ingratiatingly.

"Well, if it isn't Pat!" he said. "I often wondered what had happened to you two. If you listen to what I've got to say—"

Pat went up to him angrily.

"Listen, Cash. If you try to talk Ted into going into the fight racket, I'll brain you."

Cash turned to Slag, his expression nasty.

"Slag, can't you shut her up?" he said.

Slag didn't like his tone, and he wasn't going to have Pat spoken about like that by anyone. He took Cash by the shoulders and swung him towards the door.

August 5th, 1939.

"Outside, you!" he snapped. "And stay out."

Ted tried to intervene.

"Listen, Dad," he said. "I brought Mr. Enright down here—"

"Mom's right," Slag cut in quickly.

"He'll make a dim-witted, pulp-faced, burned-out old man before you've had a chance to know what it's all about. The fight game is lousy. I got put out on my ear when I was licked by Buzz Kenton, and Buzz became the blue-eyed boy. Do you know what's happened to Buzz since then? He got flung out, too, and the last I heard of him he was tramping the State trying to beg food to eat. And there have been others—Batling Jamieson, Terror Fortuna, and that Bronx kid, young Nelson."

"But, Dad—"

"He'll make you a pal of all the crooks and chisellers from coast to coast," Slag went on. "And he'll join them in laughing at you when you're through. He'll make you rich for a minute and poor for the rest of your life—that's what he'll do for you." He shook Cash violently. "Now get out of here, or for once in your easy life you're going to get what's coming to you."

He ran Cash to the door. Ted took a step forward to interfere. Pat caught hold of his arm.

"You stay here," she said.

Slag got Cash outside on the veranda, and gave a mighty heave. Cash tumbled down the steps, and before he could pick himself up Slag had slammed the door hard behind him.

Ted freed himself from Pat, and confronted Slag angrily.

"Listen, Dad," he said. "I'm not going to throw away a chance like this. Suppose I do what you and Mom want—go to law school. It'll be years before I can make any real money, and you know it. But if I grab this, I can clean up in a couple of years."

Slag looked at him wearily.

"Clean up in a couple of years!" he said scornfully. "You're trying to tell me what's going to happen! I know what Cash Enright does to people."

Pat nodded vigorously. However hard-boiled she might have been in the past, she loved Ted as though he had been her own son.

"Yeah, and I could tell you a few things about him, too," she cut in.

Slag waved her to silence.

"You stay out of this, Pat," he said. "Ted and me are going to settle things."

He turned back to Ted. "I'm going to tell you about a guy I ran into about a week ago. He was a college fellow, too—he was another who started to clean up in a couple of years."

"But look at all the big fighters, Dad," Ted interrupted. "They're not down and out. They had to start at the bottom, the same as I want to."

"I know," Slag said. "And for every top notcher, there are a thousand walking on their heels. Anyway, I was going to tell you about this guy. Cash Enright caught him when he was young. He found him in a college football team—just the same as you—and the lad had also done a bit of school boxing."

"Billy Boone!" Pat exclaimed.

"Yeah, Bill Boone," Slag answered. "Well, Billy trained to fight standard and had a couple of bouts matched against palookas. And he licked them—just like he was meant to do. Then Cash was told he would have to lose the next fight—just because the betting went that way. It was a build up for big money. The kid would take a dive, and then, when the odds would be against him for a future fight, he would get a knock-out on the next bout and put Cash Enright into the big dough."

"And Billy refused," Pat said.

"That's right. Billy refused. He said he was going to fight the clean way. So what happened? Cash put him out on his ear."

Ted made a gesture of impatience.

"What of it?" he said. "He could still go ahead with some other career."

Slag shook his head.

"That's where you're wrong, Ted, he couldn't. He'd forgotten everything he knew. He was punch-drunk—he had to be giving it and taking it, or he wasn't happy. So what happened. He goes on the booze, and ended up last week in the Hilldale jail."

"And he sent for Dad to bail him out," Pat said, taking up the threads of the story. "Dad brought him home here, and what did he have to do? He ate our food, borrowed some money, stole a lot more, and cleared out, leaving Dad to lose the cash he had put up as bail." Her voice was bitter. "That's the kind of heel he had become—because of Cash Enright. It's a good job that bail money wasn't heavy, or it would have broke us."

Ted was not convinced. He had set his heart on the fight game, and wasn't going to listen to reason.

"If I got big money," he said, "look what I could do for you both."

"We don't want things done for us," Pat said. "Not that way, anyhow."

"We've always looked after ourselves," Slag added.

Ted nodded patiently.

"That's true," he admitted. "And you've looked after me, too. I don't forget that. But I'm not a kid any more. You can't make my decisions for me."

Slag put his hand on Ted's shoulder.

"This is one we've got to make for you, son," he said kindly.

Ted drew away angrily.

"So that's it!" he said. "You think I'm not capable of managing my own life, eh?"

"It looks that way," Slag answered. "Right!" Ted's face was red and his hands were trembling. "Then I'm not going to argue with you any more. I'll just tell you instead. I'm going through with that deal with Enright."

Slag faced him, a gleam in his eye.

"You're not," he said flatly.

"I'm twenty-one," Ted persisted, "and I can do what I darned well please."

Slag did not move.

"You think so?" he asked.

"I'm sure so. And what's more, I'm going to start right now."

Slag planted his feet wide apart. The grin, the easy-going demeanour, that had been his main characteristic in the old days, had gone completely now.

"All right," he said. "You say you're going to do what you like, and you ain't going to argue any more. That's fine. I'm not going to argue either. I'm going to tell you. You're going to law school the way we planned—you're going to amount to something. And if it takes longer to make big dough that way, well, you're going to take longer, that's all."

"You're wasting your time, talking like this," Ted snapped.

"I am, huh?" Slag squared his shoulders. "Okay. Maybe when I was in the fight game I wasn't anything but a third-rater, but I've still got enough left in me to knock any fool notions out of your head."

"That's what you think," Ted said rudely.

"Yeah, that's what I think. Take care of yourself, can you?"

"You bet I can."
"Well, start doing it."

And deliberately, knowing what was bound to happen, Slag reached out and brought the flat of his hand hard across Ted's face.

The Last Fight

TED started back, his face scarlet except for the white marks left by Slag's fingers. He stared at Slag unbelievably, not knowing what to do.

"Come on," said Slag. "I'm going to knock some sense into you. Put up your hands."

Ted put them up—a little uncertainly. Slag gave him a light blow on the side of the jaw.

"Come on, prize-fighter!" Slag taunted. "See how you like it!"

That last blow sent Ted into a fury. He lashed out, aiming a left at Slag's face. Slag stepped back easily, and while Ted was off balance and trying to recover, sent a wicked right in between Ted's eyes.

"What's the matter, Champ?" Slag wanted to know. "Another one like that, and you'll be cold."

Ted rushed in, still in a rage. Yet again Slag stepped away and rammed home a hard one. Ted tottered back, clutching wildly at nothing, and went down with a crash.

Slag grinned and helped him to his feet. Then he stood back, waiting.

Ted did nothing for a moment or two. He was shaking the dizziness out of his head. Then he came on again.

But this time he did not rush. He had learnt his lesson. It was no good losing one's temper with a fighter like Slag. Slag had tactics and science—he was slow but clever.

So Ted became slow and clever, too. He went down into proper fighting position and edged himself forward.

Slag saw him coming, and his grin widened. He waited until Ted was near enough, then got his left into action again.

But Ted wasn't there when it ought to have connected. He let the blow go past him, and put his right hard on to Slag's nose. Slag staggered backwards, blinking, wondering what had happened.

He realised that Ted had been doing some fighting before. Ted's blow had been shrewd and well-timed. Slag decided to go all out on him. The boy had to be taught his lesson, and this was the time to do it.

He went in with all the ringeraft he knew and gave Ted a couple of hard body blows. Ted took them comfortably, and countered with another smasher to Slag's face.

"How do you like it, prize-fighter?" Ted said tauntingly.

Pat stood on a chair, waving her arms about excitedly.

"Give it to him, Slag!" she cried. "Show him some sense! Knock him out!"

Slag grinned again, and decided that he would take Pat's advice. The only way to cope with an obstinate kid like this was to get really rough.

He feinted with his right to draw Ted's guard, and then started a hay-maker on its way. The blow started from the region of Slag's knees, and came upwards with crashing force as he gathered his weight behind it.

But Ted had realised what was coming, and against Slag's science he had speed. He smothered the hay-maker by going backwards and beating it down, and then stepped forward with one of his own.

Again it was beautifully timed. It landed full on the point of Slag's chin, and Slag, completely unprepared for it, gave a grunt of mingled surprise and pain and went over backwards. He hit the floor with a thud that rocked the house.

The moment he was down, Ted realised what he had done. He rushed forward and dropped on one knee.

"Dad!" he cried. "I'm sorry! If you hadn't started—" He broke off, then repeated. "I'm sorry, dad!"

Pat jumped off her chair and knelt down on the other side of Slag. She put her arm under Slag's head.

"Sorry!" she shouted at Ted. "You ought to be! Picking Cash Enright instead of him, after the way he's sweated his life out to give you a chance like other boys—and you not even his son! Going without things so that you could have everything your own father would have wanted you to have!"

Ted hung his head, ashamed.
"Do you know what he's been doing?" Pat went on fiercely. "He's been going out of nights, down to the local boxing booth, letting those rats down there make a chopping-block of him so as to pay for you at college—trying to give you a chance to be something better than he was. And if you ever turn out to be one-tenth as good —"

She stopped. Slag was moving. He opened his eyes, looked up at them both, and grinned again.

"Dad, I didn't mean it," Ted said miserably.

"I know you didn't, son," Slag said. "I asked for it—and I got it."

Ted tried to keep the tears from coming into his eyes.

"Dad, you're right about Cash," he said. "I'll go to law school if you still want it."

Slag sat up, fingering his jaw.
"It would be better that way, Ted," he said. "Honest, it would. I reckon you deserve to be different from me and the rest of the mugs."

Ted nodded, reached out, and took hold of Slag's right hand.

"I will be," he said. "You see."

Pat glared at him, conscious that her eyes were misty. She tried to cover it up by going hard-boiled again.

"Say, what are you hanging around for?" she said to Ted. "Go upstairs and get the witch-hazel and the cotton-wool. And hurry!"

Ted scrambled to his feet and hurried away. Slag watched him go, then put his hand on Pat's shoulder. He grinned at her. She smiled back, and a tear ran down her nose.

"Okay, now?" Slag asked.

"Okay, Slag," Pat answered. "You're a great guy. And you won your last fight by losing it."

And unable to hold back the tears any more, she buried her face in his coat.

GREAT ADVENTURES OF WILD BILL HICKOK"

Follow the adventures of Bill Hickok in this thrill-packed serial. The pounding of hoofs and the roar of blazing guns echo through its vivid chapters

EPISODE 10:—

"Savage Vengeance"

Read This First

Wild Bill Hickok, United States marshal in Abilene, Kansas, declares war on the Phantom Raiders, a powerful organisation of outlaws dominated by a ruthless schemer known as "Lynx" Morrell.

Morrell and his associates are bent on a dual purpose—firstly, to prevent the movements of cattle from Texas to Kansas, where beef is fetching high prices—secondly, to hold up construction on a railroad which is being extended from the north and which constitutes a threat to their ambitions.

The crooks' ultimate aim is to obtain possession of the lands owned by the Texas cattle-barons, who, under the leadership of a rancher named Cameron, have banded themselves together with the object of driving their combined herds north to Abilene via the Chisholm trail.

The Texans set out on their long and perilous journey through the wilderness, the expedition comprising supply wagons, cowmen and their womenfolk, and thousands of head of steers.

Meanwhile, away up in Abilene, Bill Hickok obtains information which causes him to ride south and contact the Cameron column, and he is instrumental in saving the Texans from massacre during an Indian uprising engineered by the Phantom Raiders.

Afterwards, Bill returns to Kansas, but in due course heads southward again, unaware that Cameron has met August 5th, 1939.

his death and that the Texans are contemplating retreat.

On the trail he is attacked and captured by renegade Indians in the pay of Morrell, and carried to the Red-skin encampment, is condemned to die at the stake.

Reprieve

ADVENTUROUS as his career had been, familiar as he was with the perils of the frontier, Wild Bill Hickok had never been involved in a plight so desperate as that in which he stood now.

Deprived of his death-dealing guns, a prisoner of the infamous Vulture and his band of renegade Indians, a helpless figure lashed to the stake, the marshal believed that his doom was imminent as the leader of his foes flourished that blazing brand and prepared to thrust it into the brushwood that was piled about him.

Yet before the Vulture could plunge that brand into the heap of dry faggots Bill Hickok saw a chance of saving himself from the ghastly fate with which he was threatened.

Physical prowess could not have aided him. Muscular as he was, he could never have burst the bonds that secured him to the stake, and even if that had been possible he would have been instantly massacred by the Redskins who surrounded him. But presence of mind and quickness of wit came to his rescue as he suddenly beheld a shadow commencing to intervene between the vivid, brazen orb that was the sun and the world to which he was in danger of bidding farewell for ever.

It was then that he remembered the expected eclipse for which he had been interestedly keeping a look-out when he had been ambushed and captured, and as he realised that it was about to take place he immediately perceived that he might profit by the phenomenon.

"Wait, Vulture," he jerked. "I say you do great wrong by burning me at the stake. I say my death will displease the Great Spirit and bring misfortune to you and your brothers. I say that if you set fire to this brushwood the Great Spirit will move his hand across the face of the sun and bring on the night as a sign of his wrath."

The Vulture had stayed his hand to listen to what the captive had to say, but having heard him out, he was clearly unimpressed by the white man's prophetic declaration. For his lean, rascally countenance merely registered a look of mockery.

"Big Thunder would make fool of me," he jeered.

"I speak the truth," Bill Hickok retorted. "You will see."

A derisive laugh was the Vulture's only response, and flourishing the torch again, he lowered it deliberately and forced it into the brushwood that had been piled around the marshal, the twigs and foliage speedily becoming ignited.

Meanwhile, however, the shadow of the moon was continuing to pass slowly across the face of the noonday sun, and with the brush crackling sinistral before him and flames mounting luridly from the heaped vegetation Bill threw a glance skyward.

"Look!" he rapped out. "Look, Vulture! Now do you see?"

The Vulture raised his head as did the other Indians who had formed a ring about the stake, and at once they descried that the sun was huff obscured. And as they gazed aloft with awe succeeding the fiendish expressions that had hitherto stamped their features, the shadow of the moon gradually obliterated the sun in its entirety so that they and their intended victim were enveloped in a darkness as thick as the gloom of night.

It was a darkness complete but for the flicker of flames arising from the brushwood in the close vicinity of the stake, and not for long did those flames continue to play. For on a sudden a Redskin standing close to the Vulture leapt forward, tore away the burning brand and such of the faggots as had caught fire and flinging them to the dust, stamped them underfoot and extinguished them.

In another moment that same Redskin had cast himself on his knees in an attitude of fearful reverence, and the Vulture excepted, the other Indians made haste to fall into the like posture, crouching there with abject faces uplifted to the sombre heavens.

Bound to the stake, Wild Bill Hickok drew in a long breath. He had gambled on the superstitious credulity of the savages, and it looked as if the gamble had proved successful. Nor did he have occasion to doubt the success of that gamble when the ecliptic phenomenon at length came to an end. For as the shadow of the moon passed clear of the sun's orbit and allowed the light of day to shine forth again the Redskins who had dropped to their knees rose up and turned apprehensive glances on the marshal.

"Big Thunder spoke true words," faltered the Indian who had quenched the blazing faggots and the torch that the Vulture had thrust into them. "I, Moon Dog, say that Big Thunder must not perish by any hand of ours."

There was a tremulous murmur of assent from those other Redskins who had knelt reverently during the period of the eclipse. But the Vulture did not add his voice to that murmur. Alone among the renegades he was still in murderous mood, and plucking a knife from a belt around his waist, was lunging towards the marshal when the Indian known as Moon Dog sprang to intercept him.

Seizing the Vulture by the wrist, Moon Dog dragged him back from the captive.

"No," he cried vehemently. "No, Vulture! Big Thunder gave sign. No can kill!"

"Maybe you no can kill!" the Vulture snarled. "But I am not afraid."

"Moon Dog say no kill!" the other insisted. "You bring great trouble on us! Moon Dog say no kill!"

The Vulture was the leader of that band of renegades, yet it was plain that Moon Dog was a personage of influence amongst them. Moreover, it was obvious that Moon Dog had the support of the rest of the Indians present, and, divining that these might even turn on him if he persisted in his desire to slay Bill Hickok, the Vulture sullenly discarded his knife.

"What of our bargain with the white man who bribed us to kill Big Thunder?" he muttered, when he had let the dagger fall to the ground. "What of the rest of the gold he was to pay us? We were to buy much fire-water with it—and good guns."

"We take Big Thunder alive to that white man at Wolfville," Moon Dog retorted. "We get gold just the same. But we no kill. We leave that to white man. Then Great Spirit make no bad medicine for us."

The arrangement met with general approval, and within a few minutes Bill Hickok had been untied from the stake and marched to the edge of the encampment, on the fringe of which his own bronco Pinto and the mustangs of the Indians were picketed. There, covered by his captors, the marshal was compelled to climb astride his pony with his arms pinioned by a lariat which had been slung over him and which the Vulture was holding. Then, the leader of the renegades mounting a sorrel horse and Moon Dog and two powerfully built braves scrambling on to the backs of three other steeds, a start was made for the town of Wolfville, which lay half a day's journey to the north-east and which possessed an unsavoury reputation, as Bill well knew.

The remainder of the Indians watched prisoner and escort until they had passed out of sight of the encampment, and for the marshal and the four Redskins who were in charge of him there ensued a brisk journey through the hills which environed that encampment.

Bill was forced to keep ahead of his captors. Riding abreast of one another, these followed at a distance of a dozen yards, the Vulture linked to Bill by the rope which encircled the officer of the law and which the Redskin had twined round his own right wrist.

In this formation the quartet presently debouched on to an expanse of prairie bounded on the north-east by a stretch of terrain cluttered with massive rocks, and, the Vulture calling out terse directions to him from time to time, Bill at length found himself in close proximity to that boulder-strewn tract.

He had been speculating on the identity of the white man whom the Indians intended to seek out in Wolfville, but he had no desire to make that individual's acquaintance yet awhile—and certainly not as a prisoner. And he had scarcely reached the rocks to which he had been directed when he unexpectedly jabbed his heels into Pinto's flanks.

The bronco was prompt to respond. It shot forward from trot to gallop with an impetus that might have been likened to the velocity of a stone discharged from a catapult. Simultaneously Bill braced himself to counteract the tug of the rope that connected him to the Vulture, and, taken completely unawares, that dusky ruffian was whipped clear over his mustang's neck as the lasso was wrenched taut.

The renegade crashed to earth, and was dragged forward as Pinto careered into the midst of the huge boulders that littered the ground ahead. Twenty paces the Vulture was hauled, then his skull came into sickening collision with a snag of rock, and cracked as if it had been an egg-shell, his brains splattering the dust.

By then Pinto and Bill Hickok had disappeared among the boulders—before Moon Dog and the other two Redskins could fire so much as a single shot—and a split-second after the leader of the renegades had met his death against that snag of rock the marshal contrived to tear the lariat's noose from around his arms and extricate himself from the imprisoning loop.

He spurred onward. Behind him there arose a fierce outcry and a sudden, swift tattoo of hoofs—sounds that told him the Vulture's cronies were surging forward to give chase—and, though he had no doubts concerning Pinto's ability to outstrip the Indians' mounts, he had no intention of matching the paint stallion's speed against that of his enemies' mustangs. He wanted his guns, and they were in the possession of one of the two braves who were with Moon Dog.

He had gone no more than a hundred yards through the rocks when he jumped from the saddle, and, shouting to Pinto to keep going, he scrambled to the craggy side of a high boulder—had barely gained the peak of it when Moon Dog and his comrades swept into his view.

They were riding side by side, following the dust-clouds raised by the flying feet of Pinto, who had vanished among the rocks farther on, and no sooner were the three Indians below him than Wild Bill hurled himself upon them.

He lauded atop of them, enveloping the trio in his powerful arms. Next instant white man and Redskins were thumping to the ground with an impact for which the marshal was prepared, but for which his foes were not.

Bill was the first to rise. Moon Dog was the next to reach his feet, but almost immediately renewed his acquaintance with the dirt, for he encountered an Anglo-Saxon upper-cut that laid him as flat as a tepee rug and buffeted the wits clean out of his feather-decked head.

The other two renegades struggled up, only to feel the weight of Bill's blunCHED knuckles as well. They had no chance to use musket, six-gun, or knife—were slammed senseless ere they could make any dangerous move—and just thirty seconds later Bill Hickok had retrieved his prized forty-fives and was uttering a shrill whistle that was calculated to bring Pinto back to him.

Smart enough the bronco soon returned to him, and, swinging himself into the saddle again, he abandoned the unconscious renegades and made tracks for the west.

Half an hour afterwards he picked up the Chisholm trail and turned southward along it in the expectation of meeting up with the Cameron column; and it was about four o'clock of that same afternoon that he finally came upon the Texans at the point near which the rancher who had headed the expedition had died so tragically.

The fight which had broken out between Scudder, Keno, Jim Blakely and Kit Lawson had been stopped, the other men in the outfit having intervened. Yet it was plain to Bill when he arrived on the scene and dismounted that all was not well, and espying Ruth Cameron among the assemblage gathered there, he singled her out and addressed her inquiringly.

"Howdy, Miss Cameron?" he greeted. "Are you folks camping here for a spell?"

Scudder was near by, somewhat bruised of countenance but belligerent of manner, and he stepped close to Bill before Ruth could reply.

"No, we're not campin' here, Mr. Hickok," he said thickly. "We're headin' back to Texas where we belong."

Bill surveyed him coolly.

"I sort of heard rumours that a fellow by the name of Scudder was trying to spread discontent through the outfit," he observed. "It appears a hunter who spent a night in camp with this expedition showed up in Abilene a week or so back with word to that effect. That's why I'm here."

He turned to Ruth again.

"Is your father around, Miss Cameron?" he asked.

The girl's eyes filled with tears, and approaching Bill, Jim Blakeley related the news of Cameron's death, whereupon the marshal was silent for a spell. Then, after expressing his condolence to Ruth, he once more addressed himself to Scudder.

"Listen," he said, "you may be from the Lone Star State, but you answer to the name and description of a hombre who used to hang out in Abilene and who wasn't too highly thought of by the folks around there. Anyhow, I'm giving it as my opinion that whatever you may be aiming to do, the rest of these people won't be of the same mind as yourself after I've had a talk with them."

"No?" Scudder sneered. "Talk's cheap, Hickok."

Bill took his hand across the ruffian's face in a sharp, stinging blow, and at that Keno made as if to pounce on the marshal from the rear, only to be held in check as Kit Lawson pulled a six-shooter and covered him. As for Scudder, he had recoiled with hand up-lifted to his cheek, but in another moment he ripped out an oath and reached for a revolver he was wearing on his hip.

Bill could easily have beaten him to the draw and plugged him. He refrained from doing so, however, and instead gripped the rogue by the front of his shirt with one hand and let loose a smashing punch with the other.

Scudder went down and stayed down for several seconds. Then he rose, and though he scowled darkly at Bill, he seemed to think better of trying to settle the issue by gunplay, for he kept his fingers away from his holster.

"Now cut your hundred measly head of steers out of the herd and get going!" the officer of the law commanded tersely. "Go on, beat it!"

Scudder slouched off, and Keno did not have to be told to accompany him. And under Kit Lawson's supervision the pair of them had mounted up and had departed with the hundred head of cattle to which Bill had referred, when the marshal commenced to harangue the personnel of the Cameron column.

"Folks," he began, "there's just one question I want to ask you. Are you real Texans?"

There was a murmur of assent, which Bill quickly interrupted.

"Maybe you think you are," he declared, breaking in on their concerted response. "But you're not the kind of Texans who fought with Davy Crockett at the Alamo. Listen, while the wagoners and outriders and punchers among you stand here bickering like a lot of old women, men up in the north—real men—are risking their lives to complete the railroad that's going to help your state if you'll take advantage of it. And that railroad will be completed in a short time—to be ready for you when you reach trail's end."

His audience looked sheepish, and he saw that his homily had created an effect and was bidding fair to shame them out of all inclination to abandon their enterprise.

"Now what is it to be?" he demanded of them. "Back to Texas in disgrace or on to Abilene with honour?"

A dubious pause ensued. Then someone raised the cry of "Abilene," and it was a cry that was taken up on every side until the whole concourse was shouting it in determined accents.

"That's the spirit of the Lone Star State!" Bill announced, when the hubbub had died down, and immediately afterwards he was receiving the thanks of Ruth, Jim Blakely and Kit Lawson for the manner in which he had restored the confidence of the people of the column.

"Aw, that's all right, friends," he drawled in response to their appreciative words. "But say, where's my little pal Buddy? I don't see him about anywhere."

It was Ruth who answered him.

"He's gone, Bill," she told him, a worried expression dawning on her pretty features. "One minute he was close by me, and in the next I caught sight of him riding off on that little pony dad gave him. I couldn't follow him at the time because things were looking so bad here. But I suppose he thought we were going back to Via Vista, and dreaded the idea of being caught and whipped raw by that heartless storekeeper he and the half-breed boy Jerry used to work for."

"You mean the fellow he called Stone," Bill rejoined through clenched teeth. "Tell me, Miss Ruth, which way did Buddy head when he left here?"

"East was the direction he took," was the reply. "East towards the hills."

"East, eh?" Bill mused. "I'll bet he went to look for Jerry. Yes, I'll gamble on that, for Grey Eagle's tribe isn't very far away. Look, Miss Ruth, you folks get the column moving, and I'll ride into the hills and see if I can find Buddy. If I'm lucky, I may have him safely back with the outfit before you make your next camp."

ABOUT the time that Bill Hickok set out to make a search for little Buddy, that diminutive youngster might have been located near the rim of a hundred-foot cliff some miles to the east of the Chisholm trail.

The half-breed lad Jerry was with him, for as Bill had surmised, Buddy had left the Cameron column with the object of seeking that boy who had been his friend and his companion in misfortune in Via Vista.

Fortunately for Buddy, he had fallen in with a band of friendly Indians belonging to Grey Eagle's tribe, and these had conveyed him to the Comanche head-chief's village where he had been reunited with Jerry and where he had informed the latter that he wanted to live with him and the Redskins—as a happy alternative to returning to Via Vista.

Jerry had been all in favour of the idea, and after Buddy had been provided with a meal in the Indian village the older boy had invited him to accompany him on a ride through the hills, it being Jerry's custom to enjoy a canter during the afternoons, when the heat of the sun was on the wane.

At present the two of them were a long way from Grey Eagle's village, and having dismounted to rest their ponies, they were discussing the customs of the race among whom Buddy had elected to spend his life.

It was a discussion during which Jerry retailed many of the traditions and habits that were current among the people of the Comanche nation. Then the subject of hunting eventually cropping up and Buddy expressing a desire to become adept in archery, his half-breed chum laid hold of a bow and a quiver full of arrows which he had brought with him from the Indian village.

He was soon instructing Buddy in the art of using a bow and arrow, and it was while he was demonstrating that art that he suddenly heard movements in some thickets hard by.

A moment later a man emerged from those thickets on horseback. He was a white man, and lowering the bow and a feathered shaft he was grasping, Jerry was on the point of volunteering an amiable greeting when he recognised the newcomer.

"Stone!" he blurted.

Buddy was quick to identify the horseman as well, and with a scared exclamation he made a rush for his pony. Nor did Jerry lose any time in following his little friend's example, but before either of them could reach their mounts Stone had spurred forward and interposed himself between them and their mustangs.

The two boys retreated then, and climbing out of the saddle Stone surveyed them ominously. There was an evil look on his cadaverous face and a baleful glint in his narrow eyes.

"I heard your voices as I was passin' by," he said slowly, "and I thought they sounded familiar. That's why I turned aside an' pushed through the brushwood, and I'm sure glad I did. Yeah, I'm sure glad I did."

He drew in a long breath, then went on speaking in a harsher tone.

"I knew I'd catch up with you two some day," he rasped. "So you didn't like workin' for me and my partner Mr. Jenkins hack in Via Vista, hey? First one and then the other of you ran away thinkin' you could escape me, hey? Ran away an' left Mr. Jenkins and me short-handed at the store—and me havin' gono to the trouble of takin' out papers that made me your lawful guardian, too."

He took a step towards the youngsters.

"Well," he continued, "I've found the pair of you again, and you're comin' with me. Right now I'm headed for Wolfville, an' that's where you're goin'. And from there I'm packin' you back to Via Vista. But before I do pack you back there I'm gonna tan the hide off the both of you—and when I'm through with you neither one of you will ever have the notion to give me the slip a second time."

Young Buddy was trembling, but Jerry had stiffened. Not without justification had the Indians named the half-breed boy little Bravo Heart, and as Stone moved forward again the elder of the two lads brought up the bow and arrow he was clutching and levelled the feathered bolt at the advancing storkeeper.

"Keep back, Mr. Stone!" he panted. "Legal papers don't mean nothin' to us, and you're not takin' us anywhere."

"Put that toy away!" Stone snapped, still advancing.

"This is no toy," Jerry warned. "You get out of here or I'll shoot—and shoot straight!"

He retreated a pace as he made the threat, and at the same time drew back the levelled arrow so that the bowstring was stretched taut. But that retrograde pace proved his undoing, for he tripped over a small rock that was embedded in the ground, and as he reeled he lost his grip on the arrow and missed his aim as well.

The shaft whistled harmlessly above Stone's head, and in an instant the rogue pounced on Jerry and struck him a savage blow in the face. It was a blow that knocked the boy staggering, and the rim of the cliff was only two or three yards behind him—fatally close, for suddenly the lad was toppling over it, and uttering a scream that was punctuated by a shrill cry of horror on the part of Buddy, he plunged from sight and hurtled downward through a hundred feet of space.

Stone had not intended to send him to his doom, and with Jerry's shriek ringing in his ears he stood motionless for a few seconds with an expression of awe on his lean face. Not for long was he impressed by the tragic result of the blow he had struck, however, and with a shrug of his shoulders he turned all at once towards Buddy as if to take charge of the latter.

Yet he was not destined to lay hands on Buddy, for in the very moment that he turned in the little fellow's direction he perceived a lone rider cantering across an expanse of plain away to the east of the cliff over which Jerry had fallen—a rider who was too far off to recognise, but who was mounted on a paint horse which caused Stone to hazard a guess at his identity.

"Hickok!" the storkeeper jerked involuntarily, and immediately losing interest in Buddy, he made tracks for his bronc, scrambled astride the animal and spurred from the scene.

The rider whom he had espied was indeed Bill Hickok, and some time afterwards Buddy was by the marshal's side and was giving him a tearful account of all that had occurred the youngster having found a winding path that had enabled him to descend the cliff safely.

The two of them located Jerry among some boulders in the shadow of that cliff. He was dead, and it was with an expression of mingled sorrow and determination on his handsome countenance that Bill gathered him in his arms and laid him across Pinto's saddle-bow. Then, remounting and lifting the weeping Buddy up behind him, he headed in the direction of the Chisholm trail.

An hour or two later Bill Hickok rejoined the Cameron column, coming upon the wagon-train in a valley where the Texans had encamped, and there in the presence of a sympathetic crowd which speedily congregated around him the officer of the law climbed down from his stallion with Buddy and lowered the lifeless body of Jerry to the ground.

Kneeling by the prone form of the half-breed boy with Ruth Cameron and Jim Blakely and Kit Lawson close beside him, Bill spoke in a voice that was pent-up with emotion.

"The rat who answers to the name of Stone was responsible for this," he said, "and according to little Buddy, Stone was on his way to Wolfville. I'm going there, too, and I'm packing a bullet that will carry this message: 'Remember young Jerry!'"

He paused, then went on speaking.

"I'll be hitting the trail as soon as we've buried Jerry," he murmured. "As for Buddy here, he needn't worry about falling foul of Stone again. I'll see to it that Stone never has the chance to bother him any more. Incidentally, I've told the little fellow there's no question of you turning back, Miss Ruth, and he wants to stick with you."

The sun was now dipping beyond the hills in the west, and it was as the shades of night were enfolding the landscape that Wild Bill Hickok once more detached himself from the Cameron outfit, bearing with him the memory of a grave that was Jerry's last resting-place—and the memory of young Buddy sobbing his heart out in one of the prairie schooners of the "train."

Throughout the greater part of that night and all through the forenoon of the following day Bill was in the saddle, and the sun had attained its meridian when the stalwart representative of the law entered the town of Wolfville, which consisted of a single street of crude frame buildings.

The marshal was not wearing his badge. In view of the settlement's ugly reputation, he had no desire to advertise his calling until he had checked up on the place, which he had never before visited. He was planning to remain incognito while he took the measure of the town—though, having heard that Wolfville was supposed to be a haunt of outlaws, he was alive to the possibility of meeting up with some desperado who knew him.

Half-way along the settlement's street, and on the north side of the dusty thoroughfare, there stood a mean-looking saloon. In front of this Bill drew his bronc Pinto to a halt, and, throwing the animal's rein loosely over a hitch-rail, he dismounted and strode into the establishment.

There were half a dozen men drinking together at the bar. They were of rascally appearance, but were all strangers to Bill, and they returned casually enough the brief glance which he cast in their direction as he seated himself at a table a few yards from the counter. Then a greasy individual who had been serving those men rounded the bar and approached the marshal.

"Howdy, mister," this individual

August 5th, 1939.

greeted. "What can I do for you?"

"I'd like some grub," Bill answered. "What have you got?"

He was offered the choice of several dishes, and within five minutes of his having made his selection an adequate meal was set before him.

The man who had taken his order and served him pulled up a chair and sat beside him. He turned out to be the proprietor of the saloon, and mentioned that he was called "Cactus" Dawson. He also proved to be of an inquisitive disposition, and after some conversation asked what Bill's name was.

"I've got my reasons for keeping that to myself," was the marshal's response.

Cactus Dawson jumped to the conclusion that Bill was a fugitive from justice, and, noting the two guns the latter was wearing, tentatively suggested that if he had any outstanding ability as a "triggerman" he might find work to his liking in that part of the country.

Wondering what the fellow was driving at, Bill took him up on the suggestion, and hinted that he was more than ordinarily skilful in the handling of a six-shooter, whereupon Cactus Dawson leaned closer to him.

"Did you ever hear of the Phantom Raiders?" he asked slyly.

"Why, yes," Bill answered. "I've heard of them."

Cactus indicated the men at the bar.

"There's some of 'em," he muttered. "And I'm mixed up with the organisation myself. They use my saloon as a sort of clearin'-house for stores and ammunition. A man named Morrell is the big chief, and he might find a job for you if you're as smart with a shootin' iron as you claim to be. Tell me, do you happen to know a hombre called Wild Bill Hickok?"

The marshal had become tense.

"Wild Bill Hickok!" he reiterated. "Sure, I know him—and if there's one man I'd like to rub out it's that star-packing peace officer."

"You would? Then you're among friends. Me an' the boys here have never seen this Hickok, but it appears he's been makin' a heap o' trouble for some o' the other fellers in the organisation. Now listen, Morrell ain't in town just now. He left early this mornin' for Silver River. But his right-hand man—"

He broke off, for at that juncture the swing-doors of the bar-room were thrust apart and a thin-visaged, dark-moustached personage entered the saloon—a personage at sight of whom Cactus Dawson laid a hand on Bill's sleeve.

"Why, here's Morrell's right-hand man now," he announced. "I'll introduce you. Hey, Stone."

Stone! Bill swung round in his chair as Cactus uttered that name, and he saw in Stone that scoundrel who had escaped from his custody a week or two before—that scoundrel whom the marshal had known to be a prominent member of the Raiders' organisation, though he had not been aware of his name at the time.

Stone clapped eyes on the officer of the law simultaneously, and astonishment and consternation were painted on his cadaverous face in the liveliest colours.

"Hickok!" he yelled.

The men at the bar wheeled, quick to take the alarm. Cactus Dawson started up with an oath and clutched at a knife that was tucked inside a belt which incircled his waist. In the same instant, however, Bill rammed the table hard against the saloon-owner's midriff and capsized that table atop of him as the greasy ruffian fell to the floor with a grunt. Then, incensed by odds that were too heavy even for him, the marshal dived for a door that stood ajar in the rear wall of the bar-room.

He charged through into an apartment that contained a considerable quantity of stores; slammed and bolted the door behind him; then turned to seek a window through which he could make his getaway—only to learn to his dismay that the apartment in question possessed no window. Nevertheless, daylight was shining into the room through a crevice between two of the planks which formed its ceiling, and, desiring that those planks were obviously loose, Bill stumbled towards a big provision barrel that stood in a far corner.

To reach that barrel he had to pull aside several small kegs. One of these contained gunpowder, and in dragging it out of the way Bill overturned it—a circumstance which, unbeknown to him, was to expose him to deadly peril.

The keg rolled across to the door he had bolted, and thumped against it heavily. At the same time a stream of powder spilled through a faulty seam in the cask and trickled under that door, on the other side of which Stone, Cactus Dawson and the men from the bar were now mustering.

The crooks had drawn their six-shooters, and several of them were preparing to pour a volley through the store-room door when Stone restrained them.

"Wait!" he said. "There's no need to waste cartridges. We've got Hickok where we want him. There's no window in that room there, an' no way out except by this door. Yeah, we've got him where we want him—cornered like a rat in a trap!"

"Hickok," he called out, "you're bottled up good an' proper, and it won't do you any good to show fight. Now you come on out with your hands in the air, or we'll bust in and shoot you like a dog."

There was no response, and, seeing nothing for it but to break into the store-room, Stone beckoned to his confederates and moved towards the bolted door, beneath which the powder spilled from the cask had trickled, though none of the crooks had noticed it.

There was a lighted cigarette between Stone's lips, and he threw it down as he and his associates were preparing to hurl themselves at the door with drawn guns. And that cigarette, dropping to the floor, came into contact with the gunpowder that had issued from the keg.

The grains of powder were ignited, and sputtered wickedly; and, since they formed a fuse-train which led from Stone's feet to the keg within the store-room, the spark consuming them swiftly ate its way under the door towards the overturned cask, whose contents were bound to explode with shattering effect.

Meanwhile, in the far corner of the apartment, Bill Hickok had laid hold of the big provision barrel and had manoeuvred it into such a position that it was immediately beneath the loose planks he had observed in the ceiling. Now he was scrambling on to the barrel to set his hands against the boards, and, as he was pushing those planks upward, so the spark created by Stone's cigarette drew rapidly nearer to the fatal keg—rapidly nearer!

(Is Wild Bill Hickok destined to be blown to bits by the explosion that is imminent? Or will he escape from that death-trap before the blast takes place? Will little Jerry be avenged? Swimming is Still Johnny Weissmuller's Favourite Hobby

Johnny Weissmuller may have given his exhibition swimming for his rôle as the Tarzan of the screen, but he has never given up his loyalty to the sport. Accordingly, when not before the camera of a personal appearance tour, he is to be found doing regular duty as a lifeguard on the beach at Santa Monica.

He has an official badge and regular hours of duty, just as the men who earn their living in the service.

He has made several rescues. One was a boy, Johnny brought him in, unconscious. Restoratives were applied. The boy looked up into Johnny's face. "Tarzan!" he gasped, and promptly fainted again.

Johnny's first fame came when, practising swimming one day, he and his brother rescued several people in an excursion steamer disaster.

Johnny was a sickly boy, and took to swimming for his health. He improved, attracted attention in school teams, and was taken in hand by William Bachrach, coach at the Chicago Athletic Club, who is still Johnny's mentor. His Olympic and other records, since acquired, are now sports history. Many have never been broken.

"Chum" Makes the Grade

Chum, film-director Walter Forde's four-year-old wire-haired terrier, has at last become a screen actor himself; he will be seen in the Michael Balcon film "Cheer Boys, Cheer," which his master is directing at the Ealing Studios. His part in the film is the reward for four years of patient waiting at the back of the camera, for Chum has been Walter Forde's inseparable companion on the set.

There have been, you may say, dog actors before Chum, and his entry into histrionics may not—you may therefore claim—merit any undue attention; but Chum has made his entry into films newsworthy by being the first dog to write in his own part in the script. There is a scene in "Cheer Boys, Cheer," on which the unit was working the other day and in which there is a collision between two cars. Five principals of the film are in this scene—Nova Pilbeam, Jimmy O'Dea, Edmund Gwenn and that grand comedy team—Moore

Marriott and Graham Mollatt. The collision causes some commotion among them, and it was this commotion which Chum found irresistible; before Walter Forde could restrain him he rushed harking into the fray and proceeded to bury his teeth enthusiastically into the ample flesh of Graham Mollatt, causing the stout lad to protest in no uncertain terms. Chum's entry, it was found when they screened the "rushes," lent great vigour to the scene, and it was decided to keep him in the film.

D. W. Griffith, Pioneer Film Director, Joins Hal Roach

David Wark Griffith, pioneer Hollywood director and producer, who retired from pictures about eight years ago, is returning to active participation in the industry by joining the Hal-Roach Studios in an advisory capacity. In addition, Mr. Griffith will act as consultant on story material. Should the veteran director find a vehicle that strikes his particular fancy, he may even direct it, he states.

Inasmuch as the Roach productions are distributed through United Artists, Griffith returns to a company that he himself helped to found in 1919 along with Charlie Chaplin, Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks.

Griffith's best-known film is "The Birth of a Nation," which is still being shown in many sections of the globe. He is also responsible for such screen classics as "Intolerance," "Hearts of the World," "Broken Blossoms," "Way Down East," and "Orphans of the Storm."

Among the players Griffith helped to develop were Mary Pickford, Dorothy and Lillian Gish, Blanche Sweet, Mae Marsh, Richard Barthelmess, Constance Talmadge, Owen Moore and Alice Joyce.

Since his last picture, "The Struggle," made in 1931, Griffith has been residing at his birthplace in Kentucky, where he has been working on his autobiography.

Keeping Up the Props

Charles Ryan is a most harassed property man, for not only has he to live in the past, but must dip into the future to keep up with a progressive property box.

Ryan, in charge of props for the Hardy Family series, has to preserve every essential article that appeared in the first picture of the series more than two years ago. He also is required to keep the various items which accumulate in each successive picture, and the end is not in sight.

"There," said Ryan, pointing to a huge mounted swordfish, "is a white elephant that came in one of the first pictures. Over yonder"—he indicated a huge wall bookcase—"is the law library. My collection also includes an automobile from 'Love Finds Andy Hardy.'"

The Ryan prop box is augmented in the latest picture of the series, "The Hardys Ride High," by a large iron frying pan, the first of its kind the family has ever owned. It represents the sole loot which Fay Holden gets out of an inheritance of a fortune that goes astray.

"But they'll use that pan in the next picture, so I'll have to keep it," said Ryan. "It's like that with everything they use. Of course, we can and do duplicate some of the articles, but most of the familiar ones stay with us. The public has come to recognise them."

£400,000 Film Prop

The most valuable prop in the history of motion pictures will be used in "Charlie Chan in the City of Darkness," if 20th Century-Fox is successful in its efforts to obtain use of the £400,000 former Imperial throne of China.

Executives of the film corporation learned the throne was in the United States when newspapers carried dispatches from New York stating that it had been mis-addressed, lost and found again after an exhaustive search. It had stood unguarded on a New York dock for three days before it was discovered in a crate addressed to an Oakland professor.

The throne would be valuable to the picture, because "City of Darkness" deals with the theft of precious Chinese objects of art, smuggled from the country as the Japanese moved in. This is the history of the throne.

Because dispatches neglected to give the name of the person in charge of the throne in the United States, 20th Century-Fox offices in New York have been asked to investigate the possibility of acquiring it for the picture.
